MOST important of all is the table. It is not necessary that its appointments should be costly—they may be dainty and pretty at very small expense, indeed so small that we have little excuse that they should be otherwise. Little need be said of the table itself; it should be simple and appropriate in design and with a polished top if possible, though this is not essential unless one wishes to use it without a cover. The plainest of linen is in the best taste, but its quality will depend on the limit of what one feels they may spend; it is one department in which every housewife longs to be extravagant. Highly colored embroideries in realistic designs are no longer used on the table. Plain white in solid embroidery is in the greatest favor, though delicate shades that correspond with the colors of the room are sometimes used. A love of pretty china often tempts one to buy indiscriminately any dainty piece that catches the fancy at the moment. But though each of these may be quite beautiful enough to make us covet their possession, the result may be a table that, in variety of color and design, suggests nothing but a counter in a china store. A few odd pieces may add a pleasing touch of contrast to the table, but in their selection the general color scheme should not be forgotten, and the contrast must be a harmonious one.

AN 18TH CENTURY SIDEBOARD

Good taste demands simplicity in the decoration of the table; elaborate arrangements of flowers and ribbons are out of place on the home table, even when it is laid for most formal entertaining, and is much less artistic than a natural arrangement of the flowers in a pretty bowl or vase.

A fireplace is an additional beauty

Continued on page 32

Such a good Soup.

"Remember my face — you'll see me again."

Such a little price. Such a thick, nourishing, strengthening soup is Edwards'; so small is the cost that everyone can well afford it.

Edwards' Soup is prepared from specially selected beef and the finest vegetables that Irish soil can produce. It comes to you all ready for the saucepan. The cook will find Edwards' Soup a great help in the kitchen. It goes with lots of things that aren't as tasty by themselves; it strengthens her own soups and there's double the variety in the menu when Edwards' Soup is on the pantry-shelf.

Buy a packet to-day.

EDWARDS' DESICCATED SOUP

5c per Packet

Edwards' dessicated Soup is made in three varieties—Brown, Tomato, White. The Brown variety is a thick, nourishing soup prepared from best beef and fresh vegetables. The other two are purely vegetable Soups.

Edwards' desiccated Soup is made in Ireland by Irish labor. There and in England it is a household word.

1203

A Christmas Morning

KODAK

All the child world invites your Kodak. Wherever the children are there is endless opportunity for a Kodak story—a story full of human interest to every member of the family. And there's no better time to begin that story than on the home day—Christmas.

There are Kodaks now to fit most pockets and all purses and practical little Brownies, that work on the Kodak plan and with which even the children can make delightful pictures of each other. There are Brownies as cheap as one dollar and Kodaks from five dollars up—no excuse now for a Christmas without the home pictures. Write for our catalogue—or better still, let your dealer show you how simple and inexpensive Kodakery has become.

Make somebody happy with a Kodak.

CANADIAN KODAK CO., Limited, Toronto, Can.

NOT to IMPROVE on NATURE, but to SHOW HER at HER BEST

A Skin soft and aglow with health—Hair that glistens in silky, wavy masses; and Hands smooth, white and perfectly manicured.

Wrinkles, blotches and an unhealthy appearance to the skin mar a woman's face more than irregular features.

DAGGETT & RAMSDELL'S PERFECT COLD CREAM

is a skin food and a purifier. It builds up the tissues, removes impurities and gives the clear, natural color of perfectly healthy skin. It's good beause it's pure.

At the first sign of dandruff in your hair, or when it starts to comb out, start using

PALMER'S Hair Tonic

50c. and $1.00 sizes.

It cleanses, stimulates and refreshes the scalp. Contains no oil or any injurious substances. Your hair will then exhibit all its own natural beauties.

You cannot give a finished appearance to your nails by merely trimming them with a pocket-knife.

LUSTR-ITE

preparations and tools are used by 90 per cent. of the leading manicurists, and give to your hands that subtle charm that distinguishes those who care for the niceties of good breeding.

At most dealers in toilet requisites, or for six cents (6c.) in stamps (to defray packing and postage) we will send you a sample package of Daggett & Ramsdell's Perfect Cold Cream and Lustr-ite nail preparations, together with booklets containing information of great interest to you.

J. PALMER & SON, Limited. 5 and 7 De Bresoles St., Montreal

TRINITY COLLEGE SCHOOL
Port Hope, Ont.

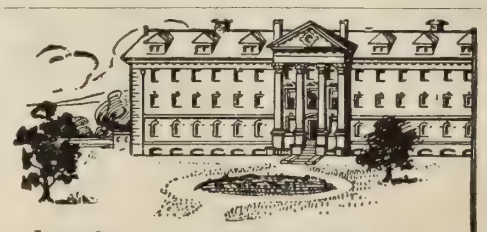
Residential School for boys.
Healthy Situation.
Fireproof Buildings.
Extensive Playgrounds, large Gymnasium, Skating Rinks, etc.

Boys prepared for the Universities, Royal Military College, and Business. Special attention given to younger boys.
For calendar and all information apply to the Headmaster.

REV. OSWALD RIGBY, M.A.
(Cambridge) LL.D.
PORT HOPE - - - ONT.

PICKERING COLLEGE
NEWMARKET

A Residential School for Boys and Girls with Preparatory, Commercial, and Collegiate Courses, Music and Art



LARGE GROUNDS, new buildings, beautifully situated, with perfect sanitary equipment, electric light, steam heating, roomy, well-ventilated.

COMPETENT instruction, firm discipline, and home-like, Christian influences unite with these material advantages to make Pickering College worthy of your confidence. For Announcement write

W. F. FIRTH, M.A., D.Sc., Principal.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Canadian Girls' Club

Christmas Gifts

EVERY year thousands of subscriptions are sent as Christmas gifts, and each year the custom is increasing. Do you realize what an opportunity this offers to our members for securing orders quickly, often several from one person? Especially will it help those members who live in villages having only a few possible subscribers, and those others who only call on a small circle of friends and relatives. Many of the girls use it very largely.

Dear Secretary.

Your suggestion to urge the Journal as a Christmas gift has been the financial wonder of the year. At least, it has been worth many dollars to me. Everyone has at least one friend at a distance to whom she wants to send something. Often it is some once intimate friend who moved away and gradually stopped writing. My inquiry recalls them to mind, and a gift often follows.

Your friend,
L. A. R.

This is from one of our seasonable members:

Dear Club Secretary:

I am very busy, but I simply cannot afford to miss $25 or $30 when I can earn it so easily. So, though I do not have time to see any new people, I will try to renew all my old subscribers, and get their Xmas subscriptions. Every year the number of gift orders increase, as they find how delighted their friends are with the Journal. Please send all supplies.

Yours in haste,
A. N.

For gift subscriptions we send a card to arrive on Christmas morning, announcing gift and giver, which will explain this letter to the uninitiated.

Dear G. C. Secretary:

Please send me another Christmas card to show my friends, mine is all worn out. I find the idea of having a copy of the Journal and the Christmas card arrive on Christmas morning adds to the attractiveness of the Journal as a gift. A subscription is such an easily sent gift, and one remembered so long that it is becoming more popular every year. Few people get too many magazines to enjoy them all. I count on my Christmas gift business to pay for all my own gifts and many other things besides.

Faithfully,
L. E. C.

I wish I could publish all the letters that come in from those who wish to join the club; they are so enthusiastic in their praise of the Journal. I am quoting one because it seems to belong to the subject of this month's letter.

Dear Secretary:

Will you enroll me as a Girls' Club member and send all supplies. Last year I sent a number of subscriptions as Christmas gifts, and all of my friends were delighted. I know several people who will subscribe and probably send some gifts. Of course I want to earn some money, but principally I want to help the Journal, because it is Canadian and such a good magazine.

Very truly,
Mrs. C.

"Start now!" Let me give this advice to the many Journal readers who have been intending month after month to write to me, so that they too may take a hand in this movement that is paying the members so liberally and helping the Journal so much.

Take advantage of the best subscription season and the constantly increasing use of magazine subscriptions for Christmas gifts. Last year many new members succeeded just at this time.

Dear Miss E.:

Please send me all supplies. I must go out for my renewals. I started last year at this time, the right time as it proved for me, as most subscriptions around here seem to expire in December. Then the Journal proved a most attractive Christmas gift. I am counting most on extending my list in this way.

Sincerely,
S. W. A.

Please—in whatever place you are, large or small, we need you, and I know you'll find the work interesting, worthy of your best efforts, and one that pays most excellently for the time you spend.

At least let me write you all about our offers—then if you find that membership in the club demands too much of your energy, drop a card to cancel your name.

Very sincerely,
Secretary C. G. C.
c.o. CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL,

Royal Vinolia

THE CHAIN OF NEW PLEASURES

BEST SCIENCE, BEST TASTE AND BEST RESOURCES PRODUCE FINEST SOAPS, PERFUMES AND TOILET LUXURIES IN THE WORLD

ROYAL VINOLIA VANISHING CREAM

IT seems to vanish on the skin, so completely is this delicate, new, Royal Vinolia luxury absorbed by the pores. It is especially welcome to those who dislike the feeling of anything heavy or oily. It is absolutely non-greasy, and will not cause hair to grow. It soothes and refreshes the most delicate skin, and always makes the skin more elastic. As a tonic for the skin and complexion it is without an equal.

Can also be had in glass jars.

Price 25c. per tube or jar.

ROYAL VINOLIA SOAP

IS an entirely new departure in the manufacture of a refined Toilet Soap. Nothing like it has ever been produced before. It contains no animal fat and is absolutely free from germs. It is made almost entirely from vegetable materials, absolutely pure and of the choicest materials that it is possible to buy.

In addition to its soothing and healthful properties, Royal Vinolia Soap possesses a delightful though delicate perfume. The perfume is wholly floral, having a delicious bouquet which is found in no other soap.

Royal Vinolia Soap is pressed in a creamy white cake of refined and beautiful design, absolutely free from any coloring matter, and is enclosed in handsome wrappers and cartons, bearing a unique and exquisite design.

Price 15c. per cake, or 35c. a cardbox of 3 tablets.

ROYAL VINOLIA TOOTH PASTE

A MORE convenient, better form of a better, more scientific tooth paste. The "ribbon" of paste, pressed from the tube, has a special shape, clinging to the bristles of the tooth brush, and is much more convenient to use. The winding key keeps the tube always neat and presentable. Prevents decay, cannot scratch the enamel of the teeth.

Owing to the antiseptic qualities of Royal Vinolia Tooth Paste, the teeth are not only made white and lustrous, but are preserved from decay.

Price 25c. per tube.

ROYAL VINOLIA COMPLEXION POWDER

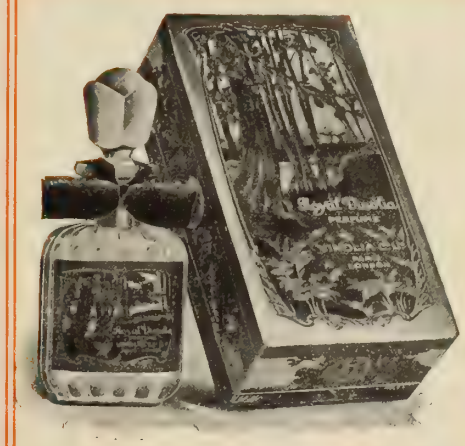
IMPARTS to the skin the velvety appearance of a well-ripened peach. The most trustworthy beautifier for the theatre or when dancing.

For either sunlight or evening lights the powder gives the skin a translucent brightness which is really beautiful.

In the three usual shades—white, cream, and pink.

Harmless, beneficial and protecting.

Price 50c. a box.



ROYAL VINOLIA PERFUME

THE finest essences of flowers and grasses, in a form to charm and delight discriminating users, the new Royal Vinolia Perfumes are entirely free from that heavier odor which may often be found even when the most costly perfumes are first dropped from the bottle.

This perfume is delicate, even when first applied, and its fragrance lingers almost as strongly after two or three days.

In bottles of $1.00 and $1.50 each with an exquisite container.

ROYAL VINOLIA TALCUM POWDER

IN addition to its delightful absorbent quality, it has a mild antiseptic action. In hot weather it prevents perspiration from fermenting, a feature which is not the least of the qualities for which it is so highly prized by persons of refinement.

In addition to ingredients which give it an indescribably refreshing quality, Royal Vinolia Talcum Powder carries with it the exquisite odor and delicacy of the new Royal Vinolia Perfume, affording another pleasure in its use.

A perfect powder for nursery or toilet.

Can be had in white or flesh color.

Price 25c.

By Appointment
Soapmakers to H.M. the King

VINOLIA COMPANY LIMITED

By Appointment Soapmakers to H. M. the King

LONDON PARIS TORONTO

Canadian Depot, Eastern Avenue, Toronto

ROYAL VINOLIA TOILET PREPARATIONS ARE ON SALE AT ALL GOOD DRUGGISTS

THE HOUSE OF QUALITY
REGISTERED

Fairweathers
FURS

—the most sensible of Uncommon and Appropriate Xmas Gifts

Our furs are acknowledgd to be the best money's worth in Canada because they are dependable—years from now the wearer will be as proud of them as to-day.

Write for Fur Catalogue

Persian Lamb Sets 25.00 to 125.00	Black Pony Coats 50.00 to 175.00
Black Fox Sets 75.00 to 200.00	Sealskin Jackets 250.00 to 500.00
Mink Sets 55.00 to 350.00	Furlined Opera and Evening Cloaks 75.00 to 350.00
Isabella Fox Sets 35.00 to 175.00
Ermine Sets 85.00 to 500.00	Fur Hats 30.00 to 100.00

We also sell Ladies' Hats, Evening Gowns and Dresses, Plain and Fancy Waists, Neckwear, etc., suitable for gifts.

FAIRWEATHERS LIMITED
84-86 Yonge Street
TORONTO
297-299 Portage Avenue WINNIPEG
485-487 St. Catherine St. W. MONTREAL

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

MATTERS MUSICAL

THERE is no season of the year that commands a greater wealth of music and poetry than the approaching anniversary of the birth of the Bethlehem Babe. Even the fact of the Resurrection seems to become a secondary joy in Christian lands. The sorrows which led up to the Resurrection throw around that sacred memory a solemn awe, resulting in a rather distant feeling, or in one tinged with sympathy, whereas the gift to mankind of a Heavenly Babe is heralded alone with acclamations of joy and thanksgiving. It is noticeable that to the composer, only joyful sentiments are suggested, for all through his various compositions, both in verse and music, there is struck that resonant note which would peal out "Peace on Earth." Even the cathedral chimes seem to be tuned in a more joyful key as they echo the Christmas song.

At this season there are many requests made for appropriate songs, anthems, etc., for home and church work, and while it is almost impossible to frame a programme that would be possible under widely different conditions, yet the following is submitted as a very happy combination, and one not too difficult for even the small choir or glee club, yet will show a range of work very attractive to the best organization.

Organ Prelude "Holy Night"—Dudley Buck
Anthem—"The First Christmas Morn" —Newton
Soprano Solo—"Star of Bethlehem"—Adams
Quartette—"O Holy Child of Bethlehem" —Neidlinger
Baritone Solo—"Nazareth" —Gounod
Anthem—"Christmas" —Shelley
Organ Postlude—"Pilgrims' Chorus"—Wagner

The opening prelude is extremely pleasing through its simplicity, and carries the strains of several sweet melodies. The first anthem is one of Newton's best, bringing in delicate piano parts, as well as some strong crescendos. The second anthem calls for soprano and contralto solo work, which, while not difficult, is very effective. An extremely attractive chime effect lends seasonable color to this work. Little need be said of Wagner's "Pilgrims' Chorus," only that it has endeared itself to the general public.

A programme that will give a greater scope for a larger chorus, and also more complete satisfaction to the hearers, might be worked out of the following:

Organ Prelude—"March of the Magi"—Dubois
Anthem—"Gloria" —Mozart
Baritone Solo—"The Message of the Angels" —Hawley
Ladies' Chorus with Baritone Solo—"List the Cherubic Host" —Gaul
Quartette—"A Hymn to Christmas"—Weigand
Tenor Solo—"Fear Not Ye" —Buck
Anthem(Soprano)obligato"Inflammatus" —Rossini
Contralto Solo—"Dear Little Stranger" —Gabriel
Anthem (Contralto Solo)—"O Thou that Tellest Good Tidings" —Handel
Organ Posleude—"Hallelujah Chorus" —Handel

There are few who do not know the famous "Gloria" with its grand tone and wonderful climax. Truly, the composer of such was a master. The Ladies' Chorus mentioned will well repay special attention. In the writer's experience, no other chorus has no completely captivated the audience. This is perhaps due to the very limited numbers written for female voices, but combined with this, the composer presents an exceptionally pleasing harmony. The effect is heightened with a beautiful baritone solo and obligato.

"Inflammatus"—the very mention of this leads one to give it a place of prominence in all the Christmas work. We are brought into the chorus after a very telling organ prelude. The soprano voice carries through an obligato to the accompaniment of very soft chorus parts, which are noticeable by their insistence, and at times lead into splendid fortissimo effects.

The contralto voice has good opportunity in Handel's "O Thou That Tellest." This anthem will well repay careful study. A grand climax to this service of song could be none other than the "Hallelujah Chorus."

Any requests for music on this page may be addressed to the Musical Editor, and we will be pleased to secure same for our readers.

Personal enquiries along this line at this or other seasons are always given special attention, and our correspondence column is open to all.

Answers to Correspondents

A VOICE WITHOUT BODY.

What qualifications are essential to a successful study of voice culture. Has the possessor of a thin small voice a good chance to make success?—Grace W.

If your friend will take our advice kindly, she will try to forget her ambition to study voice culture, and devote her love of music to some instrumental study, as the likelihood of even having personal satisfaction under her handicap is small. The qualifications for the work are: First, voice; second, taste and love for music; third, natural intelligence. The thin hollow voice too often indicates delicate constitution, and seldom can stand the exertion and strain necessary to take care of the heavy work, and lacks volume with which to express the wide range of music written.

SYNCOPATION.

What is meant by syncopation in music?—A Subscriber.

Syncopation is the connecting of the last note of a bar with the first one of the next bar, so as to form but one note of a duration equal to both. little practice.

THE FIELD FOR ORGANISTS.

What are the openings for a lady organist in the larger cities?—Mildred E.

The best city churches now require a male leader and organist combined. But your chances are good if you will make a study of leadership also.

THE INSTRUMENTAL FIELD.

What instruments would you advise teaching to children with a view to their pleasure and profit,—Mrs. W. G. B.

So much depends on the ability of the individual child that a general answer to the above is very hard. No instrument will give greater pleasure, when mastered, than the violin, and expert teachers of it are all too rare. To achieve the highest results from the violin, the player must, in nature, be in harmony with the higher ideals and have a keen perception of the delicate blending and toning in all life. Other instruments leading to great pleasure and open fields of self-support may be mentioned: Pipe organ, 'cello, cornet, clarionet, and harp. At the rate Canada is growing, there is bound to be an immense field for the good musician, and especially for those able to create a Canadian temperament in their work through originality.

VOICE TIMBRE.

What is meant by timbre of the voice?—H. B.

By timbre is meant the quality of the musical tone; there are two timbres in the voice, called clear and sombre. The clear is best illustrated in children's voices, expressing a kind of open ingenuousness and light-heartedness; the sombre is illustrated in mature voices, expressing earnestness and seriousness.

The voice of all the people on the stage—
The choice of all the people off the stage—

The Edison Phonograph is the theatre—the opera, the drama, the concert, the vaudeville—offering a great and more varied program than any theatre in the land—and playing to the biggest audience in the world.

Think of the stars of the drama—Sarah Bernhardt, for example; of the opera, like Slezak, Scotti, Carmen Melis; the headliners of vaudeville, such as Harry Lauder, Stella Mayhew, Marie Dressler, Sophie Tucker and Anna Chandler; the masters of instrumentation, like Sousa and his band, Herbert and his orchestra—right in your own home theatre, or wherever you go and whenever you want them.

That's what it means to you to own the

EDISON PHONOGRAPH

Send for catalog and complete information to-day.

The advantages of the Edison are as definite as they are important—and the way to know all about them is to send for the complete information which we have ready to send to you. Write for it now.

Edison Standard Records	$0.40
Edison Amberol Records (play twice as long)	.65
Edison Grand Opera Records	$0.85 to 2.50

Any Edison dealer will give you a free concert. There is an Edison Phonograph at a price to suit everybody's means, from $16.50 to $240.00, sold at the same prices everywhere in Canada. Write to and it means "keep the boys at home." The Edison is the original antidote for "the breaking of home ties."

THOMAS A. EDISON, INC., 115 Lakeside Ave., Orange, N.J., U.S.A.

And it means the sweet toned, long-playing Amberol Records—every selection rendered as completely as from the stage and as real as the real thing. You need the Edison and you want it. Go to the Edison dealer near you and get it.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Your Best Christmas Gifts will be Yearly Subscriptions to

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

They are very inexpensive if orders are sent direct to us

At Our Christmas Gift Rates

3 SUBSCRIPTIONS $2.00

5 SUBSCRIPTIONS $3.00

(United States subscriptions each 35c extra)

While stars at Christmas shine
Lighting the skies,
Let only loving looks
Beam from your eyes.
While bells of Christmas ring
Joyous and clear,
Speak only happy words
All mirth and cheer.
Give only loving gifts
And in love take;
Gladden the poor and sad,
For dear love's sake.
—S.N.
Christmas Greetings
Canadian Home Journal
will be sent to you during the coming year as a Christmas gift. May you have a Merry Christmas and a Joyous and Successful Year from

A miniature reproduction of the card which we send to announce the gift on Christmas morning. If you would like to send your personal card, it will be enclosed with this.

ATTRACTIVENESS, price and Canadianism make the JOURNAL a most desirable gift. Twelve times a year it recalls your kindness, and that you were the giver adds to the pleasure which each copy brings.

The January Fiction Number and an attractive Christmas Card announcing the gift and giver are mailed to arrive on Christmas morning, a generous addition to the good cheer which "Postie" brings on that joyous day.

MUTUAL interest in the JOURNAL serves as a bond to keep you in closer touch with friends at a distance. Often it is the only home magazine received, bringing culture, entertainment and helpful suggestions. To every home it brings special Canadian interests and a feeling of Dominion unity.

You may combine with others to send gift subscriptions. Firms will find the JOURNAL an attractive gift to ladies in their employ.

WHY not send us many names on your gift list, and avoid the weary days of Christmas shopping through crowded stores, and the dissatisfaction with gifts purchased. Every year thousands of subscriptions are sent as Christmas gifts, solving the problem, "What will my friend want, and what hasn't she now?" The JOURNAL is sure to please every woman, and if a name is already on our subscription list you will be notified at once to send another, so there is no chance of duplication.

A gift subscription avoids all risk and trouble, and cost of sending, which with other presents is an expense to you without adding value to the gift.

SPECIAL NOTE: Order before the Christmas rush to make sure the presents will be received on Christmas Day. To have any chance at all of this, orders for the far East or West must reach us by December 16th, others by December 20th. Give full names or initials and full addresses of both subscriber and sender.
Send all orders to CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, 59 John St., TORONTO

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

"I do express the hope that, by possessing and controlling such a book as this Encyclopaedia Britannica, Cambridge may become, more than it has ever been in the past, an inspiring centre of world-wide intellectual life, and able to carry out not only its national but also its international function."

The late S. H. Butcher, Pres. of the British Academy, M.P. for the University of Cambridge.

The Christmas Season AND The New (11th) Edition OF THE Encyclopaedia Britannica

"Concerning the eleventh edition, it is a gift of unspeakable value to all classes of readers from the plain man up, one of those human debts that money does not discharge....Every growing family of Canadians, pretending to any intelligence, whether they have carpets or not, ought to be provided with the eleventh edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica." From a Review in the Manitoba Free Press, August 5th, 1911.

THE WORK IS NOW COMPLETELY PUBLISHED

29 Volumes 40,000 Articles 44,000,000 Words

And is being dispatched to applicants—the entire work, 29 volumes—on receipt of the first payment of $5.00. Subscribers will now receive the new Encyclopaedia Britannica in one shipment. The incoming supplies of complete sets, fresh from the printer and binder, will ensure that orders registered now will be promptly executed. The preliminary announcement of the 11th Edition in advance of publication resulted in an unparalleled tribute to the Encyclopaedia Britannica, more than 32,000 orders for the work (value over $5,000,000) being registered before it was published. This necessarily involved inconvenience to many applicants, who had to wait for their books. It is advisable, however, that new applications shall be registered quickly—while the work is in stock. Should a new printing still be found necessary, it would again necessitate delay in turning out complete sets. Especially is immediate application advisable in the case of those who wish to purchase the new Encyclopaedia Britannica as a Christmas present.

The Spirit of Christmas

THE principal motive with most persons when making a Christmas present is to give something useful but at the same time "distinctive," and the great difficulty is to think of something suitable to give. The new Encyclopaedia Britannica, while more than filling every ordinary requirement, has a special appropriateness as a Christmas gift. Christmas is a season when men and women may be said to yield to a recognition of ideals, aspirations and traditions, which are the common property of the whole of mankind. Being a festival observed in all Christian countries, it typifies the truth that the most vital of human interests disregard the barriers of nationality, and being established in commemoration of events which occurred ages ago it expresses the debt of the present to the past.

The Encyclopaedia Britannica is the only work in any language in which an attempt has been made to epitomize and elucidate in an adequate manner the thought, achievements and life of our common humanity. It has been built upon a structure so broad in its foundations and so inclusive in its scope as to ignore no sphere of human activity, and no fact of useful purport in the evolution of the race.

Drawing its contributors from every civilized country, the 11th edition is based on the essentially cosmopolitan character and origin of the main factors which make for human progress, and in freely applying the historical method in every department of knowledge. there has been constant endeavor to express the present in terms of the past in which that present finds its roots.

The Encyclopaedia Britannica in the Home

THE Encyclopaedia Britannica is so obviously a gift the usefulness of which will be shared by its possessor with others, young and old, that it is impossible to think of it in the light of a Christmas present without a thought of its general utility in the household. The amount of service which it can render under such circumstances is clearly only limited by the extent of the desire of the members of the family for information.

For the Mere Pleasure of Reading

BUT perhaps the chief merit of the book as a household treasure is that, from merely referring to it, its possessor is led to read its articles for the pleasure they afford. He soons finds that the vast fund of knowledge accumulated in this book by the leading authorities in every branch of human achievement has all the interest of a real contribution to literature. So universal is its appeal that anyone who has the slightest interest in the facts or the romance of nature or of life is bound eventually to become engrossed in its contents. These light and incredibly thin volumes picked up out of idle curiosity are laid aside with reluctance, and the casual enquirer is unconsciously transformed into the systematic student.

Application For The New India Paper Prospectus, 164 Pages Post-Free Upon Request

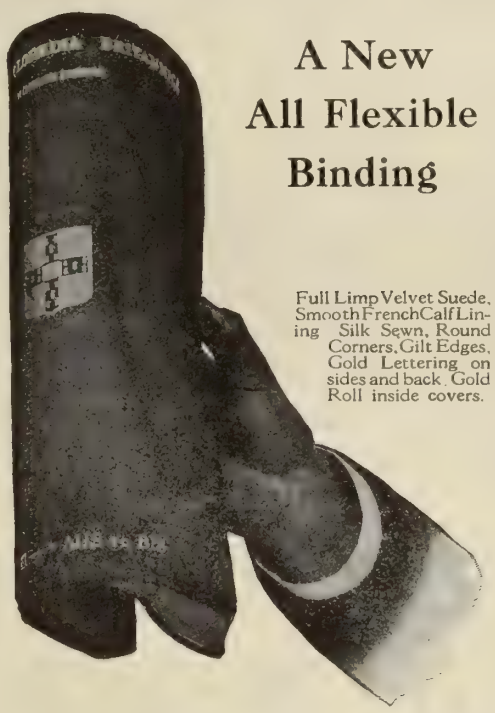
Full particulars of prices, deferred payments, book-cases, bindings, together with the prospectus described opposite, will be sent free, on application to

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS
(Encyclopaedia Britannica Department)
0504
ROYAL BANK BUILDING, TORONTO

Name.....

Residence.....

.....



A New All Flexible Binding

Full Limp Velvet Suede, Smooth French Calf Lining Silk Sewn, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, Gold Lettering on sides and back. Gold Roll inside covers.

This new binding for the India paper volumes has all the merits of previous styles as well as the following:

1. Greater Durability. The covers are rendered perfectly flexible by a lining of calfskin, and will therefore not crease or crack, as the customary cardboard lining has been dispensed with.
2. Greater Pliancy. The volumes are as flexible and "give" as though the covers were removed and only the India paper contents remained. They may be folded into four without risk of damage.
3. Greater Portability. The new Encyclopaedia Britannica is designed and recognized as a book not merely for reference but for reading. It is no small advantage of the new format that an odd volume of the work can be doubled like a magazine and slipped into the coat pocket, or into a travelling bag, ready to occupy an idle half-hour.
4. Greater Charm. The velvety surface offered by the natural nap of the skin of the cover is gratifying alike to the eye and the touch. It would be difficult to find a material more pleasing in respect of colour or texture than this mole-grey leather. It has all the distinction of a binding de luxe, for it is at once unusual and appropriate. (It is sold only with a bookcase, which is included in the price.)

The reduction in weight and bulk effected by the use of India paper has been exemplified by the publishers of the new Encyclopaedia Britannica in the preparation of a new prospectus in which the book is described with a fidelity and at a length attainable within a reasonable compass in no other way. In format this prospectus is a replica of the India paper impression, and it has thus been possible not only to reproduce a large number of extracts from typical articles exactly as they appear in the original work, but to demonstrate in the prospectus itself, which consists of 164 pages of printed matter, together with numerous selected plates, maps, cuts, etc., the convenience and compactness of the India Paper Format.

An Ideal Present for the Young

THE supreme quality, however, of the Encyclopaedia Britannica as a gift, is that it gives to its readers as complete a statement as possible of the present condition of knowledge. The recipient feels, especially if he is in the period of his mental growth, that the gift of a work of such learning and authority is stimulating to his intelligence and that, in accepting it, he incurs an obligation to use it for the purposes for which it has been given.

The number of directions in which the systematic use of the Encyclopaedia Britannica may influence for good a developing mind is legion. It is not intended for idle and listless reading, but supplies an accurate scrutiny of the foundations of conclusions, opinions and beliefs. By its insistence on what is essential in every question, and by its elimination of all that is irrelevant, it promotes habits of concentration and analysis, and instils a sense of intellectual values. In its thousands of biographies of the men and women who have figured prominently in the human story, it opens new horizons and sets up new ideals. To some readers, it may even indicate, for the first time, their real vocation, for it is a fact that, in nearly every efficient, useful life, there is traceable, at some parting of the ways, the determining influence of a book.

First Payment $5.00

The entire set of 29 volumes will be dispatched promptly on receipt.

The 11th edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica offers a complete exposition of knowledge, a fresh survey of what is known, a full and accurate inventory of essential things—of everything that can reasonably be expected to interest a member of a civilized community.

It contains 40,000 articles (by 1500 contributors), 28,150 pages, 44,000,000 words, and the value of the text is increased by 7,000 line drawings and 150 full page plates as well as 169 plate maps and 400 text maps specially prepared from the most modern sources to accompany the articles which they illustrate. Its contents, besides being arranged alphabetically, are indexed in a separate volume (the 29th) containing 500,000 references.

The 11th edition is unprecedented in

1. Its simultaneous production as a whole at a greatly increased outlay ($1,150,000) instead of volume by volume over a period of years as heretofore, all 28 volumes of text being thus of practically even date.
2. Its wholly novel format—India paper, flexibly bound—whereby a reduction in weight of 8 pounds to 3 pounds, and in thickness of 2¾ inches to 1 inch, was effected without sacrifice of legibility or strength.
3. Its endorsement by the University of Cambridge, by whom the copyright of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, after passing from one publisher to another during 140 years, is now controlled, and the imprimatur of whose press the work now bears.
4. The price at which it may be acquired ($4.50 a volume, 1000 pages) is $3.00 a volume, in the cheapest style, less than the price ($7.50 a volume) at which the 9th edition was sold in this country and in England. To the latter figure, however, of $7.50 (which may be regarded as the normal, the standard, charge) the price of the new edition will eventually be raised.

NOTICE—The Velvet Suede Binding can only be produced in limited quantities. Therefore, any one wishing the Encyclopaedia Britannica in this style of binding, either for himself or as a Christmas gift, should order at once. Delivery can take place at any time, but orders should be placed at the earliest possible moment.

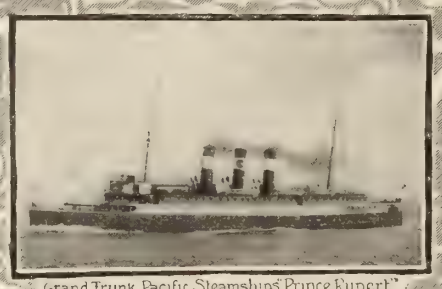
It is Excellence that Counts in all things

EXCELLENCE in RAILWAY SERVICE is expressed in what THE GRAND TRUNK SYSTEM is offering the travelling Public of Canada

The Fort Garry the new Hotel which the Grand Trunk is building in Winnipeg, Man.

The International Limited, Canada's finest & fastest Train en route Montreal to Chicago

Grand Trunk Railway's new Hotel Chateau Laurier Ottawa, overlooking the Federal Parliament Buildings



Grand Trunk Pacific Steamships Prince Rupert & Prince George (3,500 tons—Length 320 ft—18½ knots) Seattle, Victoria, Vancouver Prince Rupert, & Alaska Coast.

New Grand Trunk Pacific Union Station Winnipeg Man.

GRAND TRUNK SYSTEM

Grand Trunk Central Station Ottawa connected by underground passage with the New Hotel Chateau Laurier

The GRAND TRUNK SYSTEM is the only double track railway reaching all centres of trade in Eastern Canada. The GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY is fast becoming a factor in traffic and is now the line par excellence in the Canadian West.

Begin Your Breakfast With This Wholesome Dish!

Crisp hearts of sweetest sugar corn, rolled paper-thin and toasted golden brown—a cereal product that you'll like every morning of the year. Ready to enjoy when the package is opened—unless you'd rather eat them piping hot, and that takes only two minutes in the oven. Be sure to order KELLOG'S to-day.

10c. per pkg.

Kellogg's Try It and See

TOASTED CORN FLAKES

26

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Household Decoration

Continued from page 25

and comfort in every room, or at least it may be if it is simply and appropriately constructed. The most attractive arrangement for the over mantel in the dining-room is a mirror, either hung separately in a large oval frame or built in with the mantel itself. If the mirror is not used an interesting picture may be hung in the space or several smaller ones if their subjects are related and of sufficient importance to fill so conspicuous a place.

The kind of pictures that are hung in each room must be largely a matter of personal choice; no class of pictures is suited to one room alone. The flower and fruit studies that have been so popular for the dining-room in some homes are not inappropriate if they are really beautiful, but they rarely have as much interest as a pretty landscape. Etchings and engravings are, perhaps, the most desirable, but reproductions of great pictures, even in the inexpensive prints, are often very pleasing. Some of the amateur photographs of our natural scenery are quite artistic enough to be worth framing, and make pretty pictures for the dining-room.

If the dining-room is used as a living-room also the furniture and arrangement must be a compromise between the two, but the main object will be to make an attractive living-room. If a convenient serving pantry opens from the dining-room the sideboard may sometimes be entirely dispensed with, leaving more room for the davenport and easy chairs that are needed to make the room comfortable and attractive. A table set in the room or even with its white cover gives it always a formal, unhomelike appearance, and proclaims it a dining-room at once, no matter how cozy and enticing one has made the rest of the room. The extra trouble of changing the cloth for a pretty colored one that harmonizes with the color scheme, and making the table as small as possible, is amply repaid by the improvement in the comfort of the room. The same pictures and curtains will be appropriate for either room, but the plate-rail belongs exclusively to the dining-room.

CONVENIENT SERVING TABLE

The Wrong Word

ONE of our most prominent college professors took unto himself a wife, a very charming and highly cultured German lady who is exquisitely particular about all small matters.

Several years ago, just after she had come to live in this country, she was ever on the qui vive for new forms of expression.

One night the professor came home worn out with the troubles of Commencement. As he was dressing to attend a very formal reception, he remarked:

"I wish we weren't going to this shindig."

"Shindig?" repeated his wife; "what is that?"

"It's the sort of thing we're going to to-night," answered her husband.

At the close of a very enjoyable evening the professor heard his wife saying, "Oh, Mrs. B—, I have so much enjoyed your shindig."—Harper's Magazine.

BOOKS MAKE THE BEST GIFTS

Christmas presents to be appreciated must be in good taste and a good book is always acceptable. The name "Cassel" on a book is a guarantee that its quality and contents are such as to make them desirable as gifts. Select the books you desire to send to friends as gifts then instruct your bookseller to forward books to arrive on Christmas morning. Do not delay as all gift books must be packed and addressed by December 20.

The Land of Veiled Women

By JOHN FOSTER FRASER. With 4 Color Illustrations and 40 Half-tones. Extra crown 8vo. Cloth gilt, $1.80.

Besides telling of the life of the Arabs in their tents, he deals with the well known towns of Algiers, Tlemcen, Bou-Saada, Biskra, Kairouan, and Tunis, giving pen pictures of each, and he describes some of the past glories of North Africa like Timgad and Carthage. He has a good deal to say about the French as colonists, and the way in which they are administering the ancient Mauritania.

The Pilgrim's Progress

By JOHN BUNYAN. With a Life of the Author by the Rev. John Brown, D.D. With 12 Color Illustrations by James Clark, R.I. 8vo, 464 pages. $2.25 net.

No excuse is needed for a re-issue of the immortal work of "the inspired tinker of Bedford." Apart from its inspirational value, "The Pilgrim's Progress" must always rank as one of the purest models of "English undefiled." It only remains for the publishers to state that the demand for an illustrated edition has led them to present this volume, the color pictures of which are contributed by the well-known painter of religious subjects, Mr. James Clark, R.I.

The Truth About Egypt

By J. ALEXANDER. With 8 illustrations. Large crown 8vo. Cloth gilt, $2.25 net.

Since Mr. Roosevelt made his historic speech at the Guildhall, the attention of everyone has been drawn to the future of Egypt. In this book an attempt is made to put the case fairly for both the Nationalist and the supporter of the British Occupation. If the author has taken sides, good reasons are given for this partizanship. The book is written by one who has been in close touch with all the recent episodes in Egyptian affairs, and who is, consequently, well qualified to speak with authority on their political significance.

Canada To-day and To-morrow

By ARTHUR E. COPPING. With 6 Color Illustrations by Harold Copping and 25 Half-Tone Plates. Large crown 8vo. Cloth gilt, $2.25 net.

Mr. Copping, in other branches of literature, has shown that he wields a racy pen. It will be refreshing to readers of travel books to happen on a writer who, avoiding the path of platitudes and dull details, contrives to give us a really live account of things Canadian. Viewed from its sociological side, the book provides some intensely interesting observations by an original writer on the Indians, the Hudson Bay people, the Esquimaux, the Mounted Police and other Canadian folk, whilst a chapter headed "Among the Dukhobors," relating the author's experiences at Veregin, throws a considerable light on the particular idiosyncrasies of these queer Russian emigres.

The New Garden of Canada

By Pack-Horse and Canoe Through Unexplored British Columbia

By F. A. TALBOT. With 48 Plates. Large crown 8vo, 320 pages. Cloth gilt, $2.25 net.

This book should prove of incalculable value to all those who either purpose settling in new British Columbia or investing in the mining, agricultural or industrial interests of that virgin country, because it contains particulars about which the official Blue Books and Guides are yet practically silent. The author commenced his journey at Wolf Creek (Alberta), the most westerly railway point, the long disused trail thence to the Yellowhead Pass being followed by pack-horse. It is by some of the most difficult trails the author takes us, over the Miette River, Yellowhead Lake, Mount Robson, Lake Helena, Tete Jaune Cache, Fort George, Bulkeley Valley, Skeena River, to name but a few of the points touched.

The Unknown Isle

By PIERRE DE COULEVAIN. Translated by ALYS HALLARD. Author of "On the Branch," "American Nobility." 384 pages, demy 8vo. Cloth gilt, $1.35 net.

The isle in question is no Pacific dream, but, traveling from Paris via Calais, you can reach it in seven and a half hours. For the majority of French people it is terra incognita, because they neither know the language nor the true character of its inhabitants, its history or its literature. More than 112,000 readers have enjoyed this book in the original, and it did more to give the French people a proper and appreciative insight into English life than any other book written in France during the last fifty years. We anticipate that this will be one of the best selling and most talked about books published this year.

Talks With Children About Themselves

By AMY B. BARNARD. With Frontispiece in Color. Large crown 8vo, 224 pages. Cloth gilt, $1.00 net.

Miss Barnard has a way of talking to boys and girls that few can rival. What child has ever realized that he carries with him an elaborate telegraphic and telephonic system, a wonderful camera, and, indeed, a whole host of most remarkable mechanical devices. Instructive and entertaining, this handsome book is sure of a welcome from the children.

Life's Contrasts

By JOHN FOSTER FRASER. With Photogravure Portrait of the Author and Eight Full-page drawings. Cloth gilt. $1.75.

Little People

By RICHARD WHITEING. A series of essays on the general theme of "Little People"; the mass of unconsidered trifles of humanity who happen to form the vast majority of the race. With portrait of Author in Rembrandt. Cloth gilt, $1.75.

Quaint Subjects of the King

By JOHN FOSTER FRASER. With 77 Reproductions from Photographs. Cloth gilt, $1.75.

"Every chapter is marked with something fresh, quaint, and interesting, and the whole is written in a bright and easy style, which should make it popular."

Women of All Nations

By T. ATHOL JOYCE, M.A. With 65 Plates. 220 Pages. Cloth gilt, $1.75.

Every-Day Japan

By ARTHUR LLOYD, M.A. With an Introduction by COUNT TADASU HAYASHI. With 8 Colored Plates and 96 Reproductions from Photographs. $1.75.

"Mr. Lloyd has lived in Japan a quarter of a century, and understands what he is describing. He tells his readers a little about everything. . . In a word, he seems to leave no characteristic aspect of the national life untouched upon."

FOR THE BOYS

Biggest

in value and merit

CHUMS

Annual is the Best

For sale by all Booksellers

Janey Canuck in the West

By EMILY FERGUSON. A bright, breezy description of the Canadian West. Just the thing to send to your friends at home. $1.50.

The Other Side of the Lantern

An account of a Commonplace Tour Round the World. By SIR FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D. With 40 Full-page Illustrations from Photographs by the Author. Cheap Edition, cloth, $1.75.

THE LITTLE NATURE BOOKS

The Wood-Folk at Home

By MAY BYRON. With 6 Color Plates and numerous other Illustrations. 30c. net.

The Bird-Folk at Home

By MAY BYRON. With 6 Color Plates and numerous other Illustrations. 30c. net.

LITTLE TRAVEL BOOKS

A Little Journey To Italy

With 6 Full-Page Illustrations in Color by E. W. HASLEHUST 30c. net.

A Little Journey to Switzerland

With 6 Full-page Illustrations in Color by E. W. HASLEHUST 30c. net.

LITTLE BOOKS ON GREAT WRITERS

Robert Louis Stevenson

By ISOBEL STRONG. With 4 Color Illustrations and Photogravure Frontispiece. 30c. net.

Charles Dickens

With 6 Full-page Illustrations in Color by FRED BARNARD 30c. net.

CASSELL'S LITTLE GOLDEN BOOKLETS

The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam

With 4 Color Illustrations by A. A. DIXON. 30c. net

The Dream of Gerontius

With 4 Color Illustrations by JAMES CLARK, R.I. 30c net

Golden Thoughts from Thomas A Kempis

With 4 Color Illustrations by BYAM SHAW. 30c. net.

The Life of Tolstoy

By PAUL BIRUKOFF. Translated by W. TCHERKESOFF. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 16 full-page Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, $1.50 net.

Existing biographies of the great Russian teacher are, to a certain extent, unreliable. This unreliability arises from the false manner in which the biographers regard, and try to explain, important facts of Tolstoy's external and inner life. The need, therefore, for a Life of Tolstoy written by a thoroughly friendly and intelligent hand is evident. Such a book is the short and interesting "Life" by Paul Birukoff, now translated by a Russian scholar, well versed in the English language. No complaint can be made that the facts of Tolstoy's external and inner life are here overstated or underemphasized. In order, moreover, that the book shall be complete, M. Birnkoff has added to his famous Russian work, a short account of Tolstoy's latter days and a Prefatory Note, which should make the book a permanent unit in any Tolstoy collection

Fourteen Years A Jesuit

By COUNT VON HOENSBROECH. Translated by ALICE ZIMMERN. Medium 8vo, two vols., 480 pages in each. Cloth gilt, $7.50 net per set.

The fruit of fourteen years' inside knowledge of the Jesuit Order, this book is written with earnestness and ability, and the account the author gives of his life from his novitiate to his renunciation will be read with keen interest by those who would know something of the inner history of the mystery-enshrouded Society of Jesus. Count von Hoensbroech was educated in the Jesuit School of Feldkirch, and afterwards at Stonyhurst, and his severe criticisms of both institutions will arouse considerable discussion. The Jesuit system of education and moral training is minutely described and unsparingly condemned, and many notable figures in Roman Catholic circles—German and English—are introduced.

All About Airships

By RALPH SIMMONDS. Color Frontispiece by Charles Dixon, R.I., and a large number of Illustrations from Photographs Large crown, 8vo. Cloth, $1.75.

This is a companion volume to "All About Railways," which had such a wonderful success last year, and the publishers anticipate that it will win even greater triumphs than its predecessor. It tells, in a popular way, all that a boy wants to know about balloons, airships and aeroplanes. The chapters include such tempting subjects as "How Men Thought of Flying," "The First Airmen," "The First Dirigibles," "Monoplane v. Biplane," "How an Aeroplane is Made: The Engines that Drive it," "Flying Grounds," "How to Make a Model Aeroplane," whilst the illustrations depict the latest developments in the art of aviation.

Uniform with this volume:

ALL ABOUT RAILWAYS. A Book for Boys. By F. S. HARTNELL. With a beautiful Colored Frontispiece and 48 pages of illustrations. Cloth gilt, colored edges.

Marvels of Fish Life

By Dr. FRANCIS W. WARD, F.Z.S., F.R.P.S. With 64 pages of unique photographs from Nature. Large crown 8vo, 224 pages. Cloth gilt, $1.75 net.

The study of fish life from the photographic standpoint has never received the attention it deserves, and Dr. F. W. Ward, who is the leading authority on the subject, has produced a book which, to say the least, will attract and even astound the majority of readers. Over 100 novel photographs of fish, taken in their natural surroundings, serve as a basis for a series of chapters dealing with many new facts about fish life. Dr. Ward also describes special ponds, and details his methods of taking photographs of fish under water, so that one may see fish as they appear to each other.

The Truth About Spain

By G. H. B. WARD. 12 full-page Plates from Photographs. Large crown 8vo. Cloth gilt, 320 pages, $2.25 net.

What is wrong with Spain? is a question which everyone must have asked himself, in view of the misfortunes that have befallen that country of late years. To-day it is common knowledge she stands in a chronic condition of discontent and corruption. What will be particularly valuable in this volume is that part which the author devotes to an authentic description of the Barcelona riots and the horrors of Montjuich. The true story of the trial and the execution of Ferrer is given, as well as sketches of the leading statesmen of the day.

Barbarous Mexico

By JOHN KENNETH TURNER. 320 pages, 48 plates. Extra crown 8vo. Cloth gilt, $2.25 net.

The constant recurrence of disquieting rumors as to the internal administrations of Mexico has aroused more than a suspicion that this country has but a doubtful claim to rank among the civilized nations. Mr. John Kenneth Turner went to Mexico itself and found out the truth, examined critically the administration, laws, industries, and the social condition of the people, and dwelt among them in the cities and on the plantations. The result of his searching investigations may be gathered from the fact that he can find only one truly satisfactory title for his book — "Barbarous Mexico."

Cassell & Co. Limited 42 Adelaide St., Toronto

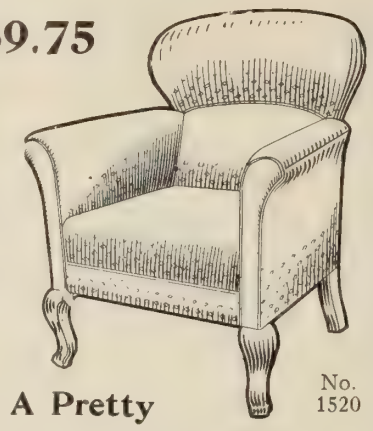
GIFT FURNITURE

IF YOU WANT TO GIVE A PRESENT THAT WILL BRING LASTING GRATITUDE, GIVE FURNITURE

Here are some hints to help you buy nice Furniture at little cost

English Fireside Easy Arm Chair $9.75

No. 1520—Just as illustrated on the right; A very cosy chair, spring seat; all over upholstered in shadow striped denim; solid oak legs. Easily worth $15.00.



No. 1520

Freight Paid

On these pieces to any station within 200 miles of Toronto

No. 2420

$6.75

A Pretty Parlor Rocker

No. 3555—As illustrated below. Frame of polished birch - mahogany, hand shaped. Spring seat, upholstered in nice assortment of French silks. Our special price is

$8.95

For this Morris Chair

No. 2420—Just like cut above. Frame of quarter-cut oak, elaborately carved and polished. Spring seat and back covered in best grade moroccoline; back adjustable to four positions.

No. 3555

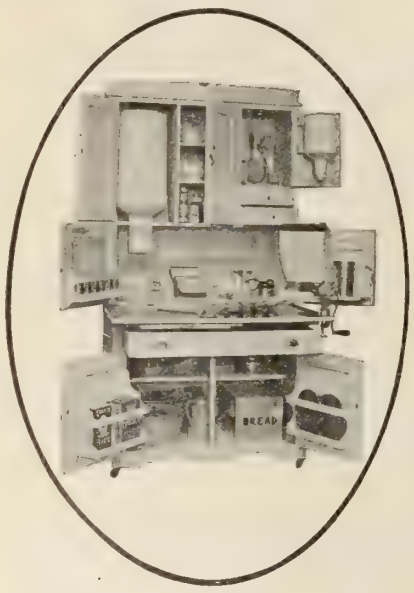
Catalogue "H"

Containing 500 other photographic illustrations of suitable Christmas-gift furniture will be sent free upon request.

The Adams Furniture Co. Limited,

Canada's Largest Home Furnishers

TORONTO, ONT.



An Ideal Christmas Gift

Here's a hint about that Christmas present — for wife, mother or sister— over which you've long been puzzling your brain: Give her a Knechtel Kitchen Kabinet — (a Christmas present of which anyone would be proud.) Handy, compact, useful—you couldn't possibly give her anything which would be more truly appreciated, or which, in giving years of efficient service, would more frequently remind her of the giver.

Built For A Lifetime of Service

The Knechtel Kitchen Kabinet does away with kitchen drudgery and actually cuts kitchen work in half.

Handy and serviceable—fitted with every possible practical convenience — substantially made and beautifully finished.

Any good dealer will be pleased to show you the five handsome styles.

Booklet B mailed upon request.

LOOK FOR THIS TRADEMARK

KNECHTEL KITCHEN KABINET

REGISTERED

Knechtel Kitchen Cabinet Co. LIM'TED

Hanover - - Ontario

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this sisue.

THE COST OF A CRIME

Continued from page 20

you hear? I'll come and speak to Uncle Archie about you to-morrow in spite of you."

She laughed a little, and with a bewildering glance over her shoulder flitted away.

CHAPTER V.

A YEAR LATER.

LIDGATE got out at Clapton Station in the dusk of an autumn evening, and turned his steps in the direction of an obscure, quiet street, where he had to pay a call.

More than a year has elapsed since the disappearance of John Reedham from the ken of those who had known him. The few who had not forgotten him believed him dead.

In Burnham Road, Clapton, remote from the scene of her former happiness, Bessie Reedham lived the life of the solitary and struggling woman in London. She had not even the cloak of widowhood to protect her. She was still attractive, and looked astonishingly young; the year, therefore, had not been without its trials.

Of these trials she did not speak to any human being, least of all to Lidgate, though she knew him to be truly her friend.

But they did not meet often; they could not meet often because of that chance revelation made in the drawing-room at Norwood, when the blow had first fallen across Bessie Reedham's life.

Lidgate bitterly regretted that he had not been able to keep a better guard upon himself. There was now a barrier between them it would be difficult, if not impossible, to clear away.

He was going to her now, against his better judgment, impelled to it by a haunting intuition that she was in trouble of some sort.

He had no ground for that intuition, except his own certainty of it. She had not written to him, or indicated that she would like him to call. Yet there was no hesitation in his step as it approached the familiar house. It was one of a neat, small, uniform row of small dwellings, much sought after by the newly-wed of moderate means because of the pleasant gardens sloping at the back to the River Lea. It was this very garden that had attracted Bessie Reedham in her dreary search for a home suitable to her slender means. They had allowed her to keep the whole of her furniture; the more expensive articles she had sold, and furnished the small house with the simpler items, and had made it a home, albeit it was plain and simple and unpretentious. She had hoped to make it a home likewise to other people who would come to her as paying guests, and be glad, perhaps, to find something a little higher than the usual London boarding house.

Guests had come certainly, but most of them had proved unsatisfactory, exacting, some of them even dishonest. She had been disillusioned, and was now thankful to receive two city clerks who desired a respectable shelter more than a home, preferring to find their social environments outside. Her boy was now at home with her. In spite of her protestations, the Luttrells had kept him another year at Reigate, and after the summer term he had taken a situation in a shop at Clapton. This was a bitter pill for Bessie Reedham to swallow; but the lad had acted on his own initiative, and she had deemed it wiser to let him have his way. But her eye, quickened by love and anxiety, had discovered that he was not happy there, that his spirit was being crushed, and she was almost in despair.

In these dark days her thoughts had turned naturally to Lidgate, who had just returned from a three months' American tour.

It is possible that some spirit message went from her to him, and assured him that he would not be unwelcome at Clapton.

As he turned in at Burnham Road he saw a lad at the opposite corner, and, though he was greatly grown, he recognized Leslie.

He gave a low, quick whistle.

"Hulloa, Leslie, old chap!" The boy stood still, peering through the dusk, uncertain of the voice. When he recognized Lidgate he seemed pleased, and returned the grasp of his hand quite warmly.

The year had reassured Leslie, and his jealousy of Lidgate slept.

"I thought you were in America?" he said bluntly.

"I have only returned a few days. How are you, my boy?"

"I—oh, I'm quite well," he replied, but the falter in his voice seemed to belie his words. Lidgate detained him a moment, as he would have passed on to the house, ashamed, perhaps, of his brief emotion.

"Tell me what it is, lad. I am truly your friend, if you would only believe it," he said sincerely.

"I didn't want to show the white feather," said the lad bravely. "But I'm down on my luck, too. I've been paid off."

"But it was a poor job, Leslie, and never good enough; probably it will come a blessing in disguise," said Lidgate cheerily.

The lad's face brightened.

"I didn't think of it like that. It was only the money I thought of; eight shillings a week isn't much, is it, but it helps a good bit, mother says, more than you'd think."

Lidgate almost gasped.

Eight shillings a week! What did it represent to him—a few boxes of matches, a copper or a sixpence bestowed here and there for service rendered, and not to be taken into account at all.

"How is your mother?" he asked, abruptly changing the theme.

"I'm afraid she isn't very well. It's been very hot in London this summer, and she has only two boarders at present. They pay very little; I know she is worried about the rent."

"Let's go in and see her, lad," said Lidgate, unable to bear any more.

"In a moment. I'd like to tell you how I came to get the sack to-day. I haven't done anything very bad, you know, and the master said he'd never had a sharper lad. But I was cheeky, I suppose. They said something about my father when we were at dinner upstairs, and I got mad, and hit out; with my tongue, I mean. I don't remember what I said exactly, but I know I could have killed them."

Lidgate's heart was full. The bright, eager face from which the rounded fulness of boyhood was so rapidly passing, the troubled eyes, the sensitive mouth, all appealed.

"Dear lad, you did right, quite right. Always cherish his memory, he was a good father to you."

"His memory, why do you say his memory?" he asked sharply. "He's still living, we shall see him again one day. Whatever you or anybody else may say I am sure of that, and so is mother."

Lidgate shook his head; Leslie put his hand on the gate and pushed it open. The brief warming of his heart towards Lidgate passed, and the old distrust returned.

They entered the house, and hearing two voices, Mrs. Reedham came out. That she was quite glad to see Lidgate was evidenced by the pleasure on her face. She had few, almost no friends now; those who thought of her with a passing pity did not come to tell her they remembered her, the world at large is only too anxious to forget those who have dropped into its byways.

"Mother, I've had my tea, I only want to change and go out for an hour. You won't mind now Mr. Lidgate has come," said Leslie, and he saw with an added bitterness that she did not mind in the least, nay, that she would be glad to have some talk with the intruder alone.

He left the house without coming to the small sitting-room at the back they had reserved for their own use; his mother started when she heard the closing of the outer door.

"Leslie is ont very happy where he is, Mr. Lidgate. I wish I could find another place for him."

"I will find him something to-morrow," replied Lidgate readily. "Personally, what I should like to do is to take him to London Wall, but James Currie would certainly object. There would not be any trouble with Sir Philip."

(To be continued)

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

When two numbers are given with one costume, two patterns are required at 12 cents each. Send cash to PATTERN DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, 59-61 John Street, Toronto, Canad Order always by number, stating size wanted. Patterns are mailed from our Toronto office the same day as order is received. PAPER PATTERNS TWELVE CENTS EACH POST PAID.

Graceful Afternoon Gowns

DECEMBER being the month of holidays always means the necessity for just such pretty, graceful toilettes as these. They are all in the height of style. They represent the latest ideas. Yet each one is simple, and involves no complications or difficulties in the making.

The gown to the extreme left is made of crepe meteor, with trimming of lace. The full portion of the blouse is of chiffon, and there is beaded banding around the neck, while the sash is made of satin. The gown is as attractive as well can be. The bertha and the gathered frills are among the latest features. The skirt is circular and complete without the train, which is adjusted over it and attached at the upper edge, consequently this train can be omitted if a simple gown is wanted. Also the waist can be made with yoke and under sleeves, as indicated in the back view, with the result that the gown becomes available for daytime as well as evening occasions. In place of the lace could be used frills of any thin material. For the medium size the waist will require 2¼ yards of material 27, 2 yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with ⅜ yard of chiffon, 3¾ yards of lace 7 inches wide, and 1¼ yards of banding, to make as shown in front view; 5¼ yards of lace and 1¼ yards of allover material 18 inches wide, to make as shown in back view; for the skirt will be needed 6¼ yards 27 or 36, 4¼ yards 44 inches wide.

The pattern of the waist, No. 7218, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 inches bust measure; of the skirt, No. 7083, in sizes from 22 to 32 inches waist measure.

The young girl's frock is made with a simple five-gored skirt that is gathered at the upper edge, and a one-piece blouse made in peasant style. The tucks over the shoulders provide pretty fulness. The trimming is all arranged on indicated lines. In this case the skirt is trimmed with straight frills below the trimming band, but such treatment is optional, for the dress can be made as shown in the back view quite as well as in this more elaborate style. The yoke and undersleeve render it adapted to daytime use. For the 16-year size will be required 5¼ yards of material 27, 4¼ yards 36, 3⅝ yards 44 inches wide, with 2 yards of allover lace 18 inches wide for the trimming, and 2½ yards of additional material 21 inches wide for the gathered frills, and 4½ yards of banding.

The pattern, No. 7213, is cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

Tunics are among the smartest of all things this season. The third and last gown shows a simple straight one combined with a peasant bodice that is draped in surplice style. It is worn over a skirt with train that can be either pointed or square. The back of the bodice can be finished with rosettes after the manner of the front, or with a sash, as liked. In this case lace flouncing is used, but any pretty soft material is equally appropriate for the model. It will be charming in crepe de chine, messaline or any fashionable material. A very charming effect is obtained by using a plain fabric, such as crepe de chine, for the tunic, and trimming of allover lace, and the drapery to match the tunic. For the medium size the flounce, tunic and drapery will require 3⅝ yards of flouncing 38 inches wide, for the sash will be needed 2½ yards of ribbon; for the skirt will be required 5½ yards of material 27, 4½ yards 36, 3¼ yards 44 inches wide. To make the tunic and blouse of plain material will require 5¾ yards 27, 3½ yards 36 or 44 inches wide.

The pattern of the blouse and tunic No. 7221, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 bust, of the skirt, No. 7215, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist.

Fashion Notes

Bands handsomely beaded and embroidered are lavishly taken for dresses and dressy suits. Every endeavor is made to produce the Oriental effect, and it is in trimmings that the idea can be most successfully carried out. Bands have been good during the past season, but there is every indication that the one now fast approaching will see these embroidered bands used in larger proportions than ever.

New garnitures are being featured that are both pleasing and practical. Among these are the long pointed effects in the form of Vandyke points. These are somewhat newer than the bands, and are appliqued onto the gowns it trims. The newest materials in the season's elaborate trimmings are colored worsteds and chenille, which are employed in combination with silks and beading or used separately. The metal embroideries, also gold and silver effects are very handsome, combined with the worsted and chenille embroidery.

The superb trimmings this season would be hard to surpass. It would seem that the elaborate preparations incident upon the coronation of the King and Queen have influenced every mart from whence come millinery goods. It is easy to trace the Oriental touches so much in vogue to the elegant costumes of the Eastern visitors who were such popular and picturesque features of the coronation festivities.

The outstanding feature of trimmings is feathers. The choicest millinery effects will literally "fly in feathers." There is scarcely any limit to the variety. The colors are bewilderingly beautiful—all the bronze and purple and green combinations of the peacock's neck in the sunshine; white joined with grey as in the dove's breast, black,

Waist Pattern No. 7218
Skirt Pattern No. 7083

Pattern No. 7213

Blouse Pattern No. 7221
Skirt Pattern No. 7215

Why Not an Ostrich Feather Gift for Yourself or Friend at Christmas?

London Feather Co., Limited assortment is so varied and so large that there is sure to be something to suit every need and every pocket. Catalogue Free.

Ours is the Largest Ostrich Feather Business in the World

LONDON SELECTED PLUME

The London Selected Plume is, as the name implies, an article every male feather of which has been selected with the greatest care. A more beautiful plume could hardly be made. Eighteen inches long, black, white, or any solid color. Delivery charges paid to any point. Satisfaction guaranteed or your money refunded. - - $5.00

LONDON FRENCH PLUMES

Twelve inches long, $1.50. Fourteen inches long, $2.50. Sixteen inches long, $3.50. Eighteen inches long, $4.50. Black, White and all new colors.

LONDON SELECTED WILLOW PLUMES

The London Willows are all hand knotted and guaranteed. They are unlike many cheap grades, the ends of which are pasted together. This London knotted plume, twenty inches long, 3 ply thick, was made to meet a popular demand, and is a magnificent plume that is giving splendid satisfaction. - - $10.00

LONDON WILLOW PLUMES

Three ply single tie: Seventeen inches long, $5.00; Eighteen inches long, $7.50; Nineteen inches long, $8.50. Three ply double tie: Eighteen inches long, $10.00; Twenty inches long, $14.00; Twenty-two inches long, $16.00.

FULL VARIETY IN OSTRICH FANS

Priced as low as $1. and $2. Special value, $5. Superb fan, $10. Others up to $25. Prices one-third of those where fans are a side line only. Large variety in Marabout Muffs, Stoles, Ostrich Boas, Ostrich Mounts and Novelties.

IN OUR OWN WORKROOMS

we make all London Goods direct from advance models from our European and New York Warerooms, for sale only to our retail customers, at maker's prices. We save you all the middlemen's profits.

YOUR OWN FEATHERS MADE INTO WILLOWS

If you have two, three or more ostrich feathers we can make them into fashionable Willow Plumes, hand-tied. Send them to us and we will write and tell you the cost by return mail. Then if you decide not to have the work done we will return your feathers at our own expense.

LET US SELECT FOR YOU

If you cannot wait for catalogue, send express or postal order for any article listed above, state color preferred, and we will select as carefully for you as if you were in our Sales Parlors. If it is unsatisfactory we will exchange or cheerfully refund your money. We guarantee satisfaction. All goods sent express paid.

Write our Toronto Office To-day for Free Catalogue and Price List.

LONDON FEATHER CO., LIMITED 144 Yonge St., TORONTO

London, Eng. Paris. New York. Montreal. Toronto

Dept. A

BEETHAM'S

La-rola

La-rola is a perfect emollient milk quickly absorbed by the skin, leaving no trace of grease or stickiness after use. Allaying and soothing all forms of irritation caused by frost, cold winds and hard water, it not only preserves the skin but beautifies the complexion, making it SOFT, SMOOTH AND WHITE, LIKE THE PETALS OF THE LILY.

The daily use of La-rola effectually prevents all redness, roughness, irritation and chaps, and gives a resisting power to the skin in changeable weather. Delightfully soothing and refreshing after Motoring, Golfing, Skating, ycling, Dancing, etc.

Men will find it wonderfully soothing if applied after shaving. Ask your Chemist for it.

M. BEETHAM & SON - - - CHELTENHAM, Eng.

An Account for Two or More Persons

A joint account may be opened by two or more persons, and it may be agreed that any one of the depositors may draw on the account. This privilege is a boon to travelers or people away from home frequently. Should any one of the parties to the agreement die, the survivor may obtain all moneys in the account on their own cheques without any expense or delay.

617

Head Office . TORONTO

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS
$6,650,000

TOTAL ASSETS
$50,000,000

The Traders Bank

of Canada

INCORPORATED 1885

113 BRANCHES THROUGHOUT CANADA

changeful as the wings of the grackle; green, like the back of the parrot; white, fluffy and foamy as marabout—all these and other tints quite as charming.

Gowns of Silk with Lace

SILK is one of the favorite materials of the season for afternoon costumes, and it is shown in numberless new and attractive weaves. The two gowns illustrated are, one of silk serge, and the other of the new satin duchess, which is soft and supple, of chiffon quality, the color of the latter is one of the beautiful fashionable greys, and the trimming is of the same material in a lighter, harmonizing shade.

The gown of serge is combined with both black and white lace, and such combination is exceedingly smart. The blouse is a very new one made in sections that are overlapped and arranged over a guimpe lining. This guimpe lining is faced with black lace and forms the V-shaped portions, with white lace for the yoke. It includes white lace undersleeves also, that can be seen through the over ones of black lace. The skirt is made with panels and overlap the side portions, and these side portions are finished and lapped onto the panels. It can be finished with either a high or natural waist line. For the medium size the blouse will require 3 yards of material 27, 2 yards 36, 1½ yards 44 inches wide, with 1 yard of allover black lace 18 inches wide, and 1⅜ yards of white lace 18 inches wide; for the skirt will be needed 5 yards 27, 3¾ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, and 2 yards of lace banding.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7234, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 bust, of the skirt, No. 7238, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist.

The second gown shows one of the new blouses that is made with a circular peplum and big revers. It can be worn over any guimpe. It includes kimono sleeves that are attached to the armholes, but the blouse is cut to extend over the shoulders, and this effect is one of the newest and smartest. The model will be found a charming one for the separate blouse, as well as for the entire gown, and if it is lined with soft silk, it becomes reversible. The skirt is made in three pieces, and is closed at the left of the front, where the edges are overlapped. If liked, these edges can be cut straight in place of being rounded as in the illustration. Worn with this blouse the skirt is finished with a belt at the natural waist line, but it can be cut higher and underfaced if desired for different use. For the medium size the blouse will require 2¼ yards of material 27, 1¾ yards 36, 1¼ yards 44 inches wide, and 1 yard of satin for the trimming; for the skirt will be needed 5¼ yards 27 or 36, 2½ yards 44, with ¾ yard of satin for the trimming.

The pattern of the overblouse, No. 7230, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust, of the skirt, No. 7236, in sizes from 22 to 32 inches waist.

Smart Gowns in Tunic Style

EVERY possible kind of tunic is fashionable this winter, the long and the short, the straight and the shaped. Illustrated are two gowns that

Blouse Pattern No. 7234
Skirt Pattern No. 7238

Blouse Pattern No. 7230
Skirt Pattern No. 7236

represent quite different sorts, yet which are equally smart.

The gown to the left is made of crepe meteor over velvet with trimming of fancy silk. The blouse is made in one piece, in peasant style, but is finished with a square yoke, and trimmed with banding. The tunic is made in two pieces and attached to it. Any preferred blouse can be worn beneath, but this one is in plain peasant style, cut in one piece with the sleeves. The skirt is made in two pieces with seams at the sides only. In addition to its other possibilities, the over-blouse can be used without the tunic, and when treated in this way it becomes a very simple garment, and can be made from any pretty silk or other material in color to match the skirt, to be worn over a guimpe in combination with a tailored skirt or with an odd skirt. For the medium size the tunic will require 2¼ yards of material 27 or 36, 1⅝ yards 44 inches wide, with 4 yards of lace banding; for the skirt will be needed 4½ yards 27, 2¾ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 2½ yards of additional material 21 inches wide for the ruchings.

The pattern of the over-blouse, No. 7227, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 bust, of the skirt, No. 7123, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist measure.

Blouse Pattern No. 7211
Skirt Pattern No. 7034

Blouse Pattern No. 7227
Skirt Pattern No. 7123

exceedingly attractive, and can be utilized in many ways. In the illustration the blouse and skirt are made of messaline, and the skirt is trimmed with ruchings of the material. The over-blouse is made with front and back portions and is closed under the left arm. The tunic is made in two pieces and attached to it. Any preferred blouse can be worn beneath, but this one is in plain peasant style, cut in one piece with the sleeves. The skirt is made in two pieces with seams at the sides only. In addition to its other possibilities, the over-blouse can be used without the tunic, and when treated in this way it becomes a very simple garment, and can be made from any pretty silk or other material in color to match the skirt, to be worn over a guimpe in combination with a tailored skirt or with an odd skirt. For the medium size the tunic will require 2¼ yards of material 27 or 36, 1⅝ yards 44 inches wide, with 4 yards of lace banding; for the skirt will be needed 4½ yards 27, 2¾ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 2½ yards of additional material 21 inches wide for the ruchings.

The pattern of the over-blouse, No. 7227, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 bust, of the skirt, No. 7123, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist measure.

pieces. The skirt is made with a five-gored foundation and circular flounce, and the flounce only is of the velvet. The high waist line is fashionable, but this skirt can be cut to the material line if preferred. Any two fashionable materials can be used. Silk and velvet are essentially smart, but plain and striped materials make a pretty effect and wool material can be used with either silk or velvet. If the round neck is not liked, the blouse can be made with a yoke as indicated in the back view. For the medium size the blouse will require 2 yards of material 27, 1⅛ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard of silk for the trimming, and ⅞ yard of allover lace for the under-sleeves or 1⅛ yards for under-sleeves and yoke; for the tunic will be needed 4 yards 27, 3 yards 36 or 44 with 1½ yards of silk for trimming; for the foundation skirt will be required 2½ yards 27, 1¾ yards 36, and for the flounce 3 yards of velvet 21 inches wide.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7211, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 bust, of the skirt, No. 7034, in sizes from 23 to 30 waist.

The short tunic shown on the second figure is cut in what is known as Greek style. The model is much liked in lace, such as illustrated, and in silk, velvet and all seasonable materials. It can be cut with a low neck or a high one. It is

Dainty Frocks for Little Girls

CHILDREN'S parties are sure to be in progress during the Christmas season. Here are two dainty, charming little frocks that can be made from any pretty thin material.

YOUR VERY IMAGE

in lines and proportions can be reproduced with a

Hall-Borchert Adjustable Dress Form

The Old Way

You know how difficult it is to make a dress fit perfectly at the Bust, Waist and Hips!

with yourself for a model and a mirror to see the back with; but with a duplicate of yourself in a Dress Form, the problem of fitting is solved and

Each and every part is independently adjustable.

Dressmaking is Made Easy

Do not any longer try to make a dress without a Dress Form, and get the best.

The New Way

Hall-Borchert Forms are known as standard forms the world over, and are used by all the Fashion and Pattern Houses in the United States. When buying a dress form be sure the Hall-Borchert label is printed on the form you buy.

To get a form giving 100 per cent. adjustable efficiency you must have one that is independently adjustable in each and every part.

Our many years of experience have forced us to discard the automatic principle because of its limited adjustability.

An important feature is the simplicity and ease with which our forms can be adjusted, as well as their great durability. Look well at the above illustrations, and then imagine if you can how easy it is to make a dress with a perfect dress form, and write at once for our 24-page Booklet entitled

"Dressmaking Made Easy"

HALL-BORCHERT DRESS FORM CO.
of Canada, Limited
70-72 Pearl Street - Toronto, Canada

The Pleasing Result

PROVIDE MUSIC

for your family and for your guests. Play Grand Opera selections — play Classical music far beyond the range of the amateur musician—play the light operas—all by the means of the which plays all music faultlessly and is not in the slightest degree mechanical, owing to the wonderful devices of individual expression.

Gerhard Heintzman Player Piano

A booklet explaining fully these features may be had for the asking.

Your present instrument taken at a fair valuation as part payment, and easy terms of payment arranged.

Gerhard Heintzman, Limited
New Salesrooms: 41-43 Queen St. West
Opposite City Hall - TORONTO
Hamilton Salesrooms: 127 King Street East

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

KNOX CANDIES

A Christmas Treat

Plan a real treat for the children this year. Make some Christmas candy of which they may safely eat all they want—because you know it is pure and wholesome and better than the rich candies that are much more expensive.

KNOX
PURE · PLAIN
SPARKLING
GELATINE

makes these pure candies; and oh, but they are delicious! Try this recipe for KNOX MARSHMALLOWS and watch not only the children, but the grown-ups enjoy them.

—Knox Marshmallows—

Soak ½ package Knox Sparkling Gelatine in 10 tablespoonfuls cold water. Heat 2 cups (1 pint) granulated sugar with 10 tablespoonfuls water till dissolved. Add gelatine to syrup; let stand till partially cooled. Add few grains salt and flavoring to taste. Beat with a whip till too stiff, then with large spoon till only soft enough to settle into a sheet. Dust granite pans thickly with confectioner's sugar; pour in the candy about half inch deep; set in cool place till thoroughly chilled. Turn out, cut in cubes and roll in confectioner's sugar. (Will make over 100 marshmallows.)

Let us send you our Recipe Book "Dainty Desserts for Dainty People." It contains recipes for other KNOX candies and countless dainty desserts, puddings, salads, etc. FREE for your grocer's name.

Post sample for 2c stamp and grocer's name.

CHARLES B. KNOX CO.
166 Knox Avenue
Johnstown, N. Y.

Webb's

Olde Englishe
Plum Puddings
ARE DELICIOUS

Enough were sold last year to serve 50,000 people.

DID YOU GET YOUR SHARE?

AT ALL GROCERS

The Harry Webb Co. Ltd.
TORONTO, CAN.

The dress to the left gives the Empire waist line that is fashionable this season, and includes one of the new berthas that is exceedingly smart. It can be made just as illustrated, and become a party frock or it can be made with high neck and long sleeves, and be trimmed more simply and become adapted to afternoon occasions. The skirt is straight, gathered at the upper edge. The blouse is cut in one piece with the sleeves, in peasant style, and there is a little chemisette arranged under it. The bertha is arranged over the blouse, and the entire dress is closed invisibly at the back. To make as illustrated requires 4 yards of material 27, 3 yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 8 yards of lace 4 inches wide, 3 yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 8 yards of lace 4 inches wide, 3 yards 6 inches wide and 6½ yards of insertion.

The pattern, No. 7229, is cut in sizes for girls of 8, 10 and 12 years of age.

The second frock is made with a two-flounce skirt, the lower flounce being joined to, while the upper is arranged over a five-gored foundation. In the illustration the material is embroidered muslin, while the trimming is lace flouncing, but the design in itself is simple, and the dress could be made from any flouncing or bordered material with less labor, as the border or flouncing would make its own finish, or it could be made from challis or cashmere and banded with velvet or satin ribbon. If an afternoon frock is wanted, it can be made with high neck and long sleeves. The blouse is made with front and back portions that are tucked to yoke depth, and the sleeves are sewed to the armholes, while the bretelles are arranged over the shoulders. For the 10-year size the dress will require 4¾ yards of material 27, 4 yards 36, 3½ yards 44 inches wide, with 6½ yards of edging and 7½ yards of insertion to trim as illustrated.

The pattern, No. 7005, is cut in sizes for girls of 8, 10 and 12 years of age.

Amber Beads

ONCE more in favor are those glistening, gleaming yellow beads which since the time of our grandmothers have been worn as necklaces. With the collarless blouses and the lingerie frocks with their low necks, neck ornaments are especially fashionable, and this gives added opportunity for the wearing of this pretty old-fashioned bead. All sizes are worn, from the small pea-sized bead to the one large as a good-sized marble. And in the jewelers' shops one may purchase them by the string or by the dozen—in this latter way making the necklace as one pleases.

Fringe Trimming

FRINGE is the most popular trimming for the fall and winter. It was introduced last spring, and was put on many handsome gowns and wraps, but this season manufacturers of garments and skirts, as well as dresses, are using it lavishly. It trims tunics on skirts as well as fringes, collars and cuffs, and in fact is used in many interesting ways. It comes about two to two and a-half inches wide, and is most popular in silk. It is rather expensive, so that it will be adopted mostly by the ultra class of buyers.

Beaded fringe is also well thought of as trimming for evening gowns. Girdles, separate tassels, passementerie ornaments, braid buttons and cords are well favored in the line of ornamentation for the new season's models. All these suggest the East Indian Empire, and are very good style.

Coats for Afternoon Occasions

PRETTY and attractive afternoon costumes are needed at all seasons of the year. Those illustrated represent the very latest styles. The young girl's frock shows one of the new coatee blouses, while the woman's gown represents the panel skirt and big revers which are among the smartest of all things.

The girl's frock is adapted to almost all seasonable materials. It could be made from French serge and be very pretty; from cashmere or challis; from chiffon velveteen, from crepe de chine or messaline. In the illustration, however, cashmere is trimmed with satin and with lace. The blouse is cut in one piece with the sleeves, but the sleeves are finished with circular frills and the peplum is separate and joined to it. The big collar finishes the neck and the chemisette is arranged under it. The under-sleeves are attached beneath the sleeve trimming. The skirt is made in two pieces with plaited panel at each side of the front and extending to flounce depth. It can be cut either to a high or natural waist line. For the

Dress Pattern No. 7229 Dress Pattern No. 7005

"A Suggestion"
For Christmas or "For Any Season"
TOLTON'S SHIRTINGS

Are particularly suitable for

Ladies' Wash Waists and Suits

because they are Exclusive, Durable and Colors Fast to Sun and Tub.

Write for samples and they will be sent to you free, then you can order from them by mail. Our Scotch Zephyrs, English Oxfords, French Cambrics and Flannels are 32 inches wide and priced from 12½c. yd. up. We sell them direct to you in any quantity and guarantee them to more than please you or your money promptly refunded. All orders shipped prepaid.

One experiment will convince the most fastidious dresser that at last she has discovered the place to secure exquisite and beautiful materials at moderate cost. We invite you to have your name put on our mail order list for present or future. Just drop a card to Harry Tolton, Berlin, Ont., Maker of Fine Shirts and importer of Woven Shirtings of rare weave.

. . . . . .

WANTED.—An educated lady in each city or town to show my samples of shirtings. The samples will appeal to and please any woman, because the designs are different from the ordinary. No experience necessary: occupation pleasant, and a splendid opportunity to make money in your spare time. For full particulars apply to

Harry Tolton
BERLIN, ONTARIO

—PERFECT—
Willow Plumes

IN any color, from your old ostrich feathers. Money saved and more lasting than new "factory" plumes.

SPECIAL processes for cleaning and dyeing evening gowns and street dresses. The lustre and softness of new goods retained. Feathers, silks and laces given special attention.

EXPRESS paid both ways on orders amounting to $5.00. Ask for our advice and prices. Quarter century reputation.

SINCLAIR DYE WORKS
656 College St. - Toronto, Ont.

The Original and Best Scotch Wincey. In range of beautiful colourings, stripes or in white. Ideal for LADIES' BLOUSES, CHILDRENS' DRESSES BABIES' FROCKS, and all underwear—Gents.' Shirts, Pyjamas, etc.

Washes perfectly, and is UNSHRINKABLE.

From 8½d. per yard to 4/6.

Patterns Post Free.

FOR BABY.

Copy of UNSOLICITED testimonial.

"St. Jude's Vicarage, South Shields, 31 Oct., 1910. Mrs. De la Hey will be obliged if Messrs. Spence will send 12 yards of enclosed Wincey, for which cheque is enclosed. Mrs. de la Hey has NEVER used ANY OTHER Wincey which gave the PERFECT satisfaction of Messrs. JAS. SPENCE & CO.'s MAKE."

JAS SPENCE & CO., GLASGOW, N.B

FREE THIS ALADDIN LAMP FREE
BURNS COAL OIL (Kerosene)

Outshines city gas or electricity. Simple, noiseless, odorless, clean, safe, money-saving. Guaranteed. Write nearest office for catalogue M and learn how to get an Aladdin Mantle Lamp FREE.

AGENTS T. H. BALL SOLD 850 on money back guarantee, not one returned. Stacey sold 12 in one hour. Newsom sold 12 in 10 calls. Gibson sold 48 in 5 days. Sells itself. Needed in every home. Our Sunbeam Burner fits other lamps. Complete line for homes, stores, etc. Ask for our liberal agency proposition.

MANTLE LAMP CO. of AM., Inc., Dept., 133-P

Offices at Winnipeg and Montreal

16-year size the blouse will require 2⅜ yards of material 27, 1¾ yards 36, 1⅝ yard 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard of satin for the trimming, ½ yard of all-over lace for the collar, 1 yard 18 inches wide for the chemisette and under-sleeves; for the skirt will be needed 4¼ yard 27 or 36, 2⅝ yards 44 inches wide, with ½ yard of satin for the trimming.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7204, and of the skirt, No. 7224, are both cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

The gown shown on the figure to the right is made of henrietta cloth, trimmed with fringe and with puffings of silk. It is both simple and practical. The blouse and skirt close at the left side, giving the continuous lines that are becoming, as well as fashionable. The collar can be made either pointed or round, but the points are in every way to be commended when found becoming. The sleeves are of the new kimono sort, and are attached to the armholes which are piped. The chemisette is arranged under the blouse, and the under-sleeves are attached to the sleeves beneath the trimming. The skirt is cut in three pieces, lapped on to separate panels. These panels can be made of contrasting material, and an attractive effect would be obtained by combining satin or velvet for the panels and for the collar and cuffs. For the medium size the blouse will require 3½ yards of material 27, 2 yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 1 yard 18 inches wide for chemisette and under-sleeves, ½ yard of silk for the pipings, and 1¼ yards of fringe. For the skirt will be needed 5¼ yards of material 27, 4 yards 36, 3⅜ yards 44 inches wide with 2 yards of fringe.

The pattern, No. 7216, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 inches bust measure, of the skirt, No. 7222, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist measure.

Fancy Blouse

THERE are many variations of the peasant blouse to be noted just now, but none is prettier than this one. The shoulder portions being separate allow effective use of contrasting material, and the square Dutch neck is becoming and attractive. In this case the material is chiffon, and the trimming is lace, while the under-sleeves are made of dotted net, but such a blouse would be found appropriate for messaline, crepe de chine and for all materials of the kind. For the tucked portion can be used either the same or contrasting material. The blouse made of dotted point de esprit net with the tucked portion of plain would be pretty, or the blouse could be made of satin, while the tucked portions are of chiffon. Any banding can be used as trimming. If the square neck is not becoming the blouse can be made as shown in the back view, and if a simpler effect is wanted the trimming of the centre front can be omitted.

The blouse is made with front and back portions and with a tucked portion over the shoulders. These are joined by means of a trimming band and the closing is made at the back. The trimming at the front is arranged on indicated lines. The under-sleeves are attached beneath the sleeve bands.

For the 16-year size will be required 2¼ yards of material 27, 1½ yards 36, 1¼ yards 44 inches wide with 2¾ yards

Blouse Pattern No. 7204
Skirt Pattern No. 7224

Blouse Pattern No. 7216
Skirt Pattern No. 7222

The Perplexing Question of the Year

is what to buy at a moderate cost as a Christmas gift that will combine all the elements of nicety, practicability and appropriateness. There is practically no gift at the same cost that will please mother, wife, sister or friend as much as the latest improved

BISSELL "Cyco" Ball-Bearing CARPET SWEEPER

Everything about the machine, including finish and mechanism, indicates value double its cost to the purchaser. Thousands of Bissell Sweepers are given every year as Christmas gifts, and the demand for this purpose is growing enormously. A "Bissell" will be a constant reminder of the giver for ten years or more. It reduces the labor of sweeping 95%, raises no dust, and cleans carpets and rugs as no corn broom can, and will outlast fifty of them. Costs from $3.00 to $4.50, and are sold by dealers everywhere. Booklet on request.

OUR HOLIDAY OFFER—Buy of your dealer between now and January 1st, send us the purchase slip within one week from dat of purchase and we will send you a fine quality black leather card case with no printing on it.

Address Dept. 3, BISSELL CARPET SWEEPER COMPANY
Grand Rapids, Mich. Canadian Factory: Niagara Falls, Ont.
(13) (Largest and Only Exclusive Carpet Sweeper Makers in the World)

THE CHRISTMAS FESTIVITIES will be much more enjoyable if you brighten things up with Maypole Soap
The Quick, Easy Home Dye

Faded curtains, sofa covers, cushion tops and table centres — soiled dresses, sweater coats, boas and toques—anything that can be dyed—will look as fresh and pretty as ever when dyed with Maypole Soap. Colors are clean, even, brilliant and fadeless in sun or rain. Dyes cottons, wools, silks or mixtures. Does not stain hands or kettles.

24 colors—will give any shade. Colors 10c.—black 15c.—at your dealer's or postpaid with free booklet, "How to Dye" from

FRANK L. BENEDICT & CO., MONTREAL

Let there be no mistake!

Make absolutely sure of your under wear satisfaction by asking specifically for 'Wolsey' and seeing that each garment you get bears the Wolsey trademark.

Then you are sure of underwear pure wool, underwear that will fit and feel right; that will yield you lasting, comfortable, useful service; that will never shrink, or, if it does, will be replaced quite free of cost; that, in short, will make you thoroughly glad you bought it.

Wolsey UNDERWEAR

Made in all garments and in many weights and sizes, for men, women, and children, and sold everywhere throughout the world

ORDER TO-DAY

All Wolsey Underwear is British made by British workers. The Wolsey Factories are the largest and most modern of their kind in Great Britain; and 'Wolsey' itself has so far proved its value as to become the most widely-selling Underwear in the world. Comfort, health, economy, all point to Wolsey garments as the best for men, for women, and for children.

The Rayo Lamp

The Lamp That Saves The Eyes

Children naturally never think of possible strain on their eyesight when poring over a fascinating book.

It is up to you to see they do not ruin their young eyes these long evenings by reading under a poor light.

The Rayo Lamp is an insurance against eye troubles, alike for young and old.

The Rayo is a low-priced lamp, but it is constructed on the soundest scientific principles, and there is not a better lamp made at any price.

It is easy on the eye because its light is so soft and white and widely diffused. And a Rayo Lamp never flickers.

Easily lighted without removing shade or chimney; easy to clean and rewick. Solid brass throughout, with handsome nickel finish; also in many other styles and finishes. Ask your dealer to show you his line of Rayo lamps; or write for descriptive circular to any agency of

The Imperial Oil Company, Limited
The Queen City Oil Company, Limited

A GOOD FIRST IMPRESSION

At a little cost you can secure a good first impression by touching up your hall furniture with

LACQUERET
TRADE MARK
HOUSEHOLD LACQUER

Why not brighten up your Hat-Rack, Hall-Seat, Staircase, etc. Your guests will notice these on entrance.

Light Oak, Dark Oak or Mahogany "Lacqueret" on these furnishings will work wonders

Or if you wish to retain the original effect, try clear "Lacqueret" on any piece of woodwork.

Its effect is almost magical.

Our little book "Dainty Decorator" tells of the many uses of "Lacqueret" in the home. A copy is waiting for you, free for the asking.

Cans contain full Imperial Measure. Don't accept a substitute.

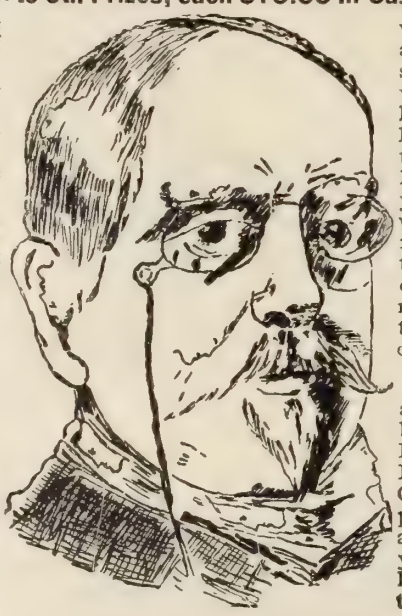
INTERNATIONAL VARNISH CO. LTD.

TORONTO WINNIPEG

FREE!! $200.00 IN CASH

AND 1,000 VALUABLE PREMIUMS GIVEN AWAY.

1st Prize, $50.00 in Cash 3rd Prize, $35.00 in Cash
2nd Prize, $40.00 in Cash 4th Prize, $25.00 in Cash
5th to 9th Prizes, each $10.00 in Cash.



Herewith will be found the picture of an old man. Around his head and shoulders are concealed the faces of his seven daughters. Can you find these seven faces? If so, mark the faces with an X. Cut out the picture and send it to us, together with a slip of paper on which you have written the words "I have found the seven faces and marked them."

Write the above words plainly and neatly, as in case of ties, both writing and neatness will be considered in this contest.

Should you not happen to be a neat writer, show this advertisement to some friend of yours who can write plainly and neatly, and have him or her enter this contest in his or her name for you. First, agree with the person who is to do the writing, that you are to receive any prize money or prize that may be awarded.

This may take up a little of your time but as there is TWO HUNDRED DOLLARS in cash and One Thousand premiums given away, it is worth your time to take a little trouble over this matter.

Remember, all you have to do is to mark the faces, cut out the picture and write on a separate piece of paper the words, "I have found the seven faces and marked them."

We do not ask You to Spend One Cent of Your Money in order to enter this Contest

Send your answer at once, we will reply by Return Mail telling you whether your answer is correct or not and we will send you complete Prize List, together with the names and addresses of persons who have recently received some of the Cash Prizes from us. You will then see for yourself that our representation that must be found. This does not involve the spending of any of your money.

Winners of Cash Prizes in our late competitions will not be allowed to enter this Contest.

Below will be found a partial list of the names and addresses of a few persons who have won some of our larger prizes in recent contests. Although these persons are entirely unknown to us, they are our references. An enquiry from any one of them will bring the information that our contests are carried out with the utmost fairness and integrity. Your opportunity to win a good round sum is equally as good as that of anyone else as all previous winners of cash prizes are debarred from entering this contest.

Names and Addresses of a few Prize-Winners in Recent Contests

Mrs W. A C Orr, 278 Garry St., Winnipeg.	$50.00
Miss E. Brodeur, 6 Gillespie St., Sherbrooke	50.00
Mr Louis Quintal, Charlemagne, Que.	50.00
Mr. Alphonse Drouin, Dept. of Militia, Ottawa.	50.00
Mr. J. A. St. Pierre, Athabaska, Que.	50.00
Mrs. E. McMillan, 345 Markland St., West Toronto	50.00
Miss I. E. Benjamin, 125 Hughson St., Hamilton	40.00
Miss H. C. Powell, P.O. Dept., Ottawa, Ont.	40.00
Mrs. Andrew Johnson, Box 109, Keewatin, Ont.	40.00
Mr. Morman Robinson, Milford Haven, Ont.	40.00
Mr Thos. Humphries, c/o Ayers & Sons, St. John's, Nfld.	40.00
Mr. P. A. Ferguson, 223 James Ave, Winnipeg.	40.00
Mrs. J. B. Girouard, 656 Maisonneuve, Montreal	35.00
Mrs. A Ferguson, 39 Stobart Block, Winnipeg.	35.00
Mrs. F. E. Chadwick, 624 Spadina Ave., Toronto	30.00
Mr. R. E. Strange, 300 Rockland Rd. St. John, N. B.	30.00
Miss Mary Cochrane, 114 Preston St., Ottawa.	35.00
Mrs G H Benson, 33 Hargrave St., Winnipeg.	35.00
Mrs. W D Little, Powassan, Ont.	30.00
Mr Thos Blakey, 88 Huntley St., Toronto.	25.00
Miss Mary Lamb, 22 Spencer, St. John's Nfld.	25.00
Miss E A Kennedy, 16 Railway St., Hamilton.	25.00
Mr Jules Vasconcelles, Goulais River, Ont.	25.00
Mr Jno. M Sullivan, Duckworth, St. John's, Nfld.	25.00
Mrs E H Dannett, 200 Hughson St., Hamilton.	25.00
Mr W C Mason, 2479 Hutchison St., Montreal.	25.00
Mrs H W Healey, Box 171 Ingersoll Ont.	25.00
Mr B Bugden, Merry Meeting, St. John's, Nfld.	20.00
Miss M E Pollock, 35 Viger Ave., Montreal.	10.00
Miss Ruth Britton, 457 Cumberland Ave, Winnipeg.	10.00
Miss Isabel Ferguson, Box 1104, Edmonton, Alta.	10.00
Mr Q E Benjamin, 125 Hughson St., Hamilton.	10.00

Address: BOVEL MFG. CO'Y.

44 BOVEL BUILDING
MONTREAL, CANADA.

of banding 2½ inches wide and ¼ yard of banding 4¾ inches wide, and ½ yard 18 inches wide for the under-sleeves, ⅜ yard for the yoke when made with the high neck.

The pattern, No. 7186, is cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

Peasant Blouse

THE peasant blouse in its many variations continues to be a favorite. This model is novel, the yoke being cut in points. It can be finished with or without a collar, and with or without under-sleeves. The cuffs are oddly shaped and attractive, and the blouse altogether is a most satisfactory one. It will be found equally well adapted to the gown and to the separate waist. This one is made of messaline, with trimming portions of allover lace, piping and buttons of velvet.

Fancy Blouse Pattern No. 7186

The blouse is made in one piece, and is closed at the back. It is arranged over a yoke and the edges are stitched to position. The cuffs are joined to the sleeve edges and the under-sleeves are sewed into place beneath these cuffs. When the collar is used, it is joined to the neck edge.

For a woman of medium size will be required 2¼ yards of material 27, 1⅝ yards 36, 1¼ yards 44 inches wide, with 1 yard of allover lace 18 inches wide for yoke and under-sleeves.

The pattern, No. 7122, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42-inch bust measure.

Peasant Blouse Pattern No. 7122

LET IT BE A SERGE

Both London and Paris say "Serge for winter suits".

Priestley's

"Sandown" & "Concord" Coating Serges

are famous for their beauty of weave and color.

In Black, Navy and Cream — guaranteed fast colors.

Rolled on the varnished board — with "Priestley's Limited" stamped every 5 yards on the selvedge.

1

MAXWELL'S HIGH SPEED CHAMPION

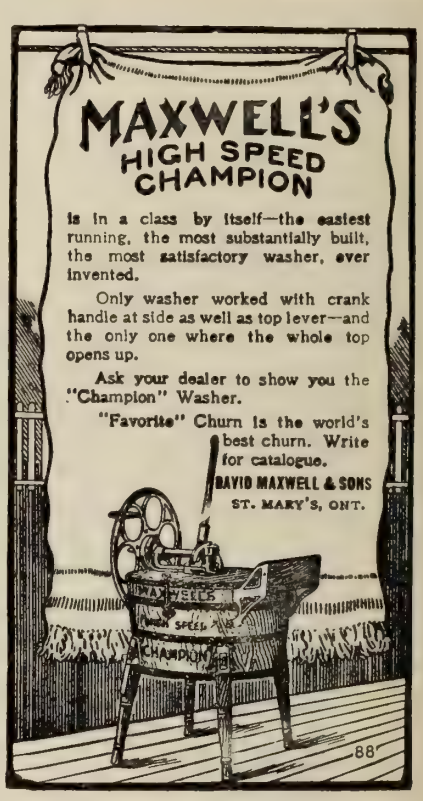
is in a class by itself—the easiest running, the most substantially built, the most satisfactory washer, ever invented.

Only washer worked with crank handle at side as well as top lever—and the only one where the whole top opens up.

Ask your dealer to show you the "Champion" Washer.

"Favorite" Churn is the world's best churn. Write for catalogue.

DAVID MAXWELL & SONS
ST. MARY'S, ONT.



88

DOMINION EXPRESS Money Orders

and Foreign Cheques are payable all over the World.

They may be sent in payment of produce, tax, gas and electric light bills, interest on notes and mortgages, insurance premiums, subscriptions to newspapers and magazines, and in fact in payment of all kinds of accounts, whether in or out of town.

We give you a receipt and if the remittance goes astray in the mails, we refund your money or issue a new order free of charge.

TRAVELLERS' CHEQUES ISSUED.
MONEY SENT BY TELEGRAPH AND CABLE.

When purchasing Goods by mail, ALWAYS remit by

DOMINION EXPRESS CO. MONEY ORDERS

RATES FOR MONEY ORDERS:

$ 5. AND UNDER				3	CENTS
OVER	5.	TO	$10.	6	"
"	10.	"	20.	10	"
"	30.	"	50.	15	"

AGENCIES THROUGHOUT CANADA.

EMBROIDERED TRAYS

WE illustrate some attractive trays which are durable and quite different in design and shape. The glass covered trays are great favorites as they are novel and quite as handsome as the silver or brass ones which have been in such general use. The trays pictured here have been selected to show the different styles of embroidered linens which, after being embroidered in beautiful shades of soft and artistic coloring, are mounted on pasteboard and fitted into the rims. These trays come complete with mahogany finish, stamped linen either white or colored, glass, brass handles, pasteboard mat and back. The designs are simple but effective. These trays are a charming adjunct to the tea table, and one of these would make a most attractive Christmas gift.

No. 1443—Size 16 x 16, $4.25 each.

No. 1443 tray is embroidered on heavy grey linen in shades of dull rose and green touched up with Japanese Gold Thread and black. The design which is worked in solid padded satin stitch, is a most effective one, the rich colorings blending beautifully with the mahogany rim.

No. 1442 shows a conventional design of daisies which are embroidered on white linen. The daisies are yellow with brown centres, and the leaves are carried out in dull greens.

No. 1442—Size 13 x 13, $3.25 each.

No. 1438 is handsome conventional pattern worked in blues, brown, gold, and black, the outer borders being couched with black and Japanese Gold Thread.

Design No. 1439 has a simple wreath stamped on white linen of small berries and leaves, dainty bow knots embroidered in pale green complete this pretty design.

No. 1432C—25 cents.

No. 1440 tray is a narrow oblong which has a dainty design of forget-me-nots which are embroidered on white linen. These may be worked in any preferred

No. 1438—Size 12 x 15, $2.75 each.

coloring, and this dainty tray is of the shape known as a "lemonade tray."

Design No. 1441 is a very handsome tray which is embroidered with a very unique design carried out in shades of burnt orange, browns, and greens, with an effective touch of black and gold which always brings out effectively designs and colorings.

Handsome towels are a much appreciated Christmas gift, and a wide variety of materials and designs and ideas are shown for these. One of the newest is pictured here, a handsome conventional design is embroidered in the darning stitch. The spaces in the design which has been specially made for this class of embroidery is darned in pale pink. The berries are embroidered in solid padded stitch in white outlined with a darker pink. The border is embroidered with white with an inner outline of pink, and these beautiful towels with their dainty coloring would make an attractive note in a pretty guest chamber. These towels are embroidered on a plain huckaback of a suitable weave and the darning is done with Royal Floss. The design is then outlined with Rope Silk.

No. 1440—Size 5 x 7, $2.25 each.

Another holiday suggestion is shown for the lacing pincushions which has the lower part em- they are so easily laundered and so much more serviceable than the fussy lace and frilled varieties, which, when soiled, were useless and had to be thrown aside. These pin tops consist of white and colored linen, the lower portion colored and the upper white. The colored linen is buttonholed with white and the white linen is buttonholed and embroidered with colored, matching the linen. Thus 1432C has the lower portion stamped on green linen, the upper portion being of white embroidered with pale green.

No. 1441—Size 7 x 19, $3.25 each.

No. 1432A—25 cents.

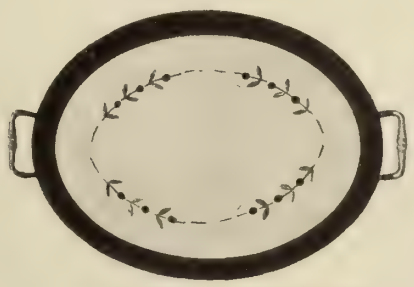
The round pincushion are such favorites, as broidered on pale pink linen in white. The upper portion is of white embroidered in pinks.



No. 1439—Size 10 x 13. $2.25 each.

Silks to embroider any of the above designs may be supplied at 55 cents per dozen, and Japanese Gold at 15 cents per skein.

If the articles illustrated on this page cannot be obtained from your dealer, write to Belding Paul Corticelli Limited, for further information.

No. 6256—Stamped on Huckaback, $1.20 per pair.

SEND AT ONCE

— 35 CENTS —

For eight skeins of ART EMBROIDERY SILK which is sufficient to embroider a 15 inch CREAM LINEN CENTRE PIECE, stamped for the fashionable Mille Fleur or Thousand Flower Embroidery which we will give you FREE and sufficient Cream Lace to edge this beautiful Centre Piece; ALSO A DIAGRAM LESSON which will enable any woman to do this embroidery which is simple but effective.

Send to-day, as this generous offer is good for a short time only.

This offer is made to convince every woman that BELDING'S ART EMBROIDERY SILKS are the best made.

Send 10c for a copy of Belding's Needle & Hook Book which contains all the latest suggestions for art embroidery.

Address

BELDING, PAUL, CORTICELLI CO'Y.
LIMITED

Dept. L MONTREAL, P.Q.

When buying your coffee don't merely say "A pound of best Coffee"—Specify

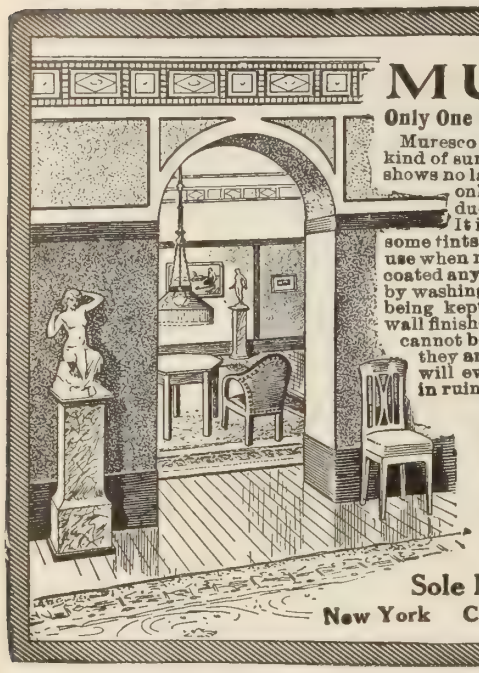
Seal Brand Coffee

127

It costs no more than inferior grades and our reputation is behind it.

Packed in 1 and 2 pound cans only.

CHASE AND SANBORN, - MONTREAL.



MURESCO

Only One Coat Required. Easy to apply.

Muresco can be applied by anyone, to any kind of surface. It will not rub off or peel, shows no laps, spots or brush marks, and is the only material producing that flat, subdued, velvety effect, so much admired. It is made in a large variety of handsome tints and colors, also white. Ready for use when mixed with hot water. It can be recoated any number of times and removed easily by washing when desired, thus insuring walls being kept in perfect condition. Beware of wall finishes containing lime or plaster that cannot be removed by washing when desired; they are neither practical nor sanitary, and will eventually peel off, leaving the walls in ruined condition.

Muresco is in use by the best decorators in the country, and sold by leading paint dealers everywhere.

Send for sample cards, descriptive matter and prices.

BENJAMIN MOORE & CO. Limited

Sole Mfgs., Toronto, Canada

New York Chicago Carteret Cleveland

Read Our Special Christmas Subscription Offer on Another Page

ELLIMAN'S EMBROCATION

Pain arising

FROM

Rheumatism, Lumbago, Sore Throat from Cold, Cold at the Chest, Neuralgia from Cold, Chronic Bronchitis, Sprain, Backache, Bruises, Slight Cuts, Cramp, Soreness of the Limbs after exercise, is best treated by using ELLIMAN'S according to the information given in the Elliman R.E.P. booklet 96 pages, (illustrated) which is placed inside cartons with all bottles of Elliman's price 1/1½, 2/9 & 4/-. The R.E.P. booklet also contains other information of such practical value as to cause it to be in demand for First Aid and other purposes; also for its recipes in respect of Sick Room requisites. Elliman's added to the Bath is beneficial.

Animals

Ailments may in many instances be relieved or cured by following the instructions (illustrated) given in the Elliman E. F. A. Booklet 64 pages, found enclosed in the wrappers of all bottles of ELLIMAN'S price 1/-, 2/- & 3/6.

Elliman, Sons & Co., Slough, England.

ROYAL for ANIMALS
See the Elliman E.F.A. Booklet
UNIVERSAL for HUMAN USE
See the Elliman R.E.P. Booklet found enclosed with bottles of ELLIMAN'S
THE NAME IS ELLIMAN

TO BE OBTAINED OF ALL DRUGGISTS THROUGHOUT CANADA.

IN these days of frost and coming blizzards, the most interesting place in the large shops is the fur department. There is, perhaps, no country in the world, unless it is Russia, where the fur display surpasses that of our own Dominion. This year's fur garments are a miracle of richness and softness—and if any man wishes to gratify the dearest desire of wife or daughter, let him pay a visit to this department with serious intentions of purchasing muff, stole or jacket. Ermine is the most fashionable of the expensive furs, although mink and seal are bravely holding their own. Among the cheaper furs, squirrel seems very popular, and truly the grey coats of this fur are much to be desired. The muffs of alternate stripes of dark and light fur are a charming novelty, but are hardly likely to be in style for more than one season.

SOME women are fond of going to the dressmaker's, picking out their own particular style of gown or suit, and submitting to several fittings in the hope that they will ultimately secure a perfectly satisfactory costume. Others there are, and the number is increasing daily, who consider the hunting up a dressmaker, the being fitted and the being constantly disappointed by the broken word of the modiste, who "promises it positively for next Saturday," entirely too much to expect of feminine flesh. "I should just as soon visit the dentist as the dressmaker," declares one vigorous dame who has had yards of good silk "simply ruined" by a dressmaker who either didn't know or didn't care. Now, it is absolutely necessary to visit the dentist, for one cannot very well get along without teeth or even with aching molars; but in these days it is quite possible to manage without visiting the dressmaker.

There was a time when the word "ready-made" was used in scorn to indicate all that was cheap, undesirable and ill-fitting in garments. To-day the ready-made gown bears no such stigma, and many fastidious women are to be found purchasing "creations" in the velvet carpeted showrooms, where the Paris gowns are hanging. Nor need the woman of comparatively limited means despair of finding something dainty and different, which will just suit her individual taste and pocketbook.

"I don't want to see the same kind of gown on everyone else," is the common cry of the woman in search of a chic gown, and the successful shopkeeper is he who knows how to satisfy the feminine demand for variety.

In the large departmental stores of Toronto, for instance, one may easily find a ready-made gown for afternoon wear or for the street, which will not be duplicated in style or material by any other. Nor are prices prohibitive, for the woman who has thirty or thirty-five dollars to spend on an evening gown may easily come upon a bargain which will meet all demands. A very pretty gown for party wear in chiffon, hand-embroidered and trimmed with Venetian lace and pearls, was sold for thirty-five dollars at the October sales, and was duly appreciated by the woman who made the purchase.

Of course, if you prefer the dressmaker and the fitting processes, you are quite right to keep to the ordered gown. But so many women complain of the apparent waste of time in such expeditions that it is well to survey the stock of ready-made gowns before coming to the conclusion that "the material is second-class and the linings are poor." Make a careful inspection for yourself, as to fabric and "findings," before investing in a ready-made gown.

The new afternoon or reception gowns, in velvet, albatross cloth and marquisette, are decidedly smart, and may be bought for twenty-five dollars —"up." Velvet is a delightful material for softness and richness of effect, but, unless one can keep it for special occasions, it is better to invest in something less regal in appearance. The marquisette is deservedly a favorite, as it always looks well, and is not crushable, if obtained in the best quality.

Winter is hard on the Complexion

It is often dreaded by the women anxious to retain or develop their good looks. The two extremes, indoor heat and outside cold, threaten a good complexion. Safeguard it against these changes by using

PRINCESS SKIN FOOD

The most beneficial unguent and emollient for this purpose made. Use it before dressing to go out. After wiping it off, use a pure, delicate face powder (the Princess Powder, 50 cents, is excellent), and you will come in knowing that your skin is improved instead of harmed. For lines and wrinkles, a fading and flabby skin and sagging muscles it is most satisfactory. Price $1.50, postpaid.

PRINCESS HAIR REJUVENATOR

restores faded hair or hair less than half grey (medium brown to black) to its original color in ten days; not greasy or sticky; entirely harmless, clear as water. $1.00 delivered. Sample free.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR

MOLES, WARTS, etc., eradicated permanently by our most reliable method of Electrolysis. Satisfaction assured. Come during the Xmas holidays for treatment and have the happiest year ever. Booklet "H" and sample skin food mailed free.

Hiscott Dermatological Institute
61 College Street, Toronto

Dry Cleaning will Remove the Spot

Perhaps you have always thought it impossible to clean fine Silks, Satins, Opera Cloaks, Suits, Laces, Feathers, etc. so they would look new.

Our special Dry Cleaning Process and years of experience, enable us to do work that your local cleaner knows nothing about.

We pay express one way on goods from out of town.

Write for free copy of our book, which tells all about our work and our prices.

Fountain "My Valet"
30 Adelaide St. W., Toronto.
14

$3 a Day Sure Send us your address and we will show you how to make $3 a day absolutely sure; we furnish the work and teach you free; you work in the locality where you live. Send us your address and we will explain the business fully; remember we guarantee a clear profit of $3 for every day's work, absolutely sure, write at once.
ROYAL MANUFACTURING CO., Box 1718, WINDSOR, ONT.

WITH the approach of Christmas, one's thoughts turn naturally to the dressing-table gifts which nearly every woman profoundly desires. There was a time when it was considered hardly "correct" to bestow presents of perfume, soap or other dainty necessities of the dressing-table. These have become so excellent in quality and attractive in appearance and wrappings that a woman may regard them as almost impersonal in meaning. However, there are some persons who are yet very sensitive on the subject. Hence, it would be just as well to ascertain beforehand whether a box of soap or perfume would be acceptable to relative or near friend. Above all things, avoid anything cheap or highly-perfumed. It would be better to spend less than a quarter on a pretty card or book-mark than to send a commonplace or tawdry article, such as those referred to. There are quite reliable and attractive toilet articles in powder-boxes, soap or sachet bags for fifty cents or under, which ought to appeal to the fair recipient.

Sometimes there is a home-made recipe in the family which provides one with the means for manufacturing welcome little gifts. I know a resourceful woman, the wife of a doctor who sent half-a-dozen girl friends the daintiest white jars containing a rose-colored lip-salve. Pretty labels with gilt lettering, "Creme Rose" and each girl's initials, were pasted on, and when tied with rose-hued baby ribbon each jar made a gift worthy of any girl's liking. The salve was so healing and beautifying that the giver was besieged with appeals to divulge the secret of the recipe; but it has remained unknown to this very day. Yet each girl receives a box on Christmas morning and knows what a reliable "giftlet" awaits her.

A good brush and comb are always welcome, but the quality of the brush or bristles should not be sacrificed to a fancy "back." In these days of barrettes and other hair ornaments, it is easy to find at the hairdresser's, a pretty trifle which will add to feminine pleasure. Then, there is a variety of jars and powder-boxes of all kinds, from the tiny jar for salve to the imposing powder-box. Cut glass with silver top is the favorite style; but some of the prettiest powder-boxes come in china with a Dresden design. Ornate silver colors are not considered in good taste. A plain silver top with engraved initial or monogram is the most suitable and satisfactory. Nearly every girl likes the tiny "vanity box," which fits into the corner of a shopping bag and holds a fairy puff with just the requisite sprinkling of powder to remove the "shine" from nose or cheeks. These boxes come in silver and porcelain, the latter prettily decorated with painting of marchioness or shepherdess, and are welcomed by any dainty dame.

Of sachet bags there is no end at this season. Do not buy cheap sachet, as its fragrance lasts for such a short time. You may make any number of pretty bags at this time out of the wide Dresden ribbon, in which there are so many bargains during the month before Christmas. The "softer" odors are more pleasant and lasting than the heavy, and you can hardly make a mistake with violet, crab-apple, amber, or lily-of-the-valley. Then there is the perfumed "hanger," which makes a highly-valued feature of the modern wardrobe. It is absolutely essential that the modern woman should have several of these hangers, in order that gowns and coats should preserve their correct lines. Then the uncovered wires are likely to leave an ugly mark; so, there is nothing for it, but to wind scented wadding around them, cover it with silk or ribbon and—behold, there is a perfumed hanger which will impart to gown or cloak just a subtle hint of flowers, which will satisfy the fastidious wearer.

CUCUMBER juice is obtained by slowly boiling the thinly-sliced vegetables, skin and all, in a small quantity of water until they are of mushy consistency. Strain first through a fine sieve, then through a piece of muslin. Of this liquid take 10 ounces; essence of cucumber, 3 ounces; oil of sweet almonds, 4 ounces; powdered white Castile soap, ¼ ounce, and two-thirds of a drachm (teaspoonful) of tincture of benzoin. Into a large glass bottle containing the essence drop the powdered soap. Shake often and vigorously. When the soap is dissolved it is time to add the fresh cucumber juice. After a thorough mixing the liquid is poured into a china bowl so that the oil and benzoin may be conveniently added. During this process the whole is constantly stirred until the mixture resembles cream.

FRENCH women know full well how to keep dry hair clean and sweet without constant use of the shampoo. They manage this by careful brushing. The entire scalp is gone over, a small strand of hair being taken at a time. A series of clean brushes is necessary for the process. Sometimes a cornmeal shampoo precedes the brushing. Fine cornmeal—ground much finer than that used for cooking--is mixed with a little pulverised orris-root. The powder is scattered well over scalp and through the hair allowed to remain a few minutes, and is then thoroughly brushed out. The final color of the cornmeal will prove to you its efficacy as a cleanser.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

L. M. G.—We notice what you say with regard to the effects of the preparation recommended. Would not its continued use be a benefit, even if it were necessary to repeat? I have no personal knowledge of its benefits, but, judging from what you say, it has already done you good. In some cases of such trouble as yours, where the affliction is of long standing, it is advisable to consult a professional dermatologist.

FREDA.—Violet or lavender sachet is very pleasing. My own preference is for a subtle odor like amber, but I could hardly advise you without more about your personal tastes. In answer to your second question, I should advise deep breathing exercise and regular exercise for at least fifteen minutes a day in extending the arms, level with the shoulders as the breath is inhaled, then slowly exhaling as the arms are lowered. Patience and practice are needed before any improvement may be expected. Your third question is rather indefinite, as the term is applied to two different objects. A florist's shop would supply you with it.

MARGARET.—So, you are anxious to have rosy cheeks—and another girl correspondent has just been complaining of blushing easily and has asked us to recommend something which will cure her of the blushing habit. Perhaps you are anaemic, Margaret, in which case you had better consult your physician, and get a good tonic. Also, try a brisk walk daily and avoid sweets. Perhaps you are naturally pale. You see, your name may have something to do with it. Tennyson writes about a "rare, pale Margaret." Of course, you are aware that the name means a pearl or a daisy, and the fairies who danced at your christening may have decreed that you are to have "white roses in the place of the red." Try ordinary means, such as exercise or diet, if you so desire, but don't resort to artificial coloring—for that is nearly always tawdry and obvious.

Dress Shield Hints

MANY women have had difficulty in fastening dress shields in a blouse with kimono sleeves. One woman has found a clever solution to the task. She has a bolero of very thin lawn. On the washable shields she sews narrow elastic for shoulder straps; then she sews the shields into the bolero, stitching them in place along the line of stitching on the shield binding. Next the material under the shield is cut out and the neck line of the bolero is cut down both back and front; the front of the bolero is fastened with tapes. This bolero is easily laundered and may be worn time and again with different blouses.

Women of Refinement and Good Taste know that they add to their charms, by making their hair the feature of their appearance If it is dull and lifeless, you cannot arrange it either artistically or becomingly. Every woman, who needs protection or adornment will find most elegant and refined, being the newest American and European Fashions. Our Featherweight Transformations and pompadours have no equals. Many ladies suffer every time they dress their hair, because of its thinness. Let us show you how to overcome this.

Dorenwend's Hair Goods

Special Switches for the New Soiree and Swathe Effects in hair dressing.

Write for Free Illustrated Catalogue "10" and booklet on Beauty Secrets.

We have just received a special shipment from Europe of Evening Hair Bands and Ornaments.

XMAS SUGGESTIONS

Back Combs, Barrettes and Pins

in plain and mounted effects. Figaree Gold and platinum set goods.

Complete Manicure Outfits in real leather cases,
Pearl and Solid Ebony.

Military Brushes, Dressing Table Sets, Etc.

Our Hair-dressing Parlors are second to none in America, for Beauty, Equipment or service.
Appointments Main 1551

We make a specialty of designing hair-dresses, for Balls, Receptions, Etc.

The Dorenwend Coy. of Toronto Limited
(The House of Quality Hair Goods)
103-105 Yonge Street
TORONTO

WHOOPING COUGH
CROUP ASTHMA COUGHS
BRONCHITIS CATARRH COLDS
Vapo-Cresolene
ESTABLISHED 1879

A simple, safe and effective treatment for bronchial troubles, avoiding drugs. Vaporized Cresolene stops the paroxysms of Whooping Cough and relieves croup at once. It is a boon to sufferers from Asthma. The air rendered strongly antiseptic, inspired with every breath makes breathing easy; soothes the sore throat and stops the cough, assuring restful nights. It is invaluable to mothers with young children.
Send us postal for descriptive booklet. 309

ALL DRUGGISTS
Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat They are simple, effective and antiseptic. Of your druggist or from us, 10c. in stamps.

VAPO CRESOLENE CO.
Leeming-Miles Bldg.
MONTREAL

Splendid Profits Paid

FOR COLLECTING

The 10,000 Journal Subscriptions Expiring In The Next Few Months

Every year the demand for magazines increases, and no place is too small to make it profitable for someone to secure the subscriptions and each year to collect the renewals.

Canadian Home Journal, by its quality and popularity and Canadianism, makes work of this kind most profitable and desirable. Men and women, well known and highly regarded, are working as much because of patriotism and enthusiasm as for the money they earn.

Renewals

In most places we have subscribers secured by circulars or advertisements, and shall be glad to turn these over to someone for collection. But these are sent only to help and encourage persons who intend to give all possible spare time to getting new subscribers for us. We do not want mere collectors.

How It Pays

Men working full time earn $120 a month. A young man during evenings and holidays, earns $500 a year. A busy housewife earns nearly $500 a year. One lady, with the help of her husband's automobile, earned $60 in ten days. Others are earning a little less.

Only a few subscriptions will pay for many things you may not feel that you can now afford.

Salary and Commission

You will be surprised to find how liberal our commisions are, and the monthly salary. Besides these there are several special prizes. Write for our offers, then if you decide not to accept, send us a card.

Circulation Department
Canadian Home Journal

Send me all information regarding your offers to subscription workers. Put me on the list to receive renewals for collection after I have sent you a few subscriptions.

Name ....

Address ....

THE LADY OF DAINTY LUNCHES

How Success Came to Sandwiches and Cake

By CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

SHE'S a canny little business woman, the Lady of Dainty Lunches; so canny that I more than half suspect she can boast of Scotch ancestry. When I asked her to tell me the story of her work, she was diffident, very diffident indeed.

"No, I don't think it's rude of you to ask for it. I think it's a compliment. I'm proud of my work, but," with a frank smile, "I don't think I'll tell it to you."

Notwithstanding the fact that she was refusing me the coveted story, I thought her very gracious, for, though it was late in the afternoon, and she was busy superintending preparations for a dinner party to be held that night in the lunch-room, over which she now presides, she stood chatting pleasantly with me about woman's work. When I was coming away I ventured to make another plea for the story that I felt sure was worth having. I found her relenting ever so little.

"Well, perhaps, but I must think it over"—that Scotch ancestry again—"You come in some day next week. I may tell you. I don't know yet."

It was thus that this busy little woman despatched me and returned to her culinary operations. Her cheeks were slightly flushed and a little dab of flour over one eye betrayed the fact that the Lady of Dainty Lunches was taking a very active part in these operations. I wondered whether it was patties or pies.

The next time I saw her she said: "Yes, I'm going to tell you all about my work. Come in to-morrow and I'll give you half an hour." How very business-like she was, and I found, when she told me her story, this same characteristic running all the way through it, like a rich vein of ore. It was undoubtedly the secret of the splendid success that attended her efforts in building up a work that was all her own, and that led certain ladies to ask her to take charge of a most delightful tea room on Yonge Street, Toronto. Listen! Here's the story as she told it to me.

"I had always wanted to do something. I'm not sure that I had any definite ambition, save to do some kind of work and be independent. Mother was an invalid and I never could bring myself to the point of breaking away from home and leaving her to the care of a stranger. When I talked of it, as I sometimes did, she would tell me that I was doing all that could be expected of me, when I kept house and took care of her. It was delightful to know that my home work was so much appreciated, still the longing was there and would not be appeased. However, as I said before, my ambition was indefinite; so I went on performing my domestic duties, never dreaming that through them I was to realize my heart's desire.

"It came about in the simplest way imaginable. A cousin was spending the afternoon with mother and me, and I had made a cake that morning, intending to have it for supper. I had always had pretty good luck with my cookery, and particularly with cakes. This one was no exception. My cousin came out in the kitchen and began saying all manner of nice things about it. Just in fun I held it up on my palm, auctioneer fashion, and said, 'Will you give me forty cents for it?' Quick as a flash came back an assuring 'Indeed I will. I'm going to have Cousin Julia to supper to-morrow night, and if you'll let me have this cake, I won't have to make one.'

"I could scarcely believe that she was in earnest. That anyone would give me forty cents for a cake seemed incredible. But there it was. That precious bit of silver that I had earned myself. No forty cents that I have earned subsequently has seemed to be worth quite so much. I really think I placed it at double its real value.

"Well, that was the beginning of my 'career.' That first sale had a stimulating effect. It set me thinking. If one person would buy my cakes, why not another? I resolved to try. I told my friends what I was going to do. They thought it was splendid, and some of them gladly gave me orders. They told others, and soon I had quite a little business established. In fact, on the last two days of the week, I often made as many as seventeen cakes. How sweet my growing independence was none can possibly know, save those who have experienced similar sensations. It whetted my ambition for still higher achievements. I aspired to greater things. My sphere was too limited, so I had some little circulars printed telling what I was prepared to do, and whenever I saw a tea or reception announced in the social news of the daily papers, I sent one of my little circulars out on its mission. Sometimes it brought results, but the greater part of my business came from those who were already customers, telling their friends, who gave me orders, and they in turn told their friends.

IN A COSY CORNER

"Occasionally I did a little light catering, but up to this time that sort of thing was a little beyond the limit of my activities, for I had to do almost everything myself except delivering the packages. The young son of one of our neighbors did this for me. Like myself, he was ambitious to earn money, and he was a very faithful little helper. Of course, I always planned to have the parcels ready, so as not to interfere with his school hours.

"Mother was delighted with my success, not from a mercenary standpoint, but because I was so pleased and happy in my newly-discovered vocation. She took a great interest in it. 'Whatever you do,' she would say, 'do it right. Try to have things not only tasty, but make them look dainty as well.' So I bought paper boxes and had white labels printed in blue to paste on them. Then I tied them with blue cord. I chose blue because it was my favorite color. I was putting a great deal of my personality into the work I was doing. Why shouldn't I? It represented me. It was a part of myself, and by it people judged me. They didn't even know my name.

"I was getting along very nicely indeed, and making quite a modest reputation for my cakes, when a young woman came to see me and proposed that we should go into partnership and supply office lunches. I did not receive the suggestion with favor. My business was growing and I was doing very nicely alone; so I refused. But my would-be partner was keen to try it. I think she realized the possibilities of such a venture more clearly than I did, for she came again and again, and, like the woman in the Bible, because of her much importuning she won the day. I yielded conditionally, and we began to canvas for orders and to serve lunches to bank clerks chiefly, although we had a great many others, who were more or less regular customers.

"Unfortunately, our business relations were not profitable, and after a time, by mutual consent, we dissolved our partnership. When we established the lunch department, it was under a different name from that I had used, and was still using for my cake enterprise. As my co-worker wished to continue furnishing lunches, and she had been the originator of the lunch idea, it was agreed that she should take the name and the customers whom we had been supplying as her share, while I should unite lunches and cakes under my trade title, and seek new pastures.

"'If I can get ten a day, or at the least fifteen,' I thought, 'I shall be more than satisfied.' But, to my astonishment and very great delight, I soon had an average of twenty-five daily, most of them regular patrons.

"I endeavored to make my lunches just as appetizing as possible. Each little box contained six meat sandwiches, sometimes a stuffed egg, a tart, a piece of cake, and one or two kinds of fruit, according to the season. I always folded these edibles in butter paper, and on the top put a tissue napkin. I tried to vary the filling in the sandwiches each day, so that those who had them regularly would not tire of the menu. On Fridays I always substituted fish or egg for meat. For these lunches I charged fifteen cents.

"My lunch department gradually grew to rather enormous proportions. For a while I had as many as seventy lunches a day to put up. I was catering to quite a few of the office staff of the Parliament buildings, and also to a manufacturing concern, but the latter I found I could not profitably handle. They were people all more or less actively engaged, and required a more substantial lunch than that which I put up. They preferred quantity to daintiness, and I felt that it would not be wise to change the policy on which I had built up my little business, so I discontinued supplying that particular concern. Sometimes I was asked for a ten-cent lunch, and I put up a few, but found that I could not consistently continue it.

"About the time I added lunches to my products, Mother gave me the laundry for a workroom. Although it was in the basement, it was light and dry. I was charmed. That laundry was going to be converted into a studio, wherein I should produce masterpieces. It was to be no mere workroom. I cleaned it all up myself, had the walls whitewashed, put down an old rug that was not worn out by any means, to make the floor softer to walk on, and had a gas stove connected. Wasn't I the proud girl when I moved by paraphernalia downstairs and got it arranged to my satisfaction? Indeed I was. I felt equal to doing double the amount of work I had done hitherto.

"But the telephone! Mercy me! I wonder how many trips a day I made up the stairway to answer calls and then down again only to be recalled. Of course, I know now that I should have had a switch put in and another telephone down stairs. But, you must remember that I was not yet prosperous. I was only beginning to prosper and trying to make my business support itself. Out of my profit I could not yet afford anything that was even suggestive of luxury, and that was what another telephone would have appeared to me to be then. So I went on tripping up and down the stairs and longing for wings. It makes me ache, even now, to think of it.

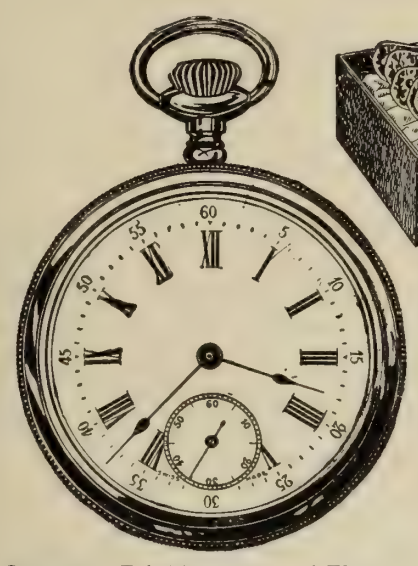
"But I would not have you think that my work went along always as smoothly as it sounds in the telling. Ah, no! anyone who has ever started out to accomplish anything knows all about the hard work it entails, and the discouraging conditions that arise. Life was a very serious matter with me in those early months. I was up at half-past five o'clock almost every morning. Every moment represented something to be done. Orders had to be sent out on time, and, as in all business establishments, large or small, accidents sometimes happened, and occasionally things went wrong. Just here comes the memory of one morning I had an order for eight dozen small cakes to be rolled in chopped nuts, which were in a dish on the window sill. One of my boys came along and tipped the plate over. Half went inside and the other half outside. Was I annoyed? Oh, don't ask me!

"It was the rule to pay for all parcels on delivery, but there were some who failed to do so, and at times I had quite an amount of money outstanding. If you will stop to make a mental calculation of the amount of money it took to carry on my work, you will realize that this was quite a serious matter to one who had started with a capital sum of forty cents. Take the items of flour and sugar alone. They amounted to a tidy sum. Then there were bread bills, and meat and fruit to pay for. Of course, by this time you will have guessed that my business had outgrown the time and ability of my little neighbor laddie, and I had to employ two boys and pay them well, in order to secure the kind that I could depend upon. This was another big item to be paid out of my earnings. Just to show how important it was that I should have reliable boys, one day something went wrong. I hadn't a boy at all. It cost me four dollars for the messenger service. Of course, I lost money that day, but it was better to do

Continued on page 58

DO YOUR XMAS SHOPPING NOW

Would you like your Christmas money to stretch further than it ever did before? Then make this a Delivery-paid Christmas, by buying everything you want from The Simpson Store. Here are some amazing values, the prices representing exactly what you pay at your nearest station.



B5-8834.—This Man's 17-Jewel Watch in a sterling silver open-face case for $5.95, is remarkable value. It's fitted with the Simpson special nickel movement, which you will find reliable. The case is a thin model, neither heavy nor bulky in the pocket. Purchase one of these watches for personal use or for Christmas giving. Write for it to-day. Price, delivered .. $5.95

B5-8835.—Give half a dozen Roger's Silver-plated Tea Spoons, packed in fancy lined box. Your gift will be appreciated. Dainty floral design. Price per half dozen, delivered ..... .99

B-8840.—Gold filled, Roman finished Cuff Links. $1.00 value for .39

B8841.—Sterling silver Cuff Links. 50c. value for..... .29

NOTE.—Send your order early and we'll engrave any letter free of charge.

Y-8842.—This splendid Black Velvet Bag is quite correct. Inside is a small purse for coins. Excellent gilt frame, durable cord handle, dainty tossels. Price, delivered $1.25

HT-8843.—Men's four-piece Brush Set. Two REAL ebony wood military brushes with 13 rows of hand-drawn bristles, and a hat and cloth brush to match. Warranted solid backs. Regular $3.00. Price, delivered $1.98

A-8838.—This pretty tailored Lace Bow is made of Plauen Irish lace with double bow of lawn at the back. Very dainty and usually sold for 25c. Price, delivered ..... .15

A-8839.—"Dutch" Collar, made from very fine Plauen Irish crochet work. Regularly sold at 35c. Better order a half dozen. They'll make pleasing Christmas gifts. Price, delivered .18

B5-8836.—Here's sterling value in a Sterling Silver Watch for women. Inside the case, (on which, by the way, we'll engrave any script monogram,) is a 7-jewel, nickel Swiss Lever movement. This splendid watch can be worn as a chatelaine or in leather wristlet. Price delivered..... $5.85

B5-8837.—Leather Wristlet for above watch, in tan or black. Price, delivered ..... .35

FM-8844.—No article for a man is more acceptable at Christmas time than gloves. These are splendid winter gloves of tan, suede leather, with warm wool lining and one dome fastener. They are strongly made and perfectly finished in every detail. Sizes 7 to 9½. We have several thousand pairs to sell, but at this very low price, it will be wisest to send your order at once. Price, delivered .59

We publish no Christmas Catalogue this year, but our Fall and Winter one is crowded with Christmas suggestions. A post card will bring it. Whether you order fifty cents' or fifty dollars' worth of goods, WE PAY ALL DELIVERY CHARGES.

The Robert SIMPSON Company Limited

TORONTO

Ontario Women's Institutes

GEORGE A. PUTNAM
SUPERINTENDENT
PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS, TORONTO

Masque of Empire

BY courtesy of Miss Agnes Deans Cameron, we are publishing a photograph of the Canadian car as it appeared in the Masque Imperial at the recent Festival of Empire in the Old Country. Miss Cameron says of the pageant and the chief figure therein:

Canadians in London and Canadians at home are justly proud of their countrywoman, the Marchioness of Donegall, who so gracefully personified "Canada" in the Masque Imperial at the Festival of Empire this season. It shows commendable patriotism for a society woman as popular as Lady Donegall, with the ball at her feet, to be willing to give up her leisure to repeat again and again her part in the Masque Imperial. Surely Canada could not have been more gracefully represented, for the Marchioness of Donegall is one of the acknowledged beauties of London, and her winning charm of manner is as distinctive as is her beauty.

Violet, Marchioness of Donegall, is the only daughter of the late Henry St. George Twining and Mrs. Twining, of Halifax, Nova Scotia, and married the fifth Marquis of Donegall (whom she survives) in 1904. Her heir, the present Marquess, is a beautiful and lovable boy, a godson of Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal. Lady Donegall has just passed through Canada on her way to the Durbar, where she is to be a lady-in-waiting to Her Majesty the Queen.

CANADIAN CAR, FESTIVAL OF EMPIRE, LONDON, ENGLAND

Contagious Diseases

IN the Stroud Branch great interest is taken in the meetings, and the members appreciate the advantages of the organization. A paper on "Home Treatment of Contagious Diseases," by Dr. L. J. Simpson, recently read before that Branch, is published herewith.

The treatment of the contagious diseases should really be taken up, one disease at a time, as there are certain necessary home precautions peculiar to each disease. However, as each disease would require a paper on itself, we shall deal with it in two parts: 1st, Home treatment of the more serious diseases, and in this class we will place typhoid fever, scarlet fever, diphtheria, tuberculosis, and smallpox; and, secondly, the treatment of the minor or children's diseases, as measles, mumps, chickenpox, scarlatina, etc.

I shall first deal with the prophylactic or preventative treatment, and this is certainly the most important part of the treatment of contagious diseases:

First, of course, is Isolation. This, in the serious cases, should be attended to by the attending physician; but where a contagious disease of any kind is even suspected, the child should be immediately put to bed, the children who have not been exposed sent away, and those who have been exposed quarantined for at least a week until assured that they have not developed the disease.

The choosing of the sick-room is an important detail; the most cheerful, best ventilated room in the house should invariably be chosen. Germs cannot thrive where there is plenty of air and sunshine. If possible, have a room facing south or east, or, better still, with a window in each direction.

The nurse should be quarantined with the patient, and should not mingle with other members of the family until a complete change of clothing has been made, and hands and face thoroughly disinfected. The nurse and all others in close contact with a severe case should use frequently an antiseptic gargle and a nasal spray. The room should be in that part of the house most easily quarantined, usually on the top floor; during the attack it should be stripped of upholstery, hangings, and carpet, and should be freely ventilated and kept as clean as possible.

All dust should be removed with damp cloths, which should afterwards be burned; the floor should occasionally be sprinkled with a bichloride solution (1 to 1000). The presence in the room of vessels filled with antiseptic fluids is of little or no practical value. The same may be said of sheets wet in carbolic or other solutions and hung about the room. Carbolic acid poisoning has been known to result from this practice. After an attack it should be remembered that the room is probably a greater source of danger than the patient. Smooth walls should be wiped with damp cloths wrung out of a bichloride solution (1 to 2000). The woodwork should be washed in the same solution and the floor scrubbed with it. After a thorough cleaning, while the floor is still wet and walls damp, the apartment should be fumigated with sulphur, or, better, with formalin. A simple method of using formalin is by Schering's lamp and tablets. If fumigation is to be efficient the room must be tightly closed, all cracks being stopped with cotton, and larger openings about doors, windows, and fire-places sealed by pasting paper over them. Bedding, cushions, pillows, carpets, etc., should be hung over chairs or upon lines strung about the room. Books should be suspended from covers so that the leaves are exposed. After fumigation the room should remain closed for twelve hours. After a severe case the walls should be painted or whitewashed, or, if papered, the wallpaper should invariably be renewed and the woodwork re-painted. Simply airing a room after an attack is of little or no benefit. An instance is on record of a patient contracting the disease in a room in which the windows had been open constantly for three months. The carpets, bedding, hangings and upholstery are best disinfected by steam. Where this is impossible, after a severe case, the mattress and pillows should be burned. Bedding, blankets, and other articles should be boiled, and afterwards exposed to sunlight for a long time out of doors.

The bedclothes, linen, and clothing removed from the patient during an attack should be put at once into a solution of carbolic acid (1 to 20) or zinc sulphate four ounces, common salt two ounces, and water one gallon, and afterward boiled at least two hours in the same solution.

Instead of handkerchiefs, pieces of old muslin, surgeon's gauze, or absorbent cotton, should be used for cleansing the nose and mouth of the patient, and burned immediately.

During desquamation the spread of the disease may be in a measure prevented by the free use of inunctions and warm antiseptic baths. All the excreta from the patient should be disinfected throughout the disease best by a carbolic solution (1 to 20). If cases of scarlet fever are to be transported this should be done only in a vehicle which can be easily disinfected. Under all circumstances as few persons as possible should come in contact with the patient.

In general, it is to be remembered that the danger is first from the patient, secondly from the room, and thirdly, from the nurse.

The mild contagions or children's diseases require no special treatment, although it is always advisable to have the children kept in bed for several days until the fever has subsided, and upon fluid diet until all traces of the disease have disappeared. This is an important detail in the prevention of kidney complications. The intense itching during the height of any eruption may be allayed by sponging with a weak carbolic acid solution of by inunctions with vaseline, or by the free use of rice powder. As soon as the fever and rash have disappeared, daily warm baths with soap and water should be used after which the entire body should be anointed with carbonized vaseline, or boric acid and vaseline 5 p.c. strength, with the two-fold purpose of facilitating desquamation and disinfecting the scales.

Where fever is high it is perfectly safe to use ice cold baths, or ice packs; in fact this is better than drug treatment.

Hints for Health

By MRS. REED, Woodville

NO other exercise develops all our physical powers as housework does, and let us remember that while it is hard to toil and labor long days through, it would be harder still to have no work to do. "Do not work too hard." You may say that is good advice, but how are we on the farms to rest where there is so much to be done and help so hard to get? I was wondering if you ladies of the Women's Institute had not found ways of lightening "labor and solving the problem. It is a question we all must face, if our daily tasks leave us so tired that we enter upon the new day weary and not rested with our night's rest. We need to stop and ask ourselves where this will end. When I was a girl there was an old English lady used to come to our home. She spoke sometimes of being tired-cross. It seemed very funny then, but I have found that it is possible to be so tired that it makes us irritable and cross with those we love. But I have been in homes where the mother could not rest until all she had planned to do that day was done, and when it was there was no rest for those in the home; small faults of the children seemed great.

Let us be careful, lest in our ambition to be good housekeepers we cease to be good home-makers. Better far to leave to our children the remembrance of a home where the mother was not too tired to share in their sports and have their friends in to spend the evening, than the remembrance of a home that was spotless. I think in summer we would make our work easier by using more raw fruit for dessert instead of pudding or pie, and be much better for us.

We should grow and use all kinds of vegetables, for every kind of fruit and vegetable has value as medicine containing something that our bodies need, as well as being pleasant to the taste. Then we must have fresh air in our homes. In summer this is not hard to do, as we can have our doors and windows open. But in winter, when we feel the cold and like the heat, we are apt to neglect this matter, for our bodies need fresh air as much as food and water. Our flesh and blood need oxygen. We should, if possible, have our bedroom window open, even if it is cold, as long as we are not in a draught. The ventilation of our homes may cost us more for fuel to warm the cold air, but will pay in the better health of our family.

Then, too, we must have sunshine. As plants and trees cannot grow and be healthy without sunshine, neither can we. Have you not noticed how pale those grow who work in shops and stores. You find more pale people in the large cities than in the country. People who live much in the open air get their faces and hands tanned; but the tanning of the skin is only part of the effect sunlight has on us. It is essential for growing the little red ducts which give redness to the blood. Then it is the great germ destroyer. Disease germs, we know, flourish and live in darkness. Knowing this, let us as much as possible let the sunlight into every corner of our houses. The windows of our houses should be large, and as many of them as possible face the south. This will perhaps fade the carpets and curtains. But better far do without them than keep out the sunshine. Our bedding should be thoroughly aired and whenever possible placed in sunshine. Then we should go out into the sunshine. Here is where we who live in the country have the advantage over our city friends. We do not have to dress in style to go for a walk. We can go as we are for a walk through the fields; or, if only a few minutes to spare, to our gardens. And I think we all should have flower gardens; the care of them will help to solve this question of health, and often, when the way seems hard, a few minutes spent in our gardens watching the growing plants and opening flowers will help us. We will be led to forget our cares and our thoughts will be drawn to the wise Father, who has so kindly given us beautiful flowers.

To-day, more than ever, our doctors think that our minds affect our bodies. We must have interests outside of ourselves and homes. I think that our Women's Institutes are good in that we leave our homes for a few hours, learn to know each other better, and how others work and think on many things pertainining to our homes. But I feel this is not all that we need. We should be planning to make some other home brighter, some other load lighter.

We should visit not always the homes of those who are happy, but the homes of those who are in the shadow, and, in trying to bear the burdens of others, our own will be lightened. Then, I think we should go away for a visit or trip for a few days at least. Some of us think our little world could hardly get along without us, but we have known homes where the mother has been taken and the world did not stand still, but they had to do without her. This summer I met a lady who was spending a few days at a convention. She had left her husband and son at home to keep house. She said, "I cannot always stay at home." Wise woman, who could see it in that light. I believe she went back to her home with a broader outlook on life and with much to think of. Then, I think, if we cannot often go away we can read. This is a great blessing. We can learn what is going on in the world around us, the thoughts of great men, and in this way grow strong mentally—which is very important if we wish to keep well.

To keep well is a duty we owe to ourselves, for life loses half of its joys if we are sick. It is a duty we owe our families, for what is home without mother, and home loses much of its brightness if any member of that home is sick. And lastly, but not least, it's a duty we owe our God, for you know what St. Paul says, "What, know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, which is in you, which ye have of God and is not your own? For ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your body and in your spirit, which are God's."

Managing a Husband

A GREAT many husbands, says Mrs. James Currie, of Owen Sound, are spoiled by mismanagement. Some women go about it as if husbands were bladders, and blow them up; others keep them constantly in hot water; others let them freeze by their carelessness and indifference; some keep them in a stew, by irritating ways and words; others roast them; some keep them in pickle all their lives. Now it is not to be supposed that any husband will be good managed in this way. Turnips wouldn't, onions wouldn't, cabbages heads wouldn't, and husbands won't, but they are really delicious when properly treated.

In selecting your husband you should not be guided by the silvery appearance, as in buying mackerel, or by the golden tint, as if you wanted salmon; be sure you select him yourself, as tastes differ. And, by the way, don't go to market for him, as the best are always brought to your door. It is far better to have none, unless you patiently learn to cook for him. A preserving kettle of finest porcelain is the best. See that the linen in which you wrap him is nicely washed and mended, with the required amount of buttons and strings nicely sewed on. Tie him in the kettle with a strong cord called comfort, as the one called duty is apt to be weak. They sometimes fly out of the kettle and become burned and crusty on the edges, since, like crabs and oysters, you have to cook them alive.

Make a clear, strong, steady fire out of love, neatness, and cheerfulness. Set him as near this as seems to agree with him; if he splutters and frizzles, don't be anxious. Some husbands do this till they are quite done.

Add a little sugar in the form of what confectioners call kisses, but no vinegar on any account. A little spice improves them, but it must be used with judgment. Don't stick any sharp instrument in him to see if he is becoming tender. Stir him gently, watching the while, lest he should lie too close to the kettle, and so become useless. You cannot fail to know when he is done. If thus treated you will find him very digestible, agreeing nicely with you and the children. They are really delicious when properly treated.

Meeting at Kemble

THE August meeting of the Women's Institute at Kemble was held at the home of Mrs. John Shirk. The president, Mrs. John Jones, took the chair, and conducted the opening, and after the reading of the minutes of the July meeting the programme for the afternoon was begun.

Mrs. Chisholm, of Owen Sound, read a good paper prepared by Mrs. John McQuaker upon "Table Manners," and Mrs. James Currie gave a paper upon "How To Manage a Husband," which was excellent, and created great applause. It was suggested that this paper be sent to the HOME JOURNAL for publication. This was followed by a talk by Miss Prichard (Domestic Science teacher in Collegiate) upon "Salads," and a number of other home and household subjects. Mrs. Danard read a selection, "How To Get a Holiday," that had been written by one of our members, which brought forth favorable comment. Miss Margaret Ireland, O.S., sang a very nice solo. One pleasing feature of this meeting was the number of O.S. friends, and a greater number of young girls than we have had for a time, forty-one were present in all. The membership is now over fifty.

Claremont Contributions

WE are not often so privileged as to receive both a poem and an article from one Branch. However, Claremont has done nobly this time, and you will first turn your attention to the following "Institute Song," to the tune of "Auld Lang Syne."

There is no more important place
Than where we call our home.
Our country then is next in rank,
No matter where we roam.

For home and country let us sing,
For home and country work.
Each member of our Institute
Her duty must not shirk.

Our motto then is plainly seen
Without our glasses on,
When finding out a helpful thing
We pass it right along.

Chorus—

And now to each with right good will,
Our friendship vows we plight,
And lend to each a kindly hand,
To help as best we might.

The name and writer of this excellent article on "Home Amusements and Literature" is not given, but she is a Claremont member.

Now that the snow is on the ground and the cold winter days are here, when practically everyone, to a certain extent, is shut in, our thoughts turn to how we can amuse and entertain ourselves at home. In the summer time, when all nature is in bloom and birds and flowers and gentle breezes call people to enjoy the out-of-doors, we do not find the time long, nor wonder what we shall do in our spare moments. But now, when all this is past and winter is here with its long evenings by the fireside, we do wonder in what way we shall occupy our time.

A writer in one of the Sunday papers said, "Have you ever considered what a priceless capital you possess in the leisure of the winter evenings, a capital that, wisely invested in intellectual culture and social service, will yield enormous gain to you?" She says that our future depends more than we think on the use we make of our leisure; that during business hours we are probably tied down to the routine of daily duty, and so are safe from temptation, but it is in the evenings that a person's character is tested.

There are many forms of amusement or recreation with which we can not only entertain ourselves, but instruct ourselves as well. Some people have certain hobbies in the pursuit of which they delight to spend any spare time they may have. Some people like making fine needle work, others delight in some of the other arts. What to one person may be a real pleasure, to another might mean a real task. For instance, some people like flowers and consider it a pleasant recreation to spend a few minutes each day in caring for them, and take much pleasure in watching their growth, while others might think the flowers pretty but would think the care of them an unnecessary burden.

Probably the two most popular forms of home entertainment are music and reading. I shall not attempt to say which is the more important. Each has its own influence. Who can think impure or unkind thoughts when listening to real music? Music, as well as being pleasant to the ear, also elevates our thoughts. There seems to be some beauty in it which carries us away from our own little commonplace thoughts and helps us to think of higher, better things. However, every person has not the opportunity to study music, and some perhaps have not the ability; but to-day I think reading matter is in the reach of almost everyone in our land. With newspapers and magazines in circulation, no one need be ignorant of the most important cur-

CREAM CREAM CREAM CREAM

If you want the highest price for your butter fat, use and you'll get it.

The DE LAVAL SEPARATOR

The De Laval Separator Co.
173-177 Williams St.
MONTREAL
VANCOUVER—WINNIPEG

98% of the PROFESSIONAL buttermakers use THE DE LAVAL SEPARATOR.

Agents Everywhere

Learn How the Hamilton Kitchen Cabinet Saves Time, Labor, Health, and Pays for Itself

WRITE today for our free booklet. It tells how the Hamilton Kitchen Cabinet forever does away with Kitchen drudgery, improves the appearance of the Kitchen and saves its own cost many, many times. The Hamilton combines all the latest and most scientific Kitchen Cabinet features.

We will ship you a Hamilton Kitchen Cabinet subject to your approval. If you are not pleased with it, return it to us at our expense.

Our booklet tells how you can pay for this wonderful device while it is paying for itself. Every housewife ought to have the Hamilton Kitchen Cabinet. It saves half your food. Write today, before you forget.

HAMILTON KITCHEN CABINET

The HAMILTON INCUBATOR CO., Ltd.
HAMILTON, ONTARIO

2

NOTICE—WE WANT DEALERS TO HANDLE OUR GOODS IN SOME LOCALITIES

CANADA'S BEST; THE RAYMOND SEWING MACHINE
PUT UP IN HANDSOMELY FINISHED GOLDEN OAK.
Send for prices to the Manufacturers.
THE RAYMOND MFG. CO. GUELPH, LIMITED, ONT.
EVERY MACHINE GUARANTEED
IT DOES PLAIN OR FANCY WORK.
SEWS PERFECTLY FROM THE LIGHTEST TO THE HEAVIEST GOODS.
GIVE IT A TRIAL.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

NEW STYLE
OLD STYLE
Mothers! Fathers!!
Look at the pictures of the old and the new in children's underwear —and say which you would prefer for your children.
They're half-dressed in the old-style kind that must be bothersomely buttoned. (See the lower picture. Hasn't it a familiar and vexing look?) They're always snugly and comfortably dressed in the new kind, whether it's buttoned or not. (Glance at the upper picture.) Your little ones will be neater, nicer, far more comfy in
WATSON'S Klosed-Krotch COMBINATIONS
Ask for it in any weight you like, and expect and find every size fits perfectly, because it is knit-to-fit. This new idea in underwear is worth your while. Ask your favorite store about it--and have them show it. You'll understand in a moment then.
25
OLD STYLE NEW STYLE

The Question of HEATING ?
BOILER INFORMATION
These two booklets tell you just what you want to know about heating your home--let us send you the one you want.
One tells chiefly about warm air systems, the other about hot water heating and steam heating.
Just write a post-card and mail to-day. It will pay you.
PEASE FOUNDRY COMPANY. LIMITED
TORONTO WINNIPEG
Showrooms: 32-36 Queen St. East Toronto
36
PEASE FURNACES and BOILERS

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

rent events in our own country and in distant parts of the world as well.

And at this season of the year the thought of books and reading seems to be very attractive, when we can sit in a cosy room with a fire burning brightly and hear the wind howling outside. People to whom books are no real attraction miss some of the most genuine pleasure this life can give.

Reading supplies recreation, and probably it is this use of reading that is most widely exercised. To many people a book is almost a necessity, and probably the world would be richer if this were true of all. To many reading is a pleasure; to others it is simply a weariness of the flesh. Yet, until a person learns to love reading his mental development is apt to be slow. Reading is, or ought to be, an important part of our daily life. The printed page, in one form or another, meets us at every turn. That fact is having its effect on our lives, even in spite of ourselves. What we are reading is helping more than we often imagine, to make us what we are. It is important that we do read, but it also is very important what we read. Haphazard reading, without any plan or definite purpose, the devouring of anything that comes to our hand is one of the banes of the times.

Books may be divided into many distinct classes, each of which has its own special mission, and it is foolish to blame one book for not being another kind of a book, just as it would be foolish to blame a cabbage for not being an orange. We must learn to use books, as we use tools, each for its own work. Fiction, science, history and poetry each has its place, and, rightly used, each will do good work. Reading means education; mental development means more than gaining knowledge. It also means increased mental force, increased thinking power. Reading also should provide inspiration. The life story of some great noble person is often an incentive to some one to do greater things in life.

But, after all, let us remember that recreation, though it should be one of the minor uses of reading, is both useful and enjoyable in its place. Recreation, to be useful, should follow and precede toil, and reading may afford a weary person many an hour of quiet rest and keen enjoyment.

Thunder Bay Convention

AMONG northern institutes, Thunder Bay District holds an honored place. The latest annual convention was held appropriately in a marquee on the grounds of the Agricultural Association, where hundreds of women gathered from all over the district. The president of the District Institute, Mrs. D. J. Piper, of Slate River, and representatives from the branches, reviewed the year's work and offered suggestions for future social and business methods for the welfare of home and country that showed the growing enthusiasm in the association. In the morning Mrs. Williamson, the Fort William Health Visitor, spoke on nursing in the home and the care of babies and in the afternoon Miss Hattie Gowsell, teacher of domestic science in the Port Arthur Collegiate Institute, gave an address on "The Farmer's Daughter," advocating the method of providing the girls on the farm with means of earning pin money by raising fruit, flowers and vegetables, by the care of poultry and dairy work, etc. This method of keeping the girl on the farm is so practical that its value cannot be questioned, and the money earned would be used generally in improving the environment of the home.

Mrs. Emery, of Dorion, gave an excellent talk on "The Home." Nothing can take the place of this divine institution, and the ideal home is founded on the standard set by God in regard to discipline founded on love. She dwelt on the influence of environment and urged mothers to set before their children the beautiful things in nature, and surround them with books and associates calculated to inspire them to become useful in the community. Home influence brings this result as the mother's recompense. The Round Table Conference, led by Mrs. T. S. T. Smellie, brought before the meeting a series of lecturettes on devices for labor-saving, means for rousing and holding interest in meetings, and making the homes all that they should be. In the Fair, members of the Women's Institute found the real demonstration of women's work and influence in the home—in itself an inspiration to those who want to do things. These lecturettes were contributed by Mrs. D. Piper, Mrs. Perry, Mrs. Gowanlock, Mrs. McGregor, Mrs. Merkley, Mrs. Sherk, Mrs. Emery, Mrs. Boulter and other members of the various branches.

Appeal from Amherstburg

THE Women's Institute of Amherstburg is endeavoring to raise funds for the purpose of erecting in their town a statue in commemoration of the saving of Amherstburg by the famous chief Tecumseh in the War of 1812.

As the centennial approaches, the ladies feel they cannot allow it to pass without marking in some way that memorable event. As a large amount must be raised in July 1912, the ladies most earnestly solicit the aid of the readers of this Journal, and your mite, however small, will be thankfully received. Address, Mrs. D. H. Terry, Amherstburg, Ont.

Girls and Their Ideals

FROM the Singhampton Institute comes an article on the above subject by Miss Nellie Taylor. The article is somewhat long for these columns, but we may select from it several pertinent paragraphs:

An ideal; what is it? It is a perfect type whether a reality or a conception only—a standard of perfection, beauty, moral or physical excellence. Girls! What are they? They are maidens or young unmarried women, and are designated "girls" from infancy to maturity and beyond it—maidservants, sweethearts, etc.

We shall deal with the most important age of any girl, the girl in her teens. The girl in her teens is often a peculiar combination of whims and fancies, likes and dislikes, giggles and impulses, exaggerations and discouragements; so much so, that the careful observer of such persons wonders what the next development will produce. All girls have their ideals and each one differs from the other as the mind of one girl differs from another, and yet there is a marked similarity in all their ideals.

In the average girl a change takes place at thirteen; it is the dawn of womanhood which means many things, but always three things, dreaming, longing and loving. She is unconscious of their meaning, but feels their power. In these awkward years of early adolescence she has her ideals embodied in parents, teachers, older girls, imaginary characters, or some ideal woman she meets, whose magnetic influence has drawn the girl, as it were, by force. These she worships. If she has been carefully trained, guarded and shielded by the patient mother, wise teacher or other sympathetic woman in all the knowledge that will help keep her pure and safe she will be ready for the wealth of emotion, the increase of intellectual and spiritual power to be developed in the next few years.

There is a three-sided life to every girl—physical, intellectual, and spiritual. These all blend so harmoniously and unite so readily that they cannot be separated with impunity. Every mother or guardian of the girl in her teens should jealously guard her physical development and bring her as near physical perfection as possible. Sound physical health is necessary for the attainment of right thinking, right actions, and right feeling. She should be taught to work, to do the duties of the home life, to save the tired mother, to be courteous to the aged, thus instilling until it becomes second nature that greatest attraction in a girl's disposition, unselfishness. She should be taught to play. This leads to the social side of life. Mankind is social, we must have companionship and pleasures in common with our kind. The girl who seeks solitude continually is ill mentally, physically, or spiritually, and needs watchful, sympathetic care.

Environment has a great deal to do with the girl's companionships. If she comes in contact with ideal Christian women in the Church and community or lives in a happy home, surrounded by culture and refinement, she will be guided and influenced in her choice. But what of the many girls who are less fortunate? The teacher in the Sunday school or in the public school or some outreaching, large-hearted, Christian woman may exert an influence over her, but chances are against her. We sometimes get out of patience with the lightheartedness, giggles, boisterous fun and silliness of the early teens, and the social tactics and philosophies of the later teens; but let us remember that the natural girl is "whole," she is body, mind and spirit, and all these make her a social being. We are serving our God just as truly on Monday, when we open our hearts and homes to entertain a few young people in intelligent proper games and amusements, as when we stand before a class on Sunday and talk over "Serve the Lord with gladness." On Sunday we are telling them how, on Monday we are showing them how.

When we say this, by no means neglect the Sunday school. If we older ones could get a glimpse of the significant fact that a girl cannot play wrong and pray right, we would be more alive to the importance of the social side of our young people's lives. We would be more willing to solve the problem of how to satisfy the social nature in ways that make for character. The intellectual goes hand in hand with the physical. A healthful body produces a healthful mind. We are grateful that the time has come when physical culture is pre-eminent. In the days of our great grandmothers and grandmothers men would hold up their hands in "holy horror" if the mothers spoke of educating their girls; but to-day in this twentieth century "young women" hold the balance of education. Indeed, it has been said that if this proportion continues for another generation, a young woman of twenty-five will be so far in advance of the average young man that she will not be able, with a telescope, to see a marriageable man on the horizon, leagues behind her.

In our country women are entering the department of finance, becoming bookkeepers in banks, etc., and up-to-date, so far as we know, no young woman has ever absconded to the United States followed by detectives, with a reward of one thousand dollars dangling over her head. Hence the need of proper physical and mental training, and these are nourished by work or exercise in the same.

Closely allied with this two-fold aspect is the spiritual side of her life. Sometimes the girl of sixteen or younger finds Christ and He is her ideal. Failing to find Him she becomes dissatisfied and restless, and longs intensely for something as an ideal. This is a critical period, she, in any case, needs patience, real sympathy, and careful understanding from those with whom she lives. She needs to be led, not driven, to come in contact with persons of refinement, so that she may contrast them with persons not so cultured, for she is keenly critical. Her ideals are high, and her requirements match her ideals, to be brought in touch with good, true men and women. She has dreams, hopes, desires, and longings. We must furnish the opportunity to work them out in reality. Biography is good. Such lives as Francis Ridley Havergal, Florence Nightingale; characters in history, as Nelson, Wellington, etc., all help in the formation of teen character. Sometimes we see the dreamy, imaginative, sixteen-year-old girl suddenly awakened and transformed by some vivacious person who has come into her life, who, being personally attractive and practical, helped and encouraged the shy, timid, self-conscious girl to take her place in life, of which she forms a part. The girl needs the Sunday school, even if she belongs to a class that gives way to giggles, whisperings, thoughtlessnesses, irreverence or discourtesy. She gets something there and often more than we think, and the Sunday school needs her. It needs her devotion, enthusiasm, her realities, her imaginations. We are glad the Sunday school has awakened to the fact that it needs the girl in her teens to keep up the interest in the school. The girl in her teens needs the Church. It furnishes, though imperfectly, the steady, uplifting, spiritualizing force and influence upon her nature during the period of the awakening and strengthening of ideals.

Most girls, in spite of hope's castles and day dreams, are destined to live amid the commonplaces of life; and unless they are prepared, many will fail to learn that.

"The trivial round, the common task
Will furnish all we ought to ask.
Room to deny ourselves, a road
To bring us daily nearer God."

The "teen" girl is glad to be alive, and her evident keen enjoyment of a world which some of her elders have found hard and a little disappointing, does more to cheer and brighten the dull grey of the commonplace than she knows. She is the life of the home. Many girls are doing noble work in their own homes as missionaries, deaconesses, and other servants of God, because away back in their teens, by the patient efforts of somebody, they were lifted out of their narrow selves to a place where they caught a glimpse of the real meaning of life. All girls have a common ideal. I think that is to be "grown up," a woman. How interesting it is to watch a group of young girls in their early teens playing at "grown up." How they copy from their elders, when dressed up in long skirts, etc. Even the smile and as nearly as possible all the set speeches and excuses that are given by the "grown ups," proving to the observer the force of example.

Let us hope they all wish to become true, ideal women. The ideal woman has been summarized by Miss M. H. Tupling as follows: 1st. She should be well developed physically. Solomon says—"She girdeth herself with strength. She strengtheneth her arms." 2nd. She has a well trained mind, not necessarily to know history or languages, but trained to habits of accurate thought. To show by look and act kindness to all. "She openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness." 3rd. She can make a decision quickly. Many of us fail right here. 4th. She is trained in some particular business whereby she can make a livelihood. Some think it is unwomanly for a girl to make her own living and come in contact with the business world, but Solomon does not think so. He says: "She considereth a field and buyeth it. She looketh well to the ways of her household." Like Martha, she should be busy and efficient, but, like Mary, find time to sit at the Master's feet. 5th. She will harbor no evil thoughts, take Paul's advice: "Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, if there be any praise, think on these things." 6th. She is essentially honest—no hypocrite. 7th. She is charitable, particularly toward her own sex. 8th. She is sympathetic. "She stretches out her hand to the poor, yea she reaches forth her hand to the needy." 7th. She is happy: if gloomy or depressed there is something wrong. 10th. She is religious. It is religion that develops the rarest qualities of a woman's character. Let those who have opportunity do all they can both by precept and more especially by example to develop what is true, noble and good in the girls, to train them up for God. Study them, pray over them, be patient with them, sympathize with them, help them. You have a great responsibility resting upon you. Make use of your opportunity.

"God wants the happy hearted girls, the loving girls,
The best of girls, the worst of girls.
He wants to make the girls His pearls,
And to reflect His holy face and bring to mind His wondrous grace,
That beautiful the world may be,
And filled with love and purity.
God wants the girls."

Multiplying the Meat

IF one desires little meat because of principle, or if one must economize because the condition of the purse makes it necessary, the following plan for distributing the meat flavors may be of interest.

The amount of meat that would supply four persons for a meal, if it were roasted by itself, will satisfy six or seven persons if it be made into a stew with vegetables. The reason for this is that the entire bulk of the vegetables cooked with the meat contain its delicious flavor. Such a delicious combination may be made on top of the stove by simmering the ingredients in a kettle, may be prepared in the fireless cooker, or blended in a slow oven in an earthen casserole, or baked in the meat drippings.

If you boil your beef or chicken or fresh pork, the broth may be served as a soup at one meal and the meat may appear at another.

One mother, who economizes in order to educate her children, makes a fifteen-cent soup bone flavor two, and sometimes three meals, for her family of four. Two-thirds of the meat is cut off and minced in a food-chopper. This is either browned to form the basis of a thick gravy, or baked with moistened bread crumbs and an egg as a beef-loaf. At another meal, the bone and the remaining meat are made into a strong soup with the addition of vegetables.

The ONWARD Sliding Furniture Shoe

Piano Shoe

Furniture Shoe

Make Things Easy For Yourself

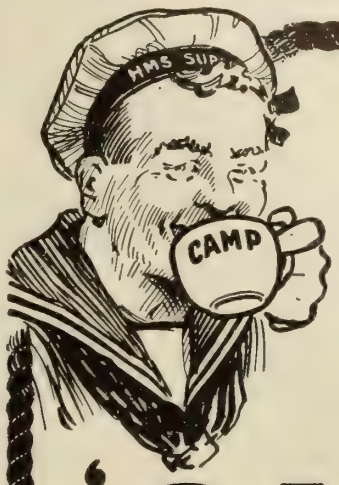
Don't be always lifting heavy Furniture to put casters in place. Don't be always oiling floors and straightening carpets that casters have marked. Don't be bothered with casters anyway.

Onward Sliding Shoes have replaced casters in hotels like Waldorf-Astoria, New York and Hotel Astor the latter using 2,500 sets. All sizes and styles for Chairs, Couches, Beds, Pianos, etc.

Special Offer For 50c., we will send postpaid a set of four Glass Base Shoes, suitable for Morris Chair, Couch or similar-weight Furniture. Regular price, 70c.

Onward Sliding Shoes prevent carpets and rugs being torn. They slide smoothly over the floor—make Furniture easy to move—improve looks and are always in place. Easy to put on—last a lifetime.

ONWARD MFG. CO., Berlin, Ont. Factories at Berlin, Ont. and Menasha, Wis. 23



JACK'S the boy for 'CAMP'!

Cold raw mornings—all sorts of weather—ashore or afloat, 'Camp' always cheers, stimulates and 'warms the cockles of the heart.'

CAMP' keeps anywhere—any time.

'CAMP' COFFEE

Of all grocers. Sole Makers—R. Paterson & Sons, Ltd. Coffee Specialists, Glasgow.

ONE GOOD FEATURE OR EVERY FEATURE GOOD WHICH?

AS long as a cream separator skims close, it is a good investment. But one good feature or a few good features do not make a separator that will skim close for any length of time.

A good separator is one in which the minor parts have been just as carefully designed and just as well made as the most important parts. A defect in a minor part will, by throwing the entire machine out of adjustment, offset all the perfection attained in any other part of the machine. In the one feature does not overtop all others because the same I H C standard of quality in design, material, and workmanship is maintained throughout. They are the only separators with dust-proof and milk-proof gears which are easily accessible. The frame is entirely protected from wear by phosphor bronze bushings. These separators have large shafts, bushings, and bearings; the flexible top-bearing is the strongest and most effective found in any separator. The patented dirt-arrester removes the finest particles of dirt from the milk before the milk is separated. I H C Cream Harvesters are made in two styles—Dairymaid, chain drive, and Bluebell, gear drive—each in four sizes.

I H C Cream Harvesters

Dairymaid and Bluebell

The I H C local agent will be glad to let you examine one of these separators, or, write nearest branch house for catalogues and other information.

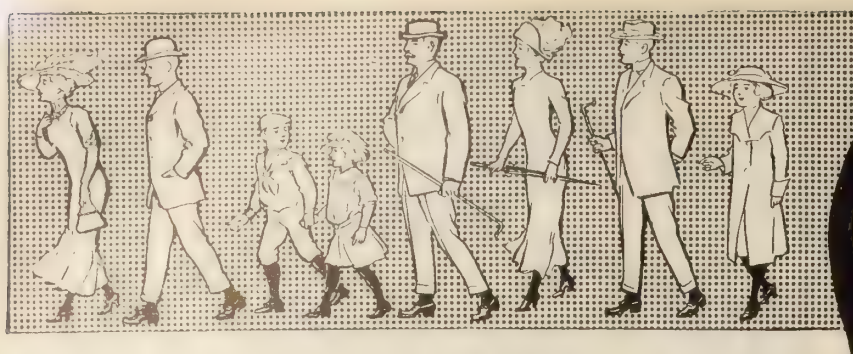
CANADIAN BRANCHES: International Harvester Company of America at Brandon, Calgary, Edmonton, Hamilton, Lethbridge, London, Montreal, North Battleford, Ottawa, Regina, Saskatoon, St. John, Weyburn, Winnipeg, Yorkton.

International Harvester Company of America
Chicago (Incorporated) U S A

I H C Service Bureau

The Bureau is a clearing house for Agricultural data. It aims to learn the best ways of doing things on the farm, and then distribute the information. Your individual experience may help others. Send your problems to the I H C Service Bureau.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.



Learn now of Hosiery Really Fault-Free!

Let your next hosiery purchase be Pen-Angle. Examine these perfected stockings or socks closely when the clerk shows them to you. Notice the utter absence of the clumsy, troublesome seams you have been wearing. Hold them up and study how the shape has been knit into them---not the fabric dragged into shape as in all other hose. And then, when you wear them, see how snug and neat their fit ----how shape-retaining their method of manufatcture---how long-wearing our exclusive knitting process makes it sure your hose will be---once you cease casual buying and demand only

71

WARRANTED HIGH PENMAN'S GRADE HOSIERY

Pen-Angle

Full-Fashioned Seamless Hosiery

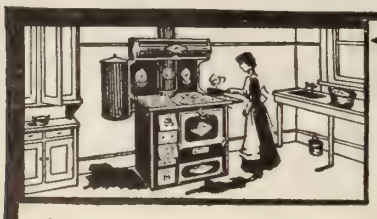
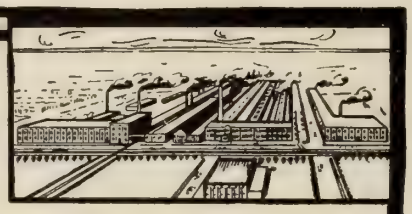
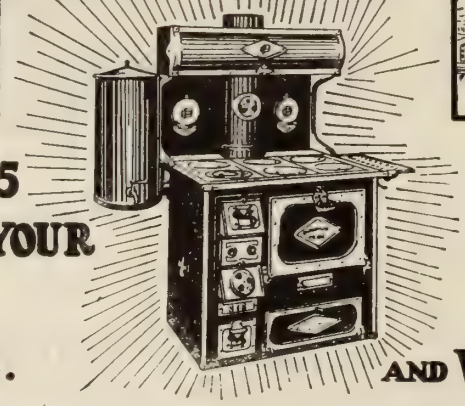
Made by Penmans Limited, Paris, Canada

UNDERWEAR, SWEATERS, HOSIERY



← DIRECT FROM FACTORY TO KITCHEN →





SAVE OVER $25 WHEN BUYING YOUR RANGE THIS FALL.

$41.00 TO $49.00

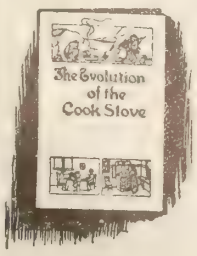
AND WE PAY THE FREIGHT

You Can Buy "DOMINION PRIDE" RANGE At Factory Price

Direct From The Largest Malleable Range Works in Canada

IF you want to save from $25 to $30, and at the same time get the most satisfactory kitchen range made, write for our Catalogue and look into the merits of the "DOMINION PRIDE," at from $41 to $49.

If we sold you identically the same range in the usual way, through a dealer, you would have to pay from $69 to $78 for it. You would be paying two extra profits—to wholesaler and retailer—which would add $25 to $30 to the cost of your range, but absolutely nothing to its value.



"The Evolution of the Cook Stove"

TELLS about cooking from the time the Cave Dwellers dropped hot stones into the pot to boil it. It also tells all about "Dominion Pride" Ranges. Whether you need a Range just now or not you will enjoy reading this book.

Write for Free Copy.

Besides costing much less than other ranges in its class, the "DOMINION PRIDE" is much more satisfactory. It is made of tough, strong, malleable iron and the best blue polished steel—materials which will not warp, crack or break.

The polished steel does not need blacking—simply rub it over with a cloth. With its cold rolled steel plate oven—sectional iron fire-box lining, with air chambers—and double-walled flues lined with asbestos—the "DOMINION PRIDE" is the most economical range you can buy. Actual tests have proved that it saves over 30% of fuel, burning either wood or coal.

WE PAY THE FREIGHT

A "DOMINION PRIDE" Range, with high closet shelf and elevated tank or flush reservoir, with zinc sheet to go under range, 8 sections blue polished steel pipe and two elbows, will be delivered to any station in Ontario, Quebec or the Maritime Provinces for $41, or to any station in the four Western Provinces for $49—$5 to be sent with order and balance to be paid when the Range is delivered at your station. If not convenient to pay cash we will arrange to accept your note.

Canada Malleable & Steel Range Mfg. Co., Limited, Oshawa, Ont.

When writing it will be a distinct favor to us if you will mention this paper. 7

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Household Exchange

FROM Mrs. T. J. McDowell, of Listowel, comes the following information which, no doubt, will be welcome to many a housewife:

I had such success in washing a white ostrich plume not long ago that I would like to pass on the method. Make a suds of lukewarm water and pure castile soap, then put in the feather and dip it up and down, and gently press out the dirt with your fingers. When the feather looks clean rinse twice in lukewarm water, and hang in the air by a string for a couple of hours. Then bring it in and shake until quite dry. Take a pair of small scissors and carefully curl. Make the curl loose, and your feather will look like new.

An excellent ointment to have on hand in case of burns or scalds is zinc oxide mixed with either castor or olive oil, until you have a thick, smooth salve. Spread thickly on soft linen cloths, then lay on the burn. I have also used it with great effect on cuts. Keep it mixed in a little jar in a handy place, ready for any emergency.

To launder net or bobbinet curtains nicely and easily, wash in the usual way first, then blue them in water in which a quantity of good thick starch has been stirred. Hang on the line by the selvage side, the full length of the curtain. They dry quickly and will be perfectly smooth, except for the frill and insertion. Then take a good hot iron and press them out, and your curtains are ready to put up again.

There are many ways coal oil may be use as a cleanser around the house. When cleaning windows add a small quantity to clear warm water, and you will find the windows polish beautifully. It is also splendid to use in cleaning the appointments of the bath room and sink.

When the children come in with wet boots, try filling their boots full of crushed paper, before putting to dry. The paper absorbs the moisture, and keeps the shoes from becoming hard and unshapely.

To cook an egg for a little child have the water boiling rapidly, then put in the egg and set on top of the stove, where it will keep warm for three minutes, then serve. Cooked in this way the egg is jellied all the way through.

MRS. C. I. BROOK, "Brook Glen," Lillico, Alberta, sends a short article on "Window Gardens," which ought to prove of value to many readers.

Autumn, with its soft, mellow, sunny days, but cool, frosty nights, steals in upon us. We enjoy these days, but for the fact that they are a harbinger of stern old winter, which, when it arrives, obliterates all the unsurpassable color blendings and tintings on Mother Earth, and enwraps her in a mantle of white—and we heave a sigh of regret that the flowers, among other things, are all gone. For we all love flowers—love to see them, even if we do begrudge the time necessary to care for them, as Jennie Allen Moore said of herself, in October's "Around the Hearth."

Even though we lose our outdoor flowers, still we may have some indoors. And at this season of the year might I suggest to those who feel they have not the time to devote to the care of a large number of plants individually, that they start a window garden, which will require but little attention. A window may be made very attractive by a common soap box (or one made any desired size) and a few plants. Nail four legs to the box, paint, stain or varnish, to suit the coloring of the room, if you wish, fill three-quarters full of good loamy soil, and put in varieties of plants or seeds, in such arrangement as you desire.

The flowers should be of contrasting colors. For instance, the following gives a very pleasing effect—geraniums of a scarlet variety in the centre of the box, with white begonias around them, then heliotrope, with its abundant flowers and sweet fragrance. Or, red geraniums with mixed pansy seeds planted around them. In every case, around the front and ends of the box, plant one or more kinds of trailing plants—strawberry geraniums, Wandering Jew, lover's tangle, portulaca, or creeping nasturtium—which may grow almost to the floor, and completely hide the box.

Concerning Christmas

AT Christmas time, it is naturally the small person whose needs are most considered. On this page will be found patterns of home-made toys which will be found useful and amusing. Number 6163 is Teddy's sacque coat, trousers and cap, 12, 16 and 20 inches high; 7124 is a dog blanket, 8, 12 and 16 inches at centre back; 6165, a pattern for jointed monkey; 6511, a Teddy lion; 6464, a Teddy bear, 12, 16 and 20 inches high; 6341, a Billy possum; 5834, a Buster Brown bulldog; 5841, a cat, and 6347 a Jack rabbit.

Then in fancy dresses for dolls, there is number 7206 for dress and coat, 18, 22 and 26 inches high; 6468, for dress and underwear for doll 18, 22 or 26 inches high; 7197, a middy costume, 18, 22 and 26 inches high; 6492, dress and coat, 18, 22 and 26 inches high; 6839, dress and rompers, 18, 22 and 26 inches high.

SUPPOSE, for a moment, you happened to know some young woman crippled by rheumatism, who never was able to get to the dining-room, and that you selected for her the cunningest little individual chafing-dish you ever saw. Wouldn't she probably be more delighted wit hit than any of her other Christmas gifts? Her luncheons and Sunday night teas might be served in it with scarcely any extra trouble to those waiting on her. When she felt able she could prepare some simple oyster and egg dishes for herself; but, even if she did not feel equal to this, the chafing-dish could be used as an attractive way of serving what had already been prepared in the kitchen. With the lamp lighted the little luncheon would have a distinctly tempting appearance when it arrived in the sick-room.

Take another imaginary case: that of a sick-abed man especially fond of good coffee. Buy for him a tiny coffee machine, and you might give him no end of pleasure, to say nothing of insuring his getting freshly-made and steaming-hot coffee. He would look forward to his breakfasts with real pleasure, and it would take only a little extra time to make the coffee. Such gifts unquestionably make the days spent indoors less tedious.

A little lamp or candle with a pretty shade gives an air of festivity to the tray or small table on which the invalid's evening meal is served. In these days of electrical connections such a lamp may be quickly and safely arranged, and some of the shops are carrying a large assortment of lamps which are admirably adapted to this purpose.

IT does not often happen in art work of such different kinds as cut-leather work and stenciling that practically the same tools and the same designs can be used. But a cardboard pattern may be cut for stenciling in the same way in which the traced pattern is used to cut the leather.

Draw the rough design on Manila paper, place tracing-paper over it, secure by thumb-tacks and make the finished drawing with a soft pencil. If the design is reversible place the traced side next to the suede. Otherwise, draw the design on the opposite side of the transparent paper. Using the back of the knife-blade, rub each line, and holding the paper firmly with the left hand, remove one or two tacks to inspect results, being careful not to move the tracing. When all parts are perfectly distinct remove the tracing and preserve the outlines with a fine pen and India ink very lightly applied.

Place a piece of glass under the skin and go all over the design, starting each opening with the knife, finishing the cutting with the scissors.

Apply the back of velvet or satin to the leather with tube glue after the design is cut. The tools required for the execution of cut-leather work present little or no hindrance to the determined worker. A very sharp knife and embroidery scissors, a drawing board, "T" square, compass, tracing-paper and thumb-tacks (the last five articles obtainable in any art or department store for $1.50) are the essential accompaniments to this work. Cut-leather articles are among the most desirable Christmas gifts.

EVEN in the last few years great changes have been going on in the manner of celebrating Christmas. The growing interest in all matters of hygiene is accountable for many of these revolutions. Now, instead of the foolish trifles so often put aside by the recipient as "good enough to give away next year" many gifts take the form of useful kitchen utensils. The kitchen being the recruiting place for the forces of health, what more appropriate to this season of joy than machinery for fortifying those forces? To hear the "groan of delight" of one housemother as she lifts the light and convenient aluminum teakettle, with its top that falls over by a certain twist of the handle, is satisfaction enough. Compare her delight in this labor-saving kettle with the chagrin she felt two years ago in unrolling a highly-scented handkerchief-case—fifth of its kind among her presents.

Let's make a Jelly Roll—
With FIVE ROSES flour.

Its Strength and Fineness hold your batter together in the long well-greased pan.

Bakes evenly.

Smooth Texture—soft, golden Crumb, spongy, porous, yielding.

No holes, nor lumps to vex you.

And when you turn it out on the damp napkin hot and savory, and you spread the under side with "jell"—

It doesn't get soggy nor crumbly.

Roll it gently, carefully.

Not a crack—not a break.

Perfect Smoothness—a Perfect Roll—Yours.

Bake anything, make anything.

Use FIVE ROSES—bread and pastry.

Melting puff paste—flaky pie crust—crinkly fritters—tooth some rolls.

FIVE ROSES for anything—everything.

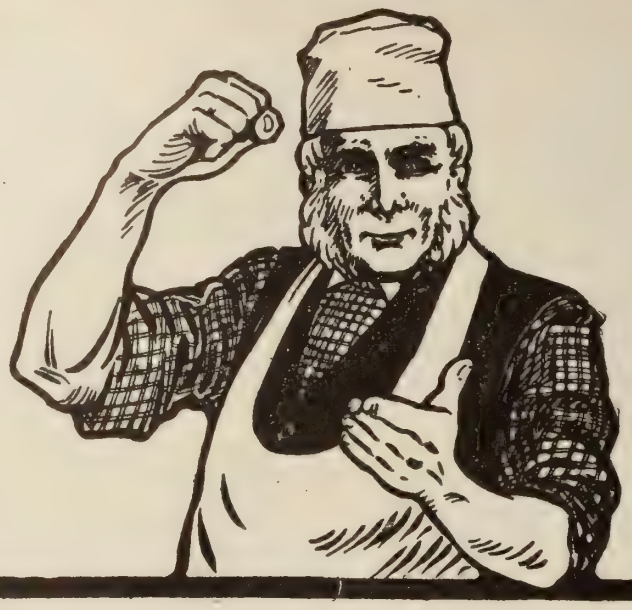
Be flourwise.

Five Roses Flour

Not Bleached Not Blended

LAKE OF THE WOODS MILLING COMPANY, LIMITED KEEWATIN TRADE MARK REGISTERED

LAKE OF THE WOODS MILLING COMPANY, LIMITED MONTREAL



I'm the Cream of the West Miller, and I'll tell you what I'll do—I'll guarantee your next batch of bread

I WILL guarantee it to rise away up out of the pans, and make as delicious bread as you ever tasted. The loaves will be the biggest and most wholesome you ever baked with the same amount of flour. I'll guarantee it or you get back the money you paid for the flour! Now see:

Just go to your grocer and buy a bag of Cream of the West Flour. Take it home and bake it up.

Give it a trial.

Give it a couple of trials. Your oven or yeast might not be just right the first time.

Now when you give it a fair trial, if you honestly feel that you have not had splendid satisfaction with Cream of the West Flour, return the unused portion of the bag and get your money back.

Just tell the store man your bread didn't come out right and you want your money back as guaranteed.

It's not the grocery man who loses. It doesn't come out of his pocket. It is the Campbell Milling Company, Limited, of Toronto, who pay, and they are satisfied to pay if you'll be satisfied to try Cream of the West Flour.

Ask your store-keeper about this guarantee. He knows. He will tell you. Try a bag next baking day.

Cream of the West Flour

The hard wheat flour that is guaranteed for bread

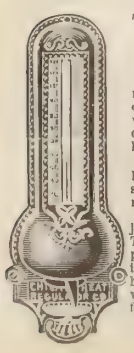
Guarantee

WE hereby affirm and declare that Cream of the West Flour is a superior bread flour, and as such is subject to our absolute guarantee of money back if not satisfactory after a fair trial. Any dealer is hereby authorized to return price paid by customer on return of unused portion of bag if the flour is not as represented.

The Campbell Milling Company, Limited, Toronto.
ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, PRESIDENT

CREAM OF THE WEST

100



This Heat Regulator
Saves on Your Coal
30 Days to Try—60 Days to Pay

Prove it for yourself. We send it all ready to put up on 30 Days Free Trial to convince you it will do just what we say it will. Anyone who can use a screw-driver can attach it to any furnace, steam or hot water heater.

The Chicago Heat Regulator keeps even heat, whether the weather outside be below zero or above freezing. That means health and 25 per cent coal saved.

The Thermostat keeps the temperature just as you want it during the day. Set the Time-Set at night and it will open the dampers at any hour you desire in the morning. No getting up early to warm up the house. Send for Free Booklet A today, which gives full particulars—Don't wait for zero weather.

Otterville Manufacturing Co.
Otterville, Ontario

CHAMBERLIN
Metal Weather Strips
KEEP OUT
DUST - NOISE - DRAFTS

Guaranteed to last a Lifetime. Can be attached to any Building

A postal will bring prices and the names of satisfied users in your neighborhood

Toronto Office---598 YONGE STREET

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Around the Hearth

Continued from page 14

and so she bravely conquered the tantalizing voice that would insist on telling her, "I knew you couldn't hold out."

MR. HOLDEN drove up to the door, and received the list of groceries and provisions from his wife. He was off for town twenty miles away, so he kissed wife and little ones, and sprang into the sleigh, Mrs. Holden calling after him not to forget to call at the express office. Then she swept and dusted, cleaned and scrubbed all day, for the intervening days until Christmas would be filled with baking and cooking, and, of course, the usual guests, the childless couple on their right, and the lone bachelor on the left would come for dinner. A good, hot supper was ready when the merry jingle of sleigh bells was again at the door, and the boxes were carried in, among them the special one, hidden among the other parcels, not to be opened until the little folk retired.

The last day of anticipation was over. Four expectant little ones went to bed with hopes beating high; four pairs of "clean stockings without a hole" were hung, or rather pinned, with large safety pins to the velours couch, hung according to age, and at respectful distances. Mr. Holden had gone over to sit a while with the bachelor, who had been housed in with rheumatism. "Do not wait for me, Margaret, I may be late, as I will help him out a little." He had not seen the row of stockings, but at eleven o'clock when he came home, without disturbing them, he placed above Georgie's a mouth organ, new skates all ready fastened on new boots; and beside Nettie's a lovely doll, and set of blue and white dishes. Billy-boy's woolly dog, on wheels was there, and a tin trumpet, with a rubber doll for baby that whistled when squeezed. At the head of the couch was a large parcel addressed to Mrs. Holden from Santa Claus.

"Don't be long out to the barn, Daddy, we want you, too."

"All right," he called cheerily. When the mystic door was opened their delight knew no bounds. Mr. Holden placed himself in front of the box until all the gifts had been examined, then took baby from his wife's knee, and placed the box there. "Open it, mother," said Georgie, "see, from Santa Claus," spelling it out, as his mother's trembling fingers untied the cord. A handsome set of furs, kid gloves, and a box of chocolates. She smiled her gratitude just then, and all day long there was a glad light in her eyes, and a song in her heart. When the happy day was ended, and they were alone, she said, "James, you have been so good and kind," and her voice broke, "and I never gave you anything in return." His arms held her close as he said, "Yes, dear, you have given me the grandest gift of all, your forgiveness for what I have always regretted, and that is something, isn't it?"

Another View of George

A MAN but lately married went out to post a letter, and as the lamps had not been lit in the suburban road in which he dwelt he could only dimly see his way. A short distance up the road he met, as he thought, his wife, who had been out to tea; and as he went past he just whispered:

"All right, my dear; I shall be with you in a minute."

Immediately after he had said these words he saw the woman turn a horrified look upon him and then hurry away; and the idea occurred to him that it was not his wife at all, and that in the darkness he had made a mistake. He decided to say nothing about the matter and quickly disappeared.

When he returned home he found his wife awaiting him, and she at once greeted him with the words:

"Oh, George, I have had such a frightful experience! I was just coming down the road when a man tried to stop me, and said: 'All right, my dear; I shall be with you in a minute.' I ran home, found you were out, and I've been so much alarmed."

George was just about to explain, when an idea came to him.

"What sort of man was it?" he asked.

"Oh," replied the young wife, "I saw him quite plainly, and a more villainous face I never beheld in my life. He was a perfect monster, with crime stamped on every feature."

George decided it was best to say nothing after all.—Boston Post.

Abbey's Effer-vescent Salt

A clean stomach and a clear head are the guarantees of

Abbey's Salt

25c and 60c bottle.

Sold everywhere.

81

Baby's Own Soap

unequalled for toilet and nursery use.

"Best for baby — best for you."

Refuse all substitutes.

Albert Soaps Limited
Mfrs., Montreal.
1511

102 Periodicals

Regular Price $4.00

For $2.00

Weekly Free Press and Prairie Farmer $1.00

The Big Newspaper that gives all the news of all Canada. Features—Colored, Comic, Magazine, Ladies' Home, Farm, Stock Raisers' and Market Sections.

Western Home Monthly $1.00

The Popular Family Magazine of Western Canada. Edited to interest every member of the household. Special articles by well known writers, departments standard, entertaining fiction and original photographs.

Northwest Farmer $1.00

The Leading Agricultural Semi-Monthly. Invaluable to every farmer. Special articles by experts, embracing every branch of agriculture.

Canadian Home Journal $1.00

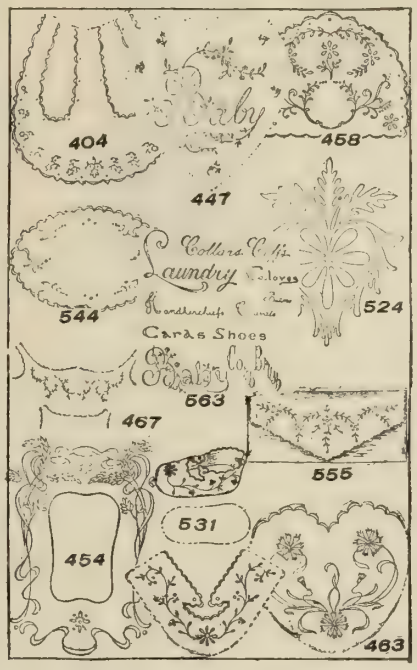
An Exclusively Ladies' Monthly Magazine, containing articles and departments dear to every feminine heart. Particular attention is devoted to household and fashion articles.

Send in your order to-day to Canadian Home Journal Toronto

Papers may be sent to one or separate addresses.

For Holiday Gifts

THERE is not a household where there is not a work-basket in full activity in the days before Christmas. Here are some patterns which will help you to make up dainty toys or trifles to gladden your friends. Number 404 is a design for an embroidered apron; 447, a design for embroidering a baby's pillow in heart shape; 458, a design for embroidering a tea cosy cover; 544, a design for embroidered bread tray doylies; 563, a design for embroidered words, adapted to different purposes; 524, a design for a braided corner; 467, a design for embroidering a corset cover; 555, a design for an embroidered handkerchief case in envelope shape, ten inches in length; 454, a design for embroidering a photograph frame; 531, a design for embroidering an infant's shoe, transfer for two shoes are given; 463, a design for embroidering a fancy bag in heart shape.



Then there is a variety of dainty aprons, among which you will be sure to be suited. Number 6480 is a fancy apron, one size; 6164, a fancy apron, one size; 6563, a circular and fancy work apron, one size; 6148, princess aprons, small 32 or 34, medium 36 or 38, large 40 or 42 bust; 6158, fancy aprons, one size; 6477, a collapsible sewing basket, one size; 6484, tea cosy with adjustable cover, one size.

An Important Game

IN a small South Carolina town that was "finished" before the war, two men were playing checkers in the back of a store. A traveling man who was making his first trip to the town was watching the game, and, not being acquainted with the business methods of the citizens, he called the attention of the owner of the store to some customers who had just entered the front door. "Sh! Sh!" answered the storekeeper, making another move on the checkerboard. "Keep perfectly quiet and they'll go out."

PREVENTION

THE MODERN DOCTOR'S WATCHWORD

To prevent disease is easier than to cure it, and Bovril and Bread and Butter are a great team to keep the system in shape to repel disease.

A Cup of Bovril, or a Bovril sandwich between meals or at night will dispel fatigue and keep one "fit".

BOVRIL

A-11-11 All that is Good in Beef is in Bovril.

JEWELRY FOR XMAS

OUR DISPLAY IS NEW AND VALUES ATTRACTIVE

Shop with us by mail and save time during the busy season.

Satisfaction Guaranteed

STOCK and BICKLE
New Building
152-154 Yonge Street
TORONTO

St. Lawrence "Crystal Diamonds"

may cost a few cents more on the hundred pounds than other lump sugar. Good things always cost more than inferior quality.

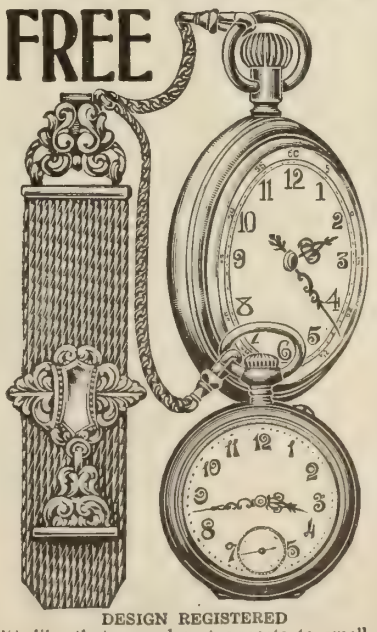
However, ST. LAWRENCE "CRYSTAL DIAMONDS" are really the most economical Sugar, because they go further on account of their matchless sweetness due to perfect purity.

To appreciate the superiority of St. Lawrence Sugar, compare it with any other sugar.

St. Lawrence Sugar

The St. Lawrence Sugar Refining Co. Limited
MONTREAL. 31

WATCHES WITH FOBS FREE



DESIGN REGISTERED

This unprecedented offer is now open to every Boy and Girl, every Lady and Gentleman, to take advantage of promptly. We will give you absolutely free your choice, or both, of these handsome and accurate Watches with Fob attached. The Gentleman's Watch is the latest thin model, stem wind and stem set, with a genuine Swiss Precision Movement, Solid Silver Nickel Case, highly polished, fancy Dial with ornamented hands protected by a heavy bevelled French Crystal. The Lady's size is also the newest thin model, stem wind and stem set, with the same quality Swiss Precision Movement as in the man's size, highly polished Solid Silver Nickel Case, beautifully ornamented Dial with fancy gold hands, and clear French Crystal. The beautiful Fob is the newest design, Solid Rolled Gold Plate throughout, fancy Mesh Pattern with Safety Chain attachment. The Suspension Clasp, Ornament, and Pendant Signet are all handsomely engraved. For selling only $3.60 worth of our high-grade Floral Motto Pictures, we give you your choice of either of the above Watches with Fob attached. Words fail us to give more than a faint idea of the quality and beauty of these Pictures, the Floral portions of which stand out clearly from a delicate satin-finished Solid Gold Background. The rich, natural colors of the flowers are so life-like that one almost expects to smell their sweet perfume. These Mottoes are full size, 16 inches long and 12 inches wide. The deep, rich coloring, and beautiful homelike sentiments of the Illuminated Text portion, will make a set of these desired by all who see them. These refined Motto Pictures sell regularly in Art Stores at 50 cents each, so that at our wholesale price of 15 cents each you can sell the entire lot in an hour. To assist you to make your sales quickly we will send a Prize Coupon to give with every Picture you sell, which will entitle your customer to receive an extra present from us absolutely free. Order right now. We will send the Mottoes by return mail Postpaid. When sold return us our money $3.60, and your choice of either of these beautiful Watches with Fob attach d complete, will be sent to you at once Postpaid. Address:

COLONIAL ART CO. Desk 04 TORONTO, ONT. 124

Dress Requisites for Xmas.

Either for Yourself or for Gift Purposes.

Note illustrations above and then read carefully the following descriptions. Where else can you obtain such values? Yet each of the articles is taken at random from The Bon Ton Fall and Winter Catalogue every page of which contains a bargain—a bargain which, price, quality, style and workmanship considered, cannot be duplicated. We make everything for women, girls and children from a fancy collar to a fur lined coat.

571—Lady's Cheviot Coat, 50 inches long, lined with quilted satin, large Mink Marmot collar. Price $17.95

5502—Child's White Lamb Stole, 36 inches long, with muff, satin lined ..... Price $3.25

5231—Tailored Black Lawn Blouse, tucks on sides of front, closing at back ..... Price 79c

5361—Corset Cover of cotton, trimmed with lace and tucks..... Price 15c

5276—Infants' Sweater of soft wool. Colours, navy with white, red with white or white with red. ..... Price 75c

54511—Child's Skirt, soft cotton with hem stitched tucks and lace edging, 2 to 7 years..... Price 35c

53413—Night Gown, flannellette, trimmed with embroidery, and tucks. White blue or pink ..... Price $1.49

54611—Infants' Long Skirt, cream flannel, hemmed with silk embroidery ..... Price $1.74

5244—Japanese Silk Blouse, lace trimmings and collar, sleeves Kimono style—white only. ..... Price $1.98

5214—Misses' Black and White striped Messaline Silk Dress, trimmed with Black Pailette Silk, edged with red piping $8.98

Why not have more and better clothes for the same money by buying from the Bon Ton Co. ? Buy from us and buy direct from factory at factory prices—save all retailers', jobbers' and other profits.

If, on receipt, the goods do not come up to your expectations, either in quality, or price, or fail in any way to satisfy, return them and we will not only refund your money promptly, but pay shipping charges both ways. Remember every price in our Catalogue includes transportation charges direct to your home—you simply send us Catalogue price and we deliver goods free. Write at once for our 1911-1912 Fall and Winter Catalogue.

THE BON-TON CO., 439 St. Joseph St., QUEBEC, Que. 1-11

SPECIAL PRICES FOR MAGAZINE CLUBS.

You save from 10 to 25 per cent. of the cost of magazines in each club.

CANADA MONTHLY	$1.50
With Canadian Home Journal	1.60
With Canadian Courier and American	5.40
With Canadian Magazine and Canadian Home Journal	3.60
With Western Home Monthly or North West Farmer, or Canadian Thresherman and Farmer or Country Life in Canada	1.50
With Designer, or Everyday Housekeeping, or Family Herald, or Weekly Star, or Weekly Free Press, or Modern Priscilla or Regina Leader or Rod and Gun or New Idea Woman's Magazine	1.60
With World's Work	3.20
With World To-day and McClure's	4.15
With Cosmopolitan or Good Housekeeper	2.25
With American or Woman's Home Companion	2.40
With McClure's and Delineator	3.45
With Western Home Monthly and Weekly Free Press	2.35
With Western Home Monthly and Etude	2.90
With Canadian Home Journal and Family Herald and Weekly Star	2.35
With Delineator and American Boy	3.40
With Practical Farmer and McCall's	2.70

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL	$1.00
With Canadian Magazine and Canadian Courier	$5.85
With Canadian Magazine and McClure's	4.00
With Musical Canada	1.35
With Toronto Saturday Night and W. Free Press	4.10
With Review of Reviews and Canadian Magazine	4.60
With W. Free Press, Family Herald and Weekly Star	2.35
With Toronto Saturday Night	4.40
With McClure's Mag. and Good Housekeeping	3.40
With Current Literature and Canadian Courier	6.00
With Free Press Weekly, Canadian Thresherman and Farmer and Western Home Monthly	3.10
With Review of Reviews and Canadian Courier	5.50
With Canadian Magazine	2.85
With Ainslee's Magazine	2.40
With McClure's	1.95
With Housekeeper	2.15
With Family Herald and Weekly Star	1.60
With Canadian Thresherman and Farmer	1.50
With Canadian Century	2.50
With American Boy and Harper's Bazaar	3.20
With Every Woman's and McCall's	2.10
With Free Press and MacLean's	3.10
With Woman's Home Companion and Everybody's	$3.55
With MacLean's and Toronto Saturday Night	4.75
With Canada Monthly or North West Farmer	1.50
With Weekly Free Press or Modern Priscilla	1.60
With Modern Priscilla, Pictorial Review and Ladies' World	2.75
With Rod and Gun or Designer	1.60
With Delineator and Canada Monthly	3.05
With Designer and Pictorial Review	2.70

CANADIAN MAGAZINE	$2.50
With Canada Monthly and Canadian Home Journal	3.60
With Review of Reviews and McClure's	4.90
With American or Woman's Home Companion	3.75
With House Beautiful	5.10
With St. Nicholas (New) and Harper's Bazaar	5.45
With Pearson's or Everybody's	3.25
With McClure's and Woman's Home Companion	5.90
With Canadian Courier and Canadian Home Journal	5.85
With Canadian Home Journal, Free Press Weekly and Western Home Monthly	4.45
With Woman's Home Companion and American	5.40
With American Magazine	3.75
With Canadian Courier	5.20
With Canadian Home Journal or Canada Monthly	2.85
With Western Home Monthly	2.85
With Musical Canada	2.70
With Toronto Saturday Night	4.60
With McClure's	3.25
With Woman's Home Companion or American	3.75
With Canada Monthly and Country Life in America	3.60

COSMOPOLITAN OR GOOD HOUSEKEEPING	$2.00
With Canadian Home Journal	2.25
With Metropolitan and Hampton's	4.25
With Western Home Monthly and MacLean's	3.75
With McClure's and Forest and Stream	4.15
With Success, Delineator and Everybody's	5.25
With Review of Reviews	3.25
With Woman's Home Companion or American	3.15
With Pearson's	2.65
With McClure's or Everybody's	2.65
With Success and The National Post	2.55
With Smart Set or World's Work	4.00
With American and Success	$4.20
With Review of Reviews and World To-day	5.50
With Canadian Magazine and Canadian Courier	6.60
With Canadian Home Journal and House Beautiful	4.40
With American and Women's Home Companion	4.80
With Review of Reviews and American Magazine	4.90
With Woman's Home Companion, McClure's and Review of Reviews	6.05
With Family Herald and Weekly Star and Canadian Magazine	4.45
With Ainslee's and World To-day	5.45
With Woman's Home Companion, McClure's and American	5.95
With Pictorial Review	2.60
With Harper's Bazaar	2.85
With Review of Reviews and Delineator	4.80
With Delineator and Pictorial Review	4.15
With McCall's and Ladies' World	2.85
With McClure's and Woman's Home Companion	4.30
With McClure's and Everybody's	3.80
With Canada Monthly and Canadian Home Journal	3.00
With Ladies' World, Pictorial Review and Modern Priscilla	3.50

McCLURE'S OR EVERYBODY'S	$1.80
With Canadian Home Journal	$1.90
With Delineator	2.70
With Woman's Home Companion or American	2.80
With World's Work and Delineator	5.15
With Cosmopolitan and Delineator	4.20
With Woman's Home Companion and Delineator	4.35
With Cosmopolitan or Good Housekeeping	3.05
With Success and Pearson's	3.35
With House Beautiful and Delineator	3.45
With Canadian Home Journal and Canada Monthly	2.65
With Western Home Monthly and W. Free Press	2.75
With Family Herald and Weekly Star	2.00
With Canadian Mag. and Pearson's	4.35
With Canadian Courier and Etude	5.65
With Musicain or Etude	2.65
With American Boy and American Motherhood	3.35
With Sunset and Field and Stream	4.15
With Scribner's or House Beautiful	4.15
With World's Work	3.60
With Current Literature or World To-Day	3.50
With Popular Electricity and American Boy	3.75
With Modern Priscilla and Designer	2.85
With Pictorial Review, Ladies' World and Modern Priscilla	3.15

All Subscriptions to run for one year.

Write for our handsome 1911-12 Catalogue of Magazine Bargains. The magazines in above clubs may be sent to one or separate addresses.

CANADIAN MAILING & SUBSCRIPTION CO. Limited

311 Somerset Building - - - - - - - - - WINNIPEG

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

House of Windows

Continued from page 10

things about which we think? I can't believe it. You and I could speak without fear of laughter, and we shall guess the other things which lie too deep for words. It seems to me that all my life I have been looking at things wrongly. I have been taking always the easy way. When I see my uncle I am going to tell him so, and show him that, while never lacking in gratitude to him, I must not be a slave even to gratitude. This will be Greek to you—but I shall find words to make you understand when I see you."

Christine laid down the letter with a quick little catch of the breath. The broad man who had protected her from observation had gone and she was already one full block past the Stores' corner. But it didn't matter. It wouldn't matter even if she were late. Nothing mattered. When she tied on her scissors and took her place at the counter more than one of the girls looked curiously at the brightness on her face.

CHAPTER XXII.

IF Adam Torrance had neglected the Stores in the past, if he had put them aside carelessly, as a thing of small import, which he steadily declined to perceive within his mental horizon, it is certain that in these days the Stores took a full and fine revenge. From being an incident of mere financial importance, they became a haunting nightmare; from being below the horizon altogether, they suddenly loomed large and threatening shutting out the view; from being nothing, they became all. It is not an exaggeration to say that he thought of them all day and dreamed of them all night. He could not bear to go near them, he could not bear to stay away, he hated to look at a shop girl's face, but it was agony not to scan each one eagerly. It speaks well for him that his work lacked nothing in efficiency and that he never spoke of the tortures he endured. Naturally he was always fancying likenesses, and that was almost insupportable. Once he saw a girl's face, coarse-lipped, black-browed, which looked at him it seemed with the very eyes of an aunt of his, an aunt whose very name had been stricken from the family annals. What if—such things are not impossible. He lived in hell until it was proved beyond all dispute that this black-browed girl was really the daughter of her black-browed parents. Then there was little Miss Ellis, an adopted child, in whose white face and timid eyes he thought he could trace a likeness to his dead wife. He was greatly drawn to this girl, and when he found out beyond doubt that she was the daughter of a sister of good Mrs. Ellis, who had adopted her, his despair deepened.

Meanwhile, the sifting went on rapidly. Johnson and his trained assistants worked almost night and day. Mark had been telegraphed for and might be expected now any day—but not a single clue led anywhere.

Christine often saw Mr. Torrance in those days, and wondered at his white and drawn face and at the keen and yet furtive look in his eyes, eyes that seemed always searching and yet fearing what they might find. And he often saw her, too, and every time was pierced anew by her strange and haunting resemblance—another trick of imagination he supposed, yet a most persistent one. And often he thought what a disappointment would have been his had he not seen her in her own home before the search was started and known her for whom she was.

So strange are the things which really happen that, of all the girls in Angers' Stores, the Misses Brown were the only ones who escaped the vigilance of Mr. Johnson and his half frantic employer. And this simply because the human mind is remarkably tenacious of a suggestion received in good faith. This is why it did not occur to Mr. Johnson, trained to suspicion as he was, that Mr. Torrance did not know what he was talking about when he told him that the Misses Brown were outside the scope of the enquiries. It never occurred to him to waste time on anyone so well vouched for. And, stranger still, it did not occur to Mr. Torrance himself that he really knew nothing about the Browns. He had called there, he had seen them, he had gathered from their conversation that they were sisters, and the idea of sifting this statement is made in England in the world's largest Malt Vinegar Brewery.

H.P. SAUCE

It has a new and delicious flavour, different — quite different — from any other sauce or relish you have ever had before.

All Stores keep H.P. Sauce on their handiest shelf—it saves time—it sells so freely.

never for a moment obtruded itself. Another reason for this negligence was the secrecy of the investigation. Outside the searchers there was no one who possessed more than the most vague idea that a search was being made. One day one of the girls at the ribbon counter laughingly asked Christine if she was a foundling, adding that foundlings seemed to be at a premium now-a-days, for she had heard that someone was looking for a missing heiress. Christine had replied lightly that she was nothing so interesting, and it so happened that Mr. and Mrs. Flynn, the only two now in the Stores who might have contradicted her, heard nothing at all of the investigation, for the simple reason that they had no children to investigate.

Meanwhile, the offer of the reward for information as to the person who had brought the letter had also ended in a blind alley. The letter-bringer might have been invisible for all the trace that had been left to guide anyone. Barefaced efforts to obtain the money by false information were, of course, frequent, but of any real clue there was not a vestige. And as days went by without result, another anxiety was added by the non-appearance of Mark. This could have been explained quite simply, for, as Mark's impatience had insisted upon starting the "Shuswap" on her voyage before the schedule time, and as the Misses Macgregor were not in town, the telegram was still following the travelers.

It must have been a fortnight after Christine's return to the Stores that the most promising clue was unearthed. It was found that in Mr. Torrance's own store there had been employed, until within a couple of months, a young girl of sixteen or thereabouts who was known to have been adopted under peculiar circumstances. The girl's name was Alma Stone. Her adopted parents were dead, and the girl had supported herself for some litle time. No one knew where she was now, and the enquiry seemed to be threatened with another blank, until someone remembered that if anyone would know anything about Alma Stone that person would be Miss Celia Brown. Christine, on being questioned, remembered having heard her sister mention the girl's name, and stated that Celia was so far better that it would do her no harm to be interrogated.

It must be said that the detective was rather surprised at the eagerness with which Mr. Torrance elected to visit the Misses Brown. He would have preferred to have attended to this promising clue himself, but as employers' wishes are paramount he had to be contented with providing the interviewer with as full a list of questions as his professional mind could compass.

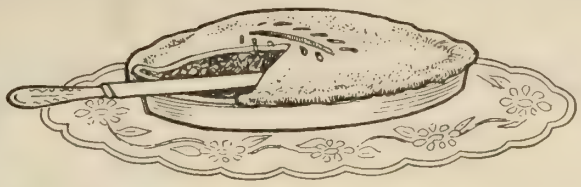
It was a dreary day that had been chosen for an interview. The glory of the autumn was almost dead and vicious, slanting rain pelted the dying leaves from the trees, and the heavy feet of passers-by printed their frail ghosts upon the muddy pavement. Brook Street, under such conditions, was not lovely. The rain seemed never to clean anything here, but only to add to the dirt and dreariness. Even the children looked dirtier and less cheerful and Ada's garden was more than ever an abomination of desolation.

Celia, who had been warned of the coming visitor, was lying, propped with pillows, upon the couch, her tired eyes watching the steady beating of the rain. Celia did not get well as rapidly as they had hoped. There were times when they almost feared to realize how slow her progress was. "Want of recuperative power," said the doctor; but, after all, that is only another way of saying want of the will to live. People who feel that life has cheated them are chary of taking up the cards again. They would often rather slip out of the game.

To Mr. Torrance the little room seemed a haven of peace. So little do we see into each other's lives that he mistook Celia's despair for the lassitude of convalescence and envied her her quiet sofa and the soft ministrations of the blind girl. How lovely Ada Brown was, he thought again. Impossible to believe that those beautiful eyes were sightless. As he watched her eager pleasure in the flowers he had brought, a sense of relief to which he had long been a stranger came over him.

Celia, who for sixteen years had wondered so often what Mr. Torrance might be like, now looked at him without interest. He was part of life. But he only saw the quiet courtesy of her greeting, noticed that she still seemed very weak, and hoped that his questions would not tire her.

(To be continued)



Make your pastry with PURITY FLOUR It will be delicious

WE tell you frankly that it will likely cost you slightly more to make pastry with PURITY FLOUR than with an ordinary flour. But thousands of home-cooks, who have tried both, willingly pay the difference.

Because of its extra strength and extra quality more shortening must be added to PURITY FLOUR than to blended or soft wheat flours, when making pastry.

PURITY FLOUR gets its extra strength and extra quality from the high-grade portions of the hard wheat berries. There is no low-grade hard wheat flour, nor no soft wheat flour, mixed with PURITY. It is all high-grade.

But think of the added delicacy of flavor, the extra deliciousness of the pies and the cakes! Surely it is worth paying a little more for greater enjoyment.

Naturally, such a high-class flour will cost you slightly more. It costs more to make. It is worth more money.

And the pleasure of using such a high-class, reliable flour for all manner of cooking and baking purposes cannot be counted in mere dollars and cents. And remember that PURITY FLOUR makes

"More bread and better bread"

It takes more water because it's a strong, thirsty flour. It goes farther in the baking. Get a pencil and add to your grocery list right now.

PURITY FLOUR

101

Is Your Wife Deaf?

Then you can appreciate what an Acousticon will mean to her. It will enable her to hear perfectly.

You will be able to have your evening chats together. You will be able to read aloud together. She will be able to have her friends in and to call on them without embarrassment. She will be able to go to church, enjoy the sermon and music, and take part in the services. She will enjoy the pleasures of which deafness has been robbing her.

The Acousticon

has brought joy to thousands of deaf people in Canada, England and the United States. It is a scientifically constructed electrical device which does not go into the ear at all, yet leaves both your hands entirely free.

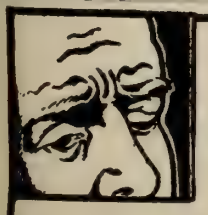
The Acousticon is neat and easily used.

Write us for full description and with copies of letters of clergymen, and business and professional gentlemen who know about the wonderful work the Acousticon is doing.

. . . THE . . .

GENERAL ACOUSTIC CO. OF CANADA LIMITED
Dept. J
468 Yonge Street, - TORONTO

They mend all leaks in all utensils—tin, brass, copper, graniteware, hot water bags, etc. No solder, cement or rivet. Anyone can use them; fit any surface, two million in use. Send for sample pkg., 10c. COMPLETE PACKAGE ASSORTED SIZES, 25c., POSTPAID. Agents wanted.
Collette Mfg. Co., Dept. D Collingwood, Ont.



That Splitting Headache

will vanish if you take

"NA-DRU-CO" Headache Wafers

Give quick, sure relief, and we guarantee they contain nothing harmful to the heart or nervous system. 25c. a box, at all druggists'.

NATIONAL DRUG and CHEMICAL CO. of Canada, Limited, Montreal. 26A

"De right ting for de Missus Christmas Gift"

¶ A woman appreciates a sensible gift from her husband or son at Christmas.

¶ Something that will relieve her of the back-breaking and nerve-racking worries of ordinary household duties— something that shows her you really care—for instance. It sweetens a woman's disposition. It enables her to get cheaper help and keep them longer. It saves the clothes and thoroughly cleanses them, because it forces the water through the fabrics. It prevents disease entering your home from public laundries.

A New Century Washer

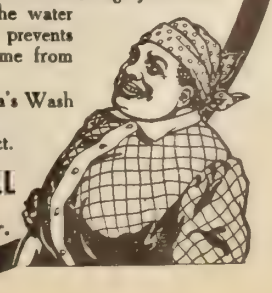
¶ Write for "Aunt Salina's Wash Day Philosophy."

¶ At all dealers or direct.



CUMMER-DOWSWELL Limited
HAMILTON, - ONT.

INGERSOLL CREAM CHEESE

SPREADS LIKE BUTTER

You can buy twice the quantity of Ingersoll Cream Cheese in blocks for the same money as you would receive in jar cheese, besides there is just as much difference in the quality in favor of Ingersoll Cream Cheese as there is in the price.

Never Becomes Hard. Every Particle Can Be Consumed.

Sold only in 15c and 25c blocks

For Sale By All Grocers

MANUFACTURED BY

INGERSOLL PACKING CO. Limited

INGERSOLL, ONTARIO

CANADA

PERFECTION IN MINCE MEAT

CLARK'S MINCE MEAT IN CANS AND IN GLASS JARS CARRIES CLARK'S REPUTATION WITH IT

CLARK'S MINCE MEAT is absolutely guaranteed, made from the finest of selected fruits, peels and spices, and being thoroughly cooked, is ready for immediate use.

CLARK'S MINCE MEAT will keep because it is thoroughly sterilized

Order a trial can or jar from your grocer.

W. Clark, Montreal

MANUFACTURER OF THE CELEBRATED "CHATEAU" BRAND

SOUPS

CHRISTMAS COMES LIKE FLOORGLAZE

To brighten our homes and make life more pleasant.

You who expect company for Christmas

You who expect home-comers

You stay-at-homes

MAKE HOME BRIGHT and CHEERFUL for CHRISTMAS

Perhaps the chairs—cupboard—bed—floors—or some other part of home or furniture has become a little worn or shabby, since last Christmas. Freshen them up with Floorglaze. This wonderful preparation not only makes home look brighter, but makes housework easy, and gives to the surface a lasting look of newness.

Sold by the better class paint dealers in all parts of Canada

Plenty of colors to choose from to suit every taste.

Floorglaze is the only Perfect Floor Finish

Imperial Varnish & Color Co. Limited

WINNIPEG TORONTO VANCOUVER

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Alum an Unseen Danger in Food

NOTED food scientists have decided that alum is an unseen danger in food, and as a result of their investigations, rigorous laws have been enacted and are now being vigorously enforced in England, France and Germany, prohibiting the use of alum in foods.

Until suitable laws are passed in Canada prohibiting the use of alum baking powders, every housewife should be careful to buy only a baking powder that has the ingredients printed plainly on the label.

To Open Kitchen Sink

IF the kitchen sink becomes clogged the cause may come from grease accumulating on the inside of the drain pipe; the lead pipe being cold the grease adheres or freezes, as the plumber would say, and soon causes the drain to be stopped up. This happens frequently with families who do not use soap for washing dishes and kitchen utensils. To remedy, open trap located about two feet below the sink drain; see that it (the trap) is perfectly clear of all deposits; clean sink thoroughly, and close the trap. Have ready about two gallons of boiling water, in which has been dissolved two pounds of common sal-soda (can be purchased at any grocery store). Pour the boiling solution down the drain pipe until full to the level of the sink, cover drain with sink stopper or cloth to retain as much heat as possible, and leave for an hour or longer to eat its way down. As soon as it works away add more of the boiling solution and keep working in this manner until the drain pipe is clear. It will take a little time, but will save a plumber's bill and much inconvenience. Try it.

Cleaning Hints

COFFEE stains on colored goods can be removed if at once sopped with a clean sponge wet with cold water.

Place the damaged spot over a thickly folded cloth or a basin and keep changing the water in the sponge until the coffee disappears.

To clean white paint, rub well with a damp cloth dipped in oatmeal, wipe with a damp cloth, and lastly, with a dry duster. This is especially useful treatment for finger marks on doors.

Brass bedsteads can be cleaned by rubbing with a cloth dipped in sweet oil. Afterwards polish with a soft, dry piece of leather.

To remove grease spots from wall paper, sprinkle a piece of blotting paper with baking soda and hold it over the spot while you press the paper with a moderately hot iron. The blotting paper will absorb the grease and the soda prevents injury to the colors in the wall paper.

Wear and Tear Savers

Pails and tubs may be kept from shrinking by painting them with glycerine.

If a teaspoonful of sugar is put into the teapot the tea will infuse in one-half the time.

To remove paint from linens rub with turpentine, then clean with French chalk dampened with alcohol.

When starching Holland pinafores put a little tea into the starch. It will help them to keep their color.

Always place citron in a moderately hot oven for a few moments before cutting it up for cakes or pudding.

To heat dishes quickly, don't put them into a hot oven, but let them be for a minute or two in hot water.

By soaking oatmeal over night it can be cooked in fifteen minutes and have the flavor of cooking many hours.

If boiled water is used for drinking purposes, care should be taken that the water boils for fifteen minutes before it is poured off.

Tumblers that have contained milk should be washed in cold water, as washing in hot tends to cloud the glass permanently.

The gasoline that is left after a garment is washed can be allowed to settle, and the clear gasoline at the top used again.

To prevent patent leather shoes from cracking, warm them before putting them on. Warmth renders the leather soft and pliable.

When bedsteads creak with every movement of the sleeper, the slats should be removed and the end of each wrapped in newspaper.

When washing tan colored clothes or stockings, or the khaki colored suits, put a little brown dye in the rinsing water and in the starch.

Articles of old furniture are sometimes made to appear like new by washing them with lime water and then applying a coat of oil.

Scorched fireproof dishes should be soaked in strong borax water till the unsightly brown marks upon them can be rubbed off with a cloth.

When anything you have been cooking has been heated to the boiling point turn the blaze low enough to keep the heat just at that point.

Sufferers from indigestion should take the white of an egg beaten to a stiff froth and stirred into a wineglassful of cold water after each meal.

To get the best results from shredded cocoanut when it is to be used in cake icing or candy, soak it for a half hour in warm water before adding.

How to Bake Bread

AT bedtime put one cake of yeast foam to soak in one-half cup of warm water. Measure and then sift eight and one-half cups flour. Put two and one-half cups of sour milk over fire to scald, the same as for Dutch cheese. Add one tablespoon each of sugar, salt and butter and a pinch of soda. When cool to lukewarm add the yeast. Stir well together, then add seven cups of flour and mix smooth with a large spoon to a very stiff batter. If not quite stiff enough add a very little more flour. Put into a six-quart measure and set into a pan lined with a newspaper or cloth; cover up with cloth and set away for the night. First thing in the morning stir down and take out upon the well-floured board and cut to pieces with large knife and work flour in by cutting and kneading until right consistency to knead well and not too stiff. Place back in same dish and cover. Will rise in one hour. When light enough so that by pressing in dough a dent will remain, take out upon lightly floured board and cut into three pieces and just carefully shape to fit bread tins without working in any more flour. Place in well-buttered tins and set to rise upon a cloth. Place dishes over them and a cloth over all, so as to keep dough soft and moist. When light so as to leave a dent in dough when pressed with finger, place in previously heated oven and bake one hour moderately for first twenty or thirty minutes. Then gradually increase heat till loaves begin to have light brown crust. Turn loaves around once while baking last fifteen minutes to brown evenly. When done, place upon dish drainer and butter top crust while hot. When cold place in stone crock with stone cover. This bread is more delicious, healthful, and will keep better without moulding than any other bread made. Try it, and you will be pleased.

MAPLE PUDDING

Mix one cupful of molasses, one cupful of sour milk, one cupful of finely chopped beef suet, two cupfuls of flour, sifted with two level teaspoonfuls baking soda, one-half cupful grated maple sugar, one teaspoonful of pulverized cinnamon, one half teaspoonful of pulverized cloves, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one and one-half cupfuls of large raisins, three-fourths cupful of dried currants, one-half cupful of shredded figs and three-fourths cupful more of flour; beat together well; then pour into a buttered mold, filling but three-fourths to the top; cover and steam or boil for two hours.

Sauce.—Cream one-half cupful of butter and one cupful of light brown sugar and mix until smooth; then add one stiffly beaten white of egg and enough grated nutmeg to suit the taste.

GOOD WAFFLES

Sift three cupfuls of flour, add one teaspoonful of salt and into this rub two rounding tablespoonfuls of butter. Beat the yolks of three eggs light, and add to two cupfuls of milk. Stir this into the flour and beat until smooth. Add the whites of the eggs, beaten to a stiff, dry froth, with three level teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Stir lightly and quickly, and bake in a hot greased waffle iron.

BOILED TROUT

Take a good-sized trout, clean and lay in salt water for half hour; take out and boil in clear water in a cloth for one hour; turn out on platter while fish is boiling. Make the sauce as follows: Fry one small onion in butter until light brown; strain one can tomatoes and put in a stew pan; add the onion and pepper and salt and some chopped parsley; let it boil and thicken; pour over fish after removing from cloth, and serve.

PLUM PUDDING

Mix in a bowl one cupful of seeded raisins, one cupful of clean currants, half a pound of citron, shredded, one cupful of brown sugar, a quarter of a grated nutmeg, one teaspoonful of cinnamon, two cupfuls of chopped nuts—either peanuts, pecans, walnuts or hickory nuts. Sprinkle over this mixture one cupful of flour and one pint of stale bread crumbs, and mix again. Beat three eggs without separating, until light. Dissolve half a teaspoonful of baking soda in two tablespoonfuls of warm water; add it to half a cupful of New Orleans molasses; add this to the dry ingredients;

RASPBERRY JELLY

add the juice and grated rind of one lemon, and—if you have it—half a cupful of grape juice. Mix thoroughly, pack into a kettle or mould, stand in a boiler, partly surround with boiling water and boil continuously for ten hours. When done, lift the lid, cool the pudding, remove and stand it in a cold place until wanted.

YORKSHIRE PUDDING

Put six tablespoonfuls of flour into a basin with a pinch of salt, and add sufficient milk to make it into a stiff batter. The mixing must be very gradual, and any lumps that form must be crushed out with the back of a wooden spoon. Beat two eggs with one pint of milk, and add to the batter, and beat until the surface is covered with bubbles. Let the batter stand for at least one hour. Put two tablespoonfuls of hot fat from under the meat into a pudding tin; stand it in the oven, and when the fat boils, pour in the batter. Cook for one hour, and serve on a very hot dish.

CHEESE DROPS

Chop two ounces of butter into a saucepan and pour over it a pint of boiling water. Have ready a cupful each of grated cheese and flour seasoned with salt, cayenne, and a little mustard. Add this slowly to the hot water and butter, stir it smoothly and boil it for five minutes. When it is nearly cold add four unbeaten eggs one at a time and beat it slowly for a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes. Drop the result on to baking tins with a teaspoon, and bake them in a slow oven for a quarter of an hour.

SWISS CAKE

This recipe calls for one-fourth cup of butter, one and one-half cups of sugar, two and one-half cups of flour, one cup of milk, two eggs, and two and one half teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Flavor with any preferred flavoring. The batter should be prepared for the tin in the following manner: Cream butter and sugar with the hand (the temperature of the hand seems to melt the butter just right), add the yolks of the eggs and beat thoroughly, then the milk. To this add the flour, which has been previously sifted with the baking powder five times. Then the flavoring (say one-half teaspoonful vanilla and one-half teaspoonful of lemon). Finally fold in the stiffly beaten whites, put in the pan (one with a tube in the centre), and bake in a quite hot oven until by inserting a broom splint it will come out clean, if done. It usually requires from one half to three quarters of an hour for baking. It is the way the cake is put together that makes it such a success, so do not shorten the process. By the addition of a package of mince meat, you will have a very nice fruit cake. This recipe, using three deep layer cake tins, makes as fine a layer cake as one could wish for.

BANANA TRIFLE

Here is a very simple sweet that may be got ready beforehand. Take some bananas, some custard and some jam that is liked. If strawberry is appreciated it is a very good kind to use. Peel the bananas, slice them, and put a layer of them in a glass dish, then a layer of jam, and then another layer of bananas. Pour the custard over and serve the sweet either hot or cold, though perhaps for this purpose cold will be preferred.

"The Star" ASBESTOS PAD FOR DINING TABLES

The original and patented Dining Table Pad. The best Pad manufactured. Made of a special grade of Asbestos of sufficient thickness and weight to assure protection from damage by heat and moisture, covered with double faced cotton flannel to make it soft and noiseless. Pads and leaves made to fold to convenient size to lay away when not in use. Doily, Chafing-dish and Platter Mats of same materials, size 5 to 18 in., round, square or oval. Ask your dealer to show you the STAR Pad. All Pads and Mats bear our trade mark "Star."

These Pads For Sale By

John Kay Co., Limited	Toronto, Ont.
Murray-Kay Limited	Toronto, Ont.
T. Eaton Co., Limited	Toronto, Ont.
Henry Morgan Co., Limited	Montreal, Que.
Ottawa Fireproof Supply Co.,	Ottawa, Ont.
Chas. Duncan & Sons, Limited	Brantford, Ont.
Smallman & Ingram, Limited	London, Ont.
T. C. Watkins, Limited	Hamilton, Ont.
T. Eaton Co., Limited	Winnipeg, Can.

Booklet on request.

KERNEY MFG. CO., 157 W. 62nd Street CHICAGO, ILL.

Most Folks Crave a Wheat Food

The craving of the normal system for wheat food is natural. Wheat is the most perfect food given to man—his "staff of life" for four thousand years. The whole wheat berry contains ALL the elements needed to build the healthy human body.

SHREDDED WHEAT

Biscuit is the whole wheat prepared in its most digestible form. Nothing added—nothing taken away.

The crispness of the shreds compels thorough chewing and a thorough mixing with saliva, which is the first process in digestion.

Shredded Wheat Biscuit every morning for breakfast, served with milk or cream, will build sturdy, robust bodies—best for children or grown-ups. Delicious in combination with fruit. Your grocer sells them.

ALL THE GOODNESS OF THE GOLDEN WHEAT.

Made by

Canadian Shredded Wheat Co., Ltd., Niagara Falls, Ont.

D65

Yorkshire Relish

"The Most Delicious Sauce in the World"

Tempts the flagging appetite—makes the plainest fare enjoyable—adds the final, necessary touch to more elaborate dishes.

20c. a bottle. 3

CHAS. GYDE, MONTREAL.

Sole Agent for Canada.

OXO Cubes are the greatest advance in food invention since men began to eat and women learnt to cook.

Each cube is measured exactly—the right size for a cupful—uniform in nutritious properties, in quality, taste and flavor.

To make a meal, simply drop an OXO Cube in a cup, pour on hot water and stir.

55

10 for 25c.
4 for 10c.

UPTON'S PURE ORANGE MARMALADE

with toast or rolls and coffee should be your Christmas breakfast.

Upton's Marmalade is such a delicious and nourishing preserve that once used it becomes a table necessity.

Upton's brands have passed the most rigid Government tests and have proven absolutely pure. The name "Upton" on the 1 lb. jar or the 5 lb. pail that you buy is a rock bottom guarantee of pure goods, produced in an absolutely sanitary factory under the most perfect conditions.

Your Grocer Recommends Upton's H37

Modern Business Courses

The courses in commercial subjects offered by this school are strictly up-to-date and practical and produce the very best results. All instruction individual. A copy of our handsomely illustrated catalogue sent on request.

British American Business College
Y. M. C. A. Building
Yonge and McGill Streets - Toronto

SHORT STORY WRITING

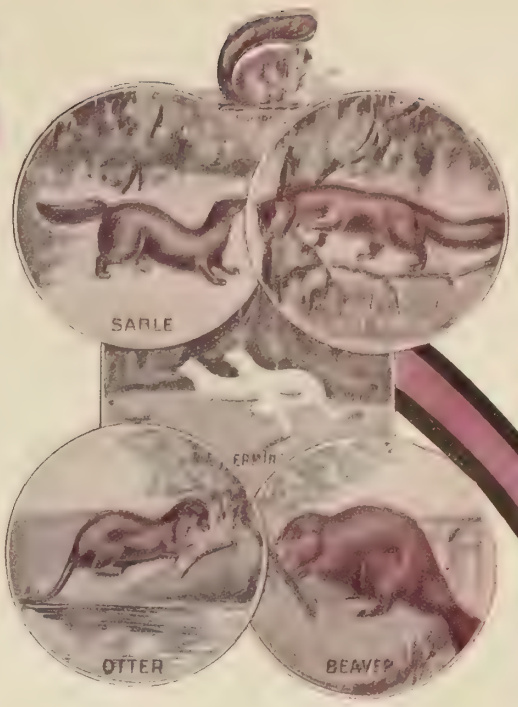
A complete, practical and thorough course of instruction prepared by and taught under the supervision of one of America's ablest Writers and Tutors.

The Magazines go Begging
for bright interesting stories. This appeal is to YOU. Cut out this ad and mail to-day for particulars.

Name ... ...

PAQUET FURS

Through This Factory From Trapper To YOU

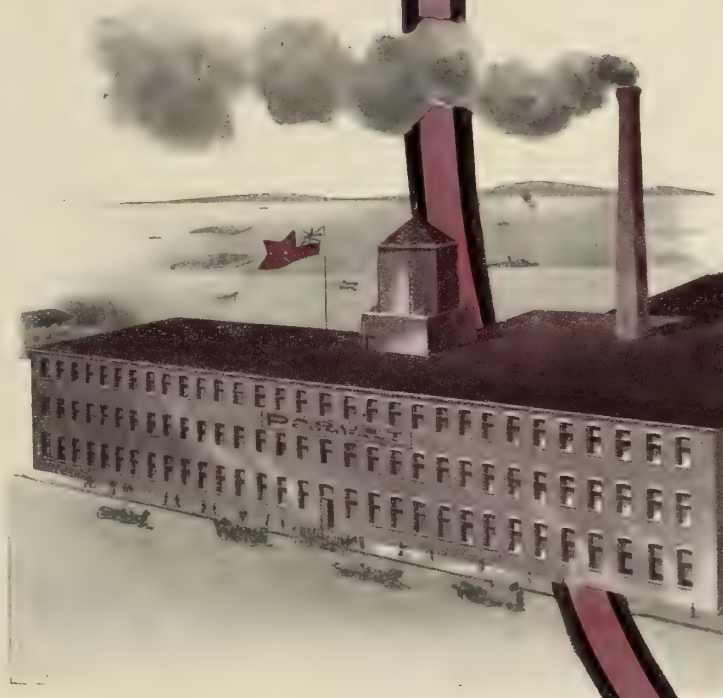


Once a Luxury Now a Necessity

FURS have long been regarded as a luxury—we've made them a necessity. Through our new method of selling direct from the factory, the man or woman of limited means may now enjoy the comfort of rich and luxurious furs without extravagance.

PAQUET FURS have long been acknowledged to be the best furs on the Canadian market. The reason is not far to seek.

PAQUET FURS are bought in the raw by men who know their business. They are carefully dressed, under the direct supervision of trained specialists. Then they are dyed in the immense Paquet dyeing tanks, and are dried in rapidly-revolving cylinders. When dry the inspectors get in their fine work, and woe betide the skin that fails to come up to the Paquet standard. The perfect skins are sent upstairs to the cutting room, where they are stretched, cut, and passed along to the operators, who know how to put the edges together so they can't come apart, and so neatly that the join cannot be located except from the back.



FURS COST MONEY

You must be absolutely certain that you get all the value you pay for, otherwise you are wasting money. There are so many qualities in fur that it requires an expert to detect the difference at sight—anyone can find it out in wear and service. There is one safe way to make sure of getting the greatest possible value for every dollar you spend, and that way is to deal direct with Canada's Greatest Fur Factory—the only fur factory in America where every process, from the raw skins to the finished product, is in operation under the one roof.

After another searching inspection, they are sent to the finishing room—there to receive the padding and lining—and, after a final examination, they are ready for the Order Department, where sharp-eyed inspectors stand ready to reject any and every fur piece or fur garment that falls short of absolute perfection.

That's why PAQUET FURS are recognized as

THE FINEST FURS PROCURABLE

Can you wonder, then, that more than eight million dollars' worth of these furs have been sold already? And this is the sort of furs we now offer to you at the actual manufacturer's prices of Canada's largest fur factory.

Fur-Lined Coat

4677/313—Lady's fur-lined coat, 50 inches long, shell of all wool imported cloth, semi-fitting back, box front, collar and revers of mink marmot, lining of brown dyed Susliki. Factory price, prepaid $32

Fur-Lined Coat

4675—Lady's 50-inch fur-lined coat, shell of pure wool imported beaver cloth, semi-fitting back, box front, 36-inch lining of genuine hampster, collar and revers in natural mink. Factory price, prepaid $55

Lady's Long Coat

4432—Lady's 50-inch coat, in all-wool imported cloth, with quilted mercerized lining and rubber interlining, collar and revers in fine quality mink muskrat. Factory price, prepaid $18

Astrachan Jacket

3378—Lady's 30-in. "Fernald" style jacket, fitted back, center vent, shawl collar, plain satin lining, jacket made with nice bright Astrachan skins. Factory price, prepaid $28

Raccoon Jacket

3098—Lady's 33-in. regulation style jacket, in fine quality, full-furred raccoon, semi-fitting back, plain mercerized sateen lining, notched collar. Factory price, prepaid $52

Man's Coon Coat

208—Man's coon coat, choice of shawl or notched collar, quilted lining of fine quality black lasting, well made and well finished in every particular. Factory price, prepaid .. $50

"Paquet" Special

311—Our "Paquet" special man's coat is made in black beaver cloth, with plain farmer's satin lining and shawl collar of Russian otter marmot. Factory price, prepaid ... $13

THIS FUR CATALOGUE

containing 80 pages of fine half-tone illustrations and thousands of descriptions and prices of PAQUET FURS, will be sent you on request. Write to-day for a copy—don't put it off and forget. A post-card request will bring it by return mail. Write now.

THE PAQUET COMPANY LIMITED.

QUEBEC — CANADA

IN 1847 electro-silver plating was perfected by Rogers Bros. and for over sixty years the original brand has been recognized as the highest quality.

1847 ROGERS BROS. X S TRIPLE is the heaviest triple plate made. It is "Silver Plate that Wears." This fact, together with the beauty of its designs and the prestige of the name, makes it

Most Popular for Gifts

Whether the original gift is a single piece or a combination chest, other pieces in the same pattern may be added at any time. Sold by all leading dealers. Send for illustrated catalogue "X20."

MERIDEN BRITANNIA COMPANY

MERIDEN, CONN.

NEW YORK CHICAGO SAN FRANCISCO HAMILTON, CANADA

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

JANUARY
1912

NEW YEAR'S NUMBER

Published by THE CANADIAN WOMEN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING COMPANY, Limited

PRICE
10 CENTS

ROYAL Yeast has long been acknowledged as the standard Yeast of Canada, and is without doubt the most perfect Yeast made. Bread made with Royal Yeast will keep moist and fresh longer than that made with any other. Royal Yeast retails for 5c a package—sufficient to produce 50 large loaves of fine, wholesome, nourishing home-made bread.

ROYAL YEAST CAKES

Be careful to see that the label on the package is blue. No other color ever used on Royal Yeast. Refuse substitutes. Insist on the old familiar blue package.

E. W. GILLETT COMPANY LIMITED

TORONTO, ONT.

WINNIPEG MONTREAL

EDITORIAL CHAT

The REBUS COMPETITION could not be decided in time for an announcement in the page for the Juniors; but we are able to make an editorial announcement concerning it, which will keep our young readers from waiting in suspense until next month. The winner of the Rebus prize is Miss Mildred Burns, of Hampton, Ontario, whose letter was numbered sixty-eight. We had a curious experience this year, as the prize winner was the only one out of scores of contestants to have a solution exactly corresponding with the author's text. There was one group in the rebus which gave most of the trouble. Some interpreted it as "orphans," some as "families," some as "the poor," and we decided to adhere absolutely to the author's words, "poor families." There were one or two other pictures in the rebus which proved confusing to some competitors. However, it has been a most interesting contest all around, and we have received solutions from all points in Canada, from Cornwall, P.E.I., to Victoria, B.C. As a rule, the answers were most neatly written and were a pleasure to read.

OUR SUBSCRIPTION LIST was the most cheering feature of our Christmas menu. We hardly hoped to exceed last year's record, when one week brought a thousand subscriptions through the mails, but such a happy condition has come true, and we have been kept busy sending out receipts and Christmas cards to accompany them. Many of these subscriptions were sent as gifts of the season, showing that our friends appreciate our efforts to give them a JOURNAL which will be welcomed in the Canadian household. Thousands of subscriptions came in during the fortnight before Christmas and made our mails satisfactorily heavy. While such results are most gratifying, they urge us to renewed effort to prove worthy of such confidence and make the record of 1912 even more creditable than anything of the past. From every one of our nine provinces come these good Canadian dollars, with assurance of appreciation, from Prince Edward Island to the Pacific Province. We trust that our old friends may long continue our readers, and that the new friends will come to the conclusion that

January CONTENTS 1912

FICTION

THE GATES OF GLORY 1
THE FATE OF GOLD 2
THE HOUSE OF MYSTERY 10
THE COST OF A GRAB 13

SPECIAL FEATURES

THE PUBLIC SCHOOL AUTOCRAT - 6
[illegible]
CANADA AND HER WOMEN
A NEW YEAR'S PUZZLE

FASHION DEPARTMENT

FASHIONABLE WINTER COSTUMES 22
NEW EVENING GOWNS
BROADCLOTH WITH VELVET - - - 23
FRINGE TRIMMINGS
VELVET SUITS
SET OF VELVET AND FUR - - - 27
THE FUR REDINGOTE - - - - 27
IN THE SHOPS
ARTISTIC EMBROIDERIES - - - 29

MATTERS OF MENU

A NEW YEAR'S LUNCHEON
DELICIOUS OMELETS

FOR THE HOUSEHOLD

HOUSEHOLD DECORATION
HOUSEHOLD EXCHANGE
HOUSEHOLD HINTS

SPECIAL DEPARTMENTS

THE GIRLS OF THE FARM
THE JOURNAL'S JUNIORS - - - 17
CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB - - - 20
FROM THE PUBLISHERS
WOMEN'S INSTITUTE
THE DRESSING TABLE

MISCELLANEOUS

EDITORIAL CHAT - - - - - - 1
EDITORIALS - - - - - - - 5
MATTERS MUSICAL

EDITORIAL CHAT

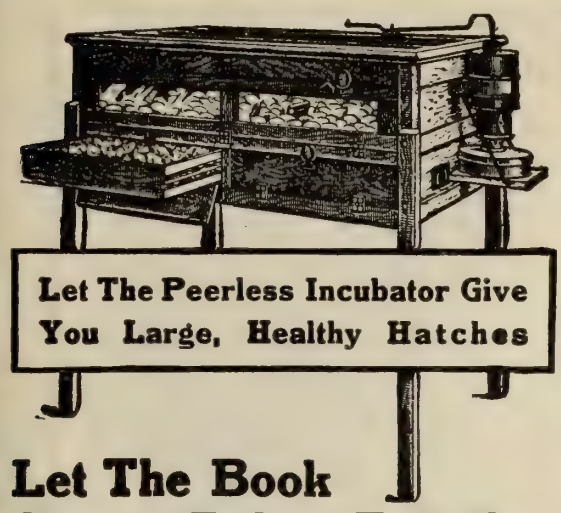
a yearly subscription to the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL is a good habit.

OUR DEPARTMENTS will be as ably filled as ever. Through some mistake, probably a delay caused by Christmas mails, Jennie Allen Moore's letter for "Around The Hearth" did not reach us in time for publication in our January issue. However, it will greet you once more in February, and, we hope, for many months to come. We are glad that our readers are feeling a personal interest in this department and are writing about their various needs, as the members of the staff wish to come into personal touch with those for whom they write. Miss Rorke's articles on "Household Decoration" are such as will prove valuable to all readers, as they are essentially practical, being concerned with the everyday home and containing sensible and original suggestions on a subject which is of interest to every woman. "The Dressing-Table" is always supplied with a question drawer, and the editor of "Matters Musical" is glad to answer inquiries.

OUR CONTRIBUTORS have been unusually profuse in their attention during the last month, and we should like them all to observe certain editorial requirements, in order that the greatest general comfort may be secured. It is not necessary to send a letter with manuscript. In fact, it is much better merely to write the name and address on the manuscript, as a letter may be mislaid easily. A stamped and addressed envelope ought to be enclosed for return of manuscript, should it prove unavailable. It is quite impossible for an editor to give specific criticism in the case of returned manuscripts, and such return does not imply that the rejected story or article is without literary merit. It merely indicates that it is not suited to the purposes of this JOURNAL. We are asked sometimes what class of articles we wish to secure. At present, we are desirous of obtaining illustrated articles of a domestic or household nature. Articles descriptive of historic towns or villages, unless written with special vividness, are not in demand. We have found that our readers are essentially practical and are anxious to read about actual conditions and doings.

SUBSCRIBERS' ADVERTISEMENT GUARANTEE

Readers of the "Canadian Home Journal" are fully protected when buying from any of our advertisers. We know that every advertiser in this issue is reliable, and that our readers will be dealt with fairly and honorably. Should any of our readers have an unsatisfactory dealing with any of our advertisers we will undertake to have a satisfactory adjustment made or the money refunded. This absolute guarantee is good only when our readers tell advertisers when dealing with them that their advertisement was seen in the "Canadian Home Journal."



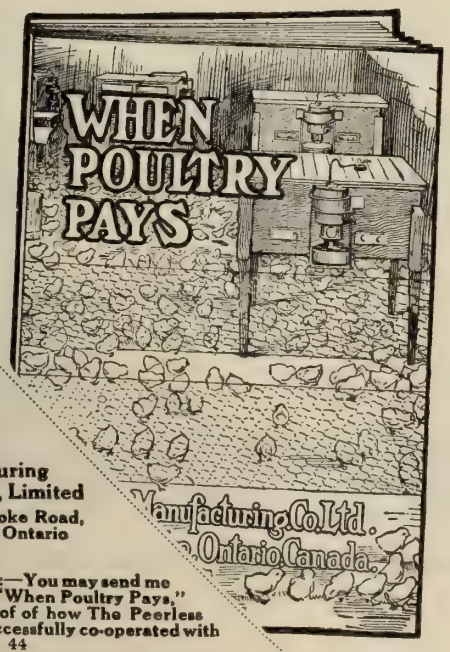
LET THIS INCUBATOR AND THE PEERLESS WAY MAKE POULTRY RAISING YOUR MOST PROFITABLE BRANCH OF AGRICULTURE

YOU can do it—can do just what 20,846 other farmers and poultrymen have done and are doing in Canada to-day. You can adopt The Peerless Way, take the Peerless Incubator and Brooder and with the experience that we have spent years in acquiring and which we offer you freely, double or treble your poultry-profits. Per head of population, the United States produces three dollars of poultry products to every dollar's worth produced in Canada. That means Canada should produce $75,000,000 worth instead of $25,000,000 worth. Canada is an under-supplied poultry market with rising prices—for example, seven years has seen the price of eggs alone just doubled. We have been so blinded with big things in Canada, that we have overlooked how really immense some of the smaller things are. The Peerless Way affords a real way to increase poultry-profits.

Let The Book Shown Below Tell You How The Peerless Incubator And The Peerless Way Can Double Your Profits

WE publish a handsome book which tells all about The Peerless Way. This book, "When Poultry Pays," must not be confused with The Peerless Way. It does not contain the plans, working-drawings, specifications and blue-prints that go with The Peerless Way. But it does explain—and fully—just how you can put The Peerless Way to work for you. It gives statistics showing the condition and possibilities of Canadian poultrying; tells how the Peerless Incubator and Brooder were evolved at the Poultry Yards of Canada, Limited, and how these and other things we learned about Canadian poultrying, made our own farm the most successful of its kind in Canada; and it tells, further, the story of a poultry system that is revolutionizing poultry raising in this country. The book is too expensive to send out haphazard; but if you are interested in "poultry-for-profit," have a little money, the average amount of common-sense and the willingness to look after your business, send us the coupon and we will send you one copy. Remember, we are not offering you any "something-for-nothing," or "get-rich-quick" plan; but we are offering a straight, legitimate, business proposition, which, if you go into it seriously as it deserves to be gone into, can double and treble your profits from poultry, and raise it from a side-line of your farm, to your most profitable branch of agriculture. Do you care to—

Send Us The Coupon



LEE

Manufacturing Company, Limited
124 Pembroke Road,
Pembroke, Ontario

Gentlemen:—You may send me your book "When Poultry Pays," and the proof of how The Peerless Way has successfully co-operated with others. 44

Name.....

Address.....

Town.....

Province.....

Let The Peerless Way Teach You Exactly What Profitable Poultrying Really Means

THE profits in any enterprise don't come from the amount of capital invested; profits come from knowledge of what to do—and, even more important—what not to do. As operators of the Poultry Yards of Canada, Limited, the largest and most successful poultry farm in the Dominion, we are prepared to teach you how to make money in poultry. You can either come to Pembroke and take a course at our poultry farm here by paying a small fee for the course—or we will teach you through the mail free all about the methods we have made so successful.

Let The Peerless Way Show You How You Can Meet The Climatic Conditions of Canada In Poultrying

OVER half the failures in poultrying in Canada are due to improper methods. Incubators, brooders, poultry-houses, etc., built for warm climates, never have and never will give, in the cold winters of the Dominion, the full possible results. The Peerless Way is the only system of poultry raising that gives recognition to this important fact. The Peerless Incubator and Brooder has been specially designed and built for Canadian use and the blue-prints and working-drawings furnished for the erection of poultry houses, are made from houses that have actually been used and proven successful on our own poultry farm at Pembroke.

Let The Peerless Way Show You About Co-operative Marketing And Higher Prices

MORE money for your poultry and eggs—that's the secret of greater profits! To followers of The Peerless Way—those 20,846 poultrymen who use Peerless Incubators and Brooders and have adopted our methods,—we have taught co-operative marketing. We have shown them how to get top-notch prices for large or small quantities of poultry or eggs, and how to sell to the best advantage. Working along the lines that we have proven to be so successful, is making an increased revenue from poultry. You, too, can have the benefit of all our experience; for our Poultry Advisory Board is ready to teach you all these things. They are ready to give you freely all the experience that has taken them years of toil and exhaustive study to acquire, ready to set you in the right track and enable you to make profits right from the minute you start. But there is not room here to tell you all about it—the book will do that. Send us the coupon and we will send you, postage paid and without charge, "When Poultry Pays".

LEE Manufacturing Co., Ltd. 124 Pembroke Road 44 PEMBROKE ONTARIO CANADA

EATON'S SEMI ANNUAL SALE

CATALOGUE Nº 101

1911-12

MONEY SAVING OPPORTUNITIES FOR EVERY MAN WOMAN AND CHILD

NOW

IS YOUR CHANCE TO BUY AT GREATLY

REDUCED PRICES

PHENOMENAL BARGAINS That's what we now offer, and what you will receive. We've worked hard to make this a Banner Sale—a Sale of momentous importance—because of the saving chances it offers. Every article has been specially selected for this Sale—from our own factories—or bought in voluminous quantities so that our word for big value-giving might be fully justified. A trial order will quickly prove what we say to be actual facts—indeed, it's more than likely you'll be more than satisfied with your purchase. That's the true significance of this Sale—to outbid—outshine all previous efforts—to reach the highest pinnacle in value-giving, and with it all this guarantee—

WE GLADLY REFUND YOUR MONEY IF GOODS ARE NOT SATISFACTORY

YOU RUN NO RISK No matter how small the purchase, or what the circumstances, the EATON guarantee is your protection, absolutely, without hesitation or dissent on our part. No better assurance could you find. Satisfaction guaranteed or money back, and we pay all charges. It's really worth while.

When the opportunity is yours—Buy Now Don't Delay

TWO UNPARALLELED BARGAINS

MATERIAL ALONE WOULD COST YOU MORE

1R-3450. CORSET COVER BARGAIN. A case where the selling price is in unusual contrast to the value offered. Fine soft cotton, charmingly trimmed, back and front, with a deep yoke, with many rows of dainty lace insertion and pretty embroidered lawn. Perfect-fitting Cover, having just the right amount of fulness over the bust, and shaping in nicely at the waist.

Sizes 32 to 42. Sale Price 39c

1R-2420. PETTICOAT, fine, lacy, beautiful pattern, but being embroidery, and not lace, it is durable, and will give endless wear. The upper part of the petticoat is cut without fulness, the lower portion well ruffled, with a dust frill under the deep 18-inch flounce. The nainsook is soft and fine, and there are drawstrings at waist.

Sizes 38, 40, 42. Sale Price 1.98

ABOUT FREE DELIVERY

All $25.00 orders sent freight prepaid in addition to goods priced for free delivery.

THE T. EATON Co LIMITED

TORONTO CANADA

FORTY FOUR PAGES OF WONDERFUL BARGAINS

. . Sale . .

Commencing

26TH

DECEMBER 1911

Ending

29TH

FEBRUARY 1912

Bird's-Eye View of Toronto Store and Factories.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Notice to Subscribers

Subscriptions are payable strictly in advance.
Remit by Money Order or Registered Letter. We are not responsible for remittances that go astray. Only one and two cent stamps accepted in payment.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Subscription Price

Subscription for Canada and British Isles, $1.00 per annum; United States, $1.35; Postal Union countries, $2.00 (8s.) post paid.
We accept no patent medicine, liquor, narcotic or exploitation announcements.

Published on the 25th of each month preceding date of issue by
THE CANADIAN WOMAN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., LIMITED
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

WILLIAM G. ROOK, President

Edited by JEAN GRAHAM

The Household at Rideau Hall

CANADIANS have been most fortunate in the representatives of royalty who have come to Ottawa and made themselves at home in the Dominion. Earl Grey and his household were so genuinely useful and popular that their departure was an occasion for deep regret. There has not been a Governor-General who has not shown a sincere interest in our land, who has not sought, on his return to the Mother Country, to foster the best social and trade relations between Great Britain and Canada.

The growing importance of Canada in the Empire has been recognized in the appointment of the uncle of King George, His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, as our present Governor-General. Since their arrival in Canada, "the Connaughts," as they are commonly called, have made themselves popular among all casses by their consideration and graciousness. The presence in our capital of a royal representative mitigates the asperities of political life and affords a social centre for all national interests. The fact that the Duke of Connaught is the son of Queen Victoria has aroused anew our loyal remembrance of that sovereign whose reign was proof of woman's ability to adorn the highest position in the British Empire. The coming of Princess Patricia is naturally a matter of interest to young Canadians, who have hitherto regarded a princess as a fairy-tale personage. That this sweet-faced granddaughter of Queen Victoria may have a royal "good time" in our happy land is the wish of all of us.

Princess Patricia of Connaught

* * *

A Hint to Fathers

IT can hardly be stated with justice that the business girl is not receiving her share of attention from editors and other general advisers of the public. Residences for the business girl, cheap lunch rooms for the business girl, and other aids to her comfort or amusement are topics of conversation in all our large cities. It is all in vain to protest that woman's place is the home. The girl whose father has but a small income feels quite early in life that she can lighten the domestic burden by earning a livelihood, and so she joins the army of wage-earners, with the laudable desire to be independent.

A business man who is anxious that his only daughter shall not enter the world of commercial competition, recently said to a friend: "I intend to offer my daughter a good allowance as soon as she is able to understand the value of money, arrange that she shall do definite work in the house, take dressmaking lessons and otherwise fit herself for an essentially feminine life. I am going to make it worth her while financially to remain in the home."

This may be taken as a hint by those fathers who are deploring the unwomanliness of a daughter's entering business life.

Minding One's Business

THE advice—"Mind your own business"—has a simple ring which echoes in a fashion not easily misunderstood. In our childhood we heard it from our elders whenever our curiosity became inconvenient. As we grew older, we found that it was the safest policy which we could adopt. However, we are sometimes confronted with conditions which make the terse bit of counsel rather perplexing. After all, it is not invariably an easy matter to tell just what is one's business. We are eminently social beings, and, consequently, there arise occasions when it seems as if our neighbors' affairs demanded our intervention. Yet, it is well, even when from motives of kindness or charity, we enter into the affairs of others, to respect the individuality of anyone we may elect to help or befriend.

The old English saying about an Englishman's house being his castle is founded upon a certain sense of proprietorship which has its fine uses. Too often, in trying to better social conditions, we forget this feeling for one's own, which is seldom absent, even from the poorest. A shanty or a tenement room may have a certain attraction for the humble dweller which must be taken into account. Wherefore, we should go carefully about our charities, or we may meet with such a reception as was accorded a condescending visitor by one of the "submerged,"—"I hope ye won't expect me to return the call—ma'am—for I ain't got any time for slummin'."

* * *

The Good Old Days

WERE they so very good, after all—those old times which we hear our venerable friends deplore? If we may take legal records as testimony, they were no more the Golden Age than these early years of the Twentieth Century. Compare the present criminal laws of England with those of 1812, and then take courage for the future. When we read in the morning paper all manner of crimes and casualties we are sure that this is a very wicked world, forgetting the many righteous and comfortable citizens whose condition remains unchronicled by the papers. We should remember that it is the business of the press to notice the unusual.

While we cannot shut our eyes to the misery and wrong doing, we must not allow such conditions to depress us so that we cannot "see Life steadily and see it whole." There is always sunshine somewhere, and the truest philosophy is that which recognizes the better side of humanity as the normal. The old men and women who keep young are those who are always hopeful for the best, who are not scornful of the new, but are anxious to find in it something of progress and betterment. Do not let yourself become out of sympathy with the youthful and the buoyant, over-critical of their good spirits.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOL AUTOCRAT

An Answer to "Public School Teachers Versus Mothers"

By ISABEL BEATON GRAHAM

IN the October issue of the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, under the courtly caption "Public School Teachers Versus Mothers," appears a paper written by a teacher who enters therein her comprehensive plea against the Canadian mother. Among the many grave charges presented, the following stand out most conspicuously: "The mother has criticized and censured the teacher since the world began"; she "has no sympathy"; "the average class of forty-five pupils has one hundred and forty-five varieties of dispositions," all presumably, directly traceable to the mother; "the mother exerts a perpetual handicap upon the teacher because she lives in constant fear without which teaching would be a joy"; "the mother regards the teacher as a stepmother, and is suspicious lest she inflict barbaric torture upon Johnny"; "the mother questions Johnny after school to entrap the teacher in indifference and general misdoing." At this stage in her arraignment, the teacher who penned this article ceased for a moment to arraign, while she "blushed for the Canadian mother" after which operation she promptly admits feeling a mild measure "of contempt for herself for imputing such unworthy motives to the mother," but justifies her exposure of the mother by affecting to cherish an incipient conviction that such accusations driven well home publicly, will induce the mother "to consider seriously." Arrived at this interesting and logical sequence, the teacher now presents what is supposed to be a verbatim report of a sample dialogue ("actually overheard by teachers boarding"—within earshot) in which the mother is alleged to have encouraged Johnny in falsifying reports of school happenings. Indeed, so altogether diabolical is the conduct of Johnny and his mother that "the distracted teacher asks herself wildly: Are mothers possessed, and all Johnnies liars?"

From this distraction the teacher recovers poise somewhat, only to find the mother "shaking a metaphorical fist in her face and with clenched teeth daring her to touch darling Johnny." As though this were not bad enough, the mother now resolves to "force the teacher out of the profession" by means of "a suspicious and inimical regard." But the teacher is "game," apparently, for Johnny has now to come to his mother's aid with a full measure of "tantrums, noises, leg-pinchings," and even the "mud of Johnny's boots grinds with a screeching and excruciating torture" peculiar to no age but this. Since "misfortunes never come singly" it is quite to be anticipated that "two or three" Johnnies should contract a corresponding number of coughs in their own right with the preconceived purpose of "jarring every fibre of the teacher's body." The teacher's testamentary climax quite naturally arrives with "the determined knock of an irate mother at the classroom door." The foregoing is a very much boiled down summary of the teacher's charge against the mother, and by the same authority the immediate and inevitable result of the mother's iniquity will be "that teachers' chairs will soon be vacant, for they will keep silence" no longer unless "the mother takes to her heart the admonition found here," and makes prompt reform.

Exhausted, but resolute still, the teacher now hands the knotted lash to the Education Department, and causes that hitherto inoffensive and pacific body to declare that "the home has been a failure," inferentially because of the mother, and "therefore, to the teacher is given the most delicate and sacred of the mother's duties." With this vigorous and overwhelming upheaval of all recognized social laws involving "mothers' duties," regardless alike of wreckage and obstruction, this scalp and gory hunting teacher sweeps fiercely on to demolish the last fragment of "the mother's rights" by taking over the garment making "for Johnny's doll," and telling him the fairy "bedtime stories," so many centuries the inalienable prerogative of motherhood. But whether the mother or the Education Department is most to blame for this "last straw" that broke, not the camel's back, but worse, the teacher's fealty to the Heart and Head of Learning, is not very clear; but, whether one or both, certain it is that imposition could go no further, and so the teacher is in revolt, rising upon Rebellion's very crest, by the added super-indignity thrust upon, or at, her by "Public Opinion" (that changeful, unchastened Mrs. Grundy before whom all else is grass), "the teaching of self-knowledge" to little Johnny.

This seems to close the plaintiff's case.

Is the bill true?

Let Public Opinion be the judge, after the mother puts in defence.

Not because of the teaching fraternity, nor yet because of the chastized mother, does it become a compelling duty to enter the courtroom of "Public Opinion" to give evidence in the case, but wholly and solely because of little Johnny. For where is Johnny while the court sits?

To begin then, in order that the judge may quickly render his decision, and restore peace, so that Johnny may safely come from hiding, and return to the classroom, let us go back to the first charge laid, "the silence" and inaction of the teacher under the public censure and criticism of the mother." During a period covering over three decades of miscellaneous reading, never, with one exception, did there cross my path a press complaint made by a mother. During the same period every such reader must have seen in newspaper, magazine and journal, and heard in and out of teachers' convention, numberless papers treating upon the mothers' infirmities of temper and reason —her faults commissive and omissive, "twice told tales," always reported by the teacher.

Pity it is if these prime forces, mother and teacher, are at variance, as it means loss to both, and worse, means inevitable and irretrievable loss to Johnny. But are these forces really at variance, and if so, why?

Antiquity sustains the adage: "Teachers are born, not made." Because enough teachers are not "born," many have to be "made"; hence many imperfect ones; hence difficulty in adjustment to either perfect or imperfect mothers; hence Johnny's imperilled predicament.

The "born" teacher knows that the school was made for Johnny, not for Johnny's mother, nor for Johnny's teacher. Both the school and the teacher are bought with the mother's money, and Johnny also is her property. It would seem then that when the teacher and Johnny cannot, "like birds in their little nest agree," that the teacher would do wisely "to fold her tent like the Arabs and silently steal away" to another school in a far country. Should the teacher still find herself unreconciled and irreconcilable to the mothers and the Johnnies there, and having also tried elsewhere, she can then quite reasonably rest assured that she is one of the "made" teachers, and a very poor job.

Mut friction and heartburnings would come to an end if the "made" teacher saw eye to eye with the "born" teacher in the particular that Johnny, his mother and the school are fixtures; the teacher only is the peripatetic. Conclusive evidence, if such is necessary, that the teacher who fails is "made," lies in the fact that the "born" teacher succeeds where a succession of "made" failures preceded her.

In her vague and blind gropings after the cause of her bondage (for she is in bondage), it is deplorable that the talons of the teacher should have struck through Johnny and "the home," and therefore straight into the mother's heart.

To the teacher falls the most blame, for, practically speaking, every teacher was brought up in a home, the average home, and knows rather well the mother's labors there. Few mothers, comparatively speaking, were trained to, or fully comprehend, the teacher's arduous duties. The teacher is trained to do her work, and paid for it. She should be tactful, strong, resourceful, patient, magnetic, a veritable radiator of cheer, good-fellowship and mixed reserve. She does not embody these attributes. Why not? Because she is overworked and underpaid. She has to compete on equal terms with her brother in the classrooms, at the teachers' examinations, in the extortionate payment of tuition and other requisite school fees; in the years of heavy application to books. When qualified at exactly the same monetary expense and labor as her brother, she is not paid as much for doing in the same way (often a better way), the same work as her brother. All the plums of the profession fall into his lap; what he cannot or will not eat are infrequently available to her, but usually her portion is the unripe crab. When there are not enough Canadian brothers to devour all the plums, brothers are imported from foreign lands. A fixed principle is, plums for men, crabs for women teachers. This is probably due to the exclusion of women from school boards. The girl teacher is compelled to qualify at the same expense of energy, time and money as her brother, though there is practically no probability of her ever being privileged to occupy a school position equal to his. Her expenditures in education hold no promise of equal monetary recompense. To illustrate more fully: A degree in mathematics costs not one dollar or effort more to acquire than a degree in history, English or moderns. The price is set high for teaching mathematics. (Why?) A woman can seldom get a position even as assistant. Many have qualified. Many have tried. This is unjust. Either her investment should have as high an earning power as her brother's, or she should not be compelled to qualify as high as he. Having then less salary but as heavy work, the teacher must live less comfortably than her brother. She must eke out her insufficient revenue by home and home-made economies of disappointing apparel, instead of like her brother, sloughing off the clinging worries of the schoolroom day in outdoor, care-free, healthful abandon. Like the barnacles that rivet themselves to the vessel's hull, so are the irritations of the school classroom. And poor Johnny is the victim, his mother, the accused before the court! Neither is guilty. To-day's Johnny pays the penalty of his own misdeeds with principal and interest on the heap of yesterday's Johnny.

To-morrow's Johnny? Ah, well! Let us hope morning will dawn in time for him. Mothers may some day appear on the school boards. Meantime must Johnny pay the penalty, and his mother stand accused? And meantime what of the teacher? She (or he) is curious sometimes, illogical often.

To illustrate: A teacher toiled minutely through a tale of woe over that bete noir of the fraternity "the lates." On opening morning class her custom was to read a thrilling tale, ceasing each day at a critical juncture. "The late missed what he was not in time to hear. The classroom door was locked. The teacher began to read. Breathless quiet reigned. A "late" knocked at the locked door. The reading ceased. A pupil was requested to move forward and unlock the door. The "late" entered. The door was relocked. The two pupils resumed their seats. The reading was resumed. Another knock. "We had to interrupt the reading every time to unlock that door. Now just look at all that," mourned the teacher.

"But why did you lock the door, if you intended to unlock it each time, and admit every pupil?" questioned her listener. A flush and confusion occupied her face. She had been locking and unlocking that classroom door for nearly two years.

Another case: A teacher had "lates." She locked the school door and kept two little girls on the street. Eventually they went home and reported the cause of their early return. The mother complained to the trustees. "The mother was a little sick, of course, and kept those girls late just to wash the dinner dishes. Who cares for her old dishes?" indignantly queried the teacher. Two little girls punished by a half-day suspension because they obeyed their mother. In the same district (same teacher) lived a Russian family, the father a section foreman, the mother and nine children were living—Vira, the eldest, thirteen years of age. They "had moved last fall from a section in the wilderness near Fort William," because the mother "had heard there was good water and a school in X—" but, oh! the teacher was so cross about the lessons, and I no Inglich but little, an' Vira, she scared so she cannot know anything, and I spare her there for the school, but I so need her, an' she want to stay with me, the teacher so cross. I know not how to help, I do anything for Vira to go to the school, but—." A visit to the school revealed Vira standing in the middle of the floor, face tear-wet, shaking in every limb, making futile struggles to spell "thorough," the teacher towering over her, menacing her with ruler and raucous voice. In hopeless confusion Vira was dismissed to her seat and a younger brother took the rack on the floor, failed as miserably as Vira, and both had to "stay in."

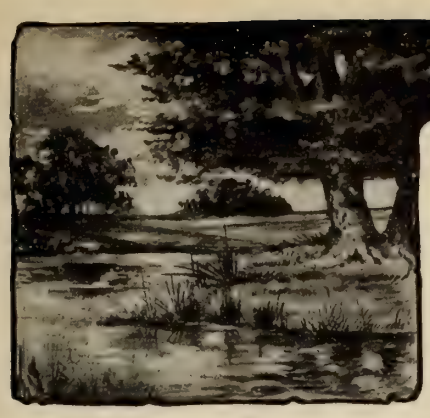
Another case—the teacher told her own tale thus: "And would you believe Minnie Jones' father wrote me a note asking me not to keep her in after four, as he needed her at home. I just wrote back and told him I was running that school, and if he thought he could do it better than I, let him come up and try, and I'll go drive his horses, but while I'm in this school Minnie will get her home work or stay in till she does." Minnie was an only child, twelve years old, kept house (all the keeping it got) for father and two hired men. Father was so anxious for Minnie's school work that he got dinner himself, but Minnie faced a table of dirty, dried-up dishes every night, and no mother. Many a night Minnie couldn't get a minute at her lessons until after ten p.m., but she was kept in, and the teacher "bragged" about it.

The lessons to be drawn are various: One teacher can do a great harm in a school; one mother very little harm. One teacher can do a great good in a school; one mother considerable good. But one good teacher and one good mother combined in any school can make a paradise for Johnny that all the powers of darkness can never smirch, and at life's close our Johnny will be still the knight, both true and strong, the faithful worshipper at mother's shrine and at the teacher's too.

The initiatory move should be the mother's care; her interest is incomparably the greater. But Johnny "late" need not be a deadly personal insult to the teacher; it may only have been that baby was sick over night, or the cows strayed farther than usual. Though not a premeditated insult to the teacher, neither need Johnny "late" mean a careless mother; mother has many suddenly imperative duties, among which she must be allowed to choose. But if careless, still it does not become the servant to rebuke the mistress by punishing her child. It is the mother's privilege to determine how early and how often Johnny shall appear at the school. It is the teacher's duty (for which she is paid) to teach Johnny whenever he presents himself.

System, says the martinet, would change all that. Perhaps, but system has been known to change more than that, and Johnny was the loser.

The teacher "born" discovers Johnny's graces rather than his faults; sees a possibility of slowly-budding genius in Johnny's dullness, a fair bright promise of the man that is to be, and then she leads both Johnny and his mother by a single hair.



THE GATES OF MEMORY

The Story of an Interrupted Proposal

By HERMAN SCHEFFAUER

THE morning air and the fresh scent of the fields worked like wine in their veins. The wheat shook its millions of bristling spears in the sunlight. They had just heard a lark trilling sunward, and the Sabbath was still young. It was summer in the world, but spring in their hearts.

So John Ogilvie, with Bessy Marvin beside him, flirted his whip sportively above the glistening flanks of his jaunty mare, and the little dog-cart bowled merrily along the road out of Orthridge. The young man turned his head toward the fair girl beside him. Blue-eyed and tawny-haired was she, her round cheeks flushed with an inward joy—some rare exuberance of the spirit. She sat on the tufted seat of the dog-cart, clad in white, the incarnation of happiness, a young queen upon her throne of youth—the predestined mate, as it seemed, chosen by Nature and Destiny for the lithe and comely young farmer at her side.

"But the day, dearest! You know it's as terrible for a lover not to know the day of his happiness as for a criminal not to know the hour of his execution," said John.

"Well, that is a pretty comparison, I must say!" replied the young woman, pouting her red lips.

"Dear Bess, do tell me the day when——"

A rabbit flashed across the road; the horse swerved, and the next instant there was the roar of a gun and a cloud of sulphurous smoke in whose centre loomed the figure of a man. The mettlesome mare reared and plunged, and backed toward the edge of the road. The girl screamed, and Ogilvie sprang to his feet, one hand upon the reins, the other upholding the whip. But ere it fell upon the startled horse the left wheel of the dog-cart had passed backward over the dusty margin of dry grass which bordered the embankment; and, the next instant, cart, horse, man and woman lay, a confused heap, amidst the briers and brambles of the field below.

The man with the gun ran hastily forward; the rabbit lay quivering in death some yards away. For a moment a strange, sinister light blazed in the eyes of the new-comer, like some flash of fire from the underworld. It was Henry Barton, and in the heart of him a fierce desire, a mad, secret hope suddenly burned like a red-hot thing.

Ogilvie was lying huddled up under the cart, his head against a stone which protruded from the ground. He was bleeding from a deep gash in his forehead close to his brown hair. His hand still grasped the reins. Bessy, who had fallen free of the vehicle, was seeking to stanch the blood with her handkerchief. Barton swiftly unharnessed the restive, struggling animal, and with one wrench of his powerful arms righted the little cart. He then lifted Ogilvie, still unconscious, and placed him on the seat of the cart, where the girl supported him, his head upon her breast. Then, reharnessing the mare, he led her back to Orthridge, to Ogilvie's home. No word was spoken, only the horse whinnied as if concerned for her master's life.

John Ogilvie died—or rather the personality, the human entity, the memories of the individual being known by that name suddenly ceased to exist. His body lived and recovered from its wound, and was vigorous as before; but from the brain of that body all retrospection, all mental links with the past, all traces of association with his former life and friends were suddenly wiped away and expunged like writings on sea-sands.

When John Ogilvie, in the afternoon of that fateful Sunday, opened his eyes once more upon the world about him he was, but for the gift of language, like unto a new-born babe. He gazed blankly around as if suddenly awakened from some stupefying dream, looked curiously and strangely into the faces of his relations, and felt the bandage encircling his head. Then, staring vacantly at the young woman who sat close to his bed, he spoke.

At the first words that fell from his lips some deep terror seized upon Bessy Marvin, and, trembling from head to foot, she sprang from her chair and looked down upon the prostrate man. For the voice that came from the lips of John Ogilvie was not his own, but that of some other being! And some other soul was peering out of the unresponsive eyes he bent first on this face, then on that.

"Where am I? What has happened?" were the words that were struggling through the laboring lips. Then came the astounding query: "Who am I? Tell me who I am."

Again he raised his hand to his head and felt the bandages. Then he seemed to lose himself in some measureless vastness of time and space far removed from the pleasant room into which the warm sunshine burst, and where his astonished sweetheart, his father and mother, and his sister Esther were standing silent as if under some iron spell. Then the girl cried, as she clasped his arm:

"Why, you're my John, dearest. Don't you remember, we met with an accident this morning? Molly backed off the road. Don't you know your Bess, dear?"

But John Ogilvie that was merely shook his head and wearily closed his eyes. Then, for an instant, as if by some miracle, his features relaxed from their strange expression, the tension of the facial muscles was smoothed away, and he appeared again as of old.

"He will come to himself to-morrow," said the doctor, who had been summoned. "His faculties of recognition are temporarily suspended, due to shock to certain brain centres. That is often the way with cases of concussion."

But neither the next day nor the day thereafter, nor the week following, nor in the months nor the years that succeeded, did John Ogilvie ever come back to John Ogilvie. His past life was cut off as if by the shears of Fate, and nothing remained of the twenty-five years of his life save his native speech. He now spoke slowly, in a voice entirely strange, and with an accent that was slightly foreign.

"The years seemed to fall from him."

Thenceforth the fact that his name was John Ogilvie, that he was the owner of a splendid farm with unfailing acres of golden wheat, and with superb prize cattle, that he had lived all his life in the beautiful region of Orthridge, remained as darkly unknown to him as a book he had never read. And he who had been the happiest of all living men until the morning of that fateful drive, because of his having won the heart and hand of beautiful Bessy Marvin, retained not the faintest memory of the tender ties and sweet communion of hearts that had bound him to his betrothed. For hours Bessy would sit by his bedside incessantly searching his eyes for the slightest sign of recognition. But the eyes remained dull and lustreless, and no longer held the old familiar light of love she had always found there. The fond heart, the warm impulsive soul of John Ogilvie no longer shone through them. His demeanor and remarks were truly those of one who had no past knowledge of things nor events—one whose prior life was a dark baffling blank. To all her questions and remarks the man upon the bed would reply, as if in great mental distress and confusion:

"Im sorry, but I do not know you. I am sure I never saw you before. I do not even know myself! I cannot tell how I came to be here!"

And when for the thousandth time the girl in her passionate, broken voice had cried to him:

"Why, you are my John—John Ogilvie—oh, can't you remember me—can't you remember your Bessy?—who loves you! Here is the ring you gave me down by the river-side that afternoon. And the very moment before the accident you were asking me to set the day of our wedding!" John Ogilvie stared fixedly in front of him as if into endless depths of space.

The distress of those about him was beginning to work upon him. He appeared and acted as might a child which had been lost in some huge, thunderous city. Having knowledge of nothing, save the immediate present and the few days since the mishap, his soul and mind were adrift as on some misty, uncharted ocean, or wandered, as it were, through some wild, sand-tossed desert.

Soon he was about once more, somewhat dazed, acquainting himself with places and persons. Outwardly, at least, he was again almost the living image of John Ogilvie, but the personality of Ogilvie had vanished like a trace of dew in the sun. In time he came to know, though he could not understand, that the venerable, lace-capped woman was his mother; the white-bearded, hale, blue-eyed man, his father; the smooth-haired girl, with the sweet placid face his sister; and Bessy, his beloved. Although his mind accepted the knowledge of these relationships, his heart was unable wholly to respond to them. Bessy was affected to the profounds of her nature. His voice was no longer the same, his mannerisms were those of an utter stranger, his stride was different from that of the man she had loved; his very expression was charged with something entirely alien.

The thing that now lived in the brain and dominated the man and his thought soon brought into play a different set of facial muscles. These so altered his features that his mother at times remarked that she no longer knew her son. The spirit of John Ogilvie had been joyous, free, even boisterous; but the spirit that now dwelt in his body was silent, grave, and haunted by brooding dreams. Ogilvie's pet setter bristled and snarled whenever the transfigured man passed by.

Yet easily and naturally enough the new John Ogilvie began to adapt himself to the life about him. Something apart from intellect or memory seemed to help him to acquire his former skill in the management of the farm. Material conditions were altered little more than if there had merely been a change of overseers. His demeanor toward all was pleasant and kindly, and he accepted the devotion of his parents and sister with heartfelt appreciation. But ever there rested a shadow upon his relations with the folk about him—some remnant of the darkness that had blotted out his memory of all he had been to these persons and they to him.

Slowly the fervent affection of Bessy Marvin began to wither under the estranging shyness of the man who had once been her lover. In the new individuality even time and renewed association seemed unable to arouse a response to the love that was still cherished in the heart of the bewitching girl.

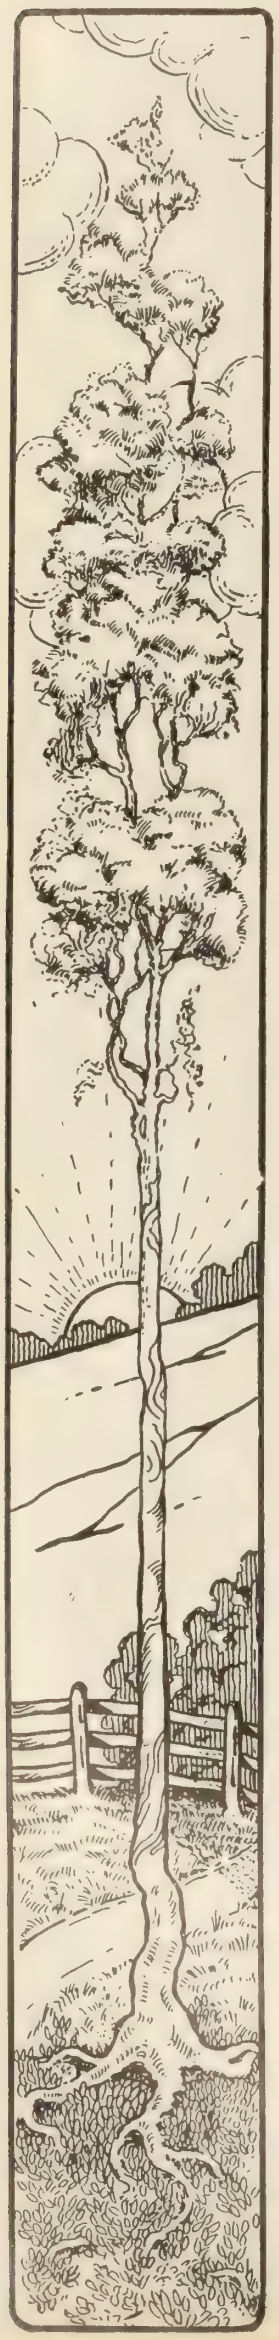
The girl realized that she was the chief victim of the extraordinary fate which had overtaken her loved one. Like the man who had lost his past, she seemed to change into another being. Two years dragged slowly and heavily along.

Finally, Bessy left Orthridge to spend a few months with her aunt in London. When she returned she was again the same lovely and cheerful creature as before. She now came but seldom to the home of the Ogilvies, and then only to visit John's sister. A new pair of lovers soon began to engage the tongues and attention of the people of Orthridge. It was observed that Henry Barton, an old suitor of Bessy's before John Ogilvie had won her hand, was again paying court to her. It was also observed that Matthew Olcott, who had for many years wooed Esther Ogilvie, seemed strangely disconsolate.

One summer evening, when Barton and the girl were strolling along the road and the new-mown sheaves lay pallidly under the glowing moon, they came to the spot where the mare Molly had shied at Barton's shot. Thoughtfully, Bessy pointed out the rooted rock against which Ogilvie had struck his head when the dog-cart was overturned three years before.

"That one stone, Henry," said the girl, mournfully, "has changed two lives—John's and mine!"

Continued on page 38



THE PATH OF GOLD

A Story of Love and Endeavor

By ETHEL KIRK

"HELLO, you fellows! Heard the news?" McAllister burst impetuously into the living-room of the Kappa Delta Fraternity, and the several members assembled therein greeted him in characteristic fashion. Langford raised his eyes, but immediately lowered them to his perusal of Hartman's "Materia Medica"; Ross, with a deep sigh of relief, tossed aside a musty volume of bound examination papers, and Graham removed his feet from the mantel and assumed a fresh interest in life.

"I suppose that you're going to tell us that the final dinner—"

"No chance. Jack Granger is the distinguished man once more. Did a great surgical stunt at the General this morning, and on the strength of it old Doc Mathers has offered to take him into partnership next year. What do you know about that now? Biggest practice in the city—in three years Jack will be a consulting physician on his own hook, have his own motor and private yacht—"

"Is he going to accept it?" asked Ross thoughtfully.

"Accept it! Why, man alive, who would ever dream of refusing? Windfalls don't come every day."

A cushion came whizzing through the air. "Not every day," repeated McAllister as he hurled it back again. "What makes you talk of him refusing it, Ross?"

"Oh—oh nothing. Only Jack is different, you know—ideals and all that sort of thing."

"Anything particularly lowering to a man's ideal in the mere fact of a partnership with Mathers?" queried Graham, in his most caustic accents.

"Certainly not," returned Ross with dignity. "Most chaps would jump at it, I know, and perhaps Jack will too. But—"

"Of course," put in McAllister decisively, "it is the only fitting climax to his career. Rugby champion, gold medallist, now house surgeon in the General, fine sport and all round good fellow—it's the natural outcome of the whole darned business. As for the rest of us, we third rate fellows (saving your presence, Langford) well, we'll have to take the world as it is handed out to us. Half of us missed our calling, anyhow—I should have been in the ministry."

A roar of laughter ensued. "Not too late yet, Mac," said Graham, with a most expressive grin. "There's still the little girl belonging to the minister, away down home in Blueberry Creek."

The hubbub that ensued was interrupted by the entrance of Jack Granger himself, the popular young doctor whose future had just proved so engrossing a subject of conversation.

"Hail the conquering hero, Hail!" shouted Graham.

"Heartiest congrats, Doc. Don't forget little Willie when it's two hundred to look in."

"Glad to hear of your luck, old sport."

"Oh, say, fellows, this is awfully good of you, really. Well—er—no, it's not decided yet, of course, Langford. What are you at now? Plugging away, I suppose—exams. in the air. Say, Ross, I just dropped in to see if you would walk over to the library with me, and we'll look that matter up. Why, thanks awfully. I'd like to come back to dinner, but have another engagement, unfortunately—Thanks, then I'll come to-morrow. Are you ready, Ross?"

Ross, who had long enjoyed the distinction of being Granger's special chum, rose and followed with alacrity. There was a slight silence in the room.

"Jack was all fussed up," exclaimed McAllister suddenly. "Bet it's Rosedale to dinner for him—"

"Rosedale," repeated Langford. "Sure! Awfully hard case with Miss Orme—she's a queen, too. I saw her at the last dance, and really—"

"Jimmie!" exclaimed Graham, with severity, "chase that far-away look out of your eyes. If the minister's daughter at Blueberry Creek—"

And McAllister's fighting blood was aroused once more.

□ □

IN the meantime the two friends were busily making their way to the medical library. It was a perfect afternoon, late in March. The grey old towers of 'Varsity were bathed in mellow sunlight, and the campus was beginning to show a quiet but lovely hue of emerald green.

They talked of desultory matters for a few minutes. Granger, a tall, lithe-limbed fellow, with a fine, clear-cut countenance, and deep blue eyes. The scientist had not yet overshadowed the boyish attractiveness of his nature, although lines of thought were beginning to carve themselves about the firm, yet flexible mouth. His companion was the typical medical student; dark-haired, dark-eyed, and slight of build. A rather jaunty manner could not conceal the fact that he was an ardent seeker after cold, unvarnished truth, and that he dearly loved an argument.

"This is a great chance you're getting, old boy," he said presently.

"Yes," said Granger slowly, "it's a great chance all right—but—I don't know about it, Syd."

Sydney Ross was too keen a student of human nature to make any further remark just then. After a moment Granger continued: "It's the biggest chance I'll ever get—I know that, Syd, and I've been working for a chance like this all along; at least, till lately. Then I got tangled up in that work down in the Ward, and when I came to a realization of just how much misery there was in the world—"

He paused and looked out over the campus. "I've had another chance lately, Syd. No one knows about it—to go up into a mining camp in the north—it's a tough place, and they need men. I don't think a consulting physician would answer—"

He stopped and smiled, and Ross became somewhat indignant.

"See here, now, Jack, just because you had to go and get interested in the Settlement work is scarcely a decent reason for you to bury yourself in some mining hole, miles away from civilization and all your brilliant prospects. You say men are needed; well, then, there are plenty. No need for a lot of the fellows to start here, because they'll never be noticed, and if they go away they won't be missed. But you—come now, Granger, be sensible. Why Jack"—and he struck his friend's shoulder forcibly—"you're one of the men of the century."

Granger laughed. "Well, Syd, I did hope you would understand. I'm not carried away by sentiment; you know me well enough for that. But a call of duty comes once to every man—and it's come to me. It calls me up north, to an obscure work, but a big one—"

"A man's work," concluded Ross. "Well, if you like."

"And what is the name of the 'lone wandering, but not lost' hole you think you're called—"

"Dogwood Valley," said Jack ruefully.

"Sounds poetic. But Jack, for heaven's sake, think it over—"

"I have. I tried not to, Syd, but in the end I had to face it. Hundreds of foreigners, poor wretches, no decent accommodation, and no medical attendance. Not much chance for them; but I've had one, and now I want to make good."

"Jack," said Ross suddenly, "there's one other phase to this matter. Kick me if you think it's none of my business; but what does Constance Orme say?"

There was a moment's silence. "I don't know, I haven't asked her."

"Not asked her?"

"Why should I?"

"Why—I thought—I understood—"

"Yes, I know. You thought I might ask her to share my destiny some day. Well, Syd, that was a good old dream of mine, too. But I have concluded that a mining doctor, and a girl from a Rosedale home, like hers, are not compatible. So that phase of the matter is settled—not an easy phase, either," he added softly.

"Granger," said his friend, "I always knew you had ideals—told the fellows at the Frat. so. No slam on them. But say—you'll give her the chance to—you'll ask her once, Jack?"

Jack turned a smiling face. "Ask her, Syd? Why, what have I to offer?"

Ross did not reply. Presently, "This is a new country, Jack, and men, and women as well, are out to carve out new destinies. Don't you realize that? And Constance Orme is just one dandy Canadian girl—"

Granger turned quickly. "I know, Syd, but she's also a daughter of luxury. I've made my sacrifice—I'm not going to ask her to make one too. Besides—she may not think about—oh, pshaw! Well, here we are, old boy."

□ □

IT was a lovely afternoon in May, and the terraced gardens of "Fernleigh," the home of the Ormes, depicted a charming scene. Early summer had thrown a delicate veil of green over the trees; the hedges were snowy with bridal wreath. Lilacs and flowering almond stood wrapped in a fairy mist, in blended hues of soft amethyst and palest rose.

Several white-clad enthusiasts were indulging in a game of tennis, while from the broad piazza came the sound of gay voices and laughter, mingled with the pleasant tinkle of tea cups, and incessant chatter of cake and strawberries.

"I say, Miss Orme, these Friday lawn parties of yours are the jolliest things I know. When I think that this is the very, very last one we'll ever see—"

"See here, McAllister, just because a lot of you chaps flatter yourselves that you are going to graduate and quit the country is no reason why Miss Orme should cut all her acquaintances. I, for one, still expect to remain in the city, carrying on a lively law practice on King Street West. And the Friday afternoons will keep on just the same, won't they, Miss Orme?"

The young hostess laughed merrily. "Why, of course they will continue—for the special benefit of Mr. Hamilton Dennison, youthful attorney-at-law. But, dear me,, we certainly are going to miss all you college boys. More tea, Evelyn? Let me see—how do you take it? Oh, yes—very strong, with the merest drop of cream, and absolutely no sugar. Here, Harold—will you take this to Miss Marden, please?"

"What a deliciously overwhelming dish of strawberries," exclaimed McAllister. "You know my tastes exactly, Miss Orme."

"Yes," she responded gaily, "I am trying to be nice, for I know that when you're a struggling country practitioner—"

"Country practitioner, indeed!" A groan went up from several among the merry group on the piazza. "Miss Orme, that's sheer cruelty," said Austin Graham. Then, in a slightly mischievous tone, "Does it apply to all of us?"

There was a low ripple of mirth. Constance busied herself with the tea urn, but a deeper pink stole into her cheeks. "Time alone will tell, Mr. Graham," she answered with becoming gravity, "and I am not a witch."

"No?" said Graham, with a provoking rising inflection; "but if rumor speaketh truly, Miss Orme, here comes a worthy scion of his profession who is destined for higher things—Dr. Granger, flushed and elated from four sets of tennis. More than conqueror, Doc?"

Granger laughed. "With the invaluable assistance of Miss Lindsay, Austin, Constance, you will never know just how thirsty we are."

"You will be better able to express yourself after you have had some tea," she answered gaily. Then, as he took the cup she added in a lower tone, "I want time to congratulate you on that splendid offer, Jack. And I only heard of it to-day—what a morose creature you are!"

He started slightly at her words, and the smile died out of his eyes. Constance was busying herself elsewhere, and did not see. Only one person, indeed, did note the change, and that was Sydney Ross. He observed the way in which Granger's glance wandered abstractedly around, but ever came back to rest, lingeringly on the slight, girlish figure in white linen, with the broad white hat crowning soft dark masses of hair, and the laughing, rose-flushed face beneath.

"And he'll go away and never a word," he thought disgustedly, "and she'll think it was all a bluff and throw herself away on Graham. Oh—er—yes—were you speaking, Miss Rivers? Please excuse my absent-mindedness. I was just admiring that bush over there. Pretty thing, isn't it?"

Thus the afternoon wore merrily on. It was about half-past five, when the guests began to take their departure, waving laughing audieus and assuring Constance that they would see her at the dance the following week. Jack Granger lingered a moment.

"What a relief!" said the girl brightly. "And now we can have a real good old talk. Jack, you don't know how glad I am—"

"I can guess, Constance," he answered slowly, "and I'm sorry. The disappointment must be so much the greater."

"Disappointment!" she echoed.

"Yes. I—the fact is, Con—I'm not going to accept Mather's offer."

"No?" Her tone was still incredulous. "You see, it's this way," and in simple, yet graphic language he proceeded to relate his plans for the future, and to tell of the rude life he had chosen up in the north. The girl listened in silence. At length, "It must be a big, big life," she said slowly.

Granger caught eagerly at her words. "That's just it, Constance. Big and pulsating, not what I once dreamed of. I think," and he smiled boyishly, "I think I must have been looking for something easy. It's different now. I know that everyone thinks I am throwing away my chances. Perhaps I am, but it's meant sacrifice. Do you remember, Constance," and he turned and smiled at the girl who was absently playing with some violets, "do you remember how we used to read Browning together? And that favorite quotation of mine:—

'Round the cape of a sudden came the sea,
And the sun looked over the mountain's brim,
And straight was a path of gold for him,
And the need of a world of men for me.'

"It always appealed to me, but I never knew what it meant, until just lately."

"And so you have felt the need of a world of men, Jack! And I—am I listed for the path of gold?"

Granger did not reply for a moment. Then he turned and looked at her. The old, sweet look of comradeship looked out clearly from her eyes.

"I suppose, at one time or another, Constance, we come to the parting of the ways. I'm glad you know now, and you've taken my decision as I knew you would—best old chum ever!"

Just for one instant her eyes wavered, but they met his again, dark and clear and true. "That's right, Jack—never forget that. I shall see you again before you go, but this is really good-bye, isn't it? And the best, the best of luck!"

They clasped hands warmly, and in another second he was gone. The girl stood watching until he was out of sight. Then she heaved a sigh, the deep, deep sigh of girlhood, and began to ruthlessly pluck the violets to pieces. Once, a whimsical smile played about her lips.

Spring ripened into summer. Convocation was over, and the companions of four years were scattered to the four corners of the earth. Late in June, his year at the General Hospital having expired, Dr. Jack Granger made his way up into the north country, and there, busily fighting death and disease in the crude life of the mining camp, striving to bear up his lofty standard of ideals in those primitive wilds where nature's laws were all, daily learning more of the hearts of pioneer humanity, he became immersed in his arduous tasks, and the old life became a phantasy of the past.

Sometimes, indeed, in the red glow of the camp fire the old scenes rose before him, and a sweet-faced girl seemed to smile from out the embers. But that firelight picture was the only relaxation he allowed his fancy. "I cannot go back," he would say firmly, "I have chosen."

Thus it was, that far away from the haunts of civilization, with long intervals between the mails, and even longer distances dividing him from his friends, he did not hear the big financial disaster that had befallen the firm of Orme, Mason and Company.

Constance Orme was seated in her favorite nook on the piazza, when she was told of the calamity. When the first rather severe shock was over, a strange, sweet thrill, half pleasure and half pain, seemed to permeate her whole being. "Oh, Jack, Jack," she whispered, "if you only knew! It may be that mine is not 'the path of gold,' either, but the big, big 'world of men.' You poor, dear, chivalrous Jack!"

□ □

THE pines stood black and gaunt against the dusky red-gold of the autumn afternoon. A warm wind blew restlessly across the clearing, laden with smoke and fine dust, and sometimes a whirling cloud of yellow leaves. Constance Orme stepped quickly out of the little log house, locked the door and gazed searchingly around, her face pale and drawn with anxiety. She was thinking of the terrible fire at the mine—the awful disaster which had kept the children away from school that day, and which had cast such a gloom over the little mining town of C——"

"How dead the place is," she exclaimed, with a little shudder. "The very wind seems to moan. There—yes, it must be. They are turning in at the church; they are going to turn it into a hospital, and they are taking the injured there now. I wonder if they need help; why, of course they must. Constance Orme, is this all you are made of? Why did you come to this country anyway?"

She ran over the rough ground in nervous haste, and in another minute she was at the door of the little frame church, flushed and breathless. "Oh, please, Mr. Allan, may I come in? I know something of bandaging—"

The mine owner turned quickly at the sound of her voice. "Why, it's teacher!" he exclaimed, and a relieved smile crossed his face. "Yes, yes, come right in, Miss Orme. That is, if you think you can stand it. A good many fathers of the youngsters you teach are in here I guess. Yes, we need help. Easy, now there, Jimmie—Smith, another pail of water."

For one instant Constance experienced a wild desire to run away from the awful scene. "Then," as she wrote afterwards in a letter to a girl friend, "I remembered that my great grandfather died at the battle of Waterloo, and sailed in." And in the same letter, "I never knew of just how much value those First Aid to the Injured stunts were going to be, which we used to take at Madame Henriette's school. But they certainly were practical—"

And indeed it would have been hard to have discovered a more practical young person on that September afternoon than the slim, white-clad girl who moved so swiftly and so lightly among the long rows of injured men. The spirit of the ancestor at Waterloo deepened the rose in her cheek, and lent a rare sparkle to her dark eyes. Other women were there, too; but all instinctively looked to "Teacher," and Constance bandaged, and bathed with cold water, made use of simple devices, and resorted to every possible plan to relieve the suffering. The doctor would not be able to get there till next day, Mr. Allan said, and in the meantime they must do their best.

Infinitely more, the girl's presence imparted a feeling of happiness. Stern faces smiled at her approach, and she was able to utter many a word of cheer. "You're the little teacher the kids talk so much about," said one of the men, as she paused near him. Then his face kindled into friendliness. "And it ain't much wonder."

Constance did not once leave her post during the long hours of that September night. "There is absolute need of me, Mr. Allan," she said, when the mine owner ventured to protest. "I am young and strong, and needed to look after these men."

Her eyes swept around the long, narrow building, and rested on a grief-stricken woman. "And comfort those whom I can no longer help," she added softly.

It was dawn-break, the hour when vitality sinks to its lowest ebb. A deep silence reigned in the rude hospital. Constance, weary with the long vigil, and the mental stress, and awed by that unseen presence of Death which might be hovering so near, stole quietly to the door. It was the "darkest hour," and while she stood and drank in the cool, fragrant air, an impulse seized her to step out into the night. A few moments more, and she was standing in the shelter of a cluster of pines by the roadside.

"The dawn is coming," she whispered to herself, "and the night is fleeing away. And in that hospital over yonder men are playing the game of Life and Death. I never knew what life meant before—but I know now, and those women in there know. It is toil, and service, and suffering, and up here in this great north country—"

□ □

A cool breeze swept through the pines. "It is the shiver of the dawn!" she murmured ecstatically. Away in the east a faint pink light appeared.

Then the sound of buggy wheels, and a man's voice rang out through the gray darkness.

"Hello! is that you, doctor? Yes—drive this way. Pretty well—pretty well—in the name of wonder—Why, it's Miss Orme! I was quite startled by your white dress."

Constance stepped out from among the trees. "Yes, Mr. Allan, I just came out to see the sun rise. Shall I go in now? Has the doctor come?"

"I am glad to say that he is here in person. Dr. Granger, let me present Miss Orme, the Florence Nightingale of the C—— mining disaster."

"Dr. Granger and I have met before, Mr. Allan. I did not know—"

"Constance, Constance, it really isn't you!" Granger's voice had the old boyish enthusiasm, and he sprang out of the rig and caught her hands eagerly.

"I will run up and let them know you've arrived, doctor," said the mine owner courteously, and strode briskly away, half smiling, half perplexed.

"But, Constance, I don't understand—" The girl smiled tremulously. "Have you never heard, Jack? When the firm failed I came up here to teach school—but since yesterday I have been acting in the capacity of a trained nurse, and—Jack, why Jack!"

His strong arms closed around her. "Oh, Constance, is it true? Can I claim you at last? I have dreamed of you so often, dear—at night, by the camp fire, and now—"

She raised her face to his. The rose-light of the dawn had cast over it a lovely radiance; her eyes were dark with joy. Away in the east the clouds kindled into crimson flames.

"See, Jack!" she cried, "the sunrise! And there, right through that cloud—"

His eyes followed the motion of her hand. Low in the horizon he saw the piled drift of a mass of soft, purplish pink clouds, cleft through the heart by one broad band of burnished gold, like a rare flaw in some splendid jewel.

"It is the 'path of gold,' Jack,' 'the girl exclaimed.

"The path of gold," he repeated, "up in the new north, Constance, and for both of us to follow. Perhaps, it, too, leads to the 'world of men,'"

TO KIPLING

In reply to "The Female of the Species," a poem by Mr. Kipling, which appeared in THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL for November, 1911.

When the Soul of Man awakened, when the Woman that God gave,
Stood revealed his wife and sweetheart, not his chattel or his slave,
Then he formed his own conception of what Woman ought to be,
And he made a Plaster Image, and he told her it was She.

For the Woman as God made her wasn't good enough for Man;
He invented large improvements upon Nature's cruder plan;
And he made that image nice and white, and put it on the shelf,
Where he kept assorted virtues that he did not want himself.

Man might govern, fight, and reason, to his perfect satisfaction;
Woman's work it was to cheer him when his mind was out of action;
Woman, good and kind, and clinging, timid, soft, anaemic, pale,
For the female of the species was an adjunct to the male.

But the Woman as Man made her scarcely suits our modern notions,
With her nicely guarded instincts and her primitive emotions;
We have dropped the weaker vessel and the tame domestic pet,
And our taste finds something wanting in that saint-like statuette.

So our literary gentlemen have touched it up afresh,
And have changed the plaster image to a Demon of the Flesh,
Half Mother-Fiend, half Maenad: lest the generations fail,
"Armed and engined," fanged and poisoned, for the hunting of the male;

With the morals of the hen-coop, with the Jungle's code of law,
As described by Rudyard Kipling after (some way after) Shaw.
'Tis no doubt a graceful fancy; but the Woman Time has made
Doesn't recognize the likeness so ingeniously portrayed.

And Man knows it, Mr. Poet! Knows your singular ideal
Does not bear the least resemblance to the Woman that is real;
Knows that Woman is not fiend, nor saint, nor mixture of the two,
But an average human being—"most remarkable like you."

—Sydney Low, in The London Standard.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

An infant is deserted by a woman who leaves it in the store of Angers and Son. It is adopted by Celia Brown, who takes it home to "The House of Windows." The child is given the name of Christine Brown. Some time before the desertion, Adam Torrance, the real owner of Angers and Son, has his only child kidnapped. Of this occurrence Celia is ignorant. Adam Torrance hears that his child has died. His wife also dies, and he lives abroad. Sixteen years pass and Christine continues to live with Celia and her blind sister, Ada. Celia is in financial distress and Christine determines to apply for position of "reader" to Miss Torrance. Mark Wareham, nephew of the latter, follows the unsuccessful Christine, and contrives to make her acquaintance. Adam Torrance, who has returned to the city, sends Mark, his nephew, out to British Columbia. Christine secures a position in "the Stores." Christine is followed by a sinister-looking old beggar woman, and is further annoyed by the attentions of Gilbert Van Slyke. The woman, whose daughter's employment in "the Stores" long ago, had led to moral disaster, is determined to wreak vengeance on Christine, whom she had stolen. Adam Torrance visits "The House of Windows" in order to relieve the sisters' distress. He shows them great kindness. On his return home he finds a letter informing him that his daughter is alive and in peril.

SHE answered him that she was quite able to help him with any information which she might have, and that talking did not tire her at all.

"I want to ask you, Miss Brown," began Mr. Torrance, "whether you remember a girl called Alma Stone, and if you can tell us where she went when she left —er— my employment? I may say that my enquiries are entirely for the young lady's benefit— in short, and not to make a mystery, we have learned that she is an adopted child, and it is believed—that it is possible, that we may be able to restore her to—" he hesitated, "to—her home."

Ada looked up with quick interest. How good he was, she thought. How kind of him to take such an interest in the stores. His kindness to Christine had been only the beginning. Even Celia brightened a little as her naturally generous nature realized the prospect of good fortune for a friend.

"I knew Alma quite well," she told him, "though I cannot tell you where she is. Surely it ought to be an easy matter to trace her, but as she often confided in me, perhaps I may be able to tell you some things you wish to know. It is quite true that Alma was adopted when a baby by Mrs. Stone, and she never knew who her real parents were."

"Ah!" The exclamation was almost a gasp and both girls looked up. Celia noticed that her visitor's face was very pale.

'Pardon me! You see, this enquiry is a very important thing. The finding of this young girl means a great deal—to me. I think I am hardly myself when I speak of it. Will you continue, Miss Brown?"

Celia was now thoroughly interested; for the first time since her breakdown she tried to sit up straighter of her own free will. "I think I can tell you all that Alma knows herself," she went on. "She often spoke of it for, though Mr. and Mrs. Stone were very good to her, Alma had the idea that she was—that they were—well, not as high in the social scale as her own parents."

"I don't like that," said Mr. Torrance uneasily. "It sounds rather—"

"Snobbish? Yes. But girls will romance about a mystery. Alma is not really snobbish. And you see even Mr. and Mrs. Stone knew nothing of Alma's parentage, and they rather encouraged her in imagining things. It lent color, I think, to all their lives. Mr. Stone was a country clergyman, and Alma was left at his door when she was a baby about—well, just cutting her first teeth."

Mr. Torrance wiped the perspiration from his forehead.

"As far as she can guess she is now about eighteen years old—"

"Eighteen? Are you sure of that?"

"Yes—Alma has often told me. It was eighteen years ago and just before Christmas that she was deserted on the Stores door-step. Ada, dear, get Mr. Torrance a glass of water."

"Thank you, I do not need it. I am ashamed of myself. These enquiries unnerve me. I think I shall leave the more serious enquiries to an agent after this. I used to pride myself upom my self control, but you see I have none. When you began your story I thought we might have at least come upon the right clue. But the young lady's age proves differently. If you are sure of the eighteen years it practically settles the matter. We shall not drop the case, of course, until we are quite sure; but what you have told me is fairly conclusive. She can scarcely be the young girl for whom we are looking."

"I am sorry," said Celia, "for she had a hard life since her adopted parents died. She could not stand the work in the Stores and had to give it up. I did not know where she went. I ought to have kept in touch with her but I was not well myself and at night I was always so tired"; she sighed. "She was a dear little girl."

"Well, we shall find her and see that she is taken care of."

Celia looked up with a touch of her old bright shrewdness. "If you are going to father the Stores you will have a large family," she said.

"I know that," he answered soberly. "And a month ago the idea appalled me. Now it seems an easy thing. If only—if only this other anxiety were lifted I think I could father all the world and not feel the burden heavy."

When he had gone, the blind girl left her knitting and came over to the sofa where Celia lay. For a moment the two clasped hands without speech, as they often did, and then Ada said softly:

"Oh, Grandma, what great eyes you have!"

It was the old childish formula with which Celia had taught her to ask when she was a little child for information which her lack of sight shut out.

"The better to see with, my dear," answered Celia, smiling. "What is it, dear? Mr. Torrance?"

The blind girl nodded.

"Well, I think you would like his looks, Ada. He is tall but not stiff. His face is pleasant, even handsome. His eyes are dark and his hair also, except for a dash of grey at the temples. It is a distinguished face, straight nose, firm mouth. He looks very pale and worried just now."

"I wonder why?"

"I don't know," listlessly. "About the search, perhaps. His interest seemed very keen."

"Isn't it odd," mused Ada, "that since we adopted Christine we have always been hearing of other people who have done the same thing. Adopted a baby, I mean? Sometimes it seems as if half the world were adopted!"

"It is on the same principle that when you go to have a tooth out, all the world appears to be at the dentist's. We notice more the things which interest us, that's all. I wish you wouldn't talk of it, Ada. Christine is our own—she was never anything else."

The blind girl nodded. "Yes, I feel like that. Of course Christine is different. Do you suppose they will find Alma? It is odd that Mr. Torrance should be so worried. In any case, the lost child could not be anything to him. Tommy says he has no children."

For the second time that day Celia raised herself out of her cushions. A soft red of excitement glowed in her cheeks. "Why, how stupid of me! Of course he had a child. I remember long ago hearing about it. Long before anyone knew that he was the owner of the Stores. He had a baby—why! I remember it all now—it was kidnapped!"

The girls' hands clasped tighter.

"How strange!" said Ada. "Oh, Celia, what if he were looking for his own daughter?"

"If he were, that would explain why he looked as he did—like a man under torture."

"Oh, Celia, how dreadful he must have felt!"

Celia had gone very pale. "I am glad I did not tell him quite all I knew about poor Alma," she said.

Chapter XXIII.

ONE wonders what psychological fact lies back of such commonplaces as "It never rains but it pours," and "Troubles never come singly." Is there indeed a power in trouble to attract trouble? Has sorrow some sad affinity for sorrow? Or is it all just chance that joy so often comes to the joyful and grief to those already stricken? To Adam Torrance making his way slowly home from Brook Street, it seemed that he at least was safe from new calamity. Fate had surely expended all the slings and arrows that the most outrageous fortune might demand. Things would brighten soon; Johnson would find a clue, Mark would soon be home; this nightmare of uncertainty and suspense must end before long! He heard the newsboys calling "Extra!" as he went along, but so sure was he of the safeguard of his own misery that he did not even glance at the paper.

As he entered the hall of his own home, Benson, the solemn butler, came forward with something almost like anxiety upon his well-trained face. "What is it, Benson?" The question was uninterested.

"Mr. Mark is here, sir. He arrived on the afternoon train, sir!"

"Mark! That's good news—"

"Excuse me, sir. Mr. Mark has had a little accident, sir. He has been hurt. Not seriously, we hope, sir. We tried to get you everywhere on the 'phone!"

Fortune had evidently not finished with Adam Torrance yet. "Mark hurt!" he repeated in a dazed way.

"Not seriously, sir, we hope. The doctors are with him at present. Miss Torrance—"

"Come in here, Adam!" sounded the unmistakable voice of Miss Torrance from the library. "You can't go up to the boy yet. The doctors are making an examination."

Mr. Torrance handed his hat to the butler and went slowly back into the library. After the sharp shock of the news about Mark the presence of Aunt Miriam seemed a minor wonder.

"There's nothing to look so white about!" said that lady sharply. "The boy isn't dead! He'll be as good as ever in a week or so."

"How did it happen?"

"Dear knows—or the street railway company! Didn't you hear about the accident? The newsboys have been shouting it for the last hour. A street car collision, no one killed."

"And Mark?"

"Not seriously hurt, the doctors say—not that they know anything about it. Benson telephoned me, said he couldn't get you anywhere. I suppose you are wondering how I got here? It just goes to prove what I said all along, that I am not such an entire invalid as it suits the doctors to suppose. My place was here—and I came!"

Mr. Torrance smiled faintly. "You were always wonderful, Miriam," he said.

"What puzzles me," continued Miss Torrance, "is how Mark happened to be in the car at all. Why didn't he telephone for the auto? Although I suppose that if he had done so the auto would have exploded. I am not a fatalist, but I believe in fate in those cases. And why weren't you at the station to meet him? Didn't you know that he was coming home to-day?"

"No, he did not telegraph. I expected him any time."

"That's odd; Adam, is there anything between you and Mark? Any unpleasantness—over that letter of mine?"

"No, nothing! Mark knew nothing about it."

The little old lady gave a sigh of relief. "Thank goodness! I was beginning to imagine things. It is against my principles to interfere in other people's business. I wrote that letter in spite of my principles and I am surprised that I did not do more harm. I am not a pessimist but I suppose the trouble is yet to come."

"There will be no trouble. Mark would not quarrel with me for the sake of a girl."

Miss Torrance closed her eyes. "No one has ever quarreled with anyone for the sake of a girl, of course!" she said sarcastically. "The question is—hush! I hear the doctors coming!"

The quick ears of the invalid were not mistaken for there was a murmur of voices upon the stair and next moment the two doctors entered the library. Their faces were grave, but not, as the anxious watchers were quick to note, sombre.

"He will do well, I think," said the older doctor, shaking Mr. Torrance's hand. "The broken arm is a simple matter and the injury to the head is not of so serious a nature as we at first supposed. In fact, I think we may relieve you of all anxiety."

"That is good news indeed," said Adam Torrance. "You say there is an injury to the head?"

"Yes, but you must not let it alarm you. There will be delirium. Try to keep his mind at ease. If he has any fancies, gratify them. He must not excite himself. Otherwise there is really no cause for anxiety. The nurse has arrived and knows her duties."

Miss Torrance sniffed audibly. She did not approve of nurses.

"If the patient appears to worry she will let you know at once," went on the doctor. "Although I think it unlikely. So fortunate a young man is not likely to have many ungratified fancies."

"Think so?" snapped Miss Torrance. "That just shows how little you doctors know. Mark is just as likely as the rest of us to want something that he can't have." She threw a slightly malicious glance in the direction of her brother, who calmly ignored it.

"Well, well!" said the doctor, smiling. "We will hope not. People with broken heads must be indulged. A deplorable affair, this accident, Mr. Torrance. This street railway company is the curse of our city. Their negligence of the most elementary precautions is notorious. Shameful!"

"I am afraid we do not think of it save when our own suffer," said Mr. Torrance. "I must confess to the common failing. Is the boy conscious yet? Might I—will it be possible to see him soon?"

Dr. Mackenzie looked at his colleague, who nodded solemnly.

"Perhaps for a few moments," he decided. "But do not allow him to talk. He may know you or he may not. In the latter event do not show alarm. It is a natural consequence of his present state. The nurse will be present—a most capable woman. I shall call again later. Miss Torrance, if I may have the honor of driving you safely home—"

"Thank you, doctor. No, I shall stay here. My maid can make me comfortable, or if not, then I shall have to be uncomfortable. I do not budge until Mark is better."

"Wonderful!" exclaimed the doctor. "Your spirit is wonderful, my dear Miss Torrance. I only hope your body may not suffer for it afterwards."

"My dear man, don't fuss! You know I cannot stand fuss. If you miss your daily call at Amberley Avenue, go and call on Jane. She has been eating too much sweet stuff and thinks she is getting the measles." She waved him away with quick gestures of her transparent hands and the big doctor accepted his dismissal with good grace.

"Miriam," said her brother, "It is like you to want to stay, but if it will injure your health—"

"It can not injure what I haven't got, and I am going to stay. Give me your arm, Adam. I want to go and see the boy. I must get a look at the nurse. I don't believe in nurses. Never saw one yet who didn't need more waiting on than the patient. I hope you have plenty of servants? With a nurse to do for, one might just as well prepare to entertain royalty—", and grumbling in a voice which she tried in vain to render subdued, she toiled up the wide and shallow stair case leaning upon her brother's arm. The nurse (who might easily have heard the remarks upon her possible character) met them at the door and motioned her into silence.

Mark was lying upon the bed. Such a strange Mark, with bandaged arm and white swathed head and restless eyes, bright with fever. Mr. Torrance thought with quick concern that even without the bandages he looked thinner and older than when he went away. There was a peculiar odor, also, in the room. An odor which recalled to him with strange vividness the room in which his wife had died. He shuddered.

"Pshaw!" said Aunt Miriam. "It's only antiseptics!"

"Hush!" The nurse raised a protesting finger, but the patient on the bed laughed weakly.

"Hullo, Auntie!" he said, but his eyes wandered past his adopted father unseeingly.

"Mark," said Mr. Torrance.

"I can't attend to you just now, Mr. Macgregor," siad Mark, in a matter of fact tone. "I want to talk to Auntie."

"Don't you know me, Mark?"

"Certainly, Macgregor. I'd know you anywhere. But don't bother me. I'm not going any farther with you this trip. I'm wanted at home."

"But, dear boy—"

"Don't argue with him!" warned the nurse.

Again the sick man's fancy veered. He looked up into his Uncle's face with a mischievous smile.

"Sly old Auntie!" he whispered, "Weren't you afraid to tell that fib?"

Adam Torrance drew back with a sigh. "He doesn't know me at all, "he said. "You try, Miriam."

The little old lady bent tremulously over him.

"Do you know me, Mark?"

Her voice seemed to touch a train of memory. "Did you bring her?" he asked, anxiously. "You had her, you know. Where is she?"

"You are exciting the patient," said the nurse coldly. Miss Torrance waved her away.

"Who is it you want me to bring, Mark?"

But he had lost the thread again. "I want a bun," he said. "No, not a bun, a red waggon—no, that doesn't sound right. How funny!" He began to laugh weakly.

"I must ask you to leave the patient now," interposed the nurse. "Excitement is bad for him."

"If he wants anything, he ought to get it. The doctor said so," declared Aunt Miriam, stubbornly.

"Certainly—if you know what it is he wants. I presume," with a little prim smile, "that it is not a bun or a red waggon."

"I used to give him buns when he was a child," said the old lady with a suspicious choke.

Suddenly the unbandaged arm on the bed shot out and Mark's hand grasped hers convulsively. For a moment his eyes seemed clear. "Auntie! Did you bring her?"

"Say 'Yes,'" commanded the nurse.

"Yes, certainly," said Aunt Miriam. "Go to sleep!" A faint smile spread over the invalid's face. "Good old Auntie!" he said, but as she bent over him to say good night, he did not know her. Calling her Miss O'Hara, he warned her not to forget the "O."

The nurse motioned them both away, peremptorily, and following them into the next room, closed the door.

"He is showing more excitement than the doctors expected," she said thoughtfully. "It will be well to quiet him if we can. Perhaps it would be possible to have the young lady in the house in case he frets for her again."

"What young lady?" asked Miss Torrance sharply.

The nurse seemed mildly surprised.

"The one he asked for," she replied. "I presumed that you would know."

"I don't know. I have no idea. I know of no one whom he could possibly want! Do you, Adam?"

Mr. Torrance shook his head.

"Then it is someone whom you do not know," concluded the nurse placidly.

The brother and sister exchanged a quick and guilty look. A look which the nurse saw and interpreted in her own way. "It may not be absolutely necessary to send for her," she said practically. "Perhaps I can quiet him. I'll try." She disappeared into the patient's room.

"What impudence!" snapped Aunt Miriam.

"What did she mean?" asked Adam Torrance. 'Did she think that we were deliberately—"

"Lying? Yes, she did. She evidently thinks that we know of someone whom Mark—do you suppose he might be wanting to see Alice Van Slyke, Adam?"

"No. In fact I may say that I am quite sure that it is not Miss Van Slyke. He told me as much before he went away."

"Perhaps he has met someone in Vancouver," suggested Miss Torrance nervously.

"Perhaps—I don't know."

They exchanged another guilty look and then Aunt Miriam gave in.

"I am afraid you do know," she said ruefully. "I am afraid we both know that he does not want anyone in Vancouver."

"You think it is—"

"I am quite sure it is."

"You are sure he was really taken with Miss—er—"

"Brown. Yes, Adam. I'm afraid I'm sure."

Adam Torrance smiled, but he was not the man to remain undecided in such an emergency. "Then we must send for Miss Brown," he said drily.

"Do you know where to send, Adam?"

"No," still more drily, "but I shouldn't be at all surprised if you do."

Miss Torrance had the face to blush. "Well," she declared, "perhaps it's lucky for us all that I do know. I thought I was a sentimental fool for taking the girl's address, but she interested me. I'm sure the address was enough to frighten anyone. She lives in Brook Street—actually! Number 1620, I think, room 26—fancy living in a room with a number!"

"Brook Street!" exclaimed Mr. Torrance. "You can't mean Brook Street? Why, it is in Brook Street that some of my employees live. (I was there this afternoon). Those other Miss Browns of whom I told you live there. It can't be the same? You said yourself they were not the same! You remember? When I asked you if she worked in a store? You said, No." Mr. Torrance's excitement was making him slightly incoherent.

"She didn't work in any store—when I saw her," said Miss Torrance. Her brother eyed her sternly. "But she may have afterwards. How was I to know?"

"The young lady of whom I spoke to you," said Mr. Torrance, "was called Christine."

Aunt Miriam tried to look surprised. "How very strange! I believe that the young lady of whom I spoke to you was called Christine, also."

The opening of the door interrupted his answer. "Excuse me, Mr. Torrance," said the nurse. "But the patient is very restless. The lady he seems to wish to see is called Christine. I don't know—"

"Thank you, nurse. I think that is all that is necessary. She shall be sent for."

"You need not look like that!" said Miss Torrance, recovering. "I really did not know whether the Miss Brown in whom you were interested was the same Miss Brown in whom Mark—was interested! I may have suspected. But it was quite true that, when I saw her, she did not work in any store. And you said yourself that you wished to consider her case without prejudice."

"I am not blaming you, Miriam. It is probably as well that I did not know—I can hardly realize it now that I do know. It seems too fantastic. I feel like a child who has frightened itself into a bogie which never existed.'

Meaning?—"

"Meaning the other Miss Brown! I may as well say at once," he went on simply, "that if Mark is in love with Miss Christine, I can wish him happiness. She is as sweet as she is beautiful and, Miriam, whatever her name may be, she is a lady!"

"Hoity, toity!" said Miss Miriam, "Whoever aid she wasn't?"

Mr. Torrance's grave face brightened. One threatened calamity had not turned out so badly after all. One cloud had already cleared and the bogie of Miss Brown had vanished for ever. In her place stood Christine! He wondered why the mere thought of her made his heart feel warm.

"Do you think she will come?" he asked.

Miss Miriam thought that she would. Even if she did not care at all for Mark she would probably not refuse to see him.

But fate, tireless in concocting evil, had still another blow in store; for when the automobile returned she did not come. Instead, there was Ada, very pale, her poor eyes red with tears, and Tommy with bad news in every line of his anxious face.

Christine, they said, was gone. She had not come home as usual from the Stores. She had sent no word. She was not with any of their few friends. Christine had disappeared!

Chapter XXIV.

"BUT where is she?"

Even as he spoke Adam Torrance realized the foolishness of his words. Tommy's stern face and Ada's tears were eloquent of that unanswered question.

"She can't possibly be really gone, you know," said Aunt Miriam. "She may very well have a friend ofwhom you have not thought. It is not late yet. She may have had dinner somewhere and gone on to the theatre."

Ada gave a half hysterical laugh. "Oh, no," she said. "You do not understand. One does not have dinner and go on to the theatre—in Brook Street!"

"We have been searching since half past six o'clock," said Tommy. "Were there any natural explanation of her absence we should have found her long ago."

"But my dear Mr. —"

"Burns," said Tommy.

"My dear Mr. Burns, what can possibly have happened?"

"We do not know. When this message from Mr. Torrance came we thought at first that it brought news; but as it was only a request for her to come here we thought it wise to come and tell you."

"We thought," said Ada softly, "that you might be able to help us."

"We shall certainly do that," said Mr. Torrance, and to give his assurance greater weight he drew his chair closer to hers and let his firm hand rest a moment upon her trembling one. "There must be a very simple explanation somewhere. But it may need a trained mind to find it. Fortunately, the very man we need is in the house—or should be." He rang the bell and when the butler appeared, "Benson, is Mr. Johnson here yet?"

"Yes, sir. He said he had an appointment, sir. He is in the small reception room."

"Ask him to kindly step this way."

"You see," he explained to his puzzled guests, "I am engaged at present in a search myself and this is the hour at which Mr. Johnson makes his report. If we tell him your difficulty—"

"Oh!" Ada drew a deep breath of relief, but Tommy's face grew more troubled.

"Must it be made public?" he asked uneasily.

The blind girl's sightless eyes turned to him in surprise. "Why not?" she asked.

There was something in the simple question which made the blood rush into Tommy's round face. "Only that publicity is not pleasant," he answered stiffly.

"But it need not be made public at all," Mr. Torrance answered them. "Mr. Johnson is a private detective and—"

"Mr. Johnson, sir," announced Benson, throwing open the door.

The big detective surveyed the agitated group with a benevolent air and the effect of his entrance was not unlike that of a doctor into a sick room. He brought confidence into the midst of fear. True, he was only a man with a brain like other men's and no abnormal faculty for the solving of mysteries; but his strength lay in the fact that mystery did not appal him or rob him of his confidence. He lived, as it were, on mystery and long familiarity had, as usual, bred contempt. This serene being listened to Ada's faltered story with an air encouragingly blase. He did not falter into surprised and purposeless questioning, like Mr. Torrance, nor did he suggest dinner and theatres, like his bewildered sister; instead, he merely said, "Ah!" and one felt immediately that this was the acme of wisdom.

"We will, first of all, get the facts," said he, briskly, producing a serviceable note book. Ada, who had just finished telling her story, looked slightly bewildered and Mr. Torrance interposed with—

"I think that Miss Brown has already told you all she knows."

The detective smiled. "And also a great deal that she does not know," he agreed, blandly. "When one knows very little one naturally theorizes a great deal. But at this stage theorizing will not help us. We must get nothing but the facts. Therefore you will excuse me if I put a few questions.

"How long has your sister been employed in Angers & Son?"

Ada gave the required dates and they saw them duly recorded in the note-book.

"Her age?"

"Sixteen—or thereabouts."

"Or thereabouts?" in surprise.

Poor Ada blushed. "I am not absolutely sure within a few months," she faltered.

"Surely a month or two does not matter, Johnson?" Mr. Torrance's tone was impatient.

"Perhaps not, in this case; but in some cases even a day or two might make every difference. Well, then—was the young lady pretty, homely, or—just ordinary?"

"I can answer that," said Miss Torrance. "Miss Brown was far more than merely pretty, she was, in fact, unusually lovely."

"Ah!" said the detective. Tommy moved uneasily.

"In what part of the Stores did her work lie?"

"At the ribbon counter."

"That is the counter just opposite the main entrance?"

"Yes."

"Had she ever, within the last few weeks or months, spoken of going away anywhere?"

"No."

"Where would she be likely to visit had she had such a holiday in view?"

"Nowhere—really, there is nowhere. We know so few people— none whom Christine would be likely to care to visit."

"No school friend?"

"Christine had school friends but she never went to their homes, because they might not have cared to come to ours."

"How about relations?"

"We are absolutely alone."

"And I understand you to say that you have already enquired at every place where you think she might possibly have gone?"

"Every place."

"And now, pardon me, but you know one must have no secrets from a detective—was there a young man in the case?"

"Oh!" Ada's exclamation was a gasp. "Certainly not," she added with dignity.

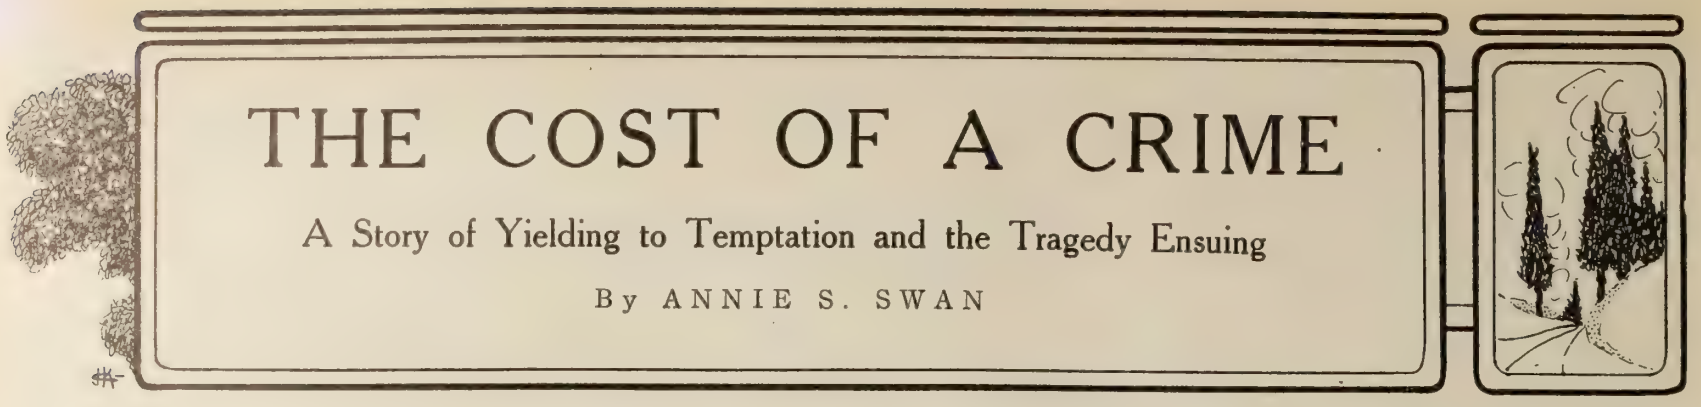
The detective made a note and then looked up. This time he looked at Tommy, who was very red. "You had better speak out if you know anything," he advised him.

"I! Why I can't—I—I don't know anything!" stuttered poor Tommy.

"Oh," said the detective, with a meaning glance. "Well, see you later! In the meantime—" But Ada's voice broke in sharply—

"Tommy—what is it? Oh, Tommy, do you know anything you haven't told?"

Continued on page 35



THE COST OF A CRIME

A Story of Yielding to Temptation and the Tragedy Ensuing

By ANNIE S. SWAN

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Reedham steals thirteen thousand pounds of trust money, held by the firm of Lowther, Currie and Company, in London, England. He confesses to his friend, Lidgate, who allows him to escape, and who afterwards informs Mrs. Reedham of the crime. The only child, Leslie, is at school in Surrey. Leslie is brought home from school. Reedham, in the meantime, has found shelter in lodgings with Mrs. Webber, an old servant, and assumes the name of Thomas Charlton. He obtains employment with Archibald Currie, a brother of his former partner and is unrecognized.

"HE has left his situation," he added, and in a word explained what had happened. Her eyes filled with tears.

"He is so loyal to his father's memory, it is a perfect passion with him. And so jealous he is, too, about it. I believe he would cease to care for me if he thought I could forget."

"It is a fine trait, later he will get more sense of proportion," observed Lidgate quietly. "I'll do what I can for him to-morrow, I promise you. And wherever he may go he will not find the time he has been in the Clapton shop lost. It will have taught him to appreciate better things. And now, let us talk about yourself. You are sadly changed. You have had a terrible year."

"Not quite terrible; there have been gleams of peace," she said, but her eyes did not meet his. "How did you like America?"

"Oh, it is not new to me, I went as far as the Argentine," he added carelessly. Her lips parted in breathless interest.

"That is where you thought John would go. You did not hear anything, I suppose?"

"No, I made very full enquiries. Of course, it is difficult to find a man there, and he might easily evade recognition, but I am nearly certain that he never left this country."

"And equally certain that he is dead, perhaps," she said in a dispirited voice.

Lidgate made no reply.

He could not tell her of the visits he had paid to mortuaries, where unclaimed and unidentified bodies could be seen, neither could he say that certain news of John Reedham's death would simplify life for a good many people.

"I must go on hoping with Leslie that something will happen, that things will be cleared up; though the sort of life I have been living lately does not conduce to cheerfulness," she went on, after a brief space.

"You have had a terrible year, and Leslie tells me you have sordid anxiety now."

She neither denied nor admitted. Lidgate sat forward in his chanr and began to speak rapidly.

"I cannot bear to see you like this, and there is no reason why I should bear it. I am, comparatively speaking, a rich man. I cannot, even if I would, spend my money on myself. I have few ties, none of them binding or obligatory. You must let me help you for old acquaintance sake, if for no other reason. Try to think of me as a brother, and let me order you to leave Clapton."

He tried to speak with a sort of bantering gaiety and an assumption of naturalness which did not in the least deceive her.

"You have already done too much in becoming guarantee for my rent. I am afraid you will have to make that guarantee good this time. I have not been able to get the money together."

"For heaven's name don't speak of it. I can't bear it. I tell you it is a mere bagatelle. Don't let it ever be mentioned between us. But honestly, now, do you think it is any good keeping on this house, or in pursuing the life which you admit can't bring you in a living wage?"

"Can you suggest a substitute for it, one which would come within the region of possibility?" she asked with a faint smile.

"I will think of it. Meanwhile the first thing is to get something better for Leslie. Have you ever met Archibald Currie, Mrs. Reedham?"

"Once or twice at Fair Lawn. A delightful man, I thought him, and I often said to John it seemed incredible that he and James could be brothers."

"Many have had such a thought. It would be a fine thing for Leslie to get into his office in New Broad Street. I shall call there to-morrow morning and see if he can suggest anything. It is the sort of thing he would delight to do. The record of his good deeds in the city would fill a book."

"Thank you very much., I shall indeed be grateful if you will do that. It would be the making of Leslie. He does not lack brains, Mr. Lidgate."

They used to be George and Bessie to one another in the old days of their friendship, but in the last year had adopted by common consent the more formal address. In Lidgate's case at least it was a safeguard.

"I am sure that Leslie has plenty of brains. He is a bit fiery and impulsive, and takes strong likes and dislikes. He does not care much about me for instance."

"Oh, I am sure you are mistaken," she said, but her color faintly rose.

"No, I don't think we make mistakes of that kind, but I understand his feelings, partly at least, and can respect him for it."

She did not ask him to explain, and when she spoke again it was of a different theme.

"Miss Wrede came to see me twice after it all happened, once just before I left Norwood and once here. But I am afraid I was not very cordial to her when she came last."

"Don't you like her? Everybody reports her charming, and Stephen Currie is madly in love with her."

"She is very clever and bright I think and—and dangerously sympathetic. I did not want to become intimate with her, Mr. Lidgate, and if she had gone on coming it must have ended in that."

"You were quite frank with her, then?"

"Yes, I told her I would prefer that she did not come, that I should always be grateful to her for her sympathy and would send for her if I were in any special trouble."

"And she understood?"

"She quite understood. That is what I say, she is dangerously sympathetic; one would talk too much to her. It is better not to see her."

"But for you it would have been good."

"No, bad, thoroughly bad, and besides I wanted to be detached from all those who knew me in happier times. But I cannot conceive of her and Stephen Currie."

"I don't think she encourages him, but everyone knows of Stephen's infatuation. In fact it won't hide."

Bessie Reedham sat still for a moment, and then looked him more straightly in the face than she had yet done.

"Tell me truly. Is the loss so great as was said at the time John disappeared?"

"Yes, it was in no way exaggerated."

"And how was it met?"

"The firm met it," he replied evading her straight look.

"Then it is Sir Philip Lowther and James Currie and you who are actually out of pocket."

"Yes, I suppose so, if you put it like that."

"And how much? Tell me the exact sum."

"Why open up all this painful business again?" he asked almost impatiently. "It can make no difference now."

"Oh, yes it can. It will be Leslie's debt. He has set it before him as a goal. Poor boy, it is a dreadful millstone about his neck even now, but I believe that it is a debt he will live to discharge."

"I hope he will not allow it to trouble him unduly; to be a millstone as you describe it," observed Lidgate, as he rose to his feet. "Well, I must go, and I will write to you to-morrow after I have seen Archibald Currie."

"You are very, very good to me," she murmured. Lidgate merely shook his head.

"I have done very little. Good-bye. You will hear from me to-morrow."

He left the house rather abruptly and retraced his steps to the station in doubt whether the visit had been a success. At least it had stayed the longing he had had to see her once more, and convinced him, if he needed any convincing, that he had not forgotten her in the smallest degree. She was ten thousand times more attractive to him now in her poverty and loneliness than she had ever been in the days of her happiest fortune.

He reached his chambers in the Albany half an hour late for dinner, a most unusual occurrence in his methodical, well-ordered life. His valet, Grimston, regarded him with a furtive anxiety, as he waited on him, fully conscious that something ailed his master. He ate sparingly that evening, and had very few remarks to make. Grimston saw that he was preoccupied, and full of serious thought, and began to fear that further business troubles might be looming ahead. Grimston had proved, even in his uneventful life, that misfortunes come not as single spies, but in battalions.

The real trend of his master's thoughts would have surprised and dismayed him had they suddenly been revealed. Grimston's fears regarding the amenity of that comfortable bachelor establishment had not received any shocks for a long time, and he had arrived at the definite conclusion that Lidgate was not a marrying man.

He went out immediately after he had drank his coffee, lighting a favorite cigar as he left the house. In the street he hailed the first hansom, and gave the address of Hyde Park Square, where he arrived soon after nine o'clock. He was not on terms of sufficient intimacy with Archibald Currie to warrant dropping in of an evening for a friendly visit, but he knew enough of the man to feel assured at least that it would not be resented, and that the nature of his errand would be sufficient to justify a departure from the usual routine. In the daytime they were both busy men with their time fully occupied, and a quiet half an hour at night would be infinitely better for arranging something concerning the future of Reedham's son.

Mr. Currie was at home, the butler informed him, but was engaged for a few moments. Would he step in? As Lidgate put his hat down in the inner hall the door of a room at the further side suddenly opened, and Katherine Wrede appeared. She started a little at the sight of Lidgate, and, then recognizing him, came forward with a ready smile.

"Mr. Lidgate, isn't it? You wish to see my uncle? He is engaged for a few moments. Will you come in here?"

Lidgate thanked her with his pleasant smile, and followed her into the room she had just left; once the morning room, but which Katherine had converted into a small drawing-room, where she sat a great deal. The big double drawing-room on the first floor was now seldom used, except on the occasion of the large and rather stately dinner parties which Archibald Currie gave once or twice in the course of a year.

"We have not met for a very long time, Mr. Lidgate," she said. "Did I hear from someone that you had been to America, or have I dreamed it?"

"You heard aright; I have only just returned—last Saturday, in fact."

"You had a pleasant voyage, I hope. My uncle won't be long. He is engaged with a gentleman from the office. He dined with us this evening, and they have had a little private matter to discuss. They may be back here again. Has the man taken your name to uncle, I wonder?"

"It doesn't matter," said Lidgate quickly. "I shall be very glad of an opportunity to talk to you. You might even be interested in the matter about which I have come to-night."

He could not help admiring her as she sat under the soft shade of the lamp, the delicate light falling on her beautiful face and giving wonderful sheen and richness to the folds of her brown velvet gown. It was a very simply-made gown, all straight lines and folds, but it had true artistic effect.

"I am sure I shall, if it interests you. Tell me about it."

"I have been this evening to see Mrs. Reedham—you know who I mean?"

Her face instantly assumed an expression of the deepest interest.

"Mrs. Reedham—why, yes, of course. Tell me about her, all about her, at once. I would like to go to see her sometimes, but—but she told me quite frankly it would be better not; and when she said it, from her point of view, it really seemed better. But I often think about her. How is she getting on?"

"Not well," he answered without hesitation. "It is a frightfully sad case, and a case which it is difficult, if not impossible to help."

"Is—is she in need of any kind?" she enquired, with a wistful, eager note in her voice. "It is dreadful to associate her with such a question; but you know how I, and a great many other people, feel about her, and how terrible it is to stand by and do nothing."

"I quite understand. She has had a very bad year. She has had boarders at her house in Clapton, but she is not the sort of woman to make such a business pay. She gives them too much for their money. I am afraid she is very poor. I wished to talk over her affairs with Mr. Currie, if he would give me a few minutes of his time. If he would take the boy and give him a helping hand, that would mean everything to them. I would take him myself at London Wall, but, as you know, I am only a junior partner, and I would not dare to suggest it."

"Don't I know it?" she said, with a little grimace. "It is a very sad case, hedged about with every conceivable kind of difficulty and hardship. She is so innocent and so sweet. It is hard how the innocent have to suffer in this world. The injustice of it all often stings me."

Her voice quickened, and her eyes were full of eloquent feeling.

"I am so glad you have come to Uncle Archie. He will think of some way. He always does. At Christmas he sent her twenty pounds anonymously, and he has sometimes spoken about her. But when I saw her she was doing well with her boarders, and she told me quite frankly she was not in need of anything, except to be left alone to live her own life."

Lidgate nodded.

"She told me that to-night—I mean what passed between you—but I think she may have regretted it. She is very lonely now, it is easy to see."

"Then I will go again. I should like to go to-morrow, perhaps," said Katherine eagerly.

"I would wait a little," he counseled. "At least till we have settled something between us. You understand how more than willing I am to help her, only in my case it is even more difficult than in yours."

"I can see that. You were very intimate with John Reedham, were you not?"

"We were like brothers once. We lodged together in our young manhood for seven years, and —and we both loved the same woman."

The words were out before he could keep them back, and though his face flushed a little, he was conscious of a sudden and sweet relief.

Of one thing, at least, he could be sure that Katherine Wrede would not misunderstand. She possessed in a very rare degree the gift of sympathetic intuition, which so often dispenses with the need for words.

"Oh, how you interest me!" she said, leaning forward with a soft beautiful light in her eyes. "And yet how terribly sad it all is! I have never understood how a man like Reedham could go wrong. He had everything to keep him right. Has the mystery ever been cleared up?"

He shook his head.

"It will never be now, I fear."

The significance of his words were not lost upon her.

"You believe that he committed suicide," she said, with parted lips.

He nodded.

"In my own mind I have not the slightest doubt of it. How else could he have eluded the vigilance of the police?"

"It has been done," she suggested. "One night Major Polock, from Scotland Yard was dining here, and it made me quite creepy to hear him talking about the number of mysterious disappearances there are in London. Men, and women too, simply fall out, and are heard of no more. They go out from their homes in the morning apparently in good health and spirits, and without any pressing cares, and they never come back."

"They have ulterior motives, I should say, in every case. They leave London and hide themselves in other countries."

"The Major says not. He says more than half create new personalities, new careers, new environments for themselves, in fact, become different people."

Lidgate did not seem credulous.

"Such a course would not have been possible to poor Reedham. I am forced to the conclusion that there were wheels within wheels, a portion of his life that we never suspected. And I am certain, as certain as one can be of anything for which there is no ocular proof, that he is dead."

"It would be better so, perhaps, and one day in the future you may perhaps comfort his poor wife."

"I would marry her now, Miss Wrede, but I dare not ask her. She is still absolutely devoted to his memory."

"Ah, but one cannot live forever on memory," she reminded him. "I do hope it may come to pass. You have been so truly a friend to her, you deserve happiness. And I shall always be glad that I have known this."

"I had no intentions of telling you. I betrayed myself because you are so sympathetic. I have not yet ceased wondering at myself."

She smiled, and at the moment held up a warning finger.

"Hark, I hear them coming out of the library."

At the moment the drawing-room door opened and Archibald Currie, a fine and picturesque figure in his velvet coat, appeared. He nodded pleasantly to Lidgate.

"I shall be with you in a moment, Mr. Lidgate. Charlton is going, Katherine, come and bid him good-night."

They left the door ajar, and Lidgate could see out into the spacious hall The man they called Charlton stood under the hall lamp, a figure of ease and grace. His clean-shaven face showed clear-cut as a cameo against the bright light. It was not familiar to Lidgate, yet somehow it interested him deeply. As Charlton turned to bid Miss Wrede good-night, he glanced back and saw Lidgate where he stood before the fireplace in the inner room. He turned away with such sharpness that Katherine Wrede was surprised. Almost before the door closed upon him he took out his handkerchief to wipe the cold sweat drops from his brow.

CHAPTER VI.

A BUSY EVENING.

"WHO is that man?" enquired Lidgate bluntly. The unusual question naturally surprised them, but Mr. Currie replied frankly enough.

"One of my clerks, of whom I wished to know a little more than can be learned in business hours. His name is Charlton."

"Charlton!" repeated Lidgate, musingly. "I thought I knew him, I must have made a mistake. Pray excuse the question."

"Why, certainly, and how are you after your American trip, Mr. Lidgate? You look very fit."

"I am all right, thank you."

"I hope you enjoyed it?"

"Yes, I think I did, but I am not a keen traveler. I am afraid London hos got me body and soul, I am restless away from her, and she quickly lures me back."

The elder man shook his head.

"That I can't understand. Has my brother mentioned that I have serious thoughts of retiring one of these days?"

"Don't, Mr. Currie. Recall to your remembrance all the men you have known who have quitted active life at your age, and the results. I think that you will find that these results have been almost without exception disastrous. Slacken off a bit by all means, and take this young lady to see a bit of the world, but don't retire."

"Do you hear that rank heresy, Kate?" enquired Mr. Currie, with a smile, which had a certain amount of triumph in it. "Yes, she is the culprit."

"Women usually are," answered Lidgate with an answering smile. "And very often they merely prepare a rod for their own backs."

"Oh, you wicked man!" cried Katherine, shaking her finger at him. "Just when I had got Uncle Archie nearly persuaded, you come in with your horrid warnings! Don't you see how he is pining for the country and fresh air and quiet occupations?"

Lidgate laughed outright.

"I don't see anything of the kind, I am glad to say, Miss Wrede. I gaze upon a remarkably hale and handsome man, with more energy in his little finger than most men, and myself, perhaps," he added with a touch of gay banter, "have in my whole anatomy."

"That may could be true of you; I could very well believe it," she replied demurely. "But by admitting it you damage your case. He ought not to be so full of energy. If he could rest more and take it easy the necessity would not be so urgent. But, as you know, he simply lives every moment of his days with his whole might."

"The only way to live, believe me, Kate. A short life and a full if not a merry one, is surely the most satisfying for every man."

"And he fills up the very scanty leisure he permits himself with doing things for other people. Even you, Mr. Lidgate, would be astonished at the sum of them."

"Perhaps not; I hear of them too often," he answered. "And I am afraid you will look askance at me because I have come to ask him to do one more."

"You may regard it as done," she said with an affectionate glance at her guardian. "Well, if you will excuse me, I shall go to the library; I have two notes to write. I shall see you before you go, Mr. Lidgate."

Lidgate's eyes followed her to the door.

"A most beautiful creature," he said with a faint, involuntary sigh, which seemed to embody regret over his lost youth.

"She is indeed, and all heart. The combination is rare; so often the beautiful casket is empty of soul. I bless God for having sent her to me at a time when I must necessarily have begun to feel more acutely that sense of personal loneliness which is the cross of a solitary man. You ought to marry, Lidgate, before it is too late. Why have you never married?"

He leaned back in his chair as he put the question with that kindly solicitude which so often compelled confidence, and which could never be in any circumstances offensive.

Lidgate's face flushed a little.

"Well, sir, since you have asked the question, I will be frank. The only woman I have ever cared about married another man."

"Ah," said Archibald Currie with an understanding nod. "Pray excuse me, I did not pause to remember that perhaps I might be probing an old wound. I am very sorry, but doubtless you have had your compensations?"

"No," said Lidgate, with a sudden fierceness, "I have not had any compensations. And of late I have had to stand by and see her suffer acutely, and know myself powerless to help, precluded, indeed, by my position from offering any help."

"A trying experience; very tryin. I had no idea of this, Mr. Lidgate; I offer you my sincere sympathy. You bear it like a man."

"I doubt it very much," said Lidgate gloomily. "May I now tell you what I have come about?"

"Surely, and if Katherine said, if to help you, or any protege of yours is in my power, you may look upon it as done."

"It is about John Reedham's boy I have come. He wants to be taken by the hand; I would like to do it myself, to take him in at London Wall, but you can appreciate the difficulties in the way."

"Ah, surely, of course I can," replied Archibald Currie, as the vision of his brother's stern face rose up before him. "What age is the lad? Bless me, I had forgotten about him. I have often spoken to my ward about his mother, but I might have done something for the boy before this."

"He has not required it. Up till June of this year he was at school in Surrey with some friends of his mother, the school he had been at for the last four years. He was very loth to go back, the youngster had the chivalrous desire to help his mother, and it was only when it was pointed out that another year at school would better equip him for his purpose that he consented to remain. When he came home at midsummer, three weeks before the usual time on account of an epidemic that had broken out in the school, I was in America. There was no one to hold him back. The young rascal went out on his own, so to speak, and took a book-keeper's place in a petty tradesman's shop out Clapton way."

"I like that, it showed a manly spirit, said Archibald Currie, with a well-pleased look on his face.

"It was not a suitable place for the boy, however, and he has never been happy there. Last night I saw him, and he had been paid off."

"Ah, poor lad, then he is in immediate need of a situation?"

"Yes. He is almost fifteen, I believe, but he is very well grown for his age; a fine, intelligent, handsome boy, though he has inherited his father's impulsive temperament and quick temper."

"These may help him, if they are properly guided," said the old man musingly. "They go hand in hand usually with other and more valuable qualities. It was a tragedy that! Poor Reedham! Have you any theory about him?"

"My theory can be put into few words. I believe him to be dead."

"But how? when? where?" enquired Currie, struck by the confidence with which the words were spoken.

Reedham shook his head.

"These questions, of course, I can't answer, but I have the conviction. There are many suicides in London in the course of a year that are never identified, and some even that never come to light at all."

"It sounds ghastly. How is his poor wife bearing up?"

"Not well; she has had a hard year. If you can do anything for the boy you will lighten her burden, Mr. Currie. If you could take him to Old Broad Street I should be most grateful. I hardly like to suggest it, but if it is the custom of your office to take premiums I should be only too glad to pay, because I can't take him as I should like to do at our own place."

"Tut, tut. I am the head of my concern. I can do as I like, and Reedham's boy shall come most certainly. I'll hand him over to Charlton, and tell him to keep a special eye on him."

"Thank you very much. I felt sure you would be willing to do something," said Lidgate, in tones of relief.

"The longer time goes on the more inexplicable appears Reedham's defalcations," said Archibald Currie, musingly. "Have you any theory about that, then?"

Lidgate hesitated a moment.

"At first I was dumbfounded, and naturally leaped to the conclusion that he had been leading a double life. But I have parted with that belief. I think there are two explanations which, when put together, may suffice. Reedham had several impecunious relatives, one of them most disreputable, who was a constant drain upon him. Part of his defalcation may have gone to cover some disgrace into which this person got himself. That is only surmise, suggested by various things Mrs. Reedham has said to me from time to time. The other is the extraordinary jealousy and antagonism that existed between him and your brother James."

The old man knit his brows, and nodded understandingly.

"I did not know Reedham well; in fact, I don't think I have met him more than half a dozen times, and then it was in the most casual way. But putting two and two together, the thing becomes plainer. I can easily understand how my brother would act upon a warm, impulsive temperament. Between ourselves, Lidgate, I have felt it myself, and we could never have been in business together."

Lidgate continued, finding his task of explanation much easier than he had expected.

"Reedham was very jealous of his position in the firm, and he constantly made himself wretched imagining slights were being put upon him, especially by Mr. Currie. Then he thought Mrs. Currie and her daughters were offensively patronising to his wife. The very idea of it maddened him. My own belief, in view of all these sidelights, which have become clearer with lapse of time, inclines me to think that Reedham was ambitious to make a clever coup-d'etat on his own account, to force recognition, as it were, from the senior partners. When he discovered that disaster had ensued, he could not face it, of course."

"Ay, ay; a most feasible explanation. I believe it is the true one," said Archibald Currie, musingly. "Poor, poor chap. It was not worth it. He was happy in his home; he had enough for his needs, and what else mattered? He had lost his sense of proportion. Ay, ay; what a number of catastrophes there are in life which the exercise of a little common-sense could avert!"

"You are right, sir; but I must not keep you longer. Then I may tell Mrs. Reedham to send the boy to you?"

"If you will leave me her address I will write myself to-night. I am glad you came to me. The boy is evidently worth saving, and I am only too pleased to be able thus indirectly to be of service to his mother."

Lidgate took a card from his case, wrote Mrs. Reedham's address on it, and almost immediately took his leave.

Archibald Currie sat still, pondering in his mind the thing he had heard. His face was wearing its most preoccupied expression. When his ward returned to the room she glanced at him anxiously.

(To be continued.)

CANADA AND WOMAN

A Consideration of the Work of the Canadian Woman and the Industrial Opportunities Afforded Newcomers

By R. E. VERNEDE

BY permission of the publisher, WILLIAM BRIGGS, Toronto, we are reproducing a chapter, "Canada and Woman," from the book, "The Fair Dominion." The author, Mr. R. E. Vernede, is an English journalist, who visited Canada during the year and wrote his impressions for the London weekly, "The Bystander." The chapter to which we have referred has much that will interest our readers, especially those of the West.—EDITOR'S NOTE.

FEW books are complete nowadays without a chapter on the woman question. Man can be treated of in between; one would not as yet care to write a book without mentioning man in it. As a subsidiary agent for keeping the world going man is still not without his importance. But woman, as I have said, must have a chapter to herself. And since I unwittingly arrived on the last page at the subject of woman's work in Canada, I will pause—even on the threshold of the mountains—and go further into the matter.

The most noticeable thing about woman in Western Canada is that she has not yet arrived there. If any one wished to get an idea of how the world would arrange itself supposing there were no women in it at all, they would have to go a little further north and west, into some of the British Columbian valleys or into the Yukon country, and look around.

What a simple world it seems. No clothes question, no washing, the simplest cookery, one man one plate (and that plate never washed), one knife for eating with or for skinning a grizzly bear, no carpets or curtains in the houses, no dustings or spring-cleanings, no knick-knacks to knock over or break, no flowers without or within except such as grow wild, no luxuries, in short, either to enjoy or to pay for, and a terrible amount of dirt. That is the physical aspect of the world without women.

The spiritual side of it is less easy to arrive at. These bachelors you see in the backwoods are a silent people, lacking in self-consciousness, and, I daresay, in manners, but law-abiding and amiable and peculiarly handy. All men are handy who have not women to steal that talent from them; and most womenless men are silent too. One knows, of course, that bores may be found among men at times, but never chatterboxes. There is something to be said for the view that speech arose by women putting questions so often that men were driven, in sheer weariness, to make answers.

Does it seem an unattractive life that these hardy bachelors have perforce to live? Perhaps. But you will not find them bemoaning their lot. That is not the way of bachelors. We know they are to be pitied, but they do not pity themselves. Seriously, the trouble with these men is that they have none of these inducements to consider the future which make a man better than a machine. They take the world as it comes, which is well enough for themselves but not well enough for the world. I doubt if it is well themselves really. true, they have nothing to worry them so long as they are in health. They can make big money when they choose and take holidays when they choose, conscious that when their money is spent they have only to set to again. Their wages are indeed to them little more than trinkgeld—and this means that those splendid workers have no real reward for their work, leave no successors to carry on the traditions of their toil, enrich only the barkeepers and the rogues who live on the folly of honest men.

CLEARLY the most honourable opening for women in Canada is marriage. Only wives are capable of putting down the drink curse, preventing the growth of a particularly odious plutocracy, establishing a permanent instead of a nomad population in the West. Nor might it be a bad thing (but for Anglo-Saxon prejudices) if provincial governments there could start marriage offices, due attention being paid to eugenics. Even in so small a matter as the following, the presence of wives should make all the difference. All down the Columbia valley, I found the cattle ranchers, who were bachelors, drinking tinned milk, while scores of cows ran wild and went dry. When I asked if it wasn't worth while to keep one cow milking, I was always told, "No, we haven't time to bother about it," till I came to the shack of a married Swede, whose wife had time to bother about it. In his shack tinned milk was anathema, as it should be everywhere.

As prejudice would undoubtedly prevent the formation of governmental marriage offices, marriage can only be considered as an indirect opening for women. What are the directer openings? A great deal depends on what part of Canada immigrant women make for. In the East there is no such lack of women as in the West. The sexes are fairly balanced. In the big towns there is the usual demand for domestic servants, but not many more openings for educated Englishwomen than there are in big towns at home. There are a few more, because those cities are going at a faster pace than our English cities, and because all work there is more valuable than in England. Women skilled in the arts that have to do with personal decoration, such as millinery, dressmaking, etc., could make their way there.

Factory work in Canada is hardly worth going into here, the chief point about it being that wages are of course higher; nor did I notice any unusual professions engaging the attention of women, unless it were the checking of parcels and the playing in hotel orchestras, neither of which requires a man's strength.

FRENCH Canada offers employment to but very few. Western Canadians sniff at the Habitants because they let their women work in the fields, haymaking and hoeing. But the idea of using women as outdoor workers is not so uncivilised as it looks to those unaccustomed to seeing it. Ethnologists are agreed nowadays that the tribes in which women do the field work are not the least but the most civilised, and maintain that the position of women among such tribes is higher than among any others. Women began to work out-of-doors because the primitive peoples believed in a connection between their fertility and that of the earth; and where they do such work, women are always the keepers of the grain store—hold in their hands, that is to say, the food upon which the life of the tribe depends. The most honourable primitive customs are not always the best in modern times, but there can be no doubt of the fertility of the French Canadians.

As one goes West, woman becomes more of an indoor creature; and this may be due to the greater chivalry of their men folk. But one has to remember that the great charm of Canadian life, especially on the prairies, is an outdoor charm—working in the exhilarating air—not cooking over a hot stove indoors. One hears of a few cases in which women have taken up farming or vegetable gardening and made a success of it, but no one could honestly say that the fortune awaiting women who take up such work is usually a great one. The work is too hard, especially in the winter time. Chicken-ranching is perhaps easier; but the real demand in the West is for women to do that housework which the men have not time for. At such work capable women can earn from three to five pounds a month with board and lodging; and while they are likely to find it rather harder—certainly not less hard—than similar work at home, it has compensations besides the money to be made by it. For one thing there is none of the odium that attaches to it in the older countries. The cook is as good as her employer, who probably did the cook's work for years before the cook was to be had. It is natural that the work which most ladies have to do for themselves, because neither love nor money can obtain them substitutes, should lose its menial and unpleasant aspect, and the finest ladies in western Canada do it unashamed. Often their guests will help them to wash up, and even prepare the dinner. Personally, I found myself becoming quite expert at cleaning fish for a hostess who thereafter cooked it and dished it up, and yet appeared at table as fresh and elegant and apparently leisured as any lady who keeps a staff of servants in the old country. And I found as I got on that I rather liked cleaning fish.

It stands to reason that the lady help is not wanted. The precise duties demanded of such a lady are always a little misty, but I imagine that they include a little sewing and a little reading, the ability to chat pleasantly, to be good-tempered (and possibly a Protestant), to feed the canary, and, at a pinch, even to clean out its cage. None of these talents are needed in a new country, and I heard of forty women who were on the books of an employment office in Calgary, all wanting to be lady helps and all likely to go on wanting it till Doomsday.

ONE hears a good deal of discussion (not in Canada) of the openings in the colonies for educated women. There is an English committee—the Committee of Colonial Intelligence for Educated Women—which, "recognising the crying need of our colonies for the best type of educated women," undertakes to furnish them with detailed, practical and up-to-date information, before advising them to go out. This committee hopes later on to found settlements in the colonies, where training, suitable to the needs of each colony, can be given, and centres can be formed to which the girls can return in the intervals of employment. There is much sense both in the recognition of the need for educated women in the colonies and in the perception that the most educated woman will be lost there unless she is prepared to be practical. The truth is that that same adaptability which is required of men in Canada is required of women also. They must first suit the country before they can hope to leave their mark on it. Educated women can leave their mark there by their inward, not by their outward, superiority.

Centres to which the girls can go in the first place, and to which they can return in the intervals of employment, are an excellent idea, and one which central or local government authorities in Canada would do well to support. Of course the Young Women's Christian Association already gives much help in this direction, but it cannot be expected to have branches everywhere. New towns and settlements are planned and put through very quickly in Canada, and wherever they result in creating a demand for women's work, some such centre for girls as near the railway depot as possible should be started. For one thing it would facilitate the engagement of girls, for another it would attract a better class. Probably the best openings of all for women in Canada—educated women, I mean—are in the big cities of the furthest West. In Vancouver and Victoria wealthy people reside who can afford to pay for such luxuries as private schoolmistresses and governesses. And the supply of women is not so great there. Women also seem to be more employed there as hotel manageresses and under-manageresses, and as cashiers in hotels and offices. I never heard of women being real estate agents, but in a profession in which the arts of persuasion play a leading part, there seems no reason why they should not shine. Of bachelor girls, living their own lives, I have also never heard in the West. They could hardly have the hearts to do it with so many bachelor men wasting their lives around them.

On the whole, the position of woman in Canada is one of honourable toil lightened by the high consideration in which they are held. They have hardly as yet obtained that dominant super-man eminence which American women are said to occupy. That is, perhaps, because they have not gone in so much for that culture and social fastidiousness by the lack of which in themselves some American husbands are made to feel their inferiority. On the other hand they seem to keep their men folk contented, and remain contented with them. Divorce is, I believe, uncommon in Canada.

The Question of Color

WE were asked recently, says a writer in The House Beautiful, by a subscriber, to approve her scheme of decoration for her new house. It was the same old story—hall in buff with white staircase and mahoganized balusters, a red dining-room with brown woodwork, a soft green living-room, one pink bedroom, another blue, and so on through all the tints of the rainbow; and then, while we were fairly gasping over the proposed array, she finished with: "I want to keep it very simple and colonial-like, you know."

Gently, but firmly, we insisted that she had too many colors; that her house would have no repose, no unity; that it would look like a patchwork quilt, without the quilt's compensating utility and comfort. Then for her guidance was described a very successful interior where the color scheme was white woodwork and a strong colonial yellow throughout the entire first and second stories. "Yellow," she repeated aghast, "why, I have purposely avoided such a garish color!"

There was little more to say; she went away unconvinced, to order her wall paper. The most she could be prevailed on to give up was the red and brown dining-room, for which she substituted the buff and white of the hallway. Thus our triumph was limited to only one room, but as red and brown dining-rooms are nearly always a serious decorative offence, this one-room victory is not to be despised.

Meanwhile the fact remains that this matter of one color throughout is worth experimenting with. The yellow interior held up as a worthy example is surprisingly successful. Its rooms are not separate units, but produce that feeling of breadth and relationship that a house should have. They are tied together, and the house seems half as large again as it really is. Provided only that the color chosen is a background, and not a foreground, one cannot go far wrong in adhering to it throughout at least one storey of the house. It is well known that the great eighteenth century architects insisted upon designing the furniture as well as the house. In the present-day revival of good taste in furniture, the architect's personal influence on his client is again playing an important part. There is an ever-increasing willingness among the latter to be persuaded that the man who designs the home may be safely entrusted to either design, or at least select, the furniture that goes into it. For the relation between the architecture of any period and its furniture is a close one; and those ignorant of it have, over and over, converted an interior (so far as movable decorations go) into a travesty of the architect's intention. He, therefore, is justified in playing the dictator in this matter. This does not mean to the extent to which a prominent architect played the role when, calling for an axe, he broke irreparably a wretched, over-ornamented chandelier that had been purchased and hung without his approval in a room of his designing; but it does mean that the architect is quite right in representing how unfair it is to him to "queer" the result of his efforts.

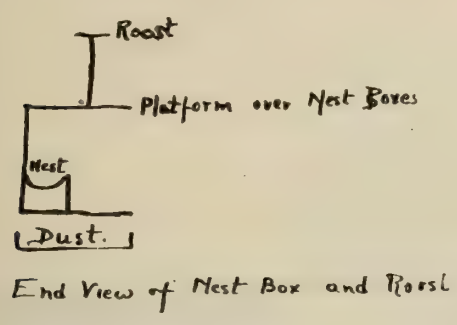
THE GIRLS ON THE FARM

A Friendly Talk With All of You

"FROM ONE COUNTRY GIRL TO ANOTHER"

DID you ever try to talk to a person to whom you had never been introduced, or to force yourself into a position where you didn't know whether or not you would find a welcome? If you have ever felt either of those uncertainties you can readily understand the state of my mind when I wrote that first letter to "all the girls on all the farms." I felt like a shy young man trying to call on a girl at boarding school—if he isn't a brother, or a cousin, or an uncle of the girl, he finds it hard to explain to the lady principal just why he is where he is. However, the editor deemed me eligible for an introduction, and now I feel free to work my way toward your sympathy, and your approval of my ideas and sentiments.

Please bear in mind, if you consider the matter at all seriously, that I am not setting myself up as capable of giving advice or dictating as to the proper course anyone should pursue—no indeed!



End View of Nest Box and Roost

I'm merely giving you some of my opinions and theories, and surely everyone who has a mind at all, has some independent ideas concerning the things which most closely touch his or her own life. I don't ask you to agree with me, but you are quite free to question me, my notions, and anything that I have said. I'll stand by my guns and try to prove that I meant what I wrote, and that my statements, although perhaps a bit conflicting, in some minds when the utterances of one article are compared with those of another, are tucked away in my mind in unison and harmony. And now we're ready to be friends, so let's to business.

In my last (and first) letter, I talked of generalities, trying to look at this quiet country life of yours and mine in such a way as to get the most out of it, and not have our minds too much trampled upon by the common round. It was only the lack of space that kept my enthusiasm tied down to the discussion of hobbies alone, for I wanted, as I told you, to go on and talk of that indefinite quantity, our special talent. However, I have decided to be very practical this time, to leave theories and mental adjustments strictly alone for a season, and, in short, to talk about the subject of hens. Hens, chickens and eggs are always in demand from the Atlantic to the Pacific, so it surely is a subject which will appeal to one and all of those who have the necessary facilities and requirements for caring for a feathered flock.

I WAS calling on a woman once who lived in another part of the country from me, in what I thought was an ideal situation. Her home was on the side of a long, gentle slope of ground which came right up from the river. In the stream were several small islands, which brought Ellen Douglas to my mind at once, and on the other side of the water, hill after hill showed all those wonderful greens of late summer. When my hostess complained of loneliness and dissatisfaction I could not but draw her attention to the beauty which she had at her very door, and which I was sure would rest and sooth. She gave me such a pitying look, and exclaimed: "I never heard of anyone living on a view." Of course, that is very true and very practical, so let us go back and roost with the chickens a time.

I have raised hens and taken charge of hens in each and every season of the year. I have never made any great amount of money from the venture because I did not go into the business seriously enough, but I know, if I had given up more of my time and attention, I would have had a greater measure of success. That reveals one of the first principles—to get thoroughly grounded before going into the hen business. Your flock must have a good share of your time and intelligent attention. The following of that rule will bring pleasing and satisfactory results.

I cannot give you definite figures of the cost of a flock of hens or the cost of their keep, or the profit you should have. Prices, both of feed and of eggs vary in different parts of Canada, and I can give you only an approximate idea of the expense and profit of keeping hens.

I have laid down the first rule—Be prepared to give your hens a generous share of time and attention.

Secondly, I would say—Have hens that are worthy of your best efforts. Have a flock of which you are proud, and if you have only a single-roomed henhouse and one general run, have but one variety, and keep that strain as pure bred as possible.

The choice of a special breed of hens is influenced by the object one has in view, whether the market nearest at hand offers better opportunities for eggs or chickens.

For all round flock, the egg basket and the dinner platter both considered, I think fifty Buff Orpington or Rhode Island Red fowls should delight the heart of any proud owner. The Buff Orpington is a gentle, placid fowl, always of the same clean light brown color, and the spring chicks develop into the plumpest, most satisfactory table fowl one can imagine or find. The Rhode Island Red is but a handsome, much showier edition of the Orpington.

The White Plymouth Rocks or Barred Rocks are of the same high class as the above-mentioned breeds, but will give better results as egg producers than the chicks will as early broilers or for general market. Of course, there are many varieties of fancy fowls, but, as I said before, the ordinary hen raiser will do much better to get a flock of good reliable fowls best suited to her needs, and work with that variety and that alone.

I am sending with this the plan of a henhouse which is ideal, and would make it possible to keep more than one variety of flock. It is quite a pretentious building which would cost seventy-five dollars to build, and which would moreover require a large piece of land, not to mention the wire, for the runs. The plan, however, is a splendid one and could be simplified to meet individual requirements. The separate rooms in this house are most convenient when the hens are setting, as it gives them an apartment quite by itself, while the third room may be used for the baby chicks. I have never used an incubator—an encourager of race suicide—and had naturally hatched chicks in April of this year, which made excellent broilers in June. I am sorry I haven't space enough to dwell on the merits of this henhouse and to tell you of an excellent plan for caring for the young chickens, whether from the hen or an incubator, when one has not a regulation brooder. However, I must keep to the subject in a general way.

HAVING chosen your flock in general, the number of fowls to purchase is the next question. If you want to make a business—and a profitable business of your hens—have a large flock. It is almost as easy to care for fifty hens as for twenty-five or thirty, and your additional profit will overbalance the extra cost and effort.

I seldom winter the same fowl twice, and a year-old fowl is always in good demand in the market, so it is easy to keep one's flock in a flourishing condition. When one is thinking of eggs only, this may not be a good plan, but I think it is.

I will give you a few figures, calculated in accordance with the conditions in my vicinity. To keep a flock of sixty fowls (of any of the varieties I have mentioned) for a year, and pay for their entire maintenance, would cost about one hundred and ten dollars. These hens, if they are doing their part of the contract, should produce eggs to the value of one hundred and thirty-five dollars. The fertilizer would put five dollars more on the credit side of the sheet, giving you a profit of thirty dollars for one year. Now, don't be disgusted at the smallness of my figures: that is your actual profit. Each of you can for herself figure up her possible profit.

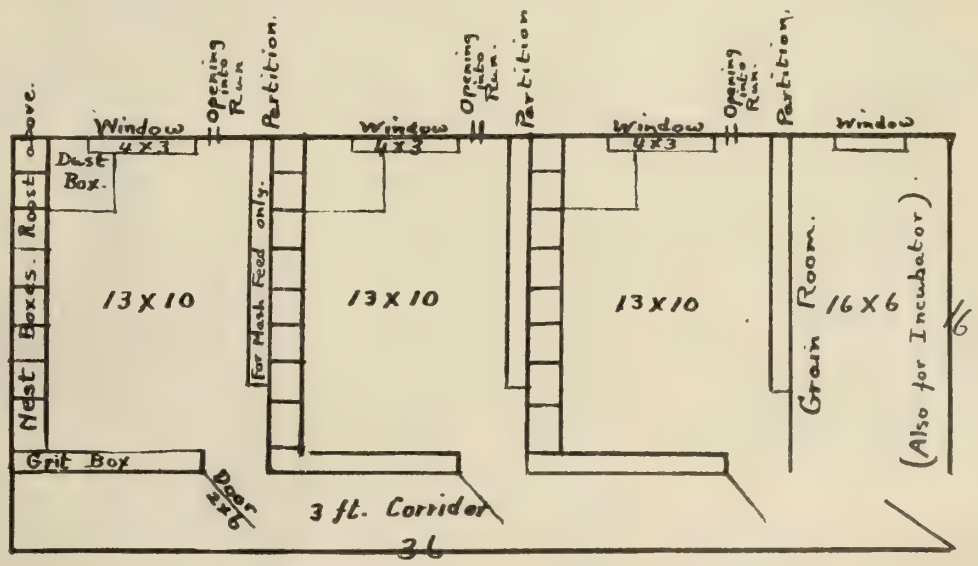
Food for a flock of hens includes grain, such as oats, buckwheat, barley, wheat or corn—some ground, some whole; vegetables, as potatoes, mangles or turnips; meat, raw or cooked, such as the liver, heart or waste portions of any domestic animal; gravel, oyster shells and ground bones. Look over this list and see how many of these articles are grown or procurable on your own farm or homestead. This lessens the expense of raising hens materially, as you can readily see, and simplifies the problem. One can procure ground oyster shells, bone foods, and other preparations from poultry supply manufacturers. There are several excellent farm and poultry journals published in Canada, which deal extensively with the raising of hens and the proper care of a flock. When one has made the start, has discovered that her private income can be satisfactorily increased by giving up some time and attention to fifty or more or less hens, and has got a proper house and a suitable flock, then she is in a position to profit intelligently by the advice offered in the columns of a poultry journal.

Trap nests, for instance, are explained explicitly, and one can readily appreciate their practical effect on one's profit after a little experience, but my idea is merely to arouse interest and to point out that many a girl and woman, who longs for an opportunity to go to a larger field and earn a wage, may stay at home and be happy in an occupation which can be made profitable and pleasant.

Have a good henhouse, a good flock, and use judgment and common sense. Don't starve your hens nor feed them until they are sluggish and stupid. Keep them active and cheerful and ready to appreciate such a treat as a raw turnip or a cabbage suspended by a string. Give them the variety of food which the hen nature craves. Keep everything in connection with your flock and its abode clean and sweet. Do all these things and you'll be so satisfied with yourself and your acquirement that you'll want to learn more and more of the subject and the best methods to pursue. You cannot expect to get that all at once any more than you can expect to learn all the reasons why you should keep hens or all the fundamental principles of the business, in one small article.

I've been so very practical that mayn't I digress in one paragraph? Have you been enjoying the autumn sunsets and the wonderful alluringness of the autumn atmosphere? I wish I had the space to quote you Bliss Carman's poem "Vagabondia," it is so thrillingly applicable and appropriate to our Canadian autumns. These sunsets of September and October must surely appeal to you girls who live in the free, uncramped open—the sunset of the mountains which ceases so abruptly but leaves such a marvellous afterglow on the fresh white peaks, or the sunset of the prairie with its "long light" so like Tennyson's "Bugle Song," or the quiet, peaceful, beautiful sunset of the East.

You girls can one and all do two things at least—you can raise hens and you can enjoy the sunset. Don't overlook the latter in the excitement of the former occupation. Make all the money you can with your hens and enjoy it, but don't forget to take time to marvel and be inspired by the glory of the setting sun.



Hen House for 60 Hens.
36 X 16

Consumption of Candy

"THIS feminine craze for being slender has knocked the bottom out of our business," said the man in charge of the down-town branch of a big candy concern in New York the other day. "Some men who were good for at least $10 worth of candy each week never come inside the door now, and when I see them trudging past the store with a package of fruit I make up my mind their wives and daughters or sweethearts have taken a stand against candy. One man with a wife and four daughters who used to be a splendid customer, told me the other day that he'd as soon come home with a viper as a five-pound box of candy."

Just WHY

Old Dutch Cleanser

Polishes

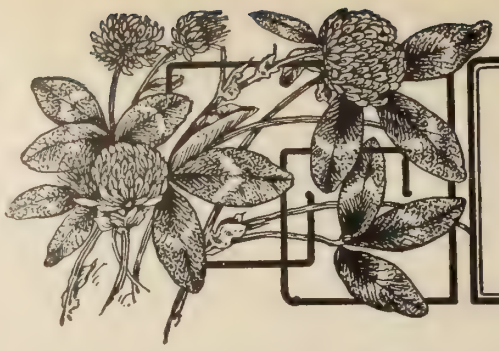
METAL { Taps, Pipes, Fixtures, Railings, Pans

Quickly

Because the Cleanser immediately takes off all rust and tarnish, and the metal surface then readily takes a gleaming lustre with a few moments' rubbing.

Apply some Old Dutch Cleanser with a wet cloth or brush; rub slightly, then wipe dry. Use dry as a polish. In this way you can easily keep brass, nickle, copper, steel, tin and aluminum bright and shining. (Not recommended for silverware.)

Many Other Uses and Full Directions on Large Sifter-Can, 10c



With the Journal's Juniors

A Corner for the Small Person

By COUSIN CLOVER

Rebus and Puzzle

UP to the time of our going to press, the prize for the Christmas rebus has not been awarded, so we must postpone the announcement concerning it until our February issue.

The prize for the picture puzzle, one year's subscription to this publication, goes to Miss Isla Stewart of Teeswater, the solution being: "The Canadian Home Journal."

We are submitting to our young readers a New Year's Puzzle. The prize is two dollars, but there is a condition attached, this time. Everyone sending in a solution must enclose also a year's subscription for the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL. This, we are sure, our young readers can readily secure. The following is the text of the New Year's puzzle.

If guessed correctly, the initials and finals (read downwards) spell a well-known greeting.

1. A continent.
2. A popular bird with housekeepers.
3. That indefinite place where tourists go.
4. A well-known fruit.
5. A favorite flower.
6. What we do when tired and sleepy.
7. A person of no account.
8. A city in Scotland.
9. Without parents or home.
10. A pleasure boat.
11. A prophet of old.
12. Just what you see.
13. The king of the flock.

Address reply to Puzzle Editor.

Holiday Letters

SOME of the remaining letters in our holiday competition are so good we do not like to leave them unpublished. We have decided to extend further the closing date for the next competition, so you may send letters on "A Winter Adventure" as late as March 1st, 1912.

Sheho, Sask., Aug. 27, 1911.

Dear Editor:

Seeing that a competition on "Summer Holidays" was open, I decided to send in a description of my present holidays.

I, with my sister, had been going to school at my Aunt's, up to the dismissal, when we came home. We had been let off a week earlier than usual on account of a few of the scholars trying their Entrance, so came home a while before the first of July (our town's sports day), but this was for nothing but the best, as we were here to help our mother the morning of that day. It proved, however, to be a very nasty day, and we did not get started off until after dinner, which left us rather late.

However, we started off to have as much fun as possible, but just in the midst of it a heavy rain storm came up; but, as we were quite a way from town we stayed out, in the shelter of an umbrella.

This rain soon passed and we enjoyed another hour or so of fun, when it began to look like rain again, so my father hitched up and drove us back to town. So that day's fun or, rather, fun and misery, was over. But my sister and I got the permission of our parents to stay in town for a few days, which we enjoyed immensely. After coming home again things went on very ordinarily for a week or so, when my mother, who had not taken a holiday for a long while, went down the line a little way to visit her father and mother, leaving my sister, little brother, and myself at home. Of course, Dadda was here too. My mother did not intend being away quite a week, but circumstances caused her to stay longer.

Well, we had a great time that little while. Here is my programme, which I planned out for the day. First, breakfast to get, which generally meant something spilled, but I got along very well at it. After breakfast dishes were washed, and then floors to sweep and beds to make, after which I got the potatoes and peeled them, which was so much towards dinner, and then a couple of times I had a little fruit to put up. This I got very thick and rich. (I got through both those tasks without a spill, which was pretty lucky.) By this time it would be dinner time, and this I would have to get ready. One day there were two men came along just in time for dinner, which caused a little extra work. After dinner there would be more dish washing and floor sweeping, and then I would have time to sew. Then supper time would come, after which work a little, time to read, and then to bed. We ran out of bread, though, while she was away, so Dadda did the baking. He also went to town twice, in the same day, a trip of six miles. The second trip he took us, but before going he put the bread in the oven, and you can imagine what it was like when we came back. Just the same, it was very good under the circumstances. The only thing which troubled Dadda, at least that's what he said, was that when Mamma saw how well we got along she might pick up and go any time. But she hasn't shown any signs of it yet, and she has been at home for almost two weeks. She is now getting us ready to go away for a holiday of a week or so, which I expect to enjoy to its fullest extent.

Aged 11. MARION AULD.

This is to certify that the above letter is original and written by my daughter, Marion Auld.

S. B. AULD.

* * *

Dear Marion:

You are a most industrious little girl in your holidays. I am sure that your mamma must have been very pleased with you. For a girl of eleven, I think you have a great deal of housekeeping ability.

OUR NEW YEAR'S PUZZLE

It was the last day of June, and the summer holidays had begun. We went home from school all delighted with thoughts of the beautiful time we had planned to have. We began to pack up a few of our summer dresses. My sister and I left on the steamer at eight o'clock.

In about two hours we arrived at our friends' summer resort, which was a very pretty place, with a path winding up a little knoll, on the top of which stood a cool summer cottage. In front, the name Stoney Beach was formed on the lawn in white stones. On the veranda were hammocks, easy chairs, and Chinese lanterns hung about the supports.

The first day the girls showed us around the place and the next day all the fun began. We slept in tents, and in the morning we got up about eight o'clock and dressed. We went into the cottage, where breakfast was prepared for us.

We went in bathing some afternoons, and fishing. We had long rambles through the woods. One day we went up the lake to spend the day. On hot afternoons we would sit in the hammocks and read one of our favorite books. In this way we spent many other days.

Near the end of our holidays one of the girls received a letter from a friend saying that she was coming down to the lake to be married at the cottage. We all helped to decorate the place, we made an arch of evergreens, and decorated the cottage with flowers and trailing vines and flowers. The day they arrived we had everything in order. After the wedding they stayed for a few days, and when they were leaving we showered them with rice and confetti.

And the next day we left on the steamer for home, and our delightful holidays were brought to a close.

Ryerson, Sask. IRENE GARWARD.

Certified by MRS. WM. G. GARWARD.

* * *

My dear Irene:

I am so pleased to hear from a little cousin in far-off Saskatchewan. A holiday by the water is one of the best in the world.

A NEW YEAR'S LUNCHEON

PREPARED BY
MARY H. NORTHEND

THE January hostess is offered unusual facilities in the way of entertaining, for at this season of the year the markets abound in delectable goodies, and the matter of providing a suitable and appetizing menu is, in consequence, easily solved. The luncheon is the popular form of diversion, as it is the simplest and most informal. It requires but little thought in arrangement, after the menu has been satisfactorily thought out, save as regards table adornment—a feature, by the way, that is one of the luncheon's most important assets, though not always given careful attention.

A prettily decorated table adds much to the quality of any luncheon course, and the little time spent in its arrangement is amply repaid by the pleasure given. Simple, dainty effects should be striven for, rather than elaborate or ornate ones, with the abundance of lovely greenery, obtainable for the gathering in any woodland tract, the securing of this desired result should not be difficult. A large basket filled with small sprays of pine or evergreen, with clusters of red berries tucked here and there, or a birch bark receptacle, placed on a mat of hemlock, and filled with crimson pinks interspersed with pine or evergreen, or any like effect, is all that is needed, and the completed result will be wholly artistic, and a distinct addition not only to the table, but to the luncheon as well.

The suggestion of New Year's may be appropriately introduced in the favors or place cards, and included in the novelties for these uses are clock-shaped candy boxes, with the face sketched upon the cover; leaf-shaped booklets, hinting of the adage about turning over new leaves, dainty calendars, and bell-shaped receptacles with the figure of the New Year or Old Father Time seated upon it.

Of course the all-important consideration is the meal itself. Even with such an array of tempting goodies as the January markets show, it is not always an easy matter to determine which will afford the most suitable and pleasing concoctions, and it is with the idea of aiding in this respect that the following simple suggestions are made.

Compote of Pineapple
Tomato Bisque
Fried Croutons
Olives
Lamb Circles with Peas
Baked Beets with Butter Sauce
Shrimp Salad
Banana Buns
Coffee
Mints

COMPOTE OF PINEAPPLE—Pare, core and quarter one tart apple of medium size for each guest. Cook until tender in as little water as possible, adding enough fresh lemon peel to give a decided flavor. When done, remove from the fire, and add a tablespoonful of diced pineapple for each person. Chill very thoroughly, and serve very cold, with or without whipped cream.

TOMATO BISQUE—To one quart of strained tomato puree, add an equal quantity of rich milk. Heat these two ingredients separately, and when the puree reaches the boiling point, stir in one-fourth teaspoonful of saleratus. Do not put the parts together until ready to serve. Season with salt, pepper, and a dash of clove. Serve with croutons that have been fried in deep fat. The LAMB CIRCLES—Make a well-seasoned croquette mixture of lean cold lamb put through the meat chopper, and an equal quantity of bread or cracker crumbs. Moisten with good meat stock or with rich milk. Make into small flat cakes, no larger than a silver dollar, and fry light brown in deep fat. Serve with hot buttered peas.

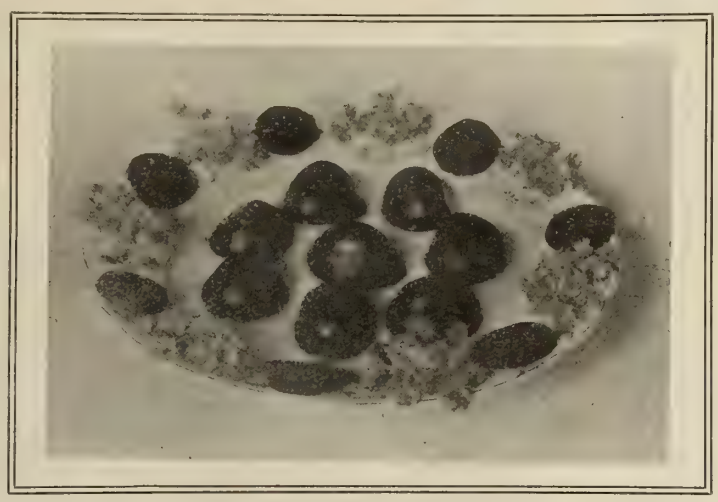
BAKED BEANS WITH BUTTER SAUCE—Parboil rather small beets of uniform size until they are fairly tender. Set them into the oven in a buttered pan for half an hour.

SHRIMP SALAD—Open a can of shrimps and allow Serve with a sauce of melted butter, and garnish with them to soak in ice water for thirty minutes. Drain and wipe dry on a clean napkin. Break in small pieces and arrange in a lettuce-lined salad bowl. Mask with mayonnaise dressing, and garnish with whole shrimps and small sweet gherkins.

BANANA BUNS—Mould good bread into tiny balls, sprinkle with sugar, and when they have risen sufficiently bake a delicate brown. While they are still hot, cut a circle from the bottom of each and remove the soft inside; fill the crusts with diced bananas, to which a few chopped maraschino cherries have been added. Place each bun upon a generous spoonful of whipped cream, garnish with slices of banana and cherries, and serve immediately.



BAKED BEETS WITH BUTTER SAUCE

SHRIMP SALAD

BANANA BUNS

DISHES OF MANY LANDS

PERHAPS no State in the Union can boast of as much variety and as many surprises in its cuisine as California, says a writer in the Epicure. Ships from every port pass the Golden Gate, and their crews bring to many of the little restaurants new ideas in cookery. The Spanish and Mexican cuisines are most prominent, but with the great numbers of Chinese and Japanese the cooking of Oriental lands has also come to be known and adopted by Californians.

From Australia and New Zealand, from the Philippines and the Hawaiian Islands, from India with the new invasion of East Indians into the state, and from many another far away land have come new dishes that have found their way into California menus, and with the dash of Creole cookery and the New England dishes that are clung to by the '49ers and easterners who have migrated to this sunny clime, one has much to choose from.

If, perchance, he strays into a California restaurant and has a keen-edged appetite, as likely as not he will glory in the possibilities of a California crab, which he may elect to follow with Boston baked beans and Virginia waffles with Vermont maple syrup, then end his repast with some wonderful strange fruits from Hawaii and wash it all down with a glass of native or Mexican wine.

San Francisco was a city of restaurants before the great calamity which befell it, and wiped out the temporary existence of such famous restaurants as Zinkand's the Techau Tavern with its Hawaiian dishes, its velvet-voiced Hawaiian singers and sadly beautiful native music; Tait's mammoth underground palace, the Palace of Art with its collection of paintings, including a Rosa Bonheur, the old and new Poodle Dog—the latter one of the show places of the coast—and the Oyster Grotto, where nothing save shell fish was served, and where mammoth specimens of the California crab served four persons each.

Bohemians will recall the Italian cafe of one Coppa on Montgomery Street that had been decorated by the famous San Francisco artists, and where painters, writers and musicians met to drink Chianti and eat spaghetti, ravioli, and frittura, and admire, through their wreaths of smoke, the wonderfully clever and suggestive frescoes and mural decorations recalling Gelett Burgess and his "Goops," Jack London and other celebrities. The restaurants of the Flowery Kingdom and the Celestial Empire passed by: there was the famous Mexican restaurant of one Matia, which was unique of all dining places in the Golden West.

Passing through the Barbary Coast to the Telegraph Hill region, one found Matia's place, where the little Austrian presided proudly and served his patrons in two clean, shabby little rooms. They smelled of garlic and were decorated with colored prints imported from Spain, which showed bull fights in every stage, from portraits of handsome matadors awaiting calmly the onslaught of Taurus to the gory finish with rivers of blood.

Add to Strength

STRENGTH

TO THE STRONG:

During the Season of Festivities, appetite usually overruns reason, and some special care is needed to rid the system of the surplus.

Grape Juice

is not only a pleasant beverage, but is also helpful to the system as a body builder.

TO THE WEAK:

During the Winter, one in every five persons is in need of some special nourishment to ward off and to overcome the attacks of Grip and other winter ills.

The choice of nourishment is all-important, many articles of diet contain much waste matter which tends to clog the whole body.

Nearly every drop of PURE GRAPE JUICE is nourishment, and does help to build up.

TO BOTH:

Try this three times a day

E.D.S. Grape Juice Wineglassful
Sugar (Powdered) Teaspoonful
Lemon Juice Teaspoonful
Water - Tumblerful

E D S

Be sure that the above mark is on the label.

Let the holiday season remind you that this is very acceptable to invalids.

A case of E.D.S. Grape Juice would be an acceptable present to invalids.

The same care and quality is used in all the E.D.S. lines, which include Jams, Preserves, Marmalade and other table delicacies.

From the kitchens of

E. D. SMITH
WINONA, ONT.

The Perfect Player Piano

is one that will produce results the Musician is after, and at the same time place the Novice in a position to play so it will not sound mechanical.

SPECIAL FEATURES IN THE

NEW SCALE WILLIAMS

place it in a distinctive class, and enable anyone to play any Musical Selection intelligently and with artistic effect.

As a piano, the New Scale Williams stands supreme, and as a player-piano, the combination makes it perfect.

Write us to-day for full particulars about this wonderful instrument, and how it can be purchased on our extended payment plan.

The WILLIAMS PIANO CO., Limited
OSHAWA 246 ONTARIO

ML FLOORGLAZE

Wonderfully Economical and Durable

A gallon covers 500 square feet with a permanent and beautiful enamel-like coating. But that coating is far more serviceable than the usual enamel paint, because it will not chip, nor flake, nor crack, but withstands wear in just those places where the most wearing comes.

For sale by most Paint and Hardware Dealers in Canada.

DON'T ACCEPT A SUBSTITUTE.

If you want to learn about the cleanest, best wearing and cheapest floor covering in existence, send to us for our new booklet, printed in colors. It contains a color card, and is FREE, if you mention this paper. Send a card for it to-day.

MADE IN CANADA BY THE

Imperial Varnish & Color Co., Limited

WINNIPEG TORONTO VANCOUVER

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Furnishing a Home on a Moderate Income

By JESSIE E. RORKE

THE HALL.

THAT the hall should be pretty and attractive is more important than we might at first suppose. To be sure, but little of our time is spent there, but it is this room that gives the first suggestion of what the house will be to all who come, and they carry that impression with them, unconsciously adding or detracting from the effect of the other rooms. The planning of a hall has its difficulties also, as it opens into many rooms and must harmonize with each, while keeping a character of its own.

MISSION WRITING TABLE.

Usually there are a few windows, and the colors should tend to the warm cheerful tones; not necessarily light shades but bright enough to avoid all suggestion of gloominess. The yellows, yellow and red browns, reds and the warmer greens may be depended upon to give this effect. Of these, red is the most difficult color to handle, for though a warm color it is inclined to absorb the light, and though very rich and brilliant, in sunshine, may be even gloomy in ordinary daylight. Both the upper and the lower halls should be treated in every way alike, and the color scheme must be considered in relation to the rooms on both floors. Papers with inconspicuous designs are the most pleasing. The fabric effects are very pretty, as are some of the strictly conventional designs in self tones, or quiet harmonious colors. If the ceiling is at all high, papers with stripes should be avoided on account of the long stretch of wall at the stairway. A narrow hall may be made to appear wider by using the same paper that is hung in the adjoining rooms. It is rarely economical to buy cheap paper as the price per roll is small compared with the price of putting it on, and a good durable paper will prove less expensive than one that must soon be replaced.

So little furniture is necessary for the hall that it is usually wise to be even what may seem a little extravagant in the outset and have it good. It is better to have a really good mirror provided with a few hooks for hats rather than a cheap hat-rack. In selecting a hat-rack, choose straight, simple lines and good material, if possible the same wood as the woodwork of the hall itself. A little table to hold a card tray and a comfortable chair or two, complete the necessary furniture, though if the hall is large enough a couch or window-seat will make it more attractive. The hall is more exposed to dust and draught than any other room in the house and appropriateness, which is essential to beauty, demands that its furnishings shall be substantial, dainty draperies and delicate colors seeming entirely out of place. Where upholstery is used, leather is the most durable and satisfactory, but any of the plain heavy materials that are used for the purpose, would be suitable for a window-seat.

HALL SEAT

Little can be done in decorating to improve a defective stairway, though this is the most important part of the hall, either adding beauty by its strong, graceful lines, or making the whole hall appear awkward and ungainly. The stairway of the Colonial period was one of its greatest beauties, with its broad, low arch in the hall below, framing in the stairs with their wide white steps and spiral spindles with mahogany rail and panelling. The window at the top of the stairs was always particularly effective, repeating the graceful, curving lines of the arch below.

The hall window is frequently of stained glass and, if there is not a good view to exclude, this may be very beautiful, the subdued light that comes through the colored glass being quite sufficient for the purposes of the room. But all stained glass is not beautiful, and even the softening influence of the sunlight will fail to harmonize crude contrasts of brilliant colors that have no beauty in themselves, and introduce a clashing note into the harmony of the other furnishings; a plain glass with some simple and pretty arrangement of curtains is much to be preferred. The curtains would have a substantial effect rather than that of daintiness. The plain or printed linens or Russian crash are good materials, but if more light is desired madras will be found more satisfactory than the thinner nets. If the window is low and wide, the curtains will be pretty shirred over a brass pole at the top and falling only to the sill; or they may be hung with a valence which brakes the long line between the curtains when they are drawn back. The crash and linen are both very pretty with some simple design in embroidery or a stenciled border. The valence may be used with the high, narrow windows if one desires, but it is not needed unless the cutrains are hung well apart for the sake of admitting more light. If the window in the door is plain glass, net shirred at both top and bottom makes a pretty and inexpensive curtain.

TREATMENT OF LIBRARY WINDOW

PORTIERES are frequently used in the doorways from the hall, and if different color schemes are used they must form the connecting link between the two. If browns are to be used in the hall, and greens in the drawing-oom both colors should be found in the portieres; but if the hall were done in tan and green and the drawing-room in green and gold the portieres might be of the plain color. In our desire for costly fabrics and elaborate arrangements, we are inclined to forget that color, which is a more important consideration in a beautiful home, is almost entirely independent of expense, and its greatest beauties may be ours simply for the trouble of planning and carrying out a harmonious scheme of color. It matters little whether we prefer to use doors or portieres between our rooms, but, having decided upon the curtains it is most important that they shall introduce an added note of color that will complete the beauty and harmony of the room. Homespuns, monks cloth, velours, tapestry, and repp are all satisfactory materials for portieres, and some of the canvases, while less expensive, give very pretty and artistic effects.

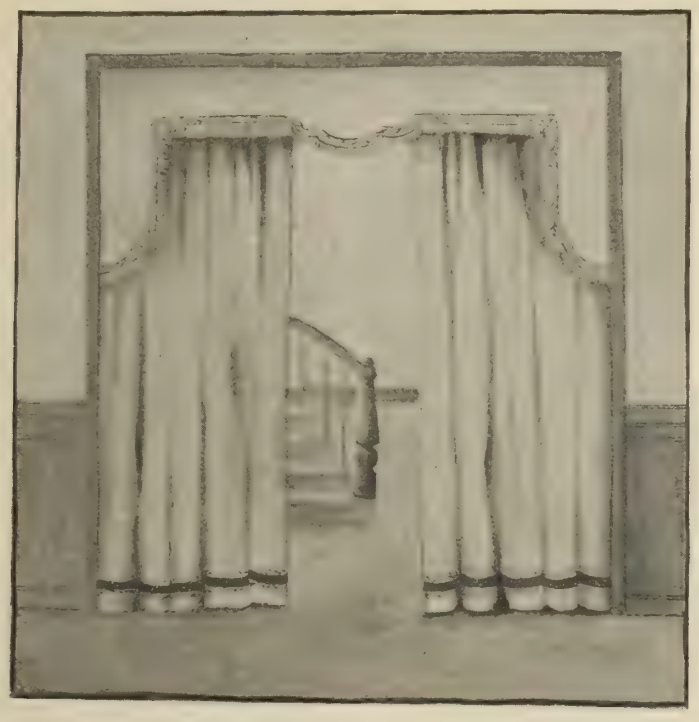
Some very pretty lanterns are to be found for the hall, and the best of these are characterized by their lack of ornament rather than by its abundance—depending for their beauty on their simple, pleasing lines, and the rich, glowing colors of the light reflected from the brass or copper from which they are made. Another type is made from bronze and leaded glass and is very quaint and pretty in design. Shades of colored glass that give an unnatural appearance to whatever the light falls upon should be avoided.

Though any good pictures may be hung in a hall, etchings and engravings seem particularly suitable and so few are needed that these are not usually too costly. Though bare walls are unhome-like, they are not so trying as those that are over-crowded and tire the eyes while dividing the interest so that it fails to centre on anything.

paper alone for the decoration of the walls; but certainly in a room where so much of our time is spent we cannot afford to do without our pictures and we turn instead to the quieter self-toned papers in simple conventional designs or fabric effects, that make a suitable background, not only for the books and pictures but for the other furnishings of the room.

The curtain materials that are offered now for sale in the same designs as the wall paper are not as satisfactory as the salesmen would lead us to suppose, as curtains in plain colors are in better taste with a figured paper; very artistic results, however, are obtained by repeating some motif from the paper in a stenciled or embroidered border. Figured materials may be used with the plain papers and give an opportunity of introducing the brighter shades of our scheme of color where the subduing influence of the play of light and shadow softens their crude effects and makes them infinitely more beautiful. It is entirely a matter of choice whether one or two sets of curtains shall be used, but if the material is opaque and heavy its hard lines will be softened by the use of sheer curtains next the glass.

The question of light is an important one in either a library or living-room, and the curtains should be so arranged that they will slip easily on the rod and may be drawn back to the full extent of the window. They should reach only to the sill unless the casement extends to the floor. There is no better artificial light for working or reading than the low reading lamp, either oil or electric, that may be moved at will, and shines over the left shoulder upon the book or work, the room itself being lighted by a low hanging lamp.



ARRANGEMENT OF PORTIERS WITH A VALANCE

THE LIBRARY AND LIVING ROOM

IN a small house, the same room must frequently answer the purpose of both library and living-room and even where this is not the case the treatment of the two is so similar that they may be easily discussed together. In these rooms beauty must be attained without any sacrifice of comfort, but the restriction which this imposes, instead of adding to the difficulties, sometimes leads us to the desired results by a surprisingly simple way, and we find ourselves wondering why the living-room is so much more attractive than the drawing-room where we have displayed our daintiest embroideries and choicest bric-a-brac.

The warm colors are to be preferred for these rooms, being both more serviceable and more cheerful than the coolor, more delicate shades. Tans, browns and dull reds and greens that incline rather to brown than grey shades, are all good colors, and the soft shades of old blue are so pretty that one is sometimes tempted to use them but only in a very bright room, and if possible, with yellow as a contrasting color. The warm weather tempts us so much out of doors, that it is better to choose furnishings that will be most attractive for the longer part of the year when we use the rooms the most.

So many exquisite papers are to be found among the years' offerings that the difficulty is in choosing among so many, rather than to find one that would be suitable. Some of the most elaborate designs are so beautiful that one is almost tempted to have them hung and depend upon the shoulder upon the book or work, the room itself being lighted by a low hanging lamp.

Strong, simple lines, good workmanship and little or no ornament should characterize the furniture for the living-room. Large comfortable chairs that look strong enough to sustain any weight, a couch that is really made for resting, on and a table large enough to be serviceable where one might work or write or read with ease will go far toward making a attractive room. To these, in the library, must be added the book cases. Those which are built in are probably the most satisfactory, but some very beautiful ones are to be found in the shops.

The cheery comfort of an open grate seems almost indispensable, and though we may be quite as warm in a room that is heated by steam or hot air, we lack the agreeable companionship of the flickering blaze of glowing coals. Either brick or tile fireplaces may be used in the living-room. The brick is almost always harmonious in color and dull soft colored tiles that harmonize with the wall tones are even more beautiful, but those with a high glaze are always to be avoided. Stone fireplaces are very attractive, but are only appropriate in large rooms that have an effect of space and strength in their appointments. They seem most suitable in rooms with dark woodwork and beamed ceilings. The same simplicity that characterizes the furniture should be found in the mantel and its ornaments. The latter need be very few. One good cast to which it would be a real pleasure to raise our eyes sometimes from work or book might be quite sufficient and give more pleasure than several ornaments of less interest. Candlesticks or decorative pieces in china or pottery are other suitable onraments for the mantel. Cut flowers or a potted plant are always beautiful, but they should be arranged with care.

You were never too young—
You will never be too old—to enjoy the

Edison Phonograph

The Edison Phonograph is not only the greatest musician of all the ages—it is all the great musicians of the present day—playing all of the greatest music ever written.

You select your program to suit your audience when you own an Edison Phonograph. The songs you love best, sung by the singers who sing them best—your kind of music, rendered as only the Edison can render it—as true to life as the original.

The Edison tone is pure, smooth, subdued and true, because of the rounded, button-shaped sapphire reproducing-point, which gives exactly the right volume of sound for the home. And the sapphire point is permanent—lasts forever. No changing needles, no scratching or wearing of records.

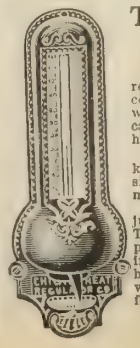
There are Edison dealers everywhere. Go to the nearest and hear the Edison Phonograph play both Edison Standard and Edison Amberol Records. Get complete catalogs from your dealer or from us. Edison Phonographs, $16.50 to $240.00. Edison Standard Records, 40c. Edison Amberol Records (play twice as long), 65c. Edison Grand Opera Records, 85c. to $2.50.

Thomas A. Edison
INCORPORATED
100 Lakeside Avenue
Orange, N. J., U. S. A.

CHANGE your opinion of the union suit as a garment for men's underwear. See the new union suit with every merit and never a fault of the old, and striking merits of its own. See (and you will buy) Watson's Klosed - Krotch Combination. This comfort garment, knit-to-fit perfectly and warranted not to shrink nor sag, sets snugly across the seat, doesn't strain, doesn't gap (because krotch-kloses like a pair of ordinary drawers). Only a single button to fasten, and it placed at one side, out of the way. Fits smoothly, neatly, comfortably across the hips, and is really comfortable, sitting or standing. Any weight you want; and the size you ask for will fit. It's knit that way by Watson Mfg. Co., Limited, Brantford, Ont.

ASK FOR 28

WATSON'S Klosed-Krotch COMBINATIONS



This Heat Regulator
Saves on Your Coal
30 Days to Try—60 Days to Pay

Prove it for yourself. We send it all ready to put up on 30 Days Free Trial to convince you it will do just what we say it will. Anyone who can use a screw-driver can attach it to any furnace, steam or hot water heater.

The Chicago Heat Regulator keeps even heat, whether the weather outside be below zero or above freezing. That means health and 25 per cent coal saved.

The Thermostat keeps the temperature just as you want it during the day. Set the Time-Set at night and it will open the dampers at any hour you desire in the morning. No getting up early to warm up the house. Send for Free Booklet A today, which gives full particulars—Don't wait for zero weather.

Otterville Manufacturing Co.
Otterville, Ontario

TO OUR CUSTOMERS

Owing to the enormous demand for our suits, corset covers and coats during the Fall we were unable to get the goods fast enough to fill the orders and were compelled to stop our advertising as we do not like to keep our customers waiting longer than necessary. We wish to advise the public now, though, that all orders that we were forced to hold up during the Fall were filled in order of dates received and we have now arrangements with several factories to buy their entire output. This assures for our patrons the most prompt attention. Our customers will always get square treatment when dealing with us.

AVALLONE & CO., Inc., 49 Colborne St., Toronto, Ont.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

BOVRIL

FOR DAINTY TEAS

Bovril Sandwiches have the advantage of being easy to prepare, exceedingly piquant, appetizing and very nutritious.

All that is good in Beef is in Bovril

The Leaders of the Month

A Most Important New Canadian Book

The Arctic Prairies of Canada

By Ernest Thompson Seton

$2.75 net, Cloth. Postpaid.

The Fourth Watch

By H. A. Cody, M.A.

Author of "The Frontiersman."

Cloth $1.25. Postpaid.

Mr. Cody has in this volume given us a very strong book. His previous work, "The Frontiersman," has been a tremendous success!

From Tenderfoot to Scout

By Anna C. Ruddy

Profusely Illustrated.

Cloth $1.25. Postpaid.

The best boy's book we have ever published. It will undoubtedly be the boy's book of the season. Numerous illustrations from the Y.M.C.A. camp at Lake Couchiching.

WM. BRIGGS, Publisher

29-37 Richmond Street West

TORONTO - - ONTARIO

AND AT ALL BOOKSELLERS

The Care of Silverware

Ever go into the home of a prosperous friend for dinner, and see the beautiful silverware arranged on the snow-white table linen and sideboard?

Ever in your own home notice how beautiful the silver looks after being properly cleaned, the different articles of jewelry, rings, toilet sets, silver handbags, etc.?

Ever stop to think of the hard labor and work it takes in the average household to clean Silverware? All the rubbing, scrubbing and polishing.

Ever think of the cost of the Silverware and consider that the rubbing and cleaning of it by the old methods wear away more silver than the hardest ordinary usage—rubbing is Positively Ruinous to plated ware?

The average life of Silverware is all the way from three months to a century according to the care that is taken of it. In some cases priceless heirlooms are handed down from generation to generation and the problem is always how to restore the natural lustre and brightness without injury.

There is one ABSOLUTELY SATISFACTORY way to clean Silver, Gold and Plated Ware, and WITH NO RUBBING. Thus the articles are not scratched—the surface is not marred or injured in the slightest—in fact we guarantee Wonder-Shine Silver Cleaner in every possible way. It does the work perfectly in one-quarter the time, and many articles can be cleaned at once.

At All Leading Dealers 25c and 50c per package

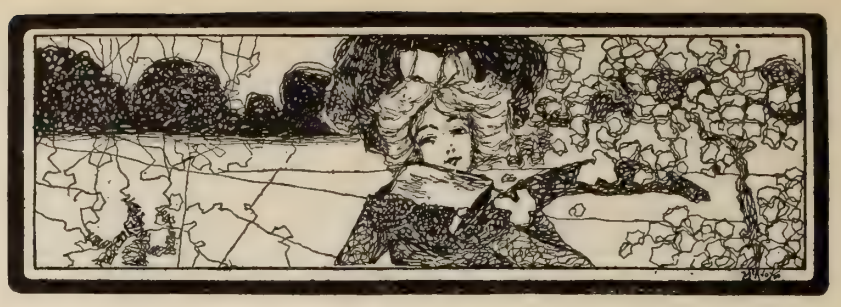
THE ORIGINAL GENUINE

WONDER-SHINE

SILVER CLEANER

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.



CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB

Planning for a Wonderful Club Organization for 1912

Will you help us get 500 new members? Those who will send a few subscriptions ask to have a sample copy sent to a friend, especially some one in a small town.

I WANT to thank you all for the splendid success of the Club during the past year. These last two months especially have been notable ones, and you can imagine it was a joyous sight to me to see so many of our blue order blanks in the order files each day.

WHAT OUR SUCCESS PROVES

We have proved that our Canadian girls will give their hearty support to a magazine of our own country. We have proved that the boasted energy, enthusiasm, aggressiveness, willingness to take up new interests, of the girls in United States is no greater than these same qualities in our Canadian girls. We have shown that the Girls' Club can be one of the most important factors in the success of the JOURNAL.

WHAT OUR SUCCESS BRINGS

In 1912 we will have a more separate and permanent organization than we have had before. We will have a little newspaper of our own, and I hope you will all contribute your experiences to help make it interesting. We will have our own stationery and a club emblem. I want every member not only to be proud of CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, but of belonging to the Club which is helping make the JOURNAL the equal of any magazine published in any country.

THE 10,000 WATCHWORD

Will you take this for your watchword? The JOURNAL has shown wonderful improvement in these past two years, and we are confident of its future success. Every Canadian woman should lend her support, and we belong to an organization that is to tell every one of them about the JOURNAL and secure 10,000 new readers in 1912.

ENTHUSIASM ALWAYS WINS

"Dear Secretary:

Will you send copies to these subscribers now. I'll have more very soon. Every one of my subscribers has liked the Journal even more than she anticipated. My enthusiasm won their orders in spite of their doubts, and now they are as enthusiastic as I am.

"People say I am such a thorough believer myself that they can scarcely refuse to give the Journal a trial. I must say I enjoy persuading people into believing as I do, and the satisfaction of every one has been a great pleasure. I only wish I had more time to work.

"Very sincerely,

"A Busy Home-maker."

"Dear Friend:

"I am sending you renewals for last year's subscribers and several new names. The subscribers have been delighted and have told all their friends, so it is not half so difficult to get orders now as last year, when only my own enthusiasm and a sample copy was all they had to depend upon.

"You are certainly treating us well in allowing the same rate on renewals as on new orders. It encourages one to build up a circle of subscribers. In a small place like this after a few years one would have all the new names she could possibly get.

"Very sincerely,

"_____"

CONDITIONS OF MEMBERSHIP

We want every girl who can get us ten or more subscriptions to join the Club. You don't have to get great big lists to be a member. It isn't necessary to make a regular business of it. We want hundreds of members who will get subscriptions from their immediate friends and relatives.

You will be surprised how many attractive things you can earn with a few orders; later you may be encouraged to increase your work and rise through the ranks of those who earn $40 or $50 a year to those who earn several hundred dollars.

TO ENLARGE THE CLUB

If you think you may be able to get many or few subscriptions, write to us. If you positively cannot join, will you suggest it to some one else? Do you know of some one living in some small place where we probably have not a subscriber? I will be glad to send a marked copy calling attention to the Club.

Just think, if we can get 700 members sending fifteen or twenty subscriptions each, 200 sending fifty, 100 sending all the way up to five or six hundred, what a tremendous help it will be in building success for the JOURNAL. Doesn't that make you realize better what an organization can accomplish if each member does a little?

START WITH THE NEW YEAR

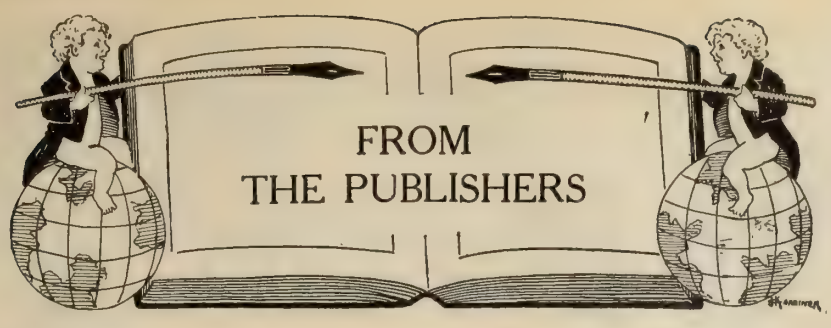
First—because these next few months are splendid subscription months. People are deciding what magazines to take, and this is the psychological time to tell them of the JOURNAL. And next—because you do not want to lose any time in starting in the race for the yearly prizes. It doesn't take such a lot of subscriptions to win a prize, because we know that a great many of our workers have not the time or opportunity to get great big lists, and we want them to have a chance.

So will you write me to tell you all about the Girls' Club? Send a post card right now while it is fresh in your mind. Remember about that old and famous robber, "procrastination," who steals time right under one's nose.

Very sincerely,

The Secretary.

Canadian Girls' Club,



THE reader who is satiated with the ordinary modern novel will find a cure for ennui in "The Gates of Hell," a story of frontier life in the United States and Canada, by Alfred Fitzpatrick. Those who are familiar with the revolting conditions which prevail on our frontier will recognize that a master hand has portrayed the scenes in this book. To those unacquainted with the frontiersman's modus vivendi the book will prove a revelation. It is a thrilling narrative, full of unique incidents, and has a charming love story running through it. The author of the book is very generously donating the proceeds to the betterment of the frontier toiler. It will be ready for the Christmas trade. Copies may be secured from the Reading Camp Association, Aberdeen Chambers, Toronto, and from all booksellers.

For eleven years this association has been doing its utmost to improve the lot of our frontier toilers. The method is to send an instructor, usually a college graduate or undergraduate, to a camp, where he works with the men during the day and conducts informal educational classes in the evenings. On Sundays he holds a song service. They provide current magazines, books and usually an organ or gramaphone.

□

A DELIGHTFUL story, with two old sweethearts for hero and heroine, was "The Loves of Pelleas and Elarre," by Zona Gale, which won popular favor some years ago. There followed "Friendship Village," by the same author, in which forced cheerfulness played almost too overwhelming a part. Now, we have another contribution from this vivacious writer in "Mothers to Men," in which the chief "speaker" is Calliope Marsh, a philanthropic old maid, who appeared in "Friendship Village" also. Calliope is a vivacious creature, withal, who is too deadly sentimental for daily food. The activities of the Friendship Married Ladies Cemetery Improvement Sodality are the subjects of the various narratives which make up the volume. This kind of book invariably introduces a deserted baby or a forlorn child, who in real life would be sent to an orphan asylum, but who furnishes a whole community with material for philanthropic endeavor. In this case, the forsaken child is a small boy, whose drunken father betakes himself to life in the open, leaving his offspring to make the best of a lonely lot. The child, Christopher John Bartlett, is adopted by Mis' Eleanor Emmons and her niece, Robin Sidney, who regard him as a gift of Providence. There is a masculine philanthropist, who sets himself to playing an all-the-year-round Santa Claus to Friendship Village, and who preaches on every occasion in an improving fashion, although he seems to have no regular work to do. There is a good deal of homely philosophy in the stories of the various enterprises undertaken by the Friendship ladies, and many will find the book quite readable. There is too much of the saccharine element in most of the "workers," and one turns with some relief to Alex. Proudfit, a young man who is alleged to be selfish and worldly, but who seems to be the most sensible citizen of them all. There is also a chapter on the woman suffrage question, in which an ultra-modern young woman bears a prominent part, enlightening the village fathers after a fashion to strike awe to the masculine heart. Toronto: The Macmillan Company, of Canada.

□

MOST Canadians have heard of Father Lacombe, the missionary who went to the Blackfeet in 1849, and who has seen a great, lone land become the Golden West of transcontinental trains and vast prairie provinces, with a welcome such as no other land extends to the newcomer from crowded Europe. Miss Katherine Hughes, one of Canada's capable journalists, has written the story of the life of this "Black Robe Voyageur" with a sympathy and vivid charm which make its four hundred and fifty pages a most interesting narrative. Here will be found the record of a life of simplest and yet most heroic endeavor, among the Indians of the West, a life full of romantic and moving incident, in a country where only the strong and fit are needed. Father Lacombe is presented as an essentially human and lovable ecclesiastic, who has given of his lavish affection to the dusky "Children" among whom he ministered, and whose twilight days are gladdened by the establishment of the "Home" on which he had set his heart. This is a book to be read by all who are interested in the development of our wonderland—the West. Toronto: William Briggs.

□

"THE HEALER" is a novel by Robert Herrick, who is one of America's foremost writers of fiction. Mr. Herrick is always in earnest, and usually has an obvious purpose in his novels. "The Healer" is concerned with an unconventional and even extraordinary character, who possesses the gift of healing, as if it were a possession akin to musical or literary genius. This gift becomes obscured through the vices of "The Healer," who betakes himself to a lonely northern wood, somewhere in Canada, and leads a primitive existence among lumbermen and miners. He encounters there the daughter of a rich man, who has all youth's charm and helplessness. Their marriage is a romantic incident in "The Healer's" career, but his wife is too conventional to understand his wild longings for "unspoiled Nature," and the inevitable drifting apart begins. "The Healer" becomes a fashionable physician and eventually becomes addicted again to drug habits. He is rescued from this condition by an unattractive spinster of doubtful virtue, and turns finally to his early aims of true healing. The book is of more than ordinary interest, and is written in a style which possesses far more of clarity and terseness than that of the "popular" magazine serial writer. Yet there is a lack of unity in the narrative which leaves the reader with an impression of incoherence. Mr. Herrick's later novels have not equalled in poise and finish one of his earlier efforts. "The Common Lot." But "The Healer" deserves careful reading and is very much up-to-date in its study of the psychic aspects of disease. Toronto: The Macmillan Company of Canada.

□

ANOTHER novel with a maternal title, also a Macmillan publication, is "Mother," by Kathleen Norris, a much more wholesome and refreshing story than the Zona Gale production. The young heroine, Margaret, rebels against her lot of monotony and hard work, as one of a numerous family, when along comes a "millionaire lady," who whisks Margaret away to a life of luxury and idleness, which that young person naturally enjoys. She learns to regard her mother with compassion, as a toiler without recompense, and reflects with half-contemptuous compassion on the sordid trials of such a lot. After years of travel and novelty, Margaret returns to her father's house, where, by a process of gradual enlightenment, she comes to see that her mother is leading a broader and more useful life than her friends of more pretentious aims. There is a tender little romance inwoven with Margaret's home-coming, and the story closes in the conventional fashion, with a prophecy of wedding bells. Perhaps the reader might desire a happy medium between the "Mother's" household, with the shabby furniture and unremitting toil, and the luxurious inanity of the Carr-Boldt's existence. "Mother" is a charming story, brightly told.

Head Office . TORONTO

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS
$6,650,000

TOTAL ASSETS
$50,000,000

Parents, teach your Children economy

This is one of the greatest factors in their education. Have them put away their five and ten cent pieces, even coppers. Arrange with them to go to the Bank and start a savings account. Afterwards, with them, watch the balance grow. Then, not only do you teach them economy, but you get into closer touch with them. 616

The Traders Bank of Canada

INCORPORATED 1885

113 BRANCHES THROUGHOUT CANADA

No More Cold Hands

PERFECTION SMOKELESS OIL HEATER

A woman often does not notice what a cold day it is so long as she is bustling around the house. But when she sits down to her sewing and mending, she soon feels chilly.

It is then she needs a Perfection Smokeless Oil Heater. Its quick, glowing heat warms up a room in next to no time.

That is the beauty of a Perfection Smokeless Oil Heater. It is always ready for use; you can carry it wherever you please; and you light it only when you want it.

The Perfection Oil Heater is smokeless and odorless — a patented automatic device insures that. It is reliable, safe and economical — burns nine hours on one filling. Handsome, too — drums finished either in blue enamel or plain steel, with nickel trimmings.

Dealers everywhere; or write for descriptive circular to any agency of

The Imperial Oil Company, Limited
The Queen City Oil Company, Limited

A GREAT SAVING

Doors and Windows tight enough to keep out winter storms—will keep down the cost of fuel.

Write for advice and plans for protecting your home. Many in your locality are using our system.

CHAMBERLIN METAL WEATHER STRIP CO.
YONGE STREET - - TORONTO, ONT.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed the Publishers.

HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

When two numbers are given with one costume, two patterns are required at 12 cents each. Send cash to PATTERN DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, 59-61 John Street, Toronto, Canada
Order always by number, stating size wanted. Patterns are mailed from our Toronto office the same day as order is received. PAPER PATTERNS TWELVE CENTS EACH POST PAID.

Fashionable Winter Costumes

STREET costumes are unusually attractive this season, and more varied than common. Tailored suits are shown both with regulation coats and with more fancy ones in Empire style, and little girls are wearing coats both of full and three-quarter length, finished with collars of different sorts. The three costumes illustrated are typical and all are smart.

The suit to the extreme left shows one of the favorite herring-bone suitings with collar of velvet. The coat can be made in length illustrated or to wrist length, as preferred. The skirt is six-gored. It can be made with two panels at the front and two at the back, or with one at the front and one at the back, or with panel at the back only, and these panels can be made round or square at their lower edges. Also the skirt can be finished at the high or natural waist line, and the collar of the coat can be made pointed or round at the back. For the medium size the coat will require 4½ yards of material 27, 2⅜ yards 44 or 52 inches wide, with ½ yard of velvet for the collar; for the skirt will be needed 6¾ yards 27, 5⅛ yards 44 or 52 inches wide, the width at the lower edge is 2¼ yards. The pattern of the coat, 7176, is cut in sizes from 34 to 44 inches bust measure, and of the skirt, 7166, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist measure.

The second costume shows a skirt of quite different cut from the preceding one, but one that is equally smart. It is made in three pieces finished at the lower edge with a tuck, and beneath this tuck is attached a straight band, while this band is opened at the sides over wedge-shaped panels. The coat is very smart in Empire style. It can be made with three-quarter or long sleeves, and with collar that can be pointed or round at the back. In this case broadcloth is combined with striped suiting, and such combinations are much in vogue, but the suit is equally well adapted to one fabric throughout, or to other combinations that may be preferred. For the medium size the coat will require 4⅜ yards of material 27, 2½ yards 44, 2⅛ yards 52 inches wide, with ¾ yard 44 for collar and cuffs; for the skirt will be required 6¼ yards 27, 3¼ yards 36 or 44, with ½ yard of any width for the panels, the width at the lower edge is 2¼ yards. The pattern of the coat, 7185, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 inches bust measure, and of the skirt, 7182, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist measure.

The little girl's coat is one of the prettiest possible. In this case it is made from one of the new checked suitings, and the collar and cuffs are of broadcloth, trimmed with velvet. The sailor collar is fashionable, and in every way desirable and it can be made from any preferred material, but many mothers like coats that are buttoned well up to the neck, and this coat can be finished as shown in the small view if better liked. Also it can be cut off to three-quarter length, although the coat that completely covers the gown is apt to be the preferred one for cold weather. For the 10-year size will be required 4 yards of material 27, 2½ yards 44, 2 yards 52 inches wide, with ⅝ yard of broadcloth and ⅜ yard of velvet for the collar. The pattern, 7180, is cut in sizes for girls of 8, 10 and 12 years of age.

No. 7176 No. 7166 No. 7185 No. 7182 No. 7180

New Evening Gowns

EVENING gowns for the winter season are always most interesting, and this year the exhibit of models is so varied, and in many instances so unusual that even those individuals who rail against society and the present inordinate love of dress are forced to bestow admiration, unwilling though it be, upon the latest example of the designer's art.

Oddly enough, there is more change in the evening gowns this season than in any others, and while it will be possible to remodel some of last year's designs, the latest styles are most distinctive, and in marked contrast to last winter. Some of the more eccentric styles of last season are again to be used this year, with only a slight modification, or, it might be said, exaggeration, of those of last winter. The one-sided effect is, for instance, in favor again; one side of waist and skirt of one material, such as lace or net, and the other of satin, taffeta or velvet. The design is often worked out in one material, but two colors. This is most effective, albeit somewhat too striking to suit conservative taste. Draperies of silk or satin or velvet in long double skirt or shawl effects, sleeveless coats and bands or folds are one and all most fashionable when two materials or two colors are combined. A most charming color scheme can be worked out in this fashion in net or lace and taffeta in white, for the different materials take on different shades, and yet all blend. This is most marked when the lining is of satin, for then the lustre of the satin gives almost another color in white.

There is no one color that is obligatory this winter for evening gowns, and both light and dark materials are in fashion. There are more vivid colorings than ever, and some wonderful shades of rose pink, empire green, royal purple and blue in satin, velvet and soft-finished taffeta, and there are trimmings woven expressly for these colors and fabrics that in themselves are beautiful and which seem to deepen the colors and accentuate them in some marvelous way. The iridescent of facts, the rhinestones, pearl beads, jet, steel, silver and gold woven into or embroidered in the fine net are or appear more brilliant than ever, and often two or three will be most cleverly combined.

There are few absolutely simple evening gowns, so far to be exhibited. Almost all are made with draperies or have double skirts, and while the embroidered and jeweled tunics are smarter than ever they are worn over skirts so fashioned that the double skirt effect is well defined, and the tunic can be either draped or left to fall in straight lines.

Draping is a marked feature in all evening gowns this winter, but it may only be seen in the draping of the long sash at the side or back, the idea apparently being to break the straight line. At the same time straight lines are not out of fashion, and the slender lines are just as obligatory as they were, only the draping is the latest fashion, and must be recognized accordingly.

Broadcloth with Velvet

BROADCLOTH combined with velvet makes many of the smartest costumes of the mid-winter. Here are two that are admirable from every point of view.

The young girl's dress is made from cloth in the favorite coral shade combined with velvet that is a little darker and with white lace and embroidered net for the yoke. The combination of materials, as well as the style of the gown, is smart in the extreme, but the model is of the available sort and can be utilized for many fabrics and for many occasions. With the blouse made as shown in the back view, the sleeves matching the main portions, it becomes much simpler in effect and can be utilized for cashmere, French serge or any similar material. Made after the manner illustrated it is excellent for broadcloth, velvet, velveteen and all fabrics of the kind. The blouse is cut in two sections that are overlapped at front and back and arranged over a chemisette. The sleeves are sewed to the big armholes, the main portions of the blouse being lapped and hooked into place invisibly. The skirt is cut with a two-piece upper and two-piece lower portion, but the lower portion is lapped on to panels. It can be finished with high or natural waist line. The blouse pattern is No. 7242, the skirt No. 7232.

For the 16-year size the blouse will require 1¾ yards of material 27, 1½ yards 36 or 44 inches wide with 2 yards of all-over lace 18 inches wide, and ⅜ yard of embroidered net; for the skirt will be needed 3 yards 27, 2½ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard of velvet for the panels and piping. The width at the lower edge is 2 yards.

The gown shown on the figure to the right combines one of the newest skirts and blouses. The skirt is simply circular. In this instance it is faced with velvet below the first row of fringe, but such treatment is entirely optional, for it can be left plain if preferred; in place of the fringe can be used any other trimming or the lines of the pattern can be disregarded and the skirt left a plain circular one if a simpler gown is wanted. The blouse is cut in two pieces only, seamed at the back, but the separate sleeves are stitched to big armholes. The collar can be made just as illustrated or shorter, terminating below the bust line, with square ends. In this case the neck is slightly open but the blouse can be made with chemisette and under-sleeves, if liked. The model is an excellent one for many materials. Broadcloth suits it to a nicety, but it also is good for velvet and for velveteen, and for simpler materials, as cashmere, henrietta cloth and the like.

For the medium size the blouse will require 3¾ yards of material 27, 3 yards 36, 1¾ yards 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard of all-over lace 18 inches wide, and 3 yards of fringe, 1¼ yards of lace for the sleeve frills, for the chemisette and under-sleeves that can be used when liked will be needed 1⅜ yards 18 inches wide; for the skirt will be needed 4 yards 27, 3⅝ yards 36, 2½ yards 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard of velvet and 10 yards of fringe. The width at the lower edge is 2⅜ yards.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7223, is cut in sizes from 36 to 46 bust; of the skirt, No. 7253, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist.

In Fashion's Realm

OF materials much has already been said. Among the handsome stuffs superb brocades and velvets multiply. A very large number of the most beautiful brocades have gold in combination with color, the gold more or less in evidence according to the design. Sometimes one is but conscious of a gleaming thread here and there or of a general shimmer of the background upon which the design is woven. Sometimes the gold is more boldly handled. There are wonderful chiffons and mousselines in color over whose surface run graceful designs entirely in gold. These in vivid color are stunning under shadowy veiling or plain diaphanous material, but the French designers do not hesitate to use even the most gorgeous of the brocades unveiled and in combination with plain monotone material or lace.

The velvets used for evening coats may be described as regal, and it seems rank heresy to say that results obtained with them are not always so good as those developed in simpler materials. The fact remains, however, and it is equally true in relation to frocks. An artist hand is necessary for the successful manipulation of brocades and embossed velvets, and even the artists have often achieved results about which there may be criticism. Much is done in velvet embossed mousselines and chiffons and these are much more easily handled than the velvets.

The Oriental colorings and many motifs are emphasized by a number of the French houses. There are wonderful trimmings in dull metal and rich Oriental colorings and many beautiful brocades and figured materials have a distinctly Oriental character.

Wool embroideries, which were launched in the summer, have assumed the proportion of a craze, and are in imminent danger of being overdone, though they are undeniably effective and interesting when artistically designed and used. In millinery one finds whose meshes gleamed green satin. The tiny brim was of mole fur, and there was for other trimming merely an Oriental looking ornament and tassels of wool embroidery in many colors. This is extreme, but it gives an idea of the length to which the fad goes.

Chiffon costume blouses embroidered in Oriental design and coloring with wool yarn are to be seen everywhere, having taken among the ready to wear jumper blouses the place occupied by bead embroidered chiffon last season. Where the wool embroidery is cleverly done these chiffon blouses have considerable smartness, but they are appearing in cheap and tawdry form and that threatens their life.

Blouse Pattern No. 7242
Skirt Pattern No. 7232

Blouse Pattern No. 7223
Skirt Pattern No. 7253

crocheted wool flowers and garlands, coarse and fine, large and small, used upon felt, velvet, fur, any and every material. There are cockades and rosettes, made of soft, heavy wool yarn, and crocheted hat bands of similar wool yarn, tassels of yarn, ornaments of cloth or velvet on fur boldly embroidered in yarn. A little toque had its entire round crown covered by an open crochet of green wool yarn through

The Old Sewing Room

IT may surprise most women to learn that it is not conducive to good health to sit in a rocking chair while sewing if the material has to be kept in one's lap. A rocking chair throws the body out of balance by pitching it backwards at an unnatural angle. In it the muscles of the front of the body —the muscles of the chest and diaphragm—are contracted, the chest is made hollow, the ribs are pulled down, and the back is rounded.

A chair with a straight back should be used, and the body should be held in the same erect position that the cutting table requires—chin and abdomen in, back straight, chest out. Of course it is necessary when sewing on the lap to bend forward, but the bending should be done from the hips—the back should not be rounded. Sewing at the machine properly conducted is an admirable exercise. Be sure to sit erect, bending only at the hips, and you will find the rapid pedaling will be beneficial as a healthful exercise.

Correct sewing is really governed by a few simple rules, which, if followed out, make the plying of the needle and thread an exercise which deepens the chest, improves the carriage, strengthens the back and shoulders, clears the complexion and brightens the eyes.

In the first place the sewing room should be well ventilated. The air in it should be as fresh and pure as the air out of doors. Three operations go on in the sewing room, viz., cutting, the seamstress standing at the table; stitching, seated at a machine; sewing, with the material in the lap. In cutting the manner in which the seamstress bends over the table is everything.

The following exercise taken two or three times a day is a wonderful help toward correct bending at the work table, that is, bending without constricting the chest or abdomen. Stand perfectly erect with the heels together, the chin and abdomen in, the chest out, the back straight. Slowly filling the lungs with air, raise the arms, held stiff, from the sides outward, until the hands meet over the head, and at the time the hands meet the lungs should be filled to their fullest extent with air. Slowly exhaling the air, lower the arms to the sides again. Repeat this movement twenty times.

There is a right way and a wrong way to sew, and she who pursues the right way arises from her sewing after a day's work greatly benefited. She may be weary, but her weariness is that derived from healthful work, like the weariness which follows a game of tennis, for instance, but the woman who habitually takes the wrong position runs a great risk of developing indigestion, to say the least, if not more serious lung trouble.

Smart Models for Mid-Winter

THE present is essentially a season of the entire gown, and models of this kind are worn both within doors and upon the street beneath long coats. The designs are extremely smart and the models adapted to many materials.

The skirt that gives a tunic effect is one of the very newest and best liked. This one is eminently simple while it provides the most graceful possible lines. It is fitted at the back with little tucks that are new and pretty. The blouse suits it to a nicety. It is made over a lining; it includes the new sleeves that are stitched to the armholes on the long shoulder line and it is finished with the pointed revers that make one of the very latest finishes. In the illustration a novelty silk and wool material is combined with velvet and with lace. The blouse is made over a fitted lining in which the undersleeves are inserted. There are frills arranged over the front and again over the sleeves that are to be seen between the revers, and the closing is made invisibly at the back. The upper portion of the skirt is made in three pieces and the foundation in two. It can be cut either to the high or natural waist line.

For the medium size the blouse will require 3¼ yards of material 27, 1⅝ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with ½ yard of velvet, 1 yard of lace 5 inches wide and 2⅝ yards 2½ inches wide, and 1¼ yards of all-over lace 18 inches wide; for the upper portion of the skirt will be needed 3½ yards 27 or 36, 2¼ yards 44 inches wide, and for the foundation 1½ yards of any width.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7268, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 bust, of the skirt, No. 7269, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist.

The gown to the right is made of fine French serge and trimmed with braid ornaments and worn with a lace collar. The blouse is closed at the front and the back portions are lapped on to the front in a distinctly novel manner. It includes kimono sleeves, but of the new sort that are separate from the blouse. There is a fitted lining and the sleeves are attached to it while the blouse is finished and arranged over both. The skirt is made with an upper portion that is cut in four gores, the back gores being extended to full length and with a two-piece lower portion. This lower portion is overlapped for several inches at the front and provides comfortable freedom for walking. The finish can be made either at the high or natural waist line. The blouse is made with three-quarter sleeves, but it can

The Famous Rayo Lamp

The best part of the day is the evening, when the whole family is gathered together around the lamp.

The old days of the smoky fireplace and flickering candle are gone forever. In their place have come the convenient oil stove and the indispensable Rayo Lamp.

There are to-day, in the United States alone, more than 3,000,000 of these Rayo lamps, giving their clear, white light to more than 3,000,000 homes.

Other lamps cost more, but you cannot get a better light than the low-priced Rayo gives. It has become so popular we may almost call it "the official lamp of the American family."

The Rayo is made of solid brass, with handsome nickel finish—an ornament anywhere.

Ask your dealer for a Rayo lamp; or write for descriptive circular to any agency of

The Imperial Oil Company, Limited
The Queen City Oil Company, Limited

United Garment

TRADE MARK

ON JAEGER UNDERWEAR

Jaeger, the warmest underwear made!

Weight for weight, JAEGER is the warmest and most sanitary underwear made.

Made of absolutely pure wool stockinet web, finished with pure wool facings, cut and made with care, and the experience of 30 years.

JAEGER PURE WOOL UNDERWEAR is the most sanitary, the safest and most comfortable underwear made.

Guaranteed against shrinkage.

Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woollen System Co. Limited

231 Yonge St., Toronto
316 St. Catherine St. West, Montreal
Steele Block, Portage Ave., Winnipeg

TOLTON'S SHIRTINGS

Are particularly suitable for

Ladies' Wash Waists and Suits

because they are Exclusive, Durable and Colors Fast to Sun and Tub.

Write for samples and they will be sent to you free, then you can order from them by mail. Our Scotch Zephyrs, English Oxfords, French Cambrics and Flannels are 32 inches wide and priced from 12½c. yd. up. We sell them direct to you in any quantity and guarantee them to more than please you or your money promptly refunded. All orders shipped prepaid.

One experiment will convince the most fastidious dresser that at last she has discovered the place to secure exquisite and beautiful materials at moderate cost. We invite you to have your name put on our mail order list for present or future. Just drop a card to Harry Tolton, Berlin, Ont., Maker of Fine Shirts and importer of Woven Shirtings of rare weave.

WANTED.—An educated lady in each city or town to show my samples of shirtings. The samples will appeal to and please any woman, because the designs are different from the ordinary. No experience necessary; occupation pleasant, and a splendid opportunity to make money in your spare time. For full particulars apply to

HARRY TOLTON - BERLIN, ONTARIO

The Best Wall Finish

Only one coat required
Easy to apply

Most beautiful, economical and sanitary wall coating made, can be applied by anyone to any kind of surface. Will not rub off or peel. Shows no spots or brush marks. Produces that subdued, velvety effect, so agreeable to the eye.

Muresco

Muresco is made in a large line of handsome tints and colors, also white. Ready for use when mixed with hot water. It can be re-coated any number of times, and entirely removed by washing, thus rendering it a simple matter to keep walls in perfect condition.

Beware of wall finishes that cannot be removed by washing; they are neither practical or sanitary. Will eventually peel off, leaving your walls in ruined condition.

Muresco costs no more than othe finishes an goes farther. Call for sample card and see handsome combination effects.

BENJAMIN MOORE & CO. Limited

Sole Manufacturers, Toronto, Canada.
New York, Chicago, Carteret, Cleveland.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

be made with long sleeves if preferred, and if a simpler finish is wanted the collar can be of the material or silk, or in place of the round collar can be used a regulation stock collar.

For the medium size the blouse will require a 3⅝ yards of material 27, 3 yards 36, 2¼ yards 44 inches wide with ¾ yard of lace for the frill and 1 lace collar or ⅜ yard of lace 18 inches wide, and 1½ yards of edging; for the skirt will be needed 4¼ yards 27 or 36, 3¼ yards 44 inches wide. The width at the lower edge is 2¼ yards.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7265, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust; of the skirt, No. 7261, in sizes from 22 to 32 waist.

Fringe Trimmings

FRINGE, as I have repeated again and again, says Miss Belgravia, in Ready-to-Wear, is a very fashionable feature. Coats are trimmed with fringe, and even fur and fancy stoles and muffs. The latest hand bags are hung with fringe. It is not to be recommended for a hard wear trimming, as it is apt to get tangled and untidy, but the fact must be recorded.

Lace is a craze, and all kinds are worn. Berthas and collars which have been put away for years are being looked over, and, in some cases, cut up to trim gowns and coats. The old macrame lace which used to be used for trimming furniture, and a few years ago was put on garments, is again to the fore for clothes, combined with eyelet embroidery. It is worth noting, for its effectiveness and the charm of novelty combined will make it a good feature for summer coats and even blouses, when combined with something else. Veiled with chiffon, this coarse lace would make a stunning blouse. For blouses, silk crepons are very good and come in lovely shades to match coats and skirts.

One-Sided Trimming

IN accordance with the general tendency of fashion to trim to one side of the garment, one-sided effects appear in increased numbers among the new blouses. The productions bearing out this idea show further uses and different arrangements of the side frill and side rever. Pleatings and ruchings are used to quite an extent, as trimming on the new lines. Fichu effects are still with us and continue for spring.

Belted and peplum styles will in all probability figure to no uncertain extent during the spring season. During the past summer many peplums were to be seen in New York and Paris, and manufacturers in the former place will take up the idea with new vigor for spring, and its influence will bear upon the Canadian trade. The arrival of this style will add a desirable novelty to the range.

Waist Pattern No. 7268
Skirt Pattern No. 7269

Waist Pattern No. 7265
Skirt Pattern No. 7261

For Evening Functions

THE models designed for evening wear are exceptionally graceful this season. A great many tunics are being worn and also a great many draped skirts. In the illustration is shown a young girl's frock made with a simple skirt and straight tunic, and a

Shall We Print One of These Five Roses Cook-books For YOU Free?

To a good cook with good flour and a good recipe, nothing is impossible.

If you use FIVE ROSES, you already have the good cook and the good flour—

We will now give you the good recipes.

If it were possible for you to meet the very finest cooks in Canada face to face, and obtain from them first hand their favorite recipes and culinary wrinkles—

That would be splendid, wouldn't it?

To obtain this priceless information, wouldn't you readily give a little time and trouble?

Tried and Tested Recipes

We will even do better than that for you.

Our office will be the exchange for the best cooks in the country.

Here we will collect their tried and tested recipes—we will arrange them in logical order (no small task)—we will print them in nice readable type on sturdy paper.

This will be the FIVE ROSES Cook-book—convenient in size—prettily illustrated in colors—the finest cook-book ever issued in Canada—in every way worthy of a LAKE OF THE WOODS product and of the housewives that use FIVE ROSES.

Only Bread and Pastry

And in order to make this book more valuable in its chosen sphere and cover a wider range, we will limit it to one special branch of home-making: THE ART OF BREAD AND PASTRY MAKING only:

But that's not all.

Besides the thousands of FIVE ROSES recipes, it will contain a vast amount of practical information and everyday hints invaluable to the housewife; wrinkles laboriously accumulated in our quarter century's experience with housewives and bakers.

Limited Edition

The cost of publishing this work must inevitably be considerable, and therefore, the edition must be limited.

So there is only one way to secure a copy—it is this:

Would you trade five minutes of your time for such a useful article?

So valuable that we could not charge enough for it, and so give it to you free—if you use FIVE ROSES.

We merely ask your co-operation; Madam: your contribution.

Will YOU be one of the contributors—will YOU take place among the best cooks in Canada—will your name appear in the FIVE ROSES Cook-book?

Then write out a favorite recipe—one or more—bread and pastry—send it in NOW.

It's the only way to secure YOUR copy.

Get Your Copy

See list to your right.

It offers many suggestions.

We want just plain, ordinary, everyday recipes—economical recipes.

Your reward will be a copy of this book just as soon as it is off the press, a souvenir of the combined efforts of the very best Canadian housewives.

The lists will close on January 15th, 1912, and all recipes should be in our hands on or before that date.

The name of each contributor will appear after each recipe submitted in the cook-book.

Please write on only one side of the paper. Do not fail to sign your name. Give full address: No. and name of street, city and province.

Don't delay—remember the edition is limited and we expect a big demand—get YOUR name in early.

Write out your contribution NOW—mail to-day.

Contents

Angel Food.
Brownies.
Breakfast Food (Recipes).
Bannock.
Baking Powder (Home Made)
Bread—all kinds.
Buns.
Biscuits.
Cakes.
Crullers.
Crumpets.
Cookies.
Croquettes.
Corn Prone.
Cake Fillings.
Custards.
Corn Cake.
Currant Loaf.
Cocoanut Balls.
Dumplings.
Drops.
Doughnuts.
Devil's Food.
Day Yeast.
Eclairs.
Fritters.
Flaky Pastry.
Frostings.
Fancies.
Fillings.
Fadge.
Food Valves.
Gingerbreads.
Gems.
Griddle Cakes.
General Hints.
Hermits.
Hop Yeast.
Hoe Cake.
H. M. Yeast.
Icings.
Jonathans.
Jumbles.
Junkets.
Jam Jams.
Johnnie Cake.
Ladies' Fingers.
Loafs.
Layer Cakes.
Macaroons.
Madelines.
Muffins.
Methods of Cooking, etc.
Puff Paste
Pie Crust.
Puffs.
Pies.
Pie Fillings.
Puddings.
Pudding Sauces.
Parkins.
Pone.
Patties.
Potato Yeast.
Pan Dowdy.
Perpetual Yeast.
Popovers.
Pancakes.
Pancake Syrups.
Rusks.
Rocks.
Rolls.
Rosettes.
Syrups.
Short Pastry.
Sauces.
Snowballs.
Snaps.
Scones.
Sponge Cake.
Straws.
Sandwiches.
Sally Lunn.
Shortcake.
Toast.
Tarts.
Tart Fillings.
Trilbys.
Tries.
Varieties.
Waffles.
Wafers.
Wet Yeast.
Weights and Measures.
Yeasts.

Address your Envelope as follows:

Lake of The Woods Milling Co.
LIMITED

Room 310 Lake of the Woods Building

MONTREAL CANADA

Five Roses Flour

Not Bleached Not Blended

OXO Cubes are not a substitute for tea and coffee, but are infinitely better than either.

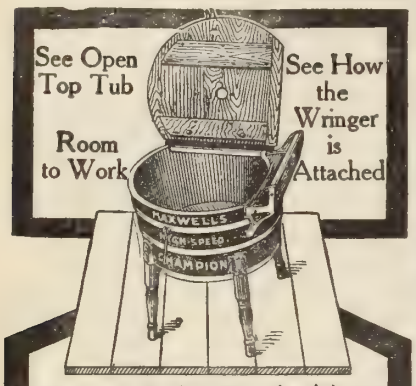
Tea and coffee affect both the nerves and digestive system.

OXO Cubes strengthen the nerves, assist digestion and add their own rich food properties to every meal.

Try an OXO Cube in a cup of hot water—instead of tea or coffee for breakfast.

56

10 for 25c.
4 for 10c.



MAXWELL'S
HIGH SPEED CHAMPION

The Wringer Board extends from the side, out of the way of the cover. This allows practically the whole top of the tub to open up—makes it easy to put in and take out clothes.

No other washer has as large an opening. No other washer can be worked with crank handle at side as well as top lever.

Do you use Maxwell's "Favorite"—the churn that makes quality butter?

Write us for catalogues if your dealer does not handle them. 89

DAVID MAXWELL & SONS, ST. MARY'S, Ont.

The best cleaning and dyeing establishment in Canada is at your service as handy as if located in your own city.

Use the mail for Gloves and Laces. Send Waists, Skirts, Curtains, Blankets and other bulky goods by express.

Dry Cleaning with us means, a scientific treatment that really cleans the fabric.

We pay express one way on goods from out of town.

Write for free copy of our book, which tells all about our work and our prices.

Fountain "My Valet"
30 Adelaide St. W., Toronto.

SHORT STORY WRITING

A complete, practical and thorough course of instruction prepared by and taught under the supervision of one of America's ablest Writers and Tutors.

The Magazines go Begging
for bright interesting stories. This appeal is to YOU. Cut out this ad and mail to-day for particulars.

Name .....
Address .....

THE SHAW CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL
391 397 Yonge St., TORONTO

gown for a more mature woman with train and draped skirt.

The girl's dress in this instance is made of lace flouncing over satin. The tunic consists of only two straight pieces. The blouse is made in peasant style and the fichu is arranged over it. Any pretty soft material could be used quite as well as the lace. Satin over satin is extremely fashionable and the frock could be made of that material in two colors, as coral over white, with perfect success. Again the model can be utilized for day-time occasions by adding the yoke and under-sleeves. The skirt is a simple one, cut in three pieces.

For the 16-year size the tunic blouse will require 4 yards of lace flouncing 30 inches wide, with ¼ yard of chiffon for the frills to make as shown in the front view, 5½ yards of plain material 27, 3¾ yards 36 or 44 with 2 yards of fringe and ⅞ yards of all-over lace to make as shown in the back view; for the skirt will be needed 3½ yards 27, 2⅜ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, the width at the lower edge is 2⅛ yards.

The pattern of the blouse with tunic, No. 7247, and of the skirt, No. 7149, are both cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age, and are well adapted to small women.

The costume to the right combines brocaded silk with velvet and is trimmed with fur and with beaded banding. Both materials and style are in the height of fashion, but at the same time the model can be utilized in many ways. Chiffon velvet is much liked for evening gowns this season. Satin is essentially smart, crêpe météore is being much worn, and the gown suits all these materials as well as it does the brocade. For the trimming can be used any preferred banding, or the skirt can be finished with a little edging of iridescent nail heads or any similar edge, in place of the fur, while the bodice could be finished with bead banding or embroidered with beads applied over a simple design. As shown in the back view the blouse is made with high neck and under-sleeves and becomes suited to quite different use. Treated in this way it can be combined with any preferred skirt.

For the medium size the blouse will require 3¼ yards of material 21, 2¼ yards 27, 1⅝ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with ⅜ yard of velvet and ¾ yard of banding; for the skirt will be needed 8⅝ yards 27, 6¾ yards 36, 5½ yards 44 inches wide with ⅜ yard of velvet, and to trim the entire gown 5½ yards of fur banding.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7255, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust; of the skirt, No. 72B, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist.

Blouse Pattern No. 7247
Skirt Pattern No. 7149

Blouse Pattern No. 7255
Skirt Pattern No. 72B

Much jade now comes from New Zealand, where many superstitions attach to it. Grotesque figures of jade, having glaring red eyes, are worn on the breasts of warriors in North Island, and hatchets, sabres, and daggers of jade are owned by every Eastern soldier of rank.

Velvet Suits

THIS is to be a great velvet season, the finely striped velvets being very much liked for tailoring as are the very heavily ribbed velvets and velours on the order of corduroy. Paquin has turned out a likeable coat and skirt costume in a rather dark grey velvet of the corduroy type, but with cord still heavier than that of corduroy. There seems to be a little black woven

Feeds the Hair

Have you ever thought why your hair is falling out? It is because you are starving your hair. If this starvation continues, it will continue to fall.

HISCOTT HAIR TONIC

is assuredly the ideal remedy for poor hair and sick scalps. You will realize this if you use it. $1.00 express paid.

HAIR REJUVENATOR restores gray and faded hair (medium brown to black) to former color in ten days. Not greasy or sticky, contains nothing harmful, clear as water. For hair less than half gray, $1.00 express paid. Sample on request.
DANDRUFF CURE. No scalp can be healthy if crusted with dandruff or eczema. Use Dandruff cure and have conditions different. $1 express paid.
SUPERFLUOUS HAIR, MOLES, ETC., permanently destroyed by our method of Electrolysis. Satisfaction assured. Booklet "H" and sample of Hair Rejuvenator on request.

Hiscott Dermatological Institute
61 College St., Toronto. Estab. 1892.

"SWAN" FOUNTAIN PEN.

Always Ready
Never Fails.

Fitted with gold iridium tipped nib and perfect feed.

Prices from $2.50

Sold by leading stationers and jewellers. CATALOGUE FREE.
MABIE TODD & Co., 124 York St., Toronto
London, New York, Chicago

WINDSOR TABLE SALT

"You are very lucky girls to have Salt like this

"When I was just starting housekeeping, the only good thing about the salt we had, was its salty taste.

"But you girls can get

Windsor Table Salt

—that excellent salt which stays fresh and dry in all kinds of weather—and never "cakes" or "hardens." You will never have any trouble with Windsor Table Salt."

14

in with the grey, for one gets a slight impression of shot effect in some lights.

The short loose coat crosses from right to left and fastens from throat to bottom, a straight collar of skunk being attached to the coat, encircling the neck closely, and falling in short ends over the shoulder. The sleeves are bordered with bands of skunk of the same width as collar, and there is no other trimming except big fastenings formed of cord made from the velvet. The coat is lined with a beautiful white crepe meteor brocaded in black velvet, which shows when the fronts are thrown open.

Set of Velvet and Fur

A GREAT many fancy sets of collarettes, muffs and hats are being worn this season and, indeed, a great many scarfs and muffs with hats of different material. Velvet with trimming of fur is especially fashionable, but there are many materials used. Satin is liked for some occasions, for evening wear brocaded silk is used, and in some instances are to be seen such materials as Oriental embroideries with bands of fur. This scarf and muff suit such treatment especially well. They are absolutely simple and easy to make. At the same time the model can be utilized for fur skins and for fur cloth, if liked. In fact, fur cloth is exceptionally handsome this season and makes up most attractively. The collarette is made with front and back portions that are joined at the back and over the arms and it fits comfortably and smartly about the neck. The muff is made in one piece and is designed to be lined and interlined. It is soft and flat, in conformity with the latest style.

To make the scarf and muff will be required 2 yards of material 21, 1¾

Collarette and Muff, No. 7241

yards 52 inches wide with 6 yards of fur banding and 4 tails to trim as illustrated.

The pattern, No. 7241, is cut in one size only.

When a Girl Travels

THE girl who made the gift is one who has little money to spend and whose friends are among a wealthy set, who have everything that money can give. But the girl in question has exquisite taste and deft fingers, and she works out ideas and makes her presents eagerly received.

For a friend who is going to Europe the clever one has just finished a set of bags and wrappers for dresses which are both pretty and practical.

The material is heavy rose pink linen and each piece in the set is embroidered with the girl's initials elaborately done in cipher.

There are eight bags in the set, their size being six inches by fourteen long. The narrow part is the top, and the cipher is placed in the middle, just below the edge. There are two ribbons at the top for tying the bag together and all are intended for shoes. One is lined with oilskin and intended for a damp pair of shoes should one be so unfortunate as to be obliged to pack them in that state.

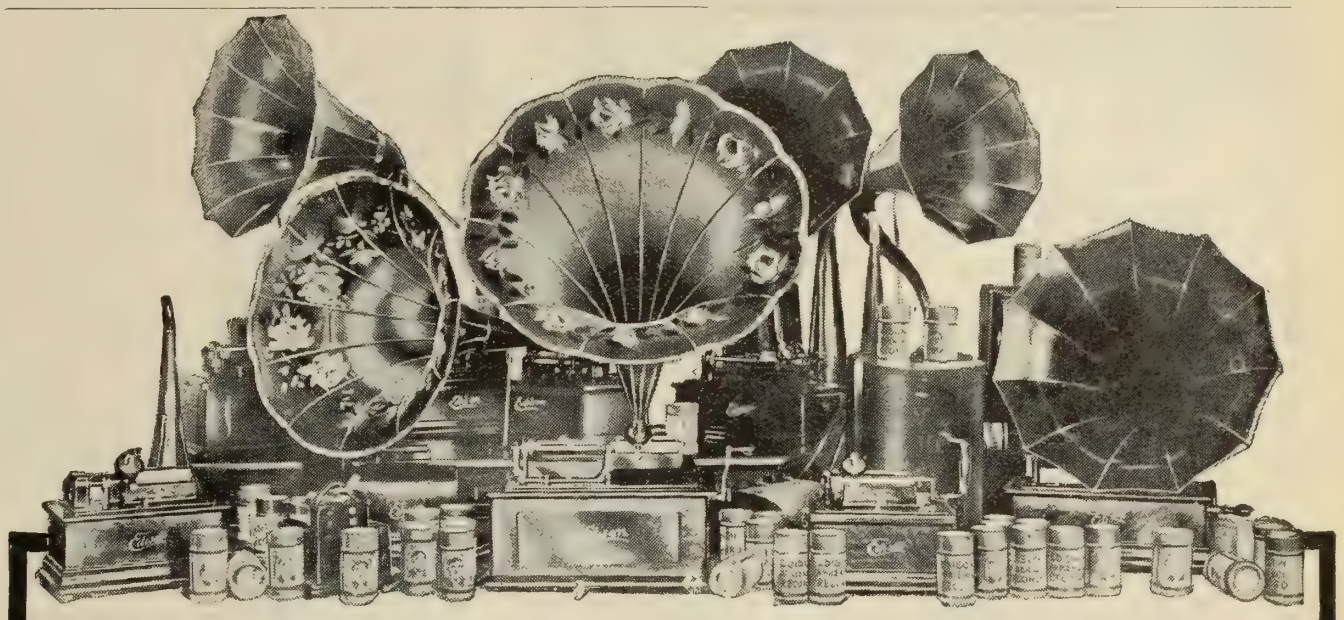
The wrappers are squares of linen the width of the material. The edges are turned for a hem and feather stitched with white embroidery silk instead of being bound. In the very centre a large cipher is done. Dresses folded smoothly and snugly, placed in the centre of one of these squares, the linen lining then tightly pinned along the edges and ends, will keep their freshness for many days and take far less room than when in boxes.

Modern Millinery

ALTHOUGH far less garnish in the way of feathers and flowers is put on the head this winter, yet that part of the anatomy is receiving fully as much, if not more, attention than ever. Coiffeurs declare that hair is the best decoration for the head, and they are keeping themselves busy with pretty wigs, curls, fringes and plaits to transform things. The modish head must be quite round until it reaches the back, where there is a small shower of curls. The big erection that has been built on the head to make it assume large proportions is seen no more. The search now is for the head that is most mignon and dainty—without being too small.

The Fur Redingote

THE fur redingote is one of the characteristics of this year. It is made of seal or tailless ermine, and it is as supple and light as velvet. Such redingotes are worn over handsome cloth, velvet or satin gowns. Some of the trimmings lavished on these long fur garments are very beautiful, with bright colors and motives outlined with gold or solid with gold. Some of the shawl collars cross so low at the front that they come well to the knees; and one side is often round while the other is square. It is amusing to see the efforts which furriers make, under the limitations of a law that compels a spade to be called a spade, or, in fact, that makes him call skunk "skunk," and rat "rat," to salve the feelings of the women who buy the skins of these humble little brothers. Rat skin is as a fact employed, but the furrier says it is not the common house rodent which lives from the garbage pail, but the sleek little prairie rat, which feeds on nectar. After all, what is chinchilla but a simple South American rat, which, being far fetched, has acquired caste as he has traveled northward. Two of the handsomest combination fur coats seen this year had Hudson seal as one of the conspicuous parts. One was of moleskin, the skins put together to make a sort of watered effect, and the seal outlined the long shawl collar, made the cuffs and the shaped band which went around the skirt and up one side the front of the coat. The buttons were covered with seal trimmed with heavy silk cord. The other coat was of Hudson seal with the big square sailor collar of the same fur, and the shawl fronts of the collar of ermine. These shawl fronts were very wide and long, crossing at the waist line, but one side extending far below and ending in a loop which fastened over one big seal-covered button. The deep cuffs were also of the ermine. The muff was of the ermine with seal ends.



Your Choice of Any of These EDISONS FREE

Yes, FREE. Shipped positively and absolutely free. You do not have to pay us a single penny either now or later. We don't ask you to keep the phonograph—we just ask you to accept it as a free loan. We do not even ask you for any deposit or any guarantee, not even any C. O. D. payment to us. All we ask is that you tell us which of the magnificent Edison outfits you prefer so that we can send that one to you on this free loan offer.

Just Take Your Choice You Don't Have to Buy Anything

Get any of the outfits shown above—your choice of records too. Simply get the phonograph and the records and use them free just as though they were your own. Entertain yourself, your family and your friends too, if you wish, with everything, from the catchiest, newest popular songs, side-splitting minstrels and vaudeville monologues to the famous grand operas, Amberola and other records sung by the world's greatest artists. Hear all this to perfection on the Edison Phonograph. After you have had all this entertainment absolutely free, then you may simply send the outfit right back to us at our expense. Now, if one of your friends wishes to buy such an outfit tell him that he can get the rock-bottom price, on easy payments, too; even as low as $2.00 a month without interest. But that's not what we ask of you. We just want to send you your choice of the latest style Edison Phonograph free—your choice of records too, all free—then we will convince you of the magnificent superiority of the new style Edison. It will cost us a little in express charges to get the phonograph back from you—that is true—but we'll feel amply repaid for that, knowing that we have made you a friend and a walking advertisement of the new style Edison Phonograph.

Send Coupon for the New Edison Books FREE Today

Get our handsome Free Edison Catalog and list of over 1500 records so you can select just the machine and the songs, recitations, etc., you want to hear on this ultra generous offer. Remember, there is absolutely no obligation on your part. All you need to do is to return the outfit at our expense when you are through with it. If you enjoy good music, and the finest and most varied entertainment that it is possible to imagine, or if you want to give your family and friends a treat such as they could not possibly get through any other means, then you should certainly send the Free coupon today. Don't wait—your name and address on a postal will do but the coupon is handier. No letter necessary. Be certain to write while the offer lasts. Better write today.

F. K. Babson, EDISON PHONOGRAPH DISTRIBUTERS

Dept. 8121, 355 Portage Avenue, WINNIPEG, CANADA. U.S. Office: Edison Block, Chicago, Illinois.

FREE COUPON

F. K. BABSON
Edison Phonograph Distributers, Dept. 8121
355 Portage Avenue, WINNIPEG, CANADA

Without obligations on me, please send me your great Edison Catalogs, and also full explanations of your Free Offer on my choice of a new style Edison Phonograph.

Name .....

.....

Address .....

.....

No letter necessary. Just sign and mail Free Coupon NOW

Try the flour that holds the confidence of thousands of home-cooks

THE present huge demand for PURITY FLOUR shows the confidence in which it is held by thousands of home-cooks.

Those who have used PURITY FLOUR have come to believe in it. They look on PURITY as a friend. They feel they can trust it implicitly, because each and every lot of PURITY FLOUR has always been uniform—always up to the high standard of quality that has made it famous.

Wouldn't you, too, like to use a flour you could always rely on? Wouldn't you like to feel certain that your bread, cakes, and pies were going to turn out exactly right? That's just how you'll feel when you become a user of PURITY FLOUR — the confidence-creating flour.

PURITY FLOUR gives high-class results, because it consists exclusively of the high-grade portions of the best Western hard wheat.

On account of the extra strength of PURITY FLOUR please remember, when making pastry, to add more shortening than an ordinary flour requires.

PURITY FLOUR

"More bread and better bread"

And when making bread add more water, and PURITY FLOUR will expand into more loaves than the same weight of ordinary flour can produce, thus making "more bread and better bread."

Make your next flour order spell P-U-R-I-T-Y F-L-O-U-R.
It costs slightly more, but it's worth the difference.
Add PURITY FLOUR to grocery list right now.

104

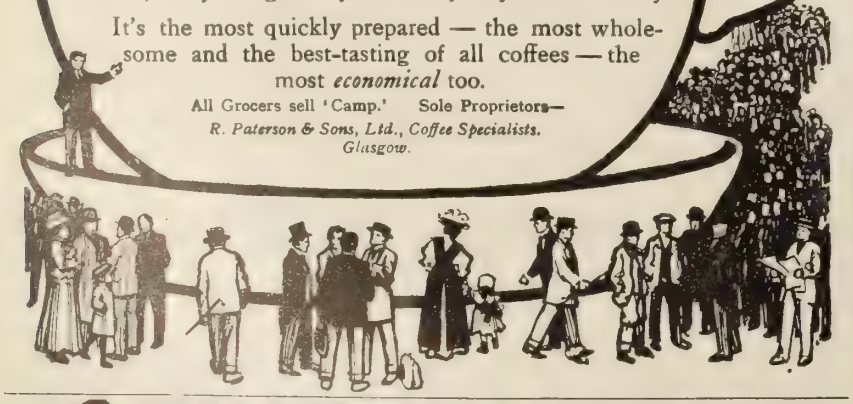
Thousands say 'It is the Best.'

'CAMP' COFFEE

'Camp' has found a rousing welcome in many a thousand homes; why not give it just one try in yours — to-day?

It's the most quickly prepared — the most wholesome and the best-tasting of all coffees — the most economical too.

All Grocers sell 'Camp.' Sole Proprietors—
R. Paterson & Sons, Ltd., Coffee Specialists. Glasgow.



ARNOTT INSTITUTE

The work of the ARNOTT INSTITUTE in treating Stammerers and Stutterers is becoming more and more widely recognized as perhaps the most successful on this continent.

Following our own scientific methods, the Institute treats the CAUSE of stammering —not the habit itself. It teaches the patient why he stammered, and once he understands that, it is comparatively easy for him to learn, in from five to eight weeks, how to speak fluently and naturally, without any of the objectionable mannerisms commonly taught. As he knows why he is speaking correctly, the cure is permanent.

If you know anyone who stammers or stutters, in kindness to them advise them to consult the ARNOTT INSTITUTE.

BERLIN, ONTARIO, CAN. 7

NOW come the happy days of bargains in model gowns and suits. Velvet and cloth suits, motor and walking coats and charming afternoon and evening gowns are among the attractive "reduced" features in the large shops. Velvet is the most imposing fabric for winter wear, and, when worn with furs, is the ideal costume for the days when snow is on the ground. Violet and crimson are the most imperial colors in this effective material, and, when worn with ermine, make a fit setting for any feminine loveliness.

The laces for this season are extremely rich in effect and give one an impression of Oriental magnificence. Gold is seen everywhere, on fringes, braids, collars and lace. The metallic "idea" has certainly taken possession of the world of adornment, and laces, with copper, bronze, ruby, emerald or turquoise touches are the most popular and effective trimming. Royal blue still holds its own as a popular color, and is veritably fit for a queen, when combined with gold lace or filmy net with gleaming spangles. Perhaps, we owe all this iridescence and radiance to the Durbar, but we are assuredly reminded at the trimmings counter of the poet's lines on the gorgeous East with its "barbaric pearl and gold."

The sales before Christmas made attractive display of silk hosiery. Even the woman who regards economy as a cardinal virtue is likely to weaken when she surveys a counter filled with silken hose in the most alluring "evening" shades. Nor are the prices such as need alarm the thrifty. A pair of good silk stockings, with lisle tops and soles may be bought for seventy-five cents, while the more expensive styles and weaves run as high as five dollars. However, we are more fortunate than the ladies who lived in the days of King George the Third, for a modern story of those picturesque days informs us that for a gala occasion in Bath, the fashionable dames paid as much as twenty guineas for a pair of green silk stockings embroidered in butterflies.

LEATHER goods, especially in the smaller articles for wear or toilet use, may be bought at very reasonable prices at this time of the year, and the wise purchaser may find in the shops after Christmas many a tempting bargain in collar bag, pocket-book or shopping bag. This is truly the day for bags, which may be seen in all sizes and fabrics, from tapestry to satin. The suede bag is a favorite with many women, and very dainty bags of this material, in brown, grey, green and tan may be bought just at this time for three or four dollars. An objection made by some is that these bags soil very soon; but a sponging with gasoline very soon remedies this condition, and gives you a bag which is practically new.

In these long winter evenings, there is nothing more comfortable for the "father of the family" than a good, warm house coat or dressing gown, and the most cheerful and substantial styles are shown as the winter days grow colder in grey, red, olive and brown. In fact, the very sight of them is enough to make a man forswear the club, the lodge or any other masculine gathering, in favor of the comfort which awaits him at his "ain fireside." Then there are neckties of dainty coloring—but she is a brave woman who buys a necktie for a man relative.

AMONG articles of wearing apparel which attract women shoppers at this season, none are more irresistible than furs. And such a showing as there is this year in muffs, stoles, four-in-hands and shawl-like arrangements resembling the old-fashioned pelerine! January sees many of the best articles, which will no doubt remain in fashion for more than one season, reduced in price and quite within reach of the woman who cannot afford mink or astrachan. Some of the cheaper furs, such as chinchilla and fox, are as pretty and cosy as anyone need desire. A "trip" to the fur department is well worth your while.

Abbey's Effer-vescent Salt

A wise person knows when to use Abbey's salt.

Don't you think it time to get a bottle?

25c and 60c.

Sold everywhere.

82

TO submit to a headache is to waste energy, time and comfort. To stop it at once simply take

NA-DRU-CO Headache Wafers

Your Druggist will confirm our statement that they do not contain anything that can harm heart or nervous system. 25c. a box.

NATIONAL DRUG & CHEMICAL CO. OF CANADA, LIMITED.

127

ASTHMA CATARRH

WHOOPING COUGH CROUP
BRONCHITIS COUGHS COLDS

Vapo-Cresolene

ESTABLISHED 1879

A simple, safe and effective treatment for bronchial troubles, without dosing the stomach with drugs. Used with success for thirty years.

The air rendered strongly antiseptic, inspired with every breath, makes breathing easy, soothes the sore throat, and stops the cough, assuring restful nights. Cresolene is invaluable to mothers with young children and a boon to sufferers from Asthma.

Send us postal for descriptive booklet. 310

ALL DRUGGISTS

Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat. They are simple, effective and antiseptic. Of your druggist or from us, 10c. in stamps.

VAPO CRESOLENE CO.
Leeming-Miles Bldg.
MONTREAL

BLACK KNIGHT STOVE POLISH

The best stove polish on the market—and the biggest can for the money. "Black Knight" is a paste—no mixing—no trouble—no dirt. Convenient, economical—shines quick as a wink—and the shine stays on. Just as good for pipes, grates and ironwork as for stoves.

If your dealer does not carry "Black Knight" Stove Polish, send us his name and 10c. and we will send a full size tin by return mail.

THE F. F. DALLEY CO., Limited, Hamilton, Ont.

Makers of the famous "2 in 1" Shoe Polish. 33

Winter Term

In the Central Business College of Toronto begins January 2nd. Commercial, Shorthand, Telegraphy or Civil Service Courses —26 teachers—151 typewriting machines—multigraphs, roller copiers and filing cabinets—Everything to thoroughly equip our graduates. Write today for catalogue.

W. H. SHAW, PRESIDENT,
Yonge and Gerrard Sts., Toronto.

ARTISTIC EMBROIDERIES

SOME of the newest ideas in artistic embroideries are illustrated on this page, and we are sure our readers will be interested in the variety shown. It is of course impossible to convey the beauty of the articles from which these illustrations have been made, as the artistic colorings are, of course, lost in the reproduction, but we think with the description of the method of working and the shades of embroidery silk used our readers will have no difficulty in reproducing any of the designs illustrated.

No. 5886—27-Inch Millefleur, 55 cents

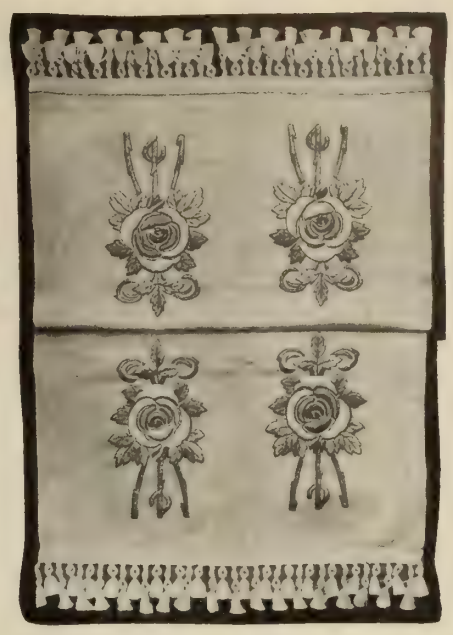
The Millefleur centrepiece and cushion is a very graceful arrangement of this popular style of embroidery, which was described in our columns before, but we will repeat this to avoid any possible misunderstanding. Two strands of Royal Floss are threaded together in a needle, and the petals are made by one long straight stitch which fully covers the stamped line. A better result is obtained if each stitch is taken from the centre of the flower outwards instead of carrying the thread from the outer edge to the next petal, this method of working rounds the petal distinctly. The centre of the daisy forms are composed of a large French knot made by using two strands of silk threaded together, one gold and one black. The bow knots on this design are worked in solid padded satin stitch, a pale shade of green is used, and a black outline around the outer edges brings out the bow knots effectively.

No. 6550—Cushion, 50 cents

The festoons of daisies are worked in shades of pink with small leaf forms worked in greens; these are worked in the same straight stitch as used for the daisy petals. Any preferred colorings may be used for this centrepiece and cushion, blues and tans, greens and browns are all effective. These designs are stamped on a special cream-colored linen.

A very handsome cushion and scarf suitable for a library or living room, are shown as Nos. 8055 and 8088. These designs are stamped on green burlap, and the roses which form a portion of the design in solid padded satin stitch, every portion of which is outlined with black. The pale greens are used for sign are stamped on velvet appliques which come already fastened into place. The designs illustrated are embroidered in dull olives and pale greens, the most effective combination. The design is worked the roses, and the olives for the scrolls and leaves.

No. 42—Cushion, 60 cents



No. 64—Scarf, $1.50

No. 8055—Green Burlap Velvet Applique, $1.25

Fringe dyed to match completes the scarf, and the cushion is already eyeleted for lacing.

Another beautiful cushion and scarf is shown, designs 42 and 64. These are tinted on heavy tan linen with handsome design of Dutch roses, leaves and scroll work. This design is solidly embroidered in beautiful shades of pink and greens. Every portion of the design is afterwards outlined with black; this method brings out beautifully the coloring. Heavy Russian fringe completes these. These scarfs and cushions are very fashionable at present, as they are admirably adapted to the mission style of furnishing.

No. 8088—Green Burlap Velvet Applique, $1.50

Any further information regarding the working up of these designs will be furnished upon request.

Silks may be supplied to embroider any of these designs at 55 cents per dozen, also fringes suitable to finish these designs may be had. Samples and prices furnished on request.

If readers cannot obtain these articles from their dealers, write the Belding Paul Corticelli, Limited, Linen Department, Montreal, for further information.

IF YOU WILL SEND US

— 35 CENTS —

we will send you

8 SKEINS OF EMBROIDERY SILK

which is sufficient to finish a

15 INCH CENTRE PIECE

which is stamped for

"THE NEW HEATHER EMBROIDERY"

This is the very latest embroidery which will be fashionable for 1912.

We will

SUPPLY FREE

sufficient lace to edge this Centre Piece, and the diagram enclosed will furnish full instructions for this beautiful embroidery which is simple but effective.

Send at once as this generous offer is made for a short period only.

Our Art Embroidery Silks are the best on the market.

Send 10 cents for a copy of Belding's Needle and Hook Book which contains all the latest suggestions for Art Embroidery. :: ::

Address

BELDING, PAUL, CORTICELLI
LIMITED

Dept. L MONTREAL, P.Q.

Ontario Women's Institutes

GEORGE A. PUTNAM
SUPERINTENDENT
PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS, TORONTO

The Annual Convention

SUCCESS appears to be the happy lot of the Women's Institutes, and especially is their good fortune manifest on the occasion of an annual convention. It was feared when the place of meeting was changed from Guelph to Toronto last year that the interest of the delegates might relax, as the Royal City had for so long been associated with large and enthusiastic gatherings. But 1910 saw goodly crowds of Institute delegates in Toronto, and this year has seen the most enthusiastic meetings ever held—a circumstance which must be most comforting to the superintendent, Mr. G. A. Putnam. The Guild Hall was the scene of meeting for morning and afternoon sessions on November 15th and 16th, and the University Convocation Hall held the audiences at the evening meetings.

The song "O Canada" appears to be firmly established in the affection of the Institutes, and formed the opening number on the programme. Mr. Putnam presided at the session the first morning, when the business methods in the Institute were dealt with. He gave a long report of the work that had been done by the Institute in the past year, and outlined a programme for the future. Three thousand members have been added, and now there were in all 654 branches and 19,091 members, with a total attendance in the year of 150,000. The institute was democratic, and women of all denominations and social standing came together and united in their work. In the past year many branches, such as Whitby, Lindsay and Hespeler, had provided permanent quarters where meetings were held, and young girls of the town came together every Monday evening for the purpose of interchanging suggestions on branches of domestic work. An interesting feature of the work of the Institute was the programme successfully presented last year, containing addresses by doctors, lawyers, dentists, bankers, butchers, grocers, etc., on topics relative to their profession or business. An endeavor should be made to accomplish something definite, and with this purpose in view the subjects chosen should be correlated. Mr. Putnam said that the programme for systematic instruction for a group of six institutes in Haldimand and Norfolk, which was proposed at the last convention, was being carried out successfully. It was intended only as an experiment, and would soon be extended to other institutes.

Miss M. U. Watson of the Macdonald Institute, Guelph, outlined the Demonstration Lecture Course of six weeks which has been tried with success in certain Institute districts. Five Institutes in a group will be able to do the most effective work, and it is well for each Institute to have one lesson a week. In places where it is difficult for the women and girls to come to afternoon meetings, it may be possible to arrange for evening sessions. A course of practical instruction costs each Institute about thirty-three dollars, and, where materials are supplied, the cost is reduced to twenty-five dollars. So far, cooking only has been tried, but such courses in nursing, dressmaking, etc., are likely to follow. This experiment has been so successful so far, that a memorial was drafted asking for an additional Government appropriation for the work.

At the afternoon session, Mrs. H. Endacott, of Orangeville, made an efficient presiding officer, referring to the broad scope of Institute aims, and emphasizing the necessity for sentiment and work going together. Mrs. James L. Hughes, of Toronto, whose platform ability is well known, gave an enthusiastic address of welcome, to which Mrs. D. O. White, of Kingsville, replied. Dr. Helen MacMurchy, of Toronto, gave an address on "Social Service," which was in her usual happy and practical vein. In the course of her remarks, Dr. MacMurchy said:

"Do you take as much interest in the election of your school trustees as you should, or do you even prevent your own husband from running for office by saying: 'No, not with that bunch?' 'If you do, you are really committing a grave crime. Social service consists in looking ahead as well as in setting things right, and when so many immigrants are coming to our country there is no doubt but that they need you and me to look ahead for them." The speaker said that the greatest social question of all was the housing problem, and to emphasize this point she showed several lantern slides of shacks outside the corporation limits of some cities. "Do you think," she asked, "that a plan is more necessary for a house or farm than for a city? Should squatters be allowed to erect any kind of buildings outside of the city limits, which when taken into the corporation are bound to make nothing but a slum area? At the next session of the Legislature we are going to draft a bill permitting us to buy land outside of the corporation where decent dwellings may be built, and when that bill comes before the House I ask you to give it your support."

Dr. MacMurchy said that the Church should be socialized if it were not so already. The public schools could be used far more than they have been. In the winter fires were often kept up all night, but the buildings remained dark, haunted, as it were, whereas if girls got together, debates and other meetings could be held in the schools. "Maybe you think this is not your business to get them together, but it is," said she.

The evening meeting in Guild Hall was presided over by Mrs. E. G. Graham, of Brampton, whose pleasant smile and manner would be worth a thousand a year to a political magnate. Miss Guest, of Belleville, gave an earnest address on "The Woman of the Twentieth Century," contrasting the position of the woman of to-day with the woman of a generation or two back. Many women now went out into the world and earned their own living. There are 7,500 women teachers in Ontario, besides many thousands more in office, store and factory, and still others in the nursing, medical and other professions.

The result, said the speaker, was that women not only became more independent, but they gained a wider outlook and a knowledge of the world—including the dangers and handicaps under which women have always lived. This knowledge and the wider outlook on life gained by the women who went out into the world was gradually disseminated among their sister women throughout the country.

Woman's greater independence today also made it unnecessary to marry for a living. She was more particular about the matter, and considered her own welfare more than she was able to do under former conditions.

The motherly instinct of the young woman of to-day, however, was as strong as before, and she was able to take her place in the home just as well and more intelligently than a generation or two ago. She had become more of a thinking woman, and she carried into the home some of the business ideas and initiative and independence which she had learned while in business life. She was a jealous guardian of everything that affected her home. The full control which she had over her children ceased only when they began to go to school. This made women earnestly interested in the management of the schools, because it affected the health and welfare in every way of her children. Consequently she believed women should be on the school boards.

In the same way women were interested in temperance work, in whatever will make for the safety of young women who go to towns and cities, in an equal moral standard for both sexes, and finally in the granting of the franchise to women as a means of wielding the influence which they claim a just right to, in regard to the many subjects in which women are vitally interested both on their own account and for the sake of their homes.

Hon. Adam Beck, Minister without portfolio in the Whitney Government, gave an up-to-date and illuminating address, "Electricity on the Farm and In the Home."

"Within a year the Hydro-Electric installation will mean for the principal cities a saving of $2,000,000. Within five years Ontario will have saved enough to pay for the whole project," said the speaker.

In a brief outline of the history of the project, Mr. Beck proceeded to show a great saving as its striking feature. Electric energy now produced at $9 per horse-power in exactly one-fifth of the cost of steam-generated power. Moreover the "white coal" now utilized does not fluctuate in price, because of strikes and strike-breakers, or because of import duties which vary at the whim of a United States trust.

There is no governmental revenue in this connection, nor does the policy favor sectional advantages, but a universal provincial system of lighting.

The wholesale criticism which greeted the inception of the scheme demanded caution on the part of the promoters. That was the reason of the Niagara district municipalities being first supplied. But now that success was assured, and public confidence invested, all Ontario shall benefit, and that, too, at a rate between Government and people, the cheapest in the world.

Never a complaint had appeared since the beginning, never a suggestion of change in the principle of the scheme.

A surplus of $85,000 out of the estimated cost remained after all construction had been completed, and all obligations disposed of. Furthermore, of tangible results, Ottawa shows prices simply cut in two, London, which had been charged 9 cents per kilowatt hour, now pays 4½, even Hamilton, the "power city," benefits to a marvelous degree, and every one of these cities, regardless of the slashing in price, enjoys an annual surplus of $250,000, $150,000 and $250,000 respectively.

"The Hydro-Electric policy is going to be of great consequence to the farmers of Ontario," declared Mr. Beck. "The great question to-day is: 'How can we keep our boys and girls on the farm?'

"They must be encouraged to stay there," agreed the speaker, "for agriculture takes the first place in enriching the province."

The crying need is for more comfort, more attraction on the farm, and less drudgery. The farmer's children in seeking the comforts of the city have made labor scarce and costly. Now is the agriculturists' opportunity to remedy the exodus. The Government is installing the transportation lines and a uniform apparatus; the only duty of the townships is to connect it with the homes.

"In two ways," continued the speaker, "will the system aid the farmer. Firstly, by a marked stimulation in his neighboring markets, and secondly by modern improvements and comforts installed in his own homestead."

By means of the lantern, Mr. Beck illustrated farm life in Germany, where electricity is used to a vast extent in pumping, threshing and dairy work, and yet at a cost of double that in Ontario.

ANNUAL CONVENTION, WOMEN'S INSTITUTES, TORONTO, 1911.

"I am not going to guarantee every farm," concluded Mr. Beck, "but the majority of farms, and especially those lying between connected towns will receive power easily and in abundance.

"As to the eastern counties and Huron, Grey and Bruce, the commission hoped to get a Federal permission to utilize local water power for the benefit of the section. Surely with power and lighting so cheap, so practicable, and so abundant, an era of comfort and prosperity was dawning for the Ontario householder and farmer."

Short addresses were made on the special work of institutes by Mrs. W. Dawson, of Parkhill, and Mrs. Dorrington, of Alton, and Miss M. U. Watson answered a number of stimulating questions.

On Thursday, November 16th, the attendance and enthusiasm were well sustained. Mrs. L. A. Hamilton, of Port Credit, presided at the morning session, and Miss Laura Rose, of Guelph, at the afternoon meeting. Mr. C. J. Atkinson, of the Broadview Boys' Institute, Toronto, gave an address, "What We Can Do for the Boys," and Miss Holston, of Parkhill, dealt with "The School; Its Relation to the Community," discussing the school problem from a woman's viewpoint. "Should women have a place on the school board of trustees?" was a question handed to her, but she did not go so far as to answer "Yes" to it. The point she made was that "Since everything a child learns or does in the school falls more upon the mother than the father, the mother should have a 'say' in every school question." Her solution for the whole question was co-operation, and on her suggestion a Committee of Child Welfare was appointed. The members nominated by Mr. Putnam were: Miss Hotson, Miss E. Guest, Mrs. Norman and Mr. C. J. Atkinson.

MRS. E. G. GRAHAM, BRAMPTON.

Dr. C. J. Copp, of Toronto, told of how the Women's Institute might take up the work of the St. John's Ambulance Association. He explained the lectures on "First Aid to the Injured," and there is a possibility that some of the Institutes will begin this new work.

Dr. W. T. Connell, of Queen's University, Kingston, gave an instructive and well-illustrated address on "Water Supply," showing clearly how defective arrangements lead to infection and disease. Since most cases of typhoid fever can be traced to impure water supply, it behooves Canadians to remedy this evil as soon as possible, for such an epidemic means that there has been gross neglect and inertness. Judging by the interest with which Dr. Connell's hearers followed his remarks and watched the changing lantern slides as they depicted satisfactory and unsatisfactory conditions, the members of the Women's Institutes are alive to the importance of this question.

"The water of the villages and rural districts of Ontario is bad, very bad," said the speaker. "Out of one thousand samples of well water of eastern Ontario I found two-thirds of them to be polluted, and in one village eighty per cent. of the wells were polluted. In eastern Ontario nearly all the wells are surface wells, and this accounts for the bad condition of the water. There is more typhoid in our rural districts than in any of our cities, and the cause of this is that in many cases the wells are too near to the pig pen, the horse stable, or, worse still, the barnyard."

Miss Hotson, a school teacher of Parkhill, discussed the school problem.

At the evening session, Miss M. U. Watson, of the Macdonald Institute, presided with that business-like grace which makes her a welcome acquisition to any Institute gathering. Miss Watson remarked optimistically, "This is the most successful Institute convention I have had the pleasure of attending, and I have attended them all."

MRS H. PARSONS, FOREST.

Mrs. H. W. Parsons, of Forest, gave an address entitled, "A Woman's View of Life," which contained much that was helpful and suggestive. The speaker gave a sketchy review of the ground covered by former speakers, remarking, "Woman and her responsibility in the home have been emphasized very strongly. I want to speak of Joy in Life.

"We have not enough joy in the home. We are apt to think of it as a place to eat and sleep. There is enough inevitable sadness in the world. We meet it wherever we go, and are overcome by the contagious gloom of it. For the child's sake, make the home bright, make it a place to be glad in. Let there be a legitimate outlet for the children's exuberant spirits. Keep their anniversaries. They serve the double purpose of giving pleasure at the time and leaving memories they will love to look back upon. 'Make a child happy, and you will make him good.' If we are going to help build up a beautiful character we must begin at the beginning.

"Let your children learn the great facts of life from you, through the life of nature, which reveals the story through flowers and birds, thus leading the child up to the heights of Creation.

"Young people should be allowed to meet and allowed freedom to enjoy each other's company in the home. Don't be afraid, mothers, that you are not wanted where young people are. Be a companion, keep young and sweet yourself. If you do not, you are likely to lose their comradeship. A young man often feels he is the object of adverse criticism and antipathy of the whole family. We expect a peculiar attitude in young men. We must not expect them to court us, too. They have neither time nor inclination. Let the young man who visits your home feel that you are his friend."

MRS. H. ENDACOTT, ORANGEVILLE.

In giving some excellent advice to girls the speaker urged: "Never marry a man you cannot honor, nor a man who

Your Profits

You take more interest in your own welfare than anybody else, or than you do in anybody's else.

What you do, and how you do it determines your success or failure.

It you skim milk with the genuine

DE LAVAL CREAM SEPARATOR

Congratulations

If you don't, send for catalog.

Agents everywhere.

The De Laval Separator Co.

173-177 Williams St.
MONTREAL
VANCOUVER—WINNIPEG

"Remember my face—you'll see me again."

Cook's first aid

The handy packet of Edwards' desiccated Soup is something the cook is always wanting, always ready when she needs it.

It solves the problem of good soup on busy days because it takes so little time to prepare. It helps her to make a tasty meal out of things that get "left over." It strengthens her own soups and suggests many a meal when she's wondering what to give.

EDWARDS' DESICCATED SOUP

There is not a kitchen in Canada where Edwards' Soup isn't needed; not a day when it does not aid the cook, and not a dinner which it will not help her to improve.

Edwards' desiccated Soup is made in Ireland from prime beef and fresh vegetables. Buy a packet to-day.

Edwards' desiccated Soup is made in three varieties—Brown, Tomato, White. The Brown variety is a thick, nourishing soup, prepared from best beef and fresh vegetables. The other two are purely vegetable soups.

5c. per packet.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

A pure, rich, high grade, flavory coffee. The kind that makes you linger over your cup—such is

Seal Brand Coffee

128

Packed in 1 and 2 pound cans only.

CHASE AND SANBORN, MONTREAL.

Have you received one of our Premium Lists showing many pleasing gifts for securing new subscriptions for the Canadian Home Journal.

Write for a copy to-day.

Do You Bake Your Own Bread?

Everyone who bakes bread should know about my Cream of the West Flour.

I guarantee absolute satisfaction and I won't take money for less. A crust, brown, crisp and sweet; a crumb, white, light and even. Get a bag and bake a batch or two.

Cream of the West Flour

the hard wheat flour guaranteed for bread

If you don't have success with your bread after a fair trial bring back the flour left over and your grocer has our authority to refund full purchase price.

Guarantee

WE hereby affirm and declare that Cream of the West Flour is a superior bread flour, and as such is subject to our absolute guarantee—money back if not satisfactory after a fair trial. Any dealer is hereby authorized to return price paid by customer on return of unused portion of bag if flour is not as represented.

The Campbell Milling Co., Limited, Toronto. 103
Archibald Campbell, President

CREAM OF THE WEST

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

belittles you at home. Never cheapen yourself. No man is worth it. Stand upon your honor. If you have had good mothers and right training, you will do so instinctively. Do not flirt after you are engaged. Man is apt to think pretence is not all pretence. There is truly nothing half so sweet in life as Love's young dream. Girls are not sufficiently trained in business methods. They should be careful about outlay until they know how everything is to be financed." The speaker gave some humorous but shrewd advice as to marrying a quiet man, since the woman can usually do the talking for the household. Gentleness towards those who have erred was dwelt upon. Girls should be taught that honorable motherhood is a great opportunity for service to the race.

"Be exponents of a gospel of joy and love. Let us remember that we belong to a nation with a future of great promise. Let us be wise, as women, as mothers, as leaders. Let us take our part in the making of a glorious future for Canada."

Mr. Harris, in an address on "Our Dumb Animals," dwelt upon the fact that the Humane Society exists for the prevention, rather than for the prosecution of cruelty to animals. He emphasized the importance of giving children kindly ideas regarding the dumb animals, and their care. Many other protective institutions have sprung from the Humane Society idea.

Mr. Putnam gave a few closing remarks on the success of the convention, referring to his own responsibility as superintendent, and urging the importance of co-operation in achieving the utmost possible benefit. There was a need of more assistants, so rapidly had the work progressed. He wished the members of the Institute every success and progress during the coming year.

It was noticeable throughout the convention that emphasis is being placed on the work being done for the next generation. In Dr. MacMurchy's address, the aspect of "Social Service" which looks towards the betterment of conditions for those who come after us was optimistically displayed. In Miss Guest's talk on "Young Women and the Twentieth Century," the scope of present-day opportunities was described. In Mr. Atkinson's practical and suggestive address on "What We Can Do for Our Boys" the way in which juvenile restlessness and activity may be turned to account was sympathetically indicated. Miss Hotson showed the conscientious teacher's regard for the young persons who are being trained for citizenship. Mrs. M. N. Norman, of Toronto, in the address, "My Child's Future," dwelt upon the value of the forces of heredity and environment, urging the importance of perfect trust and confidence between mother and child. Mrs. Parsons, in "A Woman's View of Life," gave a comprehensive talk on the home circle. Altogether, the members are keeping close to their motto of "Home and Country."

District Meetings

The following is list of January meetings to be held in association with Farmers' Institutes:—

Division 1. Dr. Margaret McAlpine, Toronto, Jan. 18 and 19; Durham Town Hall, South Grey, Jan. 3; Hanover, Telford's Hall, South Grey, Jan. 4; Wiarton, Town Hall, North Bruce, Jan. 5; Oliphant, School House, North Bruce, Jan. 5; Hepworth, Gate's School, North Bruce, Jan. 6; Hepworth, Spring Creek, school, North Bruce, Jan. 6; Parkhead, Orange Hall, North Bruce, Jan. 8; Tara, Vandusen's Hall, West Bruce, Jan. 9; Port Elgin, Town Hall, West Bruce, Jan. 10; Walkerton, Township Hall, South Bruce, Jan. 11; Gorrie, Town Hall, East Huron, Jan. 18; Brussels, Town Hall, East Huron, Jan. 19.

Division 2. Mrs. W. B. Ferguson, Strathroy—Mt. Carmel, Mt. Carmel Hall, North Middlesex, Jan 12; Greenway, Wilson's Hall, North Middlesex, Jan. 13; Parkhill, Town Hall, North Middlesex, Jan. 15; West McGillivray, Town Hall, North Middlesex, Jan. 16; Thorndale, Harding's Hall, East Middlesex, Jan. 17; Harrietsville, I. O. F. Hall, East Middlesex, Jan. 18; Alvinston, Council Chamber, East Lambton, Jan. 19; Aughrim, Lower Aughrim Hall, East Lambton, Jan. 20; Shetland, Town Hall, East Lambton, Jan. 22; Inwood, Orange Hall, East Lambton, Jan. 23; Petrolea, Town Hall, West Lambton, Jan. 24; Sarnia, Town Hall, West Lambton, Jan. 25; Bunyan, School House, West Lambton, Jan. 25; Beecher, Forester's Hall, West Lambton, Jan. 26; Brigden, McKenzie's Hall, West Lambton, Jan. 27;

Division 3. Mrs. W. J. Hunter, Brampton—Aylmer, Town Hall, East Elgin, Jan. 13; Middlemarch, Grange Hall, West Elgin, Jan. 15; Talbotville, Orange Hall, West Elgin, Jan. 16; Dutton, Town Hall, West Elgin, Jan. 17; Rodney, Town Hall, West Elgin, Jan. 18; Middlemiss, Village Hall, afternoon, West Middlesex, Jan. 19; Walker's Schoolhouse, West Middlesex, Jan. 20, Eberts Hall, West Kent, Jan. 22; Louisville, School House, West Kent, Jan. 23; Baldoon, Church Hall, West Kent, Jan. 24; Bear Line, Forester's Hall, West Kent, Jan. 25; Croton, Young's Hall, East Kent, Jan. 26; Kent Centre, K. C. Hall, East Kent, Jan. 27; Morpeth, A. O. U. W. Hall, East Kent, Jan. 29; Guild's School House, East Kent, Jan. 30; Comber, Town Hall, North Essex, Jan. 31.

Division 4. Mrs. M. M. Norman, Toronto, Jan. 5 to 31.—Waterdown, Township Hall, North Wentworth, Jan. 5; Freelton, North Wentworth, Jan. 6; Rockton, Township Hall, North Wentworth, Jan. 8; St. George, Library Hall, North Brant, Jan. 9; Onondaga, Township Hall, North Brant, Jan. 10; Cainsville, Hanley's Hall, North Brant, Jan. 11; Tranquility, School House, North Brant, Jan. 12; Burford, Cornish Hall, South Brant, Jan. 13; Mohawk, Methodist Church Basement, South Brant, Jan. 15; East Oakland, School House, South Brant, Jan. 16; Scotland, Forester's Hall, South Brant, Jan. 17; Ancaster, Town Hall, South Wentworth, Jan. 18; Stoney Creek, Institute Hall, South Wentworth, Jan. 19; Campden, Redden's Hall, Lincoln, Jan. 20; Queenston, School House, Lincoln, Jan. 22; Niagara Falls, South, Town Hall, Welland, Jan. 23; Willoughby, Town Hall, Welland, Jan. 24; Ridgeway, Town Hall, Welland, Jan. 25; Humberstone, Town Hall, Welland, Jan. 26; Pelham Centre, Town Hall, Monck, Jan. 27; Silverdale, School House, Monck, Jan. 29; Caistorville, School, Monck, Jan. 30; Camboro, Town Hall, Monck, Jan. 31.

Division 5. Mrs. H. W. Parsons, Forest, Jan. 4 to 25.—Aberfoyle, Town Hall, South Wellington, Jan. 4; Morriston, Hall, South Wellington, Jan. 4; Eden Mills, Town Hall, South Wellington, Jan. 5; Rockwood, Hall, South Wellington, Jan. 5; Alma, Alma Hall, West Wellington, Jan. 6; Drayton, Town Hall, West Wellington, Jan. 8; Glen Allan, Coot's Hall, West Wellington, Jan. 9; Mt. Forest, Allen's Hall, East Wellington, Jan. 10; Cedarvale, Orange Hall, East Wellington, Jan. 11; Conn, Orange Hall, East Wellington, Jan. 12; Conn, School House, East Wellington, Jan. 12; Kenilworth, Township Hall, East Wellington, Jan. 13; Chatsworth, Forester's Hall, North Grey, Jan. 15; Desboro, Town Hall, North Grey, Jan. 16; Kilsyth, Township Hall, North Grey, Jan. 17; Shallow Lake, Hall, North Grey, Jan. 18; Kemble, school, North Grey, Jan. 19; Brown's School, North Grey, Jan. 19; Owen Sound, Council Chamber, North Grey, Jan. 20; Annan, Hall, North Grey, Jan. 22; Leith, Hall, North Grey, Jan. 22; Bognor, Hall, North Grey, Jan. 23; Strathnairn, School House, North Grey, Jan. 24; Meaford, Town Hall, North Grey, Jan. 25.

SUPPLEMENTARY MEETINGS.

Division 2. Miss M. V. Powell, Whitby, Jan. 3 to 26.—Crown Hill Hall, East Simcoe, Jan. 3; Craighurst, Hall, East Simcoe, Jan. 3; Mitchell Square, Hall, East Simcoe, Jan. 4; Jarret, Hall, East Simcoe, Jan. 4; Warminster, McKinley's Hall, East Simcoe, Jan. 5; Uhthoff, Waring's Hall, East Simcoe, Jan. 5; Washago, Hall, East Simcoe, Jan. 6; Ardtrea, School, East Simcoe, Jan. 6; Rosemount, Hannah Hall, West Simcoe, Jan. 8; Everett, Orange Hall, West Simcoe, Jan. 9; Creemore, Leonard's Hall, West Simcoe, Jan. 10; Lavender, Temperance Hall, West Simcoe, Jan. 11; Singhampton, Ross' Hall, West Simcoe, Jan. 12; Badjeros, School House, Centre Grey, Jan. 13; Dundalk, Town Hall, Centre Grey, Jan. 16; Hopeveille, Allan's Hall, Centre Grey, Jan. 17; Flesherton, Town Hall, Centre Grey, Jan. 18; Maxwell, Orange Hall, Centre Grey, Jan. 15; Eugenia, Orange Hall, Centre Grey, Jan. 19; Kimberley, Union Hall, Centre Grey, Jan. 20; Ravenna, Town Hall, Centre Grey, Jan. 22; Heathcote, Orange Hall, Centre Grey, Jan. 23; Rocklyn, Agricultural Hall, Centre Grey, Jan. 24; Walter's Falls, A.O.U.W. Hall, Centre Grey, Jan. 25; Holland Centre, Township Hall, Centre Grey, Jan. 26.

Division 11. Miss Gertrude Gray, Toronto, Wellesley Opera House, North Waterloo, Jan. 22; Crosshill, Township Hall, North Waterloo, Jan. 23; Heidleberg, Steiss Hall, North Waterloo, Jan. 24; St. Jacobs, Wildman's Hall, North Waterloo, Jan. 25; Floradale, Steddick's Hall, North Waterloo, Jan.26; West Montrose, Jupp's Hall, North Waterloo, Jan. 27; Conestego, Township Hall, North Waterloo, Jan. 29; Waterloo, Library Hall, North Waterloo, Jan. 30.

Division 12. Miss B. Gilholm Bright,—Stroud, Orange Hall, South Simcoe, Jan. 3; Thornton, Temperance Hall, South Simcoe, Jan. 4; Churchill, Orange Hall, South Simcoe, Jan. 5; Thompsonville, South Simcoe, Jan. 6; Loretto, Orange Hall, South Simcoe, Jan. 8; Sand Hill, Church, Peel, Jan. 9; Castlemore, O'Leary's Hall, Peel, Jan. 10; Cheltenham, Harris Hall, Peel, Jan. 11; Belfountain, Church, Peel, Jan. 12; Hillsburg, Town Hall, Centre Wellington, Jan. 13; Cumnock, School House, Centre Wellington, Jan. 15; Bethany, Methodist Church, Centre Wellington, Jan. 16; Palmerston, Town Hall, West Wellington, Jan 17; Moorefield, Township Hall, West Wellington, Jan. 18; Rothsay, Temperance Hall, West Wellington, Jan. 19; Arthur, Town Hall, East Wellington, Jan. 20; Damascus, Township Hall, East Wellington, Jan. 22; Monticello, Hall, East Wellington, Jan. 23; Grand Valley, Chatfield's Hall, East Wellington, Jan. 24; Shelburne, Town Hall, Dufferin, Jan. 25; Orangeville, Public Library, Dufferin, Jan. 26; Duntroon, S.O.S.Hall, West Simcoe, Jan. 27; Batteau, School House, West Simcoe, Jan. 29; Stayner, Town Hall, West Simcoe, Jan. 30; New Lowell, Township Hall, West Simcoe, Jan. 31.

Division 13. Miss S. Campbell, Brampton.—Kleinburg, Temperance Hall, West York, Jan. 12; Woodbridge, Township Hall, West York, Jan. 13; Weston, Township Hall, West York, Jan. 15; Islington, Society Hall, West York, Jan. 16; Elia, Forrester's Hall, West York, Jan. 16; Maple, Masonic Hall, West York, Jan. 17; Nobleton, Music Hall, North York, Jan. 18; Schomberg, Market Hall, North York, Jan. 19; Kettleby, Temperance Hall, North York, Jan. 20; Queensville, Presbyterian Hall, North York, Jan. 22; Keswick, Town Hall, North York, Jan. 23; Mount Albert, Town Hall, North York, Jan. 24; Vandorf, Town Hall, North York, Jan. 25; Bethesda, Town Hall, North York, Jan. 26; Victoria Square, Public Hall, East York, Jan. 27; Thornhill, Victoria Hall, East York, Jan. 29; Wexford Methodist Church, East York, Jan. 30; Box Grove, Forrester's Hall, East York, Jan. 31.

Division 14. Miss A. M. Hotson, Parkhill.—Sanford, I. O. O. F. Hall, North Ontario, Jan. 3; Zephyr, public hall, North Ontario, Jan. 4; Sunderland, Town Hall, North Ontario, Jan. 5; Beaverton, Town Hall, North Ontario, Jan. 6; Gamebridge, Grange Hall, North Ontario, Jan. 8; Brechin, School House, North Ontario, Jan. 9; Udney, Orange Hall, North Ontario, Jan. 10; Woodville, Village Hall, West Victoria, Jan. 11; Hartley, Village Hall, West Victoria, Jan. 12; Little Britain, Temperance Hall, West Victoria, Jan. 13; Valentia, Forrester's Hall, West Victoria, Jan. 15; Cameron, Orange Hall, East Victoria, Jan. 16; Burnt River, Orange Hall, East Victoria, Jan. 17; Dunsford, Old Church, East Victoria, Jan. 18; Omemee, Opera House, East Victoria, Jan. 19; Bethany, Town Hall, East Durham, Jan. 20; Manvers Station, Orange Hall, East Durham, Jan. 20; Cavanville, Old Church, East Durham, Jan. 22; Mount Pleasant, Forrester's Hall, East Durham, Jan. 22; Solina, Temperance Hall, West Durham, Jan. 29; Columbus, South Ontario, Jan. 30; Whitby, South Ontario, Jan. 31.

Division 15. Mrs. F. W. Watts, Clinton.—Norwood Town Hall, East Peterboro, Jan. 8; Havelock, Town Hall, East Peterboro, Jan. 9; Tweed, Town Hall, East Hastings, Jan. 10; Roslin, C.O.O.F. Hall, East Hastings, Jan. 11; Philipston, C.O.F. Hall, East Hastings, Jan. 12; Foxboro, School House, East Hastings, Jan. 13; Turner's School House, West Hastings, Jan. 15; River Valley, School House, West Hastings, Jan. 16; Roseneath, Township Hall, West Northumberland, Jan. 29; Baltimore, Chapman's Hall, West North, umberland, Jan. 30; Centreton, Methodist S. S. Methodist S. S. Hall, West Northumberland, Jan. 31.

Division 16. Mrs. W. W. Farley, Smithfield.—Westbrook, Town Hall, Frontenac, Jan. 12; Queensboro, Orange Hall, North Hastings, Jan. 16; Eldorado, Town Hall, North Hastings, Jan. 17; Madoc, Town Hall, North Hastings, Jan. 18; Ivanhoe, Orange Hall, North Hastings, Jan. 19; Moira, Town Hall, North Hastings, Jan. 20; Stirling, Town Hall, North Hastings, Jan. 22; Springbrook, Forrester's Hall, North Hastings, Jan. 23; Marmora, Town Hall, North Hastings, Jan. 24.

Division 17. Mrs. E. B. McTurk, Lucan.—Maynard, Methodist Church, South Grenville, Jan. 8; Roebuck, School House, South Grenville, Jan. 9; Brouseville, School House, South Grenville, Jan. 10; Shanly, Workman's Hall, South Grenville, Jan. 11; Ventnor, School House, South Grenville, Jan. 12; Williamsburg, Boyce's Hall, Dundas, Jan. 13; Winchester Springs, Orange Hall, Dundas, Jan. 15; Iroquois, Town Hall, Dundas, Jan. 19; Summerton, Public Hall, Glengarry, Jan. 20; Bainsville, Sangster & McCraig's Hall, Glengarry, Jan. 22; Wales, Connoly's Hall, Stormont, Jan. 23; South Branch, School House, Stormont, Jan. 24; Cornwall Centre, Township Hall, Stormont, Jan. 25; Northfield Station, Arbuthnot Hall, Stormont, Jan. 26; Finch, Massey Harris Hall, Stormont, Jan. 27; Avonmore, Beaver Hall, Stormont, Jan. 29; Moose Creek, Gagnois Hall, Stormont, Jan. 30.

Division 18. Miss Ethel Robson, Ilderton.—Beachburg, Town Hall, North Renfrew, Jan. 19; Westmeath, School House, North Renfrew, Jan. 20; Alice, Presbyterian Church, North Renfrew, Jan. 22; Maberly, Town Hall, South Lanark, Jan. 24; Perth, Town Hall, South Lanark, Jan. 25; Richardson's School, South Lanark, Jan. 26; Balderson's School South Lanark, Jan. 27; Lanark Village Town Hall, North Lanark, Jan. 29.

West Korah Branch

SINCE our meeting together one year ago, at the annual Institute convention, I am pleased to be able to report a growth and improvement in our Institute. Not only have we grown in membership, which one year ago numbered thirty-six, and to-day numbers forty-seven, but I am sure we have grown in wisdom, efficiency, and ability to carry on the work, "for home and country."

Our Institute believes it to be the best plan to hold regular monthly meetings, and we have not missed a meeting all year. Although our members are very much scattered, we try to hold our meetings from month to month at homes in opposite directions, in order to bring them within reach of all the resident members. We have several non-resident members, women who have gone from this part to the far West, who, although there are no Institutes where they have gone, wish to be identified with the work.

The social side of our Institute life is very enjoyable, and affords many opportunities for becoming acquainted with the women of our community. But, better still, and even more helpful, I believe, is the thought and study that must be expended in order to produce the very excellent and practical papers, written by our members. These papers, accompanied by discussions and addresses delivered by some of our prominent citizens, and professional men, with an occasional literary programme, or competition for prizes, is a very fair general outline of our programmes.

We have found the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, the official organ of the Women's Institute, very helpful in securing new members. We made an effort this year to place the paper in every home in our community, with the result that there are now fifty subscribers, forty-one members, and nine non-members, who every month receive into their homes that good, bright, helpful, clean Canadian magazine. We are endeavoring by this method to do away with the reading of trashy literature, and cultivate a taste for that which is helpful and uplifting.

We appreciate very much the delegates sent us from time to time by the department. They are a great help and inspiration, coming, as they do, from beyond our own little circle, and telling us new ways and means and methods used by those in other parts of the province. When they go away, they leave us better equipped for the carrying on of our work.

Financially our Institute is in good standing. Since the beginning of the year we have expended over thirty-two dollars on magazines for the benefit of members and those whom we wish to interest in the work. We donated ten dollars to "The Children's Aid," Sault Ste. Marie, and five dollars to the Hospital for Sick Children, Toronto, apart from our running expenses, and have still over thirty dollars in the treasury.

We have had programmes printed for the remaining months of the Institute year. One feature of new work, at least new to our Institute, that we purpose taking up, is the offering of prizes at the fall fair for work along domestic or agricultural lines, done by the boys and girls belonging to the homes of our Institute members. In the name of our Institute I wish all Institutes and branches success and prosperity for the future.

A KODAK LESSON
From Motion Pictures

The exactions of the motion picture film business are unequaled in any other department of photography and, we believe, in any other line of manufacturing on a large scale.

The maker of motion pictures requires high speed in the emulsion, for every exposure is necessarily a snap-shot and must often be made under poor light conditions. He requires absolute dependability in the product, for he frequently spends thousands of dollars to produce his picture play, and a failure to get good negatives would mean not merely the waste of a few hundred feet of film, but the loss of the thousands of dollars spent for special trains, and actors, and settings, and the weeks, perhaps months of time, spent in preparation.

The motion picture man must have a film that is free from the minutest blemish. The picture that you see upon the curtain, say 15 x 20 feet in size, is approximately seventy thousand times as large as the tiny film upon which it was made. A spot the size of a pin head upon that film would show as large as your hat upon the curtain.

The requirements then, are extreme speed, fineness of grain, absolute freedom from mechanical defects and dependability. The price of the film is a secondary consideration. First of all, it must be right. The competition for this business is purely a competition of quality and reliability.

Ninety-five per cent. of the motion picture film used in America, and at least eighty per cent. of the motion picture film used the world over is KODAK FILM.

Those very qualities of speed, mechanical perfection and dependability which make Kodak Film essential to the maker of motion pictures, make it best for your use.

Then too, Kodak Film is properly orthochromatic (gives the most practical rendering of color values), is absolutely protected by duplex paper from the offsetting of numbers, and is superior in keeping quality.

Be sure that it is Kodak Film with which you load your Kodak, taking especial care when traveling that no substitution is practiced at your expense. Look for "Kodak" on the spool end and "N.C." on the box.

If it isn't Eastman, it isn't Kodak film.

CANADIAN KODAK CO., Limited, TORONTO, Canada

Royal Vinolia Soap

SUPREME IN QUALITY, PURITY AND FRAGRANCE. CONTAINS NO ANIMAL FAT. YIELDS AN EXQUISITELY SOFT AND LUXURIOUS LATHER, SOOTHING AND BENEFICIAL TO THE SKIN.

THE MATERIALS FROM WHICH WE MAKE ROYAL VINOLIA SOAP ARE WHOLLY VEGETABLE—A WHITE CAKE OF REFINED AND BEAUTIFUL DESIGN. NOTHING QUITE LIKE IT HAS BEEN PRODUCED BEFORE.

Price 15c. a cake, or 3 cakes in exquisite carton for 35c.
SOLD BY ALL GOOD DRUGGISTS.

VINOLIA COMPANY LIMITED BY APPOINTMENT Soapmakers to H.M. The King LONDON, PARIS TORONTO

128

A Word of Thanks to Institute Members

For my department I wish to thank the Institute members for the very cordial support given. Never have we received so many subscriptions from institutes as during the last months of 1911. Branches large and small have sent their share of a very large total. It proves that the officers and our readers have taken an active interest in convincing others of the value and satisfaction which the Journal will give them.

THE BANNER LIST in numbers to the present time has come from Burlington which has sent ninety subscriptions. Others of the large branches are close competitors. Many branches have sent us a subscription for every family.

Especially we thank the member who has secured the club in each branch. It would be impossible for us to give a special rate if it were necessary to deal with each member separately.

We hope and believe that during the coming year the Journal will deserve your continued support both as the Institute Organ and as a valuable home magazine.

Very Sincerely
Circulation Manager.

Never accept as genuine Wolsey any garment which does not bear the Wolsey head trademark

All the good qualities of all the best brands

Pure wool, new and scrupulously clean—excellent finish—perfect fit—comfort and health protection beyond words—new garments free for any that shrink—best work of biggest and longest-experienced makers in Britain—finest value and by far the greatest favourite of any underwear in the world.

Wolsey is made in many garments, for men, women, and children. One trial will prove it to be the most reliable and truly economical underwear sold

Wolsey UNDERWEAR

Wolsey is British-made by British labour; Journals, Doctors, Clergy, Athletes, and the General Public have repeatedly endorsed its merits. Sold everywhere throughout the world.

BENGER'S FOOD

is for Infants and Invalids and for those whose digestive powers have become weakened by illness or advancing age.

If the digestive functions, however weak, can do any work at all they should be given work to do to the extent of their powers. In the easy process of its preparation the digestibility of Benger's can be regulated to give this work with extreme nicety.

The "British Medical Journal" says—"Benger's Food has, by its excellence established a reputation of its own."

BENGER'S NEW BOOKLET deals with the most common doubts and difficulties which mothers have to encounter. It is sent post free on application to Benger's Food, Ltd., Otter Works, Manchester, England.

Benger's Food is sold in tins by Druggists, etc., everywhere

B23

BEETHAM'S La-rola

La-rola is a perfect emollient milk quickly absorbed by the skin, leaving no trace of grease or stickiness after use. Allaying and soothing all forms of irritation caused by frost, cold winds and hard water, it not only preserves the skin but beautifies the complexion, making it SOFT, SMOOTH AND WHITE, LIKE THE PETALS OF THE LILY.

The daily use of La-rola effectually prevents all redness, roughness, irritation and chaps, and gives a resisting power to the skin in changeable weather. Delightfully soothing and refreshing after Motoring, Golfing, Skating, Cycling, Dancing, etc.

Men will find it wonderfully soothing if applied after shaving. Ask your Chemist for it.

M. BEETHAM & SON - - - CHELTENHAM, Eng.

YORKSHIRE RELISH

"The Most Delicious Sauce in the World"

To test its wonderful effect in making the meal perfect, try half a chop without it—the other half with it—and see for yourself?

The subtle zest which Yorkshire Relish gives either to the plainest or to the most elaborate dish, is a delight to the epicure. 20c. a bottle.

CHAS. GYDE, - MONTREAL.

Sole Agent for Canada. 4

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

THE HOUSEHOLD EXCHANGE

By "MISS OPHELIA"

IN the winter months, the furnace problem is what confronts most citizens. Those who live in flats have no need to take thought for the heating apparatus and the method by which it is kept in action; but, in Canada, fortunately, flats are not as general in the United States, and we are therefore much concerned in the heating of the house. This hint from a New York writer may be useful.

It was our custom to close the furnace tight at night, because any other way seemed like wasting coal while the household slept. The result was that, during the many hours when the fire burned low, the walls became very cold, and we had a very shivery breakfast. Now our walls are kept warm all the time, so there is never any occasion to rush the fire, and in the morning little time and attention are needed (even in the coldest weather not more than half an hour) to raise the temperature the few required degrees.

How did we accomplish this? So simply that we wonder why the old way was endured so long.

At night have a good clear fire free from ashes and clinkers and bright red underneath. Cover it to the capacity of the firebox with coal. When the weather is not extremely cold the top layer may be old coal. After the gas has burned off, close the chimney draught nearly tight and open the door under the fire, little or much, according to the weather predictions in the evening paper. For instance, if a continuation of the same temperature is prophesied, your house, being already heated, will keep warm with a very small draught; but if a great fall of the mercury is expected during the night it must be met with a hotter fire, and so leave your draught wider open.

In the morning, shake little, or none at all, but open the furnace draughts wide, and in half an hour you are ready to close the furnace, and save coal during the day, when any sudden change in temperature can be easily met.

Cold walls absorb an enormous amount of heat, and still leave the room cold, and it takes less coal to keep a house warm than to get it warm. Our present method gives us an even temperature all the time and also lessens our coal bill.

ENGLAND has taken up the subject of "paper bag cookery" with much enthusiasm and Canada is following with happy culinary results. Those who wish to know about it are enquiring anxiously if the food tastes as well as when cooked in the ordinary way. Blanche St. Clair, in The Quiver, writes a valuable article on the origin and operations of this method:

It must not, however, be taken for granted because the system has now, for the first time, been brought within the reach of all those who wish to avail themselves of it, that it is the outcome of a sudden inspiration. This is by no means the case. Rather is it the result of many years' experiments based on the old and well-known French custom of cooking en papillote—i.e. wrapping small articles (fish, chops, etc.), in buttered paper and baking them in the oven.

Some fifteen years ago it occurred to M. Soyer (the worthy grandson of the world-renowned chef of that name), that this method of cooking might be applied with advantage to other and more numerous branches of the culinary art. His series of experiments always met with the same result: the food thus cooked was deliciously tender and most appetizing to look upon, but spoiled by the flavor of paper which it had absorbed during the cooking process. So sure was M. Soyer of the merits of paper bag cookery that he betook himself to the offices of a great paper bag manufacturing firm and begged them to carry out investigations with a view to discovering a suitable paper. After encountering and overcoming many difficulties a paper was produced which in every respect fulfilled the requirements. Then followed an exciting period of new practical tests, all of which answered M. Soyer's wildest expectations, and corroborated his previous opinion as to the three chief merits already found in the system:

1—The immense improvements in the flavor of the viands thus treated.

2—The reduction in shrinkage and consequent waste.

3—The lessening of time necessary for cooking, and saving of heating fuel.

It will be readily grasped that these three advantages, useful as they are, do not by any means exhaust the list of profits to be gained from paper bag cookery. The reason for its adoption that will appeal most to the busy housewife is the great saving of labor: no pots or saucepans to be cleaned, no basting or attention to be bestowed on the food whilst it is in the oven, and no smell of cooking pervading the house.

Against these advantages must be placed the expense of the paper bags and a grid; but the makers assure me that with the rising demand for these necessary articles a reduction on the original price will be speedily affected, and they will be placed within the reach of the humblest housekeeping allowance.

The following instructions for using bags must be followed:

1—Select a bag which "fits" the food to be cooked. It is better to choose one that is too large than too small.

2—The inside of the bag must be either greased with butter, dripping or oil, or water must be added to the contents. The greasing applies to fish, meat and poultry cooking. The water is added to vegetables, stews, etc.

3—Prepare the food according to the recipe, place the bag on the table, lift the uppermost edge, then put in the ingredients, taking care not to tear the edges of the bag.

4—Double the edges of the bag over two or three times, and secure them with a pin or clip. (M. Soyer used a clip composed of a long loop of wire with another piece of wire which clipped into one end, something like a huge safety pin with a blunt point).

The ends of the bag should also be turned over in case of leakage. If a bag leaks or bursts the aperture can be healed by the application of paste made by mixing the white of an egg with flour, or if this is not handy slip the burst bag with its contents into another which is slightly larger.

ALL the way from Sturgeon Creek P.O., Manitoba, Mrs. Alfred Vialoux sends us instructions how to clean "not grimy, dirty, but soiled" lace.

Many girls have some beautiful old lace handed down from their great grandmothers, and the difficulty is how to clean it successfully. Having done some myself, I think I can help them.

Take a large sheet of blotting paper, white, of course—you can buy it in very large sheets, then a sheet, or perhaps two sheets, of blue tissue paper; spread the blue paper over the blotting paper upon a board or table you can spare for a few hours. Sprinkle the paper thickly with powdered magnesia; put more of the magnesia in a bowl, and run the lace through it several times, very gently, of course, but taking care that every particle of the lace comes in contact with the dry magnesia; then pin the lace upon the blue paper, cover again with a sprinkling of magnesia and pin two sheets of blue paper over all. Cover with another sheet of blotting paper and then put something on to press the whole—large books or weights of some kind. Leave it over night, or even for a couple of days. Then, without unpinning the lace, shake it gently, still covered, unpin, remove the paper. Have ready some blue paper without magnesia; shake the magnesia out of the lace as well as possible, pin again on the clean blue paper and cover with another sheet. Press again and then you will find your lace in beautiful condition. But, of course, it needs care and gentleness and time.

DYEING BUT NOT DEAD

LADIES of refinement and culture know that fine gowns add lustre of youth to the appearance.

FINE gowns and everyday dresses cost money, but the life of a costume may be doubled by proper care.

PROPER care includes timely cleaning or dyeing before the stains become ingrained.

WE are alone in guaranteeing a jet black on Raw or Pongee Silk.

OUT of City orders as cheap as city trade—we pay express.

WILLOW PLUMES made from your old feathers.
$3.00 to $8.00

Write for price list and advice.

RELIABLE AGENTS WANTED IN EVERY TOWN

SINCLAIR DYE WORKS
656 College St. - Toronto, Ont.
Phone Coll. 621.

102 Periodicals

Regular Price $4.00

For $2.00

Weekly Free Press and Prairie Farmer
$1.00

The Big Newspaper that gives all the news of all Canada. Features—Colored, Comic, Magazine, Ladies' Home, Farm, Stock Raisers' and Market Sections.

Western Home Monthly
$1.00

The Popular Family Magazine of Western Canada. Edited to interest every member of the household. Special articles by well known writers, departments standard, entertaining fiction and original photographs.

Northwest Farmer
$1.00

The Leading Agricultural Semi-Monthly. Invaluable to every farmer. Special articles by experts, embracing every branch of agriculture.

Canadian Home Journal
$1.00

An Exclusively Ladies' Monthly Magazine, containing articles and departments dear to every feminine heart. Particular attention is devoted to household and fashion articles.

Send in your order to-day to Canadian Home Journal Toronto

Papers may be sent to one or separate addresses.

125 Egg Incubator and Brooder BOTH FOR $10
If ordered together.
Freight paid east of Rockies. Hot water, copper tanks, double walls, double glass doors. Free catalog describes them. Send for it today.
(11)
Wisconsin Incubator Co.,
Box 79 Racine, Wis.

I'll Teach You Bookkeeping by Mail
My students make good. "There's a Reason."
My first Booklet mailed on receipt of $1.00.
E. R. ZIMMERMAN
Consulting Accountant Chicago, Ill.

THE January days are almost here, and while they are not the most melancholy of the whole long year, there are none more trying to the woman who desires to keep a fair and smooth skin. Roughened cheeks and chapped hands are not to be admired in any one, and the girl who wishes to be saved from them will find it necessary to take certain precautions and not relax in them.

In the first place do not wash your face and hands in hot water, and immediately afterwards expose them to the wintry air. Such proceedings will assuredly result in chaps and creases, to say nothing of the discomfort of smarting skin. Before going out on a very cold day, rub a small quantity of good cold cream into the face and hands, then dust lightly with a rice powder or talcum if you prefer it. If you return from a walk or a drive with your face stinging from the cold, wait some time before washing it. In fact, before washing it would be well to make another slight application of cold cream and wipe the face off, before applying water. "Ever so much trouble," says someone. It does not mean more than five minutes' attention, and it secures comfort and a pleasing appearance. Girls who do not grudge two hours of an afternoon, spent over a cheap novel, will complain of a little time given to securing a good head of hair or a desirable complexion. Let us be quite honest about it, and admit that we are too lazy to take care of ourselves. A girl away up in the North asks if glycerine is hurtful to the skin. There are many women who find that pure glycerine is darkening and "toughening." However, glycerine, rose water and a few drops of carbolic acid make an application which scores of Canadian girls find beneficial.

Another girl complain of dishwashing and says that it "spoils her hands," and that she simply hates washing dishes. Now here is an opportunity for a nice, proper little lecture on the beauties of dish washing and the joy of doing one's duty in the right spirit—with a quotation from Dr. Watts' little hymn on "the daily round and common task." But I do not intend to inflict any such advice upon you. To tell the truth, I also "simply hate" washing dishes, and find it difficult to believe any woman who declares a fondness for the operation. However, there are alleviations in the lot of dish washing if we will only look for them. I once knew a woman who, as a girl, had been much admired for her fresh complexion and daintily-kept hands. After her marriage, some of her dear friends prophesied: "Now that Bessie has to do all her own work, she won't have time to look so nice." But the years have gone merrily by, and although Bessie does most of the housekeeping, her hands are as white and soft as ever.

"How do you manage it?" asked a friend despairingly, "my hands always look like graters. They are either red or rough and look so stained beside yours."

"It isn't easy," said Bessie encouragingly, "but I am never ashamed to admit that I take good care of them. I never could see any sense in giving up taking care of one's looks just because one is no longer young. In fact, youth can afford to be a little careless, where middle-age is perfectly dreadful, unless it looks out for wrinkles and sallowness. You see, I wear gloves whenever I sweep or do rough work, and I use a small mop when I wash the dishes. I use good cold cream or some emollient every night and wear ventilated gloves while I am in dreamland. It isn't, really, as much bother as it sounds."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

E. J. S.—From what you say regarding complexion difficulties, I should judge that the trouble is with the digestive organs, rather than with the skin. Do you have outdoor exercise every day, and do you sleep with the window open? Perhaps you are eating too much rich or greasy food. Try lemon juice in hot water as a dose every morning and eat a good deal of fruit. Massage before going to bed will be found beneficial to the skin and restful, disposing one to sleep. The trouble you refer to, unless it take the form of eruption, is hardly ever a "skin" affliction. The disordered stomach is the cause of it all. I wish everyone could read "The Letters of Little Mary," epistles supposed to be addressed by the stomach to other organs, describing just how sadly it is misused by the "Master."

M. B.—As you refer to a very quiet wedding, I suppose you mean there are to be no guests, but immediate relatives of bride and bridegroom. In that case, the bride should not wear a veil. As to the bridesmaid, it would not be "incorrect" to have one, although it would be quite in good taste and custom to dispense with her services under the circumstances.

In order to answer your second question satisfactorily, it would be necessary to know something as to the shape of the face. Judging from other details I should say in the simplest style, with parting in the centre and coiled quite low, as you evidently do not need to add to any appearance of height.

A simple hair tonic which I have found beneficial is: Eau de Cologne, two ounces; tincture of cantharides, two drachms; oil of lavender, ten drops. Rub in well at night. The hair should be given regular "exercise" if you wish to keep in condition. It should not be too much curled and puffed, if it is to preserve natural strength and lustre. Let me know if there is any improvement in its condition. If one may judge from your letter, you are thoroughly healthy, and your "raven locks" ought to be silky and abundant.

COUNTRY GIRL.—You are not breathing in the right way—but, then, hardly any of us do; so you need not feel at all discouraged about your failure to inhale properly. Try deep breathing, early in the morning and late, and see if you do not feel better. Try it for a month, just by way of experiment. Most of us are simply starving for oxygen, and we are not aware of the need. Get a good supply in your lungs, and you will wonder why you have only felt half alive before. You know the word "inspiration" merely means "breathing in," and after a few moments of inhaling Ontario country air you ought to feel "inspired."

ELSIE.—Very possibly the dull feeling after an hour or two of work at your desk is directly due to the lolling position you describe. How can you expect to be at your best when, day after day, you sit like the "crumpled horn" of our childhood song? If you could see a few X-ray pictures of your vital organs cramped as they are by this daily, slouchy posture, you would need no more arguments to induce a determination to cultivate a normal posture.

MARGARET.—When the use of powder is desirable pulverized orris and other vegetable powders are preferable, as a rule, to carbonate of magnesia or oxide of zinc. Carbonate of magnesia is a good dusting powder on account of the large quantity of water that it can take care of—five and one-half times its own weight. Oxide of zinc takes up only one-fourth as much.

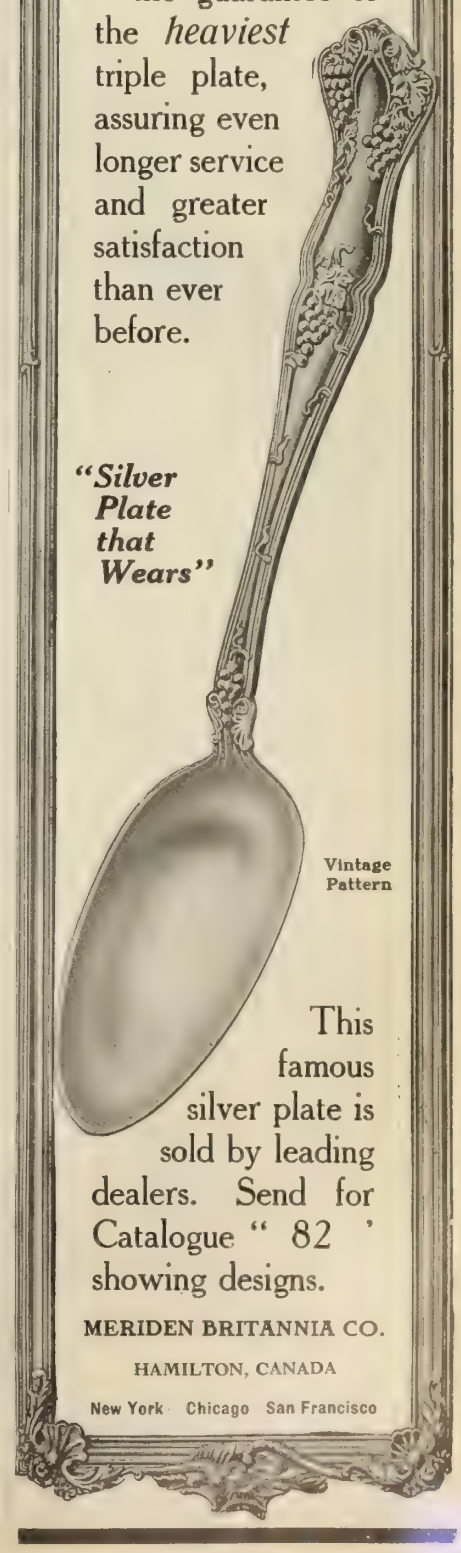
E. S. R.—Bathing is perhaps more important to prevent than to cure conditions leading up to an unwholesome-looking skin. The chief use of the daily bath is its refreshing, invigorating effect. In the largest number of cases a cool morning bath is productive of the most beneficial results. After many years of experience in treating skin disorders an eminent specialist says that a person "who works hard and perspires freely will have a far healthier and a really cleaner skin than he who eats heartily and leads a sedentary life, even though he may scrub continuously." The main benefit of a daily bath is due "not to its cleansing properties, but to its stimulating effect upon the nervous system."

Silver plate renowned since 1847 for beauty and durability bears the popular trade mark

1847
ROGERS BROS.
XS
TRIPLE

—the guarantee of the heaviest triple plate, assuring even longer service and greater satisfaction than ever before.

"Silver Plate that Wears"



Vintage Pattern

This famous silver plate is sold by leading dealers. Send for Catalogue "82" showing designs.

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO.
HAMILTON, CANADA
New York Chicago San Francisco

THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS

By ISABEL ECCLESTONE MACKAY

ILLUSTRATED BY C.W. JEFFERYS

Continued from page 11

"Might just as well tell it now," nodded the detective.

"It isn't much," said the miserable Tommy. "And it can't have anything to do with her disappearance, but she told me the other day that a man had spoken to her in the street."

"Oh," gasped Ada.

"What impudence!" said Aunt Miriam.

The detective only smiled. "It probably meant just nothing at all—or she wouldn't have mentioned it," he said comfortably. "Did she happen to say who the friendly person was?"

"No she did not."

"Do you know of any other time when she was spoken to upon the street?"

"No—that is—"

"May as well tell it all."

"Well, then, once I met her talking to a—friend"

"Gentleman friend?"

"A gentleman—yes."

"Oh, Tommy!" There was heartbreak in Ada's voice.

"Do you know who that young man was?"

"Yes. He was a piano agent. He seemed," grudgingly, "a nice fellow. They had met by accident. She intended presenting him to her sisters but he was unexpectedly compelled to go away."

"Did they correspond?"

"I believe there was a letter—or two." (Tommy did not look at Ada as he said this).

"Ah, now we are getting it! There is at least one possible place where the young lady may be. Don't feel upset, Miss," to Ada. "Lots of runaway matches turn out well! I give you my word for it. If Mr. Burns can remember the young man's name—"

"But I can't! I only heard it the once—or stay! I remember being surprised because it was like another name—now I have it! His name was Wareham."

"A piano-man with a name like Mark!" exclaimed Miss Torrance.

"I don't see how—" hesitated Mr. Torrance.

"Well, I don't see just how, either," beamed the detective, "but I think we may take it for granted that we have our hands upon the mystery. Find this Mr. Wareham, piano agent, and we probably find the missing lady. Bless you, Miss, matches like this are common as gooseberries in our business; and very well they turn out; remarkably well, I assure you."

"But," began Mr. Torrance again. "Suppose there is a flaw in your reasoning? Suppose I happen to know where this Mr. Wareham is and can assure you that the lady is not with him?"

"Do you mean that you can assure me of that?" in astonishment.

"Yes, absolutely."

"Then," said Tommy, springing to his feet. "I want more than an assurance. I demand to know where this man is?"

"He is upstairs, in this house. A victim of this afternoon's accident." Mr. Torrance turned quietly to his sister. "I think you agree with me, Miriam, that the Mr. Wareham whom Mr. Burns saw talking to Miss Christine could have been no other than Mark?"

"Must have been," said Aunt Miriam. "It is not a common name. Fancy, Mark, a piano-man!"

"But—he went away," said Tommy.

"Yes. My nephew has been absent, at the coast, for some time. We knew before he left that he was interested in a Miss Brown. He returned this afternoon—with the result that I have mentioned. It was to quiet him that we sent for Miss Christine to come here tonight."

Tommy sat down again. The puzzled look upon his good-natured face was almost funny. "Then—" he said helplessly, "Where is she?"

The detective was watching him narrowly.

"I take it, Mr. Burns," he remarked briskly, "that although you had said nothing, you had yourself entertained the idea that the young lady might have run away with Mr. Wareham?"

"He had done nothing of the kind!" declared Ada loyally. "Mr. Burns knows Christine as well as we do and he knows that such a thing would have been impossible. Tell them so, Tommy."

"Certainly. It would have been impossible. It was only in the absolute lack of anything whatever to go upon

THE "PATRICIA" LACE WAIST

NEW YORK PRICE $5.50

OUR PRICE $2.95

From the Back Page of our NEW MID-WINTER SALE CATALOGUE

THERE are 87 other equally interesting pages in this new catalogue, and every page should mean DOLLARS OF SAVING to the average family.

Here is low-priced clothing for men, women and children, as well as household supplies, Jewelry and Novelties that Santa Claus may have forgotten.

Every Price quoted means cost of goods at your very door—at any rate at your nearest station or Post Office, because all charges are prepaid to destination.

Order the "Patricia" waist to-day, or send your address on a card, and this new catalogue will be forwarded at once.

Read This Description Carefully

(Order Number GW-95381)

The ground-work of this waist is fine Malines net, beautifully embroidered with exceedingly heavy mercerized floss. It is daintily yet serviceably lined with Jap silk. Note the kimono style short sleeves: finished at neck and sleeves with fine pure Guipure antique lace. The back is as elaborate as the front. Sizes 32 to 42 bust. Colors, pure white, ecru or all black. Midwinter Sale Price 2.95 that I thought of Mr. Wareham at all. Had I not been too anxious to think clearly, I would have known that he could know as little about this mystery as any of us. I did not know that Mr. Wareham was anything save what he professed to be—a piano agent—but I believed him to be an honourable man. Even had I known that he had met Christine under false pretences I know Christine well enough to—"

THE ROBERT SIMPSON COMPANY LIMITED TORONTO

"We understand, I am sure," interposed the detective, cutting short Tommy's halting explanation. "In the face of a disappearance like this everything, however unlikely, must be considered. But in this case we were evidently upon the wrong scent. We must reconstruct our ideas entirely. I wonder, Miss Brown, if you have noticed anything at all peculiar in your sister's manner of late. Has she seemed at all—er—different?"

Ada hesitated. "Hardly different," she answered. "She has been a little more quiet, more self-contained—she seemed a little older, but I think that is all naturally accounted for by her increased responsibilities since my eldest sister's illness."

"Just so. But has she seemed to be at all worried about anything?"

"I do not think so."

"Think well, now both of you—and try to remember if she has ever said anything, however trivial, about any kind of outside worry. There must be something, you know. This disappearance did not happen without a cause."

They were all silent for a moment or two.

"Try to think," he urged them, "of anything she may have said about the Stores or of her experiences there on going to and fro from her work. You said, Mr. Burns, that once she was spoken to by a man whom she did not know. Did she seem worried by this?"

"No. She joked about it."

"And were there absolutely no other experiences of the same kind?"

"No, except that once an old woman spoke to her." He glanced at Ada who looked distressed.

"What kind of woman?"

"A beggar. She asked for money."

"Did the young lady give her anything?"

"She had nothing but car-tickets.

"And you think she was alarmed?"

"No—o. Only she did not like the beggar's looks."

"U—m. There seems to be nothing in that. The man looks more promising. You say you do not know who he was?"

"I said that she did not tell me who he was. But I found out. I wanted to—warn him. It was Gilbert Van Slyke. He saw her in the Stores and more than one noticed how impressed he was. I do not think she knew anything of it herself until the afternoon he spoke to her. I do not think that he would ever have repeated the annoyance. In fact, when I went to see him, he was away arranging for a contemplated trip to Europe. I believe he sails from New York in a day or two."

"That is interesting!" The detective sprang up briskly. "If you will all excuse me I should like to do a little telephoning. Somewhere where I shall not be disturbed—shall not be long."

□

It seemed long to those who waited, and when he returned his face was grave. He glanced uneasily at Ada who sat very still. "Well," he said. "I've found out all about Van Slyke. He left for New York to-night on the seven o'clock flyer. There was no lady with him. All the same I may as well tell you that it is common talk that he did not go alone. He has, I am sorry to have to say it, taken these little trips before. And somehow, in some definite way that I cannot account for, Miss Brown's disappearance has got about. The newspapers have it—they must be silenced at once!"

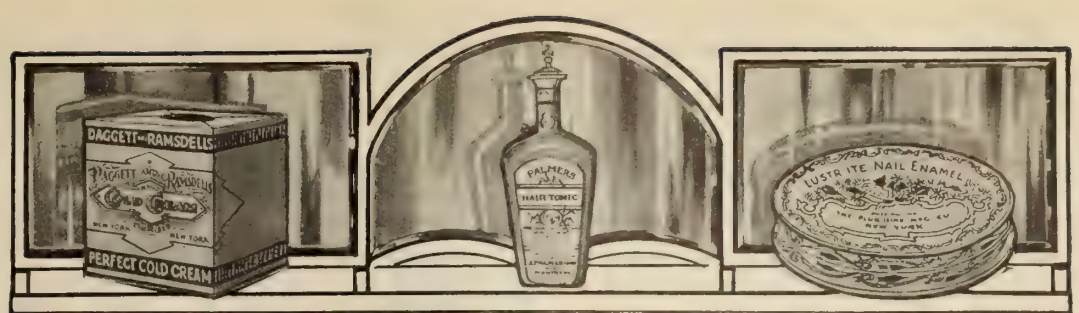
The little group looked at each other with startled faces. But the blind girl rose quietly from her chair.

"Come, Tommy!" she said. "We are wasting time here! I am sure, sir," turning to Mr. Johnson, "that you do not desire to insult my sister. I realize that, to one who did not know her, some such explanation as you have hinted might seem possible; to those who know her it is so impossible as to be preposterous. Mr. Van Slyke could scarcely have kidnapped Christine; and to consider any other possibility is an insult."

She turned with gentle dignity and moved toward the door.

"Quite right," boomed Aunt Miriam. "I declare I think all men are fools! There is more behind this affair than an elopement. Even if Miss Christine had been of the eloping kind. Adam! What are you staring at? Why don't you do something?"

(To be continued.)



THE CHARM OF YOUTH

The fresh, natural glow of health and vigor need not be wholly lost with the passing of the years.

It is as futile to hope to retain a good complexion without caring for it, as it is to expect a garden to blossom without water. Try a massage with

DAGGETT & RAMSDELL'S PERFECT COLD CREAM

Rub it into the skin and see how it cleanses and purifies. Used every day, you retain the fresh, natural, healthy condition of the skin.

If the time spent regretting the poorness of your hair were occupied in taking care of it, you would have a head of hair to be proud of.

PALMER'S Hair Tonic

50c. and $1.00 sizes

cleanses the scalp, invigorates th roots of the hair and by making it perfectly healthy, restores to it the soft, lustrous quality.

Smooth, rosy, carefully manicured nails, bespeak a nice appreciation of the essentials of refinement. They can be secured by anyone if they use preparations and tools. They are adapted to every need of the manicuring art, and are used by professional manicurists all over the world.

LUSTR-ITE

At most up-to-date Dealers in Toilet Requisites, or for six cents (6c.) in stamps (to defray packing and postage) we will send you a sample package of Daggett & Ramsdell's Perfect Cold Cream and Lustr-ite Nail Preparations, together with booklets containing information of great interest to you.

J. PALMER & SON, Limited - - - 5 and 9 De Bresoles St., Montreal

Gerhard Heintzman Pianos
Pianos of Prestige

With most people a piano is an investment for a lifetime—few buy more than one piano.

So that it pays to make the fullest investigation before buying. The

GERHARD HEINTZMAN
Canada's Greatest Piano

is without a peer in tone, touch and responsiveness to the artist's will.

Its magnificent construction has gained for it a prestige in the musical world that is unassailable.

There are over 20,000 Gerhard Heintzman pianos in Canadian Homes.

We would like the opportunity of making good our claims. Call at our salesrooms and ask for demonstration or let us send you one of our descriptive booklets, with fullest information.

Your present instrument taken as part payment.

Gerhard Heintzman, Limited

41-43 Queen Street West

(Opposite City Hall)

Toronto

1169

We Pay for Names

We are starting a Sample Copy Campaign for subscriptions and need men or women to furnish us names and act as our representatives in spare or entire time. We offer excellent pay for this special work.

In Your Neighborhood

are probably many ladies who never heard of Canadian Home Journal. They need a good woman's journal, and would prefer a Canadian magazine if they knew of it. Write for information about our Sample Copy Campaign.

Circulation Department CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, Toronto

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Greatest Hosiery Value Ever Offered!

6 Pairs of Holeproof Hose

Guaranteed Six Months!

Reg. U. S. Pat. Office, 1906

Carl Freschl Pres

Why accept ordinary hosiery, the kind that wears out in a few days, when "Holeproof," six pairs guaranteed six months, cost not a penny more? Save all the darning you do now. Have whole hose to wear all the time. Your dealer probably has "Holeproof." If not, send to us and we'll ship direct. We'll send a guarantee ticket with every six pairs, insuring new hose free to replace any pairs that wear out.

FAMOUS Holeproof Hosiery FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN

Seventy-Cent Yarn— Soft and Comfortable

"Holeproof" are not heavy or coarse in the least. No cotton hose were ever more stylish or neater. We pay the top market price for Egyptian and Sea Island cotton yarn, the finest obtainable. You can have any weight that you wish, from winter weights down to the thinnest, sheerest and lightest weights. There are also twelve colors and five grades. No other hose equal "Holeproof" in real value.

Carl Freschl, Pres.

The above is the signature which identifies the genuine Holeproof Hose. There are scores of poor imitations. Mr. Freschl originated hose good enough to guarantee. He has had 38 years of experience.

WOMEN, Save the Work! MEN, Save the Bother!

Buy six pairs of Holeproof Hose today and try them. See why they save. You'll never go back to wearing common hosiery. No one ever does who tries "Holeproof."

HOW TO ORDER—Choose your color, grade and size from the list and state clearly just what you wish. One size and one grade in each box. Colors only may be assorted as desired. Six pairs are guaranteed six months except when stated otherwise.

Men's Socks—Sizes 9½ to 12. Colors: black, light tan, dark tan, pearl, navy blue, gun metal, mulberry. In light weight, 6 pairs $1.50 (same in medium weight in above colors and in black with white feet, 6 pairs $1.50). Light and extra light weight (mercerized), 6 pairs $2.00. Light and extra light weight LUSTRE SOX, 6 pairs $3.00. Pure thread-silk sox, 3 pairs (guaranteed three months) $2.00. Medium worsted merino in black, tan, pearl, navy and natural, 6 pairs $2.00. Same in finer grade, 6 pairs $3.00.

Women's—Sizes 8½ to 11. Colors: black, light tan, dark tan, pearl, and black with white feet. Medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00. Same colors (except black with white feet) in light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $3.00. Light weights in black, tan and gun metal, 6 pairs $2.00. Same in extra light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $3.00. Same in pure thread-silk, $3.00 for 3 pairs (guaranteed three months). Outsizes in black, medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00, and in extra light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $3.00.

Children's—Sizes 5½ to 10½ for boys, 5 to 9½ for girls Colors: black and tan. Medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00.

Infants' Sox—Colors: tan, baby blue, white and pink Sizes 4 to 7. Four pairs (guaranteed six months) $1.00. Ribbed-leg stockings, in same colors and black, sizes 4 to 6½, 4 pairs (guaranteed six months) $1.00.

Send in your order now. Write for free book, "How to Make Your Feet Happy."

TO DEALERS—Write for our agency proposition. Excellent opportunity. Thousands of dealers in U. S. making big hosiery sales with "Holeproof."

Holeproof Hosiery Co. of Canada, Ltd.
117 Bond Street London, Canada

Are Your Hose Insured?

DAINTINESS IS THE KEYNOTE

What pride you take in the quiet artistic arrangement of your bedroom!

So restful! So harmonious!

But the furniture may be a little the worse for wear. If so, try—

LACQUERET TRADE MARK HOUSEHOLD LACQUER

It's so easy to apply! And it will cover up blemishes on your bedstead, rejuvenate the doors, brighten the drawers, and hide the wear and tear marks on sofa and table legs. "LACQUERET" is made in eight artistic shades. Also Clear and in Silver and Gold, Flat and Gloss White and Flat and Gloss Black.

Our little booklet "Dainty Decorator" tells of its many uses in the home.

Write for YOUR Copy.

Cans contain Full Imperial Measure. Ask your dealer.

Don't Accept a Substitute.

INTERNATIONAL VARNISH CO. LTD.

TORONTO WINNIPEG

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on PageThree of this issue.

GATES OF MEMORY

Continued from page 7

"Yes, and mine, too, though I thank Heaven it was for the better!" the man replied with sudden vehemence, "for had the horse not thrown you both, it's likely I'd have done for John with my gun—yes, as soon as for the rabbit! I was in a black mood that morning, at the sight of you both—"

"Oh!" cried the girl, moving a step away and gazing with wide eyes at the frowning face of Barton; then, in a softer tone: "You loved me as much as all that?"

"Yes, more than life—more than my life—or his!" replied Barton, as he seized her hand and drew her close.

They walked slowly on in the steady lustre of the moonbeams, and the silence, until the shadows of clustering trees embraced them. Six months afterwards Henry Barton and Bessy Marvin became man and wife.

Ogilvie himself attended the wedding, serene and self-possessed of his second nature. Without a tremor of emotion, he saw the beautiful girl he had once loved made the wife of another. His former love for Bessy and the old enmity between him and Barton existed no more than the dream of one long dead.

Peacefully, the years rolled on over Orthridge. The fields were sown and bore their rich harvests season after season, and the life of the community went on all undisturbed by the tumult of the greater world without. One by one the older inhabitants went to sleep soundly upon the pleasant tree-crested hillside where the setting sun rested gloriously in a mellow haze as it rolled down the West. In their time the old father and mother of John Ogilvie died calmly and beautifully, one soon after the other. The last words that John Ogilvie spoke to his mother were in the nature of a lie, but a lie that sent a final thrill of happiness through the aged woman.

"Tell me, Johnny, that you remember me as your mother—your mother who brought you up! Say you remember when you were a little child!"

And though impenetrable blackness arose before the groping, baffled vision of the son, he answered:

"Yes, mother, I remember—it all comes back to me now!"

A daughter was born to the wife of Henry Barton—fair-haired, blue-eyed as Bessy herself. The child was named Camille, and grew strangely fond of the tall, silent, and grave-mannered John Ogilvie, the neighbor of her parents.

Esther Ogilvie felt a sort of uncertain, yet sacrificial duty imposed upon her by the weird spell that rested upon John. She told the faithful and devoted Matthew Olcott that until her brother was entirely recovered she would never marry.

Those who had known Bessy as a child remarked upon the marvellous resemblance Camille bore to her mother at the same age. As she grew up into young womanhood this resemblance increased until there came a time when mother and daughter might almost have been taken one for the other. But the daughter's rose-like beauty brightened and bloomed and that of the mother slowly faded. Then Henry Barton died of a sudden illness—a strong man whiffed out like a candle flame.

When Camille was twenty—the same age her mother had reached when betrothed to John Ogilvie—the wonder-working hand of Fate, which had left its victim so long undisturbed, once more reached down from the clouds and blotted out the records of twenty-four years of Ogilvie's life. He was now in his forty-ninth year.

It chanced one afternoon, as he was felling a young oak upon his farm, that the tree fell crashing, and rested upon its branches, its trunk still clinging to the stump by the twisted fibres. Ogilvie's axe glittered in the sun as he raised it and with one blow cut through the bent and straining wood. The heavy trunk, suddenly released, shot upwards as the branches sank rustling together. Then, with a wide sweep like some gigantic club, it lurched violently sidewise and struck Ogilvie full upon the forehead. It was as if the doomed tree sought to drag its destroyer down with it to death. The man sank limply into the branches of the tree—a tiny rill of red began to trickle over the green leaves.

They carried Ogilvie into the house and laid him in the old tester-bed which had stood in his chamber for more than forty years. Esther Ogilvie and Camille Barton busied themselves frantically with the injured man. A physician was hastily sent for.

"It is a fracture of the skull," gravely announced the man of medicine, and left soon after to summon a specialist for consultation.

Night fell, and the two women sat alone in the chamber by the bed of the helpless farmer. He lay with eyes closed, his head swathed in linen. The watchers spoke no word. Then—

"Look! Look! Esther!" exclaimed Camille. "His lips are moving!"

Even as she spoke, the eyes of John Ogilvie opened slowly and fixed themselves dimly upon those of Camille as she stood revealed in the lamplight before him.

"We shall be one?" spoke the lips, and it was like the fragmentary ending of a question asked by an automaton, and pronounced as though the speaker knew not the meaning of his words. But the voice was the old voice of John Ogilvie. His sister, sitting in the shadow at the foot of the bed, pressed her hand over her pounding heart. Like a flash of unearthly light, it came to the two women that he was completing the sentence he had left unfinished just before the dogcart had been overturned twenty-four years before! The uncompleted phrase, perfect in its thought and impressed by a deep and eager yearning upon his consciousness, had lain dormant in the brain of John Ogilvie during all this time. Now, released by the shock of the second accident, it burst

TROUBLES will never appear at your table if you insist on getting CLARK'S CELEBRATED PREPARED FOODS

Just try CLARK'S PARAGON OX TONGUES

Perfectly Delicious and appetizing.

CLARK'S CHRISTMAS PLUM PUDDINGS

Are so piquant and full of tastiness that you'll never worry about making them yourself once you have eaten CLARK'S.

CLARK'S MINCEMEAT IN THE NEW STYLE CAN

should appeal to you on all grounds. Absolutely pure, thoroughly sterilized, ready for use, it's really the only way to buy the best Mincemeat.

W. Clark, Montreal

MANUFACTURER OF THE CELEBRATED PORK AND BEANS

into the light of the living present, and the two halves were made whole. Often had Camille heard her mother repeat the story of the accident and the last words Ogilvie had spoken to her: "Dear Bess, do tell me the day when—" Instantly the girl seized upon the clue.

"In October," she murmured, bending her head; "we shall be married in October," and laid her warm hand against his cheek.

John Ogilvie sat up in bed. The years seemed to fall from him like some worn-out garment. His eyes grew bright once more. The tense muscles of his face relaxed and rounded out into the familiar features Esther recognized as those of her brother John before his affliction. The flush of the fever that was coming upon him brought back the colour of youth to the sallow cheeks. His voice rang clearly again like the resonant voice of his young manhood.

"A pretty tumble we've had, Bessy!" said the farmer; "but I'm happy to know you're not hurt. How long have I been this way? And how's that fool brute, Molly? Has Jackson examined her carefully?"

"You've been unconscious a long time," answered Camille, "and Molly—Molly isn't hurt at all."

"It's an odd way you've dressed your hair to-day, Bess," said Ogilvie; "yet I think it most becoming. Ah! so you have set the day for October! It's worth having your head knocked to know that! A little more, however, and the wedding would have been a funeral. This head of mine feels like a mashed melon."

His eyes wandered to his hands lying outstretched upon the counterpane—hands yellow, thin, and gnarled, no longer like the firm, full-fleshed hands of four-and-twenty years ago. Wonder and alarm dilated his eyes.

"Heavens on earth! What has happened to my hands?" he cried, holding them out in the lamplight.

"It must be the fever and the loss of blood," replied Camille Barton with a quaking voice.

"Yes," hastily added his sister, still keeping fearfully in the obscurity at the foot of the bed, "you lost a great deal of blood, John. That makes you feel weak—you must rest."

"Bring me a mirror, Esther," he pleaded. "I must see how badly I'm damaged about the face."

"No, John, not to-night," faltered his sister. "To-morrow—when it is day."

"Bessy, come sit by me and give me your hand," murmured the injured man, and Camille sat on the edge of the bed, her face half in shadow and half in light. He began to speak of things that had occurred ere the girl was born—of their love, as he imagined it, of the dear days of delight in store for both. He rejoiced that his father and mother had not remained awake to watch over him. He inquired after his setter, which had died long ago. Crops that had been garnered and fruit that had been plucked over two decades ago—he spoke of these as present things.

"Be sure," said he, "that Jackson looks after Molly—her knees are tender. And if I'm to be kept abed for any length if time we must have Lafleur up to spray the freestone peach trees. I've ordered a new trap for the old folks—a present for their anniversary. See that it is taken into the barn at night, Esther, so we can surprise them with it. But where's the ring, Bessy?" he remarked suddenly, as his feverish fingers fondled the hand of the girl. With half a laugh and half a sob Camille replied:

"Oh, I left it at home, John, while working this afternoon."

Silent tears ran down the cheeks of Esther Ogilvie as she listened in the half-darkness, not daring to speak lest she reveal the age in her voice, not daring to move lest the light disclose it to her brother's eyes. She knew he was again revelling in the joy of his fresh, lusty manhood, and though the worn and broken frame of flesh invested and walled it about, and twenty-four added years of life rested wearily upon it, all this, the spinster realised, was unknown to the re-awakened memory of the real John Ogilvie. He who had been lost had now come back to his own once more.

When he slept, the women, in hushed voices, debated the question of how the tragic truth was to be told him, and by whom.

"It must be your mother, Camille," whispered Esther. "The shock will seem less to him, hearing it from her lips. We will send her to him after the operation."

The surgeons came and did the delicate work upon Ogilvie's brain and skull. He would be quite himself again, said they. When at length Ogilvie opened his eyes. he found a handsome, middle-aged woman, evidently his nurse, seated beside him in the twilight. Strange she was, and yet not entirely strange. She seemed much perturbed—more than a nurse of her age ought to be. Her voice, her face, her eyes—all were strangely familiar. When she spoke her voice trembled; when she looked at him her eyes filled with tears. The old leaven of an early love was again at work. When he persisted in asking to see Bessy—when, rather querulously, he wondered why she did not come to see him, Mrs. Barton burst into tears. Then slowly, as Ogilvie revived, she began to unfold the past. In the tenderest manner she told of the effects of the accident, of his changed personality, of the new life he had led, of the change that had come over his heart, and then over hers; of her marriage to Henry Barton, of their daughter Camille who resembled her, of Barton's death ,of Ogilvie's second accident, and the restoration of his former self.

John Ogilvie lay there as if stunned, only half comprehending the stupendous intelligence. Bessy Barton took a mirror and held it up before him. He started at sight of the altered features that stared into his own, then hid his face in his hands and said nothing for a long time, the while she gently stroked his hands. At last he muttered, despairingly:

"I thought I was coming back to the old life—the old love. I thought your girl was my old sweetheart, my old Bessy."

"John, I am still Bessy," said Mrs. Barton, smiling; "if not 'the old Bessy,' at least an old Bessy."

"Would to Heaven I had never awakened!" murmured the man despondingly. "If only that tree had finished me! This is worse than death. To lose all those years—to lose you, too! Oh, God!"

"John," said Mrs. Barton, with shaking voice, "John, Camille will remind you of me—she will be a daughter to you."

He turned his pale, drawn face toward her. A pathetic eloquence was in his eyes.

"And you," he said faintly, "—you?"

She bent over him and kissed him on the brow.

"I will not leave you," she murmured, "if you need me. I will be your nurse—your—"

The years seemed to fall from him again. There came a swift magic and a bright wonder upon them both, as in the old days. For Bessy it was as if she too had suddenly lost a great tract out of her life, as if the present had once more merged with the remote past. When, a few moments later, Camille silently entered the room, followed by Esther and the faithful Matthew Olcott, she saw her handsome mother kneeling beside Ogilvie's bed. Their arms were about each other, and the invalid was saying:

"Oh, now I do not mind having lost all these years—now that I may spend the remaining ones with you!"

Wear and Tear Savers

When putting down your new linoleum or oilcloth have strips of moulding nailed about the linoleum where it comes to the board. This prevents dust from getting underneath, and also preserves the edges from moisture under the floor covering.

To remove hot water marks on japanned trays, use sweet oil. Rub it in well till all marks disappear, then polish the tray with dry flour and soft cloths.

To eat cucumbers without causing bad effects, eat plenty of raw onion with them. The onion contains an oil which neutralizes the poison in the cucumber.

To remove a bad corn make a poultice of bread soaked in strong vinegar, and put it on the corn at bedtime. After a few nights the corn can easily be removed. This is a simple remedy, but if persevered with never fails.

A waste paper basket should be part of the nursery furniture, and the children should be taught to use it for its proper purpose. The habit may be formed of putting in it scraps of paper and other rubbish which would otherwise litter the floor.

A kitchen table covered with zinc is a great labor saver. It is easily cleaned and saucepans may be stood, and vegetables, etc., cut up upon it without injuring it. The zinc costs little, will last practically a lifetime, and can easily be nailed on the table by any home carpenter.

SPECIAL PRICES FOR MAGAZINE CLUBS

You save from 10 to 25 per cent

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL	$1.00
With Canadian Magazine and Canadian Courier	5.85
With Canadian Magazine and McClure's	4.00
With Musical Canada	1.35
With Toronto Saturday Night and Winnipeg Free Press	4.10
With Review of Reviews and Canadian Magazine	4.60
With Free Press, Winnipeg, Family Herald and Weekly Star	2.35
With Toronto Saturday Night	4.40
With McClure's Magazine and Good Housekeeping	3.40
With Current Literature and Canadian Courier	6.00
With Free Press Weekly, Canadian Thresherman and Farmer and Western Home Monthly	3.10
With Review of Reviews and Canadian Courier	5.50
With Canadian Magazine	2.85
With Ainslie's Magazine	2.45
With McClure's	1.90
With Housekeeper	2.15
With Family Herald and Weekly Star	1.60
With Canadian Thresherman and Farmer	1.50
With Canadian Century	2.50
With American Boy and Harper's Bazaar	3.20
With Every Woman and McCall's	2.10
With Free Press and McLean's	3.10
With Woman's Home Companion and Everybody's	3.55
With McLean's and Toronto Saturday Night	4.75
With Canada Monthly or Nor'West Farmer	1.50
With Weekly Free Press or Modern Priscilla	1.60
With Modern Priscilla, Pictorial Review and Ladies' World	2.75
With Rod and Gun or Designer	1.60
With Delineator and Canada Monthly	3.05
With Designer and Pictorial Review	2.70
CANADIAN MAGAZINE	$2.50
With Canada Monthly and Canadian Home Journal	3.60
With Review of Reviews and McClure's	4.90
With American or Woman's Home Companion	3.75
With House Beautiful	5.10
With St. Nicholas (New) and Harper's Bazaar	5.45
With Pearson's or Everybody's	3.25
With McClure's and Woman's Home Companion	5.90
With Canadian Courier and Canadian Home Journal	5.85
With Canadian Home Journal, Free Press Weekly and Western Home Monthly	4.45
With Woman's Home Companion and American	5.40
With American Magazine	3.75
With Canadian Courier	5.20
With Canadian Home Journal or Canada Monthly	2.85
With Western Home Monthly	2.85
With Musical Canada	2.70
With Toronto Saturday Night	4.60
With McClure's	3.25
With Woman's Home Companion or American	3.75
WOMAN'S HOME COMPANION	$2.00
With Canadian Home Journal and McClure's	3.50
With Etude or Musician	3.05
With Success and Pictorial Review	3.80
With Review of Reviews and McClure's	4.55
With Cosmopolitan or Good Housekeeping	3.15
With McClure's and Delineator	4.35
With Everybody's or McClure's	2.80
With Cosmopolitan and Review of Reviews	3.90
With Success and McClure's	3.85
With Delineator	3.20
With Cosmopolitan and Delineator	4.70
With Modern Priscilla and American Motherhood	3.60
With Success and Harper's Bazaar	4.05
With Cosmopolitan Magazine and Good Housekeeping	4.65
With Canadian Magazine	3.75
With Canadian Courier	5.20
With Rod and Gun and Canadian Home Journal	3.25
With Scribner's or House Beautiful	4.65
With Delineator and Everybody's	4.35
With Everybody's and Success	3.85
FAMILY HERALD AND WEEKLY STAR	$1.00
With Canadian Home Journal or Nor'West Farmer or Canadian Thresherman and Farmer or Western Home Monthly, or Country Life in Canada	1.50
With McClure's, or Everybody's, or Pearson's or Uncle Remus's Home Magazine	2.00
With Practical Farmer and Canada Monthly	2.85
With Designer, or Everyday Housekeeping or Weekly Free Press, or Farm and Dairy or Modern Priscilla or Regina Leader or Rod and Gun or New Idea Norman's Magazine	1.60
With Sunset, or Cosmopolitan, or Field and Stream or Good Housekeeping or McLean's or Musician or Out Door Life or Popular Electricity or Short Stories or Physical Culture	2.35
With Everybody's and McClure's	3.15
With American and Woman's Home Companion	4.15
With Etude and Delineator	3.80
With Western Home Monthly and Weekly Free Press	2.35
With Canada Monthly and Canadian Home Journal	2.35
With Woman's Home Companion and Everybody's	3.65
With Success and American Boy	3.05
With Sunset and Technical World	3.95
With Modern Priscilla, Ladies' World and Pictorial Review	2.85
McCLURE'S OR EVERYBODY'S	$1.80
With Canadian Home Journal	1.90
With Delineator	2.70
With Woman's Home Companion or American	2.80
With World's Work and Delineator	5.15
With Cosmopolitan and Delineator	4.20
With Woman's Home Companion and Delineator	4.35
With Cosmopolitan or Good Housekeeping	3.05
With Success and Pearson's	3.35
With House Beautiful and Delineator	3.45
With Canadian Home Journal and Canada Monthly	2.65
With Western Home Monthly and Weekly Free Press	2.75
With Family Herald and Weekly Star	2.00
With Canadian Magazine and Pearson's	4.35
With Canadian Courier and Etude	5.65
With Musician or Etude	2.65
With American Boy and American Motherhood	3.35
With Sunset and Field and Stream	4.15
With Scribner's or House Beautiful	4.15
With World's Work	3.60
With Current Literature or World To-Day	3.50
With Popular Electricity and American Boy	3.75
With Modern Priscilla and Designer	2.85
With Pictorial Review, Ladies' World and Modern Priscilla	3.15
MODERN PRISCILLA	$1.00
With Canadian Home Journal and Weekly Free Press	2.45
With Nor'West Farmer or Western Home Monthly	1.60
With Canadian Monthly and Family Herald and Weekly Star	2.45
With Canadian Magazine	2.95
With Canadian Courier and Canada Monthly	5.20
With Canadian Home Journal and Nor'West Farmer	2.35
With Everybody's and McClure's	3.15
With Pearson's	2.00
With Delineator	2.40
With Cosmopolitan or Good Housekeeping	2.35
With Woman's Home Companion or American	2.50
With Mother's Magazine and American Boy	2.55
With Canadian Home Journal and McClure's	2.75
With Pictorial Review and Success	3.00
With Practical Farmer and Everybody's	3.25
With Scribner's Magazine	3.85
With House Beautiful or House and Garden	3.85
With Review of Reviews	3.00
With American Boy and American Motherhood	3.05
With Sunset and Pearson's	3.50
With Canada Monthly and American	3.25
With Woman's Home Companion and Etude	3.90
CANADIAN COURIER	$3.50
With Canadian Home Journal and McClure's	5.25
With World's Work	5.45
With Travel or World To-Day	5.25
With Field and Stream and Rod and Gun	5.35
With McClure's and Business	5.40
With Musician and Sunset	5.90
With Technical World and American Boy	5.70
With Automobile Topics	5.25
With Review of Reviews and Judge's Quarterly	5.70
With McClure's and Everybody's	5.30
With Woman's Home Companion and McLean's	6.15
With Canadian Magazine and Weekly Free Press	5.95
With American and World To-Day	6.90

ALL SUBSCRIPTIONS TO RUN FOR ONE YEAR

The magazines in above clubs may be sent to one or separate address.

Write for our 1912 Catalogue of Magazine Bargains

CANADIAN MAILING & SUBSCRIPTION CO., LIMITED

311 Somerset Building, - Winnipeg

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

INGERSOLL CREAM CHEESE

SPREADS LIKE BUTTER

You can buy twice the quantity of Ingersoll Cream Cheese in blocks for the same money as you would receive in jar cheese, besides there is just as much difference in the quality in favor of Ingersoll Cream Cheese as there is in the price.

Never Becomes Hard. Every Particle Can Be Consumed.

Sold only in 15c and 25c blocks

For Sale By All Grocers

MANUFACTURED BY

INGERSOLL PACKING CO. Limited

INGERSOLL, ONTARIO

CANADA

SAVES MILES OF WALKING AND PAYS FOR ITSELF

WOMAN'S WORK IS NEVER DONE UNLESS SHE OWNS A HAMILTON KITCHEN CABINET

Hundreds of unnecessary steps are taken every day by women that could be avoided by carefully planning the kitchen. It is not the work that is tiresome but the extra steps taken to complete the work.

The Hamilton Cabinet combines all the latest ideas and actually pays for itself by the saving of food and labor.

We will ship you a Hamilton Kitchen Cabinet subject to your approval. If you are not pleased with it, return it to us at our expense.

Our method of payment is so easy that it is possible for every woman in Canada to own one of these wonderful labor and food saving cabinets. Write to-day for our free booklet and prices. A card sent to us to-day may add a year to your life and put an end to your unpleasant kitchen work

Are you interested in a really up-to-date incubator. If you are write us for information that is of great value to you

THE HAMILTON INCUBATOR CO. LTD.

AGENTS WANTED HAMILTON, ONTARIO

Solving The High-Cost Problem

Eat simple, nourishing, inexpensive foods and you will be the gainer in health and pocket. The high protein foods, meats, etc., cost the most, are the hardest to digest and hence the least nutritious in the long run. Cut out heavy meats and soggy pastries for a while and eat

SHREDDED WHEAT

Biscuits, the ready-cooked, ready-to-serve whole wheat food—steam-cooked, shredded and baked in the cleanest, finest food factory in the world.

Try Shredded Wheat for breakfast for ten days—served with milk or cream. Easily digested. Keeps the stomach sweet and the bowels healthy and active.

Also deliciously wholesome when eaten in combination with stewed or fresh fruits.

Triscuit is the crisp, tasty Shredded Wheat Wafer—delicious for any meal with butter, cheese or marmalade. Toast in the oven before serving.

Made by

Canadian Shredded Wheat Co., Ltd., Niagara Falls, Ont.

D64

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

HOUSEHOLD HINTS

Alum is Unfit for Use in Food

IN Great Britain no one is allowed to sell alum hidden in baking powder, because the English law protects the people from this injurious acid.

Canada has not yet enacted a law against the use of alum, and as alum in baking powder cannot be detected by its appearance, many manufacturers are using this condemned acid because it is a cheap adulterant.

It is a fact that alum in your stomach produces the same disagreeable results to the delicate organism as you will feel in your mouth by putting a tiny piece on your tongue. Science shows that alum reduces the flow of gastric juices and weakens their power of assimilation, causing indigestion and the ills that follow.

No housewife should buy a baking powder made by a manufacturer that is afraid to print the ingredients plainly on the label of each can, and the wording should state that there is no alum in disguise inside.

About the House

WALL paper that has been soiled by a smoky fire or lamp may be cleansed by using a hard, dry sponge, the stiffer and harder the better. Rub the wall briskly with it.

When packing lay a sheet of tissue paper between the folds of your skirts, and if the trunk will not take them full length put a soft wad of paper where they turn over.

Tinware should be rubbed with flannel well soaped to remove all stains, brightened with a fine flannel dipped in whiting and finished with the ever-useful chamois leather.

A man who raised thousands of fine heads of cabbage every year said that the only secret he possessed was that he sprinkled them every week with water in which he put asafetida.

In the making of hot starch soapy water should always be used. This gives the necessary shine to the linen, while it prevents any chance of the iron sticking to the surface of the article.

Bread or potatoes should never be put in the mouth at the same time as fish, especially by children, or it will be difficult to detect bones in the fish, and they may be swallowed by mistake.

To make a good starch for curtains, mix a large cupful of flour with a little water and beat by hand to a smooth cream, then add boiling water to required consistency, stirring vigorously the while.

To purify the air of a cellar and destroy parasitical growth, place some roll brimstone in a pan, set fire to it, close the doors and windows as tightly as possible for two or three hours, repeat every three months.

Rinse silk handkerchiefs the last time in water with a little methylated spirits in it. Roll up in a cloth, iron on both sides, and they will have the gloss you desire.

Boiled water, when used for drinking purposes, should be prepared carefully. See that the water boils fast for fifteen minutes, then keep it covered till required.

Where paraffin lamps and stoves are used, keep a box of dry sand in the hall. If sand is thrown on burning paraffin it will extinguish it at once. Milk has the same effect.

Patent leather and kid boots will take a far brighter polish if they are first wiped over with a sponge dipped in milk. This must be allowed to dry before the polish is applied.

When preparing vegetables or fruits that stain the fingers, a very good plan is to previously rub the thumb and forefinger with a little grease, and it will prevent the stains that are so unsightly and difficult to remove.

Padding Embroidery Work.—For this lint cotton is much better than thread. Moisten the finger tips and roll the cotton the size and length wanted, and put in place and work over it. No shrinking required, as most thread does.

Cleaning and Cooking Hints

A piece of soft flannel is better than a brush for removing dust from silk.

To prevent the wash boiler from rusting, dry it and then rub the inside of the boiler with a bar of laundry soap.

Spots on plush will disappear if rubbed lightly and rapidly with a clean, soft cotton cloth dipped in chloroform.

When about to sweep a carpet, wet into a paste coarse cornmeal with water and ammonia, and scatter over the carpet. It takes up all the dirt when swept, without filling the room with dust.

The cheapest way of cleaning a white felt hat is to rub prepared French chalk well into it, and then brush off with a hard, clean, white-bristled brush. Block magnesia well rubbed in also cleans white felt successfully.

When frying potatoes have the fat very hot, if not actually boiling, before the potatoes are put in. Have each slice wiped quite dry, and when each is browned take it out and place on a paper before the fire to dry.

New lamp wick if boiled in vinegar and thoroughly dried before using will not smell bad when burning.

A weak solution of turpentine poured down the water pipes once a week will drive the water bugs away.

To rid your cellar walls of mildew try burning a little flour of sulphur in a tin plate. Paste up the door with strips of brown paper after you have set light to the sulphur and leave for at least twenty-four hours before reopening the door.

To clean a child's white coat rub it with equal parts of very dry flour and calcined magnesia.

At this season when chapped hands and face will give annoyance, treat the skin with carbolic soap instead of with carbolic salve. Melt several bars of pure castile soap and beat a small quantity of carbolic acid into it Pour it into greased pans and set aside to cool.

To remove grease spots from silk or wool place the grease spots between blotting paper and press with a hot iron. The blotting paper will absorb the grease and the most delicate shades can be cleaned like new in this way.

Oatmeal whitens the skin, and the girl who appreciates the value of the bath keeps a supply of oatmeal bags on hand, always using them whenever she takes a warm bath—and this is often.

Weights and Measures

IN order to facilitate quick division of recipes commit to memory or tack up over your kitchen table, the calendar for weights and measures. Knowing what each measurement weighs helps materially in using recipes.

One cupful is a half pint.

One cupful of flour weighs four ounces, and measures sixteen level tablespoonfuls.

One cupful of butter weighs eight ounces, and is sixteen level tablespoonfuls.

Sugar is the same as butter.

Ten medium-sized eggs weigh a pound.

One tablespoonful is an ounce of common liquids.

One teaspoonful is a fluid drachm.

One level tablespoonful of flour is a quarter of an ounce.

One tablespoonful of sugar is half an ounce.

One tablespoonful of butter is half an ounce.

One dessertspoonful is a half tablespoonful.

Four level teaspoonfuls equal one tablespoonful.

PLUM CAKE

Mix one cup flour with one teaspoon cinnamon, one-half teaspoon each nutmeg and soda, one cup chopped raisins, one-half cup currants and one-half cup chopped nuts. Cream one-half cup butter, add one cup sugar, one egg well beaten, one tablespoon sour milk, the flour mixture and enough more flour to roll out. Mix soft, roll thick, cut out and bake quickly.

LEMON PUDDING

Ingredients: Boil one pint of milk, in which place two ounces of loaf sugar, the thin peel of half a lemon, two inches of stick cinnamon. Break in a basin four eggs, beat them well with a fork or whisk, then pour in the milk by degrees, not too hot. Mix it well and pass it through a fine sieve or piece of muslin. Fill a plain mould with it, and place this in a covered stew pan containing two inches of water. Set this pan on the fire and let the water only simmer for about twenty minutes or till set, which is easily perceived, then take it out and put it in the larder. When cold it will be ready to serve.

MOLASSES PIE

Here is a standard recipe for molasses pie, which is a favorite in many households: Nine tablespoonfuls of Porto Rico molasses, one tablespoonful of melted butter, three tablespoonfuls of vinegar, grated rind of one lemon, juice of one lemon, two level tablespoonfuls of flour, half a teaspoonful of cinnamon, one level teaspoonful of nutmeg; moisten the flour with the vinegar and lemon juice, then add the molasses, rind, spices and butter, and pour into crust-lined tin. Bake half an hour in a moderate oven.

MARMALADE PUDDING

Ingredients.—A quarter of a pound each of flour, chopped suet, bread crumbs, sugar, and marmalade, ¼ pint of milk, one egg, a pinch of salt, and ½ teaspoonful of baking-powder.

Mix the dry ingredients together then add the beaten egg and marmalade, and finally the milk. Stir slightly and thoroughly, put into a greased basin, cover with greased paper, and steam for two and a half hours.

STUFFED APPLES

At this season apples are practically the only fresh fruit at the housewife's command. With the aid of varied stuffings, baked apples may be frequently served without producing monotony. The apples to be stuffed must have rather more than three-quarters of the core removed. It is a matter of personal taste whether the fruit is peeled or not. The aperture from which the core is taken may be "stuffed" in one of the following ways: With orange or lemon marmalade; with a mixture of brown sugar, butter, and lemon rind. (Two ounces of sugar, 1 oz. of butter, and the grated rind of half a lemon will suffice for six apples); with sugar mixed with currants, sultanas, or chopped candied peel; with apricot jam or red currant jelly; If the apples are served cold, beat the white of an egg with as much sugar as it will take up, put this round the apples, and place in a cool dry larder to become frosted.

DUCHESS POTATOES

KEDGEREE

Made from the remains of boiled cod. Boil ¼ lb. of Patna rice. Slice an onion, and fry it in 1 oz. of butter or clarified dripping until it is a golden brown. Add the drained rice and 4 oz. of flaked cod, free from bones and skin. Stir well, and flavour with cayenne pepper and salt. Boil an egg hard, chop the white and grate the yolk. Mix the white and the kedgeree, pile on a very hot dish, and garnish with the grated yolk.

SPANISH RICE

Cover the bottom of the spider with olive oil. In this cook one-half of a small onion which has been chopped and one large green pepper cut in quarters. Add one-half can of four small tomatoes, cooking all together for twenty minutes. Then put in one cupful of rice, and just enough hot water to keep the mixture moist. Salt to taste and cook slowly for one hour, or more, if necessary. It is ready to serve when the rice is thoroughly done.

ORANGE SAUCE

Mix one tablespoonful of flour with one cupful of sugar and add gradually one and one-half cupfuls of boiling water. Put in a saucepan over the fire, and when the mixture boils, add one tablespoonful of butter and one orange, finely shredded. Boil until the sauce is of the consistency of thick cream, and serve either hot or cold.

VEGETABLE CHOP SUEY

Use one each of potatoes, turnips, carrots, parsnips and onions, cut in cubes. Add one head of celery and some finely chopped parsley. Put in a saucepan with one tablespoonful of butter or oil. Season with salt, cayenne pepper, and tumeric. About all the tumeric that will be required to tastefully season any dish will be one-fourth teaspoonful. Cover closely and cook until tender in the liquid generated from the steam. Only about fifteen minutes will be required for the cooking process. A little water may be added, if necessary, but there must not be a drop of liquid on the vegetables when they are cooked; neither must they be mushy. As soon as they crush readily between the thumb and finger, they are done.

"The Star" ASBESTOS PAD FOR DINING TABLES

The original and patented Dining Table Pad. The best Pad manufactured. Made of a special grade of Asbestos of sufficient thickness and weight to assure protection from damage by heat and moisture, covered with double faced cotton flannel to make it soft and noiseless. Pads and leaves made to fold to convenient size to lay away when not in use. Doily, Chafing-dish and Platter Mats of same materials, size 5 to 18 in. round, square or oval. Ask your dealer to show you the STAR Pad. All Pads and Mats bear our trade mark "Star."

These Pads For Sale By

John Kay Co., Limited	Toronto, Ont.
Murray-Kay Limited	Toronto, Ont.
T. Eaton Co., Limited	Toronto, Ont.
Henry Morgan Co., Limited	Montreal, Que.
Ottawa Fireproof Supply Co.,	Ottawa, Ont.
Chas. Duncan & Sons, Limited	Brantford, Ont.
Smallman & Ingram, Limited	London, Ont.
T. C. Watkins, Limited	Hamilton, Ont.
T. Eaton Co., Limited	Winnipeg, Can.

Booklet on request.

KERNEY MFG. CO., 157 W. 62nd Street CHICAGO, ILL.

DOLLARS DO DOUBLE DUTY in the hands of those thrifty, capable women who know and use

Maypole Soap

The Clean, Easy Home Dye

They keep their homes, their children and themselves looking fresh and attractive at a very moderate cost, because Maypole Soap makes old things look like new and often doubles their length of service.

Maypole Soap gives rich, even, lustrous colors, fadeless in sun or rain. Dyes cotton, wool, silk or mixtures. Does not stain hands or kettles.

24 colors—will give any shade. Colors 10c.—black 15c.—at your dealer's or postpaid with free booklet, "How to Dye" from

FRANK L. BENEDICT & CO., MONTREAL

DOMINION EXPRESS Money Orders

and Foreign Cheques are payable all over the World.

They may be sent in payment of produce, tax, gas and electric light bills, interest on notes and mortgages, insurance premiums, subscriptions to newspapers and magazines, and in fact in payment of all kinds of accounts, whether in or out of town.

We give you a receipt and if the remittance goes astray in the mails,

we refund your money or issue a new order free of charge.

TRAVELLERS' CHEQUES ISSUED. MONEY SENT BY TELEGRAPH AND CABLE.

When purchasing Goods by mail, ALWAYS remit by

DOMINION EXPRESS CO. MONEY ORDERS

RATES FOR MONEY ORDERS:

$ 5. AND UNDER		3 CENTS
OVER 5. TO	$10.	6 "
" 10. "	30.	10 "
" 30. "	50.	15 "

AGENCIES THROUGHOUT CANADA.

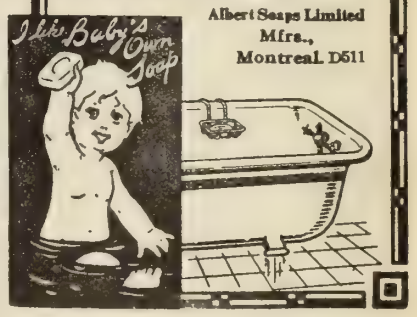
"Best for Baby—best for you."

Baby's Own Soap

Made of specially purified and refined vegetables oils. It will not hurt the most delicate skin.

Refuse all substitutes.

Albert Soaps Limited Mfrs., Montreal. D511



Knowing How

to break into business makes you an independent man or woman. Knowledge is power in business as nowhere else. Our courses cover the ground of business preparation thoroughly and we take a personal interest in the success of each student. Write for copy of our handsome prospectus.

British American Business College
Y. M. C. A. Building
Yonge and McGill Streets - Toronto

Webb's

Chocolates

for people who want the best

THE Harry Webb Co., Limited TORONTO, CAN.

Ladies' Watch Offer

PRIZES GIVEN: TEN

$50.00 Gold Watches

18 karat gold cases, fine full jewelled movements of the highest quality.

150

$8.00 Silver Watches

Sterling silver cases with monogram, guaranteed seven-jewelled movements.

These are the daintiest, most attractive watches that anyone could wish. They will give pleasure and service for a lifetime. The reputation of Canadian Home Journal and one of the best known jewelers in Toronto is guarantee not only of their quality but of their beauty.

Earned In A Week

15 Subs. Win A Watch

1. To every contestant who sends us 15 yearly subscriptions for the JOURNAL by March 15th, we will give a beautiful sterling silver watch, unless she wins a gold watch.

2. To the lady who sends us most yearly subscriptions for the JOURNAL by March 15th, we will give a splendid 18 karat gold watch.

3. For every 15 ladies who win silver watches we will give another gold watch to the next highest contestant.

4. For each 15 subscriptions we will send a silver watch or choice of its equivalent in cash or premiums. Thus, 30 subscriptions entitles contestant to two watches, etc., unless a gold watch is won.

5. Only full price subscriptions will count. One-year subscriptions at $1.00, count 20 points; six-months' subscriptions at 50 cents, count 10 points.

We are quite confident that at least 160 ladies will each secure 15 subscriptions, in which case 10 will receive gold watches, 150 will receive silver watches.

Enter Your Name Or A Friend's and prove that your interest in CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL makes you willing to work for its success.

Enter Your Favorite Teacher

You can make a splendid gift to your teacher or Sunday School class leader. A few pupils can easily secure 15 subscriptions.

ENTRY FORM

Contest Department
CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Enter this name in your gold watch contest. Send full information, sample copies and supplies:

Name .....

Address .....

Sent by .....

Address .....

.....

Send entry by Jan. 15th to have name listed in February JOURNAL among the contestants. It will help you get orders. Send your picture if you wish it published.

MATTERS MUSICAL

WE appreciate very much the many kind things that were said in comment on our December "Matters Musical," and the only other reward that we ask is that our subscribers will make still more use of this department, both in enquiries and with suggestions.

We find from the many letters received that a large number of our subscribers are interested in church music, and nothing would please us more than to be able to use our influence towards raising to a higher standard the musical part of our church services.

WOLF-FERRARI'S "La Vita Nouva," which is to be sung by the Mendelssohn Choir next February, has made a triumphant impression in Germany, Holland, England and America, and has been acclaimed by the critics as a new word in musical composition. Extraordinary demands are made upon the abilities of the choristers performing it, high C's and prolonged passages difficult of execution abounding in the first tenor and first soprano parts. The orchestration, too, is unusual in parts, and in addition to the regular orchestra demands, seven kettledrums, organ, big drum, tandam, two bells and a pianoforte. This last instrument is employed as a solo instrument, as an accompaniment, and also as an integral part of the orchestra. Once it is introduced with two harps, the string band and all the seven kettledrums in a movement entitled "The Angel's Dream," the effect produced being most remarkably beautiful. Throughout the entire composition the treatment of Dante's text is one that could only emanate from a master mind. The story of the poet's love for Beatrice, its influence, and its fruit, belongs to literary history and psychology. In his own words, "At that moment (the first meeting) I say most truly that the spirit of life which hath its dwelling in the secret chamber of the heart began to tremble so violently that the least pulses of my body shook therewith, and in trembling it said these words, 'Behold a God, stronger than I, who, coming, shall rule me.'" Thenceforth a reverent and worshipping love for the marvellous maiden "more fit to be an angel than a girl" filled the soul of Dante. It was the beginning of a "new life," the first fruits of which were his published sonnets.

MANY of our subscribers will doubtless be interested in a short description of an old-time concert given in Toronto recently, by the choir of one of our city churches, under the leadership of H. M. Fletcher, who is conductor of the Schubert Choir.

The main features of the evening were the old time costumes, and the quaint songs and choruses, which in every case portrayed life as it was at the beginning of the Nineteenth Century. The gowns featured by the ladies revealed the old-time hoops, basques, and such other fashions as grandmother might describe in telling some old tale. The men were also costumed in that period, wearing velvet suits, in knickers and long stockings, lace collars, and white wigs.

The music was characterized by the old-time jerk and emphasis, and the humor was increased by one or two finger accompaniments. Several members of the choir assisted in old-time recitations, solos and quartettes. It may easily be guessed that the amount of work necessary to produce this was indeed many times heavier than that needed for a modern concert. It certainly reflects great credit on the leader and the members of his choir.

REAL SCOTCH WINCEY

—LAWRIE & SMITH—
have for many years manufactured this fabric, which has been much appreciated, and goes on increasingly so. The excellent quality of the material, which is practically unshrinkable, makes it most adaptable to those who make up garments for day and night wear in their own homes.

PRICES-
1/- to 3/6 per yard.
Write for Free Samples to Lawrie & Smith, Ayr, Scotland.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Question—(Organist's letter)—F. K. R.—Please name some good organ preludes and postludes.

Answer—Owing to the limited space at our disposal we must give a rather brief answer to the above query, but the following might be considered an attractive list: "Communion," Saint Saens; "Peace, Perfect Peace," Willem Coenen; "Melody," J. A. West; "Cradle Song," F. Sohr; "Largo," Handel; "Hosanna," Paul Wachs; "Duke Street," George Whiting; "The Son of God Goes Forth to War," George Whiting; "March Militaire," F. Archer; "Pleyel's Hymn," U. C. Burnap. You might find Shelley's book (Gems for the Organs) very useful, and also many compositions by Henry Smart, Edwin Lemare, and H. A. Wheeldon.

CHOIRMASTER, R. W. B.—You will possibly find among the following some useful hints for your anthem work:

"Dear Refuge of My Weary Soul," Baumann. This anthem is introduced by a very pleasing baritone solo, followed by a pianissimo chorus, working up to a very fine climax.

"Hark! Hark! My Soul," Shelley, consisting of two contralto solos and a very attractive chorus, with a soprano obligato.

"Great and Marvellous," Turner. An exceptionally heavy composition, suitable for anniversary or thanksgiving services.

"Christian the Morn," Shelley. With soprano and contralto duet, also duet for male voices.

"Seek Ye the Lord," Dr. J. Roberts. Opened by a tenor solo, followed by a tenor obligato, with a soft accompaniment by the choir.

"Still, Still with Thee," Speaks. This is an anthem of much sweetness and pathos, with solos for contralto, baritone and soprano.

For a change, we give some suggestions for quartette work. One of the prettiest compositions recently published is "Vesper Hymn," Lonnie Rees; also, "Come Unto Me," E. R. Bowles; and, "Thou Wilt Keep Him in Perfect Peace," E. R. Bowles.

G. E. H.—I have heard that the study of the violin interferes with the touch of a good pianist. Is this so?

There are two reasons why no one can play piano and violin equally well. The violinist strives to harden his finger tips in order to make his tone definite, while the soul of a sensitive and refined piano touch lies in the softness of the finger tips. The ear is another factor in the matter, for the acoustic pictures peculiar to the two instruments are so thoroughly different from each other that the ear must get accustomed to the tone quality of the piano to produce the best results by exploring its possibilities. The technic, literature and tone quality of the two instruments are too different to admit of a mastery of both.

Simply say H.P. to your grocer, he will hand you a bottle of the most appetising sauce in the world.

But be sure you do say H.P., because it is H.P. Sauce you want

You can easily tell it—there is a view of the British Houses of Parliament and the letters H.P. prominently displayed on every bottle of real H.P.

H. P. is used on the dining tables of the British and Canadian Houses of Parliament—that's why it is called

H.P. SAUCE

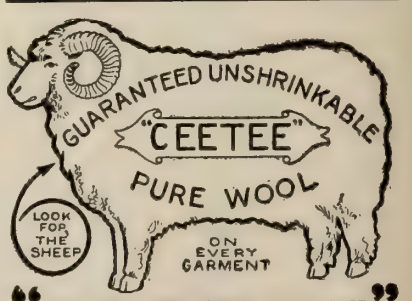
Upton's Pure Orange Marmalade

The most delicious preserve you ever tasted and served with toast or rolls and coffee makes one of the most nourishing and delicious light meals procurable.

Upton's Brands are made only from the most luscious, selected oranges and pure granulated sugar.

Ask your Grocer — he keeps Upton's

H87



"CEETEE"

THE ONLY UNDERWEAR TO WEAR UNDER ALL OR ANY CONDITIONS

Worn by the Best People.
Sold by the Best Dealers.
Manufactured by
C. Turnbull Co. of Galt, Ltd. Q7

PAQUET FURS

Through This Factory From Trapper To YOU

Once a Luxury Now a Necessity

FURS have long been regarded as a luxury—we've made them a necessity. Through our new method of selling direct from the factory, the man or woman of limited means may now enjoy the comfort of rich and luxurious furs without extravagance.

PAQUET FURS have long been acknowledged to be the best furs on the Canadian market. The reason is not far to seek.

PAQUET FURS are bought in the raw by men who know their business. They are carefully dressed, under the direct supervision of trained specialists. Then they are dyed in the immense Paquet dyeing tanks, and are dried in rapidly-revolving cylinders. When dry the inspectors get in their fine work, and woe betide the skin that fails to come up to the Paquet standard. The perfect skins are sent upstairs to the cutting room, where they are stretched, cut, and passed along to the operators, who know how to put the edges together so they can't come apart, and so neatly that the join cannot be located except from the back.

After another searching inspection, they are sent to the finishing room there to receive the padding and lining—and, after a final examination, they are ready for the Order Department, where sharp-eyed inspectors stand ready to reject any and every fur piece or fur garment that falls short of absolute perfection.

That's why PAQUET FURS are recognized as

THE FINEST FURS PROCURABLE

Can you wonder, then, that more than eight million dollars' worth of these furs have been sold already? And this is the sort of furs we now offer to you at the actual manufacturer's prices of Canada's largest fur factory.

FURS COST MONEY

You must be absolutely certain that you get all the value you pay for, otherwise you are wasting money. There are so many qualities in fur that it requires an expert to detect the difference at sight—anyone can find it out in wear and service. There is one safe way to make sure of getting the greatest possible value for every dollar you spend, and that way is to deal direct with Canada's Greatest Fur Factory—the only fur factory in America where every process, from the raw skins to the finished product, is in operation under the one roof.

Fur-Lined Coat

4677-313—Lady's fur-lined coat, 50 inches long, shell of all wool imported cloth, semi-fitting back, box front, collar and revers of mink marmot lining of brown dyed Sushki. Factory price, prepaid ... $32

Fur-Lined Coat

4675—Lady's 50-inch fur-lined coat, shell of pure wool imported beaver cloth, semi-fitting back, box front, 36-inch lining of genuine hampster, collar and revers in natural mink. Factory price, prepaid ... $55

Lady's Long Coat

4432—Lady's 50-inch coat, in all-wool imported cloth, with quilted mercerized lining and rubber interlining, collar and revers in fine quality mink muskrat. Factory price, prepaid ... $18

Astrachan Jacket

3378—Lady's 30-in. "Fernald" style jacket, fitted back, center vent, shawl collar, plain satin lining, jacket made with nice bright Astrachan skins. Factory price, prepaid ... $28

Raccoon Jacket

3098—Lady's 33-in. regulation style jacket, in fine quality, full-furred raccoon, semi-fitting back, plain mercerized sateen lining, notched collar. Factory price, prepaid ... $52

Man's Coon Coat

3—Man's coon coat, [illegible] of shawl or notched collar, quilted lining of fine quality black lasting, well made and well finished in every particular. Factory price, prepaid ... $50

"Paquet" Special

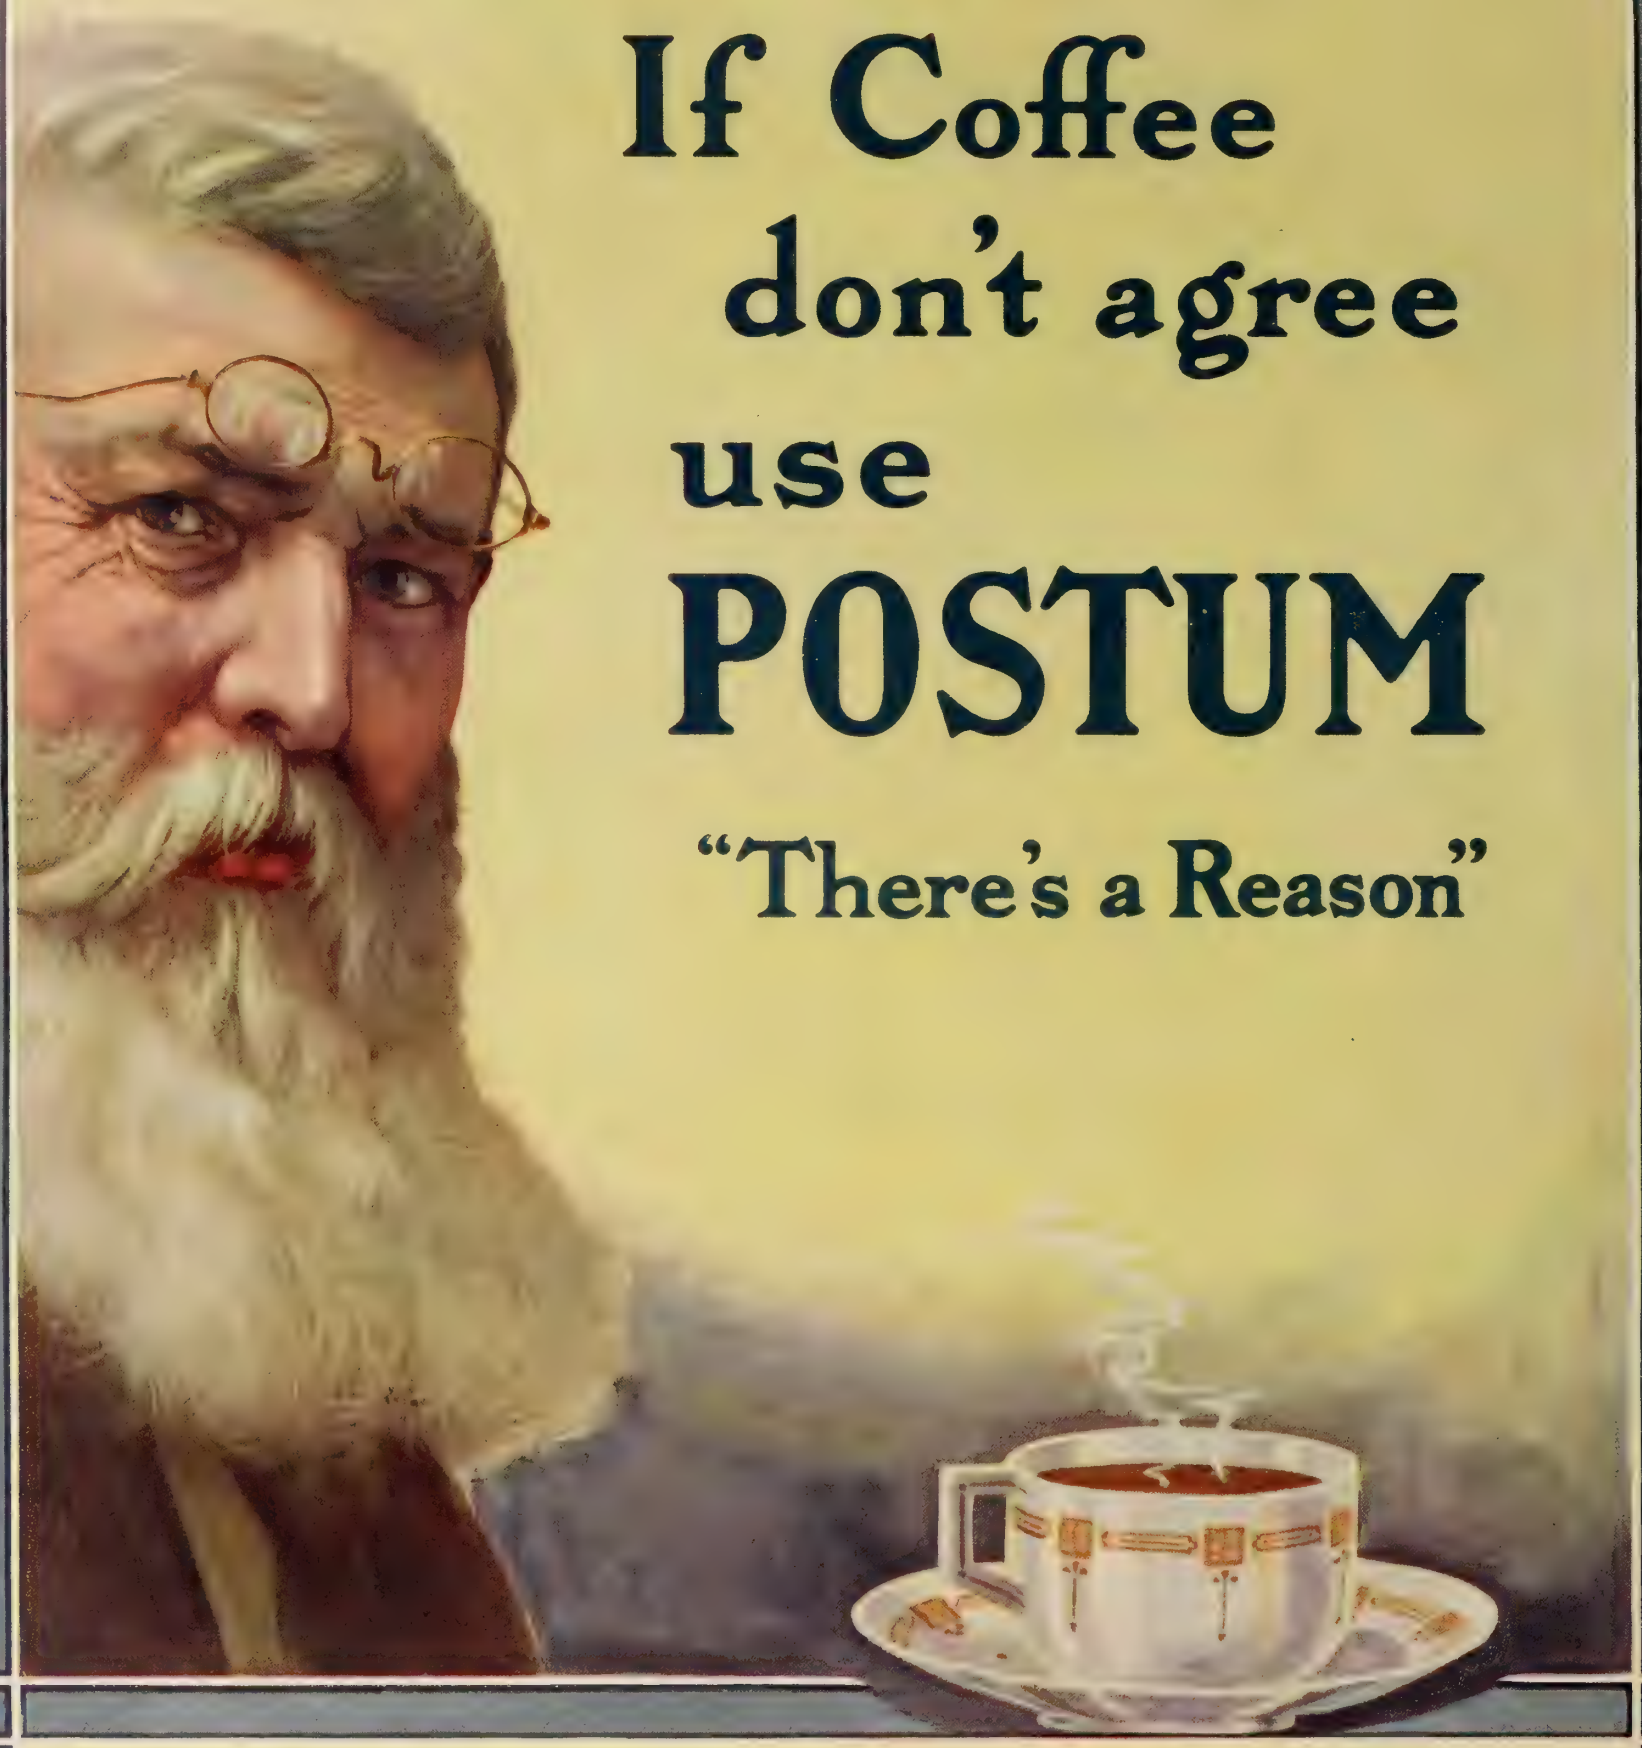
311—Our "Paquet" special man's coat is made in black beaver cloth, with plain farmer's satin lining and shawl collar of Russian otter marmot. Factory price, prepaid ... $13

THIS FUR CATALOGUE

containing 80 pages of fine half-tone illustrations and thousands of descriptions and prices of PAQUET FURS, will be sent you on request. Write to-day for a copy—don't put it off and forget. A post-card request will bring it by return mail. Write now.

THE PAQUET COMPANY LIMITED.

QUEBEC – CANADA



If Coffee don't agree use POSTUM

"There's a Reason"

Men who fail to supply the body with food and drink of the kind needed to make up for daily wear and tear must stand aside in the race for pre-eminence.

Those who are properly fed will surely win the laurels.

If coffee is found to interfere with digestion, or to cause one or more of the many nervous disorders, common sense and a little ambition to "be some one" would suggest a change.

Postum furnishes the gluten and phosphates of grains required by Nature to nourish Brain and Nerves with food. When made right, that is, boiled 15 to 20 minutes after boiling begins, it has a delicious taste similar to that of the mild, high-grade Javas.

Healthy Nerves and Brain are an asset.

"There's a Reason" for POSTUM.

Postum Cereal Company, Limited,
Battle Creek, Mich., U. S. A.

Canadian Postum Cereal Co., Ltd.,
Windsor, Ontario, Canada.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

FEBRUARY
1 9 1 2

HOME BUILDING NUMBER

Published by THE CANADIAN WOMEN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., Limited
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

PRICE
10 CENTS

Made in Canada

THE permanent success of any line of goods depends upon maintaining the quality. It has been in the past, and shall always be the aim of this Company to manufacture goods that will add to its reputation, and we shall continue our efforts to make the buyer for the home realize how important it is to guard againt the use of adulterated and injurious food products. Alum is an injurious substitute commonly used in Baking Powder, to lower the cost of production. Food scientists all agree that it is very injurious to the system.

MAGIC BAKING POWDER

Contains No Alum and costs no more than the ordinary kinds.

E. W. GILLETT COMPANY LIMITED

Winnipeg TORONTO, ONT. Montreal

Our Shop Mark

FURNITURE of Character reproduced as near as adaptability to modern requirements will permit, is not only a credit to the home in which it has the privilege of displaying its beauty, and the serviceable taste of its designer, but it is also a display of the good taste of those showing their preference in surrounding themselves with this style rather than shams. In buying our goods you not only buy the above qualifications but you become one of our numerous satisfied customers that we have attained by giving everyone that which is genuine.

William and Mary

Although all our goods are supplied through the trade we welcome your enquiry.

Toronto Furniture Co.
LIMITED

Toronto, Canada

"Makers of the Better Make of Canadian Quality Furniture."

Colonial

JAP-A-LAC

The Great Home Beautifier

¶ This wonderful material has probably done more to beautify homes in all parts of the whole continent of America than any other one preparation; yet, it is easier to tell what it is NOT than to tell what it is. It is NOT a varnish, it is NOT a stain, it is NOT a paint, it is NOT an enamel; yet it combines the uses of a varnish, a stain, a paint and an enamel all in one.

¶ Thousands and thousands of thrifty housekeepers and lovers of beautiful homes have attested to its value each year.

¶ It is so easy to apply that one needs no special skill to produce really beautiful results with Jap-a-lac. Even amateurs who have never been able to do good work with paints, enamels, stains or varnishes can obtain a finish worthy of an expert.

¶ Our book of directions and suggestions is so complete and explicit that it is almost impossible to go wrong.

¶ Be sure to write to us for it. IT'S FREE FOR THE ASKING. Jap-a-lac is made in 21 colors and natural (clear). There is nothing in the world like Jap-a-lac for renewing the youth, beauty and strength of woodwork of all kinds—stairways, doors, baseboards, window frames, cupboards, floors, furniture, wickerwork, registers, iron pipes, chandeliers, lamps, baby carriages, picture frames, candlesticks, andirons and a thousand and one other household articles. It is poor economy to try to get along without Jap-a-lac. IT IS PENNY WISE AND POUND FOOLISH. Jap-a-lac COSTS NO MORE than any high grade paint, varnish, stain or enamel AND IS VASTLY SUPERIOR.

FOR SALE EVERYWHERE

JAP-A-LAC COLORS

Oak
Gold
Ground
Natural
Mahogany
Flat White
Dead Black
Malachite Green
Enamel Green
Apple Green Enamel
Enamel Blue (Pale)

JAP-A-LAC COLORS

Blue
Cherry
Walnut
Dark Oak
Aluminum
Gloss White
Ox-Blood Red
Enamel Red
Brilliant Black
Enamel Pink (Pale)
Enamel Green (Pale)

The Glidden Varnish Co.

FACTORIES

Cleveland, U.S.A. Toronto, Canada

SUBSCRIBERS' ADVERTISEMENT GUARANTEE

Readers of the "Canadian Home Journal" are fully protected when buying from any of our advertisers. We know that every advertiser in this issue is reliable, and that our readers will be dealt with fairly and honorably. Should any of our readers have an unsatisfactory dealing with any of our advertisers we will undertake to have a satisfactory adjustment made or the money refunded. This absolute guarantee is good only when our readers tell advertisers when dealing with them that their advertisement was seen in the "Canadian Home Journal."

EATON'S SEMI-ANNUAL SALE

EATON'S
CATALOGUE No. 01
SEMI-ANNUAL SALE
1911-12
MONEY SAVING OPPORTUNITIES FOR EVERY MAN WOMAN AND CHILD
NOW
IS YOUR CHANCE TO BUY AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES PHENOMENAL BARGAINS
WE GLADLY REFUND YOUR MONEY IF GOODS ARE NOT SATISFACTORY
TWO UNPARALLELED BARGAINS
FORTY FOUR PAGES OF WONDERFUL BARGAINS
Sale Commences 26TH DECEMBER 1911
Ending 29TH FEBRUARY 1912
FREIGHT FREE DELIVERY
T. EATON Co
TORONTO CANADA
ALL SPECIAL PRICES; WE ALSO FORWARD ALL ORDERS OF $25.00 OR OVER SHIPPING CHARGES PREPAID
LOW PRICE OPPORTUNITIES IN HOUSE DRESSES AND PETTICOATS
SIZES
1.39
89
1.59
BARGAINS YOU'LL APPRECIATE
T. EATON Co TORONTO, CANADA—SEMI-ANNUAL SALE, 1911-12, DECEMBER 26th TO FEBRUARY 29th
GET YOUR SHARE NOW
A PHENOMENAL BARGAIN THIS
FLAT PAINT BRUSH 19
SILVER-PLATED BABY SPOON 19
19 CENTS
PAPER HANGER SMOOTHING BRUSH 19
PURE WOOL TOQUE 19
VALUE EXTRAORDINARY
FANCY CROSSBAR HANDKERCHIEFS 19c
THIS USEFUL LEATHER BILL FOLD 19
LAUNDRY BAG 19
INDIAN HEMP STAIR CARPET 19
THIS CHOICE BOX OF MIXED CANDIES ONLY 19
HOCKEY STICK AND PUCK 19c
SAW VALUE WE GAVE 1.43
HANDY MAN

YOU'LL SAVE MONEY BUYING NOW

PAGE AFTER PAGE OF THIS CATALOGUE BRIMMING OVER WITH BIG BARGAINS

HAVE you received this Catalogue? If not, please say so on a postcard or a letter, and don't delay either—because this Semi-Annual Sale ends 29th February, and with it your chance to save greatly. Remember, also, that this is a special sale of specially bought merchandise at specially low prices, and in voluminous variety. That's the keynote of this greatest of all EATON sales. Never before have we excelled what is now offered in all round goodness and genuine helpfulness. Consider this your opportunity to make money go farther to bring you just what you want and need most at a price much less than usual. EATON values are known in all sincerity and this is no exception in value-giving—so why hesitate when all this saving is within your reach. Send your order without delay and share in this bargain carnival. We anticipate hustling, bustling busy days, and we're in fine fettle to meet the rush satisfactorily.

EVERY PENNY REFUNDED IF NOT SATISFIED

WE TAKE ALL THE RISK

Just to think, that what you may choose comes to you on approval, that's really so — no matter what may be the circumstance—you have to be suited absolutely or else we refund your money and also pay all transit charges. Could any offer be more favorable—and so pronouncedly beneficial. We say in all sincerity—use this Catalogue—test its values, make it your guide to greater economy with this far-reaching assurance—The EATON guarantee.

JUST SEND A SAMPLE ORDER—NOW

THEN YOU'LL APPRECIATE ALL THE MORE THE WONDERFUL SAVINGS NOW OFFERED

IF YOU HAVE NOT RECEIVED YOUR CATALOGUE YET TELL US QUICK

THE T. EATON Co LIMITED
TORONTO CANADA

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Notice to Subscribers

Subscriptions are payable strictly in advance.
Remit by Money Order or Registered Letter. We are not responsible for remittances that go astray. Only one and two cent stamps accepted in payment.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Published on the 25th of each month preceding date of issue by
THE CANADIAN WOMAN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., LIMITED
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

WILLIAM G. ROOK, President

Edited by JEAN GRAHAM

Subscription Price

Subscription for Canada and British Isles, $1.00 per annum; United States, $1.35; Postal Union countries, $2.00 (8s.) post paid.
We accept no patent medicine, liquor, narcotic or exploitation announcements.

EDITORIAL CHAT

THE COVER DESIGN is always a source of anxiety and much thought to the makers of magazines. Both advertising and editorial authorities are seriously concerned over "what we shall have for the front cover." We are happy to be able to assure our readers that during 1912 the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL will present a pleasing exterior, of which our friends may well be proud. In January, we set out with a bright and seasonable depiction of a snow man and two happy young Canadian playmates who represented a typical scene of our bracing northern winter. This month, you will find a "February's Lady" on the cover who would be a fair valentine for any admirer of feminine charms. The "touch of snow" only makes the picture all the more attractive. For next month we have arranged for a "March cover," which will open the springtime most auspiciously. The artist who is giving us a cover design for this number is Mr. Norman Price, who has attained fame in both New York and London, and of whose work Canadians may well be proud, as he is a native of the Dominion. His illustrations of an edition de luxe of Lamb's "Tales from Shakespeare" showed masterly imagination, and among his recent magazine work, none has been more noteworthy than the latest Christmas cover for the New York Century. We are congratulating ourselves on having secured the services of so eminent an artist, and we are sure that you will appreciate our efforts to have the best available talent for this publication.

SCHOOL PROBLEMS have been arousing general interest, and our educational system has been more discussed during the last year than ever before. Medical inspection is a feature of the modern public school management, which is claiming more attention every day. "Are not the parents quite capable of looking after the health of the children?" is a question which may be asked by many. Apparently not, if we may judge from the reports in our congested cities. We must remember that our public schools are for all classes, and that many pupils come from poor and overcrowded homes. The rural schools have been neglected, in this respect, and the public is slow to realize what is needed in the matter of medical inspection, throughout the rural districts. In this month's issue we publish an excellent article by Dr. A. A. Backus of Aylmer on this subject, which, we hope, will be followed by other papers from the same authority, amplifying the matter and appealing especially to the members of the Women's Institutes. Dr. Backus is well known among the members as a speaker of authority, and we know that you will read her articles with interest and profit.

OUR HOME BUILDING number, which is always our February issue, is unusually satisfying this year. We publish articles on heating, decoration and construction which contain much practical information and are eminently readable. There is a little chat on the woodland home, which anticipates the summertime, and there are illustrations of homes which will prove of stimulating interest to many a prospective home-builder. From an artistic standpoint, we hope you will find the various departments of this subject dealt with in satisfactory fashion, and we trust that the many hints as to the best modern methods of equipping the home will be of immediate value to all housewives.

THE FICTION is a strong feature of the modern domestic magazine, and we try to meet this demand with stories of good purpose which are also thoroughly entertaining. "Christine," the heroine of Mrs. MacKay's serial, is certainly a lady of many and extraordinary adventures, and our readers are deeply interested in her varying fortunes. "Captain Middleton's Mistake," by Percy James Brebner, in this month's issue, is a short story which should meet with general approval. It is an English romance of the good old-fashioned type and we are sure it will meet with appreciation. Then we have two "storiettes" this month which are by Canadian writers, and which depict playfully the lighter side of life. "The Dregs-of-Wine Silk" is a sketch which is quite true to everyday life and character, while "Where There's a Will" presents a situation which every woman will understand.

WOMEN'S INSTITUTE work becomes increasingly interesting. As it spreads in the West, the enthusiasm becomes typical of that new land of great opportunities. In our March number we expect to publish an article, "Home-makers of Saskatchewan," by Miss Lillian Beynon, whose journalistic work is well known in Manitoba and the Prairie Provinces, and who has interested herself in the organization and spread of Women's Institutes in the new districts. Photographs from the West of prominent workers, or of special scenes, such as fairs or exhibitions, will be welcome.

FASHIONS FOR SPRING will be the leading feature of our March issue, and will be widely representative of the many departments of this "eternally feminine" subject. Gowns, hats, lingerie and all the frills and furbelows, dear to the most sensible of us all, will be discussed in our first spring number.

OUR INSTITUTE FRIENDS have been writing to us on a subject which seems to be very near their hearts, and which we are quite willing to include in our list of "attractions." However, the success of this new feature will depend altogether on he enterprise and enthusiasm of the nstitute members; so we appeal to them to show their sincerity by taking a practical part. We are going to have an Institute Question Box, in which any matter of concern to Institute members may be discussed and asked about, with the same reedom you would exercise in your own society. Recipes which have proved especially successful may be sent in or exchanged. Questions about any department of house-work or farm-work, in which women are interested, will be welcome. This question box must be kept up by members, who will give their names and addresses when asking or answering. If it is preferred, initials only will be published. The best way to learn is by trying to find out, and we hope our Institute friends will all show a disposition to help in this mutual information bureau.

CONTENTS

February 1912

FICTION

CAPTAIN MIDDLETON'S MISTAKE - 7
THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS - - - 9
THE DREGS-OF-WINE SILK - - - 11
"WHERE THERE'S A WILL" - - - 11
THE COST OF A CRIME - - - - 12

SPECIAL FEATURES

MEDICAL INSPECTION OF RURAL SCHOOLS - - - - - - - - 6
A ROSEDALE RESIDENCE - - - 16
A WOODLAND HOME - - - - 18
THE COSY FIREPLACE - - - - 19
A WYCHWOOD HOME - - - - 21
HEATING THE MODERN HOME - - 25
A SANITARY WALL FINISH - - - 25
HUMIDITY IN LIVING ROOMS - - 26
BEAUTIFUL WALLS FROM PAINT AND WATER - - - - - - - - 31

FASHION DEPARTMENT

CHARMING FROCKS FOR GIRLS - - 34
GOWNS FOR INDOOR WEAR - - 34
GOWNS OF FASHIONABLE SILK - - 35
A DAINTY BLOUSE - - - - - 36
FROCKS FOR MANY OCCASIONS - - 39
IN THE SHOPS - - - - - - 40
EMBROIDERED LINGERIE - - - 41

MATTERS OF MENU

A VALENTINE LUNCHEON - - - 15
CULINARY CONCEITS - - - - 53

FOR THE HOUSEHOLD

HOUSEHOLD DECORATION - - - 32
HOUSEHOLD HINTS - - - - 52

SPECIAL DEPARTMENTS

AROUND THE HEARTH - - - - 14
WOMEN'S INSTITUTES - - -- - 42
CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB - - - 46
THE DRESSING-TABLE - - - - 47
MATTERS MUSICAL - - - - - 48
JOURNAL'S JUNIORS - - - - 49
BUT THAT'S ANOTHER STORY - - 54

Medical Inspection in Rural Schools

An Interesting Paper on an Important Subject

By A. A. BACKUS, M.D.

MEDICAL inspection and sanitary care of the people is a very ancient custom. The Greeks and Romans were always interested in developing and caring for the body—baths, exercises, massage, special gymnastics for special development were a part of medical science well known before the time of Nero. For the Jews Moses gave a list of hygienic laws unequaled by any other code in the world.

In many European countries a system of medical inspection for schools has been in force for years. Japan introduced in 1893 medical inspection of schools, and in 1906 had eight thousand four hundred and twenty-four inspectors. Strange to say, the United States have been slow in adopting this measure, and it was not until 1896 that it was established. However, now New York City has the most thorough system of medical inspection of schools in the world.

Toronto—thanks to the good work and energy of Dr. Helen MacMurchy, has taken up the work in this province, and other cities and towns are giving the subject serious consideration—while the rural schools are just beginning to think that there is a need, and a great need, for the medical inspection of schools. This is conclusively proved by the statistics of New York. Sixty three per cent. of all children who enter the schools of that city require medical treatment. In Canada as yet we have no accurate information on this subject. But without doubt there would be found in our rural public schools at least fifty per cent. of the children needing medical advice and attention.

The parents should attend to this, many say; but the parents do not attend to these things, and the lack of interest in the physical well-being of the growing child is one of the sad and startling conditions in life, whether it is from lack of observation, lack of interest or a feeling of fatality—"What is to be will be." The fact is, that after the child begins to run about and care for itself a little, very serious physical changes can take place in that child without the knowledge of the parents, and a child may be considered dull, stupid, lazy, who is only ill-nourished or suffering from some physical defect, which if taken early, can be easily corrected, and the activity and brightness so a part of the normal child, return to it again.

The first thought of the mother when her babe comes into the world is for its physical condition: Is it all right in form and health? There is a pride parents display in the well-formed infant which is unfortunately often lost in the growing child, and the environment in our homes, whether in country or city, is seldom best calculated for the physical welfare, and the growth and development of the girls and boys.

Children acquire through unsanitary conditions in the home many physical defects, and unless those defects are discovered and corrected by proper medical or hygienic care in the earliest stages, the perfect physical development, and the best mental development can never be attained.

We have compulsory education, which is a great blessing, and in addition we should have compulsory sanitation in our schools, and the compulsory medical care of all children suffering from physical defects, defects which to-day in our rural schools are encouraged by the lack of care in the home and completed by unsanitary condition of our rural schoolhouses and their outbuildings. Girls and boys grow into men and women, carrying through all their lives the penalty of a weak body and inactive minds because of the indifference and ignorance in the home and in the school. The teachers, as well as the children, suffer; the remedy is regular and careful medical inspection by capable inspectors.

The medical inspector of a rural school should be an outsider, and sent direct from the Educational Department of the Provincial Government; one who has no wires to pull, and one who has an honest interest in the welfare of the children. There should be special training for these inspectors, and they should be thoroughly familiar with the laws of physical development as well as with the discovery of disease.

Every practitioner in the rural districts sees daily the frightful neglect of parents in looking after the physical needs of their children: malnutrition in every, form, enlarged glands, deformities of the spine, defective hearing, defective vision, defective breathing from adenoid growths and enlarged tonsils, defective teeth. And yet, because of their distance from a doctor, from lack of observation, or from the forlorn hope the children will outgrow these things, no heed is given to correct these conditions either by medical aid or sanitary conditions in home and school.

Probably fifty per cent. of the children in the rural schools are suffering from some physical defect, which if not attended to during these plastic years of their lives, can never be corrected, and will leave the trail of its malign influence in the mental and bodily conditions so long as life shall last. It is useless to try to educate children who are not in mental or physical condition for education, and the compulsory education of children is futile unless it is accompanied by environments for the physical and mental welfare of the children.

Faulty nutrition is the usual source of all ill health, and faulty nutrition is brought about not only through lack of proper nourishing food, but also by unsanitary conditions in the home and in the school. Medical inspection in the rural schools means that all children suffering from physical defects which can be corrected or improved will be put in the way of receiving the attention they require. Dr. Kelly writes: "Under the conditions of the present day a system of medical inspection of schools furnishes the most efficient methods for obtaining the facts which will enable any community to render the schools the best means for the development of the child and for its preparation to receive the greatest benefit from education." It is astonishing that the public have been so slow in recognizing the value of such a self-evident proposition.

Thomas Madden Moore says: "If the state for reasons of public policy, determines that all children shall be compulsorily educated from their earliest years, it should certainly afford the means by which this may be least injuriously and most effectively carried out, by providing sufficient food as well as education for every pauper child compelled to attend school.

In the rural districts of this province there are few pauper children; but there are hundreds of ill-nourished children, not from lack of things to eat perhaps, but from lack of nourishing food. Children cannot be expected to grow up properly unless directed, says Madison Taylor, and the medical inspection of rural schools include supervision of physical training and medical gymnastics. The physical welfare of the child is of so great importance because it means strong women and strong men. The physical welfare of the child to-day is the physical welfare of the children yet unborn, and the happiness of the human race.

The desired goal of every individual is happiness, and there can be no happiness without health; but, having health, it is easy to be happy, and to accomplish the tasks required with ease and comfort. The public schools of this country have often been accused of overworking their pupils, and some physicians have held this opinion. But when you consider the work accomplished, and compare it with the standard of German and English schools, our children do not have much overwork to complain of. It is not the work, but the conditions of school life in this country; too long hours in our schoolhouses (particularly for the younger children), lack of proper ventilation, bad lighting in the schoolrooms, causing eye strain and headache, improper seating, and consequently twisted and contorted positions of the body, not enough outdoor exercise of the active kind for either byos or girls. However, girls suffer most from the foolish idea they must not play outdoor games, and sit about the schoolroom while the boys are at play.

Dr. Edwin Chadwick, who has made careful researches in the mental growth of children, states that a child from five to seven years is able to attend to one subject for about fifteen minutes, which should be the length of the lesson; from seven to ten years, about twenty minutes; from ten to twelve years, about twenty-five minutes; from twelve to sixteen or eighteen years, about thirty minutes.

Every minute in school, after the power of attention is exhausted, is given to form the habit of inattention, which is a clear loss to education. That health must suffer is certain.

In 1881 the high school of Cleveland, Ohio, was investigated by authorized medical authority, and it was found that nearly seventy-five per cent. of the girls had left school on account of ill health or partly so, and that thirty-three per cent. of the boys were compelled to leave on account of physical troubles. Ill health increased almost uniformly in proportion to the amount of outside study, and inversely to the amount of recreation indulged in.

The confinement in close rooms, breathing air vitiated by respiration is bound to lower vitality, and is equally hard upon teacher and pupils. There is no doubt that breathing the vitiated atmosphere of respiration has a most injurious effect on the health. Persons soon become pale, and partially lose their appetite, and after a time decline in muscular strength and spirits. The aeration and nutrition of the blood seem to be interfered with, and the general tone of the system falls below par. Mr. Parkes, in his observations above quoted, might be looking into the average rural school of Ontario as he writes, and it is the breathing of a vitiated atmosphere day after day that sends teachers and pupils worn out and anaemic at the close of every school term.

The medical inspection of schools would necessarily make a great change in the matter of ventilation and exercise for the children. There is a tradition abroad—and like other traditions, we believe it without examination as to its truth—that country homes are more sanitary than the homes in the city, and country children stronger. Of course this is as it should be, and in the summer time, perhaps, is so; but in the winter, country homes are not by any means as sanitary and well ventilated as the city or town homes; nor are the country schools in any way to be compared with the sanitary conditions of the schools in city or in town.

To save a present dollar regardless of future contingency is the usual formula. Fox in "Sanitary Examinations of Water, Air and Food," writes: "Unventilated and crowded schools are, moreover, the nurseries of strumous diseases in general, which sap the strength of the community."

The medical inspection of rural schools would not only be of great benefit to the health and welfare of the children, but also a great educational factor concerning the laws of sanitation, which would go far towards establishing better conditions in the homes, better conditions in the schools, and a better idea of health and its preservation. "From labor health, from health contentment springs," but it must be labor under sanitary conditions or there will be neither health nor contentment.

There are continual calls for help for consumptives, and in many of these cases the foundation of the disease was the unsanitary conditions of the public schools which were attended. How much more expedient it would seem to prevent this trouble than to cure it! Keating speaks of school pathology, and gives the following affections as those which originate from school influences: dyspepsia, headache, nervous disorders, consumption, spinal neurasthenia, backache, menstrual disorders, consumption, spinal deformities and disease of the eyes. Surely if there is any method or system that can be introduced in our rural schools which will destroy or prevent influences that produce all these evils it would be well to consider them. In another article we will particularize some of these conditions and their results.

Captain Middleton's Mistake

An Old-Time Romance With Happy Ending

By PERCY JAMES BREBNER
Author of "Princess Maritza," "A Royal Ward," Etc.

Illustrations by Harold Denison

AT Almack's to-night the scene was a brilliant one. It was a masked ball, but whereas elsewhere in the town a gorgeous costume and a mask might conceal a person of no importance, or worse, one whose notoriety was too scandalous, here it was a matter of certainty that every visitor had at least some standing to give him or her a right to be present. That select committee of ladies which ruled at Almack's was not to be easily deceived, and all the world knew that cards of entry were difficult to obtain. Had not the Duke of Wellington himself been refused admission only a few nights ago because he was not in the regulation dress ordained by this austere committee?

Captain Middleton, of greater talent perhaps in the camp than in a ballroom, stood watching the dancers from a corner. He had danced half a dozen times; had acquitted himself with sufficient grace, and three times at least had succeeded in penetrating his partner's disguise. The sparkle of eyes through the mask, or hair or figure so perfect that they could only belong to one person in this parish of St. James', had led to the recognition; but the one person the Captain sought to discover he could not find. She was to have been present to-night, he was convinced of that; and he had looked upon this ball as an opportunity. Mistress Dorothy Sutherland was of those whom no disguise could conceal, at least from his recognition, he argued. Only on half a dozen occasions had he had speech with her, and then but a few words, one amongst a crowd of admirers eager to be seen and taken notice of. Certainly on no occasion had any special favor been shown him, and it was obvious that Mistress Sutherland could make choice of a richer and more important man than he was, yet from the first moment he had seen her he had worshipped her. Before this, in war, he had led a forlorn hope, and had snatched success; surely in love it was not impossible to win, no matter how great the odds might be.

But to-night chance was not in his favor. She was not to be found, and he had no inclination to dance with any other. As he passed slowly across the vestibule on his way out, three men were talking and laughing together.

"The fair lady is to marry, I understand," he heard one say.

"So fair a lady could hardly escape," was the answer. "Who is the fortunate man?"

"Not one of her own choosing, if what I am told be true," returned the first speaker. "They say my Lord Carrisford."

The third man laughed.

"Carrisford and Mistress Sutherland! Think of it. All that is beautiful given to all that is most repulsive. My life on it, she will find a way out either before marriage or after, with some gallant to help her. If her uncle persists there'll be a piquant story to set the town gossiping, I warrant."

"You might fill the post of gallant, Sir Charles."

"Why, so I might," was the answer. "It is an idea well worth the considering. One more or less will not serve to fill up the roll of my iniquities, but marriage—ah, gentlemen, is it not a much overrated condition, even when linked to as sweet a nymph as ever was sent to plague a man?"

Middleton was hard put to it to pass on in silence. It was well-nigh a sacrilege that such a man should take Mistress Sutherland's name upon his lips. Amongst the dissolute companions of the Prince Regent, Sir Charles Steadman held a prominent place. He was a libertine of the worst kind, yet of such wit and address that many found excuses for him, and innocence often believed that he was greatly maligned. Middleton well knew the dangerous character of the man, and passed into the street hot with anger.

It was not a night to help him to a better temper. A thick fog, like a pall, had fallen over the town, a damp atmosphere that chilled after the heat within and quickly settled on the cloak in a thick moisture. It was still early, there were as yet few coaches for hire in the street, and Middleton walked a little way into the blackness in search of one. At the top of a neighboring mews, where a light hung and flickered from the corner of a wall, a coach suddenly drew to the side of the road.

"Yes, sir, I know," said the driver quickly.

Middleton nodded. He was well known in the neighborhood, and this man had evidently driven him to his lodgings on some previous occasion. He got into the coach hastily, and immediately the driver's whip cracked. The sudden movement jolted him sideways, and he started as he came in contact with something soft and warm, and there was a rustle of silk by his side. He was not alone. Drawn back in the corner of the coach was a woman.

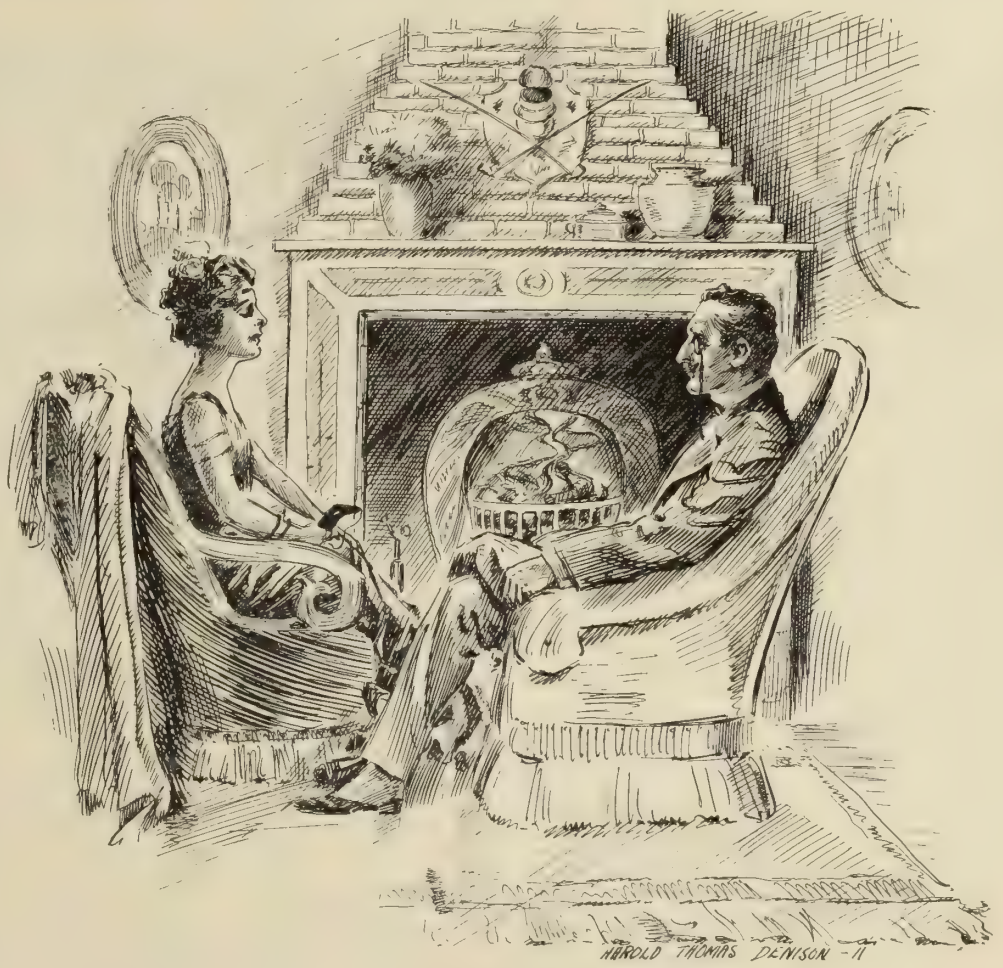
"Don't speak to me," came a whisper. "I am trusting you with more than life. Respect my helplessness."

"But surely, madam, I——"

"Please, please. Am I not here? Is not that enough?"

Middleton was silent. There was such a depth of pleading in her tone that he could do naught else but respect her wishes. There was a mistake, but she would not permit him to tell her so, and when presently she should find it out and be angry, she could not in justice accuse him. He smiled a little at the thought. Was ever woman yet born who would pause to be just in such a predicament?

She had shrunk away from him into the corner of the coach, and, save when a light at some street corner penetrated the darkness, he could not see her. Such a ray of light presently showed him that she was masked, and it was then for the first time that he realized that he was still wearinig his mask. In his anger at Sir Charles Steadman's base suggestion, and his annoyance at the inclemency of the weather, he had forgotten to remove it as he left Almack's. How could the driver have known him? Of course he could not have done so. He had been on the watch for a man seeking this coach and was as mistaken as the lady. The position was altogether impossible.



"Shall we tell the truth?"

"Really, madam, I——"

"Oh, please, not yet. Have you not said my word is law?"

It was a common enough phrase to use; possibly he had made use of it, might have done so to this very woman. Perhaps she recognized him, although he failed to discover her identity. She was trusting him with more than life, she had said; what was the full meaning of that? Surely this was an elopement, and he was the wrong man. Captain Middleton had no faith in such marriages; for one that might lead to happiness there were a dozen which only brought misery and disenchantment. Fate might have put it into his power to-night to save a woman from this. Or perchance he was the victim of a jest. He was not, as were most of his acquaintances, ever in love with some fair face or other. He had declared that when he touched so sacred a thing as love, it would be for lifelong constancy, and the laughter had been merry at his expense. This might be a trick, the woman hired from the playhouse for the occasion, while somewhere the perpetrators of the joke were gloating over the tale which they would take good care should be all over the town to-morrow. If so, his own native wit might yet turn the laugh against them, and he did not remove his mask.

There was another alternative. He might be the victim of foul play, this woman but a decoy. This would most easily account for her unwillingness to speak and for the driver's haste in getting him to enter the coach.

They were passing beyond the town now, and here the fog was not so dense. For a while, Middleton was uncertain in which direction they were going, but presently discovered they were journeying in the direction of Edgware. The woman did not move or speak. Whether her eyes were fixed upon him, perhaps penetrating the darkness better than his could, whether there were any doubt in her mind as to his identity, he could not tell.

Presently lights danced into the coach, which came to a standstill before an inn.

"Evidently our destination, madam?" said Middleton, rather asking a question than stating a fact.

She did not answer, but her dress rustled as she moved and gathered it together, so Middleton descended and handed her out. She passed quickly into the inn and he followed more leisurely. The coachman appeared to have received his instructions, and moved away.

"This way, sir. A bad night to travel in."

The landlord was obsequious, treated him as an honored and expected guest, and led him up a few steps into a private room where a table for two was already laid, and a fire made merry music on the hearth.

"You wish supper served at once, sir?"

"No, no. Wait a little. I will consult the lady."

The landlord bowed himself out, and Middleton took up a position before the fire. It was impossible to plan out any course of action. His next move must depend upon the lady's, but he did not remove his mask.

The door opened slowly and she came in, rather timidly, it seemed. She, too, still wore her mask.

"I have told them not to bring supper until I call for it. Come to the fire, madam. Now we may surely talk a little."

She crossed the room and took the chair which he drew close to the blaze for her. Her movement and pose were full of grace—a wondrous decoy, if such she were; and certainly he had seen no woman at the playhouse to compare with her.

"Will you not remove your mask?" he said.

"Indeed, sir, I was about to suggest that you should do the same thing. I have wondered why you were wearing it. For me it was natural, but for you——"

With a quick movement she undid her mask, and at the same moment Middleton did the same, a smile upon his lips as he foresaw her astonishment and dismay. The smile went out of his face as the wrinkles out of water when a strong wind sweeps the surface flat for a moment as it passes.

"Mistress Sutherland!"

"You, Captain Middleton!"

She had started to her feet, and her mask fell to the floor. He was speechless with amazement, and yet vaguely realized that Fortune had not treated him so ill after all.

"Speak, sir, and quickly What is the meaning of this outrage?"

"Indeed, madam, I am at a loss to understand it myself. You will remember that I endeavored to explain when——"

"Explain!" she exclaimed. "I remember no such thing. You forced yourself into my coach and——"

"And in the darkness you took me for someone else. I thought the coach was empty until I jolted against you and then——"

Then you ought to have called the driver and got out," she retorted.

"You would not allow me to speak, madam."

"There is no excuse, sir, to attempt to find one only adds to your meanness. There are some who will call you to account for this insult."

"Insult there is none, Mistress Sutherland; a mistake, yes, but hardly of my making."

"Of whose making then, pray? Did I creep along the street and force my way into a coach of yours? I understand now why you thought it necessary to wear a mask. It was to deceive a woman."

"You are unjust and unreasonable. There has been a mistake; it may yet prove a fortunate one."

"I can quite believe, sir, that you will not scruple to make profit out of my misfortune if possible," she answered angrily.

"At least listen to me now," he said a little severely. "A mistake can be repaired."

"This one, never."

"Will you listen to me?"

"You will use violence next if I do not, and perhaps the quieter I remain the less my reputation will suffer."

"To-night I was at Almack's," he said slowly. "It may increase your anger to know that I went there solely with the hope of seeing you. I run the risk of your greater anger to try and prove to you that I am speaking nothing but the truth. On leaving, I looked for a coach, walking along the street in search of one. Your driver drew up apparently recognizing me, and I got in. It was not until afterwards that I realised that I was still wearing my mask, and that he must have made the same mistake as you did."

"It is a strangely halting explanation," she said with a short laugh; "and it may interest you to learn that your reason for going to Almack's to night does not concern me in the least."

"Until you took off your mask in this room I had no idea who my traveling companion was," he went on.

"You took the adventure mightily complacent, sir. I suppose such intrigues are to your taste."

"And I could have sworn I should have known you anywhere, no matter what your disguise," said Middleton, rather to himself than to her.

"I see no attempt to repair the mistake yet," she remarked.

"The tale grows more interesting; pray, sir, continue."

"By a chance sentence overheard to-night I find you are to marry Lord Carrisford," Middleton went on after a moment's pause.

"Indeed, I intend to do no such thing."

"I gathered that you and your uncle were not in agreement in the matter. One man suggested that you would sooner elope than marry Lord Carrisford."

"There are things more unlikely."

"He even went so far as to provide you with a gallant."

"This is a most interesting tale," she said.

"I thought it intensely impertinent," he returned, "more especially when I heard the name of the gallant, a libertine of the worst character. The man himself was present, and it was with difficulty that I refrained from insulting him there and then."

"The tale grows more interesting. Pray, sir, continue."

"May I know his name?"

"Mr. Charles Steadman."

"I have no more to tell," said Middleton. "I left Almack's angry on your account, and unwittingly entered your coach."

"But doubtless you have advice to offer," she said. "I seem to have heard that Captain Middleton is always ready to offer advice."

"Indeed, madam, I assure you it is news to me."

"Once, I think, when I had barely exchanged a dozen words with him he had the effrontery to suggest that a gentleman I honored with my acquaintance was unworthy of that honor."

"He did," Middleton returned, "and strangely enough, only yesterday, by a military court that gentleman was found unfit to wear his Majesty's uniform. To-morrow you may read it in the 'Gazette.'"

She had not heard this, and was surprised, but she was not in the mood to admit anything.

"I had wit enough to find out his unworthiness without your advice."

"Then, mistress, you cannot require my advice now."

"I have asked for it," she replied carelessly. "I think it may amuse me."

"You ask me to tread on delicate ground in order that you may laugh at me. It requires a brave man to undertake such an enterprise, yet I will venture. Whose place I have taken to-night, I do not know. I quite understand that to fall a victim to Lord Carrisford would be a disaster to you; I feel that you are justified in escaping such a fate by almost any means you can; but unless you are sure of your cavalier, of his honor, of his chivalry, I pray you turn the mistake which has occurred to good account. In your position a woman may be most easily deceived."

"I would this cavalier of mine could hear you say so."

"He certainly would, mistress, were he here. I have never yet met the man who could make me fear to tell the truth."

"And your advice?"

"Let me take you back to your uncle."

At that moment the door opened, and they both turned quickly, both evidently expecting the same person. Only a waiter entered.

"I am to ask, Sir Charles, whether you will now have supper served?"

"Send the landlord to me at once," he said sharply, and turned to the fire.

When the landlord entered and saw Middleton without his mask he started.

"Sir, there is some mistake, I fear," he said in some confusion. "This supper was for—for another gentleman."

"For whom?"

"Really, sir, I am not——"

"I want his name, and at once."

"Sir Charles Steadman," said the landlord. This masterful guest rather frightened him.

"Sir Charles has been here often?"

"Oh, yes, sir, often."

"And there have been suppers for two like this?"

"Yes, sir, he is an excellent customer of mine."

"Always paying well for silence on your part, I suppose?"

"Gentlemen are——"

"Answer me, yes or no"

"Why, yes, sir."

"And you have known the ladies?"

"Some of them."

"And how much did he pay for silence to-night?"

"Merely an extra guinea or two, sir, charged in the bill."

"You can go. Delay the supper."

Mistress Sutherland's head was lowered, and a scarlet flush was in her face and neck. She understood only too well what these questions and answers implied. Like many another innocent girl, she had believed Sir Charles a much-maligned person. She had listened to him in a moment which he had chosen well, and when she was in despair how to escape from Lord Carrisford. She did not love him. Truly she had not learned to love at all as yet. She was waiting for someone to teach her.

"Will you let me take you back to your uncle?" Middleton said slowly.

"No. I will never go back to him. I cannot. He would speak all kinds of scandal to force me into marrying Lord Carrisford. My uncle has something to gain from such an alliance. I shrewdly suspect that part of my dowry was not to be asked for."

"At least you cannot have anything more to do with Sir Charles."

"If you knew how I hate his very name you would not put the suggestion into words."

"I have a sister——" Middleton began, after a pause.

"Do you think I can go to her?"

"Why not? We may make a tale of being lost in the fog; we may imagine a drunken driver, if you will, from whom I rescued you, and I can crave my sister's hospitality for you. To-morrow——"

"To-morrow the coffee-houses would have the story, and I should die of shame," she answered. "Think, think, Captain Middleton! There must be some way out of the dilemma. Besides, the fog may have cleared in London by this time."

"Shall we tell the truth?"

"The truth?" she repeated. "Impossible."

"We may add to it a little."

"I do not understand," she said, looking up at him.

"Mistress Sutherland, Dame Fortune has favored you to-night and saved you from a libertine. She made use of an unworthy tool, I know, but it may be the Dame is pointing a way out of the difficulty."

"Still I do not understand."

"And I have few words to explain," he said, falling on his knee beside her. "I love you, Mistress Sutherland, always have loved you ever since the first moment I bowed over this little hand. Give me the right to silence any tongue which shall whisper a word in your disfavor, and make me the happiest man in this realm of England."

"Say the one little word," he pleaded.

"And if I say that word?" she asked shyly.

"Then you shall go to my sister to-night. To-morrow I will see your uncle, and Sir Charles may ask for an explanation when he will."

Perchance the little word was never said, eyes only may have looked it; but a loud summons from the private room almost frightened the landlord presently, as he was wondering what Sir Charles would have to say about this little mistake.

He hurried to the room. The man and the woman were standing before the fire, hand in hand, the landlord fancied. The masterful guest turned round quickly, but he was in an excellent humor.

"Supper at once," he said. "We are in a hurry."

* * *

A few days later the story was over the town, not quite as it actually happened, but it was enough to set gossip cackling and to make a score of men envious A few doubted the truth of it at first, but were quickly convinced when it was whispered that, only that morning early, in a field at Highgate, Sir Charles Steadman had been punished for speaking disparaging words of Mistress Dorothy Sutherland. It was said that some days must elapse before he could recover from the wound in the forearm which he had received from Captain Middleton.

A TRIBUTE TO DICKENS

By JEAN MURRAY

HE was one of the world's great writers,
Charles Dickens, of gifted pen.
I read his books, not once, nor twice,
But over and over again.
I keep them on a near-by shelf,
Much pleasure do they yield;
If I could have but one, I'd choose
My David Copperfield.
For I'm fond of pretty Dora,
And of Mr. Dick with his kite,
Betsy Trotwood, Agnes, and Peggoty
All add to my delight.
And I rather like Micawber,
Though his troubles would make one weep;
And its thrilling to read of the downfall
Of "'umble" Uriah Heep.
Over and over again have I read
And enjoyed "Our Mutual Friend."
The charming story of Bella and John
Entertains from beginning to end.
"Little Dorrit" and Arthur Clennam, too;
Mrs. Merdle, young Sparkler, her son;
Miss Fanny and Mrs. General,
How real they seem, each one.
I can almost see the Maypole Inn,
As it stood long, long ago,
With the tall young ash for a signpost,
And methinks I see Dolly and Joe.
These are some of my favorite characters,
There are ever so many more
That seem like old friends. As the years go by Dickens' books are a treasure-store.
When I read to-day's fiction by authors of fame,
How my loving memory quickens,
I recall those old books—the new ones are good;
But they're not quite so splendid as Dickens.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

An infant is deserted by a woman who leaves it in the store of Angers and Son. It is adopted by Celia Brown, who takes it home to "The House of Windows." The child is given the name of Christine Brown. Some time before the desertion, Adam Torrance, the real owner of Angers and Son, has his only child kidnapped. Of this occurrence Celia is ignorant. Adam Torrance hears that his child has died. His wife also dies, and he lives abroad. Sixteen years pass and Christine continues to live with Celia and her blind sister, Ada. Celia is in financial distress and Christine determines to apply for position of "reader" to Miss Torrance. Mark Wareham, nephew of the latter, follows the unsuccessful Christine, and contrives to make her acquaintance. Adam Torrance, who has returned to the city, sends Mark, his nephew, out to British Columbia. Christine secures a position in "the Stores." Christine is followed by a sinister-looking old beggar woman, and is further annoyed by the attention of Gilbert Van Slyke. The woman, whose daughter's employment in "the Stores" long ago, had led to moral disaster, is determined to wreak vengeance on Christine, whom she had stolen. Adam Torrance visits "The House of Windows" in order to relieve the sisters' distress. He shows them great kindness. On his return home he finds a letter informing him that his daughter is alive and in peril. He sets out to find her, and, in the meantime, his nephew, Mark Wareham, returns and is injured in an accident. To complete the catastrophe, Christine disappears suddenly.

"INDEED—if Miss Ada will forgive us—that is just what I want to do. Please do not go. You are undoubtedly right. I do not for one moment believe that Miss Christine is responsible for her own disappearance. But the more innocent she is the more would she suffer from a newspaper scandal. I can stop that by the use of 'undue influence,' but the better way would be to prove them on the wrong track. If Mr. Johnson were to communicate with his men in New York, advising them to shadow Van Dyke, the matter will be disposed of once and for all—"

"It is disposed of now, once and for all," said Ada, calmly. "I refuse to allow Mr. Jonhson to insult my sister by any enquiries in that direction. If he cannot help us in any other way, we must manage to find her ourselves."

"Quite right," declared Aunt Miriam again. "Don't tell me that Miss Brown may be deceived in her sister. It isn't possible to live with anyone for sixteen years and not know of what they are capable—I mean in regard to the big things. So if Miss Ada here, is satisfied that you should waste time in tracking Van Slyke, I agree with her. Besides, I have the advantage of having seen Miss Christine herse'f, and anyone who had done that would have no doubts. There must be another explanation somewhere."

Ada, who was still standing, thanked her with a tremulous smile.

"Very well, you may be right," admitted the detective. "Meanwhile, the story must be got into print. Mr. Torrance, will you use that undue influence? I will begin my enquiries at the other end. Did your sister use the car or did she walk home, Miss Brown?"

"She usually walked."

"Would she walk in the rain?"

"I do not think it would prevent her. She wore her raincoat."

"Would there be any little errands which she might attend to on her way home?"

"Not to-night—oh yes, I remember she was to call at a drug-store."

"For anything particular?"

"No—just some glycerine, rosewater and carbolic acid."

"A preparation for the hands, is it not?"

"Yes. We make it up ourselves."

"Well, the drug stores on her route must be visited without delay. We may pick up a valuable clue. If I get anything definite I'll let you know at once. But try not to be impatient. At any rate I'll report to-morrow night. Shall it be here, or at Brook Street?"

"If it could be where Celia could hear—"

"Certainly," said Mr. Torrance. "The report shall be made at Brook Street. And tell Miss Celia not to worry. Everything that can be done shall be done and done quickly. We are not even sure, yet, that she is lost. We must have hope—"

"That's it!" declared the big detective, genially. "That's the word we need in our business—hope!"

Chapter XXV.

NOT until the evening of the next day did Mark's delirium finally leave him. Then, himself once more, he looked up into his uncle's face with a somewhat wry smile. "Here I am!" he said weakly. "Somewhat damaged in transit, but still kicking."

Adam Torrance pressed the free hand gently. "Hard luck!" he said. "But don't worry. We'll soon have you as right as rain."

Mark nodded. "Yes. I'll patch up quickly. But you wanted me—to help. Your little girl—have you found her?"

"No, not yet. It may be a long search. All our clues have led nowhere. The whole story may be a cruel hoax. You must not think about it. The sooner you are well, the sooner you will be able to help. Can you sleep now?"

The invalid's grasp on his hand tightened.

"Yes. But there is something—I can't rest until I have a note sent to explain—to tell someone that I am ill. You'll do it for me, won't you?"

"Certainly. Anything you like. Just a brief note telling of the accident, I suppose? I'll send it at once. What name and address?"

A bewildered look came over the invalid's face. "The name—address?" He raised his hand uncertainly to his head. "Why—I don't know them. They are gone—I have forgotten!" He returned his uncle's smiling look with one of terrified dismay. "My head! Is there something wrong with my head? Whatever shall I do?"

"It is the effect of the blow, I suppose," said his uncle, "but it will be only a temporary inconvenience—if you do not make yourself worse with worry. Meanwhile, perhaps I can help you. Shall I mention some names?"

A slight flush crept into Mark's pale cheek. "You don't know this name, sir. It is the name of someone you have never met. I want to tell you about it when—I'm stronger."

"Yes. But let me try anyway. It is a lady's name, I presume? Well then, how about Alice Van Slyke?"

Mark moved restlessly. "Oh, no!"

His uncle watched him keenly. "There was a name," he said slowly, "which you mentioned several times while you were delirious. The name was that of Miss Brown—Miss Christine Brown?"

Mark sank back upon his pillow with a sigh of relief. "That's it! I remember it all now—the address is 1620 Brook Street. Uncle, I know you will wonder, but if you can only trust me until I am a little more myself, I will tell you—I can explain—"

"Yes, don't try to talk now. I know more about it than you think. The main thing is for you to get well. I need you, Mark, and—others—need you too!" Try as he would he could not keep the feeling out of his voice. The nurse raised a hand warningly. But, already, weakness and the satisfaction of having his wish granted had dimmed the sick man's perceptions. He smiled contentedly. "I'll get well—now," he murmured. Then the nurse came forward to say that he had talked long enough.

"He is rallying splendidly," she told Mr. Torrance when they had left him in a peaceful sleep. "There is a great difference between now and last night. You can see it for yourself. By to-morrow his head ought to be quite clear and you will find him much stronger."

"Yes. Thank God! He seems almost himself to-night. Will he wake again, do you think? Should he do so and ask for me tell him that I am delivering the note he wished sent, myself. Should he be worse and I am needed, send for me to No. 1620 Brook Street, Room 28."

If the nurse were surprised at the address, she did not show it, though it might have occurred to her to wonder what business could take the fastidious Mr. Torrance into such squalid quarters.

As for that gentleman himself, he had almost forgotten to find Brook Street squalid. He passed through it now without seeing it; so great was the interest of the opening drama which it sheltered that even the House of Windows promptly took its proper place, a stage effect, necessary but unobtrusive. The children still playing in the gathering dusk crowded around him, but he scattered some silver amongst them with an indifferent hand and hurried up on the untidy stair where tragedy had climbed before him. He found the two girls close together in the almost dark room—waiting. Tragedy was there, too; one felt her chill breath in the air and read the sure signs of her presence in the strained eyes and white faces of the sisters.

"No news yet," said Ada.

"Unless you bring us some?" added Celia.

He shook his head. He was surprised at the change in Celia's voice. When he had heard her speak before it had been dull, a little hoarse, curiously without life or inflection. Now, although weak, it was clear and natural, charged with deep feeling. Her eyes, too, had changed; they were restless now, full of awakened life; all the unnatural listlessness had gone. The shock of Christine's loss had done what Christine's arguments had failed to do; she had forgotten about the Stores. The lesser calamity had been swallowed up in the greater.

"No. I have no news," said Mr. Torrance, awkwardly assisting the blind girl to light the shaded lamp. "Except that Mark is himself again. He was quite conscious when he awoke to-night and was able to ease his mind by giving me the message for Christine which he tried in vain to give last night. I told him that I would see to it. It was impossible to tell him the truth. Poor fellow! But I hope he will never have to face the shock. Christine will be found again before he needs to know that she is lost. Has Johnson sent no word? Then he will be here soon himself, and we shall know all that there is to know."

"Tommy is coming, too. He has been searching all day. He blames himself—."

Mr. Johnson's brisk knock at the door interrupted her and Ada flew to admit him, while Mr. Torrance, mindful of his own experiences, held the lamp that the detective might not stumble more than was necessary.

"Bad stairs, those!" declared the detective, puffing. "How do you do, Miss Brown? Thank you, a little light is a help. How do you do," he bowed over Celia's couch. "Is Miss Torrance here yet? She declared she was coming—extraordinary woman, if I may say so, Mr. Torrance!"

"My sister will not be here. She is greatly disappointed but upon learning that there is no elevator—well, even she knows that the stairs would kill her."

"Well, then, we are all here—except Mr. Burns—"

"He is coming now," said Ada, and indeed they could hear someone taking the stairs three steps at a time. Tommy had no need of light. He knew his way well.

"Ah, now, here we all are," went on the detective, as Tommy burst in very red and breathing heavily. "I did not communicate with you before because I had nothing very definite to tell. But I have some details, very interesting details. First, we began at the Stores. They knew all about it there! I couldn't tell them anything, so, of course they couldn't tell me anything. They are quite sure that Miss Christine has eloped with Van Slyke. All the real information obtainable there was that the young lady left the stores, looking particularly pretty, in a dark blue raincoat and toque exactly five minutes after six o'clock. Van Slyke was observed to be sauntering down the other side of the street. Evidently he wished to have one more look at her before leaving on the seven-thirty train for New York. He did not follow her; simply watched her out of sight and then went off slowly in the opposite direction. One of the clerks saw Miss Christine turn down Market Street, which gives us the course which she probably took in going home. From there we lose track of her until we come to Cunningham's Drug Store, corner of Market and Osborne Streets. As Miss Ada imagined she might, she went in there to purchase some toilet articles. The clerk remembers her well. He says that he has been in the habit of watching her go past, to and from work, because she was so pretty. For the same reason he inquired and found out who she was. There is no doubt about his identification. (It seems that there must be few young ladies with hair like hers. Everyone notices it!) The druggist sold her some glycerine, rosewater and carbolic acid. She was certainly in no danger then, for she was not at all agitated and answered his remarks upon the badness of the weather with a laugh. Here the trail would have been lost again save for the fact that the druggist's messenger boy also noticed her hair. He says, not unpoetically, that it looked like a yellow flame in the wet. He was standing in the doorway and watched her come out. She went on down Market Street, he says, and before she had gone very far an old woman came up and spoke to her—"

"What?" It was Celia's weak voice that gasped the question. The detective apparently paid no attention.

"An old woman spoke to her and she stopped for a few moments in the rain listening to her. Then the two of them moved away, still down Market Street, but together."

The little group looked at each other in helpless bewilderment. The detective paused, observing them.

"Here we lose sight of her," he went on. "Where the messenger boy's eyes lose her in the rainy dusk we also lose her. She moves away—somewhere—with an old woman!"

He watched his hearers closely, but they apparently were too much amazed to answer.

"So you see," he said blandly, "there may have been something in that old woman story after all."

"What old woman story?" Celia's voice was very low. Her face had grown deathly white. "I have been ill. I have heard nothing."

"I am afraid there has not been very much to hear," said the detective. "The information I have does not carry me very far, unless one of you can make it more definite." He took out his notebook. "I find here, Mr. Burns, that you tell me that once before Miss Christine was spoken to by an old woman, a repulsive old woman?" He looked at Tommy.

"Yes, I told you that."

"You say that she was a beggar who asked for money. Was this the only time that Miss Christine mentioned having been addressed or annoyed by an od woman? Think well, now."

"She only mentioned it once," said Ada, slowly—"to me."

"She mentioned it twice to me," said Tommy. "But the old woman only spoke to her the once. Before that she only annoyed her by what Christine thought was a sort of espionage. She imagined that the creature watched her, followed her! She first mentioned the idea to me upon the night she bade good-bye to Mr. Wareham. I remember she asked me to look behind to see if I could see anybody dogging us. I looked around and thought I saw somebody in the dark, but could not be sure. She seemed nervous at the time but laughed about it afterwards. She had never spoken to the woman or the woman to her. It was only the other day that the woman asked her for money."

"Well, then, the question is, who is this old woman?"

Again the group looked at each other in puzzled silence. Celia's face was turned away.

"Or, rather," said the detective, "who might this old woman possibly or conceivably be? No one but you, her sisters, can possibly help me in this."

Tommy fidgetted nervously. Celia lay very still.

"But how," Ada's voice was very low, "how can we possibly know who this old woman is?"

"I said 'possibly or conceivably might be,'" explained the detective, patiently. "In other words, I think that the explanation must lie right here, in this room. You ladies must be in the possession of some facts, family history or something, which may possibly give us the clue to the identity of this woman. She was not watching the girl for nothing. It was no coincidence that she is concerned in her disappearance. If you ever want to see Miss Christine again you must give us these facts, private though they may be. You are the only ones who can do so, you, her sisters."

For an instant there was silence in the room; then Celia turned and faced the questioning look in Ada's eyes.

"That is just it," she said quietly. "We are not her sisters."

"Not her sisters?"

"No. We will tell you all we know. After all, it is only from Christine herself that we wish the secret kept. I hope what we can tell you may help—although I dread it, too! Still, anything is better than this suspense."

The detective took out his note-book with business-like promptitude. "Go on," he said.

"We had a sister, Christine. She died with our mother when she was only a few days old. Had she lived she would have been almost a year older than we think Christine to be. Christine was deserted by her mother when she was a tiny baby, just cutting her first tooth. She had no one belonging to her and would have gone to the police-station and to some foundling asylum had not Ada and I taken her ourselves. She thinks she is our sister, the little Christine who died! It would break her heart to know that she was an unwanted and deserted baby."

"This is new light with a vengeance!" exclaimed the detective. "The problem ought to be simple enough now. What do you say, Mr. Torrance?"

Mr. Torrance was looking at the sisters with new admiration. "I say that it was a brave and beautiful thing to do," he said, gravely. His eyes dwelt longest on Ada's face.

The detective suppressed a smile. "Yes, it was all that," he assented cordially. "But what I meant was, how does the problem strike you? Tell me," turning to Celia, "from what you know of the mother, do you think that she would be likely to show up again?"

"Why—I don't know. I know nothing of her mother."

"Well, of the grandmother, then, or the aunts or the family generally? Might not this old woman be quite naturally accounted for?"

"I don't know, Mr. Johnson. You see, I know nothing about the family. There was no family—nothing."

"Oh," said Ada, shuddering. "Please don't."

"We must look facts in the face, dear. And there may be a chance in what Mr. Johnson suggests. Let him see the letter, Ada. The letter that came with the baby. It will tell him all we know."

As the blind girl left the room there was a sound as of someone falling violently over the third step from the top and upon the victim being investigated he turned out to be Mickey Halloren, the landlady's boy, with a letter for Mr. Torrance.

"Sure, the dude wot give it to me said that ye left strict w-word that any sich were to be delivered at wanst," said Mickey, grinning.

Mr. Torrnace passed some silver into the hand that held the letter. His face was a shade paler as he took the envelope and with a word of apology opened it. Its contents were not long, for he read it quickly and then crushed it in his hand. His face in the interval had become deathly, but in the shaded light of the room his pallor passed unnoticed.

"I hope Mr. Wareham is not worse," said Celia, anxiously.

"No. It is not Mark. It is private—news. It can wait until we have finished here." His voice forbade questioning.

"This is the letter," said Ada, returning. "It has lain all these years in our one locked box. We hated it, yet we did not destroy it—it was you, Tommy, who kept us from that. I know the horrible thing by heart. It says, 'She was one too many. Her father won't keep her and I can't. She ain't been named yet.'"

"Horrible indeed!" ejaculated Mr. Torrance.

But the detective, who was looking intently at the paper in his hand, gave vent to a vigorous "By Jove!" followed by a long whistle.

"What is it?" asked Celia eagerly.

He looked at her with a dazed air. "What is it?" I don't know. But either I'm crazy or this is the most remarkable thing I've ever run across!" He spread his broad hand over the dirty bit of paper and made an evident effort to recover his usual poise. "But I may be mistaken," he said more quickly. "Now I want to know exactly how, when and where, this deserted baby was found and don't omit the slightest detail if you ever want to see your sister again."

Ada's eyes filled with quick tears, but Celia's eyes were bright and resolute. "I think I can tell you all just as it occurred. It is one of those scenes which impress themselves indelibly. It is as if it all happened yesterday. My mother had been dead nearly a year and I had just obtained work at the Stores. I had been there only a week and did not know all the rules, one of which was that no go-cart or baby carriage should be allowed to stand anywhere but in the place provided. It was one of the days of the semi-annual ribbon sale, and we had been so rushed that we could scarcely draw our breath. In the early part of the afternoon I saw a woman come in with a tiny go-cart which she left in the little niche between the two ribbon counters. I saw her only for an instant and probably noticed her because she seemed so poor and so different from the crowds of shoppers around her. I did not think of the incident again until the sale was over and I heard the floor-walker blaming Miss Twiss, the head clerk, for allowing the go-cart to be left there. I peeped over and saw that there was a tiny baby in it—so pitiful and so wee, with hardly strength enough to cry! The store was closing and there seemed no doubt that the child had been deliberately deserted. They spoke of taking her to the police station and somehow, I never knew exactly why, it came to me to save the little thing. When they asked me about it I lied and said that I knew the mother and would see that the child was taken home. They all knew, or guessed, that it was a fib, but were glad enough to have the matter off their hands. So I brought the baby home to Ada and we adopted her. All the girls who were with me at the ribbon counter knew about it and for years they all came to see her and brought her presents, until one by one they drifted away. There are none of the old girls there now. Miss Twiss married Mr. Flynn, who is still in the Stores, and she is the only one, besides Tommy, who knows the truth about Christine."

She paused for a moment and then went on, "The baby was dressed in rags, almost; and was unkempt and ill and miserable, but even then her hair was spun gold, her eyes like flowers. There was no mark upon anything and the only scrap of writing was the note I have given you."

The detective, who had been writing steadily in his note-book, looked up.

"Can you give the exact date of the ribbon sale?"

"Yes. The autumn sale always begins upon the same date, the 16th of October. It was the second day of the sale, just sixteen years ago this October."

Adam Torrance leaned over with a stifled exclamation, but the detective went calmly on—

"Any mark upon the child?"

"No, none. She was a perfect baby."

"You say she was cutting her first tooth?"

"Yes, it was almost through."

"Do you remember anything about the appearance of the woman who left the go-cart?"

"No, nothing, except that she looked old and poor; I thought her ugly."

"What makes you think she was old?"

"She was bent, and, I think, I can't be sure now, that her hair was grey. She gave the impression of being an old woman in every way."

"Did it not occur to you, then, that she could hardly be the baby's mother?"

"Yes. Ada and I often spoke of it. We thought it might be the grandmother."

Just so. And have you ever, from that time till this, been troubled in any way?"

"Never."

The detective turned to Tommy.

"When Miss Christine spoke to you about the old woman, whom she thought watched her, did she say how long it was since she had first had that impression?"

"No, but I gathered that she had noticed it for some time."

The detective drummed thoughtfully upon the table with his pencil.

"Then," he said, "it looks as if the evidence up to date were all in."

"Not quite all," said Adam Torrance, quietly. "Let me see the paper you are hiding under your hand!"

The detective slowly placed the paper upon the table. "I wanted to be sure before I showed it to you," he said. "I did not wish to raise hopes—or fears—unnecessarily. However—there it is—what do you make of it?"

For answer, the other unclenched his hand and spread another crumpled piece of paper, face up, beside the first. It was the letter which Benson, the butler, had intrusted to Mickey Halloren for delivery. "Look!" commanded Mr. Torrance, tersely.

The two men bent forward, the detective eagerly as a hound who scents a trail, Tommy in blank amazement—their exclamations were simultaneous.

The writing on both scraps of paper was identically the same!

Celia, who had struggled up from her couch, gazed at it in wonder.

"What does it mean?"

No one answered her, and in silence they spelled out the words upon the second piece of paper.

"It's done now" (the scrawled writing ran). "I told you I'd tell you when it was done. Your girl's gone off like my girl went. She'll never hold up her head again. There ain't a pin to choose between my girl and your girl now except that your girl ain't dead yet. Perhaps she wishes she was by now. Fine detectives you've got. They'll never get her, and if they do it's too late now."

"It's the same writing," gasped Celia. "What does it mean?"

"It means that one search at least is ended," said Adam Torrance solemnly. "For your lost Christine is my lost daughter!" He buried his face in his shaking hands.

"Devil-work!" said Mr. Johnson. "Devil-work—that's what it means! And so devilish clever. The woman's either a wonder or a lunatic—the latter for choice! No one not mentally unsound could plot so cunningly—" he was stopped by the pressure of Ada's hand upon his shoulder.

"Please! won't somebody tell me!" she asked. "I—I can't see."

"Yes, yes, said the detective. "Sit down, my dear lady! A clear statement will help us all. You see we have been searching everywhere for the last month for a trace of Mr. Torrance's lost daughter. She was kidnapped when she was a baby of six months, just cutting her first teeth—remarkable that the coincidence did not strike me at once! She was stolen upon the eighth of October, sixteen years ago, and all these years her father has believed her dead. A letter came to her parents saying that she had been stolen in revenge, by a mother whose own daughter had worked in the Stores and whose ruin the distracted creature laid at the door of the Stores' owner—Mr. Torrance. This letter, evidently to stop the search, said that the child was dead. It appeared genuine, and although the search was not dropped, no trace of the child was ever found. I may add that the writing of that first letter was undoubtedly the same as the writing of that which you found on the baby. (It gave me a tremendous start). Then, about a month ago, Mr. Torrance received another letter saying that the child had not died but had lived to work as a shop clerk as the other poor girl had done, and that like her, she was —er—"

"I understand," said Ada quietly.

"Well then, to-night comes another letter, still in the same writing (it is a peculiar hand; there's no mistaking it) saying that the revenge is complete. That —er— in fact—"

"I understand," said Ada again.

"That the writing of all these three letters is the same as the writing of a letter which came pinned to the dress of the baby you found deserted upon the 17th of October—in the stores of Angers & Son, I have no manner of doubt. The conclusion is plain."

"There is a difference of nine days in the dates," said practical Tommy. It was the first time that his amazement had allowed him to speak.

"Yes, naturally. Miss Celia says that the baby was in rags; was half starved and horribly neglected—some interval would be needed to make the well cared for child look like that. (The clothes of course, were exchanged for others). Also a certain difference in dates was necessary lest the coincidence be too striking. Even as it was, it seems impossible (although in fact it is the most probable thing in the world), that no coincidence seems to have struck anybody. That is the darned cleverness of the thing! Did any one know of the kidnapping?" he asked Celia.

"Why, yes, we read of it in the papers. But we did not feel especially interested. We did not know who Mr. Torrance was. He was just a name. We did not know that he had any connection with the Stores. And this baby—so evidently a neglected, unwanted child! It would have been a miracle if the coincidence had struck us. And then—the note!"

"Ah, yes, the note. There's where the infernal cleverness of the whole thing lies. The note was a triumph—"Her father won't keep her and I can't—' she is provided at once with a fictitious father and mother. 'She was one too many—' how horribly likely! a masterpiece!"

Mr. Torrance raised his white face. It was evident that he had not heard the detective's explanation. His look was dazed. "Where is she now—my little Christine?" he said. "Did I tell you that she is Mona over again? Mona was my favorite sister, you know. I knew that she was Mona," he went on with a little hysterical laugh, "and yet I did not know that she was my own daughter! And I have let them steal her away a second time. What is it that the fiend says, 'There's not a pin to choose between'—"

"Stop it!" thundered the detective. "You'll be out of your mind first thing you know! I thought you weren't in a fit state to stand another shock, that's why didn't show you the letter at once; but I want to tell you right here, Mr. Torrance, that if you break down now, you are less than the man I took you for! You'll just have to brace up. We're going to find her for sure. Don't forget it. We know what we are doing now!"

The stricken man made a great effort to pull himself together.

"Yes," he said, "I know. I must not think of it. To find her only to lose her. To lose her like that—If I think of it I shall go mad. I—I don't–you see the creature says it is too late. She will never hold up her—"

"Mr. Torrance!" Ada's soft voice held a note of command that pierced even the bewildered senses of the distracted man. "You must not speak of Christine like that! She may or may not be your daughter but she has been our sister for sixteen years and we will never allow a word of doubt to be spoken of her. In what danger her life may be we do not know, but we do know that it is only for her life that we need fear. From any other danger our Christine is safe, wherever she may be."

"Amen!" said Tommy Burns solemnly.

Adam Torrance caught the girl's hands in a mighty grip. "God bless you!" he said. "That was what I needed. I believe you. It is only for her life that we need fear."

"And as life is worth something," said the detective drily, "we'll just see that they don't get a chance at that, either!"

Continued on page 50

TWO AMUSING STORIES

Tales of Canadian Life by New Writers

THE DREGS-OF-WINE SILK

By AGNES FAULKNER NELSON

THE doctor's wife stood back from the long oval mirror to survey herself. She gave soft little pats to her fluffy grey hair and smoothed the wrinkles out of her new silk gown complacently. It was an odd shade—that dregs-of-wine, but it suited her clear skin and her silvery grey hair. The eye lingered over the harmony of colors.

The doctor's footsteps fell noiselessly on the thick Persian rug. It was not until she saw his reflection in the mirror that she was aware of his presence. Her cheeks took on a delicate rose tint and she turned from the glass self-conciously.

"I was rather dubious about it," she said. "Are you sure you like it, John?"

"If you are satisfied I am, dear."

"Mrs. Ross thinks it is beautiful. Do you know, John, I like her very much. I'm so glad we're to be neighbors. There are women who will never praise a thing you wear, and sometimes I think it's jealousy on their part."

"I'm afraid you don't find me very enthusiastic," suggested the doctor, in his quiet way. "But you know, dear, you look charming to me in anything."

The rose tints deepened on his wife's face, and bending towards him, she touched his coat sleeve with her lips.

There were those who said that the doctor had married the widow for her money, and that the widow had married the doctor for his social prestige—but there are always people who talk thus.

"It's early for the tea," said the doctor's wife, stealing a last glance in the mirror. "I think I'll just run in next door and take Mrs. Ross one of those lemon pies I made this morning. They were better than usual, weren't they?"

"If it could be possible," returned the doctor, gallantly, and his eyes followed her with lingering fondness as she left the room. He loved her for her warm, impulsive heart, and her lavish generosity.

Twenty minutes later, as he stood at his office window, he was surprised to see her returning with the pie.

Observing him through the half-opened door, she entered the office and laid the pie on a chair, her manner as tragical as if she were taking a part in a play. The doctor noted that her face was white, and that her lips trembled piteously

"I'll never believe in anyone again," she half sobbed. "I don't believe there is a sincere person in the world. And I had planned so on our friendship. Oh, John, it was awful!"

No longer able to control herself, she leaned her head against his shoulder and shook with sobs.

"I went in at the side door," she said at last, the words coming brokenly, "for I saw she had callers in the drawing-room. So I just sat down in the sitting-room to wait until they would go. I didn't mean to listen, John, but when I heard my own name spoken the temptation was too great. John, they were talking about me—and my new dress. And what do you suppose Mrs. Ross said?"

"I can't imagine, dear."

"She said she thought it fitted abominally, and that the shade was hideous."

There was a tragical pause while something gleamed for a moment in the doctor's eye—something closely resembling a twinkle.

Finally he said:

"Don't all women talk that way, dear?"

"No, they don't; and I think it was despicable after the way she praised it to my face."

"Hush, dear; she's coming over."

The doctor's wife immediately withdrew herself from her husband's embrace, and removing the traces of tears with a tiny lace handkerchief, stood, the picture of cool, majestic dignity, to receive her neighbor, who rushed in without the ceremony of knocking.

"Oh, Mrs. Sterling," she cried in consternation, and one could see that her distress was genuine, "I heard the side door shut, and I hurried out to see who was there. The moment my callers left I came over. You must have overheard what was said in the drawing-room. I'm so sorry."

"Yes; I suppose it was scarcely intended for my ears," rejoined the doctor's wife so freezingly that even the doctor shivered.

Mrs. Ross' cheeks grew crimson, but she stood her ground bravely.

"I don't know what possessed me," she said.

"Neither do I."

"The moment I had said it I was ashamed of myself," continued Mrs. Ross heroically. "And I acknowledged that I thought it a strange dress for you to buy, because you have such excellent taste, and always dress so well."

"But you liked it the other day," said Mrs. Sterling, unbending slightly.

Mrs. Ross seemed embarrassed for a moment, and the doctor came to the rescue.

"My dear, is it not a woman's privilege to change her mind?"

"I'm sure I never do," rejoined his wife. "I always know at once whether I'm going to like a thing or not."

"And never fib politely when you don't like it?" queried the doctor gently.

"Oh, well, I don't like to hurt."

"And neither do I, Mrs. Sterling," said Mrs. Ross, "I wouldn't have hurt you for the world. If there were any way of undoing it—"

Her eyes filled with tears as she spoke, and Mrs. Sterling's heart misgave her.

"Well, never mind, we'll just forget about it," she said magnanimously. "Won't you sit down?" she added, becoming conscious all at once of her lack of hospitality.

They all three sank into seats, relieved that the moment of tension was over.

"I was just taking you over a pie," said Mrs. Sterling. "They weren't as good as usual to-day, but I knew you would be busy settling. What did I do with that pie, John?"

"You put it down somewhere, dear."

"Goodness! where did I put it?"

She rose to look for it, and turned suddenly at an abrupt exclamation from her husband.

"My dear, you sat in it!"

The office rang with laughter—wholesome, healing laughter that cleared the atmosphere and restored perfect good humor.

Mrs. Ross was the first to become sober.

'But your silk dress, Mrs. Sterling—it's ruined!"

"Oh, gasoline will probably take it out," replied Mrs. Sterling, good-naturedly, "and if it doesn't I've enough silk left for a new gore. It's such an odd shade—I knew I never could match it."

"What shade is it, Mrs. Sterling?"

"Dregs of-wine, the clerk called it."

'The dregs-of-the-wine are bitter," said the doctor sagely.

"Well, anyway, it's the most becoming shade I've ever seen on you," said Mrs. Ross, and her voice had a sincere ring to it. "I never noticed before, but just now with the color in your cheeks—doesn't she look like a dream in it, doctor?"

The doctor's lips twitched, but his eyes had a grave look.

"Something more substantial than a dream, let us hope," he replied. "If you asked me, I would call it the light of friendship in her face."

"WHERE THERE'S A WILL"

By L. C. LAWLER

"JOSH! Josh! Joshua Peters!"

The call came softly at first, gently, as befitted the Sabbath stillness, then, when it brought no answer, it was repeated, this time with almost week-day strength.

"Joshua Peters! Where on earth can that man be! He's that absent-minded he's like to forget it is Sunday, and go—dear knows where. I'll just go see what coat he's got on, to make sure."

Briskly, as was usual with her, Jemima Peters went into her brother's room. His morning coat was thrown over a chair, his favorite battered hat lay upside down on the table, while a pair of dusty boots, in the centre of the room, all told the tale to the sister's experienced eye.

"Land o' rest!" exclaimed Miss Jemima. "If that man hasn't got dressed and gone to church alone. And me without my dress buttoned up! Of all things. To have looked after that careless body for nigh thirty-five years, and then for him to forget it all like this. I just can't stay home from church no way, what with the probation preacher there, and no neighbors to help, either. Sarah Thompson's away, and old Mrs. Bascom couldn't see, not if the buttons were as big as dinner plates."

Miss Jemima could hurry, when she set her mind to it, and it was only a few minutes later that she stood before the mirror, vainly struggling with buttons that could not be coaxed to meet the buttonholes.

"Laws-a-mercy," she gasped, finally. "Why did I let Janet Stewart make these sleeves so tight? I'd sooner have comfort than fashion any day, and you can't lift your arms no way in these pesky things. Well, I just can't button it, that's sure, and it's the only dress I can wear. My lavender's got that big stain in front where the clumsy Middleton girl spilled lemonade on it."

She regarded herself ruefully in the glass. The front view was faultless, but at the back, two buttons at the neck and one at the waist completed the fastening.

"That won't do," said Miss Jemima. "Seems to me I've heard folks say they button it in front before they put their arms in the sleeves, and then turn it round. No harm to try, anyhow."

A few minutes more and the change was made, the buttons were fastened securely, and, after a little manoeuvering, moved to their proper place at the back.

"So far, so good," breathed Miss Jemima. "But I swan I can't get my arms in that tight thing without tearing something."

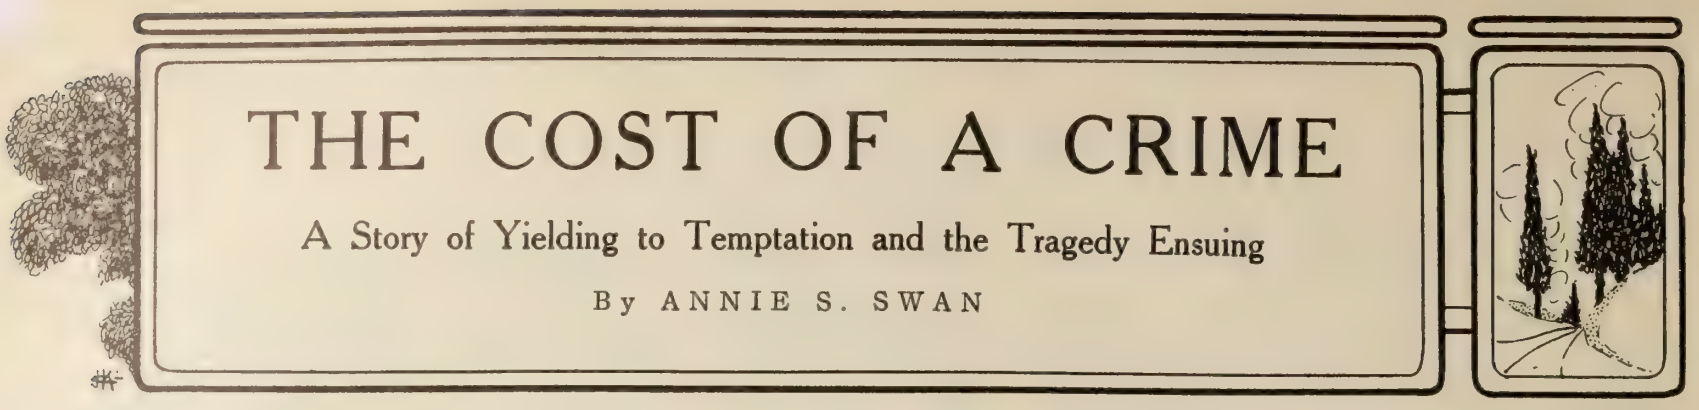
Sure enough, as she made the attempt, an ominous sound caused her to stop.

"No use spoiling a new dress," she soliloquized, "besides, if there was a tear in it, I sure couldn't go to church. Now, what am I going to do?"

Despair settled on Miss Jemima. To stay home from church on a beautiful summer day like this, and with never an ache or pain to blame was not to be thought of. And yet—it was getting late, even the stragglers had passed on their way to service, and the street was well nigh deserted. She started up in desperation, Who would lead the singing if she were not there? Who would give the minister the notice of next week's sewing meeting? Who would look after Joshua—perhaps he might even forget to take off his hat. Oh, she must go, even if she wore her week-day tub dress. She pulled the dress around again, to unhutton it, then she stopped and looked questioningly at her reflection in the mirror.

"Well, why not?" she asked. "The old thing's tight front and back, and if I'm careful not to move my arms too far, I won't tear it. I'll do it, anyway. Surely the worship of the Lord is of more account than whether Jemima Peters' dress is buttoned front or back."

The service had begun when Miss Jemima finally arrived at church, and the congregation being busy getting settled and finding the place in the hymn books, she was able to slip into her seat almost unseen. Not that she shrank from notice. Her conscience was at rest, and even the knowledge that frills made for the front of her gown were now adorning her back could not disturb her peace of mind. She had managed to slip the sewing meeting notice to one of the choir, who was to pass it along till it reached the pastor; she had got to church in time to prevent Joshua taking off his coat as well as his hat, and she felt she could sing the praises of the Lord with heart as well as voice. True, when the congregation rose for the first hymn, there was seemingly a little gasp, and then a subdued ripple of laughter, reduced to smiles, passed over the assembly, while Miss Jemima alone of all the congregation, carried along the first line of the hymn. But the spasm passed and the proper spirit of devotion settled again on the meeting.



THE COST OF A CRIME

A Story of Yielding to Temptation and the Tragedy Ensuing

By ANNIE S. SWAN

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Reedham steals thirteen thousand pounds of trust money, held by the firm of Lowther, Currie and Company, in London, England. He confesses to his friend, Lidgate, who allows him to escape, and who afterwards informs Mrs. Reedham of the crime. The only child, Leslie, is at school in Surrey. Leslie is brought home from school. Reedham, in the meantime, has found shelter in lodgings with Mrs. Webber, an old servant, and assumes the name of Thomas Charlton. He obtains employment with Archibald Currie, a brother of his former partner and is unrecognized. "Charlton" does well and wins the esteem of Mr. Currie and his ward, Katherine Wrede. Mrs. Reedham suffers from financial stress.

"THAT man hasn't worried you, Uncle Archie? He looked so preternaturally grave, I was afraid of it."

"Oh, no; he was merely talking about the Reedhams."

"And you will take the boy?" she asked interestedly.

"Most certainly. I can hand him over to Charlton. He has a sympathetic nature, and, like those who have suffered, he can feel for the trouble of others."

"I could not make him out exactly to-night, Uncle Archibald."

□ □

"I should like to hear what you think of him; indeed, that is why I asked him to dinner. I feel disposed to trust him a good deal, and I would not wish to make any mistake."

"Oh, I think him trustworthy enough. A man with a past, I should say. There is something furtive and shadowy about his eyes."

"But it might quite well be a blameless past, child. There are men in this city, thousands of men, who never have a chance. Charlton strikes me as being that kind of man."

"Quite possible. He is undoubtedly clever. He interested me very much. He is like someone I have seen, but clean shaven faces are deceiving. They are so much alike."

"I am surprised to hear you say that. Now Lidgate is clean shaven, but you would not say there was the smallest resemblance between him and Charlton."

"Oh, no, nor any comparison. Lidgate is a fossil, one of those dried up young men, who have never lived."

Archibald Currie leaned back in his chair and silently laughed.

"You are very hard on men, child. I wonder where you will find one to suit you."

"I don't want one, thank you, Uncle Archie. So long as I have you, matrimony doesn't attract me. Its limitations are too obvious."

At that moment the butler knocked and entered the room.

"Mr. Stephen Currie, sir. Could he speak to you for a few moments? I have put him in the library."

"All right."

When the door closed they looked at one another, and Archibald Currie laughed again rather softly, as if some joke occurred to him.

"Perhaps matrimony will be forced on you, dear child, sooner than you think."

She pursed up her pretty mouth into a grimace.

"Not by Stephen Currie, thank you very much. If he has come to talk about me you may nip him in the bud."

"But Katherine, Stephen is a very estimable young fellow, and he will be very well off."

"I wouldn't marry him, Uncle Archie, if he were a millionaire twice over."

"Shall I tell him that?"

"I don't suppose he has come to talk about me. He ought to have more sense, for I have done everything to show him I don't want to have anything of that kind to say to him. And his assumption of proprietorship is intolerable. That is why I wouldn't go to the garden party this year, and why I refuse every invitation I dare refuse to Fair Lawn."

□ □

When he made no reply she came to the side of his chair and looked down anxiously into his face.

"Uncle Archie, don't for Heaven's sake tell me it is the dream of your life that I should marry Stephen Currie! I am quite sure if you say that it will be an end of all things for me."

"I have no such dream, child. Marry whom you please, only don't be in a hurry, and remember that the day I have to part with you will be the darkest day the old man has ever seen."

Her eyes filled, she bent down and dropped a kiss on his cheek, and he rose to leave the room quite conscious of his own emotion.

He proceeded in a very leisurely fashion to the library, and as he entered it the clock struck ten, which caused Stephen Currie to apologize for the lateness of his call.

"I was dining with a chap at the end of your square, and I wanted to see you privately for a few moments, so I took the opportunity of leaving early. I hope you don't mind me coming at this hour, uncle?"

"Oh, no, though we are rather early birds. How are you Stephen?" said the old man cordially. "All well at home, I hope?"

"Oh, all right, thank you. Well, I needn't beat about the bush. I've been trying to get my courage up to sticking point for ever so long. It's about Katherine I want to speak. Of course you know that—that I've had hopes in that direction for a long time, ever since she first came from Bruges, in fact, I thought her then the most absolutely charming person I had ever met."

"I've got my own thoughts about it, of course, but you haven't come here very much lately and I thought you'd cooled off a bit, Stephen," said the old man with a good-humored smille.

"Ah, but that's entirely Katherine's fault. She—she behaves abominably to me, Uncle Archie, snubbing me at every turn. But it doesn't make any difference. It makes me keener if anything. You see that's where she differs from most other girls. They're all so ready to be made love to, but she's stand-offish."

"She wouldn't be with a person she cared about, lad. Perhaps it will be better for you to take it like that."

"But why shouldn't she care? There's nothing wrong with me. I can give her a good position. I'll be a partner next year. They've never filled up Reedham's place, and Sir Philip as good as said it would be mine after January. There's absolutely no reason why she shouldn't have me, and I'm sure, Uncle Archie, if you'd put in a good word for me it would go a long way."

Archibald Currie shook his head.

"I'm afraid that the love affair that depends on another man's good word is not in a healthy condition. The usual order of things is that the old man is consulted after everything is settled. Understand that I have no personal objection to you, Stephen, indeed I could not possibly have, and if Katherine cared for you it would make me very happy to see you man and wife."

□ □

"Then I have your permission to speak to her seriously? I have often broached the subject, though not with much success. But it will be different now I have something definite to offer her."

Archibald Currie looked doubtful.

"Katherine does not care for the things most girls prize. I am sure she would not at all mind being married to a poor man. And she has an astonishing faculty of being able to make the best of everything."

"She wouldn't be a successful poor man's wife," said Stephen emphatically. "She is the sort of woman who needs expensive clothes and who knows how to wear them."

"That is where you are mistaken, Stephen. She does not spend half of her allowance on herself. She knows how to wear clothes, that is all the difference," said the older man good-humoredly.

"Ah, well, so much the better if she can achieve that result on little money. The finished product is always perfect. But we are away from the main issue, Uncle Archibald. When am I most likely to find her at home? I have often called, and have never been so lucky as to find her, and she goes so little to Fair Lawn I have precious few opportunities, especially lately; I really can't go on like this. It's making me ill, and I can't attend to business. My father told me this morning I had better get it settled."

"Is your father quite pleased with your choice then?"

"Well, not as pleased as he might have been. Katherine doesn't conciliate them much, you know, and they think she mimics them. What would please the governor would be to see me make up to Sarah Bracebridge, but I have told him my mind is made up, and he understands that a man must have his own way about this, the most important act of his life. He's kept me in leading strings pretty well up till now, but I think he sees that it won't do any longer. Anyway, he hasn't made any insuperable objection to Katherine as a daughter-in-law."

Archibald Currie drily smiled.

"Katherine won't shine in an atmosphere of sufferance, I warn you, Stephen. She needs warmth and appreciation."

"Oh, well, she'll get plenty of it from me, and, of course, we won't settle in Hampstead. It's better to get away from one's own people. I have a leaning to the country myself, and I saw a little place at Mitcham that would suit us down to the ground. But first I've got to get Katherine's consent. Could I see her to-morrow afternoon on my way home from business? I'd leave early on purpose, and if you'd put in a word for me meanwhile, I'd be grateful."

"I don't think I can promise you that, lad. Katherine would resent it, I am sure, and as I said, a love affair that wants bolstering is in a bad way. Better trust to chance. I can come home to an early tea, if that'll do you any good. Katherine won't go out if I get home early."

"Very well; perhaps I'll write to her to-night after I get home. It all depends on how I feel. You see Katherine's so different from all other women, you never know where you have her, but I'm awfully fond of her, and if she won't have me I really don't know what'll be the upshot, shouldn't be surprised if I went to the dogs altogether."

□ □

He wore such a woebegone expression, and spoke with such sincerity, that Archibald Currie, albeit he was not specially fond of his brother's son, felt a passing pang of pity for him. For he was perfectly assured that Katherine would not listen to him for a moment.

"I mustn't keep you up, then, Uncle Archibald. I'm glad you know how the land lies, and that at least you're not hostile to me. Give Katherine my love, and if you can see your way to put in a good word for me I'll not forget it. And I'll call and take my chance to-morrow afternoon if I don't write in the interval. Good night, Uncle Archibald."

"Good night, lad, I wish you well, but I don't think you ought to build your hopes too high. Katherine is not thinking of matrimony, meanwhile, at least, and I'm afraid her answer will be 'No.'"

"Well, if she has no thoughts of matrimony, at least I've the chance of being the first to suggest them to her," said Stephen, with one of his shrewd gleams. "It's a great relief to me that you're not hostile, anyway. The governor said that you'd be sure to oppose it; that you had ambitions for Katherine."

"They exist only in his imagination. My only desire is to see the child happy," replied Archibald Currie, as he opened the door to show his nephew out.

Katherine was waiting for him with a little mischievous smile on her face, which augured ill for poor Stephen's suit.

"I've been sitting here with cold thrills running up and down my back, so don't pretend that you haven't been talking about me."

"I don't want to pretend. We have been talking about you. Stephen is very much in earnest, my dear, and you will have to be in earnest, too, and answer him definitely."

"Why, I have never been indefinite, quite the reverse. He knows perfectly well I never permit him to make love to me, and that I have avoided him almost entirely. I never answer the letters he writes asking me to go to concerts and things, and I always try to be out when there is any possibility of his calling. What more definite does any man want?"

"It would be enough for the average man, I admit, but you will have to put it in black and white to Stephen. He is coming to ask you to-morrow to marry him, having previously obtained my consent in the orthodox fashion."

"You gave your consent, Uncle Archibald, but you don't expect me to marry him!" she exclaimed with a little stamp of her foot. "You know I have never hidden from you how I feel about the Fair Lawn people. They are not my kind, and I would honestly die rather than marry him."

"Then be quite frank. Give him his dismissal explicitly, but don't hurt his feelings. He is quite sincere, my dear, and I was surprised at the depth of feeling he exhibited."

□ □

"I can't let him come. There would be a ghastly scene, for, of course, he would keep on arguing, even after I had spoken with the utmost definiteness. They're all like that at Fair Lawn. They wrangle over the smallest detail. I've heard them. May I write to him to-night, dear, and tell him you have warned me that he is coming, and that it is quite useless, that I am much obliged, but I will never marry him?"

"As you like. Perhaps it would be better. I will go upstairs now, my dear. I've had an uncommonly long day, and three callers in one evening is a little unusual."

"Three exciting and exacting callers, too, all wanting something out of you! That comes of being a philanthropic angel, dearest. Now nobody ever wants to ask anything of Uncle James Currie. He is left severely alone."

He smiled indulgently upon her, bade her good night, and left her to write the momentous letter. She addressed it to the office at London Wall, and marked it "Private," thinking with fine consideration that it might be better for him to read it at his private desk in the city than under the curious eyes at the family breakfast table. They all knew her handwriting, and as a family prided themselves on having no secrets from one another. That is to say, there was no privacy of thought or action allowed in the family circle. Everything was discussed and dissected and settled in conclave, which they considered indicative of their united family front.

Archibald Currie did not sleep well. His mind was too full of the individual and differing experiences of the evening. He thought longest and most continuously about the Reedhams and the story Lidgate had told him, and remembered with regret that he had not written the note to Mrs. Reedham. The conversation with Katherine had driven it from his mind.

He stopped the brougham at the first post-office and wired to Mrs. Reedham to send the boy to him at Old Bond Street in the course of the morning, and after he had been over the more important correspondence he sent for Charlton to come to his private room.

The signs of growing favor in the master towards the new clerk had, of course, been noted by the other members of the staff, but so far they did not resent it, partly because their trust in the justice and generosity of their master had already been proven, and most of them felt that their own positions were assured. Moreover, Charlton was entirely inoffensive. He spoke so little, indeed, that it was not easy for him to give offence.

There was one man, however, who resented him and all his ways. He was the only unsatisfactory member of the Old Broad Street staff, a man named Richard Turner, and but for the fact that he had a wife and a large family dependent on him, Archibald Currie would not have kept him so long. There was an antipathy between them, the natural antipathy that would arise between an honest, straightforward man and a shifty, unreliable one. It was to Turner's department that Charlton had come, and that worthy, seeing him growing in favor at court, as he expressed it, began to cherish a slow and deepening resentment. The determination to get even with him grew in proportion as he imagined himself deeply wronged. The head of the firm, unaware of these undercurrents, and oddly drawn to his new employee, who, on more than one occasion, had exhibited unusual signs of business acumen, continued to pursue his policy of recognition and encouragement which usually marks the man of broad sympathies and catholic outlook. He had determined to place Leslie Reedham under Charlton's immediate eye, and in order to enlist his sympathies, to tell him part at least of the circumstances.

□ □

"Good morning, Charlton. Yes, the letters were right, quite right, and I see where your suggestion was valuable. Sit down a moment. I want to speak to you about another matter. There is a lad coming here this morning, he may be here at any moment, whom I wish to place under your care. I don't know if you remember the case of Mr. John Reedham, who was a partner in Lowther, Currie and Co.'s. He got off the straight somehow, and there was a serious defalcation. He disappeared. This is his boy. He must be helped. He ought to have brains; his father was a clever man, though I fear unscrupulous. You follow me?"

He turned to look at Charlton, but at that moment an interruption came to the door, mercifully for the man he addressed.

"Yes, Baddeley, you may show Leslie Reedham in in five minutes' time."

CHAPTER VII.

PAYING THE PRICE.

THE lad entered a little shyly and shamefacedly, his cheeks flushed, his eyes bright with excitement. Archibald Currie turned to him with a kindly smile. Charlton gazed out of the window, with his face turned resolutely away. It is certain that had Currie seen his expression at the moment this story must have had a different ending.

"Good morning, my lad," said Mr. Currie, extending a kindly hand. "I hope you are well, Leslie Reedham. How is your mother?"

"Quite well, thank you, sir," replied Leslie promptly. He was shy, and the ring of his clear young voice sounded almost sweetly through the quiet room. The agony in the soul of the man called Charlton was beyond all telling. Surely in that awful moment he expiated in full the misery he had wrought! The boy merely bestowed a casual glance on him as he entered, his whole interest being centred in Archibald Currie, the arbiter of his destiny. And the lad's sore heart was mightily comforted by his kind face and reassuring, almost fatherly, manner.

"I am glad to hear that. So you are anxious to begin a business life, eh, my boy?"

"Yes, sir, if you please."

"Well, I will give you a chance. Mr. Charlton here will find out what you are good for. I have not very much to say to you. It can be put in a nutshell. Pay close attention to what you are told. Be obedient, punctual, conscientious. Use the brains God has given you, and don't be a faint copy of someone else. The only things worth imitating in this world are the good qualities, Reedham. Remember that."

"Yes, sir, I'll try."

"Well, you can come to-morrow. Nine o'clock, isn't it, Mr. Charlton? If our young friend comes at nine he will be in good time for the work of the day."

Charlton stood up, and faced them. His face showed grey and ghastly in the clear light. Currie was conscious of some subtle change in the man, and the sense of spiritual suffering seemed to fill the room. His intuition, always keen and sympathetic, suggested that the sight of the boy had perhaps struck some painful chord. But Charlton had not, so far, entrusted him with any portion of his private life, and he could not intrude.

□ □

The boy gazed now at the face of Charlton with deepening interest, realizing that in this man's hands his future destiny might really lie.

The face, with the light of the morning upon it, wore a puzzled look, his big, eager eyes, so like his mother's, were wide with questioning. Charlton essayed to speak, but his voice seemed to choke and die away in his throat. A second more of that agonizing strain, and there must have been a revelation made. Currie, however, intervened.

"If you like, you can take the boy to Mr. Willett's room, and put a few questions to him, Mr. Charlton. It will save time in the morning. Remember, lad, that an hour in the morning is the core and kernel of the successful day," he added, rolling another business axiom out with his pleasant smile. "Remember me to your mother, and tell her we shall hope to report progress as we go along."

The boy tried to murmur his thanks. Charlton turned to the door, and opened it, passing so close to the lad that his coat brushed his shoulder.

What an ordeal that was for the man with whom fatherhood had been a passion, was a passion now! Something swept over him—the mad desire to brave all and crush the boy in his arms, and dare fate to do its worst.

"How kind he is," murmured Leslie's voice at his elbow, as they stepped out into the passage. "Don't you think he is kind? I was quaking when I came. I couldn't really eat any breakfast this morning before I came out. But I needn't have minded."

"He's the best of men, the very best," murmured Charlton, as his shaking hand went forth to open another door in the long passage. It was a room that had belonged to one of the old partners of the firm now dead, and was still called Mr. Willett's room. No one had occupied it since he left it, and it was found most useful for people waiting in, or for interviews not suitable for the private room of Mr. Currie. Charlton let the boy pass in, and closed the door when he had entered himself. The yearning in his eyes might have betrayed him, and for a second or two it was touch and go.

The boy, unsuspecting and unconscious as youth is, and should be, began at last to feel that there was something odd about the man, and looked at him more attentively. Charlton, unable to stand the vision of these clear eyes, went to the window on pretense of drawing down the blinds for the sun.

"You spoke of your mother a moment ago. How is she? Tell me about her."

"Oh, she is quite well, there isn't anything much to tell. She is never very well now, so often tired and anxious. Of course, we've had great trouble, I dare say Mr. Currie may have told you."

"No, what is it?" asked Charlton, as if moved to torture himself.

"My father has left us, he was obliged to do it. Oh, no, there was nothing so very wrong, nothing he will not be able to clear up by and bye. But it is the waiting that is so hard for us."

"You—you—believe that he will clear up things? You do not seem to blame him."

"I don't, perhaps I don't understand about it altogether, but whoever says my father would deliberately do wrong, or rob other people, is a liar. You see we lived with him, and we know."

"Yes, yes, that is beautiful and—and unexpected. Does your mother feel like that, too, about it?"

"Yes, only she does not say much, and don't you think women are never so certain? People who talk to them make them think other things."

This bit of shrewd observation sank into Charlton's soul.

"So you think your mother has gone back a little?"

□ □

"I ought not to say that. But I know what I think myself about my father. He was the best father in the world, there will never be anybody like him. I was glad Mr. Currie did not say anything against him, I really could not have stood it, you know."

"Oh, you couldn't?"

To and fro the room walked Charlton, only permitting himself occasional glances at the bright, open, eager face. What puzzled and amazed him was the utter lack of recognition in his own boy, who had so often laid on his breast, with whom he had had the most perfect comradeship, whom he had kissed night and morning, often stealing up to look at him in his sleep. Surely some dire change must have been wrought in him that it could be possible.

Of late, looking at his own image in the glass, he had been conscious of a change, his face becoming thinner, more set, the face of a man who had paid the price. He was thankful for it, and yet fiercely resented it. He felt that he wished to go on playing with fire.

"What do you think I shall get to do, sir? I want to understand business, to be a successful man, to help my mother, and grow up so that my father will never be ashamed of me. I will work very hard, sir, if you give me a chance."

"You shall have your chance, my boy. Perhaps you had better go now," said Charlton thickly. "We shall go fully into things to-morrow. Meanwhile, please tell your mother I will do my utmost for you, that everything that I can do to help you will be done."

"Yes, sir, thank you. It is very kind, indeed. I don't know how to thank you, but I will work, sir."

There was a wistful look in the sweet, frank eyes, a kind of pitiful note in the clear, fresh, young voice which almost unmanned Charlton.

He offered a trembling hand.

"Yes, yes, it's all right. Good-bye, lad. You and I may be great friends yet, I once knew a boy like you; we were great friends. I have missed him more than I can say."

"You have no children, sir?"

"No. Good-bye, don't forget to tell your mother that I will help you here."

He opened the door and dismissed him with an abruptness which contrasted oddly with the unusual kindness of his previous demeanor.

Leslie Reedham descended the office steps with that puzzled look in his eyes. But quickly it passed, and he made haste to Clapton whistling off and on, to get rid of some of the superfluous elation at the sudden and happy change in his prospects.

Left to himself, Charlton turned the key in the door, and, sitting down, covered his face with his hands.

"My God," he said brokenly, "how shall I be able to go through with it. How long before I betray myself. How is it he didn't know?"

Yet with all the strain of the terrible situation there was a secret joy in his soul. He would have his boy near him, could touch him, speak to him, help him on. So would the hunger of his heart be partly satisfied. He passed out of the inner room at length, recalled suddenly and sharply to a sense of waiting and neglected duty. As he passed by Turner's desk that individual scowled at him over his heavy brows, and gave his shoulders a little shrug. Not a move in the office routine passed unnoticed by Richard Turner, and he resented with his whole soul every indication of the good understanding existing between his master and the interloper, as he termed Charlton in his mind.

Turner lived near Kensington Oval, but that evening for purposes of his own he made a long detour, following Charlton to Camden Town in order to discover if possible what manner of life the interloper pursued out of business hours. He traced him to St. Paul's Crescent, even saw him go into the house of Mary Anne Webber, and retired satisfied.

He had a friend in Kentish Town whom he would employ to discover something regarding the private life of Charlton, and woe betide him if anything was found there to his discredit.

□ □

It was a job after Turner's own mind, his fat, vacuous face was a cloak to a very black heart, capable of any treachery. Nothing but the long forbearance of Archibald Currie accounted for the present security of his position.

Mary Anne Webber was deeply interested in her lodger, but privately deeply concerned regarding the whole unhappy story. A whole year had gone since the man whom she was now accustomed to call Charlton had sought the shelter of her house. He had proved himself a model lodger, giving little trouble and paying with clockwork regularity, seldom going out after he returned from business, and appearing to spend his whole leisure over books and writing materials. In his happier days Charlton had made a little hobby of writing, and had been successful in having sketches accepted by different papers and magazines; now in his stranded condition he set himself to it in earnest as a means of furthering his ends. To make money by the sweat of his brow and brains was his whole desire, and he would leave no stone unturned to achieve that end. It troubled Mary Anne's active, bustling mind to contemplate a man content to spend his time thus, and to be cut off as he was, wholly from all that makes life worth living. They seldom talked of old times, or even alluded to the background of her lodger's life. He had given her a great trust, had left himself absolutely in her hands, and she would not betray that trust. But there were times when the unreality of it all seemed to haunt her, and when she could scarcely believe that John Reedham and Thomas Charlton were one.

She was only an ignorant woman, but her heart was in the right place, and a certain shrewd intelligence caused her to come to right conclusions outside of all logic. She felt, rather than knew, that Reedham had made a mistake, was making one now, which would recoil on his own head, perhaps in consequences too far-reaching and terrible to be faced.

These thoughts often troubled her, as she pursued the daily round of her commonplace tasks, but she did not venture to voice them to him

They did not have much speech together; sometimes, indeed, she felt herself curiously on the outside, and she had certainly no idea what a bulwark and buttress her presence and kindly attitude were to the solitary man who had thrown himself upon her mercy in his extremity.

(To be continued.)

AROUND THE HEARTH

Written for the Canadian Home Journal

By JENNIE ALLEN MOORE

Said the child to the youthful year:
"What hast thou in store for me,
O giver of beautiful gifts what cheer,
What joy dost thou bring with thee?"

"My seasons four shall bring
Their treasures: the winter's snows,
The autumn's store, and the flowers of spring,
And the summer's perfect rose."

HAPPY NEW YEAR

YES, bright New Year, what hast thou in store for me, for all the readers of the HOME JOURNAL? We would fain pierce the mist that enshrouds the days as they are doled out to us one by one, and know what fate holds in store for us. And yet, 'twere better not. It is not ours to know the gifts in store, the joys ahead of us, the storms, the heartaches, the golden days, the leaden skies; 'tis ours to meet them as they come, whether expected, or as a great surprise, sought for or forced upon us—just to meet them bravely, look them squarely in the face, remembering that "We are not here to play, to dream, to drift,

We have hard work to do, and loads to lift;
Shun not the battle, face it—'tis God's gift."

Such a short twelve months it seems, so full, so busy, yet the days counted off no faster than usual, just the same annual journey of the earth around the sun, the same four seasons, yet the years seem to grow shorter as we climb down the shady side of the hill! It brings one up short to feel that so many things are left undone, that time is flying past, and there is so much to accomplish. When we are young we look to the years ahead, and time often drags along slowly; but when one has passed a certain milestone called the "old age of youth," the months have a habit of gliding by unnoticed, until we are face to face with reckoning time, the goal, as it were, this joyful, happy season, so marked with festivities; and then we realize that we are entering another year.

NOW for those letters that have been accumulating for many moons! They must not be carried far into the New Year. It is settling-up time, and old debts must be discharged, old scores must be squared away, and so I place the pile upon my desk and ask my correspondents to be lenient with me for my long delay in some cases in replying. One or two I answered privately, but that is not my intention, as it requires any spare time at my command to conduct my personal correspondence. That's another pile standing in line for my attention, and one card is short and to the point—"Are you still on the face of the earth? My last letter of ages ago is unanswered." Now, hadn't I better get busy? I shall not give your letters in full, that would occupy too much space, but deal directly with the information you desire, thanking you all at once for the kind words of appreciation of my page. My aim is to be helpful to my readers.

That brings me to the first question which came to me away last winter, and asks: "How did you come to take up the pen? Were you always inclined to do writing, and why don't you write a story, Jennie Allen Moore? Why don't you write a book?"

Beginning back in my childhood, I was always very fond of reading. When I was not in sight, and needed, the command was: "Look for Jennie in some quiet corner with a book." Then the love of literature, composition, and other studies of a classical nature were my favorites at school, and this, combined with a romantic, imaginative mind, helped me to weave many a tale that interested the younger members of the family, and inspired some that never saw printers' ink. Then I wrote little articles for our local paper, for a church organ, and contributed to a children's page in a city paper, and was always longing to go deeper into it, but my way seemed blocked until three years ago, when I started this page in the JOURNAL. I write because I love it, because I want to give to others any experience that has helped me to a higher plane, because I want to lighten a load, ease a burden, cheer the despondent, diffuse light—all in my own small way.

A story? You will have read my little Christmas effort by now. My first contribution to this JOURNAL was a short story. Why don't I write a book? I may sometime. I think it was the great W. E. Gladstone who always asked before he would read a book if it turned out well, and so, when I write books, you may expect all the bad characters, the oppressors and evil designers to be punished, and caught in the net they set for others, and all the good people and llong-suffering will be rewarded and left in the enjoyment of supreme happiness. As a fond little mother I know always closes her stories to her babies with, "They lived in peace, and died in grease, and were happy ever after."

How would you settle the question of church between two who marry and have been brought up in different churches? Should a woman go with her husband?—L. D.

Something I do not like to see is a couple get married and then begin to settle the question of what church they will attend. It often makes trouble, and should have been decided earlier. Some people claim that a woman should always go with her husband, others view the matter vice versa. Well, I do not think a man should ask a woman to leave a church she has belonged to for years and go with him to one he was brought up in but never was a member of. He would be making no sacrifice to go with her in such case. The same rule works both ways. Which party is the member, not the mere adherent, should have the consideration. Where both are members, well, they should have settled it before the ceremony, or, failing that, the least bigoted give in to the other. One other alternative is to agree mutually that each should attend the chosen church; but that, somehow, seems like a house divided against itself, and causes more or less antagonism where there are children.

MURIEL asks: "Is it right for a young girl to allow a boy to buy her presents and spend money on her when she knows he has a small salary, or is perhaps a college boy, dependent on his parents? Several of my girl friends boast of the good times they have at theatre parties, etc., but my mother will not permit me to attend them until I am through school?"

Dear young girl, I wish there were more mothers like yours, and I am certain the mothers of young boys will agree with me. Of course, as long as this old world lasts there will be this same boy and girl love, the stripling who hasn't a cent at the feet of a laughing, bright-eyed witch (pity they are not more interested in their studies), and poor, foolish boy, he cannot be made to understand that she would enjoy his devotion just as well if he only expended the courage in saying the pretty nothings of admiration and walking out with her, instead of the money she knows full well he cannot afford to spend on her. The boys are as much to blame as the girls. You see they want to act "grown-up" in this their calf-love, but wisdom comes in time, when they realize how transient and fickle they really are themselves, and how soon another beauty has precedence.

The girl, too, discards her boy lover without compunction, and therefore should not accept gifts from him—even chocolates and flowers are expensive to these lads, dependent on the parental purse—it is too serious a business for school children. There is nothing I love more than to see a merry group of collegiate lads and lasses with their gay repartee, enjoying a game or sleigh drive, a picnic or a boating party, their best boy and girl picked out as partner, but theatres and late parties, present giving, and isolating themselves from the rest of the crowd—well, I would like to leave something in anticpation for the years beyond the 'teens. There is time enough for love making after you have secured your education, and long enough to be old. Remain children while you may.

"I have been reading a book called 'Eve's Second Husband,' and in it I find this sentence: 'There are such things as respecting a man you despise, and loving one you cannot respect.' This refers to husbands, of course, but to me it looks impossible. How would you solve it?"—Mrs. J. G. R.

At first reading that sounds enigmatical, but looking into it closely it does not seem quite so impossible. For instance, a wife might respect her husband's wishes, from his position as head of the household, giving him deference and honoring him outwardly, without any respect in her heart for him, because of little meannesses in his nature constantly repulsing all her finer instincts to respect. Many a woman has lived her life under such conditions. Again, a woman may have a true, wholesome respect for the man she calls husband, because he is good and honorable to her, and yet she may despise him for his business methods, his dishonest intrigues in dealing with others.

The second part of the question is easier. I can quite understand a woman's love that can overlook and forgive even when she has ceased to respect the husband who has forfeited the reverence he should inspire. Women cling to the illusions of the early love, what the man was when they joined their destinies, and they make allowances all along the way for the downfalls. They pick him up and restore him to his place in their affections, they believe his confessions, and though the hopes are shattered and broken, they have faith in his promises, no matter how severely tested, and the mantle of charity still covers the faults. Then comes a time when his word cannot be trusted, his life becomes separated from hers, her confidence no longer exists, he may desert her, may be a drunkard, a gambler, a deceiver. She cannot respect him, but still she feels that he has been led, that perhaps she can reclaim him, and—she loves him still. Somehow, that is the way some women are built.

C. S. writes from a Western town. She says: "In your October talk you spoke of tobacco, but you did not speak half strong enough. Here is an experience I had just about that time. I was standing in line before a ticket office, sandwiched in between a tall, well-dressed man puffing away at a cigar, and a short, dirty-looking fellow, who smoked a vile old pipe as vigorously as though he were paid by the minute. Being about my own height, I received the full benefit of all the odors emanating from both his pipe and his clothing. Now, I thought, how the authorities make strict laws about spitting on the street, a nuisance we can walk around, but allow the selfish smoker to sicken and disgust helpless victims wedged in a tight corner in a crowded ticket office. What do you think about that?"

Just what I have always maintained, that men are selfish in this matter of smoking. I think it is high time they realized that the habit is obnoxious to the public generally. My personal objection to the smell of tobacco smoke, coming second hand to us, as it does, is extreme. It smarts my eyes, affects my bronchial tubes and nauseates me. I fain would wish it were less distasteful to me, when one is subject to it at every turn. We have to tolerate it on the street, regardless of our dislike, but I do think it should be prohibited in places such as you describe. A man's natural politeness should prevent him from inflicting what is disagreeable upon persons placed in such an unenviable position.

YOUNG Housekeeper writes: "You have not given us a household talk for some time. Tell us about your system of management, and whether you like house work, and give us a few of your true and tried recipes."

My dear, don't I know just how enthusiastic you are, entering upon the field of household economies? It is so new, so fresh, each successful effort gives such pleasure, your whole heart is in your work. You see, I understand, for I was there once, and was full of system and management, but conditions have changed since, and where it was system with servants then, now it is management without. Servants are luxuries now which many of us prefer doing without, consequently the system we desire becomes somewhat demoralized, subject to states and conditions over which we often have no control. Really, there is such satisfaction in being without an outsider in the home that many women do not mind the extra work for the privilege of being alone.

Do I like housework? No, I do not like it, and never did. I should have liked to go through life without forming its acquaintance, let alone growing intimate with it. I should have liked to answer a bell to my meals, and never inquired how anything was made, or felt any curiosity as to how it was compounded. I was an ideal boarder in those days, before I entered the arena of domestic affairs; but understand this, that once having put my neck in the yoke, and my hand to the plough, I resolved there should be no shirking of responsibility, and that if there were some methods superior to others, some results nearer perfection than others, they were what I desired to attain.

Also, if there were labor-saving devices in the market, inventions that made easier the housewife's duties, that contrivance should have a trial. I was not a natural-born cook, so did not "take to it like a duck to water," by any means, but by dint of perseverance and steady plodding I have managed to reach the height where the family can boast of "mother's cooking." At least, they are loyal in the matter, so far as satisfying their appetite is concerned. Thus I have jogged along for a quarter of a century, constantly changing my system of management as the changes in our family life demanded. You, too, will have to work out a system of your own, to alter at your pleasure. I left your letter till the last, in case I should exceed my space limit in giving recipes. I find it necessary to omit them—some other time, little woman, some future day.

Editor's Note: This New Year chat for "Around the Hearth" did not arrive in time for publication in our January number. Christmas mails were, no doubt, the cause of delay. But we are sure you will welcome even a belated letter.

A VALENTINE LUNCHEON

PREPARED BY

MARY H. NORTHEND

FOR a hostess who wishes to entertain in February it is very easy to arrange for a Valentine lunch, for as often as February comes around there is always something new for Valentine's Day, and also an opportunity to exercise individuality in table decorations and menu.

Of course, for this lunch, hearts and cupids hold the place of honor, and with roses and ferns or other flowers decorate the table in a most artistic manner. The table is in red, white and green. Large hearts of red cardboard are placed on the centre of the cloth, surrounding a low basket filled with moss and bordered with ferns. Little red cupids stand in this with arrows poised. Red satin ribbon runs to four corners of the table, a large red heart being at each end.

The place cards are white, with hearts of bright red done in water colors, and the bonbon dishes of white filled with red and white candies. A basket of red and white roses and ferns is hung from the chandelier, with ribbon in alternating lengths, tipped with hearts. The effect of the whole is most picturesque, and easily arranged. To carry out the red effect in the luncheon, the following menu is offered:

Cream of Beet Soup
Heart Wafers
Salted Nuts Olives
Finnan Haddie
a la Valentine
Potato Croquettes
Valentine Vegetables
Tomato Jelly Salad
Sponge Squares with Apple Jelly
Coffee

CREAM OF BEET SOUP: Wash and put beets on to boil, and boil until very tender. Remove from fire, drain and peel. Then rub through a strainer, add one cup of hot milk thickened with one level teaspoon flour, cooked in one rounding tablespoon butter. Season with one-fourth of a teaspoon of white pepper, one-half teaspoon of salt. Beat yolk of one egg, add one cup of hot cream, turn the hot soup over the egg, and serve at once.

FINNAN HADDIE A LA VALENTINE: To one pint of cream sauce add two tablespoons of butter, the yolks of two eggs, well beaten, and three hard-boiled eggs cut up fine, one tablespoon of grated Edam cheese, and pepper to taste. One pound of finnan haddie picked fine should be added to this mixture, the whole thoroughly heated, and served in crusts made of rich pastry, with small pastry hearts decorating the top.

POTATO CROQUETTES: Bake half a dozen large potatoes. When done enough burst them open and scoop out the contents with a spoon. Beat the pulp until it is quite smooth. Then put it into a clean saucepan with the yolks of one or two eggs, a small piece of butter, and a little pepper, salt, and grated nutmeg. A little cream may also be added. Beat this mixture over a moderate fire until it leaves the sides of the saucepan with the spoon, then spread on a dish to cool. Shape into hearts, dip these in beaten egg, then into bread crumbs, and fry them in hot fat until they are lightly browned. Serve immediately. Cold potatoes left over can be cooked in the same way.

VALENTINE VEGETABLES

POTATO CROQUETTES

SPONGE SQUARES

VALENTINE VEGETABLES: One can French peas, about a dozen small onions, and a couple of white turnips are combined in this appetizing dish. Wash and drain one can of peas, put on stove to heat; season well with a generous piece of butter, salt and pepper to taste; mash the turnips, which have also been well seasoned. Pile in the centre of dish, surround with the boiled onions, and make a border of the peas.

TOMATO JELLY SALAD: Soak one-half box of gelatine in one-half cup of cold water fifteen minutes, or till soft. Stew one can of tomatoes till soft, cutting and mashing the pulp to hasten the process. For additional flavoring, stew with the tomato a small piece of bay leaf, one-half teaspoon mixed whole spices, one rounded tablespoon of celery salt, and one-half a small onion. Strain the tomato through a puree sieve, and if there is not enough to make three cups add boiling water. Heat again to boiling point, add the soaked gelatine, stir till dissolved, then pour it into small cups or heart-shaped moulds, or into a ring mould, if individual forms are not desired. Chill, and when ready to serve turn out and serve the small moulds on lettuce leaves with mayonnaise on top, or if the ring mould is used, fill the centre with salad dressing, and garnish with an appropriate border of green.

SPONGE SQUARES WITH APPLE JELLY: Cut squares from stale sponge cake, and saute in butter. When cool, fill with apple jelly and roll in cocoanut.

Some Sweetbread Recipes

IN a recent issue of The Table, an English authority on matters of menu, there are the following recipes for cooking sweetbreads, which will doubtless be useful:

BRAISED SWEETBREADS (CURRY SAUCE): Take a nice heart sweetbread, wash in cold water, then put to blanch in cold water, bring to the boil, strain and rinse in water, put to press between two plates, take away all skin and gristle, lard with lardons of fat bacon, wrap in a buttered paper to keep in shape, put to braise in saute pan with half a pint of stock, and salt to taste, and braise for one hour on a bed of carrots, turnips, a bit of celery, a few peppercorns, and bay leaf; then when done take away the paper, crisp the lardons, serve on a croute of fried bread. Curry Sauce: Fry a small onion in a little butter, a teaspoonful of curry powder, a saltspoonful of curry paste, a teaspoonful of lemon juice, a gill of stock, rub through a hair sieve, add a tablespoonful of thick cream, and pour around the sweetbreads.

SWEETBREAD PUDDING: Wash and skin a nice sweetbread (or small lamb's sweetbread will do for this dish), and partly cook it in milk or cream with a little mace and onion, pepper and salt; take a small cup of breadcrumbs, take the boiling milk from the sweetbreads, pour over the crumbs, and let them soak; beat in two well-beaten eggs, then the sweetbreads; butter a basin, line it with mushrooms (if liked) or plain, and steam one hour; turn out with a nice light rich gravy. This has been well tried and very well liked.

SWEETBREADS A LA CREME: Blanch and skin a nice sweetbread, cook slowly for one hour in strong stock, with a little onion and mace, a dust of red pepper and salt; lift carefully on a silver dish, take two ounces of butter, same of flour, fry together, stir in part of the stock, with a gill of thick cream; rub through the tammy, put back into the saucepan, pour when hot over the sweetbread, with a border of peas.

SWEETBREAD KROMESKIES: Take the remains of sweetbreads from the above recipes, cut in small pieces four tablespoonfuls to two tablespoonfuls of ham or tongue cut in shreds, two tablespoonfuls of good brown sauce, and dust with red pepper and salt; well mix; cut some thin slices of fat bacon; take a teaspoonful of mixture and put in the middle of the bacon, roll up into cork shapes, dip in frying batter, and fry a golden brown; served with fried parsley.—(Original.)

LAMB'S SWEETBREADS A LA CARLTON: Blanch some lambs' sweetbreads, free them from any fat and core, press them between two plates until cold, lard them with very fine lardons of fat raw bacon, truffle, and cooked tongue; put them in a stewpan with one and a half ounces of butter, a bunch of herbs, sliced carrot, onion, and two blades of celery, pepper and salt; cover with a buttered paper and fry for ten minutes, add half a pint of white stock and cook in the oven one hour, frequently basting the sweetbreads and adding more stock if required; when cooked take out the sweetbreads, brush them over with thin warmed glaze and return to the oven to crisp.

THE "DRUGGY" TASTE
in many makes of jams and preserves is one sure evidence of adulteration.

This Label
E D S
On a Package is a guarantee that the contents do not have the "druggy" taste, and that they are absolutely pure.

THE FRUIT
from which our preserves and jams are made is only the very best, it ripens on the branches and the preserving is done while the true flavor is in the fruit.

THE KITCHENS
where the preserving is done are the most sanitary that can be built.

THE SUGAR
is the best granulated, which with a very small amount of spring water and the fruit, are the only ingredients of our jams and preserves.

THE RESULT
obtained with the use of only pure fruit and sugar, and their preparation in sanitary kitchens makes E. D. SMITH preserves and jams the best tasting and most pure money can buy.

PRESERVES
JAMS
JELLIES
CATSUP
GRAPE JUICE
MARMALADE

Sold by All Good Grocers in Canada

E. D. SMITH
WINONA, ONT.

Pure Gelatine Most Wholesome of Foods

Do you know, madam, that the leading Food and Health Authorities highly recommend Gelatine dishes on account of their great nutritive value?

But your Gelatine dishes must be pure in every ingredient — and there is just one way that you can insure this. Use pure, plain Gelatine, and add your own flavoring and sweetening—seasonable fruits, pure sugar, etc.

KNOX
PURE · PLAIN
SPARKLING
GELATINE

This world-famous, pure, plain Gelatine, in addition to making countless dainty desserts, also makes or improves many other dishes and saves housewives time, because it is granulated and dissolves quickly; saves trouble, because it never fails; saves expense, because every package contains two envelopes of Gelatine, making together two quarts (one-half gallon) of pure jelly. There is no better economy than the use of Knox Gelatine.

DESSERTS made with Knox Gelatine are as wholesome as they are delicious

SOUPS are greatly enriched by adding a little Knox Gelatine. Just try some in a thin soup-stock and see what a rich, savory soup you get.

SALADS—the most delicious you ever tasted—can be easily prepared with Knox Gelatine. See our Recipe Book.

SAUCES The next time you want to make a "thick" sauce or gravy with a rich body, just use a little Knox Gelatine. The result will delight you.

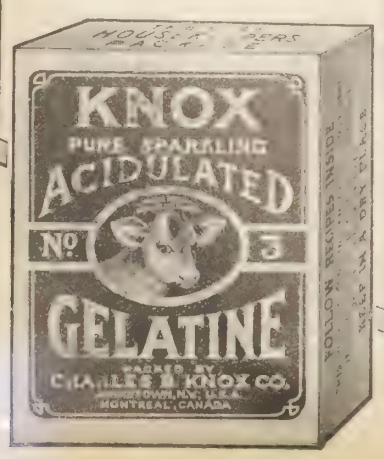
KNOX Acidulated Gelatine

When you must prepare desserts in a very great hurry, you will find this "Busy Housekeeper's Package" convenient. In addition to the two envelopes holding enough Gelatine for two full quarts, this package also contains an envelope of pure concentrated fruit juice (lemon), affording a pure, ready-prepared flavoring.

Send for Recipe Book

We want you to have a copy of the Knox Recipe Book, "Dainty Desserts for Dainty People." You will find its many recipes for Desserts, Salads, Candies, Puddings, Ices, Ice Creams, etc., a great help to you. Sent free for your grocer's name. Pint sample for 2c stamp.

CHARLES B. KNOX CO.
501 Knox Ave. Johnstown, N. Y.



A ROSEDALE RESIDENCE

Illustrations by courtesy of Construction

"MARBRAE," RESIDENCE OF MELVILLE P. WHITE, HAWTHORNE GARDENS, TORONTO.
Burke, Howard & White, Architects

ON this page and the opposite will be found illustrations of a residence of modest dimensions and artistic lines in Rosedale, Toronto. The suburban home is becoming more and more the ambition of the city business man, and that part of Toronto known as Rosedale, is a residential district of which any city may well be proud. In the month of June it is especially beautiful and fully justifies its name.

The residence pictured here is of brick, faced with stucco. It is thoroughly commodious, and is such as is within the ambition of many citizens. The residence is owned by Mr. Melville P. White, of Toronto, and the cuts on these two pages are displayed by courtesy of the editor of Construction, in which publication the originals appeared.

The gable structure is seen effectively in this home, and is preferred by most women to the unadorned or rounded roofs. The library shows a commodious and comfortable room, whose leaded windows and beamed ceiling remind one of old-world rooms, where books may be read in comfortable seclusion. The "note" of the dining-room is brightness in furnishing and aspect.

Hints on Homebuilding

WE can no more account for the tasteless furnishings of the average house than we can account for many people recognizing a successful effect after it has been produced, when they would be entirely helpless in accomplishing it themselves.

Admitting that a thing of real merit cannot be utterly lost, Jane Kilham, in The House Beautiful, or that rooms devoid of furnishings may still be entirely satisfactory, let us consider the subject from the standpoint of the average householder who has not "Louis Quinze" room to live up to or furnish, but has simply the usual set of rooms which are his to make or to mar.

The subject is time-worn, and the awkward question arises as to whom really belongs the business of furnishing a house—the occupant or the decorator—perhaps a little of both and not much of either. Few people start unencumbered. They are as hampered with old belongings as life is with old prejudices. But would they, if it were possible, strike out on any but conventional lines? What Bostonian would begin housekeeping without a rubber plant? As a Western girl once remarked, "I can tell how long Boston people have been married by looking at their rubber plant"—much to the indignation of her hostess, who possessed one that had reached the dimensions of a shade tree. Why attack this particular object of decoration, which is decorative and in many places desirable? Simply because it is overdone. Neighbor follows neighbor until we find few rooms that are individual or interesting. The Western girl afterward became a resident of Boston and bought a rubber plant—the house seemed lacking without it.

SIDE VIEW OF "MARBRAE," RESIDENCE OF MELVILLE P. WHITE TORONTO

Providence intervened, however, and warned her to be herself, for it was missing one day from the doorstep after the customary rain bath. Now a long row of bright geraniums fills a shelf that follows the window, and visitors unwittingly say, "How cheerful this room is!"

LIBRARY, "MARBRAE," RESIDENCE OF MELVILLE P. WHITE, HAWTHORNE GARDENS, TORONTO

THE stucco house in the United States is, with the exception of a few old Southern examples inspired by Spanish work in Florida, a novelty of the last twenty-five years, says a New York writer. It became popular only when it was found possible to make a durable house by covering a light wooden frame with a coat of plaster. Once this method of construction was established stucco houses sprung up in all our suburbs and were, in design, better than their frame predecessors, for the very material itself insists upon simplicity of form and detail. Nor is better design the only improvement incidental to the use of stucco; it is also responsible for the fact that much-needed color is gradually creeping into American domestic work. By color we do not mean colors; there is a pronounced distinction. Colors are pigments that can be bought and mixed and applied by any local house painter; color is a certain harmony produced by the combination of several of these pigments or even sometimes by their absence. Concrete being plastic suggests the insertion of colored terra-cotta tiles or plaques and the use of the colored tile roof that make its foreign prototype such a delight for an artists' eye. Mr. F. R. Roth, the sculptor who is making the lions for Princeton athletic field, has added very appreciably to his Englewood cottage by having his colored reliefs of animals inserted at desirable points on the facade. Some California houses show Moorish iridescent tiles, which our terra cotta makers are now reviving with considerable success, and which are the invariable accompaniment of both stucco and brick houses in Spain. In the matter of colored roofs for our stucco houses there have been some unhappy mistakes—chiefly in the misapprehension that in selecting red we are copying the attractive house tops of southern Europe. The brilliant vermilion that glares on the roofs of so many seaside residences here is not the refined red that one sees in Italy or Spain, the home of stucco, and where roof tiles were burnt from the earth without the addition of any mineral pigment. In other words, they were originally the same as bricks and have faded after long exposure, into charming salmon shades or deepened in places into rich browns. This attractive variety will never come to a roof that starts its existence as one dense opaque red. How often one hears of a house not yet carried beyond its hollow tile walls. "What a pity to cover it with stucco—the color is so beautiful!"

THE vacuum cleaner is becoming an essential, in the eyes of the modern housewife. As the association between dirt and disease is more clearly understood, the popularity of this mode of cleaning will increase and the medical expenses of the household will decrease. Every woman who has experimented with the vacuum cleaner only wonders how she was able to endure the old-fashioned dust-raising for so long.

The modern home-builder will take into consideration the Twentieth Century methods of getting rid of dust and its germs, and will see that the cellar contains an up-to-date vacuum cleaner which may be "piped up" for use in any room of the house. Then the cleaning of a room will not mean the complete overhauling and re-adjustment of the apartment, but a swift and dustless removal of all disfiguring accumulations.

DINING-ROOM, "MARBRAE," RESIDENCE OF MELVILLE P. WHITE, TORONTO

Silverware of Unrivalled Reputation
The durability of 1847 ROGERS BROS. silverware is beyond question. For 64 years it has been proving its wearing qualities. To-day it is the standard in silver plate.
1847
ROGERS BROS. XS TRIPLE
is guaranteed by the largest makers of silverware in the world. Local dealers everywhere sell this famous
"Silver Plate that Wears"
Send for catalogue "E 48" illustrating the most popular patterns.
MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO.
(International Silver Co. Successor)
MERIDEN, CONN.
New York Chicago
San Francisco
Hamilton, Canada

Trial Box $1.50

6 Pairs Holeproof Hosiery (25c per Pair)

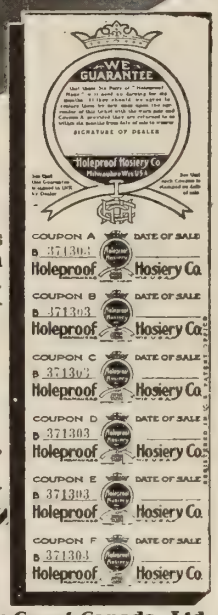
Guaranteed Against Holes for 6 Months. Send Coupon

A MILLION PEOPLE

are wearing Holeproof Hosiery! We have sold 24,006,034 pairs! Guaranteeing six pairs six months plus the quality of "Holeproof" is the reason "Holeproof" sells to so many. These people get comfort from "Holeproof" and save darning. You'll do the same. Order a box today. Send coupon.

Note the Guarantee Ticket →

This ticket comes to you in each box. If any or all pairs wear out in six months, return the worn pairs with a coupon for each and we'll send you new hose FREE. But "Holeproof" are so good that you probably won't have to send any back.



WE GUARANTEE
Holeproof Hosiery Co.
COUPON A DATE OF SALE
COUPON B DATE OF SALE
COUPON C DATE OF SALE
COUPON D DATE OF SALE
COUPON E DATE OF SALE
COUPON F DATE OF SALE
Holeproof Hosiery Co.

Reg. U. S. Pat. Office. 1906

Carl Freschl

FAMOUS Holeproof Hosiery FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN

None Genuine Without Signature, "Carl Freschl"

We pay top market price for 3-ply Egyptian and Sea Island yarn—the finest obtainable. We could buy yarn for 30c, but it would be cumbersome, coarse and 2-ply. Our yarn, which is lighter but stronger, enables us to make a lighter and stronger hosiery. Thus we can guarantee a light hosiery. We also make heavy weights.

Saves Darning, Discomfort and Expense

Write for List of Sizes, Colors and Grades

Men need not any longer wear sox with holes in them. Children may now always wear neat-looking stockings. WOMEN MAY SAVE ALL THE DARNING! Think of the darning you do now; then order. Or send for the "Holeproof" list of sizes, colors and grades.

Don't pay out good money for hose that wear out in a week. Get this Trial Box of "Holeproof" and learn how hosiery should wear—even the lightest weights. Send the coupon and $1.50 now, while you think of it. (Don't forget to send $2 if you want them for women or children.) Remit in any convenient way.

Holeproof Hosiery Co. of Canada, Ltd.
132 Bond Street, London, Canada

Are Your Hose Insured?

Trial Box Order Coupon

Holeproof Hosiery Co. of Canada, Ltd.
132 Bond Street, London, Can.

Gentlemen: I enclose $1.50 ($2.00 for women's or children's), for which send me one box of Holeproof Hose. Weight.....(medium or light?) Size.....Color (check the colors on list below). Any six in a box, but only one weight and one size.

Name.....

Street.....

City.....

Province.....

LIST OF COLORS

For Men and Women

Black Light Tan Dark Tan Pearl
Lavender Navy Blue Light Blue

For Children

Black, and tan, only; and medium weight only.

(279)

A Timely Book on a Living Subject

The Lad Felix

A Tragedy —of the— Ne Temere

By HENRY MILNER

Cloth Illustrated $1.25 Postpaid

This book comes at a time when its stirring words will do much to set thinking citizens acting on right lines.

FOR SALE AT ALL BOOK STORES

WILLIAM BRIGGS

29-37 Richmond Street West TORONTO

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

A WOODLAND HOME

IN the winter months we sit before a glowing fire and build castles in the coals, which usually resolve themselves into a summer home of modest dimensions, a bungalow preferred. The plans of January and February do not blossom into execution until April or May, and, before the small home is complete, we come to the conclusion that there is more enjoyment in anticipation than in accomplishment.

In our modern city life we are always striving towards simplicity, and find that, as the winter days pass, we are longing for the far-off summer time, with a cottage near the lake or a tent on the banks of a stream. The minimum of housekeeping, with the maximum of comfort is what most of us desire, but the opinion of the neighbors is the fancied tyranny from which we suffer. In a country where there is a severe winter the house must be built for security in the days "when the stormy winds do blow." But, in our dreams of a summer home, we do not need to take the northern breezes into consideration, and can afford to let the fancy play about a tent or a shack, with a friendly anticipation of August breezes.

The masculine idea of a summer home is of a primitive structure, which will keep out mosquitoes and let in the air. There is also a masculine preference for meals outdoors, and fish cooked over a genuine camp fire. The summer home, according to the man of the house, are content with comfort, not striving for the luxuries of life. The summer home has come to be regarded as almost a necessity by those who live in the large towns or cities. Do not let the prospect of extra expense alarm you, for a modest and comfortable cabin or bungalow can be erected for a few hundred dollars; and such a building can always be rented, in case the owner changes his mind regarding a summer residence.

A STURDY LOG CABIN

Unity in a Room

"NOW, what is the matter with this room?" the distracted housewife said, in The House Beautiful. "Its color is all right, and so are its lines, but, somehow, it doesn't hang together. It might as well be a furniture shop. It looks loose."

"That's the very word," the decorator said, "and do you know why? You have not tied your loose ends together. A room has to be gathered together and knotted to look right. Churches have been the triumph of architects of all ages because, externally, they generally soared upwards to a tower, and inside, nave and choir led up to the altar. They had a focusing point for the eye. That is what you lack in this room: your colors and your furniture are good and even your mantel is so harmonious that should be devoid of fuss and "fixings." You find on this page the picture of such a home, which is as simple as a house in the woods can be made, with only two rooms in the cabin. However, it is "mortared" and cemented until it is thoroughly rainproof, and two healthy persons could enjoy immensely a summer of "roughing it" in such a habitation.

Of course, a pine forest is the ideal location for such a summer home. Fortunately one does not need to go far from any Ontario town or city in order to find oneself in a grove of pines. There is health and new life under the pines, and all the cares and worry of town life fly away and are lost in the woods. The furnishing of such an abode should be of the plainest, with a few strong chairs and camp beds and an abundance of linen-covered cushions. A steep hillside often affords an excellent nook for a woodland home, the slope of the land making possible a lower storey. Many who are devoted to outdoor life in summer like part of the structure of the house to be of cedar, and pillars of this wood are used extensively in modern cottages in Muskoka and in some homes along the St. Lawrence. Rustic effects are always desirable in a building of this kind, and there is no reason why it should not be made an attractive dwelling-place, even if it be only a two-months-in-the-year resort. The floors should not be of rough wood, or the cleaning will be a rather serious matter. Light is an important consideration, and the window space should be carefully proportioned in the small habitation.

The term "cottage" is applied frequently to houses which might more reasonably be called "palaces," and these, of course, belong to the wealthiest citizens. Most Canadians, however, are modest in their household ambition, and it simply takes its place as part of the background—for what?

"A piano, especially a grand, as it has a good curve, is a good point for emphasis, and all the decorations of a room may lead the eye up to it, but, as this room is too small for that I'd suggest that you accent your fireplace by hanging that large picture with its heavy frame over the mantleshelf. Hang it flat so it will look as if built into the wall. Now put your dark Persian rug in front of the fireplace. Or, place your davenport parallel with the hearth and put that drop leaf table at its back; a rug in front of it, and you have a sort of ingleside around which the rest of the room seems naturally to group itself.

"A heavier set of andirons, a fender around the hearth, or two settles built at right angles to it, would strengthen your fireplace.

"If you did not want to do anything to the fireplace, you could draw the eye to the end of the room opposite the door and accent those bookshelves by putting doors or curtains on them and hanging that framed series of pictures over them, or a frieze of plaster casts.

"The old-time pier-glasses between windows, hideous as they were, served the purpose of drawing the eye to the windows, often providing a 'vista.' The more recent 'cosy-corner,' now, happily, only an uncosy memory! survives in the comfortable living-room couch, and this might well be made the keynote of your room. As the room is a little weak in color, have the couch cover and cushions of a darker shade than their background, so it will stand out distinctively.

"Curtains and upholstery fabrics are excellent binding mediums, and in this room you will find that cretonne, chintz, denim or madras ones made with valances across the window-tops, will do much to draw your room together.

A COSY FIREPLACE

A FIREPLACE is so ancient that we should need to go back to prehistoric times in order to find its origin. The sacred fire was always symbolic of worship or domestic affection, and the hearth meant the home. In an article in Suburban Life, Mr. George J. Jervis treats of this subject of home-like fireplaces of stone and brick in a most interesting way.

Trivial incidents of life often carry the mind back to childhood days of picture-book and story—to a land of fantasy, peopled with knights and ladies, giants and ogres, elves, goblins and the other denizens of Fairly Land. We see, through the glass of memory, the children seated around the cozy old fireplace, listening with wonder-waking eyes to the thrilling tales of long ago. Golden-haired princesses are rescued from giants' castles; three-headed dragons are slain by the touch of a magic sword; while the mere possession of a fairy ring—like the proverbial philosopher's stone—turns baser metals into gold, and transforms a woodman's cottage to a palace of glittering crystal.

A CORNER FIREPLACE

So runs the tale, and all the while the yellow flames from the log-fire on the hearth

"Flicker and wane,
To blaze again,"

playing such tricks with the shadows in the corners that the very little ones creep closer to your side, until the story ends as all would have it end, "They all lived happily ever after."

And as the line of a song may bring back the memory of the singer, so, too, a simple fairy tale may turn our thoughts back to the place of places in the homestead—the warm fireside.

FIREPLACE OF "TAPESTRY" BRICK

In northern Europe, the fireplace, in spite of modern heating appliances, remains a permanent and integral part of every dwelling-house; and, while it figures largely in the pages of tradition its early history is lost in obscurity.

The fireplaces of ancient castles and manor-houses show plainly that they were an important feature in the domestic life of the Middle Ages. And, indeed, one can well understand the esteem with which they were regarded; for, while the inhabitants of the castle were marshaled at the common dining-board, either above or below the salt—that strong line of demarcation which separated the nobles from the serfs—yet the great fireplace, piled high with blazing logs, gave equal warmth and comfort to all.

These fireplaces were invariably built of the same material as that of the building itself, either of brick or stone. In Tattershall Castle, Lincolnshire, England, built in 1430, there still exists, or did so recently, a delightful old brick fireplace, in the construction of which is shown an early attempt at brick decoration in the shape of herring-bone pattern work.

If an essentially "rustic" effect is aimed at, it may be very easily obtained by the use of fieldstone. There are various shades in the stone, and the effect may be heightened by the shades of mortar. Much, of course, depends on the workmanship; but there are few country districts in which one workman cannot be found who is capable of doing a job in stone in an out-of-the-ordinary manner, and thoroughly workmanlike, too. He will generally be an "old timer," though. They seemed to do these things better in the olden days, and, although the younger stone-masons are capable, so far as certain kinds of work are concerned, they would sooner do a job in a very mechanical way, and get it over with as soon as possible.

The popularity of brick fireplaces increases from year to year; and it has been especially marked since the great variety possible in brick of various textures, and varying in shades from the warm reds and olive-greens to deep purplish hues, has become of more general knowledge.

Quite as important as the kind of brick chosen and the design of your fireplace is the question of mortar joints. It is surprising how little appreciation is shown by the average layman for that part of brick construction. It plays such an important part in the general effect of a brick surface. The difference of a mere quarter of an inch in a mortar joint seems hardly worth consideration, yet it is upon the width of joint that much of the beauty of the old brick fireplace depends. Just as a picture is dependent upon its frame to enhance its effect, so the mortar joint in the dimension of the brick it surrounds tends to emphasize the varied shades, at the same time modulating the general color scheme of the entire wall surface. In some of the old brick chimneys in Suffolk, England, the bricks used measured 9¼ by 4¼ by 2 inches, built up with a joint of light yellowish-grey mortar of about a half inch thickness. Such a combination is uncommonly beautiful.

The principal condition we require a fireplace to fill is comfort. This is subdivided into warmth and cheerfulness; the first of which is obtained in ratio of the amount of heat we can generate, with an eye to economy, from the minimum amount of fuel; the second, is the amount of flow and rays of light from the fire itself.

The size of your fireplace is naturally dependent upon the dimensions of your room, but if you err, it is better to do so on the side of generosity rather than to spoil the effect and reduce your own comfort, by building a small and insignificant fireplace in your sitting- or living-room. A fireplace should be what it represents.

Quaker Oats

The Reasons for Its Wondrous Flavor

Do you know that we get from a bushel of choice oats only 10 pounds of Quaker Oats?

They are just the rich, plump grains, picked out by 62 siftings.

These selected grains, prepared by our process, form this delicious oatmeal—the finest oat food in existence.

Does it pay?

Every dish of Quaker Oats tells you that it pays. Note how the children delight in it.

And the cost, despite its goodness, is but one-half cent per dish.

That's why Quaker Oats has become the world's breakfast.

Millions and millions, every morning, enjoy this ideal dish.

Quaker Oats outsells all other brands combined. It outsells in dollars any other package food.

Please remember this.

On some foods grade doesn't matter much.

But a great deal depends, in every home, on the young folks' love of oatmeal. And that depends on the richness and flavor.

In this food of all foods it is highly important to serve just the cream of oatmeal.

And that means Quaker Oats.

Regular size package, 10c

Family size package, for smaller cities and country trade, 25c.

The prices noted do not apply in the extreme West.

The Quaker Oats Company

PETERBOROUGH

Look for the Quaker trademark on every package

225

You Select Your Program to Suit Your Audience When You Own an Edison Phonograph

THE songs you love best, sung by the singers who sing them best---your kind of music, rendered as only the Edison can render it---as true to life as the original. For is not only the greatest musician of all the ages—it is all the great musicians of the present day—playing all of the greatest music ever written.

The EDISON PHONOGRAPH

The Edison tone is pure, smooth, subdued and true, because of the rounded, button-shaped sapphire reproducing point, which gives exactly the right volume of sound for the home. And the sapphire point is permanent —lasts forever. No changing needles, no scratching or wearing of records.

And the long playing Amberol Records render every composition completely. No cutting out of important parts. No hurrying.

And besides all this the Edison Phonograph is the instrument on which you can make and reproduce your own records in your own home.

Send for Catalog And Complete Imformation To-day

The advantages of the Edison are as definite as they are important —and the way to know all about them is to send for the complete information which we have ready to send to you. Write for it now.

Any Edison dealer will give you a free concert. There is an Edison Phonograph at a price to suit everybody's means, from $16.50 to $240.00, sold at the same prices everywhere in Canada. Edison Standard Records, 40c; Edison Amberol Records (play twice as long), 65c, Edison Grand Opera Records, 85c to $2.50.

Thomas A Edison INCORPORATED

126 Lakeside Avenue, Orange, N.J. U.S.A.

A WYCHWOOD HOME

Illustrations by courtesy of Construction

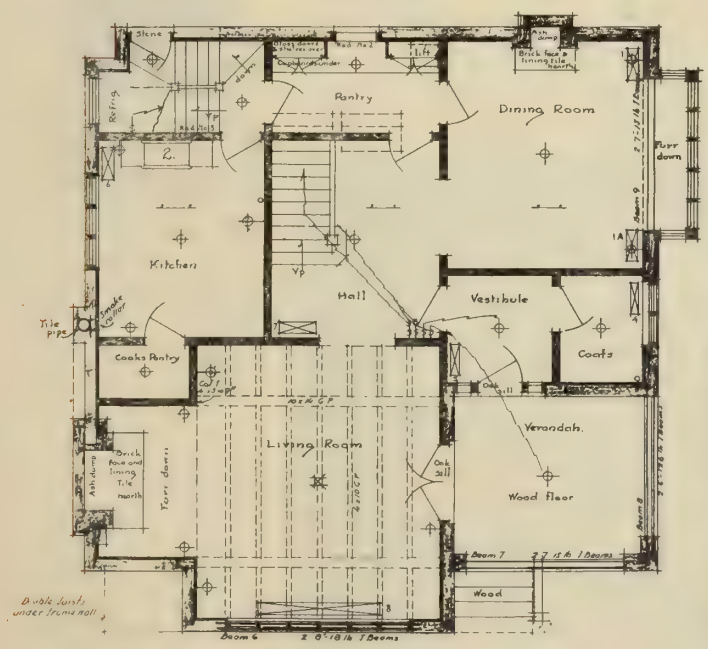
RESIDENCE OF MR. GEORGE HOWELL, TORONTO

Eden Smith & Sons Architects



GROUND FLOOR PLAN

HALL AND STAIRWAY

IT is the desire of almost every business man in the city to have a home removed as far as possible from the dust and stir of the crowded streets. In recent years there has been a "back-to-the-land" movement for the city dweller who is able to gratify his craving for fresh air and sylvan loveliness, with the result that the fringes of our cities are becoming adorned with artistic residences which show the owners' desire to return to the country home.

A talented woman writer in the United States once declared that her idea of perfect bliss was "country life with city society." The modern ambition appears to be all the urban comforts with none of the inconveniences. Well, it is not always possible to dispense with suburban car service or city dust, but let us, so far as we may, escape from city noise and strife, even if we do not wish to exile ourselves from city theatres and concert halls.

Our Canadian cities are fortunate in their suburban districts. Montreal, Ottawa, Winnipeg, Toronto and Vancouver have ideal surroundings for those who are anxious to possess residences removed from city disturbance and yet within easy reach of "down town." Torontonians turn to the lake shore, eastward towards Scarboro, or westward beyond Parkdale. The ravines of Rosedale have been eagerly appropriated by those who were not slow to appreciate their advantages. The northern section of the city of Toronto is now being searched for good building sites, and Wychwood has been recognized as an ideal location for a suburban home. The residence of which we reproduce plans and illustrations is in that part of the city, which only a few years ago was nothing but woodland.

The home of Mr. George Howell, as shown in the accompanying plans and photographs (republished from Construction), is a suburban structure which will appeal to many. The house is built of brick and rough-cast on the outside. The shingles on the walls and roof are stained brown, the windows

ARE YOU PLANNING A HOME?

UPON THE HEATING SYSTEM YOU PUT IN DEPENDS THE HEALTH AND COMFORT OF YOUR FAMILY.

HOW many homes do you enter tastefully furnished and otherwise carefully planned, made uncomfortable and cheerless at this season because dependent upon stoves or "hot-air" furnaces for warmth? The hostess apologizes for cold rooms, the children shiver before "hot-air" registers, carpets and curtains are covered with dust, and if your visit is made in the morning you find the rooms full of smoke and gas. Not an imaginary or exceptional case, this. These hardships and inconveniences many good people impose upon themselves every winter by unwisely "economizing" in their heating system.

If you are planning a new home or contemplating improved heating for your present one, consider carefully the advantages of the

KING HOT WATER HEATING SYSTEM

You Don't Have to Be a Heating Expert to understand these features of the "KING" Boiler.

Water-ways nearly twice as large as others —hence gets hot water out to radiators and cooled water back to boiler quickly.

Corrugated lining in fire-pot increases heating surface and makes coal burn down evenly.

Vertical Lever Shaker—works easily and noiselessly, and eliminates the back breaking "cranking."

Latest wrinkle in grates—no nuts or bolts to work loose and break.

No unnecessary parts, no intricate "machinery," feed it in the morning and your wife can easily look after a "KING."

The King System exemplifies the best of what has been discovered and invented in heating apparatus during the past half century.

In designing the "KING" Boiler we investigated, analyzed and critically studied every recognized type of boiler made. We carefully sifted and weighed the desirable features of each, and were able to use many of them in the construction of the "KING."

The corrugated fire-walls, for example, add one-third more live heating surface to the boiler, and alone cut down fuel consumption 15 p.c. Big ash and feed doors, patented vertical shaker, large open water passages and "trouble proof" grate, are some other improvements we have successfully introduced.

These are all useful, common-sense advantages that appeal strongly to the home owner looking for his money's worth in a heating system. They abolish the drudgery of fire-starting and ash sifting; they lighten housework and make home a healthier and more cheerful place to live in.

Ask any Reputable Steamfitter about "KING" Goods.

His expert advice on heating is free, and always cheerfully furnished. This is his "slack season," and he can afford not only to spend more time in advising you, but if you're ready to go ahead he can get to work at once, and as a rule, this work can be done for less money at this season.

It will pay you to get in touch with him right away.

Write for Your Copy of "COMFORTABLE HOMES."

It tells all about the various kinds of heating and their relative merits. It's full of vital, helpful facts that will assist you to select the system best adapted to your needs. You'll find it an interesting book to read. A post card brings it.

"King" Radiators and Their Success

The wonderful popularity of the "KING" Radiator has not been a matter of chance. Its sales are due solely to its artistic and mechanical superiority.

Its handsome, dignified appearance "fits into" any interior.

Its great range of patterns—

Thin radiators for narrow halls and bedrooms,

Angle shapes to fit corners or bay windows,

Low, square radiators to go under a window seat,

With brackets to hang upon the walls or ceiling,

With high legs to permit sweeping,

With a ventilating device endorsed by doctors and heating experts, insures even supply of fresh air,

With a small, neat nickle-plated valve. Operates as easily as an electric button and absolutely controls heat.

STEEL AND RADIATION, Limited

Head Office: Frazer Ave., TORONTO

SHOWROOMS:

138 Craig St. W., MONTREAL -:- 80 Adelaide St. E., TORONTO -:- 83 Bank St. OTTAWA

Agencies in all Principal Cities and Towns.

are of casement style, equipped with metal weather strips. The ground floor is quarter-cut oak and the upper floors narrow quarter-cut Georgia pine. The staircases are oak and trim is Georgia pine with pine doors. All the woodwork inside is stained brown and waxed. The beam ceiling in living-room shows the real beams, and the ceiling between is sheeted.

The photographs show a dining-room and living-room, bright and glowing with true home comfort, with an appreciation of artistic and simple furnishing. The architects of this attractive home were Messrs. Eden Smith & Sons, Toronto.

Names for Country Homes

CANADIANS have usually selected names for either city or country residences, borrowed from Old Country homes. It is significant that Scotch names are in the lead, although English names, such as Ilfracombe and Brantwood are a close second. It would be interesting to revise many quaint and musical Indian names and give them to our summer or suburban homes.

In the Kawartha Lakes and Muskoka districts you come upon many cottages with musical Indian names, which are suitable to the sylvan or watery surroundings, such as Minnehaha, Otonabee, Nanita and others of legendary lore.

A writer on this subject in Suburban Life remarks concerning a request made to its readers for suggestions:

From New Jersey come letters that include the following: Airymount, Arrowdale, Kenilworth, The Hills, Maple Grove, Willowdale, Pinehurst, Forest Hill, Chestnut Ridge, Hope Hill, Deer Lodge and Dancing Brook.

In an Ohio neighborhood these names are in use: Cloverdale, Rockwood, Sunnyside, Arrowdale, Deepdale, Fairoaks, Oaklawn and Northwood; while an Indiana reader suggests Hill View, High Point, Breezy Point and Air Knoll, for elevated situations; Mountainside, Northside (also east, west and south), and Sunny Slope, for places on the sides of the hills; and Hazelnook, Cedarcroft, The Meadows, The Downs, Glendale and The Willows, for those in the valley.

In a Massachusetts locality is a farm called "Wee Laddie," and another named Cloverfields. There are submitted also the following: Sunkist, Goodholme, Successacres, Happyhome, Woodsmere, Edgemere, Hillhome, Gatherhere Place, and Ourown.

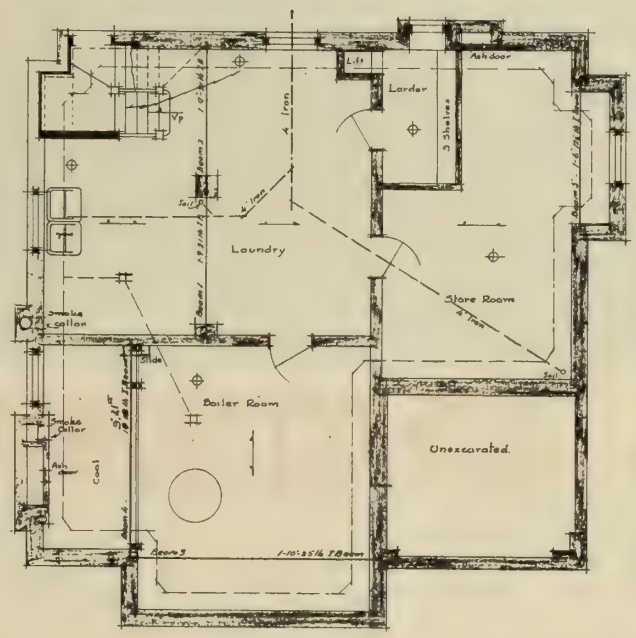
From Iowa comes a letter, reading in part: "Our summer home is called Westwood. It takes its name from the fact that it is located west of the city and in the woods."

South Carolina contributes Shiness, Stornoway, Duncraig, Plainfield, Ardross and Airlie, and these Indian names: Pohoka (hills), Wasale (sweet dreams), Lowena (happy one), Alini (pretty eyes), Monmawala (rolling prairie), Wabenanog (wild rose), Homtakods (welcome friend).

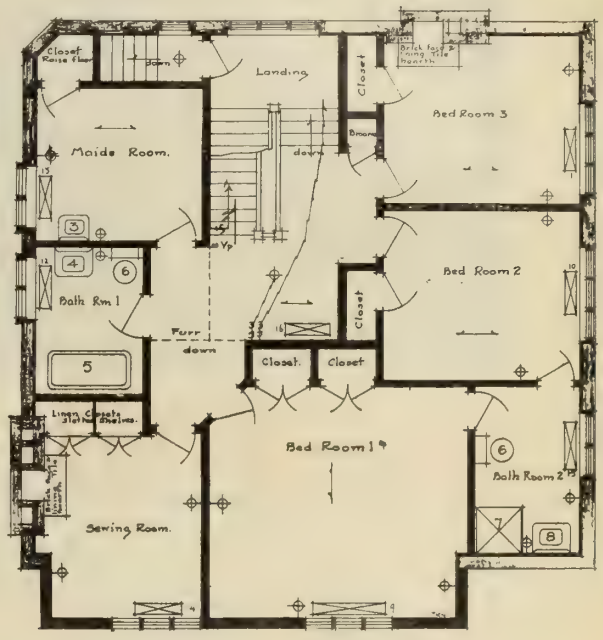
From Connecticut are these suggestions: Westgate, Fairlawn, Glencroft, Hillcrest, Beech Knoll, Ledgewood Farm, Redhurst, Stonehurst, Redtop, Cragside, Hilltop, Arden, Hermitage, The Priory, Oakleigh, Aldworth, Waldheim, Clearview, Springbank Ghlaenhower, The Anchorage, The Nautilus, Bide-a-Wee, Ingleside, Eyrie, Nirvana, Edgewood, The Grange, Longmede, Tanglewood, Mizzentop, Waldmere, Greystone, Meadowbrook and The Valley Farm. And Wide View is also suggested from Connecticut and Massachusetts.

A New York State suggestion is Rose Lodge. From New York also come Butternut Farm, Dew-Drop Inn, Overbrook Pass, Fordmore, Hazelton House, Meadow Manor, and Beechmore. In a Pennsylvania locality these names are liked: Cedar Lawn, Heart of the Valley, Arbutus Lawn, Cherry Hill, Maple Lawn and Pleasant View. There is also Jacqueminot Lodge from Pennsylvania, and Lakeside, Oaklawn, Robin Lane, and Overview, from the same state. Graceland, Grand View and The Maples come from Delaware, and Birdwood from Virginia. In Indiana there is a Robinvale, an Arden, and an Arcadia.

A DINING-ROOM, FULL OF SUNSHINE



BASEMENT PLAN



FIRST FLOOR PLAN

A LIVING-ROOM, WITH SOLID COMFORT

THE WALL BEAUTIFUL

AND HYGIENIC HOME DECORATION

Should express artistic feeling, show an atmosphere of individuality, and be an actual economy in the upkeep of the house. Such beauty of surroundings can be made permanent and hygienic as well as artistic

BY THE USE OF

MAPLE LEAF FLAT WALL COLORS

FOR INTERIOR WALL AND CEILING DECORATION

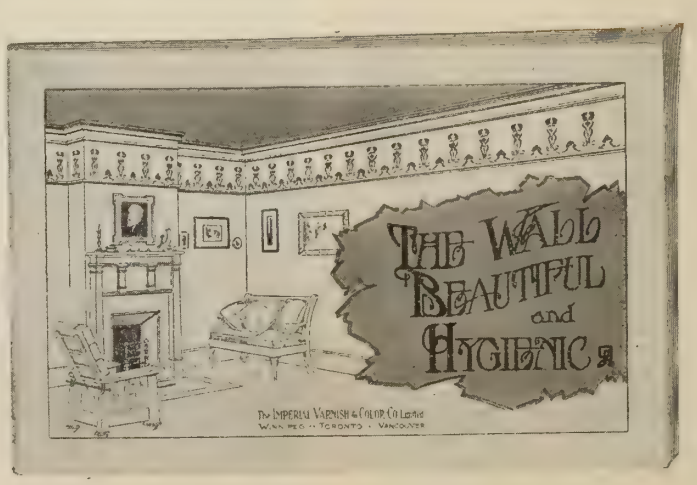
BEAUTIFUL:—Fulfilling every requisite for artistic decorative wall treatment.
PERMANENT:—Forming a perfect, durable, non-poisonous glaze on the wall.
INDIVIDUALITY allowed in the choice of innumerable color combinations.
HYGIENIC:—They can be washed and cleansed with soap and water and therefore ideal in preserving healthy, sanitary surroundings.

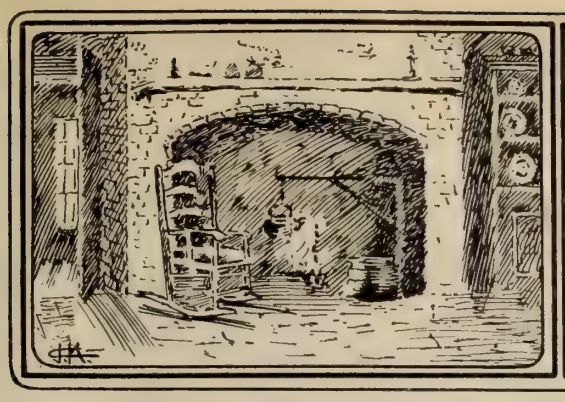
FREE Write your name and address on this coupon, and mail to our Maple Leaf Decorative Art Department for our free book "The Wall Beautiful and Hygienic," containing a stencil catalogue, and telling how to obtain free color schemes and suggestions for your own home decoration.

PLEASE SEND ME FREE "The Wall Beautiful and Hygienic"
Name.....
Address.....
City.....
C.H.J. 2-12

THE IMPERIAL VARNISH & COLOR COMPANY, LIMITED

6-24 Morse Street, TORONTO
108 Princess Street, WINNIPEG
365 Water Street, VANCOUVER





Oil Paint, a Sanitary Wall Finish
Heating the Modern Home

Oil Paint, a Sanitary Wall Finish

BY F. C. KENILWORTH

MANY conditions have brought about the necessity of building the home along practical and sanitary lines. Houses are better ventilated, lighted, heated, etc., than ever before, and rapid strides are being made to maintain sanitary conditions in public and private buildings by the selection of sanitary finishes. All this has brought into prominence the uses of paints and varnishes that would effect these improvements. While there has been, from time to time a change in the style of wall decorations, the present popularity of an oil finish in preference to a wall covering that requires paste and glue to make it adhere to the plaster surface has been influenced by the desire to keep the walls —as well as the other exposed parts of the home—sanitary in every sense of the word.

An oil paint, in fact, becomes a part of the plaster wall, binding itself, when properly used, with the particles of the plaster. In addition to the artistic effects that are possible—for a greater variation of color combinations is obtainable by the use of the oil paint—the most hygienic results are secured. The painted surface becomes absolutely non-porous and will not collect moisture or give the dampness that is evident on a wall covered with such absorbent materials as paper, prepared coverings, etc. By reason of the texture of the latter much dust is collected on the surface, while thorough tests have proved that dust particles will not adhere to the painted surface, even though it is of the flat effect.

The paint pigments must be ground in pure oils, and proper precaution taken to keep the finish pure. Three coat work is advised and clean brushes are recommended. The prepared paints are preferable as they are purer, more easily used, and will produce, without variations, the shade decided upon.

The plaster surface, as it is porous must first be sealed. This is accomplished by the use of a wall size, either alone or mixed with an equal quantity of the oil paint. The latter method is preferable since it has been found to produce a better foundation for the additional coats of the paint itself. The second and third coats should be applied as the material comes from the can. Turpentine only should be used if the paint seems a trifle too heavy to work easily under the brush. The paint should be flowed onto the surface; and will dry flat without any brush marks

Such a surface can be repeatedly washed with soap and water, and, while the colors do not fade nor the material chalk or peel off, the color scheme can easily be changed by painting over this surface with the desired color of the same flat tone oil paint. No sizing will be required in redecorating. Such a finish lends itself to the most attractive stencil decoration.

In the illustration of hallway of suburban home near Philadelphia is shown a large and spacious apartment of colonial architecture, the chief feature of which is the white enameled mantel. The spindles of the banister are enameled in white and the capping in mahogany, and at the head of the stairway is a handsome Tiffany window.

HALLWAY IN SUBURBAN HOME, PHILADELPHIA

Heating the Modern Home

THE features of any system of heating in which your readers or any home builders are particularly interested, are: First, cost of installation, up-keep or repairs to the apparatus itself; second, cost of operating or fuel; third, the efficiency or general usefulness of the heating apparatus.

The last named is the one which necessarily should have the most consideration. To take up each of these points separately, as applied to hot water heating, the initial expense or cost of installing a hot water system is greater than that of stoves or "hot air" and less than that of steam heating. The difference in price is, however, only a small percentage of the total cost of the building. For example: In a $5,000 home the difference in price between a "hot air" and a hot water system should not be more than from $90 to $200. The repairs necessary to a hot water system amount to practically nothing, as there is nothing breakable or easily worn out in the apparatus. The system is tested thoroughly, immediately after installation, and any defects developed in the boiler or radiators are invariably corrected at the expense of the manufacturer, and the steamfitter of course, makes sure that the piping is perfect. After this, with ordinary care, no further repairs should be necessary.

CONSIDERING the cost of operating, that is, the fuel required to heat a building of any size, it is seldom disputed that the hot water system requires less fuel than any other. This is accounted for by the fact that the boiler is designed to bring the intense heat in direct contact with the cold water from the radiators. It has also been clearly demonstrated that in a hot water or steam boiler, the combustible gases liberated by the burning of the coal, are consumed and this heat utilized. In a stove or "hot air" furnace, this is impossible, as the heat being radiated directly from the walls surrounding the fire, it is impossible to provide "combustion chambers" as they are called, to prevent the escape of these gases with the smoke.

A hot water system requires at least no more attention than a furnace or stove. Contrary to the opinion which still exists in the minds of some people, there is no "machinery" to this system. The system is filled with water in the fall and thereafter requires only firing. All of the modern boilers in the market are equipped with sifting grates, which are directly under the fire. These are operated with an ordinary shaker and sift unburned coal from the ashes without dust and without any extra handling.

The advantages of the hot water system are briefly, as follows: It may be installed in a home of any size and in any location. It is equally suitable for a farm house, a city mansion or a suburban bungalow. It may be installed in an old building without dirt and without cutting or otherwise disfiguring the walls. It occupies much less space in a cellar than the cumbersome air ducts of a "hot air" system.

As warmth is taken from the fire and distributed to the rooms of a building through the medium of a stream of water instead of being radiated directly from the fire and conveyed by ducts or air currents, the dust, smoke and fumes at the fire are confined in the basement. It is next to impossible to avoid this objection with any other than the radiator type of heating. Possibly the greatest advantage of hot water heating in comparison with stoves of furnaces, is that the air is never subjected to the intense heat of the fire, as in the case of stoves and furnaces. It has been demonstrated that air which has been "parched" or robbed of its natural moisture is the most frequent cause of winter colds and other throat troubles. It is for this reason that nothing but radiator heating is used in greenhouses. Plants will not live in the artificial heat from furnaces.

IN discussing the question of properly heating the suburban home, Mr. H. L. Anness, in Suburban Life, remarks:

A curious fact connected with the heating question is that we are compelled by the law to furnish large amounts of fresh air in the school-rooms, and yet we bring our children to homes in which the question of ventilation has never been considered. Fresh, pure air is absolutely essential to the sustaining of health, and this is the prime factor in favor of this system. A well-planned fresh-air system is easy to control and economical in fuel. A moderate fire can be operated in mild weather, and a deep, brighter fire for cold weather, giving all the heat required at all times; but care should be exercised to have an apparatus of adequate capacity installed, both as to size of pipes and fire-pot area, and heating surface in the heater.

Hot water heating was in general use in Canada before it was introduced into this country, but for the last twenty-five years it has gradually grown in public favor until to-day it is, perhaps, the most popular method for home-heating. With this system, the heater is located in the cellar, at any convenient point near the smoke-flue, and radiators are placed in the several rooms and halls to be heated. These are connected to the heater by small wrought-iron pipes. Above the highest radiator is located the expansion tank, of about fifteen gallons capacity for the average residence. The entire system is filled with water to the centre of the expansion tank, from the top of which is run an overflow pipe, open to the atmosphere, so that no pressure exists except that derived from the weight of the water.

When planning your heating plant remember:

That it is poor economy to cut down the first cost if it means increased coal consumption.

That the first cost is paid once, and forgotten, but coal bills come every year.

That you should consider carefully the merits of all systems, and adopt the one best suited to your requirements.

That the location of radiators or registers is very important. Don't spoil the heating, to place the furniture.

Humidity and Complexion

EVERYONE knows how the moist air of Ireland and England tends to make women have lovely complexions; I know the condition of our hair is better than it has ever been; we have fewer colds, almost none in fact; "nerves" are practically unknown with us, and we are all remarkably good sleepers.

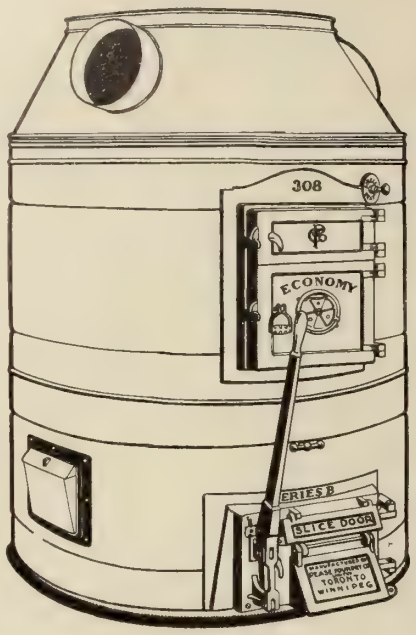
Our friends notice the difference in our house when they come to visit us, and speak of the "mildness of our climate," the "soft, gentle heat," the "restful and soothing atmosphere," the "pleasant feel to the air," the "sense of comfort and well-being," etc. Many of them have been inspired to make their own home less like deserts because of our example.

A COIFFURE MADE IN COMFORT

A COSY CORNER IN WINTERTIME

Are You Burning Too Much Coal?

Is your furnace heating your house? All of it—or are you perpetually shovelling in coal and not getting sufficient heat? Is it the quality of the coal or is it the construction of the furnace that is at fault?



THE

Pease Heating Systems

Steam, Hot Water, Warm Air or Combination

are so constructed that they must give the maximum amount of heat for the minimum amount of coal consumption.

If You Are Troubled

with insufficient heat in your house, our heating engineer will be able to help you. A post card or phone will bring him.

Ask the man who has a Pease Heater if his house is economically heated.

Let us send you our books "The Question of Heating" or "Boiler Information."

PEASE FOUNDRY COMPANY
LIMITED

Toronto -:- -:- Winnipeg

Western Representatives

Pease-Waldon Company, Limited, - Winnipeg

HUMIDITY IN LIVING ROOMS

IN an article on this subject by Lillian S. Loveland in Good Housekeeping, copyright in the United States of America, the writer says:

We modern Americans, when we build a new home, have it back-plastered, or build it of brick or stone, equip it with storm windows and weather strips, lay double floors, and in every way strive to keep out the cold. Then we put in the very newest and best heating apparatus to be had, and attach a thermostat to insure even temperature; we keep our living rooms at whatever temperature we choose, and think we have solved the matter. But in shutting out the cold, we also shut out the moisture in the outside air, and then we proceed to dry out what moisture does get in by our various heating appliances.

The houses in which we live are drier in winter than the driest desert regions of the globe. For instance, the average humidity at Yuma, Ariz., is 42.9 per cent.; at Santa Fe, N.M., 44.8 per cent.; in the Punjab and northwestern India, 31 per cent.; and in the deserts of Africa it averages from 27 to 33 per cent. The humidity of our living rooms in winter is from 15 to 36 per cent., where no effective effort has been made to raise the humidity. The average outdoor humidity in the United States is from 60 to 70 per cent.; therefore the change from indoor to outdoor humidity is very great. By relative humidity is meant, the ratio of the amount of moisture present to the amount necessary for saturation; that is if we say the relative humidity is 50 per cent., we mean that the air contains one-half as much moisture as it would if it were saturated.

In the old days when the houses were heated by fireplaces, the occupants probably suffered much discomfort from cold, but their method of heating did not dry out the moisture in the air of their houses as is done in ours.

There are numberless ill effects which result from the extremely dry air of our living rooms; our furniture checks and cracks and falls to pieces; our pianos lose their tune; house plants get brown and wither up; our skin becomes parched, and we women, without knowing why we have to do it, apply cold cream, glycerin and the like to keep the skin moist; our throats become sore and our voices more and more harsh and scratchy. Possibly this explains the "American voice," which is such a source of ridicule among Europeans. They do not keep their houses hot and dry as we do, because their mild climate does not require our modern heating methods. Even in Northern Europe, where the cold is severe, their method of heating is primitive like that of our forefathers in this country, and they do not dry out the air as we do with our furnaces, steam and hot water heating. The dry atmosphere also acts as a stimulant to the nervous system; our sleep becomes restless and broken and we become more and more conscious that we have "nerves." The change in going from our dry living rooms to the moister air of outdoors, also makes us more subject to colds.

Furnace makers realize this state of affairs to some extent, as most furnaces are equipped with a cast-iron pan holding about twelve quarts, from which to evaporate water into the house.

During the winter of 1901, my husband, who is a meteorologist, and myself tested this furnace pan quite thoroughly. We lived in the north half of a double house, both parts being practically alike and equipped with furnaces of the same size and make. We used the water pan in our furnace, while that in our neighbor's was not used. Each day at noon for a period of three weeks, I took the humidity observations in both houses. We evaporated about two quarts of water a day from our pan, and the result was only about one per cent. higher humidity in our house; a difference so slight, that it seems probable that such a small pan in a furnace is of little or no value.

Many people put small pails or pans of water just inside the registers, and I have known physicians to recommend this practice in cases of catarrh or throat troubles. We tried placing pans of water in four of the registers in addition to the pan in the furnace, and increased the evaporation to 5.9 quarts per day; when the humidity was 2.4 per cent higher in our house than our neighbor's.

From observations taken in steam and hot water heated houses, we find that there is practically no difference in the relative humidity of the air, between them and furnace-heated houses. Many people believe that hot water heating gives a moister atmosphere in the house; it does give a more even, uniform heat, but none of the moisture from the hot water itself can get into the house. The only way to raise the humidity is by the actual introduction of moisture into the house.

My husband felt that a humidity of 50 per cent in our living rooms was the correct standard to be striven for, so when, two years later, we built a modern, eight-room house, he had that in mind in planning the heating apparatus. We put in a regular hot air furnace, but when it was being set up he had one large galvanized iron pan and one smaller cast iron pan fitted around the firepot, inside of the jacket of the furnace, and under radiator so that the moisture evaporated went directly into the hot air pipes and then into the living rooms. These are in addition to the one furnished by the furnace maker, and the three pans, all told, hold seventy-two quarts of water.

In severe weather, when there is a hot fire in the furnace, we evaporate from 20 to 24 quarts of water in 24 hours. Ordinarily, when the thermometer is from 20 to 30 degrees outdoors, we evaporate from 12 to 15 quarts per day, and raise the humidity in the house up to 35 or 40 per cent. If we evaporated more than that, the extra moisture in the air would condense on the windows, forming steam or frost and would be a nuisance in many ways.

In a laundry with the washing going on, the humidity is probably over 90 per cent., and we know how wet and steamy the walls and ceilings are, as well as the windows. If, however, all the windows in the house were equipped with storm windows, we could keep the humidity at 50 per cent. without any inconvenience, as the air space between the double windows acts as a non conductor of cold, keeping the inner window warm and thus the moisture would not condense upon it.

To summarize, we find that evaporating 12 to 15 quarts of water daily, during average winter weather, is about the right amount for a house like ours, only partially equipped with storm windows. This keeps the humidity at 35 to 40 per cent., which is certainly a big improvement over the humidity in the average home, which is probably below 25 per cent. In the steam or hot water heated houses, some definite plan could be arranged for to evaporate water into the living rooms.

I wish I might say that the raising of the humidity in the living rooms is a saving of fuel. One naturally thinks that since one feels the warmth more in a moist atmosphere, it would not be necessary to keep the temperature so high and therefore less coal would be required. But it requires coal to evaporate water; to evaporate 20 quarts of water requires 43,000 thermal units, or approximately three and one-half pounds of anthracite coal. This number of heat units would be sufficient to raise the actual temperature in a dwelling house, containing 14,000 cubic feet, two degrees; thus it takes as much fuel to keep a house at 68 degrees temperature and 40 per cent. humidity as at 70 degrees temperature and 30 per cent. humidity. However, the lower temperature, as well as the higher humidity increase our comfort and health, because the change to outside conditions is not quite so great.

We find the results well worth all the trouble and effort they cost. Our furniture does not become cracked, split or checked; the boards in the floors do not shrink and leave unsightly cracks; the woodwork keeps its form and position; our piano remains in tune very much longer; our ferns and palms grow luxuriantly (we do not have flowering plants, because we use gas for lighting, but "that's another story"); our skin feels moist and comfortable, though sometimes if my husband forgets to fill the pans and they get nearly empty, I am in great distress with a feeling of dryness in the palms of my hands, lips, and nostrils, and I hasten to apply glycerin, cold cream or something of the sort till the pans are in working order again. I think we all have better complexions.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Some Principles of Interior Decoration

by F. C. Kenilworth

ALTHOUGH every interior presents new problems to the decorator and to the housewife, a general set of color principles can be followed in solving them. Unity, fitness and practicability are the fundamentals to be considered in planning the decorating of any interior. Unity is obtained by adhering to one style in exterior and interior construction, and in the selection of furnishings and finishes; fitness by holding to a simple or an elaborate treatment throughout, governed by the life and habits of the family; while practicability is gained by employing materials that will give the most durable results and will still retain unity and fitness. As an example, birch wood is selected for the trim of a living room to make possible a mahogany finish which will harmonize with the old Colonial furniture. The most careful consideration of the stain to be used is essential. It must give the right color, be non-fading, and permit of the application of the required surface varnishes. Products of reliable manufacturers should be selected in order to assure good results. Then, too, the surface finish over the stain must be similar to that of the furniture.

The same is true of the wall finish, and no one can give this part of the interior decorating too much thought. The use of rough plaster for the walls has done much toward the production of a home that involves the true principles. Its use has led to simpler wood treatments, and in turn, better designed furniture, and then on to well-chosen wall finishes. A flat oil paint is essential over the rough plaster, but the same has been found so practical, as well as artistic, that its use is no longer restricted, and the smooth plaster is as much decorated in this manner as the rough.

A prepared oil paint that dries with flat tones is recommended. Such a finish will not chalk or peel off, and will permit of frequent cleaning, as water will not affect the oil. The illustrated interiors show the effects produced by the flat tone oil paint, and demonstrate the importance of treating the walls to harmonize with the furnishings. The manufacturing of the printed fabrics in excellent colors and designs at such moderate prices is most fortunate, as these combine well with the flat tone wall finishes, and introduce the contrasting colors that are required in a well-arranged scheme. The accompanying elevations showing actual tints for ceiling and walls, give some idea of the wide range of colors. These, however, are only a few, for several greens, browns, buffs, greys and blues, lighter, darker and stronger than those shown, can be secured.

In the dining-room the simple but well-designed oak furniture gains in appearance by using the rich red for the lower wall. The necessary light is produced by treating the upper wall and ceiling in a light warm tint. The rug and over-curtains repeat the predominating colors, and a most artistic effect is thus obtained. The fundamental principles have also been followed in the decorating of the chamber, where the green wall gives the necessary contrast to the Circassian walnut furniture, while the tones in the hangings and rugs combine the green and brown in such a way that a refined and dignified appearance is given.

When one finds it necessary to introduce certain furnishings, valuable because of long association, greater care must be exercised in selecting the general color schemes. Each room must produce the proper setting for its furnishings, and must complement or harmonize with the predominating color of the adjacent rooms. In addition, the decorating needs to hold to the style of construction. The natural and artificial lighting properties of each room must be considered. This is especially true of the chambers, where the wall tints strike the keynote of the color scheme. Bright attractive effects are required, making it necessary to use a warm wall tone when the exposure of the room does not give much sunlight or the room is so situated that it is not well lighted. On the other hand, a strong light can be easily subdued by the use of greens, blues and greys. These colors should, however, always be combined, to a more or less degree, with the warmer contrasting tints, to avoid a cold, hard appearance. The color scheme of the hall is the nucleus about which the other schemes can be arranged. If, however, it is only a part of the living room or dining-room, then its color must harmonize with those of the living room proper. On the other hand, contrast is possible. In the smaller home the lighter tints can be used on the first floor, as well as second, while the darker tints are preferable in the large-sized living rooms.

The wall elevation in brown shows a harmony of three colors. The brown and deep buff are in harmony by analogy, while the green is in harmony to both through contrast. The green gives life to the scheme, and this is true of any color that is in harmony by contrast; hence the importance of selecting curtains, rugs, hangings, etc., in a room where the wall is treated in the flat tone and not decorated with stencils. The contrasting color should, however, be in a proportion of one part to ten parts of the predominating tint. The brown scheme will be attractive for a living room or library. The grey elevation suggests an appropriate treatment for a Colonial music or breakfast room. The mahogany wood trim with the decorative stencil border in olive and deep rose gives the necessary warmth to the wall tint. Rose hangings and furnishings will be appropriate here. The green elevation with its Craftsman border in a dark tint is typical of the decorations suitable for the more severe style of living room where dark oak furniture is combined with wicker chairs cushioned with cretonne that shows a bright array of color. The brick fireplace and brass fitments are not separable from such a treatment.

The Colonial or Empire chamber finds a suitable finish in the deeper cream wall tone and wreath decoration. The lavatory or bath with its tile-like wainscotting requires the sanitary oil paint for the remainder of the plaster surface, and the light blue is not only well-chosen, but gives the practical finish required. The stencil decoration in the contrasting color gives an added charm to the neat appearance produced. Milady's chamber must be decorated in a dainty manner, and the flat tone in the shell pink with rose decoration is ideal. Cretonne with a rose design over a white or ivory ground can be secured, and will be charming for hangings while the handwoven rag rugs in grey, rose and delicate olive green should be selected for the floor covering. The white woodwork finish is essential.

Ceiling, Buff Stone. Wall, Cocoanut Brown.

Ceiling, Ivory. Wall, Pearl Grey.

Ceiling, Ivory. Wall, Pale Olive.

Ceiling, Ivory. Wall, Old Gold.

Ceiling, Pearl Grey. Wall, Pearl Grey.

Ceiling, White. Wall, Shell Pink.

SHERWIN-WILLIAMS

Ceiling, S-W Flat-tone Ivory. Wall, S-W Flat-tone Terra Cotta. Stencil No 97. Woodwork, S-W Varnish Stain Dark Oak. Floor, S-W Floorlac Light Oak.

Ceiling and Drop, S-W Flat-tone White. Wall, S-W Flat-tone French Grey. Stencil No. 18y. Woodwork, S-W Enamel White. Floor S-W Inside Floor Paint, Grey.

Body, SWP 153. Trimming, SWP Gloss White. Roof, S-W Preservative Shingle Stain, B42.

Body, SWP 470. Trimming, SWP 393. Roof, S-W Creosote Paint, Red Oxide.

You should paint as well for every part and exterior

There is a She Varnish that is proper treatment of right kind of finish particular purpose. Williams dealer w protect or decorate right finish. Read of some of the m Varnishes you will

Sherwin-Williams Paint (Prepared) S.W

Is a most durable and most economical which gives uniformly good results. S.W is made from pure lead, pure zinc, pure seed oil and the necessary coloring pigm and driers, thoroughly mixed and groun scientific proportions. It spreads easiest der the brush, saves the painter's time, covers the greatest number of square fee the gallon. It can be bought in 48 diff colors, together with black and white. siding, trimmings and sash of the h shown here are painted with S.W.P.

Sherwin-Williams Preservative Shingle Stains

Sherwin-Williams Preservative Shi Stains bring out the natural beauty o wood, and add to it a rich and disti coloring. They do not cover up or co the surface as do some so-called stains sink into it thoroughly and permanently, ing the wood. Sherwin-Williams S Stains are made with creosote, the best preservative known. The shingled par the houses shown here are protected S-W. Preservative Shingle Stains.

Sherwin-Williams Porch Floor Pai

This is a pure linseed oil paint, and with a tough, elastic film, capable of re the most trying weather and wear. Va shades of this material have been used o porch floors of the houses shown here.

Our decorators Portfolio of Ho will be sent free

This portfolio illust method of beautifying ceilings and woodwork in addition gives many outside painting.

There are 20 plates tions for your painter's Williams these late finishes Send for ect the right he best paint your interior ration.

THE S

CA

PAINTS & VARNISHES

Williams Paint or ally made for the surface. It is the as the best for its tell the Sherwin- face you wish to will give you the owing descriptions portant Paints and his spring.

Sherwin-Williams Flat-Tone

nt for the artistic yet economical decor- of interior walls, ceilings and wood- It produces flat effects that are soft h, is easily applied, does not streak, can hed and cleaned without injury, and in 24 beautiful shades. The walls and of the rooms shown here are painted lat-tone.

Sherwin-Williams Enamel

gh quality white enamel of splendid g, flowing and drying qualities. Gives that remains permanently white, and t crack or mar. In the grey bedroom the woodwork is painted with S.-W. White.

erwin-Williams Handcraft Stain is a high-grade, artistic stain for g interior woodwork. These stains wonderful richness and individuality c, do not streak when applied, are rent and do not obscure the finest wood. Handcraft Stain is made in active shades.

Sherwin-Williams Marnot

ot is a durable, tough and elastic floor that is not easily marred under foot nd that retains its original lustre for gest possible time. It dries dust free t eight hours, and can be walked on t day. The floors of the rooms shown shed with Marnot.

prepared a Style coration which request.

describes the modern rving the walls, floors, ooms in your house, and color combinations for ith complete specifica- giving just the Sherwin you need to carry out n home decoration in durable and sanitary. olio to-day.

L ENQUIRIES TO

N-WILLIAMS CO

CLEVELAND, OHIO

Ceiling, S-W Flat-tone Ivory. Wall, S-W Flat-tone Old Gold. Stencil No. 10. Woodwork, Pine, Natural, S-W Excello. Floor, Pine, Natural, S-W Marnot.

Upper Body, S-W Preservative Shingle Stain, C71. Lower Body, SWP 457. Trimming, SWP 393. Roof, S-W Preservative Shingle Stain, C71.

Body, SWP 456. Trimming, SWP 382. Roof, S-W Preservative Shingle Stain, B43.

Body, SWP 393. Trimming, SWP 457. Roof, S-W Preservative Shingle Stain, B44.

Body, SWP 354. Trimming, SWP 371. Roof, S-W Preservative Shingle Stain, C81.

ROOMS DECORATED WITH ALABASTINE

As shown in our book, "Homes Healthful and Beautiful."
Bedroom

As shown in our book, "Homes Healthful and Beautiful."
Dining Room

As shown in our book, "Homes Healthful and Beautiful."
Den or Living Room

LET US HELP YOU DECORATE YOUR HOME

Our method is so simple and the material so easily applied that thousands of women decorate their own homes.

Let Us Send Color Plans Free

for the rooms you intend to decorate this season. Last year we furnished without charge thousands of original plans for wall decoration. These were used in some of the most artistic homes, studios and offices in America, by people who selected the exquisite water color tints of Alabastine in preference to wall paper, paint or kalsomine. Skilled designers prepared these plans. It is service you could only obtain in the larger art centres at considerable expense.

We have a form called the "Information Blank," which may be had from your dealer, or which we will send on application. When filled out this blank will give us all the information required to suggest color schemes intelligently.

Take off the Old Unsanitary Wall Paper and Use

Alabastine

The Beautiful Wall Tint

It is more artistic than wall paper or paint, more easily applied—and costs far less. It is too superior to compare with kalsomine—distinctly a wall covering for people of taste and refinement—used for more than a quarter of a century.

With Alabastine you may give living room, library, dining room or bedroom an individuality of its own. The charming modified tints are given unstinted praise by architects and decorators who are producing some of the most attractive of the new city and country homes and public buildings. They specify Alabastine as the ideal foundation for all future decorating, for a new coat can be applied directly over the old—from time to time when you wish to renew your decorations—without the expense and nuisance of washing the old Alabastine off the walls. It hardens with age.

Alabastine is absolutely sanitary and far more durable than any kind of kalsomine. Lasts longer, does not chip, peel or rub off if properly applied and covers more wall surface per pound than any other wall coating. It is the easiest to use—mixed simply with cold water—applied with an ordinary wall brush.

Alabastine is for sale by all the leading hardware and paint dealers in Canada, but to obtain one of our beautiful books, "Homes Healthful and Beautiful," showing rooms in colors it is necessary to write us direct and mention this magazine. Also ask about our offer to supply STENCILS FREE to Alabastine users.

Write a card and send it to-day

THE ALABASTINE CO.
Limited
25 Willow Street - PARIS, ONT.

Tints for Bedroom

Tints for Kitchen

Tints for Dining Room

Beautiful Wall-Tints With Water-Colors

MOST women have regarded the painting of the walls as a feature of room decoration quite beyond their domestic capabilities. It would be "so dreadful" to attempt such an extensive bit of decoration and have it fail, that most housewives have been more than content with the work of the hired decorator. However, the simplicity of modern materials is such that women need no longer be afraid of applying a coat of paint to hall, bedroom or library, but may do so in perfect confidence as to results.

There is hardly anyone who is uninfluenced by the tint of the walls or the pattern of the carpet. Do not live with ugliness beneath your feet and confronting your gaze. An expert on this subject tells us that the wall tints have a subtle influence over our spirits, and in this way affect our physical well-being. Who has not felt the instantaneous uplift of a cheerful room, or the chill of depression of a gloomy one? And the wall decorations were largely responsible for either atmosphere, though you may not have fully realized it at the time you entered the room. The shogi (or walls) of the Japanese home can be rolled back at will and the contour of the room changed almost in the twinkling of an eye, but the walls of your home must remain stationary; so it is your work to see that they are at least artistic and harmonious in every way, and not mere partitions with no more life or beauty than prison walls.

A BRIGHT AND HOMELIKE LIVING-ROOM

The modern dry paints which may be applied merely by mixture with cold water are of such soft plain tints that they make an excellent background for a graceful stencil pattern, which enables you to carry out any decorative scheme desired. A frieze consisting of a delicate design may be stenciled in harmonious colors on the smooth surface of the wall and thus relieve the solid tone effect if that is not to your liking.

When furnishing your new home rather fit your wall decorations to your furniture than your furniture to your wall tones. With the modern wall tints you may combine the colors and designs you prefer, thus reflecting your personality as much as in the selection of your clothes, perfumes, books or whatever else shows the particular you in all that you do and say. The beauty of the modern treatment, too, is that a mistake is not irremediable. You may put a coating on the new walls, and even if they should crack when they become permanently settled, it is an easy matter to put on another coat of paint right over the first one. If you desire to remove the first coat, however, it can easily be washed off, leaving the walls in perfect condition for the new application. So from the very beginning, walls harmoniously and artistically decorated can be enjoyed, instead of passing through the trying period of nerve-racking bare walls.

A DAINTY BEDROOM

In the dainty bedroom, shown in the illustration, the ceiling is of a delicate cream tint, restful and pleasing. The wall is in buff and the woodwork is done in white enamel. The kitchen shown is a model of convenience for the ordinary household, and housewife will appreciate the saving of steps made by such an arrangement of sink and drain-pan. The latter, adjacent to range, and the board on other side of sink, minimize the housekeeper's steps and contribute to general comfort. The nearness of kitchen cupboard, containing all culinary requisites, will appeal to the feminine heart.

The walls of the living-room are in buff, with harmonizing tints in curtains, and the ceiling is in white. There has been an evident desire to dispense with superfluous and unsanitary draperies, which merely impede the free flowing of fresh air, and which even weekly shaking and cleaning, cannot keep altogether clean. The simplicity in furnishing is decidedly pleasing, and the effect of the whole apartment is cosy and home-like. The furniture of Mission style is simple and of artistic lines, yet substantial enough to admit of use by the younger members of the family. Every equipment is afforded for happy evenings with music and games, and the modern "living-room" is a welcome departure from the old-fashioned parlor which was closed on all but state occasions. We can recall homes in which such a room always had a cold, unusual appearance, and a stuffy atmosphere which was anything but conducive to social cheer.

Now that women have discovered that they can easily apply paint to the walls of bedroom or pantry without fear of hopelessly marring the surface, the task of home decoration will not seem so formidable. Now the women of the land are educating themselves in the value of the right kind of decorating in each room. Woman recognizes more and more the need of sanitary wall coverings and equipment for the home. With the introduction of metal ceilings and side walls, woman's work is made easier. A scheme of decoration can be laid out for the modern house which, when completed, will make the home more sanitary, more safe from fire injury and more artistic than ever before. With a wall of metallic covering, woman's work is materially lightened.

When it is erected, it can be decorated to suit the fancy of the individual owner.. Then each season what dirt has accumulated (for dirt will accumulate in the best-regulated households) may be washed off in a few hours with soap and water, and the room is as fresh and clean as when the covering was first put on. Many fires are caused by lamps falling from the table or exploding. With a metal-covered wall there is little chance for a blaze, and this consideration alone will go a long way with the careful home-builder.

The furnishings of your home may be artistic and well-chosen, but their beauty will be obscured if your walls are not tinted to form a suitable setting or background. This will make the most ordinary things beautiful.

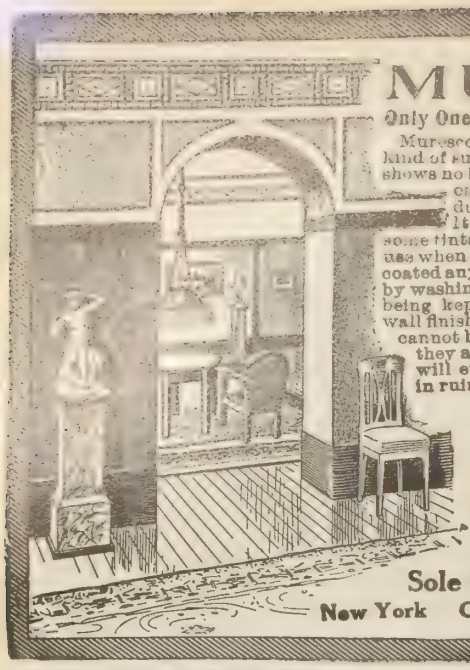
The primary importance of the walls in this connection will be seen when it is realized that they occupy about four-fifths of the surface measurement of each room.

Outlined against them, you see faces and forms of your family and friends, then how needful it is to have a harmonious background in keeping with the design and purpose of the room.

A decorative material for home use, should, in addition to good looks, be sanitary and healthful. It should be free from perishable or poisonous substances, not liable to fade or discolor, rub, crack, or peel from the walls, reasonable in cost and easy to apply.

The old bugbear, "spring decorating," is fast losing its terror, with the new methods of cleaning and renovating. The muss and mess of the paperhanger, the ill-smelling paste and the danger of colds from fresh, damp wall paper are things of the past, or matters of your own choice if you prefer to go through all that trouble and expense. For, by the use of water and dry colors in a wonderfully short time the old walls and ceilings can be done over and made to look like new.

A KITCHEN, WHERE COMFORT IS QUEEN



MURESCO

Only One Coat Required. Easy to apply.

Muresco can be applied by anyone, to any kind of surface. It will not rub off or peel, shows no laps, spots or brush marks, and is the only material producing that flat, subdued, velvety effect, so much admired. It is made in a large variety of handsome tints and colors, also white. Ready for use when mixed with hot water. It can be recoated any number of times and removed easily by washing when desired, thus insuring walls being kept in perfect condition. Beware of wall finishes containing lime or plaster that cannot be removed by washing when desired; they are neither practical nor sanitary, and will eventually peel off, leaving the walls in ruined condition.

Muresco is in use by the best decorators in the country, and sold by leading paint dealers everywhere.

Send for sample cards, descriptive matter and prices.

BENJAMIN MOORE & CO. Limited

Sole Mfgs., Toronto, Canada

New York Chicago Carteret Cleveland

Free to Club Raisers

TEN $50.00 Gold Watches

150 $8.00 Silver Watches

15 Subscriptions Win a Silver Watch

Gold Watches for Larger Clubs

[Subscriptions at Special Club Prices]

Every lady has a sure opportunity to earn a watch that will give her pleasure and service for a lifetime. Nothing but her own lack of interest can prevent. No village is too small, no city too large for a live, wide awake person to secure 15 subscriptions at our club rate.

Quality

Beautiful 18 karat and sterling silver cases, with monogram on the back. They are of the dainty sizes that are most desired. The works are fully guaranteed 17 and 7 jewel movements of high reputation. These watches are not for children, but for ladies who would wear nothing but the best.

Contest Rules

1. To every contestant who sends us 15 yearly subscriptions for the JOURNAL by March 15th, we will give a beautiful sterling silver watch, unless she wins a gold watch.

2. To the lady who sends us most yearly subscriptions for the JOURNAL by March 15th, we will give a splendid 18 karat gold watch.

3. For every 15 ladies who win silver watches we will give another gold watch to the next highest contestant.

4. For each 15 subscriptions we will send a silver watch or choice of its equivalent in cash or premiums. Thus, 30 subscriptions entitles contestant to two Watches, etc., unless a gold watch is won.

ENTRY FORM

Contest Department
CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL
Enter this name in your gold watch contest. Send full information, sample copies and supplies:

Name .....
Address .....
Sent by .....
Address .....
.....

Enter your name or a friend's, and prove that your interest in the JOURNAL makes you willing to work for its success.

Enter your favorite teacher, you can make a splendid gift to your teacher or Sunday class leader. A few pupils can easily secure 15 subscriptions.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Furnishing a Home on a Moderate Income

By JESSIE E. RORKE

THE BEDROOM.

IF a bedroom is clean, airy and comfortable we have all that is essential to make an attractive room and one that will fulfil its purpose perfectly, and furnishing or decoration that detracts from these characteristics will fail to give any additional beauty. We sometimes make the mistake of collecting in our bedroom small things of personal interest, photographs, souvenirs, fancy work—each of which may have sufficient interest or beauty to justify its presence, but which we multiply until the whole is suggestive of a museum, and lacks entirely the restful atmosphere which we should use our wisest judgment to create. We can each of us no doubt recall some tired night when we have found ourselves in a big, quiet, airy bedroom, and felt that the resting began the moment we entered the room, and we realize how impossible this feeling would be in a fussy, overcrowded room.

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY BED

These big, airy, attractive bedrooms are most easily attainable in the country home, where rooms are built on generous principles, as a matter of course, and windows are large and numerous, with a wide outlook over many acres, and airs that blow in fresh and pure, carrying with them a hint of nearby orchards and clover fields. But these, of course, are not possible for all of us, and Browning tells us:

"The common problem, yours, mine, everyone's,
Is—not to fancy what were fair in life,
Provided it could be; but, finding first
What may be, then find how to make it fair,
Up to our means: a very different thing!"

So in this humble problem of ours what "may be" is often a diminutive room with fewer windows that we could desire, and the question is how to "make it fair," to plan and arrange its furnishings to get as much of this fresh, restful atmosphere as possible.

In planning our rooms the walls and ceiling are the first consideration. When selecting wall papers we must remember that the cool, quiet colors always seem to recede, and will have the effect of making the room appear larger, and at the same time form a more neutral background for its furnishings. Delicate greys and lavenders, light dull blues and pretty grey greens all suit well the cool white that must usually be counted on as part of the color scheme for a bedroom. If, however, the window space is insufficient and the room dull and gloomy, it is wiser to use neutral shades of the warmer colors, or even medium tones, if the room is not too small—the tan and buff shades usually giving the best results. Small and inconspicuous patterns are the most appropriate; some of the floral designs are very dainty, and there are fascinating bedroom papers with satin stripes or small, self-toned figures. The plain papers, too, with paper or stencilled border, are always pleasing. Plain white papers are being much used for bedrooms; a creamy white wall with a quaintly designed border of cream and green will make a charming room. Some of the panelled walls are most attractive, but only those that are simple in design and quiet and harmonious in color are appropriate. Exceedingly good designs and colors may often be found in the less expensive papers, that are quite suitable for bedrooms. It is particularly wise to use these when the shades chosen are those that are likely to fade quickly, otherwise we must take into consideration, too, that the greatest cost in papering a room is in the hanging rather than the price of the paper.

FOR bedroom windows it is customary to use only one set of curtains, and these may range in price from ten or fifteen cents a yard to a dollar, or even more. But daintiness and freshness are what we chiefly desire here, and these may be attained quite as well with the cheaper materials. If the walls are plain nothing can be daintier for the windows than the pretty figured muslins, and it is well worth while watching the bargain counter for summer dress muslins. Some of the silk muslins are lovely, and the cross-bars, dotted Swiss, and flowered dimities present unlimited possibilities. A most attractive room has paper of a delicate silvery grey, with satin stripe border in grey and violet. The curtains are of the same shade of grey muslin, with a thread of gold and design of scattered violets, and a touch of brighter color is lent to the room by the brass bed and curtain pole. Another pretty room is furnished in cream and old rose, with curtains of scrim decorated with a simple cross-stitch design in old rose. If one is fortunate enough to possess one of the exquisite old blue and white counterpanes the room might be decorated in blue and ivory white, using the motif of the spread, sparingly, as a stencil for the curtains and dresser scarf, and introducing the same shade of blue in plain color in cushions or upholstery of a shirtwaist box or window seat. Ivory white paper, ivory white woodwork, and a plain rug in a slightly darker shade of the same blue would make a suitable setting.

BED, WITH COLORED SPREAD AND BOLSTER

A pretty arrangement of the curtains is to shirr them with a deep heading over a brass pole, and let them fall straight to the sill, finishing them with a deep hem. But abundance of light and free access of air are essential in a bedroom, and if the curtain material is at all heavy, they should be hung so as to draw readily on the pole or be draped back out of the way.

Nothing can be found more satisfactory for the bedroom floor than matting, though rugs have always the charm of being soft and warm. Matting is fresh and clean in appearance, and does not hold the dust, but has the one objection that it spots with water. The Japanese matting has some of the prettiest designs, but is not as durable as that which is made in China. A few small rugs, in colors that harmonize with the rest of the room, will add to its comfort and attractiveness.

When the same wood is not used for the woodwork and furniture, white is a very satisfactory color for the former, but ivory or cream white will be found to harmonize most readily with other colors. Both birch and bird's-eye maple make pretty and inexpensive bedroom furniture, and beds and dressers can be found in these woods with quite as good line and proportion as in walnut or mahogany. The Colonial type of dresser, with wide oval mirror, is one of the most pleasing of these simple designs, but it makes another and longer mirror almost a necessity

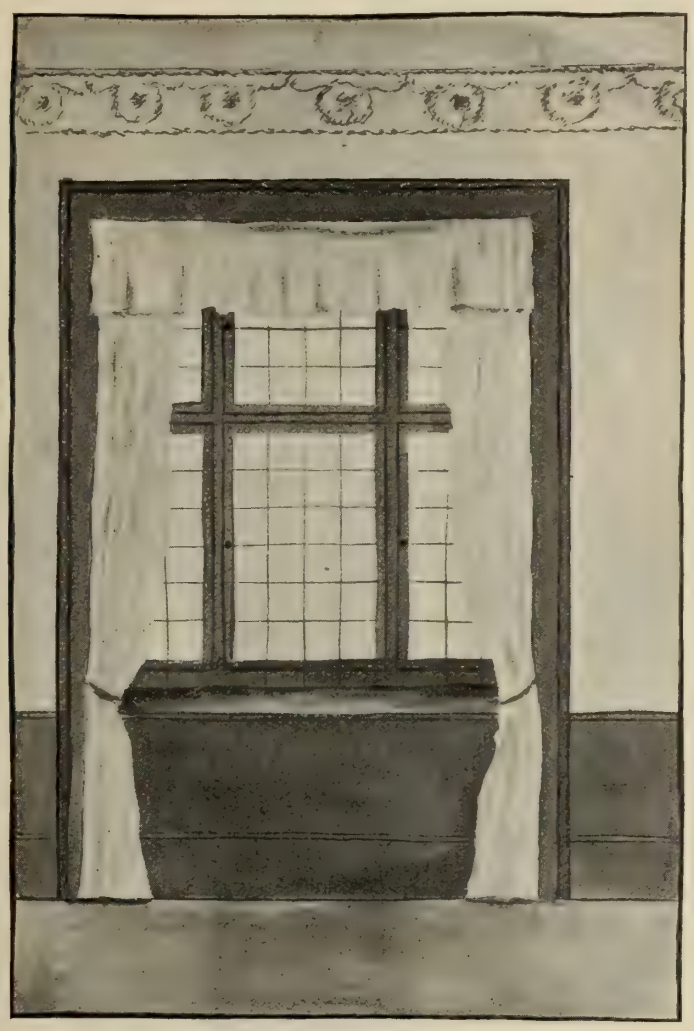
~

THE tendency to reproduce the furniture designs of the eighteenth century has not extended to the elaborately carved and canopied beds of that period, though it has given us a simpler and plainer style of the four-poster without the canopy. Our increased knowledge of the necessity of an abundance of fresh air in our sleeping apartments leads us to discard any form of drapery about the bed, and to select the simplest types of wooden or the iron or brass bedstead. The snowy cleanliness of the white enamelled bedsteads is their greatest charm, and their effect is very pretty in a room with other white furnishings. In planning the color scheme, however, we must remember that white is a cold color, and, unless the room receives abundant sunshine, introduce some warmer note. White and yellow give a pretty combination for a dull room. Brass bedsteads are expensive, but those which are not solid are more moderate in price and are very durable and often quite as good in design.

The simplest arrangement in dressing the bed is usually the best. The spread may be of cretonne or muslin (the latter made up over some pretty color) or some of the suitable materials in white. The colored spreads may be made to fit most attractively into the color harmony, but in most cases the white, with the possibilities of frequent tubbing, will appeal to us most strongly. It is customary with the colored spreads to use a long round bolster covered with the same material, but the entire uselessness of this lends a further argument in favor of the white coverlet, with pillows encased in white embroidered slips, or, if one prefers, embroidered or ruffled shams and plainer covers.

Wicker chairs are light and comfortable for the bedroom, and may be had in forms that will harmonize with any well-designed furniture. If variety of furnishing is used, as a metal bed, wooden dresser and stand, and wicker chairs, care must be taken to secure harmony in line and color, or a patchwork effect would be the result.

In selecting pictures for a bedroom one may be more largely governed by personal taste than in any other room, and yet anything except simple subjects in simple frames would be out of keeping. A very few pictures are sufficient, and these should be chosen with a view to giving lasting pleasure, rather than something that catches the fancy at the moment. If a room contains but one picture, to which you are glad to turn again and again and find pleasure in its line or color or the thought expressed, its walls cannot seem bare. Some prefer to leave their bedroom walls entirely without pictures, and the effect is sometimes quite as pleasing. I recall a boy's room with walls of ivory white bordered with a stencil design of flying swallows in dull blue, and even though the walls were so simply treated and no pictures hung, one did not feel that there was any lack. Pictures should not be used with a panelled wall. Photographs should be used sparingly if at all—one or two that give pleasure from their merit as a work of art or because of their association may be an addition to the room.



TREATMENT FOR BEDROOM WINDOW

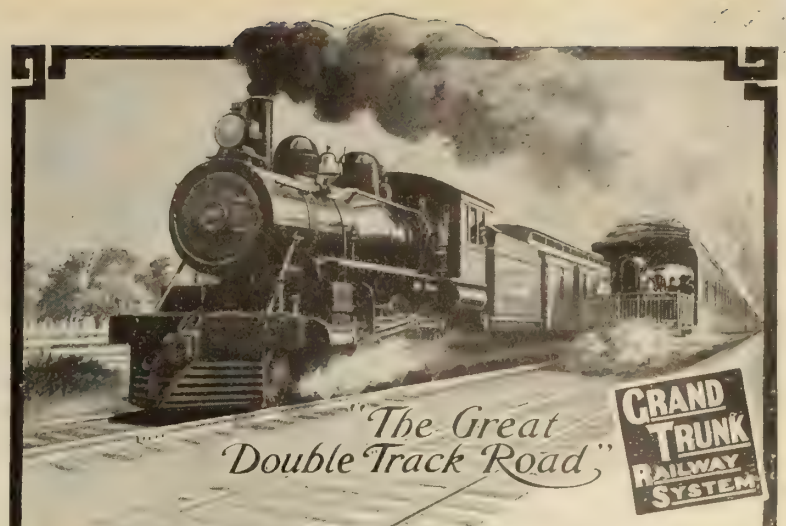
~

THE BATHROOM.

SPOTLESS cleanliness is the greatest necessity in the bathroom, and all the furnishings must be selected with this in view. Nothing is better for this purpose than to have the whole room tiled, but as this is too expensive for a moderate income, we must turn our attention to the next best thing. Blue and white or green and white are colors that will look fresh and clean, and a tile-paper that will permit of washing in either of these combinations will be most suitable for the walls. White enamel will, of course, be used for the fittings, and the woodwork is most satisfactory in white. It is better to use a linoleum in some plain tone for the floor.

Make your curtains as simple as possible, and launder them frequently. A plain muslin finished with a deep hem will look fresh and pretty, or curtains of cheese-cloth or factory cotton, with a narrow stencilled border will add another touch of color to the room.

Have the towel racks generous in size, large enough to hold the towels when open to their fullest extent. A small shelf is a necessity (bevelled plate glass may be used or wood painted white to watch the woodwork).



Solid Vestibuled trains are operated daily between Montreal, Toronto and Chicago, carrying the finest equipment, including Pullman Sleepers, Parlor Library Cars, Dining Cars and Modern Coaches.

1000 Miles of Double Track Line

Palatial Pullman Sleepers

Courteous Employees

Smooth Roadbed and Excellent Train Service

ARE FEATURES OF THE

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM

Full information from any Grand Trunk Agent.

A. E. DUFF, District Passenger Agent, TORONTO

What Is the Favorite Dish

after that tramp or good healthy skating party?

CLARK'S PORK and BEANS

The very knowledge that CLARK'S BOSTON BAKED BEANS will be there adds just the necessary spice to the fun. And say, isn't that poor appetite wonderfully expansive!

W. Clark - Montreal

Manufacturer of the CELEBRATED Mincemeat in the new style can.

146 MARIE H. RIDER HAGGARD 147

—The title of a book destined to be one of the best sellers for 1912.

The author's name — H. Rider Haggard—assures wide popularity for any story he may write, and competent critics believe "Marie" to be the notable writer's best production.

"Marie" is quaintly or diffidently sub-titled "An episode in the life of the late Allan Quatermain" — but that hardly does justice to the book.

The story is practically a complete and wonderfully fascinating history of Allan Quatermain's early life—a story that also reveals many incidents in the strenuous life of South African settlers more than half a century ago.

The book shows Africa's big mystical philosopher at his best.

Price, $1.25

Can be obtained wherever books are sold.

CASSELL & CO. Limited
Publishers of Books with Merit
London, Eng. Toronto. New York
Melbourne. 21

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers

HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

When two numbers are given with one costume, two patterns are required at 12 cents each. Send cash to PATTERN DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, 59-61 John Street, Toronto, Canada. Order always by number, stating size wanted. Patterns are mailed from our Toronto office the same day as order is received. PAPER PATTERNS TWELVE CENTS EACH POST PAID.

Charming Frocks for Girls

FROCKS of the late winter are very charming. The two illustrated are new and typical. They can be made from cloth, velveteen and materials of the kind for immediate wear, and also make excellent models for the lighter weight fabrics of the coming season.

The dress to the left, as illustrated, is made of henrietta cloth, with trimming of lace banding. The neck is cut square, the sleeves are of three-quarter length, but if liked it can be made as shown in the back view. There is a yoke to which the lower portion of the blouse is attached and the sleeves are extended over the shoulders and joined to this yoke beneath the trimming. The skirt is made in six gores and forms a box plait at front and back. The closing of the blouse is made at the center back of the skirt beneath the box plait.

For the 12-year size will be required 5¼ yards of material 27, 4 yards 36, 3½ yards 44 inches wide, with 1½ yards of lace to trim, as shown in the front view, ¾ yard 18 inches wide for yoke and cuffs to make as shown in back view.

The pattern, No. 7298, is cut in sizes for girls from 10 to 14 years of age.

The second frock is made of velveteen with trimming of lace. Both skirt and blouse are closed at the left of the front, and the trimming on the skirt combines with the plain on the blouse to give pretty and becoming lines. The blouse is made with front and back portions and sleeves that are sewed to big armholes. The skirt is made in two portions, but the front portion forms only a box plait, and the skirt, consequently, is straight at the lower edge. For immediate wear velveteen with lace is exceedingly handsome, for spring the same model would be pretty made of challis with trimming of silk or satin, and it will be charming for linen with trimming of embroidery or of a contrasting color.

For the 10-year size will be required 4¼ yards of material 27, 3½ yards 36, 2 yards 44 inches wide, with 11¼ yards of all-over lace 18 inches wide and 2½ yards of picot edging.

The pattern, No. 7301, is cut in sizes for girls from 8 to 12 years of age.

Dress Pattern No. 7298

Dress Pattern No. 7301

A Fashionable Evening Coat

THE evening coat that is made long and draped is one of the smartest of the season. This one can be treated in that way or left plain, as preferred, consequently the same model can be adapted to many uses. It can be made with either a hood or round collar also, and treated in either way it is smart in the extreme. As shown in the large front view, it is made of brocaded silk with collar of satin, but it could be made as shown in the small view of reversible cloth or similar material and become adapted to motoring and general use. The sleeves are separate and sewed to the armholes and the collar is sewed to the neck edge. The coat is cut with separate front and back portions. When the draped effect is wanted the fronts are cut away on the round outline, and the right front is laid in three upward turning plaits.

For the medium size will be required 7⅜ yards of material 27, 5¼ yards 44 inches wide, with 1¼ yards of satin for the collar and 2 yards of plaiting.

The pattern, No. 7302, is cut in three sizes, small 34 or 36, medium 38 or 40, large 42 or 44 bust measure.

Coat Pattern No. 7302

Matching the Eyes

A TOUCH of velvet near the face, matching the color of the eyes, has long been popular with the women who study their own beauties, and this has been easy to manage in these days of quaint little bows and pipings. Of late, however, the women of the smart set have taken to wearing flowers which carry out the color scheme set by nature. It is found to be a simple matter, too. There are pansies that are for the brown-eyed girl, forget-me-nots for blue eyes, and orchids for the maid with hazel eyes. The girl with grey eyes is the only one who has any trouble, for all she can find to match her eyes is the humble auricula leaf. Sometimes she fancies her eyes, however, are "grey-blue" or "green-grey," so she varies her color scheme with orchids, mignonette, or a dull blue blossom. If she is quite convinced that her eyes are really "matchless" she contents herself with the feeling of superiority arising therefrom, and lets the jewels of her face sparkle unrivalled, or wears the modest violet, which would never presume to resemble the eyes above them.

When natural blooms are not procurable the woman with an eye for flowers buys artificial ones of the required tint.

Parisian ingenuity has gone one step further in this art, and provides for its leaders of fashion real flowers dyed with chemical dyes in any desired color or shade. Hardy flowers, such as camellias, carnations, and all varieties whose stems are good absorbers, are placed in the liquid and allowed to stay there until exactly the right amount of color has been absorbed. Woe to the florist who gets his charges a shade too dark, or who makes such a fatal mistake as to send blue carnations to the fair one who ordered brown ones.

Gowns for Indoor Wear

MANY materials are being used for indoor gowns this season, but none is more fashionable than silk. In the illustration are shown two made of that material, one for young girls and the other for mature women.

The girl's dress is made of simple figured foulard, combined with plain satin and with dotted net. The blouse is made with sleeves that are extended to form a part of it. In this case they are made of contrasting material to give a guimpe effect, but they can be made to match the blouse, if preferred. Also the lining can be used or omitted. The skirt is in two pieces. In this case it is trimmed with a deep applied hem, but it is a simple, plain skirt nevertheless, and can be finished without the trimming, if preferred. For such a model can be used any two seasonable materials. It would be charming developed in challis with silk or in cashmere with satin, or indeed, in any similar way.

For the 16-year size the blouse will require 1¼ yards of figured material 27, with 1¼ yards of plain material 36 inches wide, and 1 yard 18 inches wide to make as illustrated; 2 yards 27 or 36, 1½ yards 44 inches wide to make of one material throughout; for the skirt will be needed 3¼ yards 27, 2¼ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 1½ yards 36 inches wide for the applied hem; the width of the skirt at the lower edge is 1⅞ yards.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7287, and of the skirt, No. 7283, are cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

The gown to the right combines striped taffeta with plain. It is exceedingly handsome and yet perfectly simple. The blouse is made with separate sleeves sewed to the armholes and is closed at the left of the front. It can be made with or without a lining, and with plain or puffed under-sleeves. The skirt is made in three pieces, with trimming portion that is extended to form a band, or panel, at the left of the front. It also is closed at the front and combines with the blouse most effectively. The striped silk and the plain satin harmonize to a nicety, but the season is prolific of trimming materials, and any two contrasting ones can be used

For the medium size the blouse will require 2⅝ yards of material 27, 1⅞ yards 36, 1⅝ yards 44 inches wide, with ⅞ yard of all-over lace 18 inches wide and ⅝ yard 21 inches wide for the trimming, ⅞ yard of ruffling for the frill. For the skirt will be needed 3¾ yards 27 or 36, 2½ yards 44 inches wide, with 1¾ yards 21 inches wide for the trimming; the width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2¼ yards.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7290, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust; of the skirt, No. 7273, in sizes from 22 to 32 waist.

The Neck Bow

THE velvet neck bow made of inch-wide ribbon with somewhat long loops and ends and a rhinestone buckle in the centre over the knot is the latest favorite with the girls. It is apt to match in color the tone of the hat or its trimmings. The black velvet hat is often trimmed with colored feathers. One of the handsomest seen with an entirely black costume had sapphire blue feathers. Geranium red or cerise feathers often match up with furs that have dashes of yellow in them, such as fisher and the like. A black ribbon band tight around the throat with a square bow at the front is being used by the girls with low-neck gowns. The bow is often centred with a jewel.

Gowns of the Fashionable Silk

SILK is one of the most fashionable materials of the winter. Here are two gowns made of quite different sorts but equally smart. The one to the left combines crepe meteore with ap-

Blouse Pattern No. 7287
Skirt Pattern No. 7283

Blouse Pattern No. 7290
Tkirt Pattern No. 7273

SPECIAL PRICES FOR MAGAZINE CLUBS

You save from 10 to 25 per cent

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL	$1.00
With Canadian Magazine and Canadian Courier	5.85
With Canadian Magazine and McClure's	4.00
With Musical Canada	1.35
With Toronto Saturday Night and Winnipeg Free Press	4.10
With Review of Reviews and Canadian Magazine	4.60
With Free Press, Winnipeg, Family Herald and Weekly Star	2.35
With Toronto Saturday Night	4.40
With McClure's Magazine and Good Housekeeping	3.40
With Current Literature and Canadian Courier	6.00
With Free Press Weekly, Canadian Thresherman and Farmer and Western Home Monthly	3.10
With Review of Reviews and Canadian Courier	5.50
With Canadian Magazine	2.85
With Ainslie's Magazine	2.45
With McClure's	1.90
With Housekeeper	2.15
With Family Herald and Weekly Star	1.60
With Canadian Thresherman and Farmer	1.50
With Canadian Century	2.50
With American Boy and Harper's Bazaar	3.20
With Every Woman and McCall's	2.10
With Free Press and McLean's	3.10
With Woman's Home Companion and Everybody's	3.55
With McLean's and Toronto Saturday Night	4.75
With Canada Monthly or Nor'West Farmer	1.50
With Weekly Free Press or Modern Priscilla	1.60
With Modern Priscilla, Pictorial Review and Ladies' World	2.75
With Rod and Gun or Designer	1.60
With Delineator and Canada Monthly	3.05
With Designer and Pictorial Review	2.70
CANADIAN MAGAZINE	$2.50
With Canada Monthly and Canadian Home Journal	3.60
With Review of Reviews and McClure's	4.90
With American or Woman's Home Companion	3.75
With House Beautiful	5.10
With St. Nicholas (New) and Harper's Bazaar	5.45
With Pearson's or Everybody's	3.25
With McClure's and Woman's Home Companion	5.90
With Canadian Courier and Canadian Home Journal	5.85
With Canadian Home Journal, Free Press Weekly and Western Home Monthly	4.45
With Woman's Home Companion and American	5.40
With American Magazine	3.75
With Canadian Courier	5.20
With Canadian Home Journal or Canada Monthly	2.85
With Western Home Monthly	2.85
With Musical Canada	2.70
With Toronto Saturday Night	4.60
With McClure's	3.25
With Woman's Home Companion or American	3.75
WOMAN'S HOME COMPANION	$2.00
With Canadian Home Journal and McClure's	3.50
With Etude or Musician	3.05
With Success and Pictorial Review	3.80
With Review of Reviews and McClure's	4.55
With Cosmopolitan or Good Housekeeping	3.15
With McClure's and Delineator	4.35
With Everybody's or McClure's	2.80
With Cosmopolitan and Review of Reviews	3.90
With Success and McClure's	3.85
With Delineator	3.20
With Cosmopolitan and Delineator	4.70
With Modern Priscilla and American Motherhood	3.60
With Success and Harper's Bazaar	4.05
With Cosmopolitan Magazine and Good Housekeeping	4.65
With Canadian Magazine	3.75
With Canadian Courier	5.20
With Rod and Gun and Canadian Home Journal	3.25
With Scribner's or House Beautiful	4.65
With Delineator and Everybody's	4.35
With Everybody's and Success	3.85
FAMILY HERALD AND WEEKLY STAR	$1.00
With Canadian Home Journal or Nor'-West Farmer or Canadian Thresherman and Farmer or Western Home Monthly, or Country Life in Canada	1.50
With McClure's, or Everybody's, or Pearson's or Uncle Remus's Home Magazine	2.00
With Practical Farmer and Canada Monthly	2.85
With Designer, or Everyday Housekeeping or Weekly Free Press, or Farm and Dairy or Modern Priscilla or Regina Leader or Rod and Gun or New Idea Norman's Magazine	1.60
With Sunset, or Cosmopolitan, or Field and Stream or Good Housekeeping or McLean's or Musician or Out Door Life or Popular Electricity or Short Stories or Physical Culture	2.35
With Everybody's and McClure's	3.15
With American and Woman's Home Companion	4.15
With Etude and Delineator	3.80
With Western Home Monthly and Weekly Free Press	2.35
With Canada Monthly and Canadian Home Journal	2.35
With Woman's Home Companion and Everybody's	3.65
With Success and American Boy	3.05
With Sunset and Technical World	3.95
With Modern Priscilla, Ladies' World and Pictorial Review	2.85
McCLURE'S OR EVERYBODY'S	$1.80
With Canadian Home Journal	1.90
With Delineator	2.70
With Woman's Home Companion or American	2.80
With World's Work and Delineator	5.15
With Cosmopolitan and Delineator	4.20
With Woman's Home Companion and Delineator	4.35
With Cosmopolitan or Good Housekeeping	3.05
With Success and Pearson's	3.35
With House Beautiful and Delineator	3.45
With Canadian Home Journal and Canada Monthly	2.65
With Western Home Monthly and Weekly Free Press	2.75
With Family Herald and Weekly Star	2.00
With Canadian Magazine and Pearson's	4.35
With Canadian Courier and Etude	5.65
With Musician or Etude	2.65
With American Boy and American Motherhood	3.35
With Sunset and Field and Stream	4.15
With Scribner's or House Beautiful	4.15
With World's Work	3.60
With Current Literature or World To-Day	3.50
With Popular Electricity and American Boy	3.75
With Modern Priscilla and Designer	2.85
With Pictorial Review, Ladies' World and Modern Priscilla	3.15
MODERN PRISCILLA	$1.00
With Canadian Home Journal and Weekly Free Press	2.45
With Nor'West Farmer or Western Home Monthly	1.60
With Canadian Monthly and Family Herald and Weekly Star	2.45
With Canadian Magazine	2.95
With Canadian Courier and Canada Monthly	5.20
With Canadian Home Journal and Nor'West Farmer	2.35
With Everybody's and McClure's	3.15
With Pearson's	2.00
With Delineator	2.40
With Cosmopolitan or Good Housekeeping	2.35
With Woman's Home Companion or American	2.50
With Mother's Magazine and American Boy	2.55
With Canadian Home Journal and McClure's	2.75
With Pictorial Review and Success	3.00
With Practical Farmer and Everybody's	3.25
With Scribner's Magazine	3.85
With House Beautiful or House and Garden	3.85
With Review of Reviews	3.00
With American Boy and American Motherhood	3.05
With Sunset and Pearson's	3.50
With Canada Monthly and American	3.25
With Woman's Home Companion and Etude	3.90
CANADIAN COURIER	$3.50
With Canadian Home Journal and McClure's	5.25
With World's Work	5.45
With Travel or World To-Day	5.25
With Field and Stream and Rod and Gun	5.35
With McClure's and Business	5.40
With Musician and Sunset	5.90
With Technical World and American Boy	5.70
With Automobile Topics	5.25
With Review of Reviews and Judge's Quarterly	5.70
With McClure's and Everybody's	5.30
With Woman's Home Companion and McLean's	6.15
With Canadian Magazine and Weekly Free Press	5.95
With American and World To-Day	6.90

ALL SUBSCRIPTIONS TO RUN FOR ONE YEAR

The magazines in above clubs may be sent to one or separate address.

Write for our 1912 Catalogue of Magazine Bargains

CANADIAN MAILING & SUBSCRIPTION CO., LIMITED

311 Somerset Building, - Winnipeg

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers

NERVOUS INDIGESTION

Spoils the enjoyment of life and makes everyday work a toil. The digestive powers are toned up and assisted in a remarkable degree by a cup of Bovril at eleven in the morning or before retiring at night.

BOVRIL

IS CONCENTRATED BEEF B-12-11

JAEGER COAT SWEATERS

Four Popular Styles For Men

Golf Coats, open neck, in all sizes Derby Coats, with turndown collars and pockets. Hunting Sweater Style, button at neck with loops. Motor Coat Style, double across chest, collar to turn down or button round throat.

This list includes twenty different styles in all sizes and variety of coloring.

There is something to suit every man under all conditions in which a coat sweater can be used.

TRADE MARK ON JAEGER UNDERWEAR

Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woollen System Co. Limited

231 Yonge St., Toronto
316 St. Catherine St. West, Montreal
Steele Block, Portage Ave., Winnipeg

BEETHAM'S
La-rola

La-rola is a perfect emollient milk quickly absorbed by the skin leaving no trace of grease or stickiness after use. Allaying and soothing all forms of irritation caused by frost, cold winds and hard water it not only preserves the skin but beautifies the complexion, making it SOFT, SMOOTH AND WHITE, LIKE THE PETALS OF THE LILY.

The daily use of La-rola effectually prevents all redness, roughness, irritation and chaps, and gives a resisting power to the skin in changeable weather. Delightfully soothing and refreshing after Motoring, Golfing, Skating, Cycling, Dancing, etc.

Men will find it wonderfully soothing if applied after shaving. Ask your Chemist for it.

M. BEETHAM & SON - - - CHELTENHAM, Eng.

IF YOU HAVE SOME SPARE TIME

be our local representative in our

Great Sample Copy Campaign.—WE PAY FOR NAMES

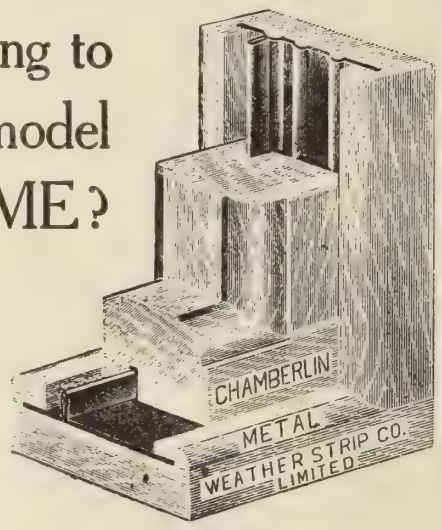
CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, 59 John St., Toronto

Are you planning to build or to remodel YOUR HOME?

Let us have a part in helping you to overcome one or two of the very hardest problems in the whole plan,

What Are They?

Do you know of any harder, than the proper heating and ventilation, at a proper cost



Cut No. 2

Eight of the Twelve Months are Stormy

Fuel runs away with money faster than any other necessity of life so if you can cut that expense down 25 per cent. is it not something these days? Drafts cause a very large percentage of sickness in the home to say nothing of discomfort and poor ventilation. There is only one thing to overcome these and at the same time prove economical. Drop a postcard for our representative to call on you and explain or ask our prices.

Chamberlin Metal Weather Strip Co'y

589 YONGE STREET, TORONTO

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

plique banding, while the one to the right is made of striped satin trimmed with plain.

The gown made of meteore is pale grey in color and is worn with yoke and under-sleeves of ivory net. It is very dainty and very charming, and perfectly simple. The blouse is made all in one piece over a lining, and this lining is faced to form the yoke, while the under-sleeves are inserted in its armholes. The skirt is cut in three pieces, and is finished with a wide hem and tucks. The plaitings are attached beneath the tucks. It can be finished with a high or natural waist line.

For the medium size the blouse will require 1½ yards of material 27, 1 yard 36 or 44 inches wide, with 3 yards of banding and 1¼ yards of all-over lace 18 inches wide; for the skirt will be needed 4 yards 36 or 44, with 1½ yards 27 inches wide for the frills.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7303, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust; of the skirt, No. 7046, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist.

The second gown shows one of the new coatee blouses and a skirt that is trimmed after the very latest manner. The skirt is made in two pieces and the trimming portion is arranged over it. It can be cut to the natural waist line or to the high one. The blouse is lapped in surplice style and includes the single revers that are so exceedingly smart. The sleeves are sewed to big armholes, and the peplum is joined to the lower edge. It can be made with or without a lining and with high or natural waist line.

For the medium size the blouse will require 3⅜ yards of material 27, 2¼ yards 36, 1¾ yards 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard of all-over lace 18 inches wide for the revers and cuffs, 3 yards of picot edging, ⅝ yard 18 inches wide for the shield, and 1 yard of lace for the frills. For the skirt will be needed 3½ yards 27, 2⅝ yards 36 or 44, and for the trimming portion 2¼ yards 27 or 36, ⅞ yard 44; for the bands on both blouse and skirt will be needed ⅝ yard of satin. The width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2⅛ yards.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7295, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust; of the skirt No. 7280, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist.

A Dainty Blouse

A MODEL in green and black chameleon taffeta is made with a double vest effect, the edges of which are scalloped, then machine-stitched and buttoned over a single line of black silk braid. Enclosing this vest is a deep, rounded yoke, reinforced by a stitched section two inches wide that joins it to the body of the blouse, following the yoke outlines. There is a shoulder cap that is cut in one piece with the blouse, but it falls only about three inches over the shoulder, where its edges are turned and machine-stitched to match the rest of the blouse, bishop sleeves completing the length. These sleeves are gathered to a muslin foundation and gathered again at the wrist into a regular shirt cuff. A little net stock attached to a very narrow yoke is worn with it. Even among tailored blouses there is a commendable variety shown in the cut, materials, and trimmings, though always, of course, keeping to the required degree of simplicity. Crepe de chine is an ideal blouse material, and so, also,

Blouse Pattern No. 7303
Skirt Pattern No. 7046

Blouse Pattern No. 7295
Skirt Pattern No. 7280

are the changeable taffetas that come in such beautiful colorings, each of them much better suited to the tailored effects than the satins, although one sees a good many of the latter. For morning wear, too, there are the silk-and wool fabrics that have a satin-like surface.

Gowns for Evening Occasions

JUST such gowns as these are always needed at this season of the year. They are graceful and in every way attractive, yet by no means elaborate, and involve no difficulties in the making.

The gown shown on the older woman is made in tunic style. The skirt is of the two-piece sort, with only two seams to be sewed up. The tunic consists of two straight pieces. The guimpe is made all in one piece, the sleeves being a part of it, and the surplice drapery is arranged over it. In this case the skirt and the guimpe are made of messaline, and the surplice drapery and the tunic are made of embroidered net, but the gown can be utilized for all materials adapted to evening wear. Satin over satin is very fashionable this season, and the skirt could be of one color with tunic and over drapery of another, while the guimpe is of all-over lace, or, again, in place of the embroidered net could be used a beaded net or all-over lace, or any similar material.

For the tunic with the surplice over blouse will be required 3¼ yards of bordered material 30 inches wide, or 3 yards of material 36, 2 yards 44 inches wide, to make of plain material; for the guimpe will be needed 1¾ yards 36 or 44, and for the skirt 2¾ yards 36 or 44 inches wide. The width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2⅛ yards.

The pattern of the tunic with over blouse, No. 7294, and of the guimpe, No. 7292, are cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust measure; of the skirt, No. 7304, in sizes from 22 to 32 waist measure.

The girl's dress is made of crepe meteore, with trimming of the same, and of chiffon roses. It is very dainty and very charming, but the same model can be utilized for tulle, chiffon, or any preferred material. If an afternoon dress is required it can be made high at the neck and with long sleeves as indicated in the back view. The skirt is straight and finished with hem and tucks and the blouse is in peasant style over a lining that is faced too from the yoke when high neck is wanted, and to which the under-sleeves are sewed.

For the 16-year size will be required 5¼ yards of material 27, 3¾ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 2 yards 27 inches wide for the plaited trimming, 1 yard of rosebud banding for the neck edge, ⅞ yard of all-over lace, 18 inches wide for yoke and under-sleeves, when these are used.

The pattern, No. 7308, is cut in sizes for girls of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

Tunic Pattern No. 7294
Guimpe Pattern No. 7292
Skirt Pattern No. 7304

Dress Pattern No. 7308

One-Sided Effects

SURPLICE effects are still wonderfully popular, and also the one-sided treatments. Here, too, is a propitious opportunity for combining metal and thread lace, fashioning one side of the one, and the other of the Cover Those Blemishes!

'Tis the kitchen that gets most wear and tear. Wear from the scrub brush—tear from the pots and pans and daily toil. With you can give a new tone to your oilcloth—make those old kitchen chairs fit for any company—cover up the iceman's clumsy work on your refrigerator—brighten the wainscoating—banish pussy's claw marks from the table and chair legs. Worth while trying it?

LACQUERET
HOUSEHOLD LACQUER

Our little booklet 'DAINTY DECORATOR' tells of many uses of "LACQUERET" for your home. And there's a copy waiting for you for the asking. Ask your dealer. Don't accept a substitute.

INTERNATIONAL VARNISH CO. LIMITED

TORONTO -:- WINNIPEG

TOLTON'S SHIRTINGS

Are particularly suitable for

Ladies' Wash Waists and Suits

because they are Exclusive, Durable and Colors Fast to Sun and Tub.

Write for samples and they will be sent to you free, then you can order from them by mail. Our Scotch Zephyrs, English Oxfords, French Cambrics and Flannels are 32 inches wide and priced from 12½c. yd. up. We sell them direct to you in any quantity and guarantee them to more than please you or your money promptly refunded. All orders shipped prepaid.

One experiment will convince the most fastidious dresser that at last she has discovered the place to secure exquisite and beautiful materials at moderate cost. We invite you to have your name put on our mail order list for present or future. Just drop a card to Harry Tolton, Berlin, Ont., Maker of Fine Shirts and Importer of Woven Shirtings of rare weave.

WANTED.—An educated lady in each city or town to show my samples of shirtings. The samples will appeal to and please any woman, because the designs are different from the ordinary. No experience necessary: occupation pleasant, and a splendid opportunity to make money in your spare time. For full particulars apply to

HARRY TOLTON - BERLIN, ONTARIO

We Pay For Names of Neighbors Sent in by some person who will act as our representative

IN OUR SAMPLE COPY CAMPAIGN

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, 59 John St., Toronto

Don't Pare Corns With Steel

This cut shows a corn with the pointed end digging into the nerves.

Paring that corn takes off just the top layers, and a few days brings them back.

If you pare too deep, or the blade slips a trifle, it means an infection. And blood poison often results.

That is a useless, old-fashioned, dangerous way to treat corns.

How to End Them

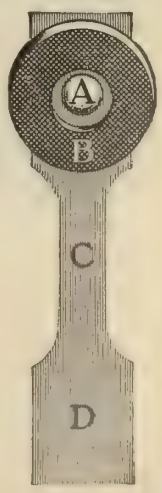
A Blue-jay plaster—applied in a jiffy—means the end of the corn, root and branch.

The pain stops instantly. Then the B & B wax gently loosens the corn. In two days the whole corn comes out.

No pain, no soreness. You apply the plaster, then forget the corn. In 48 hours it is ended forever.

Nothing ever invented does what Blue-jay does for corns. Millions of people have found this out.

Won't you?



A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

Blue=jay Corn Plasters

At Druggists—15c and 25c per package

Sample Mailed Free. Also Blue-jay Bunion Plasters.

Bauer & Black, Chicago and New York, Makers of Surgical Dressings, etc.

[138]

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

A bottle of prevention is better than a disordered stomach.

Abbey's Effer-vescent Salt

25c and 60c bottle.
Sold everywhere.
83

H.P. SAUCE

is being widely imitated. So be careful of the bottle you buy.

H.P. Sauce has a Taste, a Quality, a Value all its own. It is a Sauce of Character

That's the bottle

Oriental Fruits and Spices blended cunningly with pure malt vinegar — that's the secret of H.P.'s wondrous flavour.

That's the bottle

Hot or cold meats, fish, flesh, or bread and cheese, H.P. works wonders with them all Grocers sell H.P.

Enter Any Day

for a thorough course in Business, Shorthand, Telegraphy or English in one of

SHAW'S SCHOOLS

TORONTO

WINTER TERM NOW OPEN. Write for Catalogue. Address W. H. Shaw, President, Head Offices, Central Business College, Yonge and Gerrard Streets, Toronto.

Ask for UPTON'S

ORANGE MARMALADE

and you will be sure of obtaining an absolutely pure and nourishing preserve. UPTON'S Marmalade is delicious and with toast or rolls and coffee makes a satisfying breakfast or light meal.

The most luscious, selected oranges and pure granulated sugar are the only ingredients that are contained in every jar or pail of UPTON'S Brands.

Sold By All Leading Grocers.
1

second lace. This is demonstrated in a blouse just completed for a pretty debutante's outfit, in which midnight blue velvet is the chief material. There is a body, smooth fitting, of turquoise chiffon with dark blue chiffon over the upper part forming a yoke. Then over this there is draped from the shoulders around one side a dull silver lace, and on the other a beautiful Venise, while, peeping out between, below the yoke, is a little vestee of the turquoise chiffon. The skirt with which this is to be worn is entirely of the velvet, and is perfectly plain. The bodice has a narrow peplum, all of the metal lace, and the sleeves, one each of the different laces, are of the "angel" type, though much modified, and reach only to the elbow. A few inches of peplum, or the skirt continued for two or three inches above the waist line, is sufficient to add perceptibly to the formality of a blouse. In reality it becomes a bodice, an integral of the costume, instead of a separate waist. The same result, however, may be obtained through the medium of a girdle that is of the skirt fabric. In some fancy shape, and trimmed to show its connection with the skirt, it immediately strikes the note of continuity between blouse and skirt, and transforms the whole into a "costume" instead of a blouse and skirt suit. In most instances skirts designed to wear with separate blouses have the waist line raised a trifle unless the blouse is to be worn outside of it, and sometimes a princess effect is preferred to the girdle, when a section made of the skirt goods is shaped to the lower part of the blouse. It may be on the lines of the blouse with the merest suggestion of pouching.

Blouse Pattern No. 7266

Blouse Closing in Front

SECTIONS that are overlapped and sleeves in kimono style that are stitched to the blouse are two of the latest features, and this model shows them both. It is closed at the front, also, which is a practical as well as smart feature. Altogether the design is a most satisfactory one. It will be found equally desirable for the separate waist and for the entire gown, and it is suited to a great many different materials. This one is made of the new satin duchesse that is so soft and pliable and is finished with a frill of lace. The model is just as good for broadcloth, which is a favorite of the season, and for the light weight serge and other materials of the kind, as it is for silk, and it can be utilized for lighter and thinner materials, such a crepe de chine and fabrics of the kind. The sleeves can be made in three-quarter or full length. When long they are plain, while the three-quarter ones are finished with shaped cuffs.

The blouse is made over a fitted lining. It consists of front and back portions, and of the separate sleeves. The sleeves are attached to the lining, and the armhole edges and under-arm edges of the blouse are finished. The back is lapped over the fronts and held into place with buttons. Both lining and blouse are closed at the front. When the stock collar is wanted it is joined to the neck edge at the right side and hooked into place at the left.

For the medium size will be required 3⅝ yards of material 27, 3 yards 36, 2¼ yards 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard of lace 7½ inches wide for the frill.

Pattern No. 7266 is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42-inch bust measure.

Tucked Blouse

THE blouse that is made with straight back edges is especially well liked and well adapted to lingerie materials, for it can be laundered easily and successfully. This one also includes the new sleeves that are finished with deep cuffs. It is tucked after a most becoming manner, and it is altogether attractive. In this case the material is handkerchief lawn, but blouses of this kind are made from silks, as well as from washable materials. The combination of wide tucks with narrow tucks is especially worthy of note.

The blouse is made with front and back portions, and includes one-piece sleeves that are joined to deep cuffs.

For the medium size will be required 3¼ yards of material 27, 2 yards 36 or 44 inches wide.

The pattern, No. 7286, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42-inch bust measure.

A Tunic Gown

A STUNNING tunic gown of redingote suggestion had the very long white satin tunic almost to the bottom of the skirt at sides and back, but wide open at the front. The skirt was of green chiffon and the crossover waist was also of the chiffon. The tunic, wide open at the front of the waist as well as in the skirt, had big revers stencilled like the band around the bottom of the tunic in bold coloring. The one-piece gown has been one of the smartest models ever since the best of the fall styles were opened. One of the most effective seen as yet was of delft blue velvet with a deep band on the skirt which extended half-way from knees to hips. This band was made up of unspotted ermine finished at the top with an outline of tails against the upper band of Italian lace. Three great white fur buttons finished the side closing of the draped waist and of the skirt, in a Russian effect.

Blouse Pattern No. 7286

Dress Materials

THE new materials taken for dresses are extremely pretty, soft, thick fabrics, such as ratine and zibelines, being the favorites for street wear. Besides these, English tweeds, homespuns, cheviots, serges, etc., are very much in vogue. The most fashionable shades are Havana tones in browns, taupe, olive green, slate greys and blues. The double-faced goods are shown in many

A KODAK HOME PORTRAIT

Picture taking is simpler than you think—if you do it the

Kodak Way

And there's no more delightful side to photography than the making of home portraits. Get the full pleasure that is to be had from your Kodak by taking in-door pictures in winter as well as out-door pictures in summer. To make every step perfectly clear we have issued a beautifully illustrated little book—At home With the Kodak—that tells in a very understandable way just how to proceed. It may be had free at your dealers or by mail direct, upon request.

CANADIAN KODAK CO.
Limited
TORONTO, CAN.

Short-Story Writing

A complete, practical and thorough course of instruction prepared by and taught under the supervision of One of America's Ablest Writers and Tutors

The Magazines Go Begging

for bright, interesting stories. This appeal is to You. Write to-day for prospectus.

Name .....

Address .....

Shaw Correspondence School
391-401 Yonge St., Toronto

BUST AND HIPS

Every woman who attempts to make a dress or shirt waist immediately discovers how difficult it is to obtain a good fit by the usual "trying-on-method," with herself for the model and a looking-glass with which to see how it fits at the back

"HALL-BORCHERT PERFECTION Adjustable Dress Forms"

do away with all discomforts and disappointments in fitting, and render the work of dressmaking at once easy and satisfactory. This form can be adjusted to 50 different shapes and sizes; bust raised or lowered, also made longer and shorter at the waist line and form raised or lowered to suit any desired skirt length. Very easily adjusted, cannot get out of order, and will last a lifetime.

Write for illustrated Booklet containing complete line of Dress Forms with prices.

Hall-Borchert Dress Form Co., of Canada, Limited.
70-72 Pearl St., Toronto, Can.

Try our patterns, 12c. each. Sensible styles, easy to cut.

They mend all leaks in all utensils—tin, brass, copper, graniteware, hot water bags, etc. No solder cement or rivet. Anyone can use them; fit any surface, two million in use. Send for sample pkg., 10c. COMPLETE PACKAGE ASSORTED SIZES, 25c., POSTPAID. Agents wanted.
Collette Mfg. Co., Dept. D Collingwood, Ont.

OXO Cubes open up a new world of home cookery. The monotonous routine of beef, mutton and pork may be varied by an endless variety of light, nourishiug, easily digested dishes.

By the aid of OXO Cubes, soups, sauces, meat jellies, croquettes, etc., may be made or enriched with no trouble and little expense.

57

One Cube to a Cup

MAXWELL'S HIGH SPEED CHAMPION

has the largest opening of any washing machine. Practically the whole top opens up because the wringer attachment is on the side. No other washer washes clothes so quickly—so well—so easily. Tub made of Red Cypress—will last a lifetime. In every respect, the "Champion" is the champion of all washing machine.

If you want quality butter, use Maxwell's "Favorite" Churn.

DAVID MAXWELL & SONS,

St. Mary's Ont.

See large opening in tub. So easy to put in clothes.

90

FOR INFANTS, INVALIDS, and the AGED.

BENGER'S FOOD

assists nature.

It is used mixed with fresh new milk and forms a delicate and nutritive cream which is enjoyed and assimilated when other foods disagree. It is entirely free from rough and indigestible particles which produce irritation in delicate stomachs.

The Lancet describes it as "Mr. Benger's admirable preparation."

BENGER'S FOOD, LIMITED, Otter Works, Manchester, Eng.

Bengers Food is sold in tins by Druggists, etc., everywhere.

B21

models. For the elaborate tailor-made costume velvet is prominent, not only in blacks, but greens, browns and also those shown in corded and chiffon effects. Semi-fitted lines and novel empire lines are evident in many models. The value of line and of correct proportion is a dominant character of the new tailor-mades. The latest novelty in skirts is the "jupe-portefeuille," the sides of which are slightly open, and there are also some showing inverted pleats.

Frocks for Many Occasions

THE variety of materials offered this season is almost bewildering. For the younger contingent are shown most fascinating, simple silks as well as numberless pretty wool fabrics. In the illustration are shown two dresses that can be utilized in many ways.

The frock worn by the older girl combines a simple, straight skirt that is gathered at the upper edge with a blouse that is open at the front. In this case it is made of messaline piped with black and white silk and trimmed with frills of lace. The blouse is finished with a round collar that is very deep at the back and there are sleeves stitched to the armholes and is closed at the front. If preferred the sleeves can be made long and the stock collar can be worn either with or without the round collar. The skirt, too, can be made either to the high or natural waist line, but the frock just as illustrated is in the height of style and in every way to be commended. The blouse is made with separate fronts and back that are seamed over the shoulders and under the arms. The one-piece sleeves are joined to it at the long shoulder line and are slightly full.

For the 16-year size the blouse will require 3 yards of material 27, 2 yards 36, 1⅞ yards 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard of lace for the wide frill, 1 yard of narrower lace for the sleeve frills; for the skirt will be needed 3¾ yards 27 or 36, 2¼ yards 44 inches wide, the width at the lower edge is 2⅛ yards.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7263, and of the skirt, No. 6927, are both cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

The dress worn by the younger girl can be made either with or without a guimpe lining, consequently, it is adapted to many materials and to many occasions. In the illustration it is made from velveteen with trimming or Persian silk, and is worn over a guimpe of tucked net, but it would be just as well adapted to cashmere with trimming of velvet or plain silk and to the French serge that is so much liked, while it also can be utilized for white or light colored broadcloth, and made as shown in the back view it would become adapted to parties and occasions of the sort. The skirt is in four gores with separate box plaits applied over the side seams that are extended over a girdle on to the blouse. The blouse is made with front and back portions, and with separate sleeves stitched to the armholes. The closing is made at the back.

For the 12-year size will be required 5¼ yards of material 27, 4½ yards 36, 3¼ yards 44 inches wide with ¾ yard of silk for the trimming and ¾ yard of tucked net for the yoke and undersleeves of the guimpe.

The pattern, No. 7260, is cut in sizes for girls of 10 to 14 years of age.

Blouse Pattern No. 7263
Skirt Pattern No. 6927

Pattern No. 7260

Just WHY

Old Dutch Cleanser

Is The BEST Thing That

Keeps Bath-tubs Clean

Because the Cleanser quickly removes the discolorations which appear on porcelain bath-tubs, and which it is impossible to remove by any other means.

Sprinkle the Cleanser over the tub, and rub the surface with a dampened brush or coarse cloth. Then wash off with clean water, and you will find that all dirt and stains have vanished, leaving the tub clean and spotless.

Many Other Uses and Full Directions on Large Sifter-Can, 10c

I'm the Cream of the West Miller, and I'll tell you what I'll do—I'll guarantee your next batch of bread

I WILL guarantee it to rise away up out of the pans, and make as delicious bread as you ever tasted. The loaves will be the biggest and most wholesome you ever baked with the same amount of flour. I'll guarantee it or you get back the money you paid for the flour! Now see:

Just go to your grocer and buy a bag of Cream of the West Flour. Take it home and bake it up.

Give it a trial.

Give it a couple of trials. Your oven or yeast might not be just right the first time.

Now when you give it a fair trial, if you honestly feel that you have not had splendid satisfaction with Cream of the West Flour, return the unused portion of the bag and get your money back.

Just tell the store man your bread didn't come out right and you want your money back as guaranteed.

It's not the grocery man who loses. It doesn't come out of his pocket. It is the Campbell Milling Company, Limited, of Toronto, who pay, and they are satisfied to pay if you'll be satisfied to try Cream of the West Flour.

Ask your store-keeper about this guarantee. He knows. He will tell you. Try a bag next baking day.

Cream of the West Flour

The hard wheat flour that is guaranteed for bread

Guarantee

WE hereby affirm and declare that Cream of the West Flour is a superior bread flour, and as such is subject to our absolute guarantee of money back if not satisfactory after a fair trial. Any dealer is hereby authorized to return price paid by customer on return of unused portion of bag if the flour is not as represented.

The Campbell Milling Company, Limited, Toronto.
ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, PRESIDENT

CREAM OF THE WEST

100

This Ring given FREE

for selling Assorted PICTURE POST CARDS. In one hour you can earn this handsomely Chased Signet Ring, engraved with any initial desired Free The design is an exact duplicate of a solid 18K Gold pattern. Given for selling only 18 pkgs. of our Multi-color Picture Post Cards at 10c. a pkge. Each pkge. consists of 6 cards done up in a Valuable Coupon Envelope, which makes your friends buy them on sight. Don't wait a minute. We prepay postage on both Cards and Ring. Big Catalog of all our Premiums sent with each order.

COLONIAL ART CO., Desk OL., TORONTO

Stammering or Stuttering

may make life miserable for your child, or for one of your family or friends. If it does, you owe it to the sufferer to investigate the sensible, successful Arnott Methods of treating the Cause—not merely the habit—and permanently curing these distressing impediments. We'll gladly give you full particulars and references. Write 9

ARNOTT INSTITUTE
Berlin, Ont., Canada.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

In The Shops

THE month after Christmas is like the respite after a fever. Every year we say that we will do our shopping early, that we will begin in January to make our purchases for the following Christmas—and every year finds us in the same old hurry. Perhaps there is a slight improvement, but it must be admitted that, in the matter of early shopping, we learn very slowly what is the best policy. After Christmas we breathe freely and say that we will not go into a shop again for a whole long month, that we wish, for the rest of our natural lives, to avoid the snares of fancy work, decorated china, and embroidered towels.

Wherefore, there is a period of calm in the large establishments, of which the wisest housewives avail themselves. Many are the dainty bits of lace and muslin which are sold at absurd figures during the months of January and February. The rush has left a variety of trifles well worth inspection and purchase all untouched, and the experienced buyer is aware of this.

In the matter of home furnishing, the shops of January and February may be relied on for low prices and large stocks. During the last month Eaton's have been making a display of curtains quite worth a morning's visit. Cushions have also been a staple display of the season, with every variety of covering. The month of February is one usually given to special furniture sales, and a new set for library, dining-room or "den" may well be purchased during the last winter month.

The rugs shown are more alluring than ever, perhaps from force of contrast with the bleakness of the snow-covered ground outside. The Oriental, medallion, chintz and two-tone effects are exceedingly attractive to the shopper who is intent on re-furnishing her living-room or bedroom. The colorings of the woollen rugs show a marked improvement on the garish and "cheap" effects, which were once characteristic of these goods. The softest colorings of rose, reseda and violet are shown, in designs which are eminently artistic.

SERGE, in all probability, will be the leading material again for spring, says Ready-to-Wear. The tendency is towards the finer French serges. There is also a marked use of whipcords, which are anticipated to be excellent sellers for the new season. Cheviots will be good for the heavier garments. This is especially true of the mixed and fancy weaves. The rough and semi-rough fabrics generally are expected to enjoy a large field of recognition. Many of the double-faced materials shown for coats have a rough surface in the checked or striped side with a softer, smoother plain back. Stripes will be very good in all lines. Some of the coatings show reversible whipcords with white faces and shading down to a decided biscuit shade. There are also some wide herringbone stripe effects in tans and browns with deep browns and some of the bright shades in combination. The most noticeable of these have the black and white herringbone effect with bright dark green and also one of the brick reds as a reverse. There is a large range of light mixtures in many colors and combinations. The greys and tans predominate for the face of the cloth. Changeable taffetas are expected to have a considerable vogue, especially for long coats and separate skirts. Three-colored, changeable taffeta is being shown as a novelty for the making of both suits and coats.

Regardless of "vain repetitions," we must emphasize the fact that the craze for the fichu means for the spring and summer a more fluffy feminine style of dress, quillings, ruchings, frills, wider skirts, and the use of taffeta for dresses, coats, trimmings, etc. This may seem a good deal to hinge upon the return of the fichu, but a certain tendency always brings a good deal in its train. It would appear that the kimono sleeve started the idea of the fichu and fichu effects, for the long smooth shoulder was found so becoming that women were reluctant to give it up.

EMBROIDERED LINGERIE

THE interest in embroidered lingerie still continues, and these garments appeal especially to the woman of refined taste. It is surprising how much of this work may be accomplished in odd moments if one's work and material are kept in a convenient place. The woman who longs to possess the dainty garments which are shown in the shops, and bear the magic title of "French lingerie," need not hesitate to collect her materials and to commence the work, a knowledge of embroidery, and the deft fingers which accomplish this will also sew the fine "hand-sewn" seams, that all these garments may be suitably finished.

No. 7009—Combination Corset Cover and Skirt, $1.25

We are sure our readers will be interested in the lingerie designs which are illustrated on this page. All the whitewear sales which at this season of the year make their annual appeal bring to the mind of every woman that this portion of her wardrobe must be added to, and the styles and shapes of these garments vary somewhat from those of previous seasons. The materials may be as expensive or inexpensive as one's purse will allow. Sheer handkerchiefs, linens, lonsdales, muslins, etc., are used for these embroidered garments, special weaves of all these lines suitable for embroidery are to be had. The designs for these hand-embroidered garments have been selected so that they may be effective without involving too much work, and the same

No. 7007—Kimono Night Dress, $1.10

design may be matched throughout the entire set. The set illustrated shows this idea, and if necessary, the skirt ruffles may be supplied to match the other garments. The embroidery used for these garments shows a combination of eyelet and French embroidery, and we would again remind our readers that a simple design well worked is preferable to an elaborate pattern carelessly embroidered. The

No. 7008—Umbrella Drawers, $1.10 method of working French embroidery is generally known, but a few directions to the novice may not be amiss, and one of the most important is that the padding must be carefully laid. First run the stamped edges of the design, carefully keeping the shape, then fill lengthwise the remainder of the design, making it slightly higher in the centre. The surface or satin stitch is then worked smoothly and evenly across the padded foundation, each stitch lying close to the preceding one. Special attention must be given to the buttonholing, which finishes these embroidered garments, as if not closely and firmly embroidered the edges will fray, and embroidered lingerie instead of being things of beauty will soon become useless. These embroidered edges may be finished with a narrow lace; this helps to protect the edges.

No. 7010--Combination Corset Cover and Drawers, $1.25

No. 7009 is one of the popular one-piece or kimona night dress. These garments are easily made up after being embroidered, the only finish being the under-arm seams. The design may be worked in either solid padded embroidery or pierced eyelets.

Combination garments are now in such general use that every woman knows their advantages. No. 7010 is a combination corset cover and drawers. The present style of dress demands that as few under garments as possible shall be worn, and all unsightly ridges and bunches must disappear, so for this reason the combination garments have become popular.

No. 7009 shows a combination corset cover and skirt. This, too, is a favorite garment.

The umbrella drawers, No. 7008, are another garment which carry out the same embroidered design. Separate corset covers may be had to match this set. No. 5200 is another design, illustrated on a slip-over corset cover. These garments are now made in two pieces, consisting of a full front and a narrow back, the only making up these require is to have the under arm seamed, and they fasten on

No. 5200—Stamped Slipover Corset Cover, 30 cents

the shoulders. This corset cover has become one of the most popular styles, as they are easily made up.

If these articles cannot be obtained from your dealer, or for further information regarding any of the articles contained in these columns, address Belding Paul Corticelli Limited, Dept. L, Montreal.

THE kimono sleeve per se is by no means dead, no matter what some authorities say, but an improvement upon it is the long shoulder, with the sleeve joined below the shoulder in a fashion in vogue about six or seven years ago. This by a natural transition led to the fichu, and the latest Paris models have the drapery well over the shoulder to cover the top of the arm. In front some of the dresses have the regular fichu cross-over, but a great many end by being fastened under a big bow or tinsel ornament of some kind, just over the bust.

The collars of all kinds and the cross-over fronts are features of the coats for day and evening wear, and these will last well into the spring.

IF YOU WILL SEND US

— 35 CENTS —

we will send you

8 SKEINS OF EMBROIDERY SILK

which is sufficient to finish a

15 INCH CENTRE PIECE

which is stamped for

"THE NEW HEATHER EMBROIDERY"

This is the very latest embroidery which will be fashionable for 1912.

We will

SUPPLY FREE

sufficient lace to edge this Centre Piece, and the diagram enclosed will furnish full instructions for this beautiful embroidery which is simple but effective.

Send at once as this generous offer is made for a short period only.

Our Art Embroidery Silks are the best on the market.

Send 10 cents for a copy of Belding's Needle and Hook Book which contains all the latest suggestions for Art Embroidery. :: ::

Address

BELDING, PAUL, CORTICELLI LIMITED

Dept. L MONTREAL, P.Q.

Ontario Women's Institutes

GEORGE A. PUTNAM
SUPERINTENDENT
PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS, TORONTO

To Our Institute Friends

WE trust that all our readers were pleased with our "Convention Number," as we might call the January contents of this department. We should have liked to publish the papers in full, but that, of course, was impossible. The group photograph was an appreciated feature, and we are publishing in this issue also an Institute group. Most of the group photographs we have received have not been suitable for reproduction, but this one is so good that we are making it an exception.

Muskoka District Convention

THE first convention of Muskoka District was held in Bracebridge, on Wednesday, November 22nd. The day was a perfect one and the sleighing good, which, no doubt, helped toward the splendid attendance. About one hundred and fifty women were present, some of them having driven more than thirty miles to enjoy the convention.

Mrs. H. L. Goltz, of Bardsville, presided at the afternoon session, and gave the address of welcome, which was warm and sympathetic. The speaker referred to the spirit of the Institute as being one for mutual help in all questions relating to home life. Mrs. Goltz emphasized the fact that the wife should be a good helpmate to her husband, using all the resources at hand to the best advantage. She also spoke of the work which the Bardsville branch intended to undertake, viz., arranging for a rest room on the grounds of the fall fair, and serving lunch, with the particular thought of making a resting place for the mothers who came to the fair with children.

In replying to the address of welcome, Mrs. DeMaine, of Ashworth, stated that she believed that the convention would mark another step towards spreading knowledge of the Women's Institute. The delegates were meeting together to get fresh information and new ideas to take home to develop the local Institute. They had not yet grasped the real aim of our Institute work, nor had they attached a broad enough meaning to the motto, "For Home and Country." Mrs. DeMaine expressed the hope that they would go home with the thought of training their children in the very best way to make them good men and women.

Reports from the various branch Institutes were read. Baysville, Muskoka Falls, Sanford, Monck, Asplin, Ravenscliff and South Macaulay all brought very encouraging reports.

A paper by Mrs. J. Thompson, president of the W.C.T.U., was full of good thought and to hear it impressed one with the value of the work undertaken by that organization.

Mrs. T. M. Stewart, of Bobcaygeon, read a paper on "The Up-to-Date Homemaker." The home of to-day is in advance of that of our grandmothers. Work is made easier by labor-saving devices. The Women's Institute has for its end "home study," and the science taught is how to be up-to-date housekeepers and homemakers. Labor-saving devices are better investments than doctors' bills and rest cures. Mrs. Stewart's paper was bright and practical.

Miss S. Campbell, of Brampton, the lecturer sent to the convention by the Department of Agriculture, in her usual happy mood expressed her pleasure in addressing the convention. Miss Campbell made the statement that, while housekeeping is a fine art and should be well taught, the finest art is homemaking, and the sphere of every woman is the home. Home is a seed plot more important than the farm and care should be taken to sow the best seed. How many smiles and good manners are kept for company. What a mistake. Give them to the boys and girls, for nothing is too good for them. There is never a boy so bad but that there is some good in him, and, if we look for it, we will find it. Miss Campbell also expressed the belief that if we could have more of the old-fashioned hospitality in our homes, how much more cheerfulness there would be among us. If we would consider that what is good enough for the family is good enough for company, how many more hours we would have for rest, recreation and cultivation of the mind. Our lives would be filled with more knowledge and we would be better teachers, which is the calling of us all. Our Institute organization is a large school, with twenty thousand pupils. What a power these pupils could yield in the future, if properly trained. The speaker urged the importance of better sanitary conditions in the school buildings. With this improved condition the children would have a better opportunity to grow physically, mentally and morally strong, and health is conducive to happiness.

Miss Beaumont's paper on "Cheerfulness" was much enjoyed. A face that is good to look upon has real value, but a homely face too may carry a message of cheer and helpfulness because of the radiance within. There is great need for the cultivation of cheerfulness. Miss Beaumont emphasized the thought of the relation between cheerfulness and health.

Miss Fitzmaurice and Miss Galbraith added to the enjoyment of the afternoon by furnishing music, and before the session closed Miss Campbell gave the branch officers a few minutes' talk on how to make the meetings successful.

An interesting feature of this session was that three of those taking part in the programme were the grandmother, mother and daughter of the one family.

The evening session of the convention was presided over by Mrs. J. T. Galbraith, of Reay. The first address was given by Mr. Shannon, B.A,. who expressed himself as being honored by being asked to address the convention. He was glad to have the opportunity of speaking to the mothers and sisters of the school children, for with them lies the whole training of those children up to the time they enter the schools. The impressions gained in those years remain through life. If the child is kept at home until seven years of age, the moral character can be moulded in the right way, thus making a good foundation upon which to build. Mr. Shannon spoke a warning word against the exciting sports. Those who take a leading part in these sports are not usually at the head of the class. With the excitement of the game, before and after, the child is not able to concentrate his mind upon his studies. He would not for a moment debar sport from the life of the child, but would advise that it be taken in moderation.

Mrs. Stewart's paper on "Woman and Her Interests" was full of suggestion and was much appreciated.

Miss Campbell addressed the convention again, giving many good points and original ideas, brightening the whole with touches of humor. She referred again to the relation of the home and school, asking: "Why have better barns for our cattle than schools for our children?"

The music of Mrs. Fulton, Mrs. Holden and Mrs. Galbraith during the evening delighted those present. Mrs. Creasor's reading also added to the pleasure of the audience.

In moving a vote of thanks to Miss Campbell and others who had assisted with the programme, Mr. Thomas congratulated the Institutes upon the splendid attendance.

This convention, for system and good management, quite surpassed many where the women have had more advantages and privileges.

WOMEN'S INSTITUTE OF IRWIN CORNERS

A Good Suggestion

HERE is a letter containing a valuable hint. What man will be brave enough to send us an article on the proposed subject?

Dear Editor:

I have read with much pleasure the paper given by Mrs. Currie, of Owen Sound, on "Managing a Husband." I think it will be of benefit to many a young (and perhaps an occasional older) wife. It is so suggestive and quite amusing.

But what about the other side of the subject? Perhaps a member of the Farmers' Institute, who has been a success at "Managing a Wife," would give a paper on that subject at one of their meetings, which would be published and thereby be a benefit, and help some of the younger husbands with this important, yes, most important, part of married life.

A Subscriber.

The Alton Institute

OUR Institute was among those first organized. We have a membership of forty-one, which we consider very good, for we are surrounded by Institutes and our village is small.

We thought we would like to take up some special work outside of our regular monthly meetings. As we had a large number of young people, who seemed to have no place of amusement but the streets, a skating rink was suggested, and we decided to build an open-air rink, which would mean good healthy sport for all. We set about to raise the money necessary. First, we gave an ice cream social, a little later a corn social, then we canvassed the people. That, with a few donations, realized $395.00. We paid $50.00 for a piece of rough land in a good location for a rink, 160 ft. by 60 ft., paid for levelling, put a waiting room 35 ft. by 15 ft., a 6 ft. fence all around, lighted it with electric lights, and our rink was then ready for the ice.

We rented it for the season and felt more than repaid for all the work and worry in connection with it when we saw old and young enjoying one of Canada's grandest sports. When the season was over we decided to sell it. We sold to a reliable man, who has since put up a spectators' stand, and the rink promises to be even better this winter.

On October 31st we gave a Scotch social, realizing $51.00. On November 20th we had the well-known entertainer, Mr. J. W. Bengough, realizing $43. The question arose what to do with the money on hand? We wanted to use it to improve the village. As we had good pavements and electric lights, it was decided to buy a park. We bought 4¾ acres for $427. In buying this particular piece of land we had in mind the improving of our school grounds, as they join the other. The children will have plenty of room for their different games without fear of breaking the school windows. The land is surrounded by beautiful maples, which means considerable. We donated the park to the village on condition that they do the improving, such as levelling and attending to the fences. They have just paid out $200 for levelling, so our park has made very good progress. We feel quite proud of what we have done in a year. We are now going to see what can be done to improve our school. This has long been a vexed question to the mothers and seems a hard problem to handle, as the trustees do not want women interfering.

However, we are going to try and get things in a more sanitary condition for our children, and a woman on the school board, if possible, this year.

Wishing the readers of the JOURNAL a merry Xmas and a happy and prosperous New Year, I remain

Yours truly,
Mrs. Catherine Meek.

Secretary Alton Women's Institute.

This report is most interesting, and we are glad to publish it in full. We are sure that many Institutes will profit by the good work done in Alton and will "go and do likewise."

From Merrickville

THE November meeting of the Merrickville Women's Institute was attended by forty visitors and twenty-two members. According to our programme the answer to the roll call was a suggestion for a simple Christmas gift, and the subject for the paper was: "The True Spirit of Christmas Giving."

The paper stated that instead of making Christmas giving a game of reciprocity with much perplexity, or simply a social duty, it would be much better to look backward over the year and think of those who have real needs, who are suffering or lonely, and to whom a simple gift conveys a sentiment of the Christmas spirit that comforts and sustains.

"It is not the gift that is brought,
But the love that goes with the giving;
The remembrance and the thought
That fills the life with gladness
And the eyes with unshed tears;
That warms the coldest winter
Of the heart along the years."

The true spirit of giving is that the gift should represent something of more value than itself; that it should be an expression first of the giver's own joy in that which the season commemorates, and those of affection, or sympathy, unselfish interest or kindly thought. Christmas stands for more than the making of presents or giving of alms. It means self-service, it means sharing.

The paper in its entirety was excellent in its treatment of the subject.

Many of the members displayed the finished work that they would suggest as a simple Christmas gift. This work was arranged on one side of the hall under the emblems of Canada and the Empire. Some foreign work—Mexican drawn work, Japanese embroidery, Chinese girl's suit, Swiss wood carving, lace from Italy, crochet and embroidery from Ireland, etc., etc.—was arranged on the other side of the hall under the flag of the country from which it came.

Refreshments were served immediately after the programme, and afterwards the exhibit of work was examined at leisure.

Kaslo Fruit Fair

FROM Miss Mildred Twiss comes a report of a most successful and unusual fruit fair held at Kaslo, B.C., under the auspices of the Kaslo and District Women's Institute. Evidently, the West is living up to its golden opportunities, and we are sure that Easterners will be interested in this undertaking.

The local press says: "That Kaslo has held successful fairs in the past is a matter of history and congratulation, and that her fifth annual fruit fair has gone one better financially is a tribute to the careful manipulation of the funds under the auspices of the Women's Institute. After all expenses have been paid, it is found that they are four hundred and twenty-four dollars to the good, and the funds of the Institute have been enriched by exactly that amount. This undoubtedly makes that organization the wealthiest institution of the kind in British Columbia."

The prize list of this Fair shows that the Kaslo citizens must be possessed of a valuable public spirit. Fruit, vegetables, flowers, home baking, dairy produce, jams and jellies, needlework, laundry, art, music and drama were all represented on the committees. We shall be glad to hear from Kaslo again.

One Year's Work

FROM the Whitby Branch comes a paper, with the above title, by Mrs. J. B. Powell, which will interest many Institutes.

We are standing on the threshold,
We are in the opened door,
We are treading in a broader land
We've never trod before.

Another year is opening, and Another year has gone;
We have passed the darkness of the night,
We are in the early morn.

We have left the field behind us,
O'er which we scattered seed;
We pass into the future,
Which none of us can read.

Then hasten to fresh labor,
To thresh, and reap, and sow,
Then bid the New Year welcome,
And let the old year go.

Another year of history in our Institute has been made, and we may ask ourselves: "Has the branch to which we belong measured up to the requirements and possibilities of the work?"

The large membership of the province proclaims that the wives and daughters have banded themselves together into one great force, which says, with no uncertain sound, that, as an organization and as individuals, we will do our part to maintain the high moral standards of Ontario homes, to broaden the opportunities for helpful and pure sociability among the women of our land, to furnish means and opportunities for intellectual improvement, to make less burdensome the duties which come to the woman in the home, and to do our part to enable our fellow creatures to get the most out of this life, and to inspire them to accept the responsibilities which are theirs as citizens of this fair country—in a word, to make home and community life more attractive and more elevating.

If our work is to be of permanent value, we must engage in useful activity. Let us be more faithful to our branch, for that is where our work lies. Let us attend the meetings and bear our share of the responsibility. It is individual work, personal effort, that is most effective; individual faithfulness from each and every member.

I wonder if we are more loyal women because of our motto, "For Home and Country." I wonder if we are more loyal to our homes. Are we more helpful, more loving, more self-denying, and more necessary to those with whom we come in contact? Are we doing our work in the broadest sense, putting the cause before all other interests? And then, are we more loyal to our country? You and I have a part to play in making this beautiful land, which we call home, and which we expect great things of in the future, in making it to be the great land we want it to be. We must be loyal always.

Future Canada is rocking in the cradles of our homes. The boy or the girl who goes out from your home, we should teach to be honest, faithful, upright and true, and the influence they exert upon the future life of our country is the atmosphere which is created in and through the home, yours and mine.

A prominent man was heard to make this statement: "Looking back over the years of my life, I believe I owe whatever good is in me in a very great measure, if not altogether, to the influences of three good women, a loving mother, a good, kind sister, and a faithful, devoted wife." Every woman stands in one of these relations, and what a power is hers! We have twenty thousand of these women in our Institutes in Ontario. Let us see to it that ever and always our influence, whether great or small, is cast on the side of right and goodness and purity.

Has the year which is drawing to a close been one of usefulness and activity? Can we look backward with rejoicing and look forward with hope to the work of the coming year? We hold with reluctant, clinging hands to the robes of the receding year, loath to say

Save One Dollar, Lose Two

¶ Isn't that just about the size of it—when something shoddy and cheap is foisted on you in place of the

DE LAVAL CREAM SEPARATOR

¶ You see, the early disability of the shoddy thing, and poor performance while it does hang together, makes it a losing proposition no matter how cheap.

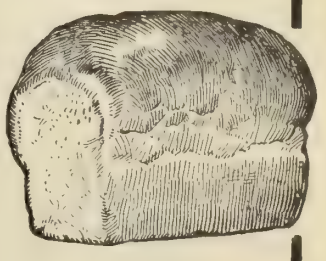
The De Laval for satisfaction.

¶ Send for beautifully illustrated catalog.

Agents everywhere.

The De Laval Separator Co.
173-177 Williams St.
MONTREAL
VANCOUVER—WINNIPEG

You will be proud of the bread you'll make with PURITY FLOUR



AFTER seeing a batch of big, gold n-crusted, snowy white loaves, that you have baked from PURITY FLOUR, you will, indeed, be proud of your cooking-ability—and proud of your wisdom in deciding to pay the little extra it costs to procure such high-class flour. You will admit, too, that we are justified in the pride we take in milling this superb flour.

PURITY FLOUR

"More bread and better bread"

PURITY FLOUR is milled exclusively from the best Western hard wheat—the world's finest. More than that, PURITY FLOUR consi ts entirely of the high-grade portions of the wheat. The low-grade portions are separated and excluded during the PURITY process of milling. Such high-class flour, of course, expands more in the baking. It makes "more bread and better bread."

It makes lighter, flakier pastry, too, if you just take the precaution to add more shortening. On account of its unusual strength PURITY FLOUR, for best results, requires more shortening than ordinary flour.

Progressive dealers, everywhere, sell PURITY FLOUR and take pride in recommending it.

Add PURITY FLOUR to your grocery list right now. 106

125 Egg Incubator and Brooder $10 BOTH FOR
If ordered together.
Freight paid east of Rockies. Hot water, copper tanks, double walls, double glass doors. Free catalog describes them. Send for it today.
(11)
Wisconsin Incubator Co.,
Box 79 Racine, Wis.

Spare Time Earnings
$400.00 A YEAR
15 Subscriptions secured each week will pay you more than any (except the best) stenographers receive.
CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

The Rayo Lamp

It Never Flickers

The long winter evenings give a woman a splendid chance for sewing or embroidery; but her eyes suffer from the strain unless she has a good light.

The Rayo is the best lamp made.

It gives a strong, diffused light that is remarkably easy to the eyes. There is no glare to it; no flicker. It lights up a whole room. The Rayo is an economical lamp, too.

You get the most possible light-value for the oil burned; and the Rayo itself is a low-priced lamp. Yet it is a handsome lamp—an ornament to any room in the house

The Rayo Lamp is easily lighted without removing shade or chimney; easy to clean and rewick. Made of solid brass, nickel-plated; also in numerous other styles and finishes.

Ask your dealer to show you his line of Rayo Lamps; or write for descriptive circular to any agency of

The Imperial Oil Co., Limited The Queen City Oil Co., Limited

Such a good Soup.

"Remember my face—you'll see me again."

Such a little price.

Such a thick, nourishing, strengthening soup is Edwards'; so small is the cost that everyone can well afford it.

Edwards' Soup is prepared from specially selected beef and the finest vegetables that Irish soil can produce. It comes to you all ready for the saucepan. The cook will find Edwards' Soup a great help in the kitchen. It goes with lots of things that aren't as tasty by themselves; it strengthens her own soups and there's double the variety in the menu when Edwards' Soup is on the pantry-shelf.

Buy a packet to-day.

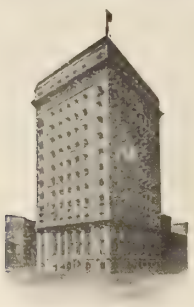
EDWARDS' DESICCATED SOUP

5c. per packet.

Edwards' desiccated Soup is made in three varieties—Brown, Tomato, White. The Brown variety is a thick, nourishing soup prepared from best beef and fresh vegetables. The other two are purely vegetable soups.

Edwards' desiccated Soup is made in Ireland by Irish labour. There, and in England it is a household word.

1203 E.H.E.



Immediate Cash

Is essential in case of death. A man will save his wife a lot of unnecessary trouble by opening a joint account of $200, or more, to be used only in case of great emergency. All moneys in an account of this kind earn interest at 3%, compounded semi-annually, and are payable to the survivor without any expense or delay. 612

Head Office . TORONTO

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS
$6,650,000

TOTAL ASSETS
$50,000,000

The Traders Bank of Canada

INCORPORATED 1885

113 BRANCHES THROUGHOUT CANADA

farewell to our departing friend, yet reaching out with eager, yearning fingers to clasp the hand of the new and untried future, with its possibilities all before us, with its duties, and its pleasures all unknown to us. Another year untried, unproved before us lies. We hail with smiles its dawning. How shall we meet its final day?

Love of God and love of country are the two noblest passions in a human heart, and these two unite in our motto. A man without a country is an exile in the world, and a man without God is an orphan in eternity.

Carlyle says: "We cannot move a step on the earth without finding some duty to be done, and that every one is useful to mankind by the very fact of his existence." How many open doors then invite us as we go through life? The work is abundant, and strength will be provided for the willing gleaners.

February Meetings

WE have pleasure in announcing lady delegates for Institute meetings to be held as indicated in the following list. The Institutes concerned have been asked to arrange for a separate session for ladies in the afternoon, and the custom is for the Farmers' and Women's Institute to join forces for the evening meetings. It is to be hoped that the members will show a deep interest in the meetings, not only by attending, but by inviting others to go with them.

THE MEETINGS ARE FREE TO ALL.

Space will not permit an announcement of subjects for each speaker. We wish to state, however, that the Department has been fortunate in securing a capable, enthusiastic band of workers for the winter series, and the work to be taken up will be found of general interest to home-makers, whether they live in the country, village, town, or city.

BRANT, NORTH.—Miss A. M. Hotson, Parkhill.—Glenmorris, Feb. 14; Oak Park, Feb. 15; White's, Feb. 16; Middleport, Feb. 17; Langford, Feb. 19.

BRANT, SOUTH.—Mrs. F. W. Watts, Clinton.—Ohsweken, Feb. 24; Burtch, Feb. 26; Falkland Feb. 27; Cathcart, Feb. 28; New Durham, Feb. 29.

BRUCE, CENTRE.—Mrs. W. B. Ferguson Strathroy.—Bervie, Feb. 7; Kincardine, Feb. 8; Reed's Corners, Feb. 9; Ripley, Feb. 10.

BRUCE, SOUTH.—Miss B. Gilholm, Bright.—Mildmay, Feb. 15; Belmore, Feb. 16; Lucknow, Feb. 17; Holyrood, Feb. 19.

DUNDAS.—Miss M. V. Powell, Whitby.—Mountain, Feb. 16; Morewood, Feb. 17;

DURHAM, EAST.—Mrs. W. W. Farley, Smithfield.—Bailleboro, Feb. 12; Millbrook, Feb. 12.

ESSEX, NORTH.—Mrs. W. J. Hunter, Brampton.—Oldcastle, Feb. 1.

Miss Ethel Robson, Ilderton.—South Woodslee, Feb. 17; Maidstone, Feb. 19; Canard, Feb. 20; Tecumseh, Feb. 21; Bell River, Feb. 22; Stoney Point, Feb. 23

ESSEX, SOUTH.—Mrs. W. J. Hunter, Pleasant.—Harrow, Feb. 2.

Miss Ethel Robson, Ilderton.—Leamington, Feb. 12; Kingsville, Feb. 13; Cottam, Feb. 14; Exsse, Feb. 15; Malden, Feb. 16.

GLENGARRY.—Miss M. V. Powell, Whitby.—Martintown, Feb. 6; Maxville, Feb. 7; Glen Robertson, Feb. 8.

GRENVILLE, SOUTH.—Miss M. V. Powell, Whitby.—Spencerville, Feb. 19; Algonquin, Feb. 20.

GREY, SOUTH.—Miss B. Gilholm, Bright.—Elmwood, Feb. 9; Dornoch, Feb. 10; Holstein Feb. 12; Dromore, Feb. 13; Ayton, Feb. 14.

HALDIMAND.—Mrs. F. W. Watts, Clinton.—Springvale, Feb. 15; Circleville, Feb. 16; Nanticoke, Feb. 17; Erie, Feb. 19; Kohler, Feb. 20; Rainham, Centre, Feb. 21; S. Cayuga, Feb. 22; York, Feb. 23.

HASTINGS, EAST.—Mrs. W. W. Farley, Smithfield.—Melrose, Feb. 14; Claize's School House, Feb. 15.

HASTINGS, WEST.—Mrs. W. W. Farley, Smithfield.—Wallbridge, Feb. 28; Frankford, Feb. 29.

FRONTENAC, CENTRE.—Miss M. V. Powell. Whitby.—Mt. Grove, Feb. 15.

HURON, EAST.—Mrs. M. L. Woelard, Toronto.—Belgrave, Feb. 19; Harlock, Feb. 20; Winthrop, Feb. 21; Walton, Feb. 22; Moncrief, Feb. 23; Ethel, Feb. 24; Molesworth, Feb. 26; Jamestown, Feb. 27; Bluevale, Feb. 28; Fordwich, Feb. 29.

HURON, WEST.—Mrs. M. L. Woelard, Toronto.—Londesboro, Feb. 17.

KENT, EAST.—Mrs. E. B. McTurk, Lucan.—Highgate, Feb. 19; Ridgetown, Feb. 20; Thamesville, Feb. 21; Botany, Feb. 22; Wabash, Feb. 23.

LAMBTON, EAST.—Mrs. W. J. Hunter, Pleasant.—Wyoming, Feb. 13; Watford, Feb. 14; Warwick, Feb. 15; Uttoxeter, Feb. 16; Camlachie, Feb. 17; Forest, Feb. 19; Arkona, Feb. 20; Thedford, Feb. 21.

LAMBTON, WEST.—Mrs. W. J. Hunter, Pleasant.—Wilkesport, Feb. 6; Rutherford, Feb. 7; Oakdale, Feb. 8; Oil Springs, Feb. 9; Colinville Feb. 10; Courtwright, Feb. 12.

LINCOLN.—Mrs. H. W. Parsons, Forest.—Beamsville, Feb. 9; Jordan, Feb. 10; Grantham, Feb. 12; Virgil, Feb. 13.

MIDDLESEX, EAST.—Mrs. D. McTavish, Port Elgin.—Wellburn, Feb. 16.

MIDDLESEX, NORTH.—Mrs. W. J. Hunter, Pleasant.—Ailsa Craig, Feb. 22; Beechwood, Feb. 23; Coldstream, Feb. 24; Komoka, Feb. 26.

MONCK.—Mrs. H. W. Parsons, Forest.—Marshville, Feb. 22; Byng, Feb. 23; Attercliffe Station, Feb. 24; Wellandport, Feb. 26; Smithville, Feb. 27.

NORTHUMBERLAND, EAST.—Miss Susie Campbell, Brampton.—Warkworth, Feb. 22; Codrington, Feb. 23; Menie, Feb. 24.

NORTHUMBERLAND, WEST.—Miss Susie Campbell, Brampton.—Grafton, Feb. 16; Baltimore, Feb. 17; Roseneath, Feb. 19; Harwood, Feb. 20; Coldspring, Feb. 21.

ONTARIO, NORTH.—Mrs. W. W. Farley, Smithfield.—Goodwood, Feb. 5; Altona, Feb. 6.

ONTARIO, SOUTH.—Mrs. W. W. Farley, Smithfield.—Claremount, Feb. 7; Whitevale, Feb. 8; Kinsale, Feb. 9; Pickering, Feb. 10.

Miss A. M. Hotson, Parkhill.—Port Perry, Feb. 1; Greenbank, Feb. 2.

OXFORD, NORTH.—Mrs. D. McTavish, Port Elgin.—Innerkip, Feb. 5; Plattsville, Feb. 6; Cassell, Feb. 7; Hickson, Feb. 8; Braemar, Feb. 9; Embro, Feb. 10; Harrington, Feb 12; Lakeside, Feb. 13; Kintore, Feb. 14; Thamesford Feb. 15.

OXFORD, SOUTH.—Mrs. F. W. Watts, Clinton.—Burgessville, Feb. 1; Currie, Feb. 2; Beachville Feb. 3; North Oxford, Feb. 5; Foldens, Feb. 6; Springford, Feb. 7; Brownsville, Feb. 8.

PERTH, NORTH.—Mrs. M. N. Norman, Toronto.—Gowanstown, afternoon, Feb. 9; Britton, evening, Feb. 9; Carthage, Feb. 10; Milverton, Feb. 12; Monckton, Feb. 13; Rostock, Feb. 14; Kinkora, Feb. 15; Shakespeare, Feb. 16.

PERTH, SOUTH.—Mrs. M. N. Norman, Toronto.—Tavistock, Feb. 17; St. Pauls, Feb. 19; Sebringville, Feb. 20; Fullarton, Feb. 21; Staffa, Feb. 22; Kirkton, Feb. 23.

PETERBORO, EAST.—Mrs. W. W. Farley, Smithfield.—Warsaw, Feb. 26.

PETERBORO, WEST.—Mrs. W. Farley, Smithville. Lakefield ,Feb. 24.

VICTORIA, EAST.—Mrs. W. W. Farley, Smithfield.—Fenelon Falls, Feb. 21; Bobcaygeon, Feb. 22.

WELLAND.—Mrs. H. W. Parsons, Forest.—South End, Feb. 14; Allanburg, Feb. 15; Quaker Road, Feb. 16; Crowland, Feb. 17; Stevensville, Feb. 19; Brookfield Station, Feb. 20; Bowen Road, Feb. 21.

UNION.—Mrs. M. N. Norman, Toronto.—Clifford, Feb. 5; Lakelet, Feb. 6; Drew, Feb. 7; Teviotdale, Feb. 8.

WENTWORTH, NORTH.—Mrs. H. W. Parsons, Forest.—Sheffield, Feb. 28; Kirkwall, Feb. 29; Westover, Mar. 1; Carlisle, Mar. 2; Millgrove, Mar. 4.

WENTWORTH, SOUTH.—Mrs. H. W. Parsons, Forest.—Jerseyville, Feb. 1; Glanford, Feb. 2; Carluke, Feb. 3; Hannon, Feb. 5; Binbrook, Feb. 6; Tapleytown, Feb. 7; Winona, Feb. 8.

YORK, EAST.—Mrs. W. W. Farley, Smithfield.—Agincourt, Feb. 2; Stouffville, Feb. 3.

Household Emergencies

IN order to meet intelligently emergencies of various kinds, there must be, first, previous knowledge, said Miss Alice Ferguson, of King. The knowledge of what to do—when something must be done quickly—does not come to us in the moment, but our brain thinks back to some knowledge gained previously, and we proceed to put that acquired knowledge into practice. Therefore, we should seek to acquire all proper knowledge, for it may do great things for us some day, when we least expect it. It may save us and others from an embarrassing situation, or it may even save life. In the second place, it is necessary to have made previous provision. The guest who comes unexpectedly at meal time, need not give us cause for worry if we have provided beforehand fruit and vegetables, etc. "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" simply added more water to the potato soup, thus supplying a plate of soup for the unexpected guest. We would probably have added milk, but she gave what she had, and all with the grace of hospitality, that made even watery soup delicious. So when the guests come, welcome or unwelcome, if there are canned vegetables in the cellar and canned fruit, and a well-cured ham somewhere in hiding, with pickles and good bread and butter, this knowledge, and the ability to prepare these foods properly will make the meal a pleasant one, and the guest will feel at ease. Hospitality without grudging will make the simplest meal a banquet. Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith.

When an accident happens, it gives little or no warning, but occurs in the least expected manner. You may be well and whole one moment, and laid up with a broken bone the next; you may make a laughing remark one minute and be dancing about with a badly burned or scalded hand or foot the next. No time to hunt up medical books for information; you must act, and act quickly. Here knowledge is power. In the case of the broken bone, while waiting for the doctor, bathe with hot water and keep down the swelling, for should it swell, there will be difficulty in setting the fracture. In the case of a bad burn or scald, baking soda is usually at hand, cover the burned or scalded place with the powdered soda, cover with a damp clean white cloth, over this a layer of absorbent cotton or cotton batting, and bind the whole gently with a bandage. Or a cloth soaked in coal oil will do, but the soda is better. Use this till carron oil or a special ointment for burns can be obtained. The main thing is to cover the burned surface from the air as quickly as possible.

Then there is the case of bleeding. Now do not faint, but wash off the bloody surface, so as to see the extent of the injury. If it is a deep cut, roll up a piece of clean cotton into a hard lump and press into the cut, over that a larger piece of cotton folded, and over that still a larger piece, thus making a compress, and bind this on with a bandage as tightly as possible. If it looks as though an artery has been severed, tie tightly a bandage above the wound if it be on arm or leg, thus stopping the flow of blood on the way from the heart through the limb. If it is a simple case of nose bleeding, of course you may tie a cord around the little finger, or apply a cold key to the back of the neck, or press a pencil or tight roll of paper under the upper lip, up against a blood vessel that runs to the nostril, but a surer method is to have the patient hold his or her hands above the head, or have someone do it for him, or apply pieces of ice to nose—we used to apply a snowball in our schooldays—or snuff up a solution of alum and water.

When a bee or other stinging insect stings us, a mud poultice is easily prepared, but bathing it with a lotion of baking soda and water will kill the poison of the sting, and reduce the swelling. When a person gets a black eye or a bruise on any part, it may be relieved by the application of cold water, ice water or pieces of ice in a cloth applied to the bruise. Or you may have in your home drug box a bottle of witch hazel or some such preparation for such a purpose.

When baby begins to writhe in convulsions, place it quickly in a hot bath, testing the heat with your elbow. Sponge it well over, bathing thoroughly, then dry quickly, and roll in a blanket. Give the child another convulsion by administering a dose of castor oil. If the child becomes croupy, give the hot bath, as in the case of convulsions, then rub the throat well outside with goose oil and turpentine. If relief does not come quickly, apply a sponge wrung out of hot water, to the front of the throat.

When a lady faints, lay her out straight on her back, relieve all tight places in her dress and collar and waist. If necessary, dash cold water over her face, or carefully hold a bottle of spirits of ammonia to the nose, and chafe the hands. If she does not recover, try artificial respiration by working the arms. And so on, down the list of creature complaints, it is the knowledge of first aid to the wounded that counts. Some time ago we read in the papers of a woman who, with her husband, lived a couple of hundred miles from a doctor or hospital. The woman took ill, her husband diagnosed her case as appendicitis, and as the only chance of saving her life, he operated on her himself, then by canoe, or carrying her as best he could, he made his way with her to the nearest hospital, and the last reports were that she was doing well. Had that man not had some knowledge of the location of the appendix and knowledge of how to sterilize his rude instruments and some idea of surgery, he must have seen his wife die, without being able to relieve her sufferings. His previous knowledge put into practice saved her life. That man was a hero. Most of us who are used to driving horses, have had accidents sometimes—harness breaking or something like that. A knowledge of how that harness is put together is quite as necessary as the knowledge of how to drive a horse. A man in his wonderful pockets usually has a knife and a string, and can readily adjust the harness. A woman may have to resort to using a shoe lace or even a suspender, but she can usually find a way out of the difficulty, providing either the horse or she herself, does not lose its, or her head.

That brings me to the last point. In all case of emergencies—keep cool—keep your head—that is the part that will guide fingers presently. The person who has the previous knowledge is likely to be the self-possessed person, and the one to be relied upon to help out of the difficulty. We women often have to do things we otherwise would not have to do, because a man is not around at the right time, but if we are women of resource, with plenty of practical knowledge stored away in our heads, and a fair amount of strength, we can meet and overcome any emergency that may arise, however difficult it may appear.

Music in the Home

MRS. JOSEPHINE M. SCRATCH, of Kingsville, contributes an interesting article on the above subject, from which we make the following extracts:

Now that music has become a real factor in education, a force in the psychic world, and a moral agency, it behooves us to give its influence a more careful consideration than was afforded it in past years, when we looked upon it as an accomplishment to be taken or left, as suited the individual. The change in the viewpoint, perhaps, is the outgrowth of a better understanding of what music really stands for in the soul's life. So much has been written of music as a therapeutic agency, that I will not touch upon it in the broader sense, except where it indirectly touches my topic.

The home is merely a collection of human beings, subject to the same needs as affect the world at large. In all the progressive insane asylums of the world, music is employed as an agency of healing mental ills. In the sanitariums devoted merely to broken-down nerves it plays a prominent part in the treatment. And can we question its value? Who of us that will not vouch for the effects upon our mental conditions of the stirring excitement of the French "Marseillaise," the exquisite joy of the "Spring Song," and the majestic sorrow of Chopin's "Funeral March?" A great artist once declared that music had saved him from a breakdown, which would have been the natural outcome of his own work, long hours and irregular life. We have Martin Luther as authority for saying, "Music came from heaven, and would be found in heaven again." From out of every personal experience I am sure there will flash forth the memory of some mood, grave or gay, that was either produced or dispelled by the power of music.

The ancients comprehended this fact, and made the sounding of brass and tinkling of cymbals a salient feature of their victorious jubilees. In the earliest remains of prehistoric races we have found traces of musical instruments, and music plays no mean part in the folklore of the most primitive people. If, then, and the proof would make it seem so, music is a necessity to the emotional life of the world, can we ignore its need in the little world we lovingly call home?

Were I asked which could best be spared from the modern home, delicate food, or the same money expended to producing good music, I think I would take the part against the food. We know that the body needs less than we give it to be well and vigorous. We know that the soul of the average man or woman is starving for the thing it needs for growth and development.

No one questions the need of air and sunlight and beauty, as it comes to us in God's great out-of-doors, and yet we are all full of questions as to the need of the thing which is the essence of moonlight, sunlight and beauty—the voice of God when He talks to His children, the best legacy to a world that needs solace, and faith, and hope.

I can sooner imagine a life shut away from all light, and therein finding peace and delight, than I can imagine a world soundless, musicless and happy.

But perhaps someone reminds me that the deaf are happy. Yes—but they certainly possess the sense of rhythm. Have you ever seen a roomful of mutes dancing? The perfect time, the visible delight, and oneness with the orchestra; through other channels of communication, we get the sound, but the music nevertheless has entered and possessed their souls.

To bring it to a perfectly practical basis: The great fight of the thinking world of to-day lies between two forces that threaten the home life of the world: individualism and commercialism. Individualism, its opponents tell us, is at war with all authority which would silence the ego.

Simple obedience to authority it abhors. With a son growing into manhood, a mother meets with many problems of life. How can she keep him at home, when the long winter evenings offer him charm elsewhere; where will come the influence to bind the discordant strings of his being and make them respond to the highest within him? Where, indeed, if not by the power of music. It is a source of cheerfulness in the life of the brain fagged, a possibilitv of health to the overwrought, and an influence of refinement that has no limit.

Commercialism is the sordid instinct which weighs only the money value; the thing must be worth while, of value received.

Music is the antithesis of this widespread human instinct. By this counteracting influence the soul is fed, even in the atmosphere of a home controlled by greed, and, wherever the soul is fed, who shall say that a man is not saved?

Come again, Pie Time, and often.
For wholesome, digestible "eats" —give us PIE.
At its very best wrapped in a FIVE ROSES crust.
Upsets Pie Prejudice without upsetting the Eater's Insides—FIVE ROSES flour.
Great for Pie Crust — top and bottom.
And Puff Paste and Difficult Things.
Close-grained — melting — even textured.
Flaky, too, and crinkly — crisp yet tender.
Put into your bake things the rare nutlike sweetness of Manitoba wheat kernels.
All soppy with the rich red juice of the cherry—or lemon pie—or apple—or healthy custard—meat, may be, or mince—
Put the FIVE ROSES "crust end" about 'em.
See the hungry wedges fade behind busy milk teeth.
At Pie Time—
Use FIVE ROSES. 7

Five Roses Flour

Not Bleached LAKE OF THE WOODS MILLING COMPANY KEEWATIN TRADE MARK REGISTERED Not Blended

LAKE OF THE WOODS MILLING COMPANY, LIMITED MONTREAL

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Royal Vinolia Soap

SUPREME IN QUALITY, PURITY AND FRAGRANCE. CONTAINS NO ANIMAL FAT. YIELDS AN EXQUISITELY SOFT AND LUXURIOUS LATHER, SOOTHING AND BENEFICIAL TO THE SKIN.

THE MATERIALS FROM WHICH WE MAKE ROYAL VINOLIA SOAP ARE WHOLLY VEGETABLE—A WHITE CAKE OF REFINED AND BEAUTIFUL DESIGN. NOTHING QUITE LIKE IT HAS BEEN PRODUCED BEFORE.

Price 15c. a cake, or 3 cakes in exquisite carton for 35c.
SOLD BY ALL GOOD DRUGGISTS.

VINOLIA COMPANY LIMITED BY APPOINTMENT Soapmakers to H.M. The King LONDON, PARIS TORONTO

128

A PROPER PRIDE IN YOUR APPEARANCE shows itself in the care taken with all the details of your toilet

The awkward attempts of many women to conceal their hands would be unnecessary if they used manicuring preparations and tools. Beautiful nails are the best adornment your hands can have. Lustr-ite supplies all that is necessary to obtain them.

LUSTR-ITE

How long will it take to ruin your hair when you lose great quantities of it every time you comb?

PALMER'S Hair Tonic

50c. and $1.00 sizes, will effectually stop that loss, and promote a vigorous, healthy growth. Healthy hair cannot be imitated or replaced. Palmer's Hair Tonic contains no dye

Isn't it better to remove impurities from your skin than to try to cover them up?

DAGGETT & RAMSDELL'S PERFECT COLD CREAM

carefully massaged into your face, neck, arms and bust, will clean out the pores, purify and bring back the bright, healthy glow, and generally refresh you.

At most dealers in Toilet Requisites, or for six cents (6c.) in stamps (to defray packing and postage) we will send you a sample package of Daggett & Ramsdell's Perfect Cold Cream, and Lustr-ite nail preparations, together with booklets containing information of great interest to you.

J. PALMER & SON, Limited, 5 and 7 De Bresoles St., Montreal

Webb's

Chocolates

for people who want the best

THE
Harry Webb Co., Limited
TORONTO, CAN.

Baby's Own Soap

unequalled for toilet and nursery use.
"Best for baby—best for you."
Refuse all substitutes.

Albert Soaps Limited
Mfrs., Montreal.
1511

DYEING BUT NOT DEAD

LADIES of refinement and culture know that fine gowns add lustre of youth to the appearance.

FINE gowns and everyday dresses cost money, but the life of a costume may be doubled by proper care.

PROPER care includes timely cleaning or dyeing before the stains become ingrained.

WE are alone in guaranteeing a jet black on Raw or Pongee Silk.

OUT of City orders as cheap as city trade we pay express.

WILLOW PLUMES made from your old feathers.
$3.00 to $8.00

Write for price list and advice.

RELIABLE AGENTS WANTED IN EVERY TOWN

SINCLAIR DYE WORKS
656 College St. - Toronto, Ont.
Phone Coll. 621.

The Influence of Readers

A post card came in yesterday, "Kindly send me sample copy of Canadian Home Journal and terms of subscription. I have never seen a copy, but I heard some people discussing one of the items published. I did not know there was such a magazine in Canada." We send hundreds of free sample copies on such requests as these. Will every Journal reader make a New Year's resolution that when she learns a friend does not know the Journal she will tell her to write for a sample, or send us lists of names of those she thinks do not know the Journal.

January 8, 1912 CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Canadian Girls' Club

A COLUMN OF LETTERS

IF you were interested in seeing the JOURNAL succeed, if you wanted to earn some pin money, and if you knew some ladies whom you thought probably didn't know of the Journal, or had not given it full consideration, then you would naturally write to the secretary for information about the Canadian Girls' Club, a club of girls from all over Canada who are doing just that kind of work.

Then, if your application had been gladly accepted, if perhaps, you felt a personal interest in the secretary, if you had earned more pin money than you hoped for, if you had raised the number of JOURNAL subscribers in your town from five or six to fifty or sixty, wouldn't you feel very much elated? And as the secretary is so interested in each member of the Club, you can believe that she is very much pleased to get such letters as these, and to publish those which are not too personal.

"Dear Friend:

Thanks very much for the express order which came yesterday. I am glad that I joined the Club. I always praised the JOURNAL, but the pocket money I earned and the success of the club have been the incentives to real work. I am going to help you all I can.

Very truly,
F. M."

"Dear Secretary:

One member has much thanks to give you. I wanted so much to earn some pocket money to spend on the foolish things for which I didn't like to spend father's money. Mother needed my help at home, still I had lots of leisure time. Then I joined the club, and it has meant pocket money, exercise, social interest, and a new feeling toward life. Much success to you.

Sincerely,
L. R."

"Dear Friend Secretary:

Really, haven't you overpaid me. That seems too much for the work I have done. I was surprised when I started to find so many people did not know we had a Canadian magazine like the JOURNAL. I had a regular harvest. Nearly every day I meet some of my subscribers who tell me how pleased they are with it, so I am looking forward to the easiest money I ever earned when I go for renewals.

Yours sincerely,
R. N."

"Dear Secretary:

Probably I have gone further than most of the members, partly because I needed the money and partly because I like the JOURNAL and the work. I started, as I suppose, hundreds of the members have done, to get subscriptions just from acquaintances and friends. But I found that Canadians everywhere could be interested so quickly in a Canadian magazine, that everywhere the JOURNAL worker was received so cordially, and the money returns so satisfactory that I now get subscriptions wherever I find a woman who reads.

The JOURNAL is certainly the coming magazine. Wishing the club every success.

N. A."

"Dear Club Secretary:

All hail to the Girls' Club. It fills a long-felt want and a very empty purse. In ye olden days when I needed $2.00 for this, and $2.50 for something else, I saved it dime by dime. Nowadays, I go and visit a few acquaintances who haven't subscribed to the JOURNAL. I know everyone in town, so as rapidly as my finances require renewing, you may expect subscriptions until everyone in town knows the JOURNAL. I am certainly proud of our JOURNAL and delighted with its growth in these past two years.

A Hustling Member."

Just before Christmas many JOURNAL readers found that their funds on hand and the total of expenses for gifts and entertainments and such like didn't balance by some dollars. So lots of them turned to the "Girls' Club." That the club helped many of them is shown by the letters the secretary is beginning to receive even so early in the month, as I must write this to get it in an early form.

"Dear Secretary:

Indeed I don't know what I should have done without the money I earned in the Club. Several small brothers and sisters certainly would have had a much less enjoyable Christmas. It was a lucky day for me when I picked up the copy of the JOURNAL and read your Girl's Club column, and I wish you all luck too.

Yours very truly,
B. H."

There are many, too many towns and villages in Canada where no member of the Girls' Club is taking advantage of the opportunity to make money and to help the JOURNAL. Will you join the Canadian Girls' Club?

Very sincerely,
SECRETARY.
Canadian Girls' Club,
Canadian Home Journal,

INATTENTION and INDIFFERENCE to the needs of the skin, scalp, hair and complexion are oftentimes the cause of much self-recrimination. Less than half-an-hour daily devoted to the care or betterment of the skin and hair will reward every woman who does it. You ask, What shall I do and how shall I do it?

☛ SUBMIT YOUR CASE TO US AND WE WILL ADVISE YOU CANDIDLY, CONSCIENTIOUSLY AND CONFIDENTIALLY.

PRINCESS SKIN FOOD

is one of the choicest unguents for the skin. Composed of the most fattening oils and albuminous compounds it feeds and nourishes the cellular glands and tissues and restores flabby flesh and muscles. It removes lines and wrinkles; is beneficial for scars and pockmarks, and it will make a thin face round and plump. Price, $1.50, postpaid. Sample and Booklet "H" mailed free.

If your face is disfigured by a growth of moles, warts or red veins, we can correct the trouble by our reliable and antiseptic method of electrolysis. Satisfaction assured.

Superfluous Hair

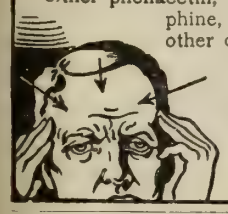
Hiscott Dermatological Institute
61 College Street, Toronto
Established 20 Years

You cannot afford brain-befogging headaches.

Na-Dru-Co Headache Wafers

stop them in quick time and clear your head. They do not contain either phenacetin, acetanilid, morphine, opium or any other dangerous drug. 25c. a box at your Druggist's.



National Drug and Chemical Co. of Canada, Limited.
128

DOMINION EXPRESS Money Orders

and Foreign Cheques are payable all over the World.

They may be sent in payment of produce, tax, gas and electric light bills, interest on notes and mortgages, insurance premiums, subscriptions to newspapers and magazines, and in fact in payment of all kinds of accounts, whether in or out of town.

We give you a receipt and if the remittance goes astray in the mails,

we refund your money or issue a new order free of charge.

TRAVELLERS' CHEQUES ISSUED.
MONEY SENT BY TELEGRAPH AND CABLE.

When purchasing Goods by mail, ALWAYS remit by

DOMINION EXPRESS CO. MONEY ORDERS

RATES FOR MONEY ORDERS:

$ C. AND UNDER		CENTS
OVER $. TO	$10.	"
" 10. "	20.	10 "
" 20. "	30.	15 "

AGENCIES THROUGHOUT CANADA.

"BLOW, blow, thou winter wind!" is the cheerful refrain of one of Shakespeare's daintiest songs. If Shakespeare had been a woman, he would never have allowed a character, however robust, to utter such sentiments. The winter wind is all very well in moderation, but, when it makes up its mind to a good hard blow, it is no friend to any woman. It is not necessary to abstain from winter sports, on this account, for, with ordinary precautions, the complexion may be protected.

There are women who make certain rules and adhere to them slavishly, without the slightest regard for exceptional cases or occasions. For instance, there is Bertha Crawford, who has made a rule to go for a walk every day and to make that walk of certain length. Along comes a stormy day of unusually low temperature, and Bertha, with a Spartan expression on her lips, sets out for her ordinary promenade, regardless of wind or weather. She becomes aware, before she has gone far, that she is tired and cold, and she longs to turn back. However, with a curiously perverted stubbornness, she continues on her way, only to find at the end of the exercise, that she is chilled and exhausted. Her face is stinging from the cold winds, and for days thereafter, she suffers from the entirely needless exposure. Perhaps, most of us err on the side of taking too little exercise, but there are a few like Bertha, who adhere to a rule with foolish tenacity, in spite of all circumstances. Do not remain in the house because it is stormy, but take comparatively little out-door exercise on a very severe day. Fortunately, such days are few, and we are able to get enough ozone under clear Canadian skies to keep our systems in cheerful and healthy condition.

Dr. Eleanor Rogers, a New York authority, of The Ladies' World, says, regarding cold weather conditions:

"The cold takes the moisture from the skin, and for this reason it is much more likely to become harsh and dry in wintry weather. You must use some kind of cold cream to supply the grease which the skin needs. It is a pity that using cold cream on the face is liable to stimulate the hair follicles and so promote a growth of hair. This is especially likely to happen if there is a fuzzy light growth of hair on the face, which ordinarily does not show. One should be very careful in the use of massage, cosmetics, and of all kinds of applications, not to occasion the growth of hair. Camphor added to the vegetable oils is excellent for the skin, and often will prevent the hair from growing. In these cases, the best massage is that which is deep. For instance, take the flesh between the thumb and forefinger, and pinch and squeeze it well, not so hard as to cause pain, but just short of it. This brings the blood to the minute glandular structure of the skin. The reason one's skin is dry in winter is often because of the dry atmosphere of the overheated rooms in which one lives. Care should be taken that the heating apparatus should be supplied with vessels containing water, so that the evaporation of the water will give moisture to the air.

You doubtless have a delicate skin and the wind and the cold affect it very quickly. You must toughen the skin, so that it will bear the temperature changes. It is not difficult to do this. After washing your face with hot water, you should use very cold water, even putting ice in it, and dashing it on the skin with both hands. If you do this night and morning you will find that soon your skin will become accustomed to cold, and the blood-vessels will not respond so unpleasantly to winter weather. To thicken the texture of the skin, which is desirable in your case, use, after the cold water applications, alcohol and water in equal parts, some toilet water, or diluted eau de cologne. The effect of hardening the skin in all toilet waters is due to the alcohol which they contain.

Chilblains, which are a species of frost-bite, come because of a poor circulation of the blood. Young children and those who are run down are liable to them. When there is a tendency to them, one should be careful about coming from the cold winter atmosphere suddenly into a hot room. Chilblains occur in those parts of the body where the circulation is poorest and in those parts of the body which are most exposed to cold—that is, the feet, the hands, ears and cheeks. The best remedy is tincture of iodine, painted over the chilblains. Camphorated alcohol is also good. If you are run down, ask your doctor for a tonic.

STEAMING the face in many instances is an excellent remedy, and it is true that it is good where there is an inequality of the circulation. If used when there is a great tendency to flushing and redness, it may dilate the blood-vessels, but the better way would be to alternate very hot water with that which is very cold. Have two basins of water side by side. In one the water should be as hot as can be borne by the hands, in the other it should be correspondingly cold. Dash the hot water a half a dozen times on the face, scooping it up with both hands, then in the same manner use the cold water. Continue thus alternating the hot and cold water for ten minutes. This procedure gives the blood-vessels most excellent exercise and causes them to acquire a healthy tone.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

BROWN EYES.—Talcum powder is decidedly beneficial to the skin and may be used to advantage in all seasons. I am enclosing names of two or three of the best in a letter. As to the trouble you mention, it may be caused by too much greasy food. Eat fruit every day, drink plenty of water and be sure to have an abundance of out-door air. At night wash the face thoroughly in hot water, using a good pure soap; rinse in cold water and dash with eau de cologne. Rub in a little good cold cream and massage thoroughly. The trouble you mention is indeed annoying and frequently comes from indigestion or liver disturbance, rather than from any infection of the skin. It if continues to be troublesome, I should advise you to consult a physician. A dollar in time often saves a larger bill.

MARY S——.—The preparation you mention is quite to be depended on and has, in some cases, entirely cured the affliction. As to your question regarding brisk brushing of the hair, it is usually quite healthful and desirable. The English girl has very poor teeth in comparison with her Canadian sister, but her "head of hair" is much more luxuriant than that of the "average" Canadian girl. And the English maiden always gives the hair a good, vigorous brushing at night. Massage is excellent, and a good tonic should do the rest. If you resort to vaseline, be careful to apply it delicately, with the tips of the fingers, before rubbing the scalp thoroughly. The salts you refer to should not be used on the hair, as the effect is decidedly bad. In fact, I know of several instances where the use of this substance has injured the hair seriously and made a thorough "treatment" necessary. I could not say what nationality affords the best hair-dressers, although I believe that the French are generally credited with most skill in this art. On this continent, there is hardly a city which does not contain several excellent hair-dressing establishments. Do not go to extremes in the style of coiffure, as women of the best taste always avoid startling effects of an over-elaborate type. Ribbon bandeaux may be worn or very delicate wreaths. The fashion for everything Oriental has introduced some dazzling affairs in gold and jewels, but these are not likely to be in favor long. The pins and combs of pearl-grey are extremely becoming when worn by grey-haired women. Do not worry over the few grey hairs—and, above all, do not use the mixture to which you refer, as it will give the hair that hideous brassy tinge, which is associated with vaudeville artistes of the tenth rate.

MILDRED.—Patchouli is an old-fashioned perfume which is rather too heavy to be liked by modern girls. Violet is, perhaps, the most popular perfume of all—but, in these matters, follow your own preference. If you like lilac, use it in sachet for your gowns and lingerie. A suggestion of this springtime fragrance is far more effective than an obvious odor.

"A Pride in Your Appearance" shows itself in the care taken of your hair. The many modes of dressing the hair in vogue to-day makes necessary the exercising of careful judgment in the choice of the style adopted. To secure a coiffure that will enhance the natural charms, and what is more important—to avoid those not suited—to secure beauty with simplicity and individuality without extravagance, THE SERVICES OF AN EXPERT ARE REQUIRED.

"DORENWEND'S"

use only the finest quality of hair in the manufacturing of hair goods, and the workmanship is unsurpassable.

Write for Free Illustrated Catalogue
Mailed to any address on request.

The Newest European and American Styles
Ladies' Switches, Transformations, Pompadours, Waves, Bangs, Fronts, etc., of the highest quality.

Send Us a Sample of Your Hair and let us quote you a price for a beautiful hair switch in any length.

THE DORENWEND CO. OF TORONTO, LIMITED
(The House of Quality Hair Goods)
103-105 Yonge Street, Toronto

Well, Well!

THIS is a HOME DYE that ANYONE can use

I dyed ALL these DIFFERENT KINDS of Goods with the SAME Dye.
I used

DY-O-LA
ONE DYE FOR ALL KINDS OF GOODS

CLEAN and SIMPLE to Use.
No chance of using the Wrong Dye for the Goods one has to color. All colors from your Druggist or Dealer. FREE Color Card and STORY Booklet 10, from The Johnson-Richardson Co., Limited Montreal, Can.

TRY A

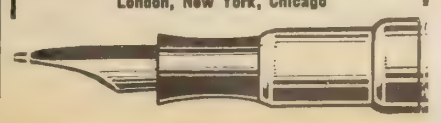
"SWAN" FOUNT PEN.

FIRST

The comfort of it, the sureness, ease and sweetness—each and every characteristic deserves notice. Unqualified satisfaction guaranteed.

Prices from $2.50. Sold at Stationers.
Catalogues Post Free.

MABIE, TODD & CO., 124 York St., Toronto
London, New York, Chicago



The World's Greatest Operatic Stars Use and Endorse
THE
NEW SCALE WILLIAMS
CANADA'S GREATEST PIANO
"The tone is simply magnificent"—Slezak.
¶ If you stop to consider the number of times this Piano has been used on the Concert platform, and the standing of the Artists who use it, there can be no doubt in your mind about the high position it occupies in the musical world.
Artists like CARUSO, FARRAR, HOMER, FREMSTAD, RAPPOLD, SLEZAK, SCOTTI, ELMAN, SEMBRICH and DESTINN, have chosen this great instrument for their Canadian Tours, because it is different from other pianos, and its magnificent tone is recognized as the NEW STANDARD which appeals to those who will have only the best.
Sold by reliable dealers from Coast to Coast or from factory direct.
Ask about our extended payment plan.
242
The Williams Piano Co., Limited
MANUFACTURERS Oshawa, Ont.
LEO SLEZAK
Great Wagnerian Tenor

WOMEN folks who do their own washing are foolish. Washday is only another name for drudgery day—the one day every week that makes women old before their time. A washwoman costs $1.50 per day. In other words you can save the price of a New Century Washing Machine in less than six months—besides saving your health.
Wuk less and enjoy life moah by lettin the "New Century" wash for you.
The New Century is the "Top Notcher" of all hand-washing machines. Its design assures efficiency, simplicity and durability. A child can work the New Century—it's easy to work and cannot harm the most delicate fabrics. 1
CUMMER—DOWSWELL LIMITED
HAMILTON — ONTARIO

Knowing How

to break into business makes you an independent man or woman. Knowledge is power in business as nowhere else. Our courses cover the ground of business preparation thoroughly and we take a personal interest in the success of each student. Write for copy of our handsome prospectus.

British American Business College

Y. M. C. A. Building

Yonge and McGill Streets - Toronto

WHOOPING COUGH

CROUP ASTHMA COUGHS
BRONCHITIS CATARRH COLDS

Vapo-Cresolene

ESTABLISHED 1879

A simple, safe and effective treatment for bronchial troubles, avoiding drugs. Vaporized Cresolene stops the paroxysms of Whooping Cough and relieves croup at once. It is a boon to sufferers from Asthma. The air rendered strongly antiseptic, inspired with every breath makes breathing easy; soothes the sore throat and stops the cough, assuring restful nights. It is invaluable to mothers with young children.
Send us postal for descriptive booklet. 309

ALL DRUGGISTS

Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat. They are simple, effective and antiseptic. Of your druggist or from us. 10c. in stamps.

VAPO CRESOLENE CO.
Leeming-Miles Bldg.
MONTREAL

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this sisue.

MATTERS MUSICAL

OF the winter's musical events, the Mendelssohn Choir cycle of concerts in Toronto has foremost place. This year the tour of the choir includes a wider itinerary than for some years past.

The cycle will consist of four evening concerts on February 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th, next, with an orchestral matinee on the afternoon of February 8th. In addition to the Toronto concerts, the society will appear in Convention Hall, Buffalo, on February 26th; in Carnegie Hall, New York, on February 27th and 28th; and in Symphony Hall, Boston, on February 29th.

On Monday, the choral numbers will include excerpts from the Bach B minor Mass, Elgar's "Caractacus," the Suite "From the Bavarian Highlands" and Wagner's "Meistersinger," and unaccompanied numbers by Palestrina, Lotti, Van der Stucken, Tschaikowsky, Gounod, Elgar, Bantock, Herzogenberg, Howard Brockway, Bullard and others. The orchestra's contribution will include the "Hustika" overture, Dvorak; the "Die Koenigskinder" suite, Humperdinck; Fantasia "Francesca da Rimini," Tschaikowsky.

The Tuesday programme consists of:

Part I.—"The New Life," by Wolf-Ferrari, based upon the text of Dante's "La Vita Nuova," for soprano and baritone solo, two adult choirs, an auxiliary choir of 250 children and large orchestra.

Soloists: Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano; Mr. Clarence Whitehill, baritone.

Part II.—Te Deum, by Hector Berlioz, composed in commemoration of Napoleon I., for tenor solo, two adult choirs, an auxiliary choir of children and large orchestra.

Soloist, Mr. George Hamlin, tenor.

The Wednesday programme will be:

Verdi's "Manzoni" Requiem, for soprano; Mr. Clarence Whitehill, baritone. soloists, chorus and orchestra. Soloists: Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano; Miss Christine Miller, mezzo-soprano; Mr. George Hamlin, tenor; Mr. Clarence Whitehill, bass.

The programme for Thursday will be miscellaneous in character, consisting to some extent, in the choral numbers, of excerpts from the programmes of the preceding evenings, as well as Greig's ballad "At the Cloister Gate," for soprano and contralto solo, women's chorus and orchestra. Soloists: Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano, Miss Christine Miller, mezzo-soprano.

The orchestra will contribute the overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber; Symphonic Poem, "Die Toteninsel," Rachmaninoff, any Symphonic Waltz, Frederick Stock.

The Theodore Thomas Orchestra, under Mr. Frederick Stock, will present a programme of orchestral works on Thursday afternoon, February 8th, including masterpieces by Beethoven, Brahms' orchestral creations, his No. 2 phony being that most beautiful of Brahms' orchestral creations. his No. 2 in B minor. The piano concerto (in commemoration of the composer's centenary) will be the Liszt A major.

~

ONE of our readers has asked for information concerning Kathleen Parlow, the Canadian musician.

Kathleen Parlow, was born at Calgary, Alberta, Canada, in 1890, and comes of a musical family, her mother, who was a native of New Brunswick, being herself a violinist. Miss Parlow is very proud of her Canadian birthright, although she has few recollections of her native country, owing to the fact that her parents moved to California when she was only five years old. It was a year later that Miss Parlow made her first appearance at San Francisco, her chief recollection of that memorable occasion being that her violin was almost as large as herself. She went to London and gave her first recital in Bechstein Hall on March 23, 1905. On November 1, following, she played with the London Symphony Orchestra in Queen's Hall, and in the same year had the honor of a royal command to play before the queen.

The following criticism appeared in the Times at that date:

"Very rarely indeed, have we heard tone of such volume, and there is no sign of forcing it, so that its quality is beautiful. Her intonation is immaculate, and her technical equipment magnificent."

This was promising enough for a young girl barely fourteen years of age, and naturally aroused considerable interest in her career. Miss Parlow played at nine concerts in Helsingfors and two in Riga, while in July, 1907, during the International Musical Festival at the Kursaal, Ostend, she was selected to play at the Russian concert. The programme was made up entirely of pieces by the famous composer and conductor, Glazounow, who himself conducted, and her success was so remarkable that Director Rinksopf at once engaged her for his classical concerts in August of the same year. At this time the well-known impressario-director heard her in London, and was so delighted with her playing that he engaged her immediately for a Continental tour. In the following November the youn violinist began a tour during which she played 6 times in Berlin, 10 times in Copenhagen and Stockholm, and ten times in Christiania, where she received a royal command to play before the Queen of Norway, and was presented with a magnificent brooch of brilliants. Her majesty paid Miss Parlow the honor of attending the last of her concerts in Christiania. Miss Parlow was also presented after these concerts with a beautiful Guarnerius violin which cost 40,000 marks ($10,000).

Queen Alexandra, the Queen of Norway, Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll, and many other distinguished personages have taken a lively interest in the career of this artist.

~

AS the concert season, and more especially the pupils' concert season, is about to open, perhaps a few notes on "how to behave" on the concert platform would not come amiss to some of our budding musicians, says a Canadian musical critic.

Many of them don't even know how to walk across the platform properly, the writer asserts. "Some roll on, some slouch, some are deprecating, some overbold; few seem to possess the art of being at once natural and dignified." But any actor will tell you that the apparently simple business of walking on to a stage without appearing awkward and ill at ease is one of the most difficult things to learn that confront a beginner.

Complaint is further made by the writer quoted that another "detestable practice" has latterly come into fashion of affecting "absolute indifference to the audience's expressions of approval," young British artists, it is conceded, being most frequently the offenders in this respect. Whereupon the London Daily Telegraph, rousing itself from the silly season lethargy, volunteers these "few simple rules for the guidance of young beginners."

Do not slouch on to a concert platform.

Male singers and pianists should never come in with their hands in their pockets.

No performer, male or female, should ever make faces at the audience.

Or cast disapproving glances at them.

Or smile too frequently in the direction of friends in the auditorium.

An artist should always appear to be on more or less amicable terms with his or her accompanist.

The latter should try to avoid violence to the assistant who turns over more than one page at a time of the piece he is accompanying.

To leave off in the middle of a song or piece when late-comers enter the hall may be justifiable, but looks "sidey."

Avoid talking to your audience, unless your name happens to be Pachmann.

Don't leave the platform with such haste as to suggest that you fear your audience are armed with missiles.

WITH THE JOURNAL'S JUNIORS

A Corner for the Small Person

By COUSIN CLOVER

Our Competition

OUR competition for the best letter on the subject, "A Winter Adventure," will not close until March 1st. We hope to hear from many of our Juniors before then. The New Year's Puzzle has not yet been decided, but the name of the winner will be announced next month.

A Kitten's Tale

WEEKS and weeks ago, as long ago as I can remember, I was much smaller than I am now, and not near so pretty. I lived in a big basket at first with my mother and my two brothers. My mother was very good to us, and washed us all over several times a day.

There were some very queer sort of cats about the house where we lived; they walked on their hind legs, and their claws were no use to anyone, and they only had fur on their heads. My mother told us they were human beings, and that they owned us and took care of us. I got quite used to them after a while, but at first I used to run away from them and hide under the barn. The big human beings were very good to me, but some of their kittens that they called children, were not so good. They would hold me upside down and squeeze me. Then the big ones would say, "If you hurt the kitty, Susie, I shall take it away from you."

One day, after one of these games, I was tired, and went down to the lilac bush that grew through the front fence to sleep. I curled myself up in a little hollow in the roots, and began to dream about a red beetle my brother caught and ate. And then a voice said, "Hello, there's a kitten!" and someone snatched me.

It was a strange child, a boy. He was so dirty you'd think he never used his tongue on himself in his life. I didn't like him. I scratched and squealed. He squeezed me dreadfully and bumped me against the fence. So then I knew he was a bad boy. He carried me away down the road. I never saw my mother and brothers again.

After a while he got tired of carrying me, and dropped me at the corner of a country road. I crawled into the grass and lay as still as a stone. I was bruised and sore and hungry, and oh, so scared. I heard him go on farther and farther, whistling. Then all was still. I peeped out of the grass. The whole world around me was strange. The grass was dusty, the wind moved in the elder bushes as if a lot of kittens hid there, but when I mewed there was no answer. It was growing dark. I trotted along the road, mewing, but no one heard me, and I couldn't find out a house. There were no houses at all. Soon it was dark, and began to rain. The wet stuck to my dusty fur until I was like a little ball of mud. I caught a cricket, but it didn't taste as good as when I caught them in fun. Kind of dry. I hid again and went to sleep. I cried in my sleep, I was so lonely.

Do any of you boys and girls know what it's like to be hungry? Really starving hungry, I mean, so that you feel as if you would die, and your eyes are weak, and you ache all over, and seem to have swallowed a hot cinder? I guess you don't, or you wouldn't neglect to feed your pets, or move away and leave your kittens behind to starve. I was like that the next morning, so weak I just crept down the road and lapped a little water from a puddle.

PRETTY PUSSY

I went on it seemed to me for a very long time, a very long way. There were houses in front of me. I was afraid.

There were no bad boys, but there was a dog, a horrid white one. It came at me with its mouth open. I ran as hard as I could. There was nowhere to run to but the houses, so I ran for the nearest, a big, black, noisy place. I was too weak to run far, and the dog was close behind. I ran past two men with hammers, and past a horse's hoofs, and turned in the corner and scratched the dog's nose. He howled and backed off.

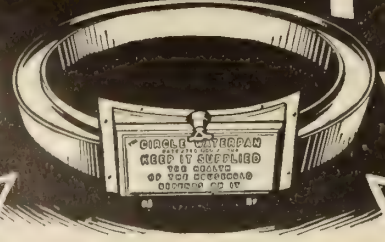
The men laughed. One of them chased the dog, and then picked me up gently in a big black hand. "My, but you have grit," he said, "and I guess you are hungry. You are going to be a fine cat."

He gave me milk and a little piece of meat, and I knew my troubles were over.

Yes, I have lived with the blacksmith ever since. He doesn't allow any bad boys round. I sit in the forge and play with the sparks, and catch the rats if I feel like it.

PRETTY PUSSY.

A Waterpan worth while



The object of the Furnace Waterpan is to give back to the warmed air the natural moisture that the fire has dried out. But in the average Furnace the Waterpan is made insignificant and insufficient and placed in the least effective position. But the

"Good Cheer" Furnace

Has A Big Circle Waterpan

entirely encircling the fire-pot. This waterpan holds 4 to 6 gallons, and is placed where it will evaporate the water rapidly. It keeps the humidity of the air up to the normal 60% or 70% while the air from the average furnace often contains less than 25% of moisture.

Besides the vast improvement this makes in comfort and healthfulness, the house feels as warm at 65° as it does at 70° when the air is parching and dry. The consequent saving of coal is a big item.

"Good Cheer" Furnace construction throughout is of the same high standard of excellence as the Circle Waterpan.

It's well worth your while to write for Booklet and full information about the advantages of the "Good Cheer" Furnace.

9

The James Stewart Mfg. Co., Limited
Woodstock, Ont. — Winnipeg, Man.

We Pay for Names We are starting a sample copy campaign for subscriptions and need men or women to furnish us names and act as our representatives in spare or entire time. We offer excellent pay for this special work.

In Your Neighborhood are probably many ladies who have never heard of Canadian Home Journal. They need a good woman's journal and would prefer a Canadian magazine if they knew of it. Write for information about our Sample Copy Campaign.

Circulation Department CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, Toronto

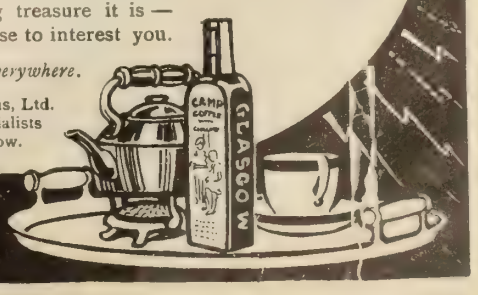
'CAMP' COFFEE

—made quick as lightning!—and with all the flavour, fragrance, and richness of the finest coffee.

Early morning—breakfast-time—middle of the morning—after dinner—evening; these are the times when 'Camp' is such a luxury, convenience, and delight. Once try 'Camp'—once discover what a time-saving, money-saving treasure it is—and other coffee will cease to interest you.

Sold by all Grocers — everywhere.

R. Paterson & Sons, Ltd.
Coffee Specialists
Glasgow.



Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS

By ISABEL ECCLESTONE MACKAY

ILLUSTRATED BY C.W. JEFFERYS

Continued from page 10

THE morning sun was shining cheerfully through the curtains of Mark's bedroom when, three days later, the young man awoke with the delicious consciousness of returning health strong upon him. The confusion in his head had cleared, and as his other injuries had been of no very serious nature, he was already pleading to be treated no longer as an invalid

"You know," he said, smiling into his adopted father's grave face, "that nothing is so bad for an invalid as suspense, and although I am not an invalid, I feel sure that I shall become one if you don't stop being so plaguey mysterious! Seriously," his laughing face grew grave, "I want to know what is troubling you, sir. You are so different. Every day you are whiter and more worried. I know that the search can't be going well; but sometimes I think there is more than even that troubling you. If you could only trust me. The doctor says I may get up to-morrow, by the next day I shall be ready for anything.

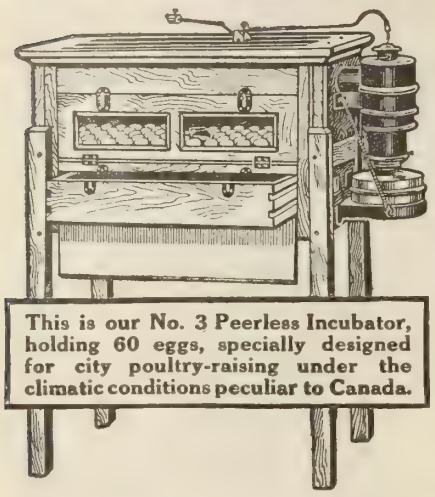
"Mark," said Mr. Torrance irrelevantly. "Haven't you something that you want to tell me on you own account? Something which you promised to tell me when you were stronger?"

"Yes. But I do not want to worry you while you are so troubled. It can wait."

"I am afraid it cannot wait any longer, my boy. You are right in thinking that I have bad news for you—but before we speak it I would like to hear the story that you promised me."

"Well, sir, it is very simple. It is just that before I went away to Vancouver I met the girl whom I hope to some day make my wife. You will be disappointed and hurt perhaps when I tell you that she is a poor girl, and that

YOU CAN MAKE POULTRY RAISING PAY IN YOUR OWN BACK-YARD IF YOU WILL ADOPT THE PEERLESS WAY

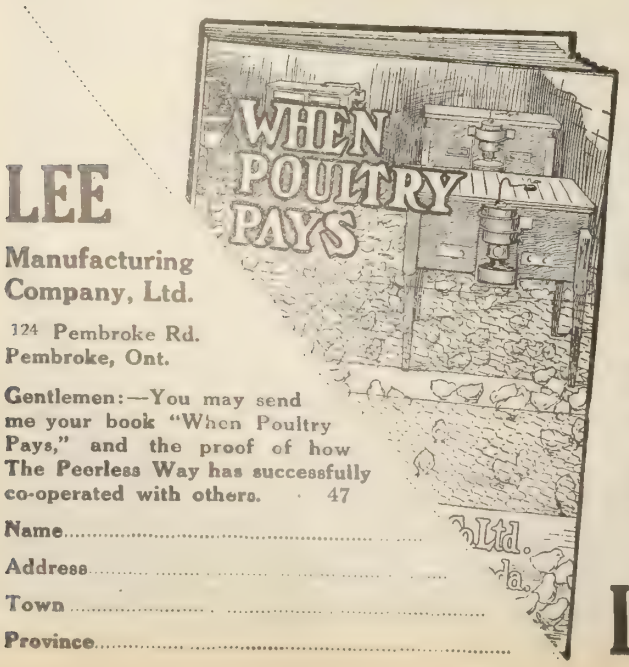


This is our No. 3 Peerless Incubator, holding 60 eggs, specially designed for city poultry-raising under the climatic conditions peculiar to Canada.

RAISING poultry on a city lot or in a backyard can be made far more than merely a fascinating hobby. It can easily be made a mighty profitable business that will bring you in a handsome revenue. At the same time knowledge of how to do it right will make the work doubly interesting. Now all that you need is knowledge—and the right kind of incubator. Yet these two necessities are both within your reach; for, by following the methods of The Peerless Way and adopting the Peerless Incubator, 20,846 Canadian poultry raisers are to-day making big cash profits. Do the same! Make poultry raising both your hobby and a business as well. Ride it as a hobby if you want to—but do more; make it yield you dividends and add to your bank account! You can do it. Remember that twenty thousand successful poultrymen have seen that our experience was worth having and following as operators of the largest and most successful poultry farm in the Dominion,—the Poultry Yards of Canada, Limited, at Pembroke. So they wrote and told us they wanted to raise poultry as we raised it. You can do that too; we have guided these twenty thousand odd successful poultrymen and we are ready to guide you.

This Book Tells About The Practical Solution Of Profitable Poultrying on a City Lot

"WHEN POULTRY PAYS" is a book that tells, by personal letters, what hundreds of followers of The Peerless Way have actually accomplished. It tells about an incubator and brooder especially designed by Canadian experts for city poultry raising in the Canadian climate and about the plans, specifications and blue-prints of poultry houses constructed to meet this country's long, cold winters (after poultry houses actually in use at our own farm), and which form a part of our service in The Peerless Way. "When Poultry Pays" explains just how you can put The Peerless Way to work for you, tells you about an enormous, undersupplied market and gives you full information as to the best way to start. It will show you an unworked field of profit lying in your own back-yard right in the heart of your own town. If you have some spare time in your evenings, a little money and the willingness to follow directions and look after this business, The Peerless Way cannot fail to make money for you. Please bear in mind, however, that this illustrated book has cost money to prepare and publish and is too expensive to distribute haphazard; we send it only on request. If you want it, send us the coupon—



LEE

Manufacturing Company, Ltd.

124 Pembroke Rd.
Pembroke, Ont.

Gentlemen:—You may send me your book "When Poultry Pays," and the proof of how The Peerless Way has successfully co-operated with others. 47

Name.....

Address.....

Town.....

Province.....

We Send The Book FREE For The Coupon

There Are Big Profits in Poultrying

TO get the maximum profits out of anything requires experience or knowledge. A bad start may take years to overcome; don't handicap yourself. Use our experience and knowledge instead of purchasing your own through bitter and costly disappointments. The Peerless Way has made smooth the hard road of the beginner and solved his problems before he even knew of their existence. Step by step, we will teach you every detail of The Peerless Way, so that as the business outgrows your back-yard, you can engage in it on as extensive a scale as we do.

It Will Cost You Little To Adopt The Peerless Way

TO start The Peerless Way working and making money for you, will not cost you much money. The principles of this plan are the same on a large or small scale—scientific management. But the cost of proper equipment varies—to start on a city lot in your own back-yard need cost you very little. And as your business grows, its own increases can be made to pay for the extension and yield you handsome profits besides.

Our Poultry Advisory Board Will Teach You

THE Peerless Way teaches our system—complete. But if, at any time, special problems peculiar to you alone, do arise, our Poultry Advisory Board is always at your service free of charge,—not only when you are starting out in business, but to the very last day you are running a Peerless Incubator and following The Peerless Way—ten years hence or even longer! All you need to do is to write and your problems will be investigated individually and answered personally. We stand back of our followers not only in the raising of poultry, but also in turning their poultry and poultry products into revenue producers of the highest type.

We Teach You Co-operative Marketing

THE few extra cents of profit which you might lose through ordinary marketing, cause but a small loss on your total selling price; but they represent a very, very big per cent. of your profits! Our Peerless Co-Operative Marketing Plan will put you in touch with buyers who will take your entire output,—large or small,—at highest, spot-cash, market prices. Or we will show you how you can sell direct to the consumer, or to the special private trade that is always glad to pay higher prices for guaranteed fresh eggs. We will show you how to handle that too. This is merely one more detail of the service offered by The Peerless Way.

Get Into An Under-Supplied Market With Rising Prices

THE rise in prices of both eggs and poultry, during the last few years, will show you that the market must be a tremendous money-maker for someone. Why should not you be among those who are taking the easy profits? You can be as successful as anyone, if you will only let The Peerless Way show you how—if you will follow our methods and devote just a little time and more or less common-sense to the work. Send the coupon and get "When Poultry Pays"; it will tell you more about The Peerless Way.

LEE Manufacturing Co., Ltd. 124 Pembroke Rd. 47 PEMBROKE ONTARIO CANADA

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

her family is just—well, just an ordinary, everyday family, you know. Her name is in fact, "Brown."

He paused for a moment, but as the other made no comment, he went on sturdily. "You have told me that you do not insist upon money, but that you wished me to marry a lady. That Miss Brown is a lady I can assure you, upon my honor. I only ask you to meet her. Of course, I do not know whether she—whether I have any chance."

"Have you known Miss Brown long?"

"No; but you see it was a case when time didn't seem to count. It sounds silly, I know, but—oh, well, one can't explain these things."

"It was, of course, to her that you sent the note? You had not seen her before the accident—at the station, or anywhere?"

"Why, no. I just swung off the train and into a car. Christine knew I was coming back, but she is not the sort of girl who would go to the station to meet a chap she had met only a few times."

"No, I suppose not. Well, then, I must now give you my news. I have met the Misses Brown and I do not need your word to assure me that they are ladies. I have seen Miss Christine and spoken to her, in fact, she was for a time a clerk in the Stores—"

Mark smothered an exclamation.

"But she never received your note saying that you were ill. The evening of your accident she disappeared, and has not yet been found. That is bad news, my boy, and that is why you must get well quickly. We need you to help us find her—no, you must not try to get up! To-morrow is the earliest by the doctor's orders, and besides I have much to tell you yet."

Then very quietly he told him of the strange discovery of the past weeks. Of his certainty that Christine was his own lost daughter he said little. The astonishing facts alone were enough to stagger belief, and the invalid listened in dazed silence.

"Then you think these fiends have got her hidden somewhere? Keeping her away out of revenge on you?" he asked at last. "The thing is too preposterous to be believed."

For answer Adam Torrance laid the last letter on the bed and bade him read it, watching his face grow ghastly as he realized its dreadful meaning. He expected a fainting fit at the very least, and had his hand already on the bell, but Mark was not made of fainting stuff. Scarcely had the vile purport of the scrawl become plain to him before he was out of bed, swaying a little, but utterly determined.

"If you will leave me I will dress," he said politely. "Send Benson along to help me, for I must be careful of this arm. No, I am not mad, but I soon would be if I lay there in bed with Christine in God knows what peril! Why didn't you tell me before—my poor little girl!" Tears of weakness stood in his blue eyes, but there was no slackening of purpose in his face.

In spite of his concern, Adam Torrance felt a thrill of pride. No one could say that little Christine had not won a worthy love!

"Mark, don't be foolish! Don't you believe that everything is being done—everything? Do you suppose——"

"Everything is not being done while I am doing nothing," said Mark briefly. Then, suddenly flaring out with impotent rage, "Everything being done? Why haven't they found her, then? What is Johnson thinking of? There must be plenty of clues. There can't be many old women like her around here.. She ought to be as easy to find as the nose on your face. With eyes like hers—"

"What are you talking about? What do you know about the old woman's eyes?"

"Eh? Why—I saw her, of course! You see what you have done by not telling me before! Do you mean to say that you haven't a description of the old wretch?"

"That is exactly what we have not. Christine never described her, and the boy who saw the meeting was too far off to see her face." Mr. Torrance spoke soothingly, for indeed he thought that the boy had lost his head entirely.

"Oh, I'm not delirious," said Mark quickly. "I did see the creature. Saw her plainly under the street lamp. It was the night I walked with Christine to the post-box. The night I left for Vancouver,"

"Why, yes. She did speak to Burns about it that night!" he admitted eagerly. "She said she thought she was being followed."

"She was. I noticed an old woman slipping along behind us. I took her for a beggar, but as I turned to leave Christine, I passed her when the light was full on her face, and I declare the malignant hate I saw there frightened me! She was such a repulsive-looking old creature that her face haunted me long after. I have never forgotten it—why, I can draw it! I thought at the time what a good sketch it would make. Get me some paper—quick! For once my talent for drawing will be of some use in the world."

"Some use?" Why, Mark, it will be every use. Oh, to think that we have a clue in hand at last! I'll send Benson with your sketching kit and I'll telephone Johnson—and, Mark, won't you do the sketch in bed?—just to take one worry off my mind?"

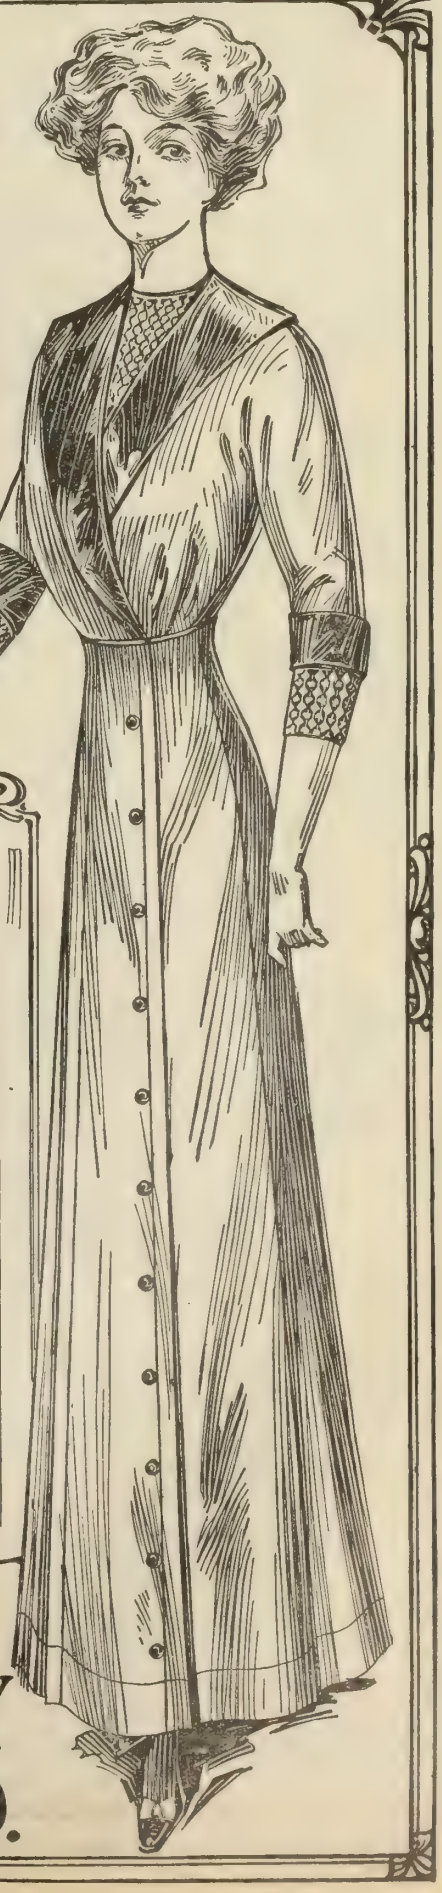
(To be continued.)

THIS FASCINATING DRESS $6.49

Just one of many wonderful values that the Robert Simpson Co. is now offering in their new

MIDWINTER SALE CATALOGUE

that is just off the press. If you haven't received your copy, your name on a post card will bring it. But just as a foretaste, order this dress to-day---You'll be delighted with it.



We Pay All The Delivery Charges

Whether you order fifty cents' or fifty dollars' worth of merchandise from us, we pay all delivery charges on everything in this catalogue. And if you're not satisfied with what you receive, send it back in good order within seven days, and we will pay all express charges both ways. This is the Simpson simplified system of shopping by mail.

This dress is SIMPSON MADE, which means that experts designed it, experts made it in the Simpson work rooms, and more important still it was inspected the Simpson way, not one little defect was passed. We bought too many yards of the cloth and want to clear it out quickly, hence the great saving in price to you.

Misses' Sizes

Years	14	16	18
Length	33	35	37
Bust	32	34	36

Women's Sizes

Waist	23	24	25	26	28	29
Bust	32	34	36	38	40	40
Length	38	39	40	41	42	42

Order Number G90581

This attractive dress for women or misses, is splendidly made from richly finished lustre. The shoulders are made so as to give a dainty kimona effect. The pretty yoke of fine net lace is outlined with a new rolling rever and a square-designed black satin collar comes over the shoulders from the back and continues to the waist-line at front; the lower part of sleeves trimmed to match. Skirt made with correct and graceful lines, fastens at left side of front panel, which is finished with small black satin buttons. Colors, black, navy or green. Sale Price..... $6.49

THE ROBERT SIMPSON COMPANY LIMITED. TORONTO

A POUND OF GOOD COFFEE IS NOT only more economical than the ordinary cheap grades, but is an added pleasure to every meal.
Seal Brand
is the best that can be produced.
PACKED IN ONE AND TWO POUND CANS ONLY
CHASE & SANBORN
MONTREAL
'29

Those Things That Won't Wear Out

but of whose faded, dingy appearance you get so tired---they can be freshened up like new again with

MAYPOLE SOAP

The Clean, Easy, Home Dye

Your choice of 24 brilliant, fadeless colors, from which you can make any shade. Being in cake form, Maypole Soap does not make a mess like powder dyes, nor does it stain hands nor kettles. It will brighten up your home and your own and the children's clothes with the least possible trouble and expense.

Colors 10c. --- Black 15c. --- at your dealer's or postpaid with booklet "How to Dye" from

F. L. Benedict & Co., - Montreal

An Early Breakfast

An early breakfast without getting up early! That's Winter joy without Winter worry or work. Such a thing is possible in the home where forms the daily breakfast. Being ready-cooked and ready-to-serve one does not need to wait for kitchen fires or slow servants for a warm, nourishing, strengthening breakfast.

SHREDDED WHEAT

Simply heat the biscuit a few moments to restore crispness, then pour hot milk over it and salt or sweeten to suit the taste. Deliciously wholesome with stewed prunes, baked apples, sliced bananas, canned peaches or other canned fruits. At your grocer's

Made of Choicest Selected Canadian Wheat

A Canadian Food for Canadians

Made by

The Canadian Shredded Wheat Co., Limited

Niagara Falls, Ontario

Toronto Office:—48 Wellington Street East

I-73

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Avoid Alum Powders

THERE are many housewives who unthinkingly use alum baking-powders in making biscuits, cake and pastry, when it would only take a little precaution to avoid doing so.

Baking-powders that contain alum cause indigestion and nerve disorders. English food experts condemn alum as an injurious adulterant unfit for a baking-powder ingredient. If you are not careful you may be buying alum in your baking-powder and putting it in food. The way to be sure is to read the label on the baking-powder, and if the ingredients are not plainly printed on it, refuse to accept it.

Bother the Button

ALL know the annoying hab' buttons have of coming off at a moment when they are most needed. It seems sometimes as though nothing short of wire thread would keep them in their places; and even wire breaks away from the cloth.

When next you are sewing on a button, follow these directions and that button will never trouble you again.

Place your button, take a hairpin—a strong one—and lay it across the button, then sew it over the hairpin. When you have put as much thread through the eyes as they will hold, withdraw the hairpin. Then push the needle through near the button, pull the button up and wrap the thread several times round between the button and the garment. Fasten the thread on the under-side of the button, and then you will find that that button will stay on until the garment is worn out.

Rice Dainties

RICE boiled tender in milk, seasoned with sugar and lemon juice and when cold cut into pieces, rolled in egg and cracker crumbs and fried makes a tasty dessert for luncheon.

For Spanish rice, brown half a cupful of rice in hot fat, add an onion, chopped fine, a tomato and a mashed clove of garlic. Cover with hot water, season with salt and pepper, cook the rice till tender, adding water as it is needed, but not stirring.

For rice tortillas mix a cupful of flour, a cupful of ground rice, half a cupful of milk, a tablespoonful of butter and a little salt. Knead the mixture thoroughly, break off pieces and pat into cakes until each cake is large and very thin. Bake on a griddle until brown.

A rice omelet makes the ordinary omelet more substantial. Add to the well-beaten yokes of three eggs a third of a cupful of milk and half a cupful of boiled rice with two tablespoonfuls of butter, salt and pepper. Fold in the stiffly beaten whites of the eggs at the last. Cook the omelet slowly.

Delicious stuffed eggs have the hard boiled and mashed yolks mixed with an equal part of hot boiled rice and the whole seasoned with minced ham or tongue, pepper, salt, made mustard and a little lemon juice. Fill the paste into the hollow whites.

Minced ham and boiled rice mixed together and filled into individual baking dishes with an egg on the top makes an excellent luncheon dish. Fill the little dishes about half full of the rice and the ham mixture and put them into the oven until they are heated through. Then remove, drop an egg on to each with bits of butter, salt and pepper over the top, and bake until the white is set.

Washing New Flannel

IT is surprising how a little care bestowed on new flannel lengthens its life and preserves its appearance. First of all, put the garment, or the piece of flannel, into a large tub filled with cold water—rain water, where obtainable—but otherwise a little ammonia added to the water will serve equally well. The water must be cold, no other method will extract the sulphur which is contained in all new flannel. Steep it for a least two hours.

Have ready a tub of hot water, add a little soap-jelly—too much soap makes flannel slimy—and a small quantity of ammonia. Put the flannel into this and rub lightly, giving extra attention to seams, gathers, and thick places. The water must not be boiling—only hot. Wash again through warm water with a small quantity of soap-jelly in it and rinse in tepid water. Pass twice through the wringer and hang out-of-doors, if possible, with the thickest and heaviest part uppermost; this precaution is necessary, otherwise the moisture drains into the yoke, collar or waistband and thickens those parts. Fine flannel may be pressed with a moderately hot iron on the wrong side, but heavy garments are usually mangled.

Earache in Children

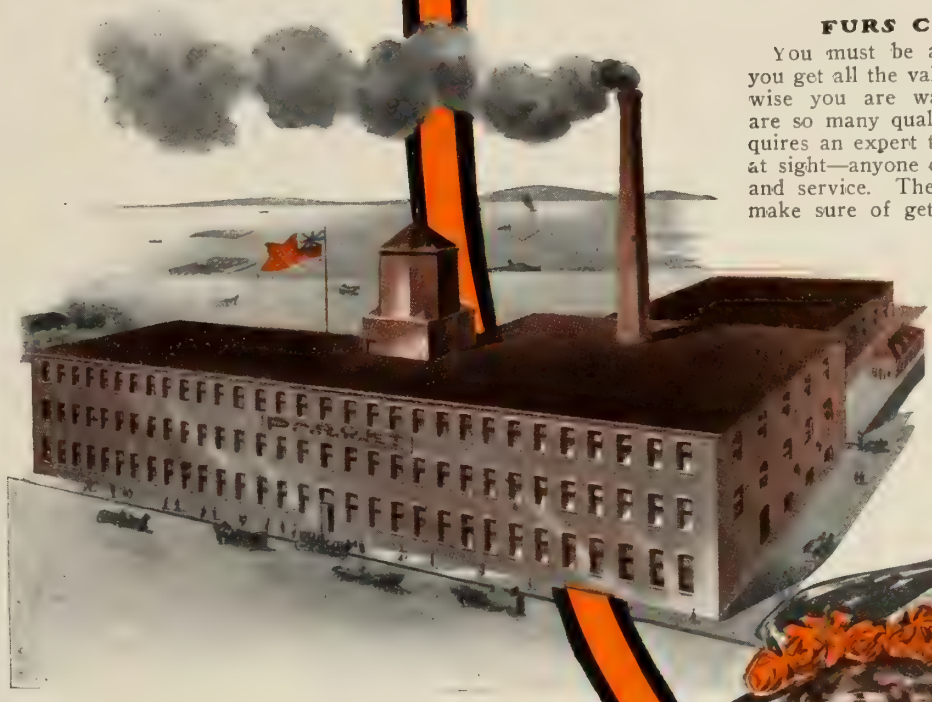
ONE of the most distressing of common ailments from which children of all ages suffer is earache. It may arise from nothing more serious than a cold, which attacks the throat and extends upwards to the ear, but in too many cases it denotes the presence of inflammation of the drum of the ear. The slightest pressure will cause agonizing pain, the child cannot lay its head down, whereas in ordinary earache from cold relief will be obtained on laying the ear against the mother's breast or a warm pillow. Where the pain does not rapidly subside upon the application of repeated hot fomentations or bags or hot salt, together with a mild aperient, medical advice should be sought without delay, or the consequences may be very serious. The membrane of the drum of the ear is extremely sensitive, and every sound from without only reaches our brain through the movement produced by it on this membrane. The differences of sound are all recognizable only by the sensitiveness of the tympanic membrane, and inflammation of the middle ear is sometimes followed by perforation of this membrane, the inflammatory fluid thus escaping into the outer ear. There is then a so-called "running from the ear" which lasts a variable time, according to the case. Doctors differ as to the best treatment for aural discharge; some advise that the ears be syringed twice daily with warm boracic acid lotion; others that no water be used but that the ears be wiped out with boracic wool, and a little powdered boracic acid blown into them afterwards.

Dressing for Burns

WHEN a burn or scald is not severe, but enough to redden the skin cause much pain the best dressing is oil of some kind, the best of all is carron oil, that is olive oil and lime water in equal parts. The great thing is to keep the injured surface from contact with the air, and therefore lint or cotton wool should be used. In an emergency a thick coating of flour over the oil will do till more suitable coverings can be prepared. A saturated solution of carbonate of soda applied by means of lint or soft rags kept wetted from time to time is another good remedy for burns or scalds which are not very severe, but whenever a large surface of the body is involved the danger of prostration is too great for cold water to be safely used. In cases of very severe burns, it must be remembered that the clothing should not be removed until some form of dressing is ready for application, so that the injured surface may not be exposed to the air one minute longer than is necessary, also that any such clothing must be carefully cut away, not pulled off, and every effort must be directed towards treating the patient for shock. Strong hot tea or coffee, half a teaspoonful of aromatic spirits of ammonia, or small quantities of hot beef-tea, may be used for this purpose. Butter or lard is a good substitute for olive oil when the latter cannot be obtained.

PAQUET FURS

Through This Factory From Trapper To YOU



ALL FUR Catalogue Prices now Subject to a Discount OF 20%

Although the prices in our Fur Catalogue are guaranteed to be the lowest in America for equal quality, we will give you a discount of 20 per cent. on anything in fur selected from our catalogue after January 15th, 1912. This offer will hold good until the 1st of March, 1912. If you have not yet received a copy of our Fur Catalogue, write at once—TO-DAY. Don't miss this remarkable opportunity to save money on high-grade furs.

FURS COST MONEY

You must be absolutely certain that you get all the value you pay for, otherwise you are wasting money. There are so many qualities in fur that it requires an expert to detect the difference at sight—anyone can find it out in wear and service. There is one safe way to make sure of getting the greatest possible value for every dollar you spend, and that way is to deal direct with Canada's Greatest Fur Factory—the only fur factory in America where every process, from the raw skins to the finished product, is in operation under the one roof.

All These Prices Now Subject to a Discount of 20%

Fur-Lined Coat

4677/313—Lady's fur-lined coat, 50 inches long, shell of all wool imported cloth, semi-fitting back, box front, collar and revers of mink marmot, lining of brown dyed Susliki. Factory price, prepaid $32

Fur-Lined Coat

4675—Lady's 50-inch fur-lined coat, shell of pure wool imported beaver cloth, semi-fitting back, box front, 36-inch lining of genuine hampster, collar and revers in natural mink. Factory price, prepaid $55

Lady's Long Coat

4432—Lady's 50-inch coat, in all-wool imported cloth, with quilted mercerized lining and rubber interlining, collar and revers in fine quality mink muskrat. Factory price, prepaid $18

Astrachan Jacket

3378—Lady's 30-in. "Fernald" style jacket, fitted back, center vent, shawl collar, plain satin lining, jacket made with nice bright Astrachan skins. Factory price, prepaid $28

Raccoon Jacket

3098—Lady's 33-in. regulation style jacket, in fine quality, full-furred raccoon, semi-fitting back, plain mercerized sateen lining, notched collar. Factory price, prepaid $52

Man's Coon Coat

208—Man's coon coat, choice of shawl or notched collar, quilted lining of fine quality black lasting, well made and well finished in every particular. Factory price, prepaid .. $50

"Paquet" Special

311—Our "Paquet" special man's coat is made in black beaver cloth, with plain farmer's satin lining and shawl collar of Russian otter marmot. Factory price, prepaid ... $13

THIS FUR CATALOGUE

containing 80 pages of fine half-tone illustrations and thousands of descriptions and prices of PAQUET FURS, will be sent you on request. Write to-day for a copy—don't put it off and forget. A post-card request will bring it by return mail. Write now.

THE PAQUET COMPANY LIMITED.

QUEBEC - CANADA

COLGATE'S
RIBBON DENTAL CREAM
TRADE MARK

These pictures of dental lecturers in public schools show how thoroughly aroused educators are becoming to the importance of teaching the children to care for their teeth.

It has been proved beyond question that children having seriously defective teeth, take at least six months longer to complete the school course than those possessing good teeth.

It is for you as a parent to urge the teaching of dental hygiene in the schools and to practise it in your home.

The twice-a-day use of the tooth-brush is a pleasure as well as a duty if you choose such a delicious dentifrice as—

COLGATE'S
RIBBON DENTAL CREAM
TRADE MARK

Cleanses safely because it is wholly free from grit.

—antiseptically-destroying decay-germs and making the mouth wholesome and non-acid.

—and pleasantly with a delicious flavor; so different from the usual "druggy" taste.

Trial tube—this exact size—sent on receipt of 4 cts.

COMES OUT A RIBBON LIES FLA ON THE BRUS

COLGATE & CO.

Dept. H. . Coristine Building

MONTREAL

Makers of Cashmere Bouquet Toilet Soap —luxurious, lasting, refined.

W. G. M. Shepherd, Montreal

SOLE AGENT FOR CANADA

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

SPRING FASHION NUMBER

MARCH
1912

Published by THE CANADIAN WOMEN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., Limited
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

PRICE
10 CENTS

STOP HIM!

We ask assistance of all good housekeepers in our efforts to introduce pure goods.

MAGIC BAKING POWDER, GILLETT'S PERFUMED LYE, GILLETT'S CREAM TARTAR, ROYAL YEAST CAKES.

When you ask your dealer for any of the above goods and he reaches for a substitute, STOP HIM. That is the time. It is too late after you have used part of it with poor success, as is always the case with substitutes.

There is every reason why you should insist upon Gillett's Goods, and absolutely no reason why you should permit a dealer to substitute something he claims to be "Just as good" or "better" or "the same thing" as the article asked for.

The buying public and the dealers acknowledge the superior quality of Gillett's Goods. Why accept something inferior when you can buy Gillett's pure goods at the same price?

E. W. GILLETT COMPANY LIMITED

Winnipeg Toronto, Ont. Montreal

PROTECT YOURSELF BY REFUSING SUBSTITUTES

Our Shop Mark

FURNITURE of Character reproduced as near as adaptability to modern requirements will permit, is not only a credit to the home in which it has the privilege of displaying its beauty, and the serviceable taste of its designer, but it is also a display of the good taste of those showing their preference in surrounding themselves with this style rather than shams. In buying our goods you not only buy the above qualifications but you become one of our numerous satisfied customers that we have attained by giving everyone that which is genuine.

Although all our goods are supplied through the trade we welcome your enquiry.

Colonial

Toronto Furniture Co.
LIMITED

Toronto, Canada

"Makers of the Better Make of Canadian Quality Furniture."

Colonial

Notice to Subscribers

Subscriptions are payable strictly in advance.
Remit by Money Order or Registered Letter. We are not responsible for remittances that go astray. Only one and two cent stamps accepted in payment.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Subscription Price

Subscription for Canada and British Isles, $1.00 per annum; United States, $1.35; Postal Union countries, $2.00 (8s.) post paid.
We accept no patent medicine, liquor, narcotic or exploitation announcements.

Published on the 25th of each month preceding date of issue by
THE CANADIAN WOMAN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., LIMITED
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

WILLIAM G. ROOK, President

Edited by JEAN GRAHAM

EDITORIAL CHAT

THE SPRINGTIME is almost upon us, and no one can say that we have not had an old-fashioned winter, with abundance of snow and ice. We are fairly tired of velvets and furs, and quite eager to know what we may expect from Dame Fashion in the coming season. And such a tempting array of light and graceful fabrics as we see on the counters and the shelves of the city shops would be enough to lure any daughter of Eve to become a purchaser. The new goods seems a fresh story every year—one we have never known before—and we turn from gowns to hosiery, and from hosiery to hats, with a keen interest in all that is "the very latest." This month we have devoted especial attention to the fashion department, with a result which can hardly fail to be pleasing. Our exclusive fashion letter is from an authority in direct communication with the makers of styles in Paris and London, and may be relied on for the most recent information regarding modes and fabrics. Millinery is also given its share of attention, as the hat is of surpassing importance to the woman who desires to complete her spring costume. The scientific improvement which has been made of recent years in the manufacture of dyes renders the dyeing of goods at home a comparatively simple and easy matter. Our article on this subject will be read by every woman with a lively appreciation of its utility. We are receiving every day commendation of our fashion department as regards the pattern supply. Our patterns have the virtue of simplicity and do not present the intricate problems for which so many "fashions" are noted. Many a woman hesitates to send for a pattern lest it should prove utterly impracticable, when it comes to the process of "cutting out." No such troubles need be feared with our supply, and you will be surprised to find how easily you can "manage" the manufacture of the latest blouse or skirt.

MEDICAL INSPECTION OF SCHOOLS has lately been the subject of adverse criticism. We have received from Ottawa a newspaper containing several strong parental letters against such a feature in our educational system. From other sources, also, have come protests against it, as an entirely unnecessary measure. Those who read an article by Dr. Annie Backus of Aylmer in our February number concerning medical inspection, as needed in rural schools, will be prepared for a further consideration of the subject. In the current issue will be found a second contribution from Dr. Backus about the equipment of rural schools, which will be recognized as only too true to life by those who attended the little red school-house in the long ago. If the parents who are so indignant regarding medical inspection will stop to consider how many cases of defective sight or hearing have been detected and treated through the visits of medical authorities to the school, they may not be so unwilling to consider their usefulness.

OUR CANADIAN SERIAL, by Mrs. MacKay, is generally recognized as the most successful story we have published. It is nearing completion and the interest culminates in the heroine's final adventures. The writer's ability to hold the interest of the reader, as the plot becomes more complicated, has been demonstrated thoroughly by subscribers who have sent us such plaintive messages as this: "My January JOURNAL went astray. Please send me one, as I don't want to miss a chapter of 'The House of Windows.'" In this number we are publishing a short story by a Canadian writer, "A Man He Would A-wooing Go," which presents in amusing fashion a masculine type, which will be readily recognized in many communities. An English tale of rather sensational character tells of an adventure which is highly unusual, but which is all the more exciting on that account. This tale, "A Leap From the Train," introduces a highly dramatic incident which results in the conventional "happy-ever-after" ending. We hope to announce at an early date a forthcoming Canadian serial.

OUR GARDEN NUMBER will be issued in April. As this will be our Easter number, also, there will be an interesting sketch of "Easter in Bermuda," by Miss Helen E. Williams, a Quebec writer, who has contributed to several Canadian publications, and whose picturesque account of Eastertide, as seen in a city of the West Indies, will be of unusual charm. Katherine Hale, one of Canada's most popular journalists, whose talent is shown in recital as well as in review or romance, is to give us an Easter story, and those who remember her Christmas story, "The Unconfessed Cross," which appeared in our pages, will not need to be urged to read her latest production.

There will be a number of technical articles, dealing with the garden and its care and culture. An article on "Hot-beds and Cold Frames" will take up these features of horticulture from the standpoint of an expert. Mr. A. B. Cutting, who is a reliable authority on the subject, will write on the subject of vegetable gardens and show how these may be brought to the desired perfection. Photographs showing Canadian gardens at their best will appeal to all lovers of flowers. Miss M. E. Blacklock, who contributes "Garden Chat" to this issue, will help to make our April number a memorable presentation of garden trials and triumphs. We expect to have contributions from Miss Blacklock throughout the summer months.

SPECIAL ARTICLES, such as appeal to women whom ambition or necessity urges to look beyond the home for employment, are always eagerly read. "The Lady of the Dainty Lunches," which appeared in our Christmas number, was of interest to many of our friends. In this number we publish an article, "Chicken Lore and Table Eggs," which tells of how success came to an enterprising woman who had determined to make poultry pay. There will soon be another contribution on a diet kitchen whose feminine promoter and proprietor has met with most cheering results. We are sure that these actual accounts of how women have been successful in various business undertakings will prove more stimulating than any amount of advice on imaginary careers. We shall be glad, at any time, to receive a practical article of this nature, dealing with the real work that women are accomplishing, especially one on the woman rancher.

CONTENTS

March 1912

FICTION

A LEAP FROM THE TRAIN - - 7
THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS - - - 9
"A MAN HE WOULD A-WOOING GO" - 11
THE COST OF A CRIME - - - - 12

SPECIAL FEATURES

TO THE GIRLS ON THE FARM - - 6
RURAL SCHOOLS AND THEIR EQUIPMENT - - - - - - - - - 14
CHICKEN LORE AND TABLE EGGS - 17
SPRING MILLINERY - - - - - - 31
LINGERIE AND LACE - - - - - 32
THE EASTER BRIDE - - - - - 34
DYEING AT HOME - - - - - - 48
NAN'S HOME-MADE HATS AND GOWNS 49

FASHION DEPARTMENT

A LETTER ON LATEST MODES - - 19
FROCKS FOR THE SMALL PERSON - 20
TAILORED SUITS OF SPRING FASHIONS 21
FASHIONABLE STREET COSTUMES 22
MODELS FOR SILK AND WOOL - - 22
THE NEW EMBROIDERIES - - - 35
IN THE SHOPS - - - - - - - 36

MATTERS OF MENU

A ST. PATRICK'S DAY LUNCHEON - 15
CULINARY CONCEITS - - - - 53

FOR THE HOUSEHOLD

HOUSEHOLD DECORATION - - - 40
HOUSEHOLD HINTS- - - - - 52

SPECIAL DEPARTMENTS

THE JOURNAL'S JUNIORS - - - 16
AROUND THE HEARTH - - - - 18
GARDEN CHAT - - - - - - - 37
THE DRESSING-TABLE - - - - 39
WOMEN'S INSTITUTES - - - - 42
CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB - - - - 46
MATTERS MUSICAL - - - - - 47
BUT THAT'S ANOTHER STORY - - 54

SUBSCRIBERS' ADVERTISEMENT GUARANTEE—Readers of the "Canadian Home Journal" are fully protected when buying from any of our advertisers. We know that every advertiser in this issue is reliable, and that our readers will be dealt with fairly and honorably. Should any of our readers have any unsatisfactory dealing with any of our advertisers we will undertake to have a satisfactory adjustment made or money refunded. This absolute guarantee is good only when our readers tell advertisers when dealing with them that their advertisement was seen in the "Canadian Home Journal."

Certainly, Madam, Jap-a-lac is made in 22 different colors

—We thought you knew it!

PERHAPS you think of Jap-a-lac as good for half a dozen purposes. You can just as well use it for half a thousand. For Jap-a-lac is not only a stain and varnish combined. Jap-a-lac Natural is as fine a clear varnish as anybody wants to use. Jap-a-lac Enamels are superb. Jap-a-lac Gold and Jap-a-lac Aluminum are for touching up hundreds of things.

Why not get acquainted with the whole Jap-a-lac family. Learn how a few pennies invested in Jap-a-lac will save you many dollars in preserving articles you would otherwise have to replace.

You will find Natural Jap-a-lac unequaled if you merely want to freshen the finish. It renews faded colors—gives brilliancy, life, to the old floors and furniture.

Then there is colored Jap-a-lac (Transparent). It comes in Oak, Dark Oak, Walnut, Mahogany, Cherry, Malachite Green, Ox-Blood Red and Empire Blue. It retains the beautiful grain of the natural wood—adds a brilliant and durable finish. Use it on your tables, chairs, bric-a-brac—everywhere you require a varnish and stain in one.

Then there are Jap-a-lac Enamels—Apple Green Enamel, Enamel Red, Enamel Green (Dark), Enamel Green (Pale), Enamel Pink, Enamel Blue (Pale), Brilliant Black, Dead Black, Gloss White and Flat White.

Some of these you will want to use on your porch furniture—settees and swings; on lamps, chandeliers, baby buggies. The daintiest, most delicate tints—pale green, blues and pinks—are just the thing for bedroom woodwork and for the nursery.

And then there is Jap-a-lac Dead Black and Brilliant Black for different kinds of metal work—for rejuvenating and protecting screens, for leather work, for fire fronts, andirons, etc. Dead Black Jap-a-lac—the fashionable "wrought iron" effect—is for plate rails, picture frames, etc.

We have merely skimmed through the list of Jap-a-lac uses. Your own ingenuity, Madam, will suggest many more.

But be sure that you get Jap-a-lac itself and not an imitation. Imitations are not like Jap-a-lac. They have not the beauty, the covering capacity nor the durability. And no thinking woman wants an imitation when she asks for the genuine.

JAP-A-LAC
Renews
Everything from Cellar to Garret

10 Cents a Can and Up

Jap-a-lac is now sold in ten cent cans—enough to finish completely a small piece of furniture.

Note New Lower Prices on Jap-a-lac

Other prices and sizes, (Full Imperial Measure)—¼-pt. 18c; ½-pt. 30c; 1-pt. 50; 1-qt. 90c; ½-gal. $1.75; 1-gal. $3.50.

Let us send you the Jap-a-lac booklet of money-saving suggestions.

For Sale at Paint, Hardware and Drug Stores

The Glidden Varnish Company

Factories: Toronto, Can., Cleveland, Ohio. Branches: New York, Chicago

10 Cents a Copy

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

$1.00 a Year

Volume VIII TORONTO, MARCH, 1912 Number 11

The Musical Club

IN most of our Canadian towns and cities will be found a Women's Musical Club, which contributes not a little to the higher interests of the community. The value of music in the home or in the life of public entertainment can hardly be over-estimated, and no woman can afford to be without its refining and uplifting influence. The charm of such an interest is that it is ever widening and expanding, until one realizes that, like the other great arts, it is endless in development and infinite in variety.

By means of the musical club, women who might otherwise forget their musical interest or ambitions are encouraged to keep in touch with the activities of the realm of harmony. In our cities the women's musical clubs have induced many distinguished artists to appear in recital and have done much to foster local talent. The choral societies are the ultimate outgrowth of musical organization, which have given the greatest impetus to study of the world's masterpieces. In the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto, Canada possesses an unrivalled choral society, which has conferred inestimable benefit on the community by its performance of the finest works, and every year the concerts prove a widening source of inspiration to clubs and choirs beyond Ontario's boundaries.

* * *

The Ways of Fashion

IT was a wise Greek philosopher who said that there is nothing constant in life but change. It is the very nature of things, and the critic who is always finding fault with the varying of feminine fashions, would do well to watch the changing fields and woods, as they alter from spring's tender green to the ermine mantle of winter. It is, indeed, as Bryant tells us, a "circle of eternal change," and the girl who desires ardently a new spring hat is only in harmony with the daffodils and the robins.

PHOTOGRAPH BY ELSIE BANKS

Wherefore, we need not regard the ways of fashion as altogether those of folly. Their extremes may lead to what is harmful, but the ordinary change and novelty which come with the new garments of each season merely add interest and beauty to life. The existence of the average woman is made up of details, and a variety in the day's dress makes the round of domestic duties much more enlivening. Even a new ribbon or a fresh jabot may make all the difference between an old gown and one that is "renewed." Whatever new interests woman may gain, she is sure to keep always a regard for fine raiment—and no one who enjoys the brightness of this changing globe need regret that it is so.

* * *

A Word To Country Girls

A WORD of warning to country girls who seek employment in the city appears to be needed occasionally. There are, perhaps, no communities in the world where intercourse between girls and boys is more wholesome and free from morbid sentimentality, than the small towns or villages of Canada. It is quite natural that the girls from such homes are prepared to regard the world as a friendly place where a stranger who offers help or information has only the kindest intentions. It is difficult to believe in the absolute fiendishness of certain agencies which exist for the entrapping and destruction of innocent or over-credulous girls. We do not wish to magnify their danger, but the country girl who comes to a large centre seeking employment cannot be warned too plainly regarding their existence and methods.

No girl employed in a store or office should accept invitations or gifts from a stranger—even if the unknown benefactor be an elderly woman of gracious manner. There is only one rule for the young girl who is traveling or working alone—avoidance of all acquaintanceship with those who are not properly introduced. The Y.W.C.A., and other friendly organizations are now on the watch for young girls coming as strangers to the city, and it would be well to communicate with them as to boarding-houses before coming to the large centres of population.

* * *

Why Have Slums?

A WOMAN who has traveled widely said with impatience: "There is no sense in Canadians talking about slums as if we were helpless and could not avoid them. A young country like ours has no excuse for them and should take vigorous preventive action now."

There is an idea abroad that every city must have slums and paupers, that there is no use in trying to keep large districts from becoming breeding-places for disease and crime. This is the worst kind of fatalism and needs to be condemned by all good citizens. A writer in "LIPPINCOTTS' MAGAZINE" emphasizes the wisdom of and need for instant preventive action. In the United States, Kansas City, Cleveland, Rochester and St. Louis, have aroused to the seriousness of the situation. In the first-named city, an official Board of Public Welfare, composed of five citizens who serve without pay and who have a fund of two hundred thousand dollars this year, are waging war on the slums. Rochester affords an admirable civic example in the matter of slum prevention, and has made good provision for decent wages for all citizens. This work should be carried out by business men on a financial basis—and the Local Council of Women can give material aid.

There is no palliation for the slums, for what one city has done, another may certainly accomplish. But the evils associated with the slums are such as grow with mushroom rapidity, and they must be contended with early in the day if they are to be crushed. The ideal city has not yet been seen, but we are beginning to realize that Heaven helps those who make the best fight.

BACK DOOR OF EASTERN FARMHOUSE

A LETTER OF GREETING

To All the Girls on All the Farms in All of Canada

GREETINGS and my best wishes for 1912. This is the first opportunity I have had to extend New Year's greetings to you as it was hens and nothing else in my last letter. Now this time I have designs on you, each one of you girls who lives on a Canadian farm and reads the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL. I want to draw you out. I want your opinion, your aid, and your helpful suggestion. I think the most effective way to arouse you is to pick a subject which I am sure you have all thought of at times,—even if it was a subconscious thought—and state my views emphatically enough to stir you to express your own opinions on the matter either pro or con. Perhaps I should not give myself away at the beginning, but I dislike concealing a motive without any real reason, so I shall be open and above board, and then we are ready to say what we mean and mean what we say.

Now, if we were having a face to face conversation—a regular heart to heart—and this question was put to each and all without warning,—"Have you ever thought of a career?" I wonder how you would answer either aloud or to yourself. Don't picture to yourself a masculine, long striding, loud voiced suffragette as synonomous with a seeker after a career. That is farthest from my mind and my meaning. That women have a right to earn their own living, I am convinced, and that they can do so is being proved more and more. That they want equal rights with men to earn their daily bread is unquestionable, but this they can demonstrate much more effectively by proving themselves capable of holding a man's position in the business world, than by insulting their own womanhood as the fanatics, who need some excitement to change the monotony of their lives, are doing. When I speak of the question "Have you ever thought of a career?" I mean have you had the longing, too strong to put aside, to make your own way, to try yourself and prove yourself worthy, and to do it simply because it is your right. I don't mean you are planning to throw away your femininity or your dreams of a home of your own; if either or both of those won't stand the test you put upon them, it certainly is well for you to find it out for yourself.

Probably the majority of you, perhaps none of you, have used the word "career" in connection with your future life, but I am sure that every girl who has reached the age where she is capable of independent thought and ideas has pondered over the general course she wishes to pursue and has arrived at her own conclusions. Those two last clauses are the nucleus of this talk on careers. Let me repeat then that I am convinced that the present day country girl has her own firmly grounded notions about the course she wishes to pursue and has pondered over the matter and arrived at her own conclusions. I don't believe many of you will dispute that fact but there might be some reason to doubt the appropriateness of the conclusion.

Granted that a career or a future course or conduct of life, or whatever you prefer to call it, is the subject of meditation and planning with the girls who live what many of them consider a narrow, humdrum existence, please satisfy me on this point. How many girls plan practically, sensibly, logically for the work they wish to start on, and how many girls dream and imagine and build bright and impossible bridges over an unknown gulf which they know to be between them and the positions they desire to occupy?

I am very much interested in this subject. I have been a girl on a farm and know it is quite possible to be happy in that free, busy existence. I have lived the life and been satisfied with it, yet at the same time I have had those "immortal longings" which come to all of us, I believe, a one time or another, and which should be considered so very seriously and gravely, and decided one way or the other. Yes, form a definite opinion of your line of action and having come to your own conclusion, stick to it. Impossible, you say? Don't attempt the impossible, but plan as far as you are able and work towards your chosen intention as faithfully as you are allowed, remembering that "not failure but low aim is crime." Selfish, you think? Not if you consider carefully before choosing which way you shall set your course. Then if, as far as you can see, there is no outlook for you, and your work lies plainly at hand, take that work and make it your aim and object. Specialize your duty and if the real desire of your heart becomes too painful to harmonize with existing conditions lay that treasured longing and aspiration away and be a healthy minded capable girl, not a languid dreamer of dreams who wastes so much time craving a fellow being who will "understand" her that her mother has nearly all the work to do and almost wishes her daughter could follow the desired bent. If that longing of yours is the undefined call of your special talent don't be afraid to put it from you or to try and forget it; it is a part of you and will spring to life at any time.

I was brought to earth once with a sudden flop at this stage of the game. I was wasting a good deal of precious time worrying over the pros and cons and establishing myself on a pedestal as a martyred member of rural society, when a good friend of mine from whom I expected much sympathy, familiar as she was with the world and its possibilities as well as with my life, addressed me in words to this effect:

"You must make up your mind one way or the other. It is the indecision that is doing you bodily and mental injury. I would like to see you try to earn your own living and I think you have an over exalted idea of the difficulties you would have to overcome, and an underestimated notion of your own ability. I may be prejudiced in your favor, but I do not like this uncertainty and indecision."

Frankly, I was offended, and when one can sulk one's skirts are still not far from earth. When I had recovered my good humor I was off the pedestal on solid earth with a realization of my own responsibilities before me.

I find this subject a most difficult one. I am afraid I will give you an impression different from the one I really have, and lead you to think my ideas are most conflicting. Yet I am going to stumble along with it for I am positive there are girls and girls and girls who feel deeply on this tangled topic of an independent course for women, and perhaps some of them will gather new ideas or will feel glad of an opportunity of exchanging views. I know I am always anxious to discover how far my mind works like other people's, as far as a career is concerned, and how many of their arguments I am convinced are superior to my own. But right here let me stop once more and make my meaning clear. You may gather all the ideas and opinions and advice you can assimilate, or more but it is you alone who must decide the matter.

Suppose you are a girl who has decided on a career. What have you in mind? Are your ideas and plans practical, and will they stand the test of calm logical examination? Here we can see the advantage of the advice of some friend wiser and better versed in the ways of the world than ourselves. But no one can give advice who does not thoroughly understand the conditions, and it is so extremely difficult to explain all the circumstances, even to our nearest and dearest that it becomes imperative the final decision should rest with ourselves.

If your mind is set on a business position or a musical career, or a journalist's life, don't spend your spare moments seeing a rosy future in the fire or in the blue of the summer sky. It is much better to underestimate your ability and be pleasantly disappointed, provided your pluck is sufficient to carry you beyond the realm of aircastles into the stern unsympathetic world of realities. There is no time when a career, or whatever you would choose to call it, seems quite so easy and so much within our reach as when we are curled up before the fireplace of a farm house, secure from the storm which is raging ourside, or stretched on a rug or in a hammock under the trees in the shadow of the same protecting home. Be disillusioned before you start, and then having faced the fact squarely and found that it is possible or feasible or best or whatever the cause or reason may be, that you should make this move, marshall all the forces with which you have equipped yourself for the fray and never lose confidence in yourself until your last reserve has been routed. And that day will never come if you have acted up to the foregoing mode of procedure. The business world of to-day is a busy one and demands trained workers, yet it will make way for honest effort tempered with originality and a determination to succeed. If you can get experience in any particular line before starting for your Mecca, so much the better, but a farm isn't exactly a business college or an establishment for apprentices or anything of the sort, is it? That's one reason why the girls who go from the farms make their mark, as we say; they realize the handicap lack of experience has placed upon them, and they work more earnestly and with more concentrated effort, and with most enviable results.

A WESTERN RANCH HOUSE

If any one of all the girls or all the mothers of all the girls thinks I am urging the aforementioned girls to leave their homes in search of what I have called a career, I protest and emphatically deny the accusation. Every girl who is happy and contented in her life on a farm and looks forward to a happy marriage and a sheltered home life need give no thought to this perplexing problem; and every girl who sees plainly that circumstances forbid her leaving the work which lies clearly at hand should not let the matter trouble her. But in this progressive century of ours it is as natural for many girls to demand a test of themselves as it was for our grandmothers to marry before they were grown up. And those girls must think the matter out and act according to their best judgment, looking forward to the time when the successful outcome of the venture will do much to heal the wound inflicted at the seeming selfishness of the flitting.

Let me pass on to you the advice of a woman who has "made good," has made a name and an enviable reputation for herself. This letter of counsel was in answer to the inquiries of an inexperienced country girl who had stated her qualifications and asked for an opinion as to her chances in a large city.

"I think," she was told, and the "think" was underlined, "judging from your letter that you have good health and common sense. You have a knowledge of ——. Remember (to be commonplace) that so much depends on yourself. I think you should have enough money to keep the household of one going for three months. Excuse the practical details. It might be a little lonesome at first, but there is always good music and there are so many other things which 'may be had for the asking.' If you have pluck, skill, and good health you may toss mountains around in a game of ten pins,—which is Irish but true."

I am sure that sane, wholesome, encouraging advice will touch a spot in many hearts. It appeals particularly because of its directness and simplicity.

I am going to stop now with a recipe for success as a parting word. I don't know the author but the sentiment is truly commendable.

"Keep your head cool—your feet warm—your mind busy. Don't worry over trifles. Plan your work ahead and then stick to it—rain or shine. Don't waste sympathy on yourself. If you are a gem, someone will find you. Don't whine. Tell people you are a failure and they will believe you. Talk and act like a winner and in time you will become one."

Farm Girl

The Girl on the Farm

ONE of the most startling features of the census, says the Toronto Globe, is the recorded drift of women from the farms to the cities. While their adventurous brothers go West the sisters are crowding into the cities and towns to take places in whitewear factories, in departmental stores, and as stenographers and clerks. The migration of young men from the farms of Ontario has been going on for many years. In some measure the drain has been made good by the influx of male immigrants from Great Britain and other European countries.

The migration of the young women is a more serious thing for the future of the province, because the place of the migrants is not being taken by anyone. In Bruce there are 1,875 more males than females, in Grey 1,719, and in a small county like Welland, 2,381. There is scarcely a county in Ontario devoted chiefly to agriculture in which there are not many more men than women, while in the single constituency of North Toronto there are 7,500 more women than men.

Why is rural Ontario unable to keep the girl on the farm? In what respect do the cities and towns present superior attractions? The steady drain upon the country to supply school teachers for the West accounts for only a few hundred girls yearly. Ontario sends them forth joyfully, knowing that their career as teachers will be short, and that in their prairie homes they will become the mothers of the best types of Canadians.

But what happens to the girl who leaves the farm for a place in a whitewear factory or behind the counter? What of her future? Why should she prefer the discomfort of a hall bedroom and the physical weariness of factory life to the freedom and the healthy conditions of a country home? It would be worth the while of the Young Women's Guild and the Y.W.C.A. to get a few hundred answers to these questions from farmers' daughters in the stores and factories of Toronto. It would probably be found that the desire for pocket-money and the instinct of gregariousness are the two chief causes for the drift of the girls from the farm. Too many comfortable Ontario farmers think their daughters have no need of money, and that for their services an occasional dollar grudgingly doled out is ample recompense.

The desire for social intercourse is another potent reason for the country girl's migration. It seems to be generally agreed that there is not so much social life in the country as there was a generation ago.

Political and fiscal changes will not keep the girls on the farm. The telephone, with its facilities for arranging social gatherings; good wide roads that would permit women and girls to drive about more without danger of being crowded into the ditch by every passing motor car; the making of regular, systematic money allowances to the girls to be spent on their own initiative, and the introduction of sanitary conveniences into farm buildings would do much to prevent rural Ontario from becoming a country of elderly and middle-aged people, while the cities are swarming with pallid and restless girls who should be the life and the joy of the farms of this fertile province.

A LEAP FROM THE TRAIN

The Story of a Romantic Rescue with a Happy Conclusion

By E. EVERETT-GREEN

Copyright in Great Britain by Cassell & Co.

I

"GREAT blazes!" shouted the traveler, springing from his seat and leaning out of the window in an access of furious excitement and indignation. "Stop the train, you dundering fools! Can't you see it's deadly earnest—maybe life or death for the girl? Does nobody else see? Good Lord, he'll have her. Why in thunder haven't I my rifle with me? Good Lord—and to think this sort of thing can go on in old England."

The train—a fast express— was rushing through a bleak expanse of desolate moorland. No house was to be seen; scarce a tree broke the monotony of the wide dismal expanse. Two white roads, one east and west, the other north and south, meandered like pale ribbons in undulating curves over the uneven surface of the vast heath. Where they met and crossed a gaunt dead tree raised its blasted head, and stretched forth two great limbs with a weird resemblance to some twisted, writhing human form.

Hangman's Oak this tree was called; and time was when from its strong limbs human forms had dangled. Hangman's Heath the moorland was called, and it was, at every season of the year, a singularly desolate region; but perhaps never more so than beneath the lowering sky of a dull November afternoon, when the short daylight was waning, and the shades of night imperceptibly stealing on.

The traveler was alone in his compartment. He had been reading for some time—reading with eagerness the latest news in English papers, as a man does who is just off a longish voyage, where wireless telegraphy has not kept the ship's company in touch with recent happenings.

Suddenly, chancing to look up, he had leaped to his feet and to the window in a state of wild excitement. A man was pursuing a girl—the girl was flying as for dear life. His immensely strong and powerful eyes caught something of the wild terror in her face, the savage ferocity on that of the man. A casual onlooker might think that he was witnessing a playful contest of swiftness between rustic lovers: one of those playful episodes which enliven rural courtship. But this man's eyes told him more. This was no play—it was deadly earnest—and some woman was in peril—an English maiden—with no succour at hand. What could he do? He rushed to the communication cord; but, with his hand upon it, he paused. This was a swift express—a train of importance. What could he say to the guard? Who would stop a train for what he had to tell? But would he stop the train before he came to ask the cause? Was it worth the experiment? Ivor's strong hand was still upon the cord, when something else caught his attention.

The pace of the train had changed. It was slowing down; had someone else seen, and acted with greater promptitude than himself? Headlong though the speed still was—carrying them right past the scene which had challenged his attention—it was certainly slacking its pace. Ivor thrust his head out of the window once again. Surely the stars in their courses were fighting—for someone. There were signals at a place where a branch line joined the main—and the signals were against the express. The panting engine was slowly drawing up.

Ivor knew that at any moment the signal might drop and the pace instantly accelerate; but he vowed that when this thing happened he would not be on the train. He was out upon the footboard, waiting, waiting till he dared to make the leap. Luckily for him the raw air kept guard and passengers from any great interest in the doings of the train. Slower—slower—now he could adventure it. One lithe spring in the direction in which the train was traveling; firm ground beneath his feet which reeled for a moment and then recovered balance. Next instant Ivor Dane, his luggage and impedimenta left behind in the London express, was scooting back along the line of the rail as fast as swift feet and powerful lungs could carry him, in the direction of that chase which he had witnessed, and the issue of which had been all too clear to him—if help could not arrive in time.

II

MISS MURIEL, dear, it's no use waiting longer. The doctor isn't going to come to-day. We'll have to go for the medicine ourselves—you or I; and it'll have to be you to-day, dearie. My poor knee is that bad, I'd never get there and back before midnight."

The girl's face turned suddenly white. She was warming up beef-tea over the fire in a cosy farm-house kitchen. She looked at the old servant with a mute appeal in her eyes. This appeal was instantly understood; but the woman sought to put a brave face on the matter and spoke cheerily.

"Now don't you go and get too much afeerd, my dearie. I know what you're thinking of—the Black Squire of Wildacre. But he can't always be watching for you, and there's nobody could be telling him that you were crossing the heath this afternoon. He's got his land to see to and his game to shoot. It's not like Sunday afternoon, when folks can guess as you might be on your way to church. Besides, even if he did walk a piece with you, and try and say a few pretty things——"

"It's not pretty things he has to say to me now, Martha," spoke the girl with a visible shudder. "Since I refused him the third time, he has been terribly angry. He says dreadful things. He frightens me horribly. He says he will have me, living or dead, and that he'd rather kill me with his own hands than see me the wife of anybody else. I've toldhim there is no one else; but it scarcely makes any difference. He says there will be one before long, and he'd like better to see me lying dead at his feet than that any other man should ever—"

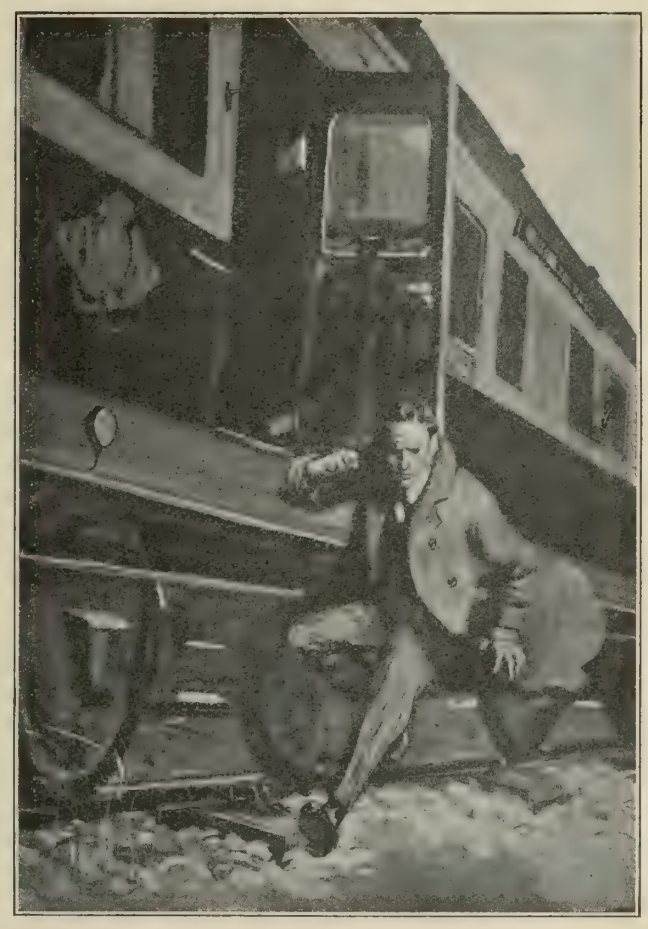
"Hoots, lassie; that's just his silly clavers. Men like him don't mean half they say. They get a wild, wicked fashion of talking, and nobody pays much heed to it. It's just his ill way of wanting to scare you into doing his will——"

"Which I never, never, never will, Martha. I'd sooner die—if that was the only choice."

"Which it isn't, my bairn. Now don't go for to worrit yourself into a fever. Your poor mother is suffering, and we have got to get that medicine for her. I'd go and welcome, but for this knee of mine."

Muriel, with a set, stern young face, was already donning her cloak and hat. She was very pale; but her mind was evidently made up. Martha watched her, and saw the pressure she was putting upon herself. She laid a hand on the girl's arm.

"It's a good lassie and a good daughter you are,



"One little spring in the direction the train was travelling——" my bairn, and I'll be praying for ye that no hurt comes your way. Yon Black Squire likely will be miles away and ye'll never clap eyes on him. And his words be a deal worse than anything as he would dare to do to you—so don't ye show any fear of him; and maybe if you get to the doctor's all safe and sound, he'll bring you home himself."

"Perhaps he will," spoke Muriel, with as confident an air as she could assume. "I don't mind anything but crossing Hangman's Heath. It's so terribly lonely and eerie. Only Wildacre's chimneys to be seen from anywhere, and I hate the sight of them. I wish they were farther away."

The girl set forth upon her lonely walk, without even a dog as a companion. She often longed for a faithful four-footed friend to guard her steps and act as her companion; but her mother's diminished income was so pitifully small, since the failure of a bank had spread distress far and wide through the locality where once they had lived in modest comfort and simple luxury. Even the keep and the licence of a dog would have to be carefully considered. They had taken this quaint, but almost ruinous old farm house, because it was near their faithful Martha's old home. It was to be had for a mere song, if the tenant did not bother the landlord to spend money on it. Martha had stalwart nephews in the carpentering and building trade, who came over to "take tea" with her, bringing their tools with them, and spent their time in patching and tinkering, so that the poor lady and her winsome daughter should have a dry roof over their heads. Muriel's sweet thanks was all the pay she could give, and all they wanted. Their humble friends and neighbors showed them much true kindness in a surreptitious fashion, which showed much of native delicacy and dignity. The girl would have been very happy in her strange home, save for two causes—the ill-health and frequent severe suffering of her fragile mother, and the most unwelcome and unwarrantable attentions of a man of eccentric behaviour, who lived upon the edge of the heath, and had won for himself the sobriquet of the Black Squire of Wildacre.

He had seen Muriel in the hamlet once as he rode through; after that he called upon Mrs. Grey, making himself singularly agreeable (at the first), and sending presents of fish or game or fruit according to the season.

Then, almost without warning, he began making furious love to Muriel. Had he gone about more warily, had he not frightened her with his violence and almost scorched her by the intemperate heat of his passion, she might possibly have been won; for he was a personable man, though much her senior, and she was lonely in her life, and grateful for his kindness.

But he terrified her by the stormy nature of his wooing, and when thwarted he showed a brutal and terrible side to his nature, of which otherwise she might for long have remained in ignorance. Now she feared him terribly, for he had not only ceased his friendly visits, he had threatened her with his undying enmity. Men whispered of the man that he was not entirely sane; that there was insanity in the family, which broke out unexpectedly, no one exactly knew why or how. It might take many forms. There had been homicidal Wilderses in old days, and others who had taken their own lives. Muriel could not help listening to the legends of the wild squires of the heath; but it was these stories which caused her own fears to assume proportions which had not so far been justified by events. Old Martha would remind her that hard words broke no bones, and try to laugh away her fears; yet all the same it was with a very timid and shrinking heart that Muriel set forth this drear November afternoon upon her walk over Hangman's Heath.

III

MURIEL accomplished her journey to the doctor's house without adventure or misadventure. She had seen nothing of her enemy as she crossed the lonely heath; with the exhilaration of her breezy walk, and the cheery, kindly greetings of the doctor, she felt her fears melt away and her spirit return.

He could only take her back a little part of the journey, for he had had an urgent summons in another direction. He put her down just on the confines of the lonely heath, and himself took the road which ran beside the railway line for some way, and then branched off into the hilly country beyond.

But Muriel had been cheered and heartened by his kindly talk; she had the medicine with her which would ease her mother's pain. The heath looked grim and lonesome indeed; but home was just on its other border. She set forth with a lightened heart, for she felt it absurd to think that the Black Squire kept watch for her infrequent passage of the lonely waste; and she was humming a little tune to herself as she went her way, when suddenly she was stopped short—her pulses leaping, her whole frame shuddering with an access of terrible fear.

A tall figure leaped up from a hollow in the ground which had concealed from her view the fact that any human being was near. The man she feared and hated stood towering over her; he held out his great strong hands to her.

"At last, my darling—at last!"

There was a strange wild light in his eyes—was it the light of madness? The stories she had heard of him and of his forbears rushed through Muriel's agitated mind. A terror, cold and grim, seized upon her; she flung out her hands as though to hold him back; and words sprang to her lips which it had been more prudent to leave unspoken, but she was in no case to weigh the probable effect of them—they were uttered almost before she was aware of them.

"Go away—go away! I am not your darling—I never was. You have no right to speak to me like that. I have told you that I never wish to see you again. Ah——"

The interjection was almost a scream, for the mad fury that sprang into his eyes terrified her, and she turned in her tracks and fled wildly from him in the direction in which she had come—careless where her steps led her, if only she might escape from the horror of being clasped in the arms of that madman and forced to submit to his wild endearments. That he was mad she did not doubt. Oh, whither could she flee from him? For he was possessed by a fury of anger, as well as that of wild love, which frightened her yet more. Had he not said he would kill her, rather than let her belong to another? And that spark of red in his eyes that she had seen looked like the light of murder.

Terror lent wings to her feet. For a moment her swiftness was so great that she distanced him by a considerable gap. He had been lying on the cold ground, and his limbs were a little stiff and chilled. But he sent out his voice in a roar, like that of a beast deprived of his prey, and Muriel's feet faltered for a moment; then she sprinted on with every power she possessed.

But he was coming after her—he was gaining upon her—she knew it, though she dared not look round. On and on and on she fled, her breath coming in long drawn sobs, an icy hand clutching at her heart, the thunder of her blood drumming in her ears. What was that other thundering noise? Surely one of the great express trains flying across the dreary waste! Oh, if she could but gain the metals—fling herself across them—let herself be cut to pieces by grinding wheels rather than fall into the hands of that madman behind!

Her foot caught in some obstruction in the path; she fell prone along the heather. She heard a shout as of triumph; then her senses failed her. Blackness swallowed her up. She knew no more.

When next the girl began to be conscious of her surroundings she was aware of a succession of strange sounds in her immediate vicinity. She was still lying face downward in the heather; she was bathed in the sweat of terror and exertion; but no hands were laid upon her, no voice was uttering words either of endearment or of threatening anger. Yet there were deep breathings, stamping of feet, strange hissing noises that she could not understand or interpret. Then with a great effort she lifted herself into a sitting posture and what did she see?

Two men wrestling together like the gladiators of ancient days—wrestling silently, with a deadly intensity of purpose which sent shivers through the girl's frame. One dark, wrathful face with starting eyes and protruding purple veins she knew all too well—the face of her pursuer. The other man was a total stranger—fair, stalwart, deep of chest, lithe of limb. Ah, heaven be thanked! He had flung his adversary at last. Wilders fell heavily, his head against the ground. He fell and lay still, like a creature without life.

With a little cry of mingled terror and relief, Muriel sprang to her feet. She found herself face to face with the fair-haired stranger.

"Did he hurt you?" asked her rescuer, still drawing his breath hard.

"No, he did not hurt me; but oh, I was so frightened. They think he is mad around here. Oh, how did you come? How did you know? He is not dead, is he?"

She looked fearfully at her prostrate foe. The tall man beside her laughed.

"Oh, no, he is not dead; he has only had the breath knocked out of him. He will be all right in a few minutes. Will you let me see you safe home? I saw how he was frightening you as the train passed along. It was stopped by the signals over yonder, and I got out. I was just in time to see you fall—and to give a lesson to yonder gentleman. See, he is beginning to move. Suppose we get on. I am quite ready to fight him again if needful; but perhaps you would like better to save the situation by flight."

IV

"HOW can I thank you, sir?" asked Muriel's mother, with tears in her eyes, as the tall stranger, who had brought home her darling child, came at her request and stood beside her couch. From Martha she had heard the story of the girl's adventure and peril; for the arrival of the stranger had caused some excitement, and the old servant felt that her mistress ought to hear all the tale. She had insisted upon seeing Ivor Dane himself, and there were tears in her eyes as she held out her transparent hands towards him.

"Indeed, I am only too glad to have been of service. It was a horrible thing to watch—helpless. The stopping of the train was a bit of sheer Providence—I'm not ashamed to say so. It gave me my chance; that was all. But it's Providence you have to thank for the chance it gave to me."

"Indeed, I thank God from the ground of my heart; but I want to thank you also. Is there any little thing that we could do?"

Ivor recognized at once the genuineness of the wish, and answered smiling:

"Could you put me up for the night in this old farm of yours? Any kind of a shakedown does for a traveler who has roughed it as I have."

So the stranger stayed, not one night, but many. Fot the next day the weather broke; pouring rain was succeeded by heavy snows, and strong, willing arms were wanted at the lonely homestead if the little party there was not to be reduced to direst straits.

But to a man who has wintered in the Arctic—who has known life at Klondike—the snows of Cumberland were but as child's pastime. And what a pastime it was! As if by magic a sledge and horses arrived at the door. Muriel was wrapped to the chin in furs, and was driven into the nearest town by the stranger guest, where stores were taken on board—undreamed-of luxuries for the invalid—and blankets and down coverlets galore. Coal by the truck load, at fabulous price (Muriel was sure), was commandeered, and arrangements made for delivery. His own baggage, wired for the first day, was likewise transported to the farm. Ivor had made his own appeal to the tenant of the ramshackle place.

"I've not a soul belonging to me over here. This place is big for you. I wish you'd sublet a corner of it to me—for my headquarters. I won't be in your way, and it would have a sort of feeling of home about it!"

How Muriel's eyes had glowed and sparkled when she heard. All the fear had passed from her face now. She sang as she went about her household duties. Whenever she knew that Ivor was out, she would run to his rooms to dust and sweep and keep every thing in the most iexquisite order. As for his meals——

"If you would just let us have a common table it would save such a lot of trouble—and expense," he had pleaded. And now good joints, nourishing food of every kind graced their board; the invalid gained strength, Muriel unfolded new graces and charms every day—like a flower in the sunshine. Though the days were dark and grim, there was light and warmth at the homestead. Two men attended daily to care for the horses which now lived in the long-disused stable, and care for the cow whose milk delighted Martha's heart and did so much for the invalid shut up in her now well-warmed room.

Mistress and servant knew well what it all boded.

"Thank heaven he's such a good lad—and kind of heart. For I saw it in his eyes the first time I clapped mine upon 'em, how it was going to be. It was love at first sight with him—whether he knew it or not; and, bless her heart, she can think of nothing but him from morn till night. Well, well, it's Providence we see through it all; and though he was a stranger to us a few weeks ago, I'll not be afraid to give our darling to him when the time of the singing of birds is come."

It was a wild, snowy Christmas Eve, when a strange bit of news came to the homestead, where Ivor Dane was decorating the rooms with holly, and Muriel watching and helping, as she toasted cakes for tea, and set forth jam and all sorts of luxuries once undreamed of in honor of the festive occasion. How sweet she looked, the man thought, with the red fire-light shining in her eyes and lighting the cream and roses of her happy face. His own heart throbbed strangely as he watched her. How soon would he dare to put his fate to the touch? For well he knew that the whole wide world held but one woman for him.

There was a little stir at the door, and one of the men came in with an armful of logs for the fire. As he piled them up in the corner of the ingle-nook, he spoke his bit of news.

"They've found the body of the Squire of Wildacre; he was lost in a snowdrift; maybe he'd abin there for days. Doctor said he'd bin dead a goodish while. Well, well—them Wilderses seldom dies in their beds—and seldom want to, they say."

The man went out, and Ivor came and stood close beside Muriel. News had been brought before that the squire had taken himself off without a word, just a week ago; but as this was rather a way of his, no particular surprise had been aroused. And now his body had been found in the snow; he was dead and gone. Muriel lifted her face and looked mutely at Ivor.

"Poor man," she said softly, "I suppose he was not quite like other people. I was terribly afraid of him once, but—but—I have not had time to think of him lately."

"And I can only think of him with gratitude," spoke Ivor, his arm stealing inch by inch round Muriel's slender waist; "for had it not been for the madman's chase across Hangman's Heath—oh, my darling, my sweet one, my own and only love—I might be living in loneliness and solitude still. Muriel, Muriel, I cannot keep it to myself another moment. I love you—love you—love you!"

V

"THE Mad Squire" had made a will which there was none to dispute. He had left Wildacre Hall to Muriel. He had nothing else to leave, having squandered his money to the last farthing. The place was mortgaged too, but Ivor's gold, won at Klondike, redeemed it, beautified it, made it a fitting home for their happy married life.

Muriel's mother lived to see her darling a happy wife and mother. Old Martha still holds sway in Muriel's nursery, and the children love to cluster round her high backed chair and hear the legends of the countryside from her lips.

But the story they love best to hear is how daddy came to the rescue of their darling mother, by leaping from an express train going at full speed—for a legend that does not improve upon fact is but a poor thing—just as she was being chased by a raving lunatic black man across the lonely waste of Hangman's Heath.

IS THE OPAL UNLUCKY?

THE belief that the opal is unlucky apparently is not as ancient as has been supposed. The Greeks, says the Pall Mall Gazette, believed it possessed the power of bestowing second sight to those under its influence, provided they did not use the power for selfish ends. By its misuse they became unlucky in love, disappointment and misfortune dogging their footsteps.

The theory was started that for occult reasons the opal was unlucky or that it brought ill luck to its possessor, and succeeding generations have inherited the distrust that was thus aroused.

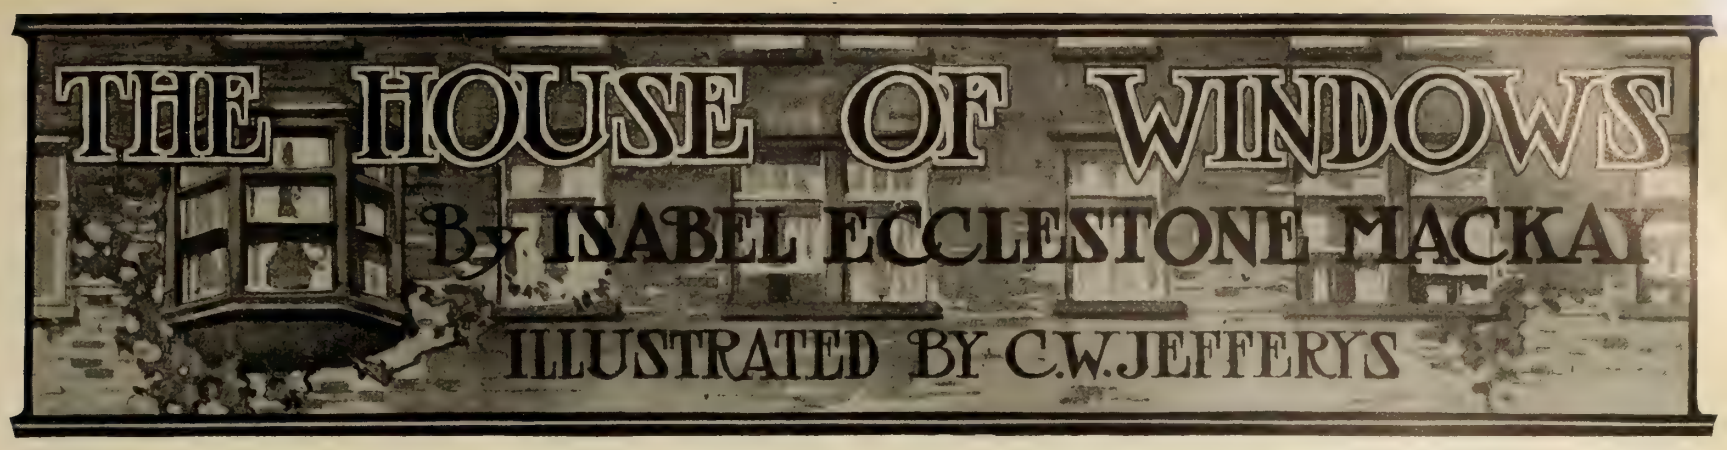
The idea that opals were unlucky is thought by many to be on account of the unfortunate part Sir Walter Scott assigned to it in his "Anne of Geierstein." But the gem must have appealed to so great a lover of beauty in animate and inanimate Nature as Sir Walter, and it must have been far indeed from his thoughts to engender superstition by giving a bad name to a marvellous example of creative energy.

The opal is also associated with misfortune by Russians of both sexes, who should they chance to see an opal among the goods displayed for purchase will buy nothing more that day, and it is a curious fact that the Japanese, being under the sign that this stone belongs to, should be the nation to bring such ill luck to the Russians during the disastrous war between these two countries.

The Romans of old loved the opal so well that they bestowed upon it the name of "lovely youth." It never occurred to them that it was a gem which carried ill luck to its possessor. Lucky indeed did that Roman esteem himself who was the owner of an opal that filled his neighbor with envy.

In the Middle Ages there were not wanting men who shared the Romans' weakness, for opals did not lose popularity as time went on. Each century brought its own joys and sorrows, luck and ill luck to the human race, and each age brought its fashions in jewelry as in clothing, but the opal remained high in favor and entered largely into the adornment of both sexes. Its frangibility was well known, but this was regarded not as a failing so much as a special claim on the care of all who handled it.

Along among jewels the opal defies the ingenuity of the imitator. It owes its charms not so much to its own intrinsic merits as to the splendor of the rays of light that it reflects. It is the chameleon of stones. Pliny, writing 1819 years ago, remarked that it "displays at once the piercing fire of carbuncles, the purple brilliancy of amethysts, and the sea green of emeralds, the whole blended together and refulgent with a brightness that is quite incredible."



SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

An infant is deserted by a woman who leaves it in the store of Angers and Son. It is adopted by Celia Brown, who takes it home to "The House of Windows." The child is given the name of Christine Brown. Some time before the desertion, Adam Torrance, the real owner of Angers and Son, has his only child kidnapped. Of this occurrence Celia is ignorant. Adam Torrance hears that his child has died. His wife also dies, and he lives abroad. Sixteen years pass and Christine continues to live with Celia and her blind sister, Ada. Celia is in financial distress and Christine determines to apply for position of "reader" to Miss Torrance. Mark Wareham, nephew of the latter, follows the unsuccessful Christine, and contrives to make her acquaintance. Adam Torrance, who has returned to the city, sends Mark, his nephew, out to British Columbia. Christine secures a position in "the Stores." Christine is followed by a sinister-looking old beggar woman, and is further annoyed by the attention of Gilbert Van Slyke. The woman, whose daughter's employment in "the Stores" long ago, had led to moral disaster, is determined to wreak vengeance on Christine, whom she had stolen. Adam Torrance visits "The House of Windows" in order to relieve the sisters' distress. He shows them great kindness. On his return home he finds a letter informing him that his daughter is alive and in peril. He sets out to find her, and, in the meantime, his nephew, Mark Wareham, returns and is injured in an accident. To complete the catastrophe, Christine disappears suddenly. It is discovered that Christine is Adam Torrance's long-lost daughter, and that she has been kidnapped again by the old beggar woman. Mark tells of his attachment for Christine and joins in the search.

WITH a chastened air Mark permitted himself to be propped up upon the pillows. "So long as I am doing something," he declared, "I don't care where I do it."

"And, Mark, Aunt Miriam is here. She has been staying here since you were hurt. She wants to see you! but I warn you she will talk of Christine—"

Mark groaned. "Oh, let her come up. Nothing could make the suspense worse than it is, and Aunt Miriam is such a good sort."

Adam Torrance smiled a little as he left the room and despatched Aunt Miriam in his stead. He knew that, if Mark could only stand it, her constant talk of Christine, of her beauty, her sweetness and their own unnatural stupidity in not recognizing her by instinct, would effectually prevent the young man's mind from dwelling too closely upon the more immediate problems. For by some curious psychological process, Aunt Miriam had almost convinced herself that she and she alone had had some inkling of the truth from the very moment she had seen Christine. The news, she declared, had not come to her as a surprise at all! She had 'felt in her bones' that Christine was not what she seemed to be and she was never tired of bitterly blaming herself for what she described as the criminal want of self-confidence which had prevented her from stating her convictions earlier. Nevertheless, the good old lady had virtually adopted Ada, and, by proxy, Celia (whom she had not yet seem) and her unfailing optimism had done much to keep up the general courage in those anxious days.

For in spite of all the new information which had made the detective so hopeful, there had been absolutely nothing to relieve the ever growing dread of those who loved Christine. The young girl seemed to have vanished off the face of the earth. In spite of Mr. Johnson's best efforts, no new facts whatever had been brought to light. Time, money, effort, had been spent like water, and the only result, so far, was a few dozen old women frightened into fits by the well-meant efforts of eager detectives.

One can imagine, then, the relief with which the unduly self-confident Mr. Johnson received the news that at last a certain clue had been found: although his satisfaction was necessarily tempered with annoyance that he had not thought of such a possibility before. At any rate he lost no time in hurrying down to the Torrance house where he found Mark surrounded by sketching materials and just putting the finishing touches upon a vivid sketch of as forbidding a face as any he had seen in a long day. Mark, who, in his amateur way, had the making of a clever artist, had certainly surpassed himself. The ugly, repulsive face stared at one with eyes that actually seemed alive with hate. The thick lips were curling into a snarl.

"By Jove!" exclaimed the big detective. "It's only a question of time now, and a short time at that! A woman with a mug like this ought to leave a considerable mark somewhere. She's not known to the police, that's certain, or I would recognize her at once. But then we were practically sure of that, for there's not a spotted character in the city who has not been through our hands during the search. Well, I'll get photographs of this in the hands of our men at once. To-morrow ought to see us sure of our quarry."

"And to-morrow I get up!" said Mark. "Henceforth where you go, I go. You'll need me, you know, for identification and perhaps for a few other purposes also."

"There is no use trying to dissuade him," declared Aunt Miriam, "Doctors or no doctors. Doctors are fools anyhow—look at me! If I had believed everything that the doctors had to say I would be dead instead of only half dead, as I am now. Besides, I have an intuition that Mark is destined to find our dear girl. If I had followed my first intuition she would never have been lost. The moment I saw her I felt a strange instinct—yes, I did, Adam. I think I may be allowed to know my own feelings!"

"Quite so," agreed the detective, blandly. "And now I will lose no time in getting this excellent picture into the proper hands. You may be sure that the moment I have placed the original I will let you know. Like Miss Torrance, I have an intuition that we shall not have long to wait."

As he left the room he passed the solemn Benson, who entered to announce that Miss Ada Brown was waiting in the library.

"Thank God, there is news for her at last!" said Mr. Torrance. "Tell her I'll be down at once." He left the room in a hurry.

"Did you see that, Mark?" asked Aunt Miriam, shrewdly. "I am not a prophet or the son of a prophet, but I have an intuition—" she nodded mysteriously after the retreating figure and made strange but illuminative gestures with her tiny hands.

"Why, Auntie! How absurd. It is only his natural anxiety—"

"Natural anxiety, indeed! Did you see him fix his tie in the mirror as he went out? (Just as though she could see whether it was straight or crooked, poor thing!) Did you notice that he did not ask me to go down to her—as he might very properly have done? Besides, I have seen what I have seen and I feel instinctively that I am not mistaken. Intuition is a very strange thing—I shall always feel that if I had followed my intuition in regard to Christine—"

"I think it is time for my medicine, Auntie—will you see?"

CHAPTER XXVII.

"LIFE is queer!" said Mark, and having made that brilliantly original remark he proceeded to amplify it. "It seems to me," he said, "that life is like a portmanteau packed in the deuce of a hurry. All the necessary things are there but they are so misplaced, so jumbled together that one never places one's hand upon the right thing at the right time. If one wants, for instance, the time-table, one invariably grasps the soap; if a tooth-brush is frantically needed, one's pyjamas persist upon being the only thing in evidence, and so forth. Still, if one waits and is properly patient it is possible that things may sort themselves in time."

"Perhaps," said Tommy absently. He was pacing the room impatiently, stopping at every turn to gaze out of the window for the usually prompt Mr. Johnson was already ten minutes late.

"Take me, for example," went on Mark, who, as he had been forbidden to walk more than was necessary, was trying to drown his own fiery impatience in philosophy. "My life portmanteau is fairly well supplied, but everything was put in upside down. I have (I hope you will pardon these personal allusions) a certain artistic talent but it had never been of the slightest use to me until yesterday. I have a certain amount of brain power but I have never been allowed to use it properly. Uncle's money is a good thing: I adore money and what it will buy, but, in my portmanteau, it has been, like the suit of pyjamas, a coverer up of other things just as useful. And then—there is Chr—Miss Brown. If I had met her a few years ago what a difference—?"

"He is coming now!" said Tommy. "Let me help you on with your coat. You feel quite sure that you are able to go with us?"

"Quite. I'm perfectly well."

"That's good news," said the big detective, who entered in time to catch the last words. "We can't do without you this morning. The picture has been thoroughly identified and that without approaching the original—whom of course, we must not frighten too soon. She is known as Granny Bates and lives in a hovel on Hill Street. The place has been under constant surveillance since we spotted it early this morning, but the sooner we make our raid the better. The men report no sign of life but, of course, that is to be expected. It's early yet and she is probably lying low. Mr. Torrance is waiting in the auto so we will start if you are ready."

"We are ready. But you are not going to take an auto, surely?"

"Only part of the way. Although we might, I suppose, drive right up to the door. No one in that house can get away. Still it might be a risk."

"Johnson," said Mark. "If you take any risks—why man, if they are frightened, who can tell what they might not do?—even now if they guess that your men have surrounded them and she is there—in their power—'?

"They can't guess. The men are not sitting on the door-step, and—we're wasting time."

"She must have been lying upon this very bed."

It was a quartet of stern and white-faced men who left the auto at the corner of Hill Street. Now that the end of their long search seemed in sight they were sick with apprehension. Even the phlegmatic detective was less cheery than usual. "Somehow," he whispered aside to Tommy, "I kind of believe in intuition myself. and if there's anything in this kind of 'gone' feeling that I have we're in for another disappointment, and a big one."

They walked down the squalid street singly, although indeed it seemed as if a regiment might have tramped by at that hour without arousing much interest behind its dirty window panes. At a time when other streets were awakening to the life of a busy day, Hill Street still sleeps. The clock goes backward in Hill Street, and night usurps the place of day. Only one rickety door sprang open as they passed and one towzeled head regarded them with eyes of lively suspicion.

Upon Granny Bates' hovel there rested an ominous quiet. There are differences in quiet, not only in degree but in kind. There is the quiet of living things, the stillness which speaks of bated breath and hushed, strained waiting, and there is also the quiet of emptiness, the stillness which means that life has gone away. This and the instinctive realizing of it was all expressed in Mark's whispered phrase, "It feels as if there was no one here!" A remark at which the big detective shook his head and striding up to the closed door he lifted the latch, prepared to use his great strength to force immediate entrance. But greatly to his surprise, the door opened without much effort. Its only security had been a rusted key in a crazy lock. They found themselves in a tiny passage, dark and evil-smelling. To their right an open door led into a small room whose one dirty window faced the street. Its spare contents were plainly revealed in the morning light—a table, three rickety chairs, a broken stove. The air was comparatively fresh owing to a broken window pane, inadequately plugged with paper, but the ashes in the broken stove were long cold. The room was empty! With a suppressed groan, Mark dashed past the rickety table to a closed door upon the other side. This led into a room, still smaller, dirtier, more evil smelling and quite as empty. Its one window looked out upon a small and filthy back yard where a gaunt cat sunned itself. In a corner stood something which was probably intended for a bed, its soiled bed clothes dragging upon the unswept floor—

"Gone!" ejaculated the detective. "By Jove! It's a cold trail—we've come too late!"

There was only one other room in the hovel—a tiny, lean-to kitchen, chocked with refuse and plainly never used. It's broken door was half open and led into the back yard, untenanted save for the hungry cat.

With a sudden feeling of nausea, Mark sank into one of the rickety chairs. The other men looked at each other in silent dismay.

"She's made a clean get away!" declared Johnson. "But we're this much farther ahead. There's no doubt, now, but that we are on the right track. The old woman who fled from this place is the old woman we want—that's something! Now let us see what else we may find to help us. With practised ease he moved around the room sniffing, peering, examining with trained senses. The others watched him in silence.

"Well," he said presently, "there is not much to go on. This fire has been out for a long time, weeks probably. They must have got out of this the moment they had the girl. It was all well planned; everything done quickly, but not in a hurry—the room's disorder was natural, I imagine—everything shows signs of having been deliberately abandoned."

"How about the disordered bed in the other room?"

"Oh, old Granny wouldn't trouble to make a bed—although it does look as if this one were even more than ordinarily upset. Notice the wild disorder of the clothes. They have been taken up bodily and flung upon the floor!"

"It looks," said Mark, who had succeeded in recovering himself. "It looks as if someone had been searching for something."

"That is so. It does. Look, the pillow-case even has been stripped off. By Jove, that accounts for the way in which the ashes in the stove are raked out! Someone has been searching and, not finding, has been looking for traces of something which might have been burned."

"Suppose then," said Mark, "that we look also. See, there is candle grease on the bed, the other searcher had to look by night. What she could not find, we may."

"Excellent," agreed the detective, a little drily. "If you go on you will soon be deducing things like Sherlock Holmes. Strange how deductions are almost always wrong—except in books. I remember once—"

But what Mr. Johnson remembered was never known for at that moment Tommy, who was struggling with a very dirty blanket began to sniff violently and to dance around in a most peculiar manner.

"Smell this!' he almost shrieked, pushing the unsavoury covering under Mark's nose. "Smell it, smell it!"

Marked sniffed eagerly. "Why, it's—it's—What is it anyway—it's like the dressing that they put on my head!"

"It's carbolic acid, man! Carbolic—acid—don't you see? Christine had carbolic acid—and glycerine and rose water! And this blanket has been dosed with the acid—not the pure, the kind they sell diluted—but the smell is the same!"

"It is certainly carbolic," said the detective, gravely. He turned away that the others might not see the sudden fearful suspicion in his eyes.

But Tommy saw nothing ominous in the discovery. "She has been here," he declared, "and she has been clever enough to leave at least a trace of her presence. She had the stuff in her pocket; what more easy than to soak the nearest thing at hand. She must have been lying upon this very bed—"

"Stop it!" Mark who was tugging frantically at the rotten mattress felt deathly faint at the vision which Tommy's excited words had conjured up. "Here, help me with this. If she left that, she may have left something else." They dragged the mattress into the other room and carefully examined it. It was dirty and torn, but it concealed nothing. The bed itself was then examined with a similar result—the floor was gone over almost inch by inch; the blanket, the quilt, the pillow, all yielded nothing. Yet Mark would not give up. "I am sure there is something," he declared over and over. "If she was here she left something and they missed it and came back for it."

"Perhaps they got it?" suggested Mr. Torrance.

"No—else why did they rake out the ashes in order to satisfy themselves whether or not it had been burned?"

"Your reasoning is sound," said the detective. "But like lots of sound reasoning it doesn't help any, for if the other searches did not find it, it is evident that we are not going to fare any better. We have tried everything—"

"No, there must be some things which we have not tried. For instance, one might try putting oneself in her place." Suiting the action to the word, he flung himself at full length upon the uninviting bed. "Now," he went on, "two of you go and seat yourselves in those two chairs by the table, so that I may see in what possible places I might hide something without making any movement which you might detect."

Tommy and Mr. Torrance at once did as he requested and the detective, tired of what he considered mere tomfoolery, made a dignified retreat into the back yard.

Left alone, Mark began eagerly to examine his immediate surroundings. "I shall imagine," he said to himself, that her hands were free, otherwise she wouldn't have been able to extract the cork from the carbolic acid (They usually put a pretty tight cork in a bottle like that). Also it is unlikely that she could move very much without being seen." He lay very still examining every inch of wall and bed and floor which might possibly have come within reach of the girl's hands. The result seemed to be absolutely nil. Barring the mattress, which had been thoroughly searched, there seemed no possible hiding place anywhere. There was nothing on the wall and although the plaster was chipped and in places broken, there was nowhere a crevice deep enough to serve. The floor also was without cover of any kind, and the cracks were solidly filled with packed dirt.

"And yet," thought Mark obstinately, "she must have left something—else why—"suddenly his heart gave a leap and then seemed to stop beating! His hand, which had been blindly groping along the low wainscotting behind the bed, had touched something—something soft! Cautiously he peered over the edge—he could see nothing but the line of dirty grey board skirting the plastered wall. And yet he had certainly touched something soft! He felt along carefully with his fingers—yes, there, pressed tight into a crevice where the warped board had parted a little from the wall, was something—something so small, so tightly pressed in, so like the color of the grey board, that it's presence had escaped the sharp eyes of all the searchers! With the feeling of almost superstitious awe Mark drew the something out—it lay in his hand, a little grey silk glove! With something very like a sob he raised it to his lips.

Holding it reverently, he went into the other room and laid it quietly on the table.

Tommy caught at it with a choking cry. "Christine's—it is Christine's glove!"

It lay there on the table like a living thing—already falling again into the shape of the hand it had covered—a girl's small hand whose helpless fingers seemed to clutch their hearts.

Adam Torrance drew a deep breath. "God keep her!" he said. "If we fail to find her now, we are less than men!"

CHAPTER XXVIII.

LET us leave the puzzled searchers now with the clue of the glove in their hands and go back to Christine, who has certainly been left to her own devices long enough. We know that upon the evening of her disappearance she came out of the Stores sharply upon time. It was raining but not heavily, and as she wore a raincoat and a little toque, that the rain "wouldn't hurt," and as she loved the feel of the rain upon her face and her hair was the kind which rain loves to fashion into lovely curling tendrils, she decided to walk home. This decision was strengthened by her seeing, without seeming to see, the watchful figure of Van Slyke, upon the opposite side of the street. It would never do to allow this impudent young man to imagine that she, Christine, was conscious of his pursuit, and was compelled to escape from it by means of an unromantic street-car! All this was decided in the passing of a second and so, without perceptible hesitation, she set out, turning at Market Street, and having the satisfaction of seeing, again without seeming to see, that Van Slyke had moved moodily off in the opposite direction.

"So that's settled!" said the girl to herself, with a little gurgle of laughter. "Perhaps after a while Mr. Tommy will admit that I am quite capable of taking care of myself!"

She walked along briskly, thinking of nothing in particular until, as the red and yellow lights of the corner drug store gleamed through the wet, she remembered that Ada was expecting glycerine, rose-water and carbolic acid. All three girls were careful of their pretty hands, and they made up their own lotion. Christine went in and gave her order. The druggist was quite right when he said that she laughed at his observations upon the badness of the weather. She felt like laughing, and did not think the weather bad at all—did she not have in her pocket a letter from Him—shortest of all his letters (a note, really), but saying that He was coming home! The druggust could not be expected to know this, neither could the messenger boy, upon whom she smiled as she went out, and who was charmed into watching her down the rainy street.

At first sight of the old woman, Christine felt nothing save gladness that this time she had something in her purse besides car tickets. She could give the poor creature some money and satisfy her. But, to the girl's surprise, the beggar did not ask for money; instead she burst into a long story, not very lucid, of a little grandchild of hers who was very ill and who had been crying all day to see the lady with the pretty hair. By this it was evident that Granny Bates had watched Christine to some purpose, for no plea could more quickly and surely have won the instant sympathy of the young girl. She loved children, and they loved her. On Brook Street there was not one who was not her friend, and she knew quite well that there were many others from darker streets to whom she had often passed a pleasant word. That one of these poor mites should wish to see her was not surprising, and out of the young and innocent joy in her own heart was born a tender pity. She went with the old woman without a moment's indecision or suspicion, eager to give of her own fullness and intent only on the possible relief which she might bring to the suffering child.

It was darker now, and Christine followed the old woman blindly. Of the squalid streets she had not the slightest fear. They were quiet enough at this hour. Once, with a sudden alarm for Celia, she asked her guide if the child's illness were a fever; but with quick cunning, she was reassured. The child, it seemed, had merely fallen and broken a leg, but the pain was bad, and nothing would quiet her but a sight of the pretty lady from Brook Street. They slid into Hill Street unnoticed. A fog was creeping up; the policeman who ought to have been thereabouts was elsewhere (a common enough phenomenon), and the rain and supper time had swept the dismal street almost clear. Not once did Christine's sixth sense warn her of danger. The happy and healthy are seldom clairvoyant, and the aroused instinct of the girl's sub-conscious mind might beat in vain against the barrier of her pleasant thoughts. She entered the hovel eagerly—smiling—thinking only of the restless child.

A man, dark-browed and lowering, rose from beside the broken stove. Christine gave him a pleasant nod. "Where is she?" she asked in her clear voice. The old woman pointed to the inner room. Drawing off her gloves, Christine turned to the door—the next moment she was seized, her half cry was choked by a handkerchief held tightly against her lips. She was conscious of a strong, sickly scent.

When she struggled back to consciousness she realized nothing except that she felt very ill, that she could scarcely breathe, and that she was lying down somewhere in the dark. As memory came back and her brain cleared, she knew that she must be upon the bed in the inner room of the hovel she had entered. What had happened? Had she fainted? Was she lying there waiting for the doctor? Then, with a chill feeling, which as yet was hardly fear, she remembered how she had been seized from behind—she had not fainted. Something else had happened, but what it was she could not realize. Perhaps that man, whom she remembered as sitting by the stove, had tried to rob her. A thought of the pitiful sum in her purse made this idea seem ridiculous. At any rate, it was evident that there was no child with a broken leg and that she had been lured to this place upon false pretences. A feeling of anger surged up,

Continued on page 50

"A Man He Would A-Wooing Go"

The Story of a Stingy Sweetheart and His Loves

By JENNIE A. STUART

ALEX. COLLINS was deep in thought. The subject on which he was allowing his mind to dwell was not altogether new to him. To tell it briefly it was—"marriage"—not "love"—that was apt to be too expensive, for he noticed that when men allowed themselves to fall in love with a damsel, they stopped at no extravagance which might find favor for them in their fair one's eyes. There was Bob McCormick who, canny Scot though he was, paid five dollars for railway fare two or three times a year in order to go to see a girl with whom he was popularly supposed to be in love. Now, he could have found lots of good workers around home who would have done very well to "go with" if he had soberly and properly thought of marriage, apart from love, which acted on many individuals like intoxicating liquors, making those under its influence perform many freakish actions which in their sober senses they would not think of doing.

Alex's acres were broad, his lots in town were daily increasing in value, his property in Muskoka was held at a high figure, his bank account was being steadily—decreased? Never! Banish the sickening thought!—increased by no small amounts. When you add to these attractions a pair of blue eyes and a head covered with curly hair, you may, perhaps imagine that the possessor of them was a man for whom all the girls in two townships were setting their caps. Alas! that we should have to tell it. His chief characteristic was the unlovely one of stinginess—the blue eyes were always looking for cents or dollars—the curly hair covered only a multitude of plans for making and saving.

However, time is money and must not be wasted in such an abstract thing as thought. Therefore Alex stepped briskly off the verandah of his big house—far too large for himself, his mother and his sister—with a glance over the place where his lawn ought to have been (the ground was too good to be used for such nonsense, though, and so it grew turnips), he went to the barnyard, whence he issued in a few minutes, seated in his buggy and driving "Prince," who was a good steady goer, not very speedy, but still he did not let the grass grow under his feet.

It had been just the day before that Mr. Collins had been talking to Sam Ross regarding the Nixon family, who lived near Sam. There were several girls of generous proportions in said family, and Alex. had known them "to speak to" for several years.

"I tell you, they're hustlers to work," observed Sam.

"They get that from their father, I suppose," said Alex. "He never spends his time on the road, like some of the men you see."

"They're pretty tricky, though, but I guess they come by that honestly, too," went on Sam. "They say that after they test their incubator eggs they soak the ones that ain't going to hatch in buttermilk, and then take 'em to market and sell them."

Now, in a measure, this had appealed to Alex. Of course it was a little shady, but one who would be thrifty in regard to incubator eggs would doubtless keep her mind on the almighty dollar in its other phases.

And so, on a Sunday afternoon in July, Alex. started on the six-mile trip to Nixon's, with the purpose of beginning a courtship which would end profitably to all concerned; he would get a strong, careful, energetic wife, and she would have a husband with a large amount of this world's goods and also the privilege of adding thereto.

He was welcomed effusively by Mrs. Nixon.

"Why, how are you, Mr. Collins? Come right in. Won't you put your horse in?"

Alex. making no motion to the contrary, she went on: "Jim, you go with Mr. Collins to the barn and show him where to put his horse."

When he returned to the house Anna (to whom he had resolved to direct his attentions, she being about twenty-three, according to Sam's statement, and therefore the nearest to him in age of the girls at home—Alex. was fair, thin and forty) was discoursing to a neighbor upon the subject of the raspberry market.

"We were in London yesterday, and we had the first berries there have been on the market."

"I suppose you got pretty good money for them," remarked Alex.

"You bet; I made them pay up—got fifteen cents a box for them," replied Anna.

"How did you get along with your eggs?" enquired the neighbor.

"Oh, real well. I tell you it pays to have things to take to market these days," was the response.

"Do you go to market often?" asked Alex.

"I'll be going up three times a week during the berry season if we have rain enough to ripen the berries well," said Anna.

All this so heightened his opinion of the elder Miss Nixon that he asked if he might take her to church that night, which manœuvre he repeated for three consecutive Sundays. Anna found this admirer of her good works a little too "slow" for her liking, but thought that if she could not love him for himself she might do so for his money, and every visit served to show Alex. some hitherto unthough-of way in which a woman might earn or save. So, it began to look as if the course of their love affair would be as smooth as the blancmange which Anna made for tea.

Surely it was an especially malicious demon who whispered in Alex.'s ear that perhaps these tales he heard on a Sunday were not strictly truthful—perhaps when Anna was moved to speak of her own exploits she dwelt on them until they assumed proportions which were not verified by fact. The demon took the form of a gossiping old woman, but it could scatter discord in that shape, perhaps better than in many others. Alex. began to wonder if his choice on the age basis had been wise.

"Sam knows them," thought he. "He's there on week-days and the Ross girls are there sometimes, and he'll know which is the best worker. I'll ask him."

So when next he met Sam on the road he hailed him thus: "Say, Sam, you know those Nixon girls pretty well. Which one does the most work around home?"

Sam, not being unblessed with a sense of humor, responded without even a betraying glimmer in his eye: "Well, they do say that Anna is rather lazy sometimes; tries to get off milking the cows every once in a while to have a game of tennis or such-like. I've heard that Millie's the one who really makes things hum around there, although to hear Anna talk you'd thing she did it all. Why do you want to know?"

"Oh, I just wondered, that's all. Get up," and Alex. drove on, experiencing a faint feeling as he realized the indiscretion into which he had almost been led. Why, he had nearly made up his mind to propose to that girl the next time he went down there. Fortunately he had not committed himself by word or look; he could break with the girl without breaking with the family.

He missed a weekly visit, and then being in town saw a post card on which was "Millie" in large gilded letters. He felt himself growing wildly extravagant as he counted out five coppers for it, expending a sixth one on a stamp to speed it to its destination with the announcement that the sender would be at the Nixon residence on the following Sabbath, health and weather permitting.

The neighbors were lost in wonder as to why that Alex. Collins took Millie Nixon to church on Sunday, while Anna went with her father.

"I wonder if Anna wouldn't have any more to do with him, and he had to fall back on Millie," said Mr. Cochrane, for once giving the girl the benefit of the doubt, although we see in this case she did not deserve it.

During the week Alex. met Sam, the mischief-maker, again. When they had agreed that rain was not what the crops needed at that time of the year, had comforted each other over the fact that hogs were down, and rejoiced together over the promise of a good apple crop, Sam let fall a remark regarding the Nixons. "Susie Nixon, the one who's been in London sewing, you know; well, she's home now. 'Spose you'll see her next Sunday."

"What kind of girl is she?" asked Alex.

"Well, she used to pitch in while she was home. Did things in the house and helped her paw in the field. Gosh, but she did work!" exclaimed Sam. "And, I say, Alex., you ought to hear her play the organ, and sing; why, she always knows all those new pieces. First time I heard 'I'm Afraid To Go Home in the Dark,' was one time when she was home."

"What's she home for now?" enquired Alex.

"Oh, just for a change, I guess; perhaps she thinks she'll land a rich farmer," and Sam went off chuckling at his parting shot, which found a lodging in Alex.'s mind.

What if it were so! Why should he not go one better than Millie, and get a wife, not only of sterling qualities as a worker but having accomplishments to boot—that is, if she knew the time and place to display them. Then this Susie was older than the girls who had stayed on the farm, and so her head was likely to be more level than theirs. Both Anna and Millie were too much inclined to laugh and giggle and treat even such serious matters as the loss of one's best cow a little lightly. Even in the role of a husband he might find it difficult to restrain their youthful spirits. Plainly the matter of Susie was one worthy of consideration.

When next he turned his face Nixonward he met Miss Susan, who was graciousness personified.

"Very pleased to meet you, Mr. Collins. I've heard so much about you from maw and the girls."

"What were you doing in London?" queried Alex. in the course of the afternoon.

"Oh, I sewed for the Helena. They're wanting me back, too, but I'm not going. They just hated to let me go, and tried to make me promise to go back in the fall, but I didn't." Susie could be her own megaphone almost as well as Anna.

"Do you like living in the country?" Alex. enquired.

"Oh, I just love it!" gushed Susie. "I'd always live in the country if I could get anything to do here, but of course I can't. Do you like it, Mr. Collins?" she pursued.

At length Alex. mustered courage to say: "Do you play some of those pthere pieces?" pointing to the music.

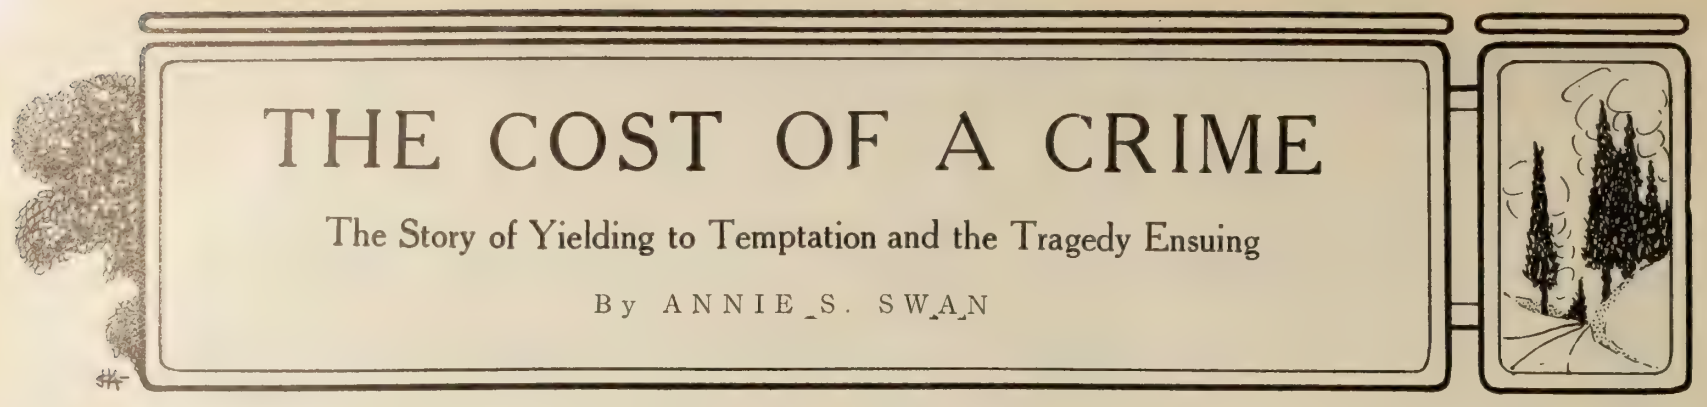
"Oh, yes; I can play them all. Suppose we sing some of them. You can sing, can't you, Mr. Collins?" she asked.

"No; I'm no singer," replied Alex. "Go on yourself."

"Well, I can try; I know you could, too, if you'd only try," and nothing loath Susan commenced her very amateurish interpretation of popular melodies which her admirer felt sure was never surpassed in Canada.

His voice almost faltered at his own "nerve" as he asked the strikingly-dressed young lady if he might take her to church. A smothered titter from Millie's direction did not add to his comfort, but Susan's heartily spoken consent put him at ease; so he was not even disturbed by frequent collisions between his head and the stylish hat which was his companion's most noticeable adornment.

Continued on page 54



THE COST OF A CRIME

The Story of Yielding to Temptation and the Tragedy Ensuing

By ANNIE S. SWAN

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Reedham steals thirteen thousand pounds of trust money, held by the firm of Lowther, Currie and Company, in London, England. He confesses to his friend, Lidgate, who allows him to escape, and who afterwards informs Mrs. Reedham of the crime. The only child, Leslie, is at school in Surrey. Leslie is brought home from school. Reedham, in the meantime, has found shelter in lodgings with Mrs. Webber, an old servant, and assumes the name of Thomas Charlton. He obtains employment with Archibald Currie, a brother of his former partner and is unrecognized. "Charlton" does well and wins the esteem of Mr. Currie and his ward, Katherine Wrede. Mrs. Reedham suffers from financial stress. Archibald Currie takes Leslie Reedham, also, into the office, but the latter does not recognize his father.

ONE day she gave voice to some of her fears to the vicar, when he paid a pastoral call. He had discovered by accident that the man to whom he had offered a cup of cold water on the top of an omnibus was now resident in the house of one of his parishioners, and he had twice paid a call upon him there. But though Charlton had been perfectly courteous, Fielden felt himself left on the outside, and wisely decided not to force the acquaintance, but to wait until it should ripen of its own accord. He had been curiously drawn to the man, and was always interested in him, and glad to think of him in such good care as Mary Anne Webber's.

"Oh, Mr. Charlton, 'e's quite well in hisself, sir," said Mary Anne when he enquired one day regarding Charlton's welfare. "But 'tain't a life for any man, wot 'e lives. I don't see myself how it's goin' to go on. I do wish as you'd get him to come out of hisself. 'E ain't well, no, 'e ain't, how could anybody be well settin' up arf' the nite like 'e does?"

"I suppose you don't know anything about his people?" said the vicar, interestedly.

Mary Anne reddened, and put up her apron under pretence of wiping a smut from her nose.

"'E don't talk much to me, sir, 'e don't. 'E's bin in trouble, anybody kin see that. But people 'ave the rite to keep their troubles to theirselves if they wants to, eh, sir?"

"Surely, but every human soul needs sympathy, Mrs. Webber."

"Well, they do, an' they don't, so to speak. There's times when we feel like burstin' to speak and other times when wild 'osses wouldn't drag it from hus. I guess that's 'ow Mr. Charlton's feeling now. Anyhow, I'm sorry fer 'im, for a more inoffensive and sweet-tempered gentleman never took any woman's fust floor."

"I am sure of that; I'll drop in one evening quite casually and have a chat. Meanwhile I am pleased to hear all is well with you. I often say to my wife that it is as good as a breath of the sea to have a word with you. You make the best of everything, and never a grumble. That's the true spirit in which to meet life. It breaks down the hills of difficulty, doesn't it?"

Mary Anne's face beamed at this unexpected tribute from the vicar, whom she adored, and her heart and step were light for the rest of the day.

Her lodger came home earlier than usual, and when she took in his dinner, a task she never relegated to anyone else, she noticed how unusually haggard and pale he looked.

"Lor' you ain't well, sir!" she exclaimed, as she set down the tray.

"I am all right,' he replied, with a faint attempt at a smile. "Ive had a trying day at the office."

"'Ave you, sir? I knows what them tryin' days is, don't I just? Yer gits up of a mornin' sure things ain't goin' ter go rite, there's somethink hinside wot tells yer. Never mind, sir, the dy's done, an' thet's every pore creatur's comfort in this weary world, that there ain't never a dy but comes to a hend."

She placed the covered dish before him with a sympathetic nod. Her kind face, her ready and good-natured sympathy were once more as wine to his riven heart.

"Mary Anne, I'm bound to tell you. I can't get out of it, and if I don't I shan't be able to get through."

"I know," said Mary Anne, lowering her voice mysteriously. "Leastways I kin guess. They've begun to think who you reely are."

"Not so bad, though it may very well be the beginning of things. I had a new boy put under me to-day to train in the way he should go, whom do you think? My own son."

"Oh, Lor' no, yer don't sy so! Yer own pretty Leslie, and did the pore little dear run strite inter yer arms an' cry 'is 'eart hout?"

"No, he didn't recognize me at all."

"An' yer never said a word?"

Mary Anne's excitement and interest rose every moment. It was more melodramatic than the penny novelettes with which she beguiled her scanty leisure downstairs.

"No, I did not betray myself, and I've got to keep it up, all that up, Mary Anne, and crush down all I feel, day in and day out, perhaps for the rest of my natural life."

"Mr. Reedham, sir, beggin' yer pardin', but jes' for onst let me sy the reel nime. It'll 'elp wot I'm abart ter sy. Yer carn't do it, sir, no yer carn't. Flesh and blood carn't be crushed like that. Don't yer go fer to try. It'll kill yer sure."

"But what am I to do, Mary Anne? If I own up now, it's all up with me."

"Is it, sir? 'Ow long do they keep up spite like?"

He could have smiled at the directness of her speech.

"I am not beyond the pale of the law yet, Mary Anne, believe me, and after all I've gone through, it seems needless and hard to give up now, just when success, the success I have dreamed of, is beginning to loom within my reach."

Mary Anne continued to shake her head.

"I ain't clever, and I never 'ad no 'ead fer business, pore Webber used to sy thet, but there's things that God Almighty teaches even pore wimmen, sir. An' I carn't think this yer is rite, or thet it will ever come to any good. Oh, do think over it, an' quit! Go abroad even, anythink would be better than wot's going on now."

But the very warning and objection urged upon Charlton seemed only to impart added strength to his own resolve. There are natures so constructed that the most strenuous opposition acts only as a further incentive. Charlton had relieved his mind, and the future began already to be robbed of its new terror. Nay, even the hidden sweetness lurking in the appalling danger allured him. Mary Anne, entirely forgetful of her place, pushed his plate a little nearer, and bent her kind, anxious eyes on his face.

"Yer carn't do it, sir, believe me. Yer pore 'eart will be tore all to pieces, an' anyhow the day will come wen everythink will come hout. Do think it over, there's a dear."

She withdrew, shaking her head ominously, seriously disturbed in mind concerning her lodger and the strange complications in life.

"'Ere, you, Hannie, tike this letter to the vicarage, an' see thet it goes inter Mr. Fieldin's own 'ands," she said, after she had labored with a pencil and paper for a few toilsome moments. She did not write much, simply a few words begging the vicar if he had an hour to spare to call up and see her lodger, who seemed in trouble. Then having shifted the responsibility she felt better. She could not, of course, be sure that Charlton would unburden his soul to the vicar, the chances were probably against it, but he could not fail to be strengthened and helped by his company. Happily the vicar was at home, and by no means averse to the idea of a chat with the man who continued to interest him, though he had not of late seen much of him.

Charlton was smoking a pipe by the hearth when he was shown in, and he rose to receive him with a cordiality which showed that he was not an unwelcome visitor.

"I have often thought of dropping in lately, Mr. Charlton, you have been on my mind somewhat. But just at the beginning of the winter there seems to be a multiplicity of things calling my attention. The winter's work for one thing has to be got into shape. I hope you are very well?"

"So, so, Mr. Fielden; pray sit down. Do you smoke?"

"I can take a cigarette to keep you company, though it is not my habit." he said, stretching out his hand for the case which lay on the corner of the table. "Well, how are you getting on at New Broad Street?"

"Very well."

"You like Mr. Currie?"

"I do. The man who could not admire and reverence that fine spirit has something seriously the matter with himself," he answered on the spur of the moment; and then his face flushed a little at the anomaly suggested by his words.

"I thought you would like him, and get on well with him. He has treated you generously, then?"

"Most generously; in fact, I am sometimes ashamed at the largeness of the trust he has bestowed upon me."

"But it is the way to make men," said the vicar musingly. "I have to deal with a good many derelicts in my common experience, and I have proved that trust is the master key."

Charlton was silent a moment, not knowing how to answer. He might have resented the analgoy. Fielden observed that he did not, and perhaps drew his own conclusions therefrom.

"What department of the business are you in? Has he promoted you?"

"I am at present his confidential clerk," replied Charlton. "I have had some experience in business, as I think I told you that morning we met on the omnibus, and he has discovered where my chief capacity lies. He has a new scheme for the furtherance of his business in the colonial branch of it. It is possible he may send me abroad later in the year."

"You would not object to that?"

"No, I should welcome it," replied Charlton. "Not so much for the splendid opportunity it offers, for —for trying to justify the confidence Mr. Currie has placed in me, but because I shall, for personal reasons, be glad to get out of London."

"It would be a premanent appointment, then; at least for a period of years?"

"No, I think not; rather a visit of investigation and report. Mr. Currie has long been dissatisfied with the management of the branch abroad, and, but for his age and the fact that he does not wish to leave his ward, he would go out to South Africa himself."

"Ah, I see," said the vicar, still studying Charlton's face intently, while seeming merely to be casually interested. He felt that this was the best attitude to adopt towards this strange man, who had a whole history in his face.

"Mr. Fielden, an interesting question in what, I suppose, might be called ethical psychology came under my notice lately. May I offer it for your solution?"

"Certainly; it is a part of life that has a natural attraction for me. If I could get rid of it I might get through a good deal more than I do," he added good-humoredly.

"Well, supposing that a man had got off the straight, and that there seemed nothing for him but absolute ruin, but managed to reinstate himself by sinking his own identity?"

"Becoming a new man, so far as the former conditions of his life were concerned, you mean?"

"I don't mean that he was converted, exactly. As a matter of fact, he wasn't. He was lucky in evading the consequences of his own folly, and the chance offered for him to build up a new career. Would you say he was justified in taking it?"

"Certainly, providing his action did not involve others, or suggest disaster in other quarters. Could you be a little more explicit?"

"It is not easy. He took another name, and began to work up slowly towards the things men prize, and which he had prized and lost. Would you say he was wrong?"

"Was it right that he should have suffered for his first failure? I mean, did his conduct entail suffering or deprivation on others?"

"Not in the sense you mean. It was a question of money, which came out of the pockekts of rich people."

"It makes a difference to the result, but does not, of course, affect the main issue, the man's own sin. And what was his idea in making a bold bid for reinstatement? Was it purely a selfish one?"

"I think not. His idea was to atone, to pay the money back, to make full reparation wherever possible, and to have achieved it by his own effort."

The vicar nodded, took two puffs at his cigarette, and looked Charlton straight in the face.

"You state your own case, Mr. Charlton?"

Charlton nodded, and threw the end of his cigarette into the smouldering fire.

"It must be a matter between you and your God," said the vicar slowly. "I am hardly in a position to pronounce finally, because the details are too meagre. But the idea is a noble one, provided in the interval you do not crush others by your silence."

Charlton covered his face with his hands.

CHAPTER VIII.

HIS CHANCE.

ARCHIBALD CURRIE had no partner. Since the death of Abraham Willett, the original founder of the firm, he had pursued his way alone. It entailed a colossal amount of work upon him, but, as he was fond of saying, it had its compensations. He found the chief one in the fact that he could do absolutely as he liked without consulting or considering others. To a man of his temperament, and somewhat quixotic method of conducting business, this liberty was peculiarly satisfying and welcome. His brother James, though not admitted into his confidence, knew enough of the methods of business at Old Broad Street, to be able to describe them as suicidal. Yet in spite of all, Archibald had amassed a considerable fortune, how considerable James did not know. That it must be ample he gathered from the large sums his brother gave to charity and the lavish conduct generally of his private life. It was a mystery to James Currie, who had no great faith in his elder brother's acumen.

But in this estimate he was entirely wrong. Archibald Currie in business was very keen, and as we have already said, seldom made a mistake in his man. He had gathered a strange crowd of derelicts about him at Old Broad Street, but he kept his own hands firmly on the reins. Then he had bound most of them to him in ties of gratitude which nothing but death could break. The life stories of his own staff would in themselves make interesting reading. He was beginning to realize now, however, as age and its accompaniments began to creep upon him, that perhaps he had made a mistake in not having taken a partner earlier in life. He discovered now that while he had many eager and willing servants, there was no one to share the burden that was beginning to press. Now, when he would have slackened off a bit, and eventually retired, there was no one to take his place. It was a curious position, and an unusual one, for a man of his standing to find himself in.

As he sat at his desk surrounded by the accumulation of the morning's mail, his face wore an unusually harassed look.

It was the African mail day, and the news was disquieting. For a time he was at a loss how to act.

It was now the month of May, and Charlton had been in his employment almost two years. His thoughts naturally turned to Charlton, in a dilemma which he could not for the moment unravel. The natural outcome was to ring the bell and ask that he might come to him at once.

Charlton was now fully established in Old Broad Street, and enjoyed his employer's full confidence. On the whole, he was a favorite with the rest of the staff, chiefly because he was very retiring and inoffensive, and gave himself no airs. The only man who hated him and longed to see his discomfiture and disgrace was Richard Turner; that worthy was still biding his time. Charlton entered the private room with the quiet assurance of the man who knows that he is welcome and trusted.

Archibald Currie turned to him kindly, not forgetting to smile, in spite of the worries gnawing at his mind.

"Read that, Charlton, and tell me what you think."

Charlton took the letter and read it through.

"There seems to be a muddle somewhere," he said when he had finished. "A panic among all concerned."

"'Panic,' that's the word. A regular war fever of scare. They don't seem to be able to grip the fact that now's their opportunity. You remember I spoke to you in the autumn of last year about going out. You'll have to go now, immediately, as soon as you can get ready."

"I am ready, sir, if you think I am the man."

"There is no one else," said Archibald Currie, with a sigh. "And in the last two years I have proved you. Do you know Charlton, that to-day, for the first time, I realize my sixty-five years?"

"You don't look them, sir."

"That's neither here nor there; I feel them, which is the chief thing. I can't face the South African journey and the organization and direction that is needed there. I must leave everything to you, and give you absolute carte blanche."

Charlton's lip slightly quivered, and the blue spectacles suddenly grew dim.

"Sir, it is a great trust you would place in me, I might easily betray you."

"Yes; but you won't," said Archibald Currie with the easy confidence of the man who knows. "How soon can you be ready? This is Thursday. What about Saturday's boat? Would it be possible?"

"Quite; I could go to-night for that matter. I have no ties; I can rise up and walk at any moment."

"It has its advantages," said Currie, but with a scarcely perceptible sigh. "Just get on the telephone to the steamship company and ask them what they can do."

Charlton passed into the outer office, and was absent about five minutes.

"Plenty of berths, Mr. Currie. I will call round at lunch time and settle it," he said when he returned.

"Ah, that's all right. It's a ghastly time of year for South Africa. You'll have to occupy yourself to-morrow or this afternoon in getting a suitable outfit. Go to the proper place and take their advice, and send the bill to me."

"Thank you, I shan't want much. A man who can carry his belongings in his hand scores on occasion, and I can buy what I want in Cape Town."

"A man after my own heart," said Archibald Currie, heartily. "You can see for yourself what a little foresight now would mean later on, especially in the event of war. I will give you carte blanche. You must charter steamers, build them, if need be; get everything in readiness for what may happen, and let us be first in the field."

Charlton nodded understandingly. The prospect of such scope filled him with lively anticipation. The man who is wholly trusted, provided he is capable, can work wonders.

"I grasp the situation fully," he said.

"And when in doubt cable, cable for all you are worth, never mind the expense; but I don't think you'll be in any doubt. The thing's as plain on the face of it as a pikestaff. We've got to get ready, to be ready for any emergency, and if it doesn't come off, well, we don't lose anything. Try and knock that into them, and steady them a bit, don't you know, that's what they want."

"Yes, sir."

Archibald Currie was silent a moment gazing through the window at the blue sky.

"And Charlton, I need scarcely say that I hope this will be worth your while. Engineer this bit of business successfully and I'll make you a partner when you come back."

"Mr. Currie, that would be impossible! Who am I to have such an honor conferred? It would be too much, sir. I am satisfied with what you have done for me already, as indeed I ought."

"That's all right, my boy, said Archibald Currie affably. "We won't say any more about it. You'll be six months gone, I should say. When October comes, we'll have another talk. Meanwhile are you disengaged this evening? Come out to Hyde Park Square to dinner; my ward will be pleased to see you, and detached from the routine here, we can go more fully into affairs at Port Elizabeth."

Charlton thanked him, and with a full heart withdrew. His pulses thrilled at the prospect opening out before him. In six months' time, perhaps, he would have accomplished that object he had set before him. He would then throw himself on the mercy of Archibald Currie, and face the world a new man. But above and beyond all he would restore his home. God alone knew how hard it had been to play the part in the last six months, how often he had been on the point of betrayal, especially where the boy was concerned. His only safeguard was to keep away from him as much as possible, to say little, to cut down opportunities for which his whole being longed and craved. But while he had sternly repressed himself in one direction he had encompassed the boy with an atmosphere of loving care. The whole of the office, understanding that young Reedham was Charlton's special protege as well as in special favor with the master himself, seemed to vie with one another in doing him kindness. Leslie Reedham, indeed, found his lines fall in pleasant places, and his happiness shone in his face.

He knew that his heart was warm to Charlton, that each day was brightened and made alive for him by his kind word. And out of the fulness of his heart he had spoken at home. Bessie Reedham was so grateful to the unknown friend who had made the way so easy for her boy, that more than once she had wished to thank him on her own account. But the letter she had often penned in her mind remained unwritten.

In the course of the afternoon when Charlton was out regarding the preparations for his hurried journey, James Currie made a call at Old Broad Street. This in itself was so unusual that his brother looked naturally surprised to see him.

"A most unusual honor, Jamie," said he in his most genial mood, feeling the relief consequent upon Charlton's acceptance of the trust offered. "How are you all? It seems ages since we heard anything about Fair Lawn."

"Well, it isn't our fault. You know you refused my wife's last invitation to dinner," said James Currie rather coldly, for the memory of it rankled.

"Ah, well, I explained that I had practically given up dining out, and it is a long drive to Hampstead. Tell Jane I'll come one of these odd days and make my peace with her."

"Oh, she didn't care, I assure you, but she blamed Miss Wrede. We seem to have lost you altogether since she came to London."

"It isn't that, Jamie, but I'm getting to be an old man, fonder than ever of my own fireside. Tell Jane I'll give a big dinner myself to atone. How's business?"

"Only so-so. We haven't recovered yet, Archibald, from Reedham's disgrace. But of course these persistent rumors from South Africa have a disquieting effect. Have you any letters to-day from the Cape? I thought I might pop round to enquire whether you had any first-hand information."

"I think that war is inevitable, James, but whether sooner or later I don't know. I'm sending a representative out, he sails on Saturday."

"Who?" enquired James Currie, interestedly.

"Charlton; you remember the man who has been here about two years. An uncommonly smart chap, and reliable."

"It's a big thing, and you don't know anything about him, practically. Hadn't you better be careful?"

"I think I know my man; anyway, it's all settled and he sails in the Walmer Castle on Saturday."

"Well, I hope it'll turn out all right. I sometimes wish I had asked you to take Stephen in with you. It's a more secure business than the Stock Exchange, and he hasn't the kind of brain for our business. He'd do better handling your kind of business. I suppose it's too late now?"

"I am afraid so," replied Archibald, doubtfully. "There's nothing the matter with Stephen's brains, Jamie," he added good-humoredly. "He would probably have used them to better purpose if he hadn't had a father before him."

"He hasn't been indulged too much, excepting perhaps by his mother," replied James Currie in an aggrieved voice. "And he's a good lad without any vices."

"He's too cocksure of himself, Jamie. A little experience of life will make him a better man, as it does or should do all of us."

James Currie was silent a moment, uncertain how to proceed. He had come to plead a certain cause with his brother, and the opening was not very propitious.

"Fact is, Archie, Stephen's just at the age when a young man is unsettled. Marriage would cure him of the faults you speak of, and after all they're very slight faults. You know without my telling you that he's not been the same chap since he met Miss Wrede."

"I can't help that, Jamie."

"But after all, you're so far responsible, for you introduced her into our circle, where I'm bound to say she's done some harm. Stephen hasn't done a good day's work since he fell in love with her, and if I could see them married now it would be the best thing that could happen, I feel sure, for everybody concerned."

"That's a matter for the young people to settle for themselves," Archibald observed.

"Well, so far, of course, but a little judicious advice or pressure is sometimes of use. Miss Wrede is playing fast and loose with Stephen, and his mother is very angry about it."

"Pardon me, I don't agree with you," said Archibald, a little hotly for him. "I can't see where the fast and loose comes in. They hardly ever meet. She said only the other day she hadn't seen him for over two months. You must allow that isn't very hot love-making."

"Ah, but before that she led him on. Well, we needn't argue about that. I may as well own up that I'm here to-day solely on Stephen's account to ask whether you won't do something to hasten matters. No doubt she means to have him in the end, for, of course, he's a good-looking chap, and a fair match. But her coquetting foreign ways are driving him off the straight, Archie, and I hope you'll put in a word, seeing the mischief has been partly brought about by you."

Archibald Currie straightened himself in his chair, and squared his shoulders. A little angry, he spoke with unusual brusqueness.

"You ask what's impossible. I've spoken to Katherine again and again, and even so far back as the first year she came from Bruges she told me quite plainly she would never marry Stephen. She has never swerved from that, and I'm afraid that's the answer both Stephen and you will have to take. I'm sorry, but Stephen will have to take his disappointment like a man."

"Well, the lad's ruin may lie at her door," said James Currie gloomily. "He's off his sleep and meat, as the saying is; and as for his work, it's a vanishing quantity. I feel very bitter about this, for Stephen had his chances in more desirable quarters. Robert Bracebridge's daughter would take him to-morrow, and her fortune won't be less than thirty thousand."

"You're blaming me for this, and it isn't just," said Archibald Currie quickly. "I can't do more than say I'm sorry; but, after all, Stephen has to take his chances in the fortunes of war, and he's not the first man who has had to start life on the heels of a personal disappointment."

James Currie rose, somewhat gloomily. He could not gainsay what his brother had said. Archibald's own life story was a case in point; but he was bitterly disappointed and sore all the same, and could not hide it.

"You might have given Stephen the chance to go to South Africa for you. Couldn't he go yet, even with this Charlton? He could be useful in many ways, and I won't charge you his expenses. He'll have to get away somewhere. Do you think it would be any use his coming to Hyde Park Square and trying to get a final answer from Miss Wrede?"

"I think she's given him his final answer, not once, but many times," replied Archibald.

"And about South Africa?" he enquired, as he turned towards the door.

"I have no objection, of course; but the time is very short. Would he be prepared to start on forty-eight hours' notice, or even less. Charlton sails on Saturday afternoon."

The door opened at the moment, and Charlton himself appeared, having returned from his visit to the offices of the steamship company. At sight of James Currie he gave a start, and with a hastily-muttered apology, turned away. But his principal called him back.

"Come in, Charlton, and be introduced to my brother. I think you have never met."

Charlton had no choice. Accustomed as he was to the exercise of a perfect and colossal self-control, which had become second nature to him, the ordeal was the most searching he had yet been through.

But he did not shrink. He came a little way into the room, thankful that the blinds had been drawn closely down to shut out the glare of the afternoon sun. As Archibald Currie spoke the words of introduction he bowed, but apparently did not see James Currie's only half-offered hand.

James Currie was jealous of Charlton's influence with his brother, and not, as he might have been, happy in the thought that he had found someone he could trust. He had, indeed, no faith in Archibald's judgment of men. There was thus some comedy in their relations one to another.

(To be continued.)

Rural School-Houses and Their Equipment

A Thorough Consideration of a Most Important Subject

By A. A. BACKUS, M.D.

IT is only within a very few years that educationalists have concerned themselves with those subjects that are the practical ones of life: home-making, domestic science, care of the child, agriculture; those everyday things which make up the ordinary human life. This is a vast stride towards the welfare of human beings and the goal of content.

Content comes from doing the everyday duties with interest and intelligence. The knowledge of the whyness of the doing makes a joy in the doing. Why should we eat certain foods? Why should we ventilate our homes? Why should we develop our bodies? Why should we beautify our homes? Why should we learn to love nature? And a thousand other questions correctly and intelligently answered by the doer makes the doing a pleasure.

The earliest impressions of the child—what it sees in its own home in the way of answers to these questions, is of very great importance in after life—and next to the home, the impressions the child receives in school and school surroundings are the factors which influence mind and body in the years to come.

Architecturally, what do our rural schools say to us and to the children? Is there any effort made in their building to convey a sense of beauty and order either inside or out? Is there any effort made (except in rare instances) to have the grounds about the schoolhouses anything but a barren waste? It is the true answer to these questions that suggests the writing of this article.

In going about the country the one thing which most strikes the traveler is the uniform ugliness of the rural school buildings, and the sod-bare disorder of the grounds. This, with the two hideous little buildings so prominent in the background, and quite unscreened from every point of view, makes one wonder what ideals of beauty and modesty can be developed in such surroundings, and when the schoolhouse is entered the same careless barrenness is found within—togther with bad air—not only from lack of ventilation, but from the fact that the children's outdoor garments and their lunch baskets are kept in the schoolroom.

Remember, the school children in the country must in many cases carry a lunch for their mid-day meal, and the odor from fifty or sixty lunch baskets is not by any means the odor of violets, particularly as many of them are made up of pie, cheese, bread and butter and onions.

The medical inspection of rural schools would necessarily put an end to this unsanitary condition of things; and considering the influence of order, decency and beauty, upon the health and morals of people, would introduce some proper care of the school grounds, and a decent privacy for teachers and children. If more care were given to the situation and proper equipment of country schools, it might lessen the attendance later on in our hospitals and reformatories.

The site of the schoolhouse is usually and very properly chosen from the centre of the district, and as the land value in the country is not great, there are generally roomy grounds on which to build, and ample space from which to select an elevated spot where the earth will dry quickly after rains. This is of importance, as in damp, low-lying land we find consumption, rheumatism, catarrh, and fevers prevail. In building schoolhouses in the city, so many things have to be considered that are unthought of in the country: space for grounds, adjoining buildings, noise, light, to get out of the shadow of high buildings, and many other things. But in the country none of these problems come up, and space is unconsidered. Yet we find the brounds in the city, at least at the entrance of the school, green and cared for, while those of the country schools are bare and uninteresting from one end to the other. There is no less interesting spot in the world than the grounds of our rural schools, and yet every one could be made a bower of beauty without any cost but labor and taste.

It would be well if a representative from every school board in the rural districts of Ontario could visit the Jordan Harbor school, and witness what can be done, not only in beautifying the school surroundings, but at the same time planting a love of beauty and order in the hearts of the children attending that school, giving them a knowledge of horticulture and agriculture, and while so doing, placing the children in the most practical way towards the acquirement of physical strength.

The objectless screaming and yelling and tearing about of school children at play is waste of time and strength—there should be discipline even in play—if not, the bully develops at the expense of the weak, and the children who most require physical development are either jerked about beyond their strength, or kept by fear from play at all.

If we owe any education to our children at all, it should be a practical one, and to learn how to beautify and care for the school grounds is to learn how to make beautiful and to care for that part of the great earth which falls to the lot of anyone so taught, and which she or he calls Home. The grounds about our schoolhouses should be a constant object lesson in order and beauty, and the interior of our schoolhouse furnished with some thought of the welfare and comfort for those children who must sit there so many hours in the day.

The light in the room is of great importance—well-lighted, well-ventilated, properly heated—not a case of those near the stove being choked and those far away freezing. Another important feature is the seating—graded seats, with proper adjustment of desk to seat.

It is no unusual thing to find spinal deformities acquired at school from the improper relative position of desk to seat, and to furnish a schoolroom with seats all of the same size is an absurdity.

Go into any well-regulated dairy stable in the province and you will find the stalls graded to the cows; but in the rural schoolhouses tall and short children are expected to accommodate their bodies to the seats and desks, too often at a sacrifice of comfort and health.

The interior of the schoolrooms should be orderly—consequently a separate apartment is necessary for cloaks, lunch baskets, etc.; one for boys and one for girls. The walls of the schoolroom should not be without some adornment, and the Education Department might well appropriate a few dollars for pictures of historic interest, events and characters, women and men who in the early days braved every hardship to make Canada a country wherein to live.

The first educationalists in this country were the brave women who in the earliest days opened schools in Montreal and Quebec. Pictures commemorating these things would be lessons in history more impressive and lasting than pages of history. If our artists have not already painted these pictures, why not encourage art by offering substantial premiums for such pictures, they to become the property of the province, and from these originals have plates struck off suitable for the walls of our rural schoolhouses.

Mr. John Ross Robertson expresses himself in these words in presenting to the Toronto Public Library that wonderful collection of historical pictures: "In the hope that this collection may be a teacher of historical knowledge and a source of patriotism and inspiration to Canadians, who will love their country, and will love the British Empire in the days that are to come, as the people whose homes are depicted in these pictures, loved the land of Canada and the flag of Britain in the years gone by."

There must be some way by which to interest the children in patriotism and love of country, and the best way is to make them realize what individual effort and sacrifice have done in making the nation. Heroes, heroines, statesmen, writers, poets—have something in our rural schoolhouses to direct the thoughts of the pupils to these and to their achievements.

The ordinary schoolroom is more like an untidy barn than anything else. In some places you will yet see the pail for drinking water in the corner, and the tin cup for all. Even if there were no danger of contagion from this, it would be a bad example. No truly clean person cares to drink of water that has been standing in a room where the atmosphere is contaminated with the exhalations from many lungs, and from the dust floating about from blackboard and books.

All schoolhouses should have proper lavatory equipments, and every child taught to be particular in habits of cleanliness in order that those children coming from well-kept homes should not have their sensibilities blunted by carelessness, and more particularly in order that children coming from ill-regulated homes be taught that cleanliness is or is very near akin to godliness.

A few hundred dollars added to the appointments in the schoolhouse would mean only a trifle in taxation, but it would mean a value beyond price to the health of, and moral influence on the children. If the schoolrooms were made more pleasant and comfortable, and used by the people of the section for entertainments in the evenings, debates, dialogues, lectures and kindred subjects, it might waken a pride and care for the appearance of the room.

Day after day, so many hours in the day, the children sit in these schoolrooms; these children in turn become the men and women, and it is the environment of to-day that must influence to-morrow's conduct and ideals. There are many schoolhouses in the rural districts beautifully situated amidst trees and fertile fields, but so badly cared for that they look like disreputable dives. This state of things is not only unfair to the children, but to the teachers as well; although sometimes a teacher is able to secure the co-operation of trustees, and with the assistance of the pupils, turns the wilderness of grounds into a garden of beauty.

These are the rare exceptions that show the possibilities and the educational value along that line of knowledge dealing with horticulture and agriculture—most important subjects in the country home. We often find an anxiety shown about keeping the girls and boys on the farm. These subjects properly understood might be factors in holding them there. Make our country houses and our country schoolhouses as convenient and as beautiful as those in the city, and we have gone a long way towards keeping the young people happy and content.

It is particularly strange how little attention is given to making country life interesting to children; but it is not a bit strange the difficulty country schools have in securing first-class teachers. The wretched conditions of our schoolhouses alone makes every ambitious teacher anxious to secure a school in village or town. The medical inspection of rural schools might necessitate many changes, but they would all be for the good of the children, the teacher and the community.

A ST. PATRICK'S DAY LUNCHEON

PREPARED BY

MARY H. NORTHEND

NO form of entertainment is more popular at the present time than the informal luncheon. It serves as a delightful finis to a pleasant gathering of friends, and the wide scope of its possibilities has won appreciation. On holidays, when no special family observance is held, such as on March 17th, the luncheon affords a pleasant diversion, and the task of adorning the table in appropriate array is a pleasure to the housewife, to whom a holiday is a welcome break in a somewhat monotonous routine.

Several charming schemes present themselves to mind, as one pauses to consider how to deck the table for a St. Patrick's Day affair. The green and gold of Erin's flag at once suggests an effective color combination, and the task of arranging an attractive theme in these harmonious tints requires but little tact. Flowers, too, can be introduced into the scheme, if desired, and surely nothing is lovelier. Green pinks and ferns are appropriate in coloring, and, combined with old gold effects, are wonderfully attractive. The harp and flag affords another theme, and the shamrock offers a suggestion that can be made much of.

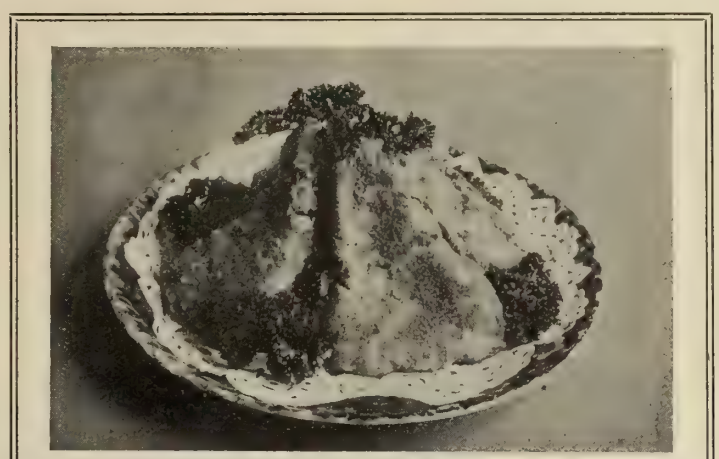
One attractive arrangement shows as a central feature a cluster of small Irish flags tied with a green ribbon bow, and arranged on a mound of green pinks. Small green-covered boxes adorned with tiny flags make appropriate favors to be used with this arrangement, and for place cards plain white cards adorned in one corner with a sketch of Erin's flag can be used. Small crystal candlesticks equipped with green tapers, will afford a pretty outline to the central theme, and large crystal candlesticks, with green candles and green cardboard shades made on an asbestos foundation, will serve to give an attractive finish to rows of tiny flags extending from the centrepiece to the table corners.

Green pinks and shamrocks constitute the principal decorations of another scheme. In a large, deep bowl mass green pinks on an outline of asparagus fern. Use this same greenery as a foundation for the bowl to rest on. Group these small crystal candlesticks on either side of the centrepiece, and equip same with green tapers and green shades adorned with shamrocks. Extend rows of tiny shamrocks from the central theme to each plate, and at each corner use low glass baskets filled with shamrocks and asparagus fern. Tiny pots of shamrocks will serve as dainty favors, and for place cards a pink surrounded by asparagus fern and tied with green ribbon, from which a shower of small shamrocks depend, will prove most attractive. The shamrocks and pinks can be made of paper, patterns for the latter being procurable in any store that carries a line of tissue and crepe paper. Artificial shamrocks are easily fashioned, and in the scheme just mentioned will serve admirably for all but the favors. These, of course, should be real. Little pots of shamrocks are procurable at five cents apiece at this time—a price that is within the means of almost everybody.

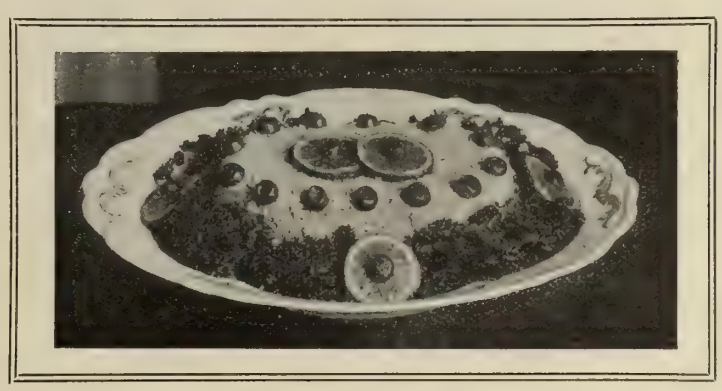
A large harp, fashioned of cardboard, covered with gilt paper, and laid on a fairly high mound of shamrocks, affords an attractive centrepiece. Outline same with tiny baskets, filled with shamrocks, and from the top of the harp to the handle of each basket extend narrow green ribbons. Small harps will serve as place cards, and for favors use green boxes adorned with harps. The latter are purchaseable in most any confectioner's store at this season. Large brass candlesticks, laid on mats of shamrocks, and equipped with green tapers and green shades, will add a finish to the table corners, completing a most effective whole.

Of equal importance with the table decorations is the menu. It is a pretty idea to have the various dishes suggest as far as possible the event being commemorated. In shape and garnish it is possible to follow the scheme to a remarkable degree, and the result is most pleasing. As a suggestion, the following is offered:

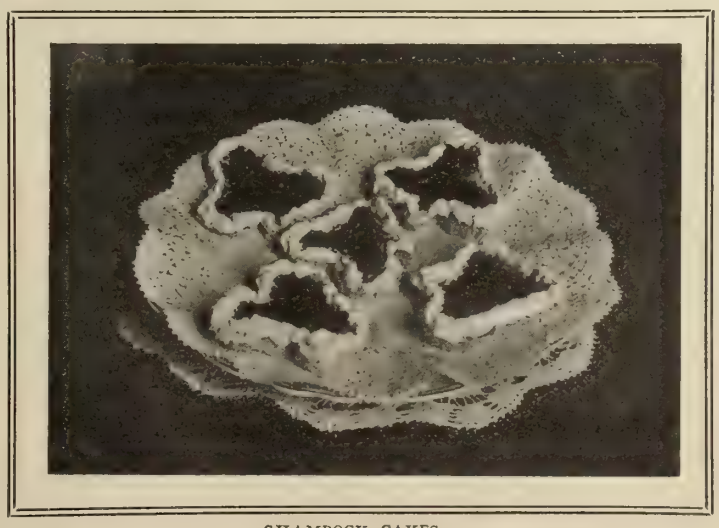
Asparagus Soup
Toasted Crackers, Olives
Rechauffe of Fish
Jellied Chicken with Peas
Cream Cheese Salad
Pineapple with Jelly
Shamrock Cakes
Coffee



RECHAUFFE OF FISH



CREAM CHEESE SALAD



SHAMROCK CAKES

ASPARAGUS SOUP: Boil three bunches of asparagus in one quart of salt water till tender. Drain water off and add one quart of cream. Rub together one tablespoon of butter and one-half tablespoon of flour, and add to mixture before removing from the stove. Then season with salt and pepper to taste. Serve with toasted bread or crackers.

RECHAUFFE OF FISH: Add to each pint of cooked fish, minced fine, the beaten yolk of one egg and a sauce made of two level tablespoons of butter and flour and one-half cup each of cream and fish stock. Bake the mixture in buttered paper cases, turn out and sprinkle with the sifted yolk of hard boiled eggs. Garnish with parsley and tiny silk Irish flags.

JELLIED CHICKEN WITH PEAS: Arrange small pieces of cooked chicken in individual moulds and fill them with a clear amber jelly made of three cups of clear soup, one-half box of gelatine soaked in half a cup of cold water, the beaten white of one egg, and cloves, onion, celery, salt and pepper to taste. Unmould, surround with peas tossed in salad dressing, and garnish with parsley, whole cloves, and Irish flags.

CREAM CHEESE SALAD: Soften the cheese with a little milk or cream and add a cup of chopped walnuts. Chill and serve in individual blocks on beds of parsley. Decorate with shamrocks cut from pickles, and a small green flag.

PINEAPPLE WITH JELLY: Arrange slices of canned pineapple in a ring around a mould of lemon jelly tinted green. Decorate the pineapple with blanched almonds and whipped cream, and serve a spoonful of the jelly with each slice.

SHAMROCK CAKES: These dainty little cakes are particularly appropriate for a St. Patrick's luncheon. From thin sheets of sponge cake cut shamrock-shaped cakes, and ice same with almond frosting tinted deep green. Decorate the edges with pipings of sweetened whipped cream.

A
Marmalade Secret!

Let me tell you one of my very own secrets. One that I have kept for some time.

During the past few years I have been honestly trying to keep up with the increasing amount of housework, and to care for my growing family The task has been fairly heavy and at times I must have shown it, for occasionally my good husband would sympathise with me.

Two years ago I visited E. D. Smith's Fruit Farms and kitchens. I watched them make Orange Marmalade—the fruit used was spotless—the lads and lassies were neat and tidy—the kitchens and utensils were exceptionally well kept, and when I saw the expensive machinery in use I understood how the label could mean what it says. I took home a jar of Marmalade and was well pleased when my husband said "it is just like yours."

From that day to this I have never had to go through all the unpleasant task of making Marmalade.

I know that the label

E D S

on jars of marmalade, preserves, jams and other table delicacies means purity, cleanliness and delight. I was welcomed at the kitchens, and you also would be.

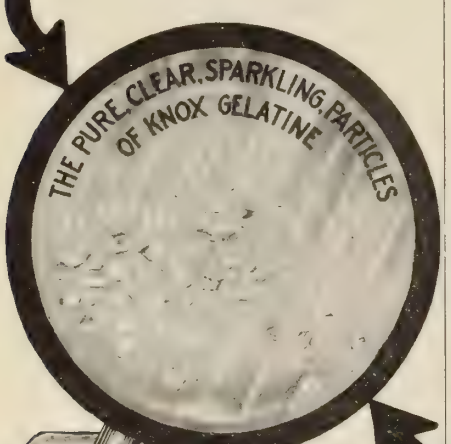
E. D. SMITH
WINONA, ONT.

Why Knox Gelatine is Granulated

First—Because in this form it dissolves immediately, saving housewives time and trouble. Second — Because the clear, sparkling, flaky particles show the pure quality of Gelatine used. It would be less trouble for us to powder Knox Gelatine but then the particular housewife could not see with her own eyes how pure, clear and dainty it is.

KNOX
PURE · PLAIN
SPARKLING
GELATINE

By adding pure sugar and real fruit juices to our world-famous pure, plain, granulated Gelatine, you can make the most delicious Gelatine desserts—because every ingredient is pure and wholesome.



Another great advantage of Knox Plain Gelatine—it does not limit you to Desserts. The most tempting Salads, delicious Candies, thick Soups and Gravies, and dainty Aspic Jellies are a few other dishes you can make or improve with Knox Gelatine, because it is neither sweetened nor flavored.

Knox Pure, Sparkling, Acidulated Gelatine

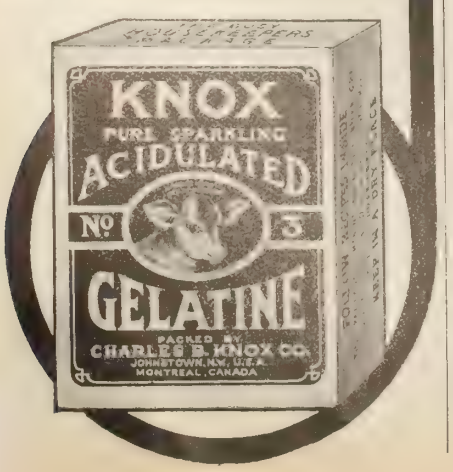
This is our "Busy Housekeeper's Package." In addition to the two envelopes of Gelatine (making two full quarts—½ gallon—of jelly) the same as contained in our plain package, this Acidulated package also contains an envelope of Pure, Concentrated Fruit Juice (Lemon), affording the busy housewife a pure, ready prepared flavoring.

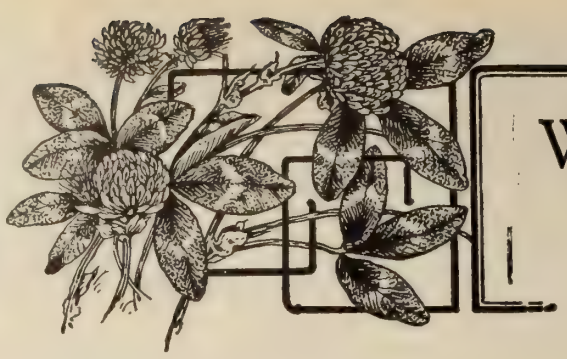
Knox Recipe Book FREE

This book entitled "Dainty Desserts for Dainty People" contains over one hundred recipes for various dishes, very quickly and easily prepared with Knox Gelatine. We will send you this helpful book FREE for your grocer's name.

Pint sample for 2-cent stamp and grocer's name.

CHARLES B. KNOX CO.
501 Knox Avenue Johnstown, N. Y.





With the Journal's Juniors

A Corner for the Small Person

By COUSIN CLOVER

Editor's Talk

OUR New Year's puzzle proved quite a success, eliciting a large number of replies. Some of you did not observe the rules of the competition. The answers, as sent us by Mrs. Gardner, are as follows: 1. Africa. 2. Hen. 3. Abroad. 4. Plum. 5. Petunia. 6. Yawn. 7. Nobody. 8. Edinboro. 9. Waif. 10. Yacht. 11. Elijah. 12. Axe. 13. Ram. The reading of initial and final letters is: "A Happy New Year, and Many of Them!" The prize winner is Teddy Wilcox, of Bond Head, Ontario, the first competitor to send in a correct answer complying with conditions.

As St. Patrick's Day comes in March, we are publishing this month a photograph of a scene in Old Ireland, which, we think, you will appreciate. We have a variety of letters this time, some of them in "A Winter Adventure" competition, and others which are sent by our occasional correspondents.

Our Letter Box

Ravenscliffe, Oct. 10, 1911.

Dear Cousin Clover:

This is my third letter to your charming club. Some of the members have written such nice letters that I thought I would try as interesting a letter as I can. I am going to tell you about my pussy and the ducks. Nearly every night when I go out in the shed I find my pussy lying on the ground with the ducks curled around her, and her head sometimes resting on a duck, purring as if she was putting them to sleep.

Would some of the girl members (age 12) write to me? If they would I would be very pleased. As my letter is getting long, I think I will close.

I will sign myself

Bertha de Forest, Ravenscliffe, Ont. HONEYSUCKLE.

I certify this is the unaided work of my little girl, aged 11.

MRS. A. DE FOREST.

* * *

My dear Honeysuckle:

What a nice, sweet name you have! I think the kitty and the ducks must look very comfortable together. I am sure some of our girl friends will be glad to write to you. You write a clear, pleasing hand.

Mount Forest,
Sept. 30th, 1911.

Dear Cousin Clover:

During my summer holidays I stayed home the first month and helped mother work. I washed the dishes, made the beds, and swept the floor. The next month I went away down to my three uncles', and I had lots of fun. My Uncle Albert is building a new brick house, and the masons are done, and the carpenters are there now. My Uncle Bert had a new dog and it ran away from him. My cousin and I ran after it and we got ahead of it and chased it back home again. We were up past the school after it, and we met an old tramp and he chased us. We take the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL and we enjoy reading it. My three uncles have a tell-a-fone and I was talking through them all. My Aunt Mable has a little baby boy and she calls it John Harly Wells. Everybody likes that name. When I was down to my uncles' we had a party and there was twenty invited, but only fourteen of them came. My two little cousins were there and they are twins. We had a real nice time.

I will close now, wishing your page success.

Yours truly,
BERTHA CALLAWAY.

Bertha wrote this. Her age is 10.

MRS. CALLAWAY.

* * *

My Dear Bertha:

I think you had a very jolly summer. A new dog is so likely to run away, isn't he? Your baby cousin's name is quite charming, and I am sure he is a nice, good-tempered baby, who hardly ever cries. It is a pleasure to read such a well-written letter.

Wellington, Jan.

Dear Cousin Clover:

As I saw in your Christmas number that a composition on "A Winter's Adventure" was open, and, as I think winter, of all the year, is the time for adventures, I thought I would enter the competition.

Sleighriding is one of our main sports of the winter, and one day, while enjoying this pastime, we met with our adventure. The boys make sleighs called "bobs," which consist of a long board fastened at each end to a sleigh. There is a very good hill for sleighriding not far from our place, with a small creek at one side near the bottom.

One day four of us got a "bob" and went up to the hill to have some fun. We had had a lot of fine rides and were preparing for another one. On we got, and, after some pushing by the one on the back, we were off. But alas! The front sleigh of the "bob" was turned to one side, and as we were going pretty swift, the steerer could not get it turned straight again.

On, on, we went, holding our breath and with eyes closed. We were on the side where the stream was and were steering straight for it. We two at the back jumped off, but the steerer could not get off, as he was lying down, and the girl next to him was hanging on for dear life. Splash! and the girl and boy are sitting on the "bob" in the creek, drenched, but laughing. We soon had them out by pulling the rope that was on the front sleigh. Needless to say, we then went home, as we had had enough for one day, and we never forgot our adventure.

Wishing the Journal Juniors' Page success, I am

Yours sincerely,
Age 14 GERTRUDE ELLIOTT.

I hereby certify that the above composition is my daughter's own work.

MRS. W. ELLIOTT.

* * *

My Dear Gertrude:

So you sent the "bob" clear into the creek. Your friends were lucky to escape with only a drenching. It would not be any fun to fall into a creek in such weather as we had in January. "Bob-sleighing" is one of our very best sports. Write again.

Penzance, Sask.

Dear Cousin Clover:

Here comes a new cousin to join "A Winter Adventure" competition.

ON AN IRISH ROAD

One bright day in January my brother and I went out hunting for the cattle. In the afternoon the snow began to blow, and in a few minutes there was quite a storm on. We both got very frightened, as we had heard about so many that had got frozen. We walked a long time but we could not find our tracks. We finally made our way to a straw pile, where we made a hole in the straw and crept in and covered ourselves with the straw.

We fell asleep and when we awoke it was daylight and the storm had abated. We got out and looked around to see if we could tell where we were. The day was cold, but off we started for home, not knowing what direction to take. We walked for about two hours before we came into our own vicinity. I was so fatigued that I was hardly able to walk any farther. We came to a friend's place, where we went in to rest and have some refreshments.

In the afternoon our friend hitched up his horses to take us home. On our way home the horses ran away, and before we could get control of them again we were a long way off the road. While the horses were running away the sleigh nearly upset several times. When we had reached the road again it was growing dark, and as our friend's house was four miles distant, and we had only a mile to go, we thought we had better let our friend go home and we would walk the rest of the way home. We got out and started off, chatting gaily. When I looked up I asked my brother where we were? What had happened? We had wandered off the track again and were now going the opposite direction. When we found the track again we had enough of common sense to keep the track till we got home. When we came up to the house the dog began to bark, but when we spoke to him he went away. We went up to the front door and knocked. Mother came to the door, and when she saw who it was she nearly fainted from the shock of seeing us alive. Father and some of our neighbors had been out hunting for us all day. When they did not find us they thought we were frozen to death. I was quite fortunate, as I had only froze four toes, a thumb and my nose. That was my last adventure in the winter time.

Yours sincerely,
Age 13. AGNES FLORENCE AYLWARD.

I certify that Agnes wrote this without assistance.

CECELIA AYLWARD.

* * *

My Dear Agnes:

Such a splendid letter and all the way from Saskatchewan. I should like to know more about Penzance. It must have been named by a Cornishman. What a truly thrilling adventure you had. I have never been through anything so exciting as that.

CHICKEN LORE AND TABLE EGGS

Success in the Poultry Yard

By CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

"YOU want to know about my fluffy family, or, rather, families," said the Chicken Specialist. "Of course, I'll tell you all about them. They're the most interesting things. Just sit down. Do you find that chair quite comfortable?"

I assured her that I did, and that I was prepared to listen to as much as she would tell me.

"Now, what is it you really want to know about them?" she inquired.

"Oh, everything," I said eagerly. "I've been told that you have made quite a success of chicken farming, and I'm quite curious to know how you happened to begin it."

"Well, you know, it's rather a joke the way I happened to launch out into this business. I'm not conscious of having had any ambitions chickenward whatever. In fact, I never dreamed of such a vocation, although I aspired to a good many others, with not nearly such satisfactory results. But one day Dottie and I found a white Leghorn pullet wandering about in the back yard scratching for a good fat worm. She was a beauty and quite tame. We fed her and amused ourselves with her for a while, then Dottie caught her up in her arms and set out to find someone to claim her. We knew of no one in the neighborhood who kept hens and it was quite a while before she found a probable owner.

"'No, little girl,' he said, when Dottie told him her story, 'I don't think she's mine, but if she is you may have her.'

"So Hen-Len became our property, and probably felt it incumbent upon her to contribute somewhat towards the family income, so she did all she could. She laid an egg.

"At this juncture I began to do some calculating. If one fresh egg was so acceptable, how much more acceptable would be six? So, eventually, I invested in a few hens, hoping soon to be able to enjoy the luxury of having really dependable eggs for breakfast. What right I had to hope for such luck, I'm sure I don't know, for I knew absolutely nothing about taking care of hens. But whatever good chance sent Hen-Len to me also sent an instinct which taught me how to care for my biddies. They thrived and did their duty faithfully.

"Notwithstanding my inexperience I was ambitious. It is remarkable how one becomes attached to hens and how much confidence they inspire. I determined, not only to revel in fresh eggs for breakfast, but to make some money. I lived in the city. Our yard space was limited, so I couldn't keep many more hens. I must think of some other way. That was plain if I was going to succeed. At last I had what seemed like a workable idea. I would get an incubator and raise chicks for sale, that is, chickens to sell to people who kept hens, but did not want to be bothered with the hatching process. I knew that this was done extensively in Buffalo and other cities. Here was my one big chance. For twenty-nine dollars I bought an incubator, with a capacity of two hundred and forty chickens, and launched out into the deep."

A YARD OF WHITE LEGHORNS

"You were plucky," I remarked. "Did you have any trouble at first?"

"Yes, a little. Of course, I couldn't expect to have good results right from the first. I had to pay something for my experience. I paid a moderate price for it. I didn't seem to be able to regulate the temperature of the incubator with a lamp and some of the eggs were spoiled. If I had persevered I dare say I should have come out alright, but I got it connected with gas instead, and after that I got along nicely.

"The funniest experience I ever had, I think, was when I attempted to incubate ducks' eggs and hens' eggs together." She laughed heartily at the recollection of the experiment, and then proceeded to relate the story.

"I thought I should like to have some ducklings, so I went to market and got a 'setting' of eggs, which I put in the incubator and filled it up with hens' eggs. I went through the usual process of examining and culling and regulating of temperatures, and in due time—twenty-one days—the hens' eggs were hatched, but not a quack from the ducks' eggs. I waited for a day and then made some inquiries, learning that it takes ducks' eggs 28 days to mature instead of 21. Here was a dilemma. I had orders for the next hatch of chickens, and I could not afford to leave the eggs in the incubator eight days longer. I decided to let Old Sally finish the job. She usually raised the incubator families, when any were to be raised, which was not often, as the chickens were almost always bargained for before they were hatched, and taken away when they were a day or two old.

"Poor Old Sally! She didn't know the trials and humiliations that were ahead of her with that family of aliens. When she saw what she had been instrumental in bringing into the world, she squatted down on the ground dejectedly, and refused to go near them. I never saw dismay so plainly depicted on any creature's face as on that poor old mother hen's. And the ducklings weren't any better pleased with their foster mother than she was with them. She wouldn't swim herself and she scolded when they tried to swim in the drinking water, and only succeeded in getting it too dirty to drink. Then we gave them a big pan of water and things went on more smoothly."

"Where do you buy the eggs for your incubator?" I asked, supposing that she bought a special kind and paid a fancy price for them.

"Usually on the market," she replied. "I inquire if they are fertile, and, if I am assured that they are, I take them. Yes, of course, they must be fresh. I never pay more than twenty-five cents a dozen. You know, I don't go in for fancy birds. I believe there is money in that branch of the industry, but so far I have adhered to the common garden variety—the kind that lay well and make good eating.

"First, I place the eggs carefully in the incubator (there are always instructions for this with it) and turn them every day. By the ninth day you can tell whether any are infertile or not. The infertile ones are removed and only the fertile ones left in. Up to the nineteenth day I keep the temperature up to 102½ deg. or 103 deg., and from that time until the birds are hatched it should register 103 deg. to 105 deg.

"Just to convey an idea of how a hatch averages, I might give you one of my experiences. Out of two hundred and forty eggs forty were infertile, and out of the remaining two hundred I had one hundred and ninety-seven healthy little chicks. Not a bad average, eh?

"Now, the beauty of dealing with chickens, as I do, is, one has no bother raising them. As I said before, they are sold, often before they are hatched, and taken away before they are forty-eight hours old. Occasionally, when by any chance they remain longer, Sally or one of the other old ladies, adopts and teaches them how to scratch. There are patent brooders, but I've not invested yet.

"At first I feed them pinhead oatmeal dry, and one must be careful not to let them have too much water. I turn a cup upside down in a saucer of water. This prevents their drinking too greedily.

"Indeed," she went on enthusiastically, "I'm so well pleased with the result of my experience that I'm thinking seriously of investing in another incubator. I certainly shall if I remove to the suburbs, as I half expect to; I may get another anyway. I could have sold as many more chicks last year if I had had them."

"What did you say about a brooder?" I inquired, anxious to know all about the Chicken Specialist's methods.

"Oh, nothing much. I've never had a real brooder; I don't know much about them. Once or twice when I required one, I invented one of my own, just a cheese box turned upside down in a larger box, and inside the cheese box a gem jar filled with hot water and an old stocking pulled over it. Put the chickens under the cheese box and they'll cuddle around the gem jar as fondly as under Old Sally's wing. Give them air, to be sure."

"Where do you keep the incubator?" I asked, much interested in this mechanical parent of innumerable chicks.

"In the cellar," she replied. "To ensure the hatch coming out all right, there should be darkness, quietness and an even temperature. I don't know why it is, but noise or a disturbance of any kind brings certain disaster. I also keep the ground sprinkled with water directly under the incubator. I find this conducive to good results.

"I should be very lonely indeed without my family of hens and chickens. I keep a few hens all the time, too, you know. I have enough eggs for table use and a few to spare. I've never sold any for less than twenty-five cents a dozen, and, of course, they are very much higher than that at some seasons. Last winter I got sixty cents for them. During October of this year they barely paid their board and keep. In November and December I'll have to credit them, but by the first of the year I expect they'll begin to pay up with big interest. You may tell your friends that there's money to be made in keeping hens and hatching chickens. And there's pleasure too, for they are such grateful little things. They seem to appreciate everything you do for them. But you must keep them busy, make them scratch, scratch, scratch, and they enjoy scraps, too. I save all the table refuse for them. I often take my sewing and sit out on the back porch, where I can watch them. They really seem to like to have me there, and peep through the wire netting in such an interested fashion, to see what I'm doing. Why, they're the most agreeable kind of company; I don't know what I should do without them."

"You cannot have much of a run for them?" I queried, thinking of the average size of city back yards.

"No; that's the worst of living in a city. One has so little room outside, but, as I said before, I may move to one of the suburbs, and if I do I shall take good care that I have plenty of space for a good run. I know I could do well if I had better facilities."

"I don't suppose you use the improvised piano box hen house that I've heard people talk about," I laughingly remarked.

"Oh, no; I have the real thing. I wish it were daylight, I'd take you out to see it. It's very small, and is built on the colonial plan."

LONDON
OSTRICH
PLUMES
LEAD THE WORLD

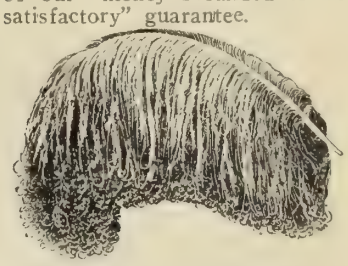
No part of a woman's wardrobe is of such importance as the hat. An expensive costume is often spoiled because the hat is not becoming or is not fashionably trimmed.

Paris, New York and London have decided the question of millinery trimming for this spring, which is to be ostrich plumes and ostrich feather novelties.

"LONDON" SELECTION of willow plumes, French plumes and fancy ostrich feather novelties is the largest and most complete in Canada.

10 Days Approval

In buying "London" goods you take no risk. Write for Catalogue C3, and get full particulars of our "money refunded if not satisfactory" guarantee.

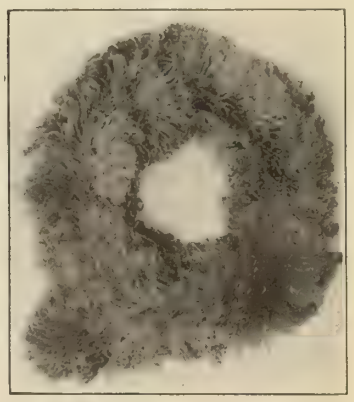


WILLOW PLUMES

17 inches long	$5.00
19 inches long	7.50
20 inches long	10.00

Guaranteed

Every article we sell is guaranteed satisfactory or money refunded. We can make this offer because we make from the finest ostrich feathers every article we sell. Make it in our own factory, and sell it in our own stores, or by mail.



OSTRICH BANDS

32-inch	$3.00
32-inch	4.00
32-inch	5.00
32inch, willowed	12.00

black, white or any color.

One of the newest fashionable millinery trimmings.

Free Catalogue

Write to-day to Toronto address for illustrated catalogue and price list No. C3.

London Feather Company, Limited

144 Yonge Street, Toronto

Montreal: 569 St. Catherines St. W.
Brantford: W. L. Hughes, 127 Colborne Street.

AROUND THE HEARTH

Written for the Canadian Home Journal

By JENNIE ALLEN MOORE

"Poor lone Hannah!
Sitting at the window binding shoes.
Faded, wrinkled,
Sitting, stitching in a mournful muse.
Bright-eyed beauty once was she,
When the bloom was on the tree.
Spring and Winter
Hannah's at the window binding shoes."

COLORLESS LEAVES

REMEMBER that poem in the old school readers? And the pathetic picture of the sad-faced girl at the top of the page? Watching for Ben who had sailed away twenty years ago, and never returned to claim his bride. How colorless her life, the return of the seasons brought no change, the same routine, "Sitting at the window binding shoes."

Right around us are just such lives, though the occasion is not public knowledge; but deep-seated in the innermost recesses of hearts, whose hopes sailed away or were buried years ago, lie the ghosts of love, and hope, and yearnings, destined never to be fulfilled, the wreck of lives that have lost their roseate hue, and only the dull pain has taken the place through the grey monotony of the passing years.

There is the elder sister who has been mother's right hand through years of toil, helping to raise a large family, and although her own ambitions were great, and her capabilities still greater, she has resigned an education that the younger brothers and sisters may go to college, and come out with professions. She has packed the trunks and sent them joyfully away; she has unpacked them when they returned; has rejoiced over their successes, their interests have been hers, and one by one the family have gone out, and in their busy lives have grown away from her. She has crossed her mother's hands in their last repose, and lives on with the lonely white-haired man in the old home, and in the memories of the old days that the younger ones are, perhaps, striving to forget. The color scheme is grey, with here and there a golden tint, as she sits musing on the past.

The manly lover who sought her hand, she turned away, because she felt her duty was to assist her mother with her arduous tasks. Again he came, and was sacrificed once more, because her father would be left alone. Then he married. How well she remembers the joyous wedding bells that rang out on that fair June morning when her favorite sister went away with the husband of her choice! And then, six years later, how mournful and hollow-sounded the train whistle that brought her remains to be laid in the family plot! The handsome big brother, too, was laid low in a distant grave with a white cross to mark his resting place. These are her companions in the declining years of her life—the ghosts of her friends, fair visitants clothed in their old-time flesh and blood. These are her thoughts as she sits in the twilight, she is linking the past with the present, she is "Sitting at the window binding shoes."

~

SHE is a very delightful woman, I admit," said one friend to another, as they discussed a mutual acquaintance. "I have always admired her for her refinement and sweet manners, but she has had things all her own way through life, and there has been nothing to call a real disturbing element ever crossed her path, unless we should name her husband in that connection. He, of course, did not prove the affinity she expected, and soon drifted into a divorce to free his bonds, but that never even ruffled her serenity, rather relieved her of a burden, and so, she has had smooth sailing, comparative ease, plenty of money, surrounded by all that makes her life enjoyable, why should she nor develop into a sweet character?"

The speaker was a jolly little woman, and smilingly added, "Now, I'm a nice sort myself, although I cannot boast of such an even temper, and am not so literary, but you know my knowledge on practical lines, of which she knows nothing, offsets that, and so, weighing me in the balance against her, I should not be found wanting. To drift with the tide that smoothly carries one onward in the direction they want to go, is a different matter to struggling against odds year after year for thirty and more. Now, my husband is as near perfection as any man on earth, but there have been times in our lives, when our ideas did not coincide, and times when we faced most provoking circumstances, and with my mind perverted by some strong opposition, I have felt like deserting the whole thing. But I didn't. I have stuck to the ranch, and I believe some credit ought to come my way, even if I have failed to acquire the easy restful character so much admired in this individual."

There was so much in that "I have stuck to the ranch." It stayed with me. It meant so much. It carried strength with it, the kind of strength that convinces the world that there are conquering heroes living quietly within the four walls of home, fighting battles and winning out, standing by the guns, meeting sickness and death, poverty, domestic problems, child-training, bearing burdens like a good soldier, often without love, or sympathy, yet ever at the helm. The body may become weakened and frail, the mind dazed and confused with the strain of always remembering, but the duties never vary, and though the eyes grow dim, the senses dulled with the grind and monotony, the meals are on time, the clean clothes are mended, and in the drawer, the comfort of every one is looked after, nothing that should be done is left undone, because she has stuck to the ranch—"Hannah at the window binding shoes."

~

POOR old man! He was seventy-two last birthday. He has always belonged to a certain village, for no one can remember a time when he was not there. He runs a little country store, has weighed out sugar, tea and butter since he was fourteen. That was when his father owned the store. At twenty-one it was bequeathed to him, and it was not long before he took as partner a dear little woman. For a few short, blissful years they lived in peace and harmony, then she left him, after a long illness, with four helpless little ones. With his sister's aid they were cared for and educated until they flew from the home nest, and found other positions and homes.

Then he married again, a widow with two sons. Three more children came to the home, and he has toiled on, never taking a holiday. His stepsons have given him much trouble, have cost him pain of mind, as well as financial loss. They have been ungrateful to their mother, and to him, but he has not complained. His hair is grey, his form is bent, but he is found behind the counter at the usual hours. The world races on apace. Kings and queens are crowned and pass away, governments rise and fall, great inventions set the whole world staring into the skies at balloons and air-ships, and down into the water at torpedo boats and submarine marvels, new and improved machinery keeps the industrial markets busy, yet he can only read and listen to the wonderful tales. If he has any aspirations towards more material knowledge of these things they are smothered.

His place cannot be filled in his little world, because his wife's mind is quite unbalanced, and no one can do for her the little offices he understands so well. Then the youngest boy, the baby of the three families is a constant sufferer from heart affection. Only his tender old father knows exactly what to do for him when a fierce spasm seizes him. How could he leave the lad? How could he get away even for a day? The bank account is low—very low—after all those years of constant work. There have been so many drains upon it for education, for sickness, for clothing and food. He has always paid his way, has never gone into debt, but it has meant a long, steady pull, he must not give up now, he has always been independent, and hopes to stave off for a few years the feebleness of old age. He looks forward with trust, never speaks discouragingly, shoulders his burden, carries it manfully, sticks to his post, "Sitting at the window binding shoes."

~

THE majority of lives are humdrum, but it does not follow that they must be lifeless and melancholy. It all depends upon the viewpoint, the disposition, the color of glasses through which we survey life. Some people choose to look through the bluest glasses. They are so constituted. They always remind me of this little verse I learnt years ago:—

"The way is dark that lies before us,
In every quarter dangers loom;
The thunder clouds are spreading o'er us
But still we hurry to our doom!
Although you call my sadness folly
I will not drive my fears away;
There's such a charm in melancholy,
I would not, if I could, be gay."

That is what they enjoy. They are gloomy because that is what they desire. With them it is to the manner born. From earliest childhood they display the traits that later develop into hard and fast habits, and become accustomed to indulging themselves in gloomy thoughts and forebodings. They becloud their minds with pessimistic views until it becomes a melancholy pleasure, and they would not, if they could, be gay. Their lives are colorless, and they do not wish it otherwise.

It does not follow because our lives are monotonous and commonplace that we necessarily must be unhappy, or move in a rut. Let us all endeavor to avoid ruts, for of all people we may encounter those to be shummed are the ones who live in a groove so narrow that there is not room for an opinion outside of their own. They are so satisfied with their own views, so hampered with their own narrow-mindedness that they cannot perceive anything beyond themselves. If aught occurs to alter the even tenor of their way, or change their way of living in the slightest degree, they pose as martyrs, and cause every one around them to feel uncomfortable because their life in a rut has been invaded, and their equilibrium disturbed.

An old man I knew very well moved in such a rut, and wanted his meals served on the minute. His impatience was very manifest when anything prevented his tray coming to his room on the stroke of the clock. The dear little woman with whom he lived did her utmost to humor his whim, but one hot July day when she had been busy sweltering over the kitchen fire all day baking bread and pies and cakes for the harvest hands, and had sent a toothsome supper to a distant field, in order to save time for the busy workers, so they could finish without the long walk back and forth, she prepared a dainty meal for him a few minutes earlier than usual, so she could cool off in the hammock swung under the apple trees before milking time. As she entered with the tray, he glanced at the clock, and in slow, withering tones said, "Are you aware that it is only five minutes to six?" I asked, "What did you do?" "Do," she said, "I set the tray down and pattered away." I am afraid the "bit Irish" in me would have flashed a retort, but I suppose she understood his rut.

~

MANY people are melancholy from force of circumstances. So much sadness has crept into their lives, and their environments, perhaps, accentuate the state of mind in which they perpetually live that they cannot throw it off. They brood over the bitterness of their troubles, and become morbid and morose, with indifference and despair plainly written in the countenance. Everything in their words and actions would indicate the trend of their thoughts, their faces wear a habitual settled look. I often pick those persons out on the car, on the street, and wonder to what reef they can ascribe their woe; and if, by any means, they could be roused to an enjoyment in their surroundings, or if they must go on preserving that apathetic look of abject unconcern forever. It is hard to understand such natures, and it must be very hard to live with them.

Again, we see those to whom the gods have sent rich gifts too late in life—long delayed joys—many things that could have given pleasure with the joyousness of youth come when health had gone, and life has lost its spring. To have the means of gratifying the appetite, and be a hopeless dyspeptic; to have money and leisure for travel, and be wheeled around in a chair, to have a large bank account at forty, and no education, these are all gifts that come too late.

We have only too look around us from day to day to see people who have scrimped and saved, lived frugally, and seldom indulged in pleasure, in order that there might be a "good time coming." When they feel that they are ready for it, somehow it eludes them.

One of the new books that came out at Christmas entitled "Right living as a fine art," contains a symphony by Channing, which reads as follows:—"To live content with small means; to seek elegance rather than luxury, and refinement rather than fashion; to be worthy, not respectable, and wealthy, not rich; to listen to stars and birds, babes and sages, with open heart; to study hard; to think quietly, act frankly, talk gently, await occasions, hurry never, in a word to let the spiritual, unbidden and unconscious grow up through the common—this is my symphony."

Thus many of the lives that seem deprived of pleasure, and lacking enthusiasm, apparently colorless, may be full of the sweet poetry of a symphony that others miss in the hurry and rush of activity, the wear and tear of our modern way of living. They do not need our pity, nor our sympathy; their paths run smoothly along, their days filled with a quaint joy of duty done, their nights calm and peaceful, they do not envy the great majority who run swiftly, filled with unrest and discontent, giving no heed to the still voices that lead to spiritual growth, and the uplift of the soul.

Do You Know Your Color?

THE girl who believes in good luck charms or likes to think that she does will want to know about her particular astral color.

The girl who was born in January should wear green. All shades of pink should be the February girl's choice, while those of March will feel most comfortable in purple. The April daughter can wear red and especially rose red. The special color for May is blue, and the girl born in this month should choose jewellery and clothes of light tints of blue. This girl is supposed to be sensitive. Bronze green is for the June girl, which is apt to make her a little melancholy. Light red is the color for July, and deep blue for the girl born in August. Yellow is for the girl born in September. If you were born in October you will take the greatest comfort in wearing brown, while if November is your month you may choose a light gray. Instead of the gay holiday colors the girl who is born in December should choose mauve.

FASHIONS FOR COMING SEASON

SPRING fashions always make a subject of deep interest. This year they are charmingly attractive, altogether desirable, and present a most fascinating picture. We have grown away from the extremes of the narrow straight lines and have developed what are really pretty and becoming effects, with the result that the coming season is one of much promise

A great many different materials are to be worn. While it may be said in a general way that for the street costume, serge and taffeta are conspicuous favorites, there are numberless other suitings that must be added to the list. Light weight broadcloth is always beautiful for spring wear. Scotch cheviots and mixtures are admirable for hard usage, mohair is shown in unprecedentedly beautiful designs and colorings, and will be a favorite, and for the dressy costumes will be used ottoman and other silk as well as taffeta, although the last is the favorite. The silk is delightfully soft and supple, takes lovely lines and is shown in such a marvelous variety of beautiful colors as to make a choice a difficult matter. Two toned effects are much seen and a great many stripes are shown. Many smart costumes for the street will combine plain taffeta with striped or plain or with changeable, and, again, taffeta will be used in combination with wool and with satin, and with other materials.

Coats are short and jaunty, extending to just a trifle below the hips. Many cutaway effects are noted, and there are collars and revers of many different sorts, but in a general way they are of generous, but not extreme, size. Both three-quarter and long sleeves will be used. Empire jackets are smart and are liked for dressy costumes and among the simple ones for morning wear must be included the Norfolk coat. Skirts are narrow without exaggeration. The two-piece skirt is a favorite, but often it is made with plaits at the sides or over the panels to provide slightly additional flare.

Tunic effects are many, and numbers of the best models are made with skirts of two materials, the lower or foundation portions being stitched to the upper, well within the edge to give the overskirt effect, while in reality there is only the weight of one skirt to be carried. What are known as Russian effects, or belts used in various ways, are conspicuous. That we will have some loose coats, actually belted, unquestionably is true, but for the most part the belts are used over the coats of semi-fit to be ornamental rather than to serve any practical use. They are shown entirely round the waist and over the sides only in equal numbers, and if they do nothing else they afford opportunity for the use of handsome buttons.

Buttons, let it be said, are all-important. They are not employed for prosaic use only, but also for ornament. On the coat suits the ball buttons are liked, but there are a great many beautiful metal and bone ones shown that are adapted to special materials and make singularly handsome effects, while buttons made of the material or the trimming are preferred by a great many tailors to every other sort. With the coat suits will be worn the dainty collars and cuffs of white that are always so pretty, and beautiful ones of embroidered muslin and of heavy laces are shown, macrame, Cluny and crochet being favorites for the purpose. The season is one of so much beautiful color that it is difficult to select any shade as favorite, but it is probable that a great deal of grey, and of the cooler blues will be worn, while white suits promise to be extremely fashionable, both in serge and cloth. Coats of changeable taffeta with broadcloth skirts are to be mentioned among the novelties also, and taffeta is likely to be employed in almost every possible way. Three-piece gowns made with skirts of cloth or fine serge, and blouses, combining the material with taffeta and net, while the little coats are of the taffeta, are very smart and distinctive.

Hats are both close fitting and large. A great many of the brimless turbans will be worn, the mushroom shape is frequently to be noted, and there are numberless of the moderately-sized and large hats with the rolling brims, among which can be found something adapted to every face. Taffeta with fine hemp and tagel straws makes some of the smartest and prettiest hats, and the changeable taffeta is a favorite. Frequently there is no other trimming, the taffeta being draped and the straw looped to form bows, but wings and small leathers on turbans and the like are shown, and there are a good many substitutes for Paradise and aigrettes that are made from ostrich and fowl feathers that are used, but for the early season flowers will be largely reserved for hats of the more dressy type. For these, Panama and peanut and Java straws are favorites, although hemp and tagel are always beautiful and much worn.

WE have no very sensational hat novelties sprung upon us, and many of the additions made to the already long list of different styles of hats and toques are revivals from not so far back. The most important of these revivals is that of the marquis. This is no servile copy, however, of the old tricorne. There is the three-cornered effect, of course, but it is frequently very slightly indicated, seldom with mathematical precision, and when this is the case, something is always done to mitigate the regularity of its outline.

A good example of such treatment is to be found in a model which has a domed crown, stretched over with black velvet, just high enough to show above the inward curve of a brim in soft white felt turned up against it. The three upward points of the brim are rounded off and the severity of its outlines moreover mitigated by a wide binding of plain ermine. It comes well on the head (as indeed do all shapes this season), and is made to be worn slightly tilted towards the right side, so that one of the points is exactly over the right ear. This point is held back to the crown by a large cockade consisting of two flat pleatings of white silk encircling a button covered with ermine, from the forward side of which comes a little point of the same and three small black-tipped tails.

In larger hats the tricorne effect is less pronounced. For instance, the brim of a very large black velvet hat is folded back straight across the front and only a small portion slightly rolled over on the left side of the back, the result being a very decided point on each side and merely a sketchy one behind. An inch-wide fold of dark blue velvet is mounted on the under side of the brim a little within the edge, and a large "feather broom" aigrette stands erect above the low-domed crown.

That Flavor

In Quaker Oats is given by Nature to just the choicest grains.

You don't find it in common oatmeal.

We get it by picking the rich, plump grains —just the finely-flavored oats.

We get it by 62 siftings. There are only 10 pounds of Quaker Oats in a bushel.

Then our process retains the flavor.

That is the reason why Quaker Oats stands unique among oatmeals.

This Morning

Millions of people, half the world over, enjoyed this delicious oatmeal.

It was served on more tables than all other brands together.

So it is every morning.

Just because mothers believe it worth while to make oatmeal delightful.

And because they know, after years of comparison, that children like Quaker Oats best.

Quaker Oats

Is the utmost in oatmeal.

It is the cream of the oats, prepared in the ideal way.

Yet, despite the selection, the cost is only one-half cent per dish.

Do you ever, in your home, serve a lesser oatmeal?

Regular size package, 10c

Family size package, for smaller cities and country trade, 25c.

The prices noted do not apply in the extreme West.

The Quaker Oats Company

PETERBOROUGH

Look for the Quaker trademark on every package

228

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

When two numbers are given with one costume, two patterns are required at 12 cents each. Send cash to PATTERN DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, 59-61 John Street, Toronto, Canada. Order always by number, stating size wanted. Patterns are mailed from our Toronto office the same day as order is received. PAPER PATTERNS TWELVE CENTS EACH POST PAID.

Frocks for the Small Person

FROCKS for the very small folk and little girls are exceedingly charming this season, and in the group are shown a number of most attractive as well as eminently fashionable designs.

Number 7271 shows a pretty girl's dress, which, in this instance, is made of plaid Scotch gingham, combined with plain linen. The feature of the blouse is found in the overlapped edges. The skirt is straight and plaited and the two are joined by a belt. All seasonable materials are appropriate, challis and the like, as well as washable fabrics. For the 8 year size will be needed 3½ yards of material 27, 2⅝ yards 36, 1¾ yards 44 inches wide, with 1 yard 27 for the trimming, ⅞ yard 18 for yoke and under sleeves. The pattern is cut in sizes for girls of 6, 8 and 10 years.

Number 7289 is a dainty little frock, the body portion or yoke of which is made in one with the sleeves. The skirt is straight, gathered and joined to it. In the front view it is made of flouncing. In the back view the whole dress is made of plain material with a frill of embroidery at the lower edge. For the 4 year size will be needed 1¾ yards of bordered material or embroidery 18 inches wide, with ½ yard of plain material 36, and 1¾ yards of beading, ¾ yard of insertion to make as shown in the front view; 2 yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 3½ yards of embroidery to make as shown in the back view. The pattern is cut in sizes for children of 2, 4 and 6 years of age.

Number 7298 is a most attractive dress, designed for slightly older girls. The skirt is six-gored and laid in plaits at front and back, while it is plain at the sides. The waist portion is distinctly novel. The kimono sleeves are cut in one with the side portions. There are separate front and back sections that are stitched to them, and there is a yoke to which both sleeves and main portions are attached. It can be made with high or square neck and with three-quarter or long sleeves. For the 12 year size will be needed 5¼ yards of material 27, 4 yards 36, 3½ yards 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard 27 for the trimming, ¾ yard 18 for yoke and under sleeves. The pattern is cut in sizes for girls of 10, 12 and 14 years of age.

Number 7319—Tunic dresses are among the newest shown and this one is exceedingly smart. In the illustration it is made of natural colored pongee, and the trimming is red silk braided with soutache matching the gown, but dresses of this kind will be found admirably well suited to the simple washable materials, such as linen, chambray and the like, as well as to pongee and other fabrics of the kind. The skirt is straight and plaited and joined to a belt. The tunic is cut with front and back portions and is closed over the shoulders beneath the trimming. For the 10 year size will be needed 4¾ yards of material 27, 3¾ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard 27 for the trimming. The pattern is cut in sizes for girls of 8, 10 and 12 years of age.

Number 7257—Dresses that are made with body portion and skirt in one are the best liked for the younger folk. This one is simple yet novel. There is a little panel at the front, to which the main portions are attached, and the shaped trimming bands and yoke give a distinctive touch. The closing is made invisibly at the back, where there are inverted plaits. For the 6 year size will be needed 3½ yards of material 27, 3¼ yards 36, 2⅞ yards 44 inches wide, with 1 yard 27 for the trimming. The

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

Coat Pattern No. 7314
Skirt Pattern No. 7261

Coat Pattern No. 7296
Skirt Pattern No. 7283

Coat Pattern No. 7332
Skirt Pattern No. 7297

pattern is cut in sizes for girls of 4, 6 and 8 years of age.

Number 7279 shows one of the newest dresses made with a panel at the front and one at the back. These panels are attached at their upper edges only, but held slightly to position by means of a belt. The round bertha makes another attractive feature, and the deep cuffs are smart in the extreme. The skirt is four-gored. The blouse is cut in one piece with the sleeves. The dress can be worn with or without a guimpe, and can be made without the panels if something plainer is wanted. For the 10 year size will be needed 4¼ yards of material 27, 3 yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard 27 for the trimming. Cut in sizes for girls 8, 10 and 12 years.

Number 7326 is a pretty one-piece dress that is finished with a V-shaped yoke and trimming that makes it entirely novel and individual. The closing is made at the shoulder beneath the trimming straps. This dress is made of rose-colored linen and the trimming portions are of white eyelet embroidery. For the 6 year size will be needed 2 yards of material 27, 36 or 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard 18 for the trimming. The pattern is cut in sizes for girls of 4, 6 and 8 years of age.

Number 7260—Overlapped effects are just as smart for the girls as they are for the grown folk, and this frock shows the effect handled with exceptional success. The trimming portions are made of embroidered banding and the dress itself is of blue linen, but frocks of this kind are made from a great many different fabrics, the wools as well as the washable materials. The waist can be made with or without the lining that includes under sleeves. The skirt is four-gored and the box plaits at the sides are applied over it. For the 12 year size will be required 5¼ yards of material 27, 4½ yards 36, 3¼ yards 44 inches wide, with 2 yards of banding and ⅜ yards 18 for the round neck yoke, ¾ yard 18 for yoke and under sleeves. The pattern is cut in sizes for girls of 10, 12 and 14 years of age.

Tailored Suits of Spring Fashions

SPRING fabrics for tailored suits are unusually handsome this season and unusually varied. Here are three that show novelties of three distinctly different sorts.

The suit at the extreme left is made of striped serge with trimming of taffeta and heavy lace. The coat is made with cutaway fronts and a big collar that can be either round or square at the back. The sleeves are of the regulation two-piece sort. The skirt is quite novel; it is four-gored, but the back gore is extended for full length, and there is a two-piece lower section that is overlapped for several inches at the front, so that it provides ample freedom for walking. For the medium size the coat will require 4¾ yards of material 27, 2⅝ yards 44 or 52 inches wide; the width at the lower edge is of lace banding. For the skirt will be needed 4¼ yards 27, 3¼ yards 44 or 52 inches wide; the width at the lower edge is 2¼ yards. The pattern of the coat, 7314, is cut in sizes from 34 to 44 bust, of the skirt, 7261, in sizes from 22 to 32 waist.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

The misses' costume shows one of the novelty suitings and is made with collar of satin. The Norfolk coat is extremely becoming to girlish figures, and will be much worn this season. The skirt is made in two pieces, and is a pronounced favorite. It can be finished either at the high or natural waist line. The model is an excellent one for mohair and for linen and other lightweight suitings, as well as for the wool illustrated. For the 16 year size the coat will require 4 yards of material 27, 2¾ yards 44 or 52 inches wide, with ⅛ yard of velvet; for the skirt will be needed 3¼ yards 27, 2¼ yards 44 or 52 inches wide; the width at the lower edge is 1⅞ yards.

The pattern of the coat, 7296, and of the skirt, 7283, are cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

The third and last suit combines an Empire coat with four-gored skirt. The coat is an exceptionally smart one and very generally becoming. It includes three-quarter sleeves and flaring cuffs, and a becoming collar. The upper and lower sections are finished separately, and the lower section is lapped over the upper and stitched to position, therefore the making is a very simple matter. The coat is held by a single button and buttonhole. The skirt is four-gored. There are extensions at the edges of the front and back gores that reach to about flounce depth and these extensions form deep inverted plaits. The skirt can be finished with a belt at the natural waist line, or be cut to the high line and underfaced, as liked. For the medium size will be needed 4¼ yards of material 27, 2¼ yards 44 or 52 inches wide for the coat; 5¼ yards 27, 3¾ yards 44 or 52 for the skirt; the width of the skirt at the lower edge is 3 yards, 2⅛ yards when the plaits are laid.

The pattern of the coat, 7332, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust, of the skirt, 7297, in sizes from 22 to 32 waist.

Coat Pattern No. 7324
Skirt Pattern No. 7327

Coat Pattern No. 7305
Skirt Pattern No. 7269

Coat Pattern No. 7320
Skirt Pattern No. 7321

Fashionable Street Costumes

THE street costume is always the one of first interest with the change of seasons. Here are three attractive models, one of which is designed for young girls and for small women.

The suit at the extreme left is made from a double-faced material, and the underside makes the trimming. The coat is without a collar and can be made with either one or two revers, and it can be worn open or buttoned up closely about the throat. The skirt is seven-gored. It can be made with inverted plaits or with habit back and with high or natural waist line. All suiting materials will be found appropriate for the model with the trimming of any contrasting one that may be liked. For the medium size the coat will require 4 yards of material 27, 2¼ yards 44 or 52 inches wide; for the skirt will be needed 6¾ yards 27, 4½ yards 44 or 52, when material has figure or nap, but if not 5 yards 27, 3 yards 44 or 52 inches wide will be sufficient. The width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2¾ yards, with inverted plaits, 2½ yards with habit back.

The pattern of the coat, 7324, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust; of the skirt, 7327, in sizes from 26 to 36 waist measure.

The second costume shows a distinctive and altogether novel coat, which gives an Empire effect at the back, and a skirt that is all in one, yet suggests a tunic. This skirt is fitted by means of little tucks at the back that are quite new and in every way attractive. In this case the material is one of the novelty suitings and the trimming is satin, but the skirt could be made of two materials with equal success, and any seasonable suiting will be found appropriate. For the medium size the coat will require 4½ yards of material 27, 3 yards 44 or 52 inches wide, with 1⅛ yards 27 for the collar and 2½ yards of braid; for the skirt will be needed 5 yards 27, 3 yards 44 or 52; the width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2¼ yards.

The pattern of the coat, 7305, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust; of the skirt, 7269, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist measure.

The misses' costume is exceedingly smart after a simple manner, and simple lines are always the best both for the young girl and for women of girlish figures. The skirt is made in two pieces. It can be finished with the overlapping points, as illustrated, or with straight edges, as preferred, but the overlapped effect is new and in every way to be commended. The coat gives the straight lines that are essentially smart and always becoming. It also can be made with or without the overlapping points, and with the collar that is either pointed or round at the back. This costume is made of striped mohair trimmed with taffeta in two shades, and with black and white cord, but any suiting material can be used with a trimming that is harmonious in effect, or plain material could be used for the entire costume with the overlap- with soutache. For the 16 year size the coat will require 3 yards of material 36, 2⅜ yards 44 or 52 inches wide, with ¾ yard of satin of each color for collar and cuffs; for the skirt will be needed 2¼ yards 36, 44 or 52 inches wide; the width at the lower edge is a little less than 2 yards.

The pattern of the coat, 7320, and of the skirt, 7321, are cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

Spring Hats

THE first spring hats have appeared, anticipating a need for them among the South-goers, for almost before we had a chance to realize that winter was upon us, the holidays had passed, says Toronto Saturday Night. For the present, there are still new hats of velvet and satin, especially designed to give a new impetus to the flagging season. Chief among these are two or three of the shapes from which the new straws were modeled. One is of moderate size, with a mound-shaped crown and a brim rolled evenly across the front, then gradually more deeply, till, at the centre back it is as high as the crown itself. The only trimming is a large gold cloth rose with a sprig or two of foliage just at one side, close to the crown, with a swirl of black velvet curving up and around one side. It is both smart and apt to be generally becoming. A large velvet hat worn well down over the ears, is turned up abruptly in a diagonal line across the front to a much greater depth at the left side than at the right, and slopes far back so that the shoulders are hidden. The "Frog" hat, which has a draped crown of velvet and a cluster of roses tucked in the folds at one side and a satin-faced brim, is another new model, and it, too, is to be one of the spring designs, developed in straw with a silk crown, and with the crown fashioned of a straw or braid plateau, and the brim faced with ribbed silk.

Borders Popular

BORDERS, borders, and yet again borders, at cotton, linen, silk and wool counters alike—this is the main feature of the new displays of spring materials. Some of these so-called borders, to be sure, are so wide that they are less real edges for trimming than a combination of two kinds of material or two-color schemes or a plain and figured pattern for combination in costumes. A conspicuous mem-

Canadian Home Journal

SPECIAL OFFER

Whole Set Shipped For

$1.00

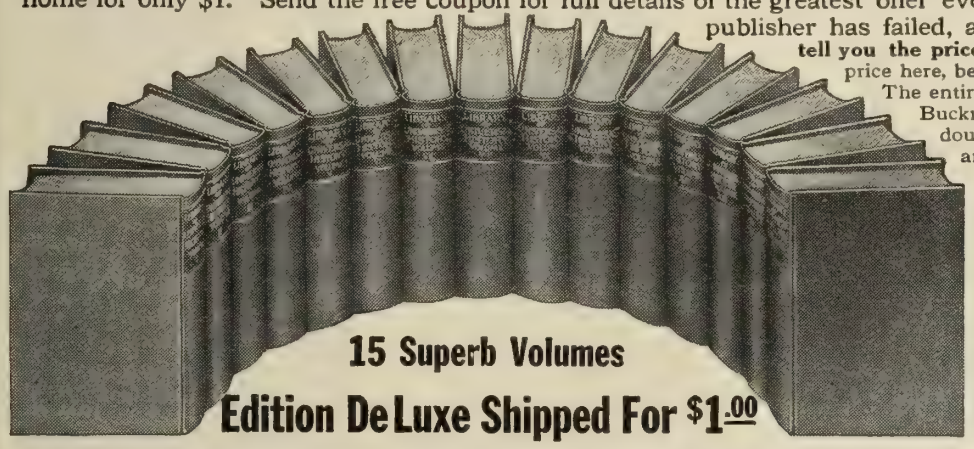
A great special limited offer to the readers of Canadian Home Journal. Send the free coupon at the bottom of this page and get the full details today.

Nero at the Circus

Nero! The very sound of the name pictures tyranny and cruelty. Born of a murderess and schooled in crime by murderers, the life of this man has stood through all ages as the climax of cruelty and crime. How the Christian Martyrs were persecuted and tortured by the tyrant, how he recklessly defied all precedent and created tortures and crimes unheard of before, and how his selfish, childish weakness, at last brought him to a coward's grave, is all told vividly and masterfully in the Library of Universal History. The illustration of the tyrant at the Circus is only one of the hundreds which embellish this great work.

Library of Universal History

The world's most reliable history, the history that has been adopted by Universities, Colleges and Educators everywhere. The history that is now in more than 250,000 homes. Now shipped direct to your own home for only $1. Send the free coupon for full details of the greatest offer ever made in the history of the publishing business. The publisher has failed, and we have secured a limited number of sets. We can tell you the price only in a personal letter. We cannot quote the sensationally low price here, because it would harm future sales, when these few sets have been sold. The entire edition of 15 Volumes is bound in genuine Maroon English Crash Buckram, printed from large new type, and embellished with over 100 double page maps and plans. 700 full page illustrations, many of which are in colors. More than 5,000 pages of solid reading matter. This is the one reliable, trustworthy history — the one up-to-date history adopted by educators for schools and colleges. It takes you from the very dawn of history to the present day. You see Chaldea rise and fall, Egypt build the pyramids, and Babylon in all her glory. You see the Spartans at Thermopolyae, Alexander build his world wide empire, only to see it crumble and fall. You see Wolfe climb to the Plains of Abraham and establish the rule of England in the New World. You see Charlemagne, Caesar, Napoleon, Wellington. The history of all nations, in all times, is told vividly in the Library of Universal History. Send the free coupon for full particulars.



15 Superb Volumes

Edition De Luxe Shipped For $1.00

Ex-Prime Minister Arthur J. Balfour of England read and endorsed the Library of Universal History as a historical work without a peer.

FREE CANAL MAP

If you send in the free coupon today, we will send you in addition to the sample pages, beautiful scenes of mighty historical events, a full, complete and comprehensive map of the Panama Canal, showing dams, locks, cuts, etc., etc. The map will show you just how the Atlantic is being joined to the Pacific, thus uniting the Orient with the Occident. It will show you how thousands of miles will be saved for travelers, and how this channel is joining the two worlds.

Send This Free Coupon for Sample Pages

CUT OR TEAR ALONG THIS LINE

American Underwriters Corporation,
175 N. State St.,
Dept. 8123 Chicago, Ill.

With the distinct understanding that I am not buying anything, or ordering anything, you may send me, positively free, the map of the Panama Canal, the Territorial map of the United States, pictures of historical events, all free and prepaid. You may send me also sample pages of the Library of Universal History and quote me the Underwriters sacrifice price and special offer.

*Name*_____

*Address*_____

_____

*Occupation*_____
O.I.L. Canadian Home Journal

Send the free coupon today and get sample pages of this most remarkable work. See for yourself the elegant, masterful style that is used to tell the story of the world. See the reproductions of the world renowned pictures, and the accurate, comprehensive maps, showing in detail the acts that have shaped the world's destiny. Live again with Caesar, Napoleon, Cromwell, Wellington and Nelson. See the world in the days of Xerxes. See Alexander conquer and rule the world only to die an untimely death, paying the price of folly. See kingdoms grow into radiant empires and rule the world,—and then see them plunge headlong to destruction. With the Library of Universal History in your home you can see and live through all ages, learning the lessons that their successes and failures afford. Just send the free coupon today and get the sample pages, complete and comprehensive maps and profile of the Panama Canal and handsome art pictures of great historical events. All are absolutely free and prepaid. No obligations whatsoever. You should investigate this greatest of all history offers today. Get full details of our big $1 shipment offer. This offer is limited. Don't delay. Send the free coupon NOW today.

American Underwriters Corporation 175 North State Street Department 8123 Chicago, Ill.

If You Dust Everything Now With LIQUID VENEER

You Won't Have to Daub up Anything in the Spring of the Year

YOU can save yourself much time, trouble, expense and dissatisfaction this coming spring by letting LIQUID VENEER work for you NOW in cheering up your furniture, woodwork and hardwood floors, to say nothing of beautifying the piano, metalwork and costly finishes of gilt, lacquer and enamel.

LIQUID VENEER is NOT a varnish or stain. You DON'T use it on a brush. NO skill is required. There is NO drying to wait for. NO trouble whatsoever. Liquid Veneer is a liquid duster. It is more than a furniture polish. You use it on a bit of cheese cloth. Simply moisten the cloth with it, and dust away.

AS you go over article after article of furniture, as well as picture frames, brass beds and chandeliers, you will be amazed to see how Liquid Veneer removes dust, scratches, blemishes, stains and that ugly, foggy film, and how it instantly restores the original lustre and finish.

Trial Bottle Free

So dust with Liquid Veneer now, and you won't have to fuss and muss with paint brushes and daubs later. It costs nothing to prove it for yourself. Send the coupon to-day for free trial bottle.

BUFFALO SPECIALTY COMPANY,
240-C Liquid Veneer Building, Buffalo, N.Y.

Home Oil is the finest sewing machine oil you can use

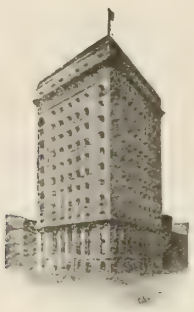
CHEER UP COUPON

Buffalo Specialty Company
240-C Liquid Veneer Bdg
Buffalo, N.Y.

Please send me free, and without further obligation on my part, sample bottle of LIQUID VENEER

Name. . . . . .
St. and No. . . . . .
City and State. . . . . .



Establish a Credit for Yourself

A careful man, with a systematic savings account, will in time of need receive greater consideration from his banker than the man who lives up to his income. If you have not already done so, open a systematic savings account with this Bank. $10 deposited monthly will, at 3% interest, compounded half-yearly, within 10 years amount to nearly $1,400. 609

Head Office . TORONTO

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS
$6,800,000

TOTAL ASSETS
$52,000,000

The Traders Bank of Canada

INCORPORATED 1885

113 BRANCHES THROUGHOUT CANADA

Prize Contest for Ladies' Watches

At least one lady in every Town should enter this Contest, a watch is very easily won. Send a card for information.

CONTEST DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

ber of cotton departments is a chiffony texture that has a cotton ratine border which makes a striking contrast between the sheer and the opaque weaves. of roses tucked in the folds at one side This ratine border comes in stripes or solid colors. Another new cotton fabric has a plain ground with a border made up of an embroidered weave that looks more than anything like the humble Turkish toweling.

A Smart Suit

THE costume that gives continuous lines is one of the very newest and smartest. This one includes many of the best features of the spring. In the illustration it is made of broadcloth with trimming of satin, but the model will be found a good one for all seasonable materials, the poplins that will be so much worn, the taffeta that promises such favor, the heavy ribbed silks that are always handsome, for mohair, and for all the familiar wool suitings, with trimming of any contrasting material. Plain taffeta with striped is to make a feature of the season, and the suit would be very handsome made with the main portions of plain and trimming portions of striped. The coat is a smart yet simple one, made with seams that extend to the shoulders at both front and back, and with regulation two-piece sleeves. The trimming portion is arranged under the front edges, however, and gives a distinctive effect. The skirt is made in three pieces, which are joined and lapped on to the trimming portion, which is extended to form the little panel at the left of the front. The closing is made beneath this panel.

For the medium size the coat will require 5 yards of material 27, 2½ yards 44 or 52 inches wide, with 1 yard of satin 21 for the trimming; for the skirt will be needed 3¾ yards 27, 2½ yards 44 or 52 inches wide, with 1¾ yards 21 for the trimming; the width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2¼ yards.

The pattern of the coat, 7334, is cut in sizes from 34 to 44 bust; of the skirt, 7273, in sizes from 22 to 32 waist.

Girl's Dress

THE dress that is closed at the front is both a smart and practical one. It is easy for the little girl to slip on and off and it is in the height of style. This one includes an unusually attractive collar and can be made from a variety of materials. It can be finished either with or without the chemisette and under-sleeves, and, consequently, is adapted to all seasons. In the illustration it is made from shepherd's check with trimming of plain colored broadcloth and narrow soutache braid and buttons, but the model is just as well adapted to washable materials and to cashmere, challis, and all fabrics of the kind, with the trimming portions made of the same material in a contrasting color, or of a contrasting material, as liked. The trimming on the skirt combines with the collar to give the continuous lines that make one of the latest features.

The dress is made with blouse and skirt. The blouse consists of front and back portions and of separate sleeves sewed to the armholes. The collar finishes the neck and front edges. The side and back portions of the skirt are straight and there is a narrow front portion that forms a box plait. The trimming is arranged over this box plait and the closing is made beneath it. When the shield is used it is arranged under the blouse and closed at the back, and the undersleeves are attached beneath the cuffs.

For the 10 year size will be required 4¼ yards of material 27, 3½ yards 36, 2 yards 44 inches wide, with 1 yard 27 inches wide for the trimming, ½ yard of all-over lace.

The pattern, 7301, is cut in sizes for girls of 8, 10 and 12 years of age.

Girl's Tunic Dress

THE tunic dress is one of the newest and prettiest for little girls. This one is equally well adapted to one material throughout and to combinations. In the illustration it is made of striped voile and the tunic is made on the straight, while the skirt is made on the cross, but the tunic could be made of one material with the skirt of another equally well. Striped material could be used over plain or over plaid, or one fabric could be used over another. In whatever way it is treated the model is a charming one, admirably adapted both to the present and to the coming season. Dresses of this sort will be charming made from the washable fabrics that are so varied and so beautiful.

The dress consists of tunic and skirt. The skirt is straight and plaited and is joined to a belt. The tunic is made with front and back portions joined over the shoulders and under the arms above the belt, but is open at the sides below the belt. Trimming is arranged over the shoulder seams for a portion of their length and the closing is made beneath this trimming.

For the 10 year size will be required

Coat Pattern No. 7334
Skirt Pattern No. 7273

4¾ yards of material 27, 3¾ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 1¼ yards of banding.

The pattern, 7319, is cut in sizes for girls of 8, 10 and 12 years of age.

Child's Empire Frock

THE empire frock is always a becoming one to the little children. This one is very dainty yet very simple. The yoke or body portion is made in one piece with the sleeves and the skirt is straight, consequently there is very little labor involved, and flouncing and bordered materials can be used with perfect success. In the front view, the dress is shown made with a frill at the lower edge and with trimming over the centre portion of the yoke, but one of the advantages of this design is its availability, and both frill and the trimming can be omitted to make a plain frock adapted to morning occasions, while if still greater elaboration is wanted, the dress could be made from embroidered batiste or other material of the kind.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

The dress consists of body portion and skirt. The body portion is tucked over the shoulders and includes the sleeves. The skirt is straight and gathered at the upper edge. Whether the sleeves are long or short, they are finished with straight bands.

Dress Pattern No. 7301

Dress Pattern No. 7289

For the 4 year size will be required 3⅛ yards of material 27, 2 yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 3½ yards of edging, 2¼ yards of insertion and 1¾ yards of beading to make as shown in the front view; 1¾ yards of flouncing 18 inches wide and ½ yard of plain material 36 inches wide to make as shown in the back view.

The pattern, 7289, is cut in sizes for children of 2 to 6 years of age.

Girl's Dress

KIMONO sleeves that are sewed to the blouse are among the latest features to be found in girls' dresses as well as in those of their elders. Here is a frock that shows them and that is just as attractive as can be. In the front view it is made with a square neck and elbow sleeves. The material is cerise cashmere and the trimming is banding. In the back view it is made of royal blue serge, and there is a yoke of all-over lace, while the sleeves are made long. The two frocks are essentially different in effect, yet the model is the same in both cases, and many suggestions might be made for still different treatments. Plaid fabrics are much liked and later it would be charming made from linen, pique and other materials of the kind.

The dress consists of blouse and skirt. The blouse is made in two portions with separate sleeves and these are all joined to the yoke. When square neck is used the yoke is cut out on an indicated line and trimming is arranged over the lower portions. The skirt is six gored and forms a double box plait at front and back. The closing of the blouse is made at the back of the skirt invisibly beneath the box plait.

Daess Pattern No. 7319

Dress Pattern No. 7298

For the 12 year size will be required

Holeproof Hose (By Mail)

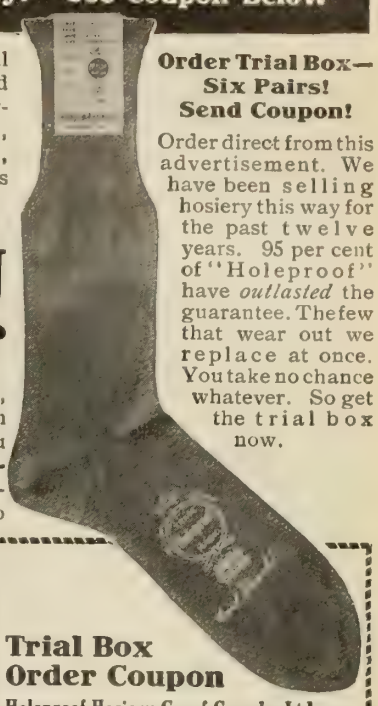
Six Pairs, Guaranteed Six Months, $1.50

Write for List of Sizes, Grades, Colors and Free Book—"How to Make Your Feet Happy." Use Coupon Below

A million people are saving all darning—all the discomfort of wearing darned hose and about half the usual hosiery expense by wearing "Holeproof." Here is the finest, softest, best-fitting hosiery ever made out of cotton, yet it costs no more than the kind that wears out in a week.

No Darning for Half a Year

If any or all pairs wear out in six months, return the worn pairs with a coupon for each (six coupons in each box) and we'll send you new hose free. MEN, WOMEN and CHILDREN can have the advantages of these wonderfully excellent hose. So there need be no darning in any family, no matter how large.



Order Trial Box—Six Pairs! Send Coupon!

Order direct from this advertisement. We have been selling hosiery this way for the past twelve years. 95 per cent of "Holeproof" have outlasted the guarantee. The few that wear out we replace at once. You take no chance whatever. So get the trial box now.

FAMOUS Holeproof Hosiery FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN

Holeproof TRADE MARK Hosiery

Reg. U. S. Pat. Office, 1906

Carl Freschl

We use Egyptian and Sea Island yarn, the finest obtainable. It is soft, flexible and strong and comes in the lightest weights. We could buy common yarn for 30c, but the hose would be heavy, coarse and uncomfortable.

Thus "Holeproof" in the winter weights are warm but not cumbersome. Ideal for this time of year.

HOLEPROOF HOSIERY COMPANY OF CANADA, Ltd.

135 Bond Street, London, Canada

Are Your Hose Insured?

Trial Box Order Coupon

Holeproof Hosiery Co. of Canada, Ltd.
135 Bond Street, London, Can.

Gentlemen: I enclose $1.50 ($2.00 for women's or children's), for which send me one box of Holeproof Hose. Weight ..... (medium or light?) Size..... Color (check the colors on list below). Any six in a box, but only one weight and one size.

Name.....

Street.....

City.....

Province.....

LIST OF COLORS
For Men and Women

Black Light Tan Dark Tan Pearl
Lavender Navy Blue Light Blue

For Children

Black, and tan, only; and medium weight only. (278)

JAEGER LADIES' SWEATERS

No other garment gives greater comfort or is better adapted to the requirements and enjoyments of our cold weather than a good sweater.

Jaeger Pure Wool Sweaters, in white, grey, fancy, or mixed colors are comfortable, durable and attractive.

For outdoor sports or exercise they are unequalled.

At the Jaeger Stores.

TRADE MARK ... PURE WOOL WARRANTED ... ON JAEGER UNDERWEAR

Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woollen System Co. Limited

231 Yonge St., Toronto
316 St. Catherine St. West, Montreal
Steele Block, Portage Ave., Winnipeg

E-112

Renewing Subscriber's Miss Copies

Renew expired subscriptions early to be sure of getting the next copies. February copies were all gone by February 3rd, and many renewing subscribers missed this number. No copies are sent after subscription expires.

CIRCULATION DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

Says Home Oil Tommy:

You Never Saw Such Oil

A drop or two of HOME OIL puts stiff-working tools and household implements in good humor, so that they do their work day after day with a quiet, untiring precision that's a joy to behold.

HOME OIL

Made by the LIQUID VENEER People

is unlike other oils. It stands highest in the friction test, heat test, cold test, freezing test and safety test. Besides, you get more oil for your money when you buy HOME OIL. A money-back guarantee behind every drop. Write today for free trial bottle.

TRIAL BOTTLE FREE

BUFFALO SPECIALTY CO.
336-C Liquid Veneer Building
Buffalo, N. Y.

Ask for "The Beauty in Every Jar" Line of Celebrated

Ingram's

Toilet Specialties

FOR two generations the toilet specialties of the House of Ingram have been the choice of leading beauties of the age—theatrical and operatic stars—and hundreds of thousands of women who know the "Beauty in Every Jar" Line and have long praised Ingram's products both publicly and to their personal friends.

Ingram's Milkweed Cream

There's Beauty in Every Jar. Improves bad complexions. Preserves good complexions. Cures complexion faults. Healing. Soothing. Delightful. Creates or retains the natural beauty of youthful skin. Prevents pimples, blackheads, and removes imperfections. 50c. and $1.00. Sample free.

Ingram's Velveola

The Milkweed Cream Face Powder. Smooth, finely pulverized and exquisitely scented. Delightful to use either in connection with Ingram's Milkweed Cream or otherwise. 25c. Sample free.

Ingram's Zodenta

Paste or Powder for the teeth. "Keeps the teeth white. Keeps the breath right." Insures healthful gums. Prevents ferment and objectionable breath. Destroys bacteria and stops decay. 25c. Sample free.

Ingram's Eliteine

Prevents and cures chapped skin. Delightfully pleasing. Evaporates without leaving greasy or sticky feeling. Applied immediately after shaving, prevents irritation, annoyance from close shaving, and practically all other causes. 25c.

Ingram's Shaving Stick

In sanitary, opaque glass jars. Forms profuse creamy and lasting lather without drying or smart, softening the coarsest, most wiry beard. Universally used and publicly praised by particular self-shavers and barbers. 25c. Guest Room size, 5c.

Ingram's Milkweed Cream Complexion Soap

Keeps or makes the skin smooth and firm. Lathers freely and neutralizes all ill effects of hard or alkaline water. Antiseptic and sterilizing cells of the skin, 25c. Recommended to be used with Ingram's Milkweed Cream.

NOTE—We also recommend INGRAM'S Complexion Tablets, 25c., INGRAM'S Talcum Powder, 25c., and our latest delightful creation, INGRAM'S Lavender Ice, 25c., not like ordinary smelling salts, but better." Also INGRAM'S Rouge, 50c.

Druggists Know and Will Tell You So—Or Write Direct to Us

INVITATION

Madam or Sir;—Confer a favor upon us by requesting us to see that you are supplied with liberal samples of Ingram's Specialties that you desire—through your druggist or direct from us if you have any difficulty in getting what you ask for.

Frederick F. Ingram, President

Frederick F. Ingram Co.

1 Ouellette Ave.

Windsor -:- -:- Ontario

5¼ yards of material 27, 4 yards 36, 3½ yards 44 inches wide, with 1½ yards of banding to trim as shown in the front view, ¾ yard of all-over lace to make as shown in the back view.

The pattern, 7298, is cut in sizes for girls of 10, 12 and 14 years of age.

Raglan Blouse

THE blouse made with raglan sleeves is the very latest. This one includes a pretty pointed collar and is smart in the extreme. In the illustration it is made from Scotch flannel, but it will be found adapted to all waisting materials. It is excellent for linen, pique and the like, it is equally desirable for the thinner washable materials, and it is most satisfactory made from flannel or other lightweight wools.

Blouse Pattern No. 7290

The blouse is made with fronts and back with sleeves that are made in sections. These sleeves are extended to the neck edge and are joined to the blouse. The collar finishes the neck edge and the closing is made with a regulation box plait at the center front. The sleeves are finished with straight cuffs.

For the medium size will be required 3⅛ yards of material 27, 2⅛ yards 36, 2 yards 44 inches wide.

The pattern, 7300, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42-inch bust measure.

A Dainty Waist

THE blouse that is closed at the front is such a comfortable one that every woman welcomes a new design made in that way. Here is a model that is chic in the extreme. It includes the new kimono sleeves that are sewed to big armholes, and that are shapely beneath the arms, and it can be finished with or without a frill and with or without the stock collar. In the illustration it is made of crepe meteor with trimming of banding, and is lined, the lining including plain under-sleeves, but it can be made without a lining if preferred, or it can be made with lining and puffed under-sleeves, in place of the plain ones.

Blouse Pattern No. 7287

The blouse is made with fronts and back portions that are seamed over the shoulders and with one-piece sleeves that are stitched to it. The lining is a simple one, fitted by means of darts, and is closed at the center front, while the blouse is closed at the left front. The stock collar is joined to the neck edge of the blouse and closed at the back. The under-sleeves make a part of the lining, whether they are puffed or plain.

For the medium size will be required 2⅝ yards of material 27, 1⅞ yards 36, 1⅝ yards 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard of silk for the trimming, and ⅞ yard of all-over lace and ⅞ yard of lace 7 inches wide.

The pattern, 7290, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42-inch bust measure.

A Fancy Blouse

A BLOUSE that is made with sleeves in kimono style, but which still are separate is a favorite. This one, designed for young girls and small women, is exceptionally attractive and unusually available. In the illustration it is made with a lining that includes puffed under-sleeves and is finished at the high waist line, but it can be made just in this way without the under-sleeves if liked, or it can be made without a lining, and it can be finished at the natural waist line quite as well as at the high one. As a result of all these possibilities, it becomes available for many occasions and for many materials, and can be used with equal success for the entire dress and for the odd waist. In the illustration plaid taffeta is made over a guimpe of lace, but combinations of material are much liked and a pretty effect could be obtained by making the blouse without a lining and with the sleeves of a contrasting material.

Blouse Pattern No. 7300

The guimpe lining and blouse are separate. The lining is made simply with front and back portions that are faced to form the yoke and under-sleeves are sewed to its armholes. The sleeves of the blouse are arranged over the lining and attached at their inner edges and the armhole edges of the blouse are finished and arranged over the sleeves. When the lining is omitted the sleeves and blouse are stitched together at the armhole edges and the gathers at the waist line are stayed by means of a belt.

For the 16 year size will be required 2 yards of material 27 or 36, 1½ yards 44 inches wide, with 1 yard of all-over lace and 1 yard of lace for the frills.

The pattern, 7287, is cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

In "Merrie England"

Maypole Soap Dye

is as strong a favorite as the time-honored Maypole itself, and like it, Maypole Soap is always an emblem of brightness and beauty.

It transforms faded, dingy, ready-for-the-rag-bag clothes and house furnishings into things of freshness and beauty Dresses, petticoats, stockings, gloves, sweaters, golf coats, children's dresses, ribbons, feathers, colored tablecloths, curtains, cushion tops, couch covers, rugs—these are some of your possessions to which will give a new lease of life.

MAYPOLE SOAP

At one operation Maypole Soap cleanses and dyes to the brightest, prettiest colors—fadeless in sun or rain.

But one of the best things about Maypole Soap is the ease of using it. No muss or fuss—no scattering powder around — no stained hands or kettles. It's themostsatisfactory home dye.

Made in 24 colors—will give any shade. Colors 10 cents, black 15 cents—at your dealer's or postpaid with booklet "How To DYE," from

Frank L. Benedict & Co. - Montreal

Furbelows

FOR spring trimming, taffeta will be much used, velvet is to be combined with straw, too, and it is probable that later a great deal of lace will be utilized for trimming in combination with flowers. Whatever the shape of the hat, however, it is drawn down closely over the head after the prevailing style of the winter.

Blouses are being made of taffeta in color to match or to harmonize with the costume, and are very charming. They show a good many variations, but the most pronounced novelty is found in what is known as the bosom effect, or the blouse that is cut to allow an inset shaped much after the manner of a bosom of a man's shirt, and this may be either of the same or contrasting material or color. The edges frequently are piped or corded, but almost uniformly collars are thin. If the waist is of taffeta or satin, the collar will be of lace or of net, and shadow nets are favorites for the purpose.

Beneath the coats are to be worn a great many jabots and soft lace effects, and with many of the blouses are shown single, tapering revers, but the one-sided full frill has been overdone, and will not be distinctly smart. Flat revers and the straight, square jabots are newer and better liked.

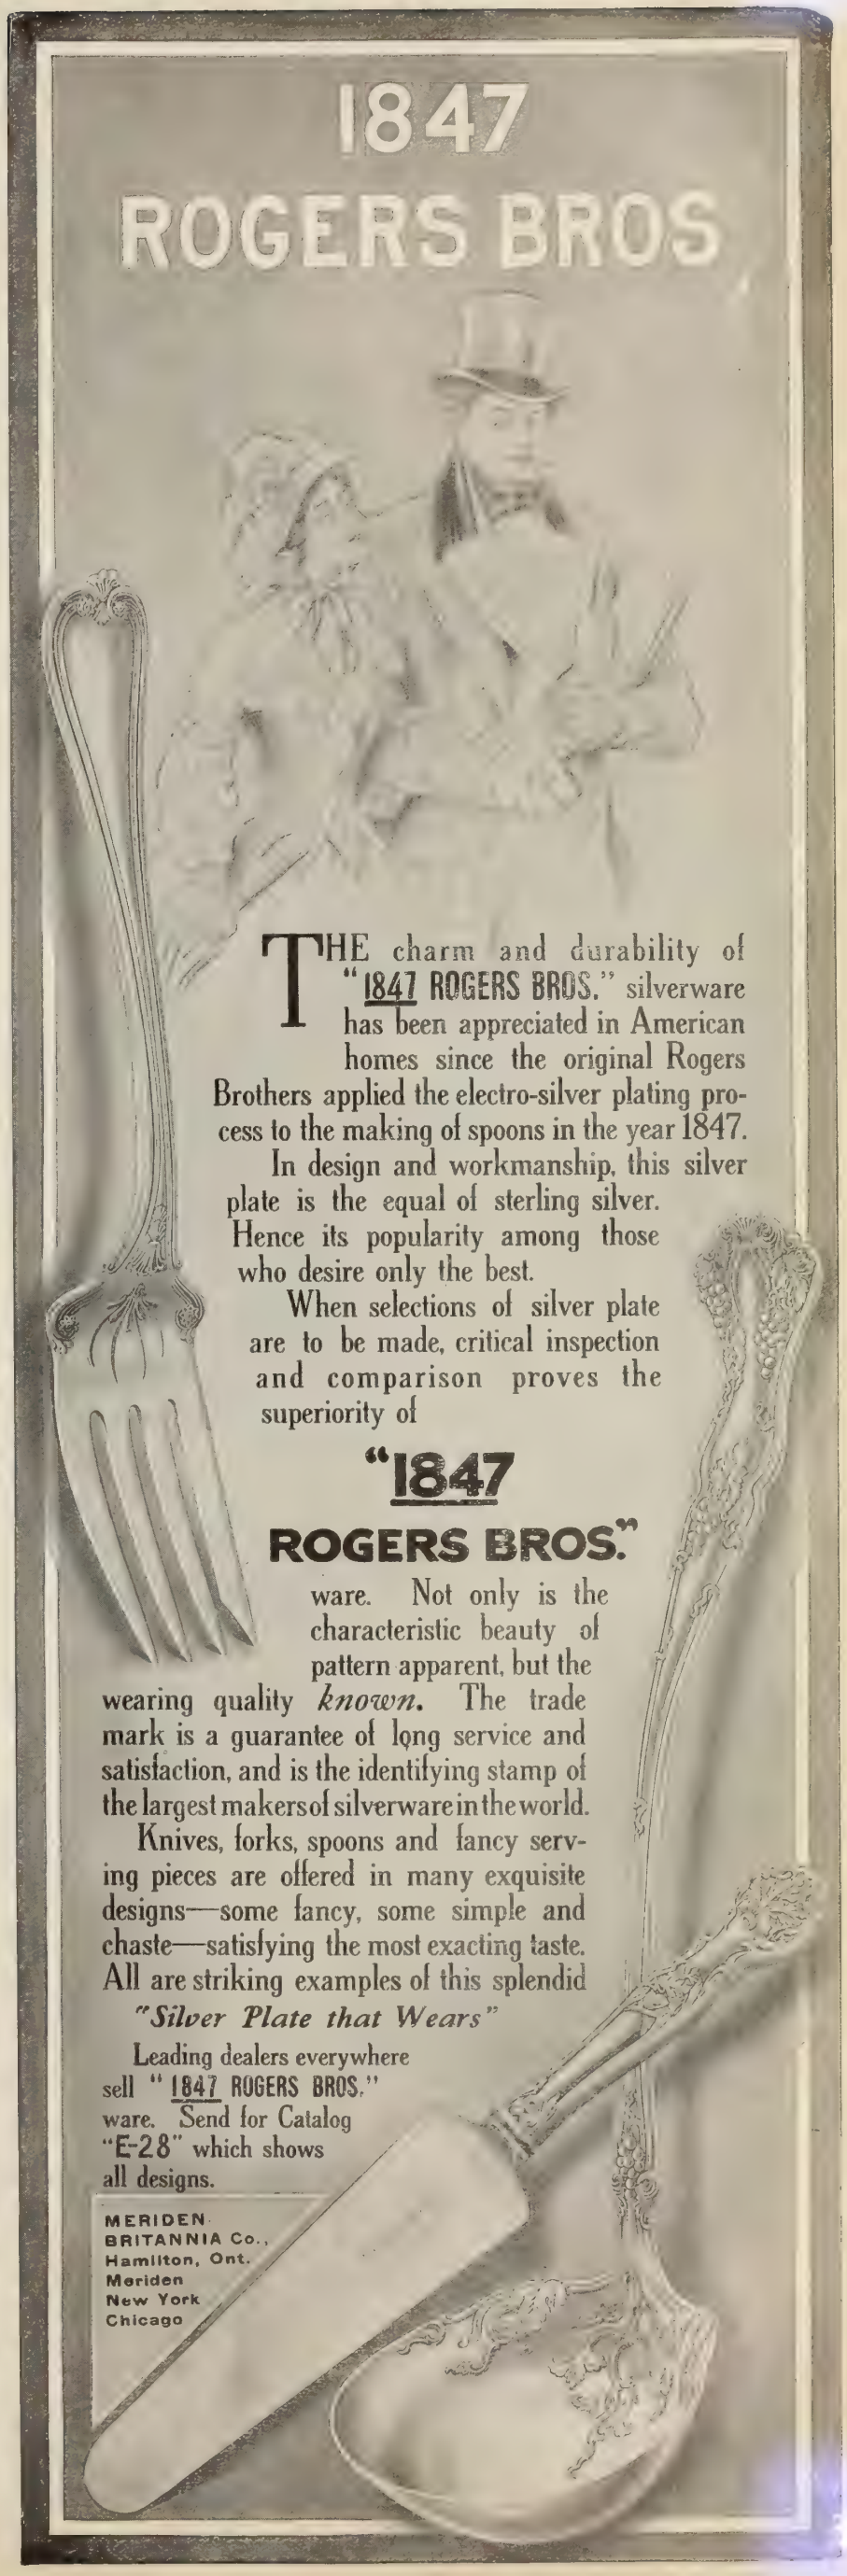
~

ALL sorts of pretty puffs and ruchings have been revived from an earlier period, and while our skirts are narrow, they will be trimmed with frills that are shirred over cordings, with ruches that are plaited and gathered over cords and finished in all sorts of similar ways. Taffeta is one of the best liked materials for afternoon and evening wear, and in many instances the edges of the trimmings are frayed to form their own finish. The two-toned, or chameleon taffetas are the favorites, and the fringe on these is always singularly attractive. The colors developed by the combination of tones are apt to be indescribable, but the foundation threads are distinctly in contrast, and when frayed they form a finish not to be obtained in any other way. Some of the newest blouses are finished with little turned-over collars, and a pretty one seen recently, which serves to exemplify the treatment, is made of taffeta, giving a shimmering gold effect, but the threads one way are blue, the other gold color, and the edges of the collar are finished with narrow frills frayed out to give a tiny blue fringe that is very attractive.

~

VEILS are being worn with all kinds of hats, and also toques, says the Millinery Trade Review. The most fashionable are in net with lace patterns, but different kinds of craquelin net are fancied in colors as well as black and white, the latter often preferred even for dark hats and toques made of fur. Veils are arranged so as to come well down under the chin and to cover the ears and the throat, and are fastened at the nape of the neck as well as to the hat.

Flowers are not quite as much out of the running as they were last month, several of the leading milliners showing velvet hats trimmed with roses—chiefly made of velvet, too—in sombre damask shades, relieved with touches of brighter reds—mostly unmounted and fastened on the brim close to the base, and now and again made up into bunches without leaves. The exceptions to the rule are roses made of padded cerise satin or panne, covered with white silk gauze, which has the effect of making them look slightly transparent, mounted garland fashion on stems, with small leaves made of composition.



THE charm and durability of "1847 ROGERS BROS." silverware has been appreciated in American homes since the original Rogers Brothers applied the electro-silver plating process to the making of spoons in the year 1847.

In design and workmanship, this silver plate is the equal of sterling silver. Hence its popularity among those who desire only the best.

When selections of silver plate are to be made, critical inspection and comparison proves the superiority of ware. Not only is the characteristic beauty of pattern apparent, but the wearing quality known. The trade mark is a guarantee of long service and satisfaction, and is the identifying stamp of the largest makers of silverware in the world.

"1847 ROGERS BROS."

Knives, forks, spoons and fancy serving pieces are offered in many exquisite designs—some fancy, some simple and chaste—satisfying the most exacting taste. All are striking examples of this splendid

"Silver Plate that Wears"

Leading dealers everywhere sell "1847 ROGERS BROS." ware. Send for Catalog "E-28" which shows all designs.

MERIDEN BRITANNIA Co.,
Hamilton, Ont.
Meriden
New York
Chicago

EATON EXAMPLES OF THE

Reproduced below are two of the pages of our Spring and Summer Catalogue, which display the garments in their actual colors. We trust that this new feature will meet with the unqualified approval of our thousands of customers, and that it will so impress those who have never bought from us that they will immediately write for a copy of our latest and greatest style book. This wonderful book lists the newest

MISSES' SELECT STYLES FOR SUMMER WEAR

MISSES' COTTON VOILE WAIST 2.75

TA—28. Misse's Fine White Cotton Voile Waist, made in Bolero effect by the insertion of silk and embroidered bands, the pattern of which is outlined by a single thread of black, showing up the design in relief; the cuffs having in addition two rows of Valenciennes insertion, and the sleeves one row of Valenciennes, and two of Plauen insertion, one of the latter extending over the shoulders at the back, where a button fly fastening is arranged. White with blue, (as shown), or pink trimming. For ages, 14, 16 or 18 years; 32, 34 or 36 bust. Price..... 2.75

NOTE.—Please note size and when ordering do not omit to give style number and color.

Years	14	16	18
Bust size	32	34	36
Waist, ins.	23	24	25

Choice of skirt lengths 33, 35 or 37 inches.

MISSES' SHANTUNG SILK WAIST 2.00

TA—15. Misses' Waist of Shantung silk in a trim sailor style; having flat silk trimming in contrasting shades on shield, collar and cuffs giving a youthful touch to the whole design, while the collar is cut square at the back. The fastening is invisible in front. In natural shade only, with choice of trimming in Vice-Regal green (as shown); brown or King's blue. Ages 14, 16 or 18 years; 32, 34 or 36 bust. Price..... 2.00

JA 48 Misses' Plaid Gingham Wash Dress, in a stylish serviceable design, with a trimming of plain chambray on cuffs and yoke, the wide pleats over shoulders giving a smart tailored effect, while the skirt shows a plain panel pleat back and front from waist down. Invisible fastening at back. Choice of black and white (as shown) or navy and white plaid with cadet blue chambray trimming. Price..... 2.35

JA—58. Misses' Dress of fine even weave percale, in tan or cadet blue; the material lending itself admirably to the tailored design in which it is developed; the waist fastening invisibly at the back, where the skirt shows a panel pleat from waist line and flaring loose from the hips down. In tan with brown, piped with white (as shown); or cadet blue with white pipings only. Price..... 2.50

JA—78. Misses' Dress of fine printed cotton voile, richly trimmed at waist line and cuffs with heavy lace insertion, while the yoke is of Swiss embroidered lawn, with lace motifs extending below and at sides. The fine tucking extends all round the skirt, below which the two tucks and wide hem show effective finish. Pearl button fastening at back. Choice of helio (as shown); also sky or pink. Price..... 4.50

NOTE. In taking skirt measures for any of the above dresses, tie a cord around waist, so as to locate natural waist line and then measure down to desired length (either 33, 35 or 37 inches.)

JA—68. Misses' Wash Dress, a light weight duck in a smart sailor model, having the characteristic collar handsomely yet plainly trimmed in contrasting shade of material and soutache braid, and which extends over shoulders in square cut at back. The fastening is effected in front with pearl buttons and hooked placket. Choice of blue with white (as shown); white with blue; and champagne with tan. Price..... 2.75

JA—38. Misses' Wash Dress, of polka dot printed percale, on white ground; the plain wide trimming being edged with a bias fold of striped material in matching tones, while the back where the fastening is affected, is plain, excepting where the wide band at the neck shows in continuation. Choice of black and tan dots on white ground (as shown); or navy and sky dots on white. Price..... 2.25

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR YOUR MONEY REFUNDED

THE T. EATON Co LIMITED
TORONTO CANADA

SPECIAL NOTICE:
men, women and children. It is
Make sure of getting a copy. A post

TEST STYLE INNOVATIONS

and most authoritative fashions direct from New York, London and Paris. It is a guide to economic buying—it is a source of pleasure and profit. Moreover, it is FREE—so why not get a copy and make up an order from its pages, always bearing in mind that we guarantee absolute satisfaction or refund your money in full, plus the transportation charges both ways.

WASH DRESSES FOR YOUNGER GIRLS

LATEST AND MOST PLEASING STYLES

These dresses can be supplied in colors as illustrated; and also colors as described.

The following are the lengths (from collar down front) for the various ages:

2 years, length 21 ins.	8 years, length 29 ins.
3 years, length 22 ins.	10 years, length 32 ins.
4 years, length 24 ins.	12 years, length 36 ins.
5 years, length 25 ins.	13 years, length 39 ins.
6 years, length 26 ins.	14 years, leng h 42 ins.

Be sure to state style number, age and color when ordering.

CHILD'S STRIPED PERCALE WASH DRESS

For Ages 2, 3, 4 and 5 Years

1.15

TB—28. Child's Stripe Percale Dress, in a trim, simple little style; an invisible button fastening all the way down the back, making the laundry work easy. Can be had as shown only, in navy and white stripe, with band trimming of plain navy and the piping of cardinal; for ages 2, 3, 4, or 5 years Price..... 1.15

GINGHAM DRESS 1.85

TB—63. Girl's Plaid Gingham Dress; the Waist trimmed with bands of the fine percale, pipings and Bulgarian embroidery in colors as shown, also in black and white and blue and white plaid with bands of cadet blue and red piping. Invisible fastening at back; all sizes 6 to 14 years. Price.. 1.85

PERCALE DRESS 1.50

TB—48. Girl's Plain Percale Dress, in pink, with black and white box check trimming as shown, also in tan or light blue with same trimming, as illustrated. It fastens all the way down the back with concealed buttons. All sizes 6 to 14 years. Price.... 1.50

CHILD'S PLAID GINGHAM WASH DRESS

For ages 2, 3, 4 or 5 years

1.15

TB—18. Child's Plaid Gingham Wash Dress, made on simple lines, buttoning down the back and showing Bulgarian embroidery trimming on cuffs and front of waist. In tan and white plaid with tan trimming, blue embroidery and piping; also in blue and white plaid with cadet trimming, blue embroidery and piping. For ages, 2, 3, 4, or 5 years. Price.... 1.15

PERCALE DRESS 2.00

TB—78. Girl's Percale Wash Dress, distinctively trimmed with contrasting shade and Bulgarian embroidery; in cadet blue with tan, as shown, also in tan with brown. Fly button fastening the way down the back. Sizes 6 to 14 years Price.. 2.00

PERCALE DRESS 1.75

TB—88. Girl's Printed Percael Dress, in blackdot on white ground, trimmed as shown, having new handkerchief pocket in cadet blue with black and white piping; also made in light blue dot on white ground with blue trimming and black and white piping. Invisible fastening at back; all sizes, 6 to 14 years. Price 1.75

GENERAL DIRECTIONS FOR LAUNDERING COLORED DRESSES

Before the first washing soak the garment for at least half-an-hour in cold water to which has been added either salt or vinegar in the proportion of one tablespoonful to a quart of water (using salt for the light shades and vinegar for the darker colors).

Wash quickly in lukewarm water in which pure soap only, has been dissolved; do not use hot water, nor rub the soap on the garment. Rinse in clear cold water, changing same two or three times.

Dry immediately in open air in shady place.

PERCALE DRESS 1.50

TB—38. Girl's Percale Dress, with stripe border trimming in colors as shown; also in pink ground with pink and white; and in light tan ground with navy and white; it buttons invisibly down the back. All sizes for ages 6 to 14 1.50

GINGHAM DRESS 1.65

TB—58. Girl's Check Gingham Dress, buttoned in front; trimmed in plain sihade. Made in navy and white check with cardinal or tan trimming; also black and white check with sky trimming. Ages 6 to 14 years Price 1.65 most important catalogue we ed. It will prove of interest to ch merits a place in every home. ou one—free.

THE T. EATON Co LIMITED
TORONTO CANADA

WRITE FOR OUR SPRING AND SUMMER CATALOGUE TO-DAY

MAPLE LEAF FLAT WALL COLORS

THE CANADIAN HOME-MAKER welcomes every method that enables her to keep the home attractive, individual, and free from all unnecessary labor in its upkeep. In choosing her method of decoration, she selects for interior wall and ceiling decoration.

MAPLE LEAF FLAT WALL COLORS

BECAUSE:—They are flat oil paints and produce the most durable artistic effects. They permit of the utmost freedom in selecting and adapting color schemes and thereby allow wide latitute for the assertion of individualty in every room. They form an impervious, non-poisonous glaze on the wall which at all times can be washed and cleansed with soap and water. They dispense with the oft-recurring and vexatious question of redecorating; being durable and permanent both in color and wearing qualities. Varnished hardwood floors have been chosen because of their beauty and because they lessen house work; logically and for the same reasons Maple Leaf Flat Wall Colors are chosen for wall and ceiling decoration.

WE WILL HELP YOU in your home decoration, select for you the best materials to use, give you free color schemes, and place our experience at your disposal. We have a most complete line of decorative materials and stencil patterns for carrying out any scheme of decoration.

Fill in this coupon and mail to us, for our free book "The Wall Beautiful and Hygienic," telling how to obtain free the services of our Maple Leaf Decorative Aid Department.

It contains a catalogue of excellent stencil designs.

PLEASE SEND ME FREE "The Wall Beautiful and Hygienic"

Name .....

Address .....

City .....

C.H.J. 3-12

THE IMPERIAL VARNISH & COLOR CO., LIMITED

6-24 Morse Street, TORONTO

108 Princess St. WINNIPEG - - - 365 Water St. VANCOUVER

Solid Vestibuled trains are operated daily between Montreal, Toronto and Chicago, carrying the finest equipment, including Pullman Sleepers, Parlor Library Cars, Dining Cars and Modern Coaches.

1000 Miles of Double Track Line

Palatial Pullman Sleepers

Courteous Employees

Smooth Roadbed and Excellent Train Service

ARE FEATURES OF THE

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM

Full information from any Grand Trunk Agent.

A. E. DUFF, District Passenger Agent, TORONTO

BABY'S OWN SOAP

Best for Baby

Best for You

THE particles of pure vegetable oil which are rubbed into the open pores of the skin with the creamy fragrant lather of Baby's Own Soap renew the life of the skin—help nature along. It assures a soft, white, healthy skin and its use delights both young and old. Baby's Own is for sale almost everywhere.

I-12

ALBERT SOAPS LIMITED, MFRS., MONTREAL.

The Economist Style Book

SENT TO YOU FREE

Well dressed women throughout Canada use the Economist Style Book as their guide. It is authoritative and entirely different from any other style book issued. It covers the latest and best New York and Paris fashions in ladies' clothing and millinery. Whether you want to buy from us, or simply to have it for reference in matters of dress you should write for the Style Book. It is a great aid to "Correct Dress." Write for a copy to-day.

Convince Yourself at Our Risk.

We Guarantee Satisfaction or Refund Your Money.

and we pay express or postage on your order to any part of the Dominion. We want to convince you that you can dress as well as the best dressed women in Canada at a moderate cost by using the Economist Style Book.

Suits for $10 to $40. Dresses, $3.48 to $18. Waists, 98c. to $10. Skirts, $3.75 to $15. Trimmed Hats, $2.98 to $10. Children's Dresses, Raincoats, Ostrich Feathers, etc., etc. Send for the Style Book to-day.

Dept. H.J.

The Economist Cloak & Suit Company

Canada's Outer Garment House

TORONTO, ONTARIO

BUST AND HIPS

Every woman who attempts to make a dress or shirt waist immediately discovers how difficult it is to obtain a good fit by the usual "trying-on-method," with herself for the model and a looking-glass with which to see how it fits at the back

"HALL-BORCHERT PERFECTION Adjustable Dress Forms"

do away with all discomforts and disappointments in fitting, and render the work of dressmaking at once easy and satisfactory. This form can be adjusted to 50 different shapes and sizes; bust raised or lowered, also made longer and shorter at the waist line and form raised or lowered to suit any desired skirt length. Very easily adjusted, cannot get out of order, and will last a lifetime.

Write for illustrated Booklet containing complete line of Dress Forms with prices.

Hall-Borchert Dress Form Co., of Canada, Limited.

70-72 Pearl St., Toronto, Can.

$3 a Day Sure Send us your address and we will show you how to make $3 a day absolutely sure; we furnish the work and teach you free; you work in the locality where you live. Send us your address and we will explain the business fully; remember we guarantee a clear profit of $3 for every day's work, absolutely sure, write at once.

ROYAL MANUFACTURING CO., Box 1718, WINDSOR, ONT.

Salary and Commissions—

the best in Canada—paid to both experienced and inexperienced subscription workers. Write for terms stating if any experience.

Canadian Home Journal.

SPRING MILLINERY

THE four hats displayed on this page will give our readers a very fair idea of the various styles to be worn during the coming season. They are from the millinery display of the T. Eaton Company, Toronto, and are typical examples of Miladi's spring headgear.

The illustration at the top shows a stunning new style in a ladies' dress hat, handsome new shape of fine quality patent Milan straw braid, soft draping of shirred silk chiffon around crown and brim shows the designer's wonderful skill. A handsome 17½-inch three-ply willow plume is used to complete the trimming of this very charming hat. Colors: Shape and chiffon in white only, with plume in black or white.

The second is a very dressy toque of exquisite design, brim bound with rich silk velvet, a fine mohair hood artistically draped forms the crown and upper brim, with a fancy bandeau of mohair braid in contrasting colors around edge, caught at right side with knot of velvet, trimmed with fancy genuine ostrich mount and pleated rosette of silk velvet. This will be one of the season's most pleasing and becoming styles. Colors: Black with burnt bandeau, white with black bandeau, and solid black. Mount comes in black or white only.

The third is a very fashionable and exclusive dress hat, new shape of fine quality soft finish patent Milan straw braid, effectively trimmed around crown with striped satin, and at side with two handsome uncurled genuine ostrich quills 16 inches long, finished with large ornament of striped satin, edged with black. Comes in white only, with striped satin in black and white, brown and white, light navy and white. Ostrich quills in colors to harmonize.

The last is a decidedly handsome and unusually becoming dress hat, new shape of chip and tagel braid in two-tone effect, trimmed with genuine ostrich feather bandeau around crown, beautiful ostrich mount and bunch of flowers at side, and finished with bunch of roses and forget-me-nots at right side. Shape in black and white or black and tuscan. Bandeau and mount in black, tuscan or white, and flowers to harmonize.

A NEW hat is always a matter of supreme interest to the feminine world — especially when that new hat blooms in the spring. After such a stern winter as we have just experienced, the vista of spring millinery stretches alluringly away, and we are ready to squander all our February savings on a hat which will be the correct Easter vogue.

There has been much guessing at spring millinery styles, but Paris has kept its secrets well, and we have only recently learned what the world's wife is going to wear for April headgear.

In shapes, the Breton brim is certain of popularity, and the high roll is to be characteristic of most designs. The hat of taffeta silk is to be a pronounced favorite, and the Tam o' Shanter crown will be worn. The straws are to be displayed in the most delicate and soft effects, Milan, tagel crinoline and chip being the popular makes. In coloring the shot and shaded effects will prevail and most attractive samples have been seen in tans, blues and greys. The Oriental touches are still seen, and the Durbar at Delhi is held accountable for shades that are suggestive of Indian bazaars and Persian gardens. Purple, gold, cerise, crimson, emerald, topaz and blue are all shown in brilliant silks, which, when blended, are decidedly Eastern in magnificence. Black and white will be still in high favor, and a soft grey will also be much worn, in the midst of all the more dazzling hues.

The brims of almost all large hats roll somewhere, says Dry Goods Record. Sometimes it is an even roll all the way around, or with perhaps a dip in the back. Others turn up almost straight in front, with a more gradual roll towards the back; still another droops over the face, widens as it turns up on the right side, taking a sudden dip before it reaches the front again.

A bandeau of feathers and a high mount adorns some of these witching shapes, while others look like bowers to accommodate nestling groups of dainty rosebuds. In fact, the novelty is so great that one can scarcely so astray in buying hats. Fashion designers have been most liberal in the variety of patterns they have made.

There is some doubt in the minds of certain millinery authorities as to whether this will be a really strong flower season, though all are stocking up quite liberally, feeling that there must be at least a conservative demand.

HOME DYEING!

You can't tell for certain what kind of Cloth your Goods are made of that you have to dye. Nobody can. You don't have to know, if you ask for, and insist on getting.

DY-O-LA
ONE DYE FOR ALL KINDS OF GOODS

Simple and Clean.

Direction Booklet in every Package.

You will have perfect Results like this every time.

Look out for a Cabinet like this:

Send for Free Color Card and Story Booklet—"How Dot Saved the Day," also Booklet telling what color your goods will "take" successfully.

The Johnson-Richardson Co., Limited

Montreal, Canada

Before You Build
Write for Our FREE Book of 60 House Plans

"Readicut" Houses come to you complete, all ready to nail together. Built in one-third usual time.

This commodious, cosy, warm 6-room house built "Readicut" way for only $552

This snug, well-designed 5-room home with porch would cost you $750—"Readicut" way costs only..... $433

Illustration below shows our famous Wonder House—Two story, 5 large rooms, of the best materials throughout. Costs only $622 or with an extra room addition at back, $724.

This 4-room cottage built as warm and comfortable as any $600 to $800 house, costs "Readicut" way only..... $332

Be sure and see the photographs, complete description and floor plans in our big free catalogue. Write now for a copy.

By Building 'Readicut' Way You Save 50%

Everything Cut to Fit, at Mill Prices

Houses 2 to 12 Rooms, Summer Cottages, Stores, Schools, $175 Up

Let us show you how you save architect's 5%, builder's 10% and lumber dealer's big profits by buying ALL materials direct from our mills. Sovereign "Readicut" Buildings come to you with every piece cut, fitted, ready to nail. No skilled labor. You get everything at wholesale cost—lumber trimmed, fitted and marked; roofing, doors, windows, glass, plaster board, interior trim and finish, hardware, even the nails and paint. Also plans, blue prints and detailed building instructions—all so clear you can put it together yourself or with unskilled labor.

Built Like Any Substantial, Well-Constructed Building

Sovereign Houses are not the portable kind, but are built like any other well-constructed, warm, substantial building. Our plan is not an experiment. It will pay you to investigate.

In our catalogue you see exactly what the completed house looks like and know exactly its entire cost. No extras. No delays. Shipped anywhere, promptly.

Learn How We Save You Time and Money

Write NOW for our big book full of photos, plans and detailed descriptions of more than 60 attractive homes that you can build with utmost economy the "Readicut" way. Send 6 cents in stamps and ask for Book No. 52.

Sovereign Construction Co. Limited 852 Lumsden Bldg. TORONTO

Cover Those Blemishes!

'Tis the kitchen that gets most wear and tear. Wear from the scrub brush—tear from the pots and pans and daily toil. Try

LACQUERET

It will give a new tone to your oilcloth—make those old kitchen chairs fit for any company—cover up the iceman's clumsy work on your refrigerator—brighten the wainscoating—banish pussy's claw marks from the table and chair legs. Worth while trying it?

Our little booklet 'DAINTY DECORATOR' tells of many uses of "LACQUERET" in your home. And there's a copy waiting for you for the asking. Cans contain full imperial measure. Ask your dealer. Don't accept a substitute.

INTERNATIONAL VARNISH CO. LIMITED

TORONTO -:- WINNIPEG

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

LINGERIE AND LACE

ON this page and the opposite will be found illustrations of some of the latest and daintiest styles in lingerie, published by courtesy of the Murray-Kay Company, Toronto

The corset covers displayed on this page are made of fine nainsook, which is one of the most favored materials for high-class underwear. The upper left-hand cut shows one which is hand-embroidered and hand-made in one of those marquerite designs which appeal to those of fastidious taste. The upper right-hand cut is of a cover finished with linen lace and linen beading, with pretty finish of silk ribbons. Below the first cut is a very handsome cover, trimmed with Swiss embroidery medallions and Valenciennes lace insertion all round, beading, embroidery beading across front to give Empire effect, all run with pretty satin ribbons. To the right is seen a high-necked gown with open front, yoke of fine Swiss embroidery, finished with fine Swiss beading. The sleeve bands are trimmed with tucking, two rows of beading and embroidery frill.

The upper gown in the cut at the bottom of the page is of finest nainsook with handsomely embroidered yoke, joined to gown by embroidery beading; short puffed sleeves, finished with embroidery frilling and beading, two rows of ribbon at neck and one in sleeves. To the left is a dainty slip-over gown of fine nainsook, with low neck and short sleeves, trimmed with good quality embroidery and good beading, fine satin with Valenciennes beading and lace at the neck. The fourth cut shows a cover of plainer style, trimmed simply with scallop-edged embroidery and ribbons.

On the opposite page are found illustrations of nightgowns in half-a-dozen varieties of style. The upper one in the first cut is a handsome gown of nainsook with yoke and sleeves made in one, of rows of Swiss insertion and Valenciennes lace finished with Valenciennes lace and ribbon. Then on the left, in the same cut, is a dainty Empire gown of fine nainsook with neck and sleeves finished with good quality embroidery and ribbon. That to the right is a gown of fine nainsook with novel embroidery insertion with scalloped edges, two rows of beading and satin ribbon.

The simplicity of OXO Cubes appeals to every woman who cooks or has a cook.

You boil the water—we have done the rest.

OXO Cubes are so handy and complete in themselves—no mess—no trouble—no measuring—no sticky bottles or troublesome corks.

Exact — convenient — and economical, because no waste.

58

One Cube to a Cup.

Fashions and Fancies

THE tailor-made suit is naturally the most important wear for the spring season, being useful and practical; while for smartness, the blouse can do wonders—and never were blouses prettier or in such variety as now.

The tailored suit for morning is plain, and made of tweed or serge, void—or nearly so—of trimming, but most perfectly fitted and machine finished. For dressy wear, the tailored coat and skirt can be of velvet, satin, faced cloth, etc., elaborated more or less, as fancy dictates, by the use of braid, and the beautiful soutache garniture now so popular.

Short coats are worn (about 27 inches, or rather more, in length), although there is a tendency to lengthen coats; while the full-length garment is considered very smart, with its long and important-looking revers, and over afternoon toilettes the long coat is indispensable and protective.

Skirts are gaining in width, but very gradually, as the straight, long effect is yet correct, while the waist line is certainly nearer its normal positon, although the slightly raised waist is yet in good form, and will be for some long time to come; so individual taste can be consulted.

For afternoon, entire gowns are de rigueur, made of soft satin, silky taffetas, rigeur, made of soft satin, silky taffetas, supple, to ensure the long, slim effect so popular.

The manufacturers of materials are highly busy, and I have seen the new foulards in very smart allover designs, the newest having lace borders and panels printed on the foulard—antique, also Viennese lace designs being selected for the purpose.

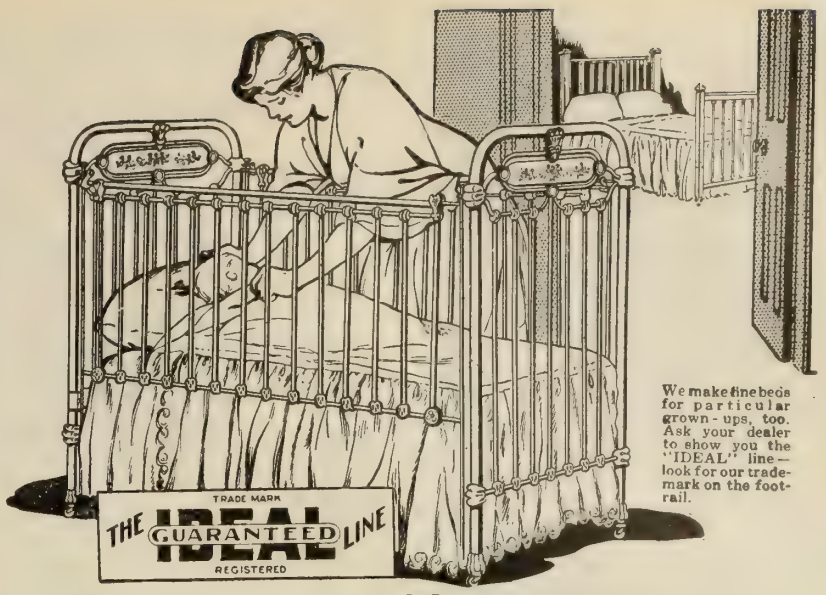
Taffetas, so beautifully supple, and in plain or shot designs, are among the latest weavings; crepe de chine, too, will enjoy a new reign; while marquisettes, bordered voiles and ninons, also chine silks, are for the coming season.

Showerproof foulard is promised us for spring gowns, also indestructible chiffon voile, as soft and fine as a cobweb, but unexcelled for wear.

There are some serge silks and thin wool-back satins for early spring gowns and tailored suits.

Macrame edgings and insertions, also antique laces, guipure, Irish crochet and Russian laces are all for the coming season; then cut-work, known as Richelieu embroidery, will lead for linen dresses, being used as insertions, borderings, collars, etc.

The skirt on right is a novelty, made of fine nainsook, cut straight, and open at side from ribbon down, to allow of freedom in walking. It is beautifully trimmed, the frill being made at the side of bias rows of linen lace and Valenciennes lace insertions.



We make fine beds for particular grown-ups, too. Ask your dealer to show you the "IDEAL" line—look for our trade-mark on the foot-rail.

Wouldn't you like to put your baby to bed in a beautiful, safe and comfortable crib like this?

It is an "IDEAL" nest for the best baby in the world." You can lower the sides to make it a convenient annex to mother's bed, when desired. Ends and sides are high enough to prevent baby climbing out. Spindles are so close together that baby's head cannot get between them. No dangerous sharp corners or rough edges often found on cribs less carefully made. Decorated panels on the ends lend an inviting touch of color. Few cribs are so altogether attractive.

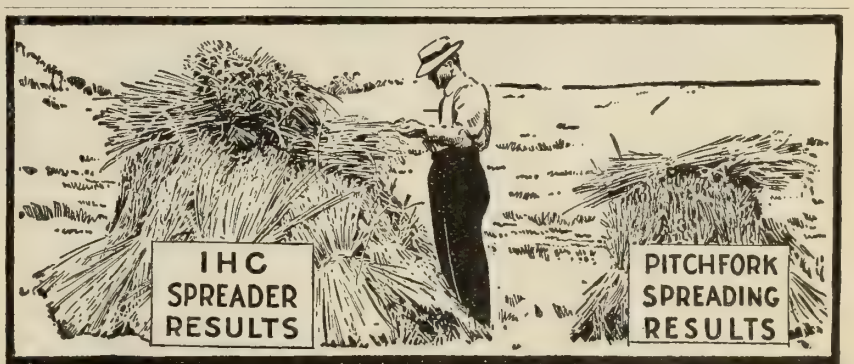
This is only one of many "IDEAL" designs. Be sure and ask your dealer to show you "IDEAL" Cribs. Our trademark on the foot-rail identifies them.

Write our nearest Office for Free Booklet No. F66

THE IDEAL BEDDING CO. LIMITED

MONTREAL—TORONTO—WINNIPEG

32



How Do YOU Spread Manure

THE above illustration shows the difference in crops, between the I H C way of spreading manure—and the pitchfork method.

The pitchfork way is slow, hard, and disagreeable, wastes much of the value of the manure, and the results hardly justify the labor and time invested.

The I H C Spreader cuts the manure into fine shreds, spreads it evenly, and makes the work easy. Spreading manure the I H C way is bound to result in better soil, bigger crops, and more profits.

I H C Manure Spreaders

Corn King—Cloverleaf

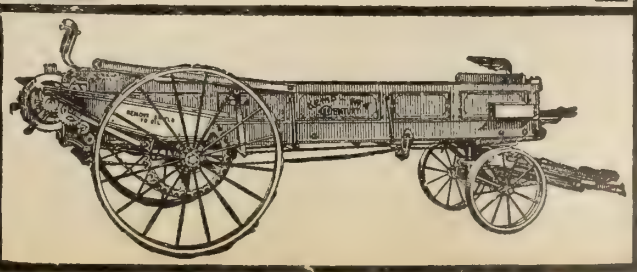
are simple, strong, and durable. They have many advantages that make them superior to other spreaders.

All working parts are extremely simple and wonderfully strong. The beater driving gear is held in a single casting, so that there is no binding—no cutting of parts caused by the gears springing out of alignment. The roller-bearing support for the apron reduces the draft. The levers are convenient. The feed changing device can be shifted quickly and easily. The wide range of adjustment allows you to spread manure heavy, medium, or light, as your judgment tells you is best for the soil.

Whether you have a large or small farm, or want a spreader for orchard use or truck gardening—there is an I H C that will suit your requirements. Why not see the I H C local agent at once? Get a catalogue from him, or, write nearest branch house.

CANADIAN BRANCHES—International Harvester Company of America at Brandon, Calgary, Edmonton, Hamilton, Lethbridge, London, Montreal, North Battleford, Ottawa, Regina, Saskatoon, St. John, Weyburn, Winnipeg, Yorkton.

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER COMPANY of AMERICA
(Incorporated)
Chicago U S A



I H C Service Bureau

The purpose of this Bureau is to furnish farmers with information on better farming. If you have any worthy question concerning soils, crops, pests, fertilizers, etc., write to the I H C Service Bureau, and learn what our experts and others have found out concerning these subjects.

"The World is mine—
I own a KODAK"

Take a Kodak with you, and picture, from your own viewpoint, not merely the places that interest you but also the companions who help to make your trip enjoyable.

Anybody can take good pictures with a Kodak. Catalogue free at the dealers or by mail.

If it isn't an Eastman, it isn't a Kodak.

CANADIAN KODAK CO.
Limited
Toronto, Canada

FOR THE EASTER BRIDE

THE bridal costume is always one of deepest interest. Here is a model that is charming in the extreme. In the illustration satin is combined with lace and with chemisette of chiffon, and there is a bunch of orange blossoms arranged at the left of the corsage. The arrangement of the veil is distinctive and new.

The blouse is one of the very new ones, giving the surplice effect, and with a postillion back. It includes double sleeves, and in this case, the upper sleeves as well as the fichu is made of lace flouncing. The skirt is a simple three-piece one, the portions of which are overlapped at the front above a panel. It can be made with a long pointed train, or with a round train that is either longer or shorter, as preferred. The bodice also can be made without a postillion if liked.

For the medium size the blouse will require 2 yards of material 27, 1 yard 36 or 44 inches wide, with 4 yards of lace 12 inches wide, and 1¼ yards of chiffon for the chemisette and puffed under sleeves; for the skirt will be needed 6¼ yards of material 27, 5¼ yards 36, 4 yards 44, with ⅞ yard 18 inches wide for the panel.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7351, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 bust; of the skirt, 7352, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist measure.

There are many brides-to-be who would delight in embroidering their own wedding veils, and the work will be found both easy and effective. To make a good-size square veil, four yards of Brussels net are required. This should be fine and have six-sided meshes, and floss silk or lace thread should be used for the darning. It is important to select the net and silk or thread, so that a single thread will just lie easily in the meshes when darned through them. If the thread be too fine the contour of design will be less pronounced and so look undecided, whereas, if too thick, it would look heavy and probably tear the net in working.

Skirt Pattern No. 7352
Waist Pattern No. 7351

A Great „Queen"

Horse Story
"KATE and QUEEN"
By Prof. Jesse Beery
King of Horse Trainers

Equals the famous "Black Beauty" in [illegible] surpasses it in practical [illegible] "Kate" a victim of poor handling [illegible] with "Queen" who was [illegible]. You sympathize with one [illegible] the other even as you sigh [illegible] laugh with the child of fortune.

Prof. Beery has skillfully woven into this intensely interesting and true story many valuable suggestions for handling horses—a result of a lifetime's experience.

Special Offer to Horsemen

Prof. Beery desires that every horse owner, trainer, breeder—everyone interested in horses—should read this great story. To make it possible, for a short time he offers every interested horseman a copy, worth $1.00, for the remarkably low price of

25c Postpaid

If you have even a passing interest in horses—if you own, train or breed them, you will gather from it a fund of knowledge worth many times the small price. Send for a copy. Enclose U. S. stamps or coin.

FREE With each book we send free a beautiful colored picture of Queen—oil painting effect—suitable for framing. Order today. Address

PROF. JESSE BEERY
Box 610 Pleasant Hill, Ohio

Every Woman Who Has Ever Worn A

Priestley's

Gown or Skirt

knows what thorough satisfaction she had out of every yard of "Priestley's" cloth.

Whether it was a soft, delicately tinted Silk-and-Wool Cloth for house or evening wear — a fine Twill or Coating Serge—or a "Priestley's" Cravenette — the service was equally satisfactory.

Ask your dealer to show you the new weaves and colors in "Priestley's" Gown, Suit and Skirt fabrics.

"Priestley's Limited" stamped every 5 yards on the selvedge. 2

FACES
Spotted with Pimples

BLOTCHES, BLACK-HEADS, ETC.

you see them every day, young men and women by the score. We treat them personally and by mail, and cure them, too, after all else has failed. Many were told they would outgrow them, that they couldn't be helped, etc. Are you one of the number?

Our Home Treatment

A fair trial of our HOME TREATMENT will convince the most skeptical that our remedies are the most reliable made. We've given twenty years to the study of skin, scalp and complexion blemishes, and are daily treating them.

Superfluous Hair

moles, warts, etc., eradicated forever by Electrolysis, the only treatment that will permanently destroy the growth. Satisfaction assured. Send stamp for booklet "H" and sample of toilet cream.

We do manicuring and chiropody, and treat the skin, scalp, hair, and figure. Consultation invited personally or by letter.

Students taken; individual instruction given.

Hiscott Institute
Toronto, 61 College St., Estab. 1892

Enter Any Day

for a thorough course in Business, Shorthand, Telegraphy or English in one of

SHAW'S SCHOOLS
TORONTO

WINTER TERM NOW OPEN. Write for Catalogue. Address W. H. Shaw, President, Head Offices, Central Business College, Yonge and Gerrard Streets, Toronto.

THE NEW EMBROIDERIES

THERE are so many places in the home where embroidered linens are desirable that one can hardly have too many, and the good taste of the housewife is shown in her selection of these decorative pieces, which add so much to the attractiveness of the home, as they should harmonize both in color and material with the style and furnishing of the room in which they are used.

Many designs beautifully suited to living rooms are quite out of place in dining-rooms and each should be retained only for such use. These points should be well considered in planning the household embroideries.

No. 5820—Scarf, 22 x 54, $1.50.

A popular idea at present is to have matched sets consisting of scarfs, cushions and centres, where the three are to be used in one room. One of the newest embroideries being shown is known as the "Heather Bloom," and its popularity is easily explained, as it is so simply and quickly worked, as it consists of the well-known French knot stitch. The set illustrated has been embroidered on heavy cream linen, finished with a fringe matching in coloring. The heather is embroidered in shades of reddish purple, greens being used for the straight, long stitches (which are taken the full length of the stamped petal) and dull browns for the stemming. A most artistic touch is given by using greys for the trellis which connects the wreath design.

The "Heather" stitch is formed by twisting a heavy silk two or three times around a coarse needle, so that the knot is full and round, either two strands of Royal Floss, or four threads of Filo Floss may be used, and this embroidery is so quickly worked that one can easily be tempted to embroider the complete set. This embroidery is also effective on dark linen worked in stronger colorings, or for dining-room use dainty pale shades produce an exquisite result embroidered on fine white linen.

No. 6506—Cushion, 60 cents.

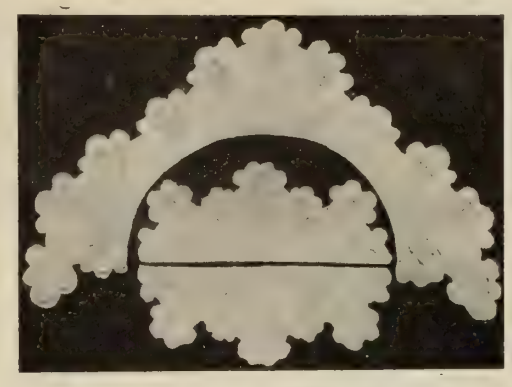
This is the season of the year when one's thoughts turn to spring and summer clothes, and to the embroidered articles which complete them. The present styles are so simple that a handsomely embroidered collar and cuffs are all the trimming they need, and No. 8214 shows one of the latest ideas suitable to wear with either a suit or a one-piece dress. Colored linen appliques are basted on to the stamped linen foundation, and are buttonholed closely all around, cutting away the edges afterwards. The veins and dots are then embroidered on the appliques which form the rose design. The set illustrated has been embroidered on white linen with pink appliques. The remainder of the design is solidly embroidered in white.

No. 6065—27-Inch Heather, 55 cents.



No. 8214—Collar and Cuff Set, 50 cents.

No. 8212 is another handsome design which also shows the colored appliques. In this case they form the border upon which are embroidered the dots. The appliques are connected to the white linen by an effective wreath design. Cuffs may be supplied to match either of these collar sets, and if preferred the colored appliques may be omitted, and the entire design carried out in white.

This No. 5208 is another design different in form and the embroidery very easy of execution. The design has been embroidered on heavy white linen in solid padded satin stitch, and we would here draw the attention of our readers to the care with which the scalloped edges on all these collars should be worked, otherwise they will fray and soon become shabby. Pad the edges closely and carefully, and buttonhole firmly, cutting away the linen very closely afterwards.

No. 5208—Collar and Cuff Set, 35 cents.

Further description of any of these embroideries will be furnished and a diagram lesson illustrating the Heather Embroidery will be enclosed with any of the stamped designs ordered. Silks may be supplied to embroider any of these designs at 55 cents per dozen, and suitable fringes can also be had to finish these.

No. 8212—Collar and Cuff Set, 50 cents.

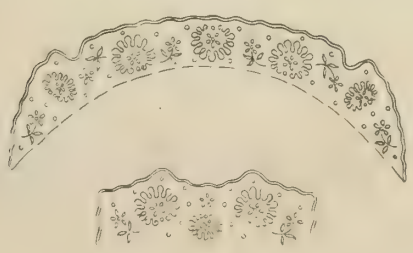
Readers will please understand that the prices quoted are for the stamped linens only. Prices for



No. 4107—Coat Set, 35 cents

embroidered pieces will be furnished on request. For further information regarding any of the articles described in these columns, address Belding Paul Corticelli, Limited, Dept. L., Montreal, P.Q.

IF YOU WILL SEND US

— 35 CENTS —

we will send you

8 SKEINS OF EMBROIDERY SILK

which is sufficient to finish a

15 INCH CENTRE PIECE

which is stamped for

"THE NEW HEATHER EMBROIDERY"

This is the very latest embroidery which will be fashionable for 1912.

We will

SUPPLY FREE

sufficient lace to edge this Centre Piece, and the diagram enclosed will furnish full instructions for this beautiful embroidery which is simple but effective.

Send at once as this generous offer is made for a short period only.

Our Art Embroidery Silks are the best on the market.

Send 10 cents for a copy of Belding's Needle and Hook Book which contains all the latest suggestions for Art Embroidery. :: ::

Address

BELDING, PAUL, CORTICELLI
LIMITED

Dept. L MONTREAL, P.Q.

People who eat Kellogg's

People in all walks of life eat Kellogg's daily.
The doctor, because he has a scientific knowledge of its great food value.
The millionaire, because money cannot buy a more delicious breakfast cereal.
The athlete, because it is a 90 per cent energy food.
Most people eat Kellogg's because of its delectable flavor—altogether unlike that of any other cereal food. 10 cents buys a big package.

10c. Per Pkg.

Kellogg's TOASTED CORN FLAKES

Gerhard Heintzman Pianos
Pianos of Prestige

"Too Old To Learn"

is never applied to the production of music with a

GERHARD HEINTZMAN
SELF-PLAYING PIANO

MANY of the most delighted owners of this celebrated player are among those who are no longer young in years. In spirit, however, the possessor may well consider himself or herself young. Nothing else makes life worth living like good music—what else brings back so alluringly the remembrances of youth?

You will find every day finer and happier for the presence in your home of a Gerhard Heinztman Self-Playing Piano.

Write for our booklet.

Your present instrument taken as part payment at a fair valuation.

Gerhard Heintzman, Limited
41-43 Queen St. West (Opposite City Hall) Toronto, Ont.

New Hamilton Salesrooms: 68 King St. East, next Post Office

EARNS $100 A MONTH

That's what one young man is getting from subscription work for CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, and it's entirely new work for him. The quality and low price of the Journal and special appeal to Canadians makes the work most profitable and interesting for young men and ladies in spare or entire time.

Write for salary and commission rates. CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

IN THE SHOPS

FLOWERS and sunshine are suggested by the shop windows as soon as the first day of spring approaches. March may come in like a lion, but the roaring alarms us not. It is only the last, futile noise made by Old Winter, and does not begin to be as dreary as the blasts of November.

The new fabrics in cotton materials show some attractive styles in "waistings" of fancy wash ducks and pique, and we are assured that the white waist is to be as popular as ever. Eaton's are showing a pretty material known as "the silk-finished wash suiting," with a soft, sheeny appearance, shown in equal-stripe combinations of cadet, black, tan, navy, old rose, mauve, red, blue and white. It is forty inches wide and only seventy-five cents a yard.

The taffeta silk gown for afternoon wear will be very popular this spring, and the shops are already showing a dazzling variety of ready-made costumes of this class. Brown is seen in all shades, from the most delicate fawn to a shade which is of the darkest woodland tinge.. The tans are exceedingly bright and attractive. Black and white, which is never wholly "out," will be worn a good deal, and some of the striped gowns are decidedly smart and chic. There are some extremely pretty gowns of white chiffon with black lace which are quite equal to any occasion, from a garden party to a vice-regal reception.

SLEEVES are both set-in and raglan, with the balance of favor on the side of the set-in models, says Ready-to-Wear. A new feature which has developed since the incoming of the spring preparation season, and one which is meeting with general appreciation, is the increased size of the armhole.

The sleeves in all the separate coats now being turned out for the spring and early summer trade are full length, plainly inserted at the armhole and slightly wider than formerly at the wrist, where they are finished with a deep turned-back cuff.

Deep collars and revers for street coats continue to hold popular fancy, especially in demand being the collar, which is deeply pointed at the back. The one side effect is a feature of many of the new coats, obtained through the medium of a single rever.

The buttons match the tone of the material, and are in two or three sizes, the largest for the fastening, with a smaller size on the seams, and the smallest of all on the cuffs.

Full length coats are closely followed in favor by seven-eighths, and a few in three-quarter length, the materials used giving very smart effects in the loose or slightly fitting models.

In the summer coats linens and silks, shot taffetas, and reversible satins are being ordered, while another style meeting with some favor is the reversible coat, one side of pongee and the reverse of satin, or two different colored serges, worn either side.

THE new summer coats are loose-fitting, and invariably have a side fastening. Rounded effects in the fronts of these garments are also a feature. Large collars and lapels continue in favor, and in them are to be seen some clever productions in one-sided effects. Some garments shown during the winter season had but one lapel, the newer ones, however, have two lapels, but of different materials, or one trimmed and the other plain.

A prominent feature in the better class garments is the use of lace trimmings in which Macrame and flat Venise laces prove effective. Plain broadcloth and satin trimmings are also popular.

There is every indication of narrow flounces, rouches and kilts being in vogue this summer.

More and Better Bread will be the result of your baking, if you use White Swan Yeast Cakes. Your grocer keeps them in 5c packages of six cakes. Send to-day for free sample. White Swan Spices & Cereals, Limited, Toronto, Ont.

MY LADY'S GARDEN

Garden Chat

By M. E. B.

To the Grower of Annuals

IF you are the kind of gardener who grows nothing but annuals, why not make a change this year and put in a few spring flowering perennials to add interest to your garden? You will be surprised how much more pleasure you will take in gardening after their advent. You know how bare your garden is of flowers until about mid-June or early July, and then they all come with a rush. To change this—for April you need some of the single "Rock Cress" (Arabis alpina), to give you a mass of snowy white. It lasts into May, when the double form of it begins to bloom, and keeps on into June. For May there is also the "Golden Tuft" (Alyssum saxatile), the purple "Rock Cress" (Aubretia), primroses, polyanthus, cowslips, dwarf iris, "Moss Pink" (Phlox subulata), "Lovely Phlox" (Phlox amoena), and Iceland poppies (Papaver nudicaule). For June there is "Snow in Summer" (Cerastium tomentosum), a glorious dwarf blue speedwell (Veronica tencrium dubia), the gorgeous Oriental poppies (Papaver Orientate), German iris, in all the tints of the rainbow, foxgloves (Digitalis), "Jacob's Ladder" in variety (Polemonium caeruleum, in both white and blue, and P. reptans, which blooms in May), Madonna lilies (Lilium candidum), columbines in variety (Aquilegias), and paeonies, the most sumptuous of all hardy plants, and beautiful beyond description. Is there nothing to tempt you to make a spring dress for your garden with all these lovely materials to choose from?

To the Grower of Perennials

YES, my friend, I know how hard it is for us to find room for annuals when some of our best-beloved need more space as things are; but we must own, just amongst ourselves, let us whisper it, that there is a time when the delphiniums are over, and before the heleniums, boltonias, hardy asters, helianthus and autumn monkshoods have begun their reign of splendor, when we need something to fill the gap. This is the moment when we regret that we have no stocks, no asters, no snap dragons, no sweet peas, no nasturtiums, no mignonette—a word to the wise is sufficient.

Get Your Plans Made Now

GARDENING on paper is almost as fascinating as the real thing. Plans made now save an immense deal of time later on. Knowing exactly what you want to do is half the battle, so draw a plan of your garden to scale, give your imagination full play, and see if you cannot think of some way to redeem it from the commonplace. If you have no artistic ideas of your own, then use some of other people's. Photographs of beautiful gardens abound in the horticultural magazines; perhaps one little feature copied from them would make all the difference between an uninteresting, two-feet-all-the-way-round-bordered back yard and a lovely garden.

Order Your Seeds and Plants Early

IF the early bird does not always get the worm, it is certain that the early order has the best chance of being completely and correctly filled. It stands to reason that the seed and plant people can take more interest in an order sent before the spring rush begins, than they can afterwards, when they are tired and overworked—and you avoid getting substitutes.

Growing Water Lilies From Seed

DID you ever try growing water lilies from seed? If not, you have missed a great deal of pleasure. This is just the experiment for those poor mortals who have no room for a garden—all they need is space enough for one or two tubs out of doors when the warm weather begins, and a tomato can, lard pail, or even a tumbler now. No time should be lost in getting the seed. If you want bloom this coming summer the seed must be sown in February. I do not suppose all water lilies would bloom in so short a time from seed, but I do know that the Zanzibar varieties will, because I have tried them. These are catalogued as Nymphæa Zanzibarensis, and come in beautiful shades of pink, blue, rose, and also white. They are, of course, tender, coming from a warm country, and will not live out of doors through our winters, but they can be either treated as annuals and a fresh supply raised from seed every year, or they can be wintered in the house, the only difficulty being the carrying of the tub indoors. I wintered mine in an empty attic room, and they came through splendidly. The room was cool, but the temperature never went down below 38 deg. or 40 deg. At the end of the second season the plants had grown so large that they were unsuitable for tub culture, so the poor things were thrown away. But the lilies the second season were larger, so they repaid the care of wintering them.

Get either a packet of mixed seed, or, preferably, a packet of blue and a packet of pink. If you want a white one, the variety minor of our own wild water lily is the most charming of lilies for tub culture—this is the lovely little one with a pink tinge to the outside of the petals, which grows so freely in every little bit of backwater of the Muskoka lakes and rivers, a root of which can be easily procured.

Sow your seed as soon as you get it. A tin can or pail in which to sow it is better than a tumbler, because you can hang it up in a warm place, which is better than standing it on a register or radiator, for, even with something underneath, it is liable at times to become too warm—if hung up over it, there is very little danger of this happening. The temperature should be kept as nearly as possible at 70 deg. Half-fill your tin with very rich earth and press it down firmly, sprinkle a packet of seed on this, cover with a layer of sand a quarter of an inch deep, and add tepid water, very gently, so as not to disturb the soil, until the water stands half an inch above the sand, and put in a warm place. A shelf over the furnace answers nicely until the seedlings are up. If there is any danger of your forgetting to add water as it evaporates, fill the can up at first, too much is better than too little. The seeds germinate rather unevenly (at least mine did), but in about ten days you will see little grass-like leaves appearing here and there, which are the seed leaves of the baby lilies. Now, your can must be placed each morning in the warmest, sunniest window available, and at night put in a warm place again. The next leaf to appear is of the orthodox shape, the most fairy-like wee lily-pad you ever saw, but its tiny stem is equipped with the air tubes of its race, to carry the leaf up to the surface of the water, where it can float about in the air and sunshine. Once the little seedlings arrive at this stage they grow rapidly, and should be transplanted before they crowd each other too much.

Give each plant a little thumb-pot to itself, using rich soil, and again putting sand on top. Place the pots, after planting, in a pan about six inches deep, on a layer of soil (which the roots will soon work their way into through the holes in the base of the pots) and fill

RENNIE'S SEEDS HAVE GOT TO GROW IF YOU GIVE THEM BUT A SHOW
THE FINEST IN THE LAND
Wm. Rennie Company, Limited, Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg, Vancouver

Arguments in Favor of Home-Mixing

Extract From "ARTIFICIAL FERTILIZERS; Their Nature and Use," by B. Leslie Emslie, C.D.A. (Glas), P.A.S.I., C.D.A.

1. ECONOMY. Usually at least 25 per cent is saved in purchasing the separate ingredients. There is no useless "filler" to add to the freight charges; there is no duty on the separate ingredients, whereas the farmer must bear the cost of the duty imposed on the ready-mixed fertilizers when these are imported from the United States.
2. ASSURANCE. The farmer who purchases the separate ingredients, especially if he insists in getting the goods in the original sacks, knows exactly what he is getting for his money; whereas the purchase of the ready-mixed brand is more often like buying a "pig in a sack."
3. ADAPTATION. With a stock of the separate ingredients on hand, the farmer is enabled to make up his mixtures according to prescriptions which he has prepared to suit the various requirements of the different crops and soils.

From this short resumé, each farmer may judge whether, in his case, it will pay him to purchase the separate ingredients in preference to the ready-mixed goods.

Copies of this, and other important bulletins, may be had by writing direct to

German Potash Syndicate
1102-06 Temple Bldg., Toronto, Ont.

The Best of all
GLADIOLI and DAHLIAS
You want them in your garden this year.
Send for Catalogue (ready soon).
H. P. VAN WAGNER
Stoney Creek, -:- Ontario

Royal Victoria College
McGILL UNIVERSITY MONTREAL
For Resident and Day Students. Students prepared for degrees in Arts, Pure Science and Music. Scholarships are awarded annually. For all information apply to the Warden.

Let Us Send this Rocker on Approval

It is one of the big values in furniture contained in our large illustrated CATALOGUE "H"

This rocker is exactly as illustrated, frame of selected quarter-cut oak, hand carved and polished, with spring seat and buttoned back, both upholstered in morocceline—an imitation leather that will wear like iron and can scarcely be told from genuine leather. Equal in value to any $10.00 rocker you ever saw.

ONLY $5.45 — FREIGHT PREPAID to any station within and as far as 200 miles from Toronto. (200 miles freight allowance to points of greater distance.)

Cut out and send us this coupon.

(Write name and address plainly.)

H

Date. .....1912.

To the Adams Furniture Company, Toronto:

Dear Sirs,—Please ship me, freight prepaid, on 5 days' approval, one No. 3,535 Rocker. I agree to within the 5 days after receipt thereof—either remit to you the sum of $5.45—the price of the rocker—or re-ship same to you. (This order implies no obligation on my part to purchase or bear freight charges either way.)

Name .....

Address .....

The Adams Furniture Company, Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Keep well—despite the weather by toning up your system with Bovril. It is a great energiser and producer of vitality.

All that is good in beef is in

BOVRIL

C-12-11

The Seeds That Satisfy

Established 1850

SPECIAL OFFER. Prices Postpaid.

Bruce's Superb Mixed—1 pkt. 10c., oz. 20c., 2 oz. 35c., ¼ lb. 60c., 1 lb. $2.00.

Bruce's Spencer Novelty Collection—1 pkt., each six new varieties, separate colors, for 50c.

Bruce's Royal Nosegay Collection—1 pkt., each eight superb sorts, separate colors, for 25c.

Bruce's Choice Mixed—1 pkt. 5c., oz. 10c., 2 oz. 15c.: ¼ lb. 25c.: 1 lb. 75c.

FREE. Our handsomely illustrated 112 page Catalogue of Vegetable, Farm and Flower Seeds, Plants, Bulbs, Poultry Supplies. Garden Implements, etc., for 1912. Send for it.

Bruce's Seeds—The Standard of Quality Since 1850.

John A. Bruce & Company, Limited

HAMILTON, ONTARIO

PEERLESS-PERFECTION

MEANS FENCE PROTECTION

Peerless Wire Fence does not serve only as a mere boundary line for your farm and pastures but gives real fence service as a permanent barrier to trespassing and wandering of stock.

You Should Fence Your Land With PEERLESS

We use high grade fence wire well galvanized. The joints are united by the non-slippable Peerless Lock, making a fence that will stand up against the most severe and sudden shocks without damage. The horizontal wires are all crimped, making ample protection for contraction and expansion, keeping the fence always tight even under extreme variations of temperature.

Write for our Illustrated Booklet at Once

We also manufacture a wonderful line of poultry fencing and farm gates. Agencies almost everywhere. Agents wanted in all unassigned territory.

The Banwell Hoxie Wire Fence Co., Ltd.

Winnipeg, Man. Dept. , Hamilton, Ont.

Improve Your Kitchen!

Madam, get a Knechtel Kitchen Cabinet and you'll actually be surprised to see how greatly it will improve the appearance of your kitchen, and how easy your work will seem (compared with what it was before).
The Knechtel is the one really useful, up-to-date kitchen cabinet. It saves money, patience, health—and allows more time for other duties by keeping everything just where you can lay your hand on it in a moment.

Finished in Oak.

and several other woods. Five handsome styles to choose from. Has flour, sugar and meal bins; spice jars, air-tight canisters, bread and cake boxes; plate racks; sliding shelves, and other practical conveniences.
Any good dealer will be pleased to show you the different styles. Booklet "B" mailed on request.

Look for the Trade-Mark

Extension top of bright aluminum — KNECHTEL KITCHEN CABINET Registered. — Will neither tarnish nor rust

Knechtel Kitchen Cabinet CO., LIMITED

HANOVER, - - ONT.

up the pan with tepid water high enough just to float the leaves. Then replace in a warm, sunny window and watch them grow. You will be astonished how soon you will have to repot them again into larger pots. If you neglect doing this at the right time you will find the pot will have to be broken to allow the roots to come out whole. As soon as the weather is nice and warm and all danger of frost is past, they can be safely planted in tubs out of doors, using about four plants to a large tub, if the plants are small; one to a tub, if large. If possible, the tubs should be sunk in the ground up to the top, a deep layer of well decomposed manure put in first, then some good rich soil, in which plant the lilies; then an inch or two of sand on top, to keep the soil down and prevent the water getting muddy when more is added. When first put out in the tubs it is best to add tepid water when needed, but as the plants get large and strong and the weather warm, the hose can be allowed to play beside the tub, if a fine spray is used, so that the air has a chance to warm the water as it descends. Large hogsheads cut in two make admirable tanks, though it may be necessary to add another hoop to keep the top of them watertight. A bit of thick galvanized wire answers the purpose if put on and thoroughly tightened with pliers, using an occasional little staple to keep it in place. By midsummer you will begin to see buds nestling at the base of the leaf stalks, and great will be your excitement when your first lily opens. From one packet of mixed seed I grew nearly fifty plants. There were so many that they were almost a nuisance, until enough had been given away to relieve the situation, for every pail, pan and tub about the place was full of lilies, reminding one of the story of the man who thought he would boil some rice while his wife was away at church, and because he liked boiled rice—not knowing its little peculiarities in the way of expanding, he put all there was in the house in a saucepan, added water, and was busy the rest of the morning finding things to put it in, ending up, in desperation, with the washing boiler.

The lilies that were put out in the garden did wonderfully well, though they were left, each in a large pot, and far more plants used than should have been in so small a tub, the result being smaller flowers than if they had had more room to grow, but the flowers were quite numerous, and of several shades of blue, rose, also a white. They well repaid the small amount of trouble expended upon them. The birds came from far and near to have a bath in the tub and it was a pretty sight to watch them enjoying it.

Bees and Their Work in the Garden

LAST spring we put a hive of bees in the garden and they buzzed about right merrily all summer long. I found, as the different flowers ripened their seeds, that the buzzing had been to some purpose, for there was an unusually large supply of nice plump seeds. Later on, when the grapes were ripe, it was quite a surprise to find how much larger the bunches were than they had been other years. This was particularly true of "Lindley" (Rogers No. 9), also known as the "Red Roger," which requires pollen from other varieties before it can set much fruit, all of which goes to show that bees are useful in a city garden for other purposes than mere honey making. The honey produced was very dark in color and unappetizing in appearance, though the flavor was pleasant enough, so it would have no market value. It was very interesting to watch these industrious little creatures at their work, how busily they collected the pollen from the flowers, revelling as much in the dusky interior of the gorgeous Oriental poppies as in the dainty sweetness of the Rugosa roses, and flying back to the hive heavily laden with their spoils. Where they gathered their honey I do not know, certainly the garden would not supply them with very much; so perhaps it would be as well not to be too curious about it, as I have rather strong suspicions that most of it was stolen, and, alas! not from flowers alone. The disadvantages of having bees is, that where you have more than one species of a plant, you cannot obtain pure seed unless you cover the flower, so that they cannot get at it, for they are the oldest and most persistent hybridizers known.

The next issue of the Canadian Home Journal will be our Special Spring Garden Number. Several of our leading horticulturists have contributed special articles for this splendid number, and we feel safe in promising an issue that will far surpass our Garden Number of last year.

The Pleasure of Sweeping is unknown to the woman who uses a corn broom.

For centuries sweeping has been done in a primitive way, and not until the introduction of the BISSELL Sweeper, thirty-six years ago, did woman ever enjoy relief from the drudgery and bondage of antiquated methods. To-day women all over the world are using the BISSELL Sweeper, and with the facility, ease and thoroughness with which it performs its work, housewives and servants are given more time for other duties. It is a useless waste of energy and an inefficient method of sweeping to use a corn broom, and just consider the injury to fine carpets and rugs as compared with the gentle though thorough operation of the

BISSELL Sweeper

The rapidly revolving brush of the "BISSELL" lifts all the dirt and grit out of the carpet, depositing it in the pan receptacles, whereas a corn broom simply scatters the dirt and dust, never doing its work thoroughly.

A trial of the "BISSELL" will make you regret those years of wasted effort, and once you know how the "BISSELL" cleanses and brightens your carpets and rugs, and confines the dust, and how quickly and easily it performs its work, you would not be without one of these machines for ten times its cost.

There are sold by the best trade everywhere at $3.00 and $4.75.

Let us send you our booklet. Address

BISSELL CARPET SWEEPER CO.

Dept. 3, Grand Rapids, Mich.

(Largest Exclusive Carpet Sweeper Makers in the World.) 16

TASTY AND SATISFYING

Breakfast gains an added charm when finishes off the meal. With toast or rolls and coffee it is delicious, and its purity is unquestioned.

UPTON'S ORANGE MARMALADE

Made solely from luscious selected oranges and pure granulated sugar—the best quality that money can buy.

Our modern factory is a model of cleanliness.

Sold By All Leading Grocers

Kellogg's TOASTED CORN FLAKES

Not merely a 'breakfast food', but a wholesome dainty you'll enjoy oftener than once a day.

10c A Package

51

DYEING BUT NOT DEAD

LADIES of refinement and culture know that fine gowns add lustre of youth to the appearance.

FINE gowns and everyday dresses cost money, but the life of a costume may be doubled by proper care.

PROPER care includes timely cleaning or dyeing before the stains become ingrained.

WE are alone in guaranteeing a jet black on Raw or Pongee Silk.

OUT of City orders as cheap as city trade—we pay express.

WILLOW PLUMES made from your old feathers.
$3.00 to $8.00

Write for price list and advice.

RELIABLE AGENTS WANTED IN EVERY TOWN

SINCLAIR DYE WORKS
656 College St. - Toronto, Ont.
Phone Coll. 621.

Don't take chances with your fine things — Silks, Satins, Laces, Suits.

Send them to Fountain, to be cleaned or dyed.

If soiled, our Dry Cleaning will restore them to pristine freshness. If stained or faded, we can dye them as good as new. Fountain's work is irreproachable.

We pay express one way on goods from out of town.

Write for free copy of our book, which tells all about our work and our prices.

Fountain "My Valet"
30 Adelaide St. W., Toronto.
15

MAXWELL'S HIGH SPEED CHAMPION

is in a class by itself—the easiest running, the most substantially built, the most satisfactory washer, ever invented.

Only washer worked with crank handle at side as well as top lever—and the only one where the whole top opens up.

Ask your dealer to show you the "Champion" Washer.

"Favorite" Churn is the world's best churn. Write for catalogue.

DAVID MAXWELL & SONS
ST. MARY'S, ONT.

A WRITER to this journal objects decidedly to our references to "powder and paint" in this department, and seems to consider that we advise strongly the use of these aids to beauty. Now, we have not said one word about the use of "paint," as we consider such stuff on the face harmful to the skin and vulgar in effect. In fact, the ordinary rouge is emphatically objectionable, and we should not advise anyone to resort to its use.

Powder, however, is quite "another story." There are powders and powders. A "cheap" powder is to be avoided, but a little good rice powder is regarded as a necessity by the modern woman. It is all a matter of the evolution of personal refinement. There are women who consider the use of soap and water a waste of time, and there are others who regard the use of a manicure set or of dental floss as absurd. But such women are hardly to be regarded as models of grace or refinement. Dr. Sabouraud, of Paris, who is a scientific student of the skin, has recently published an interesting article on the harm or benefit of cosmetics, in the course of which he remarks:

In fact, in comparing on the one hand the complexion of a woman of thirty in the town and in the country, or, on the other hand, if a comparison is made between the complexion of a woman in town who uses cosmetics and another of the same age who does not, the former will generally be superior to the other, for the reason that the complexion is better protected against physical injury from wind, rain and sun. Why is the skin of the face nine times out of ten ravaged by time at sixty years of age, while the skin of the body remains fairly delicate—more delicate, at least, than the skin of the face? The reason is evident. The skin of the body has always been protected, while that of the face has always been bare.

Why is it that the black patches which cover the back of the hands of certain aged peasants do not appear on other parts of the body? The reason is always the same:—The face of the peasant is exposed to the wind, cold and sun; that of a woman in the city much less frequently. And it is incorrect to say that the features of actresses apparently pretty on the stage are ugly when seen closely, because they are spoiled by the use of cosmetics. In reality, says Dr. Sabouraud, numerous actresses, owing to the care they take, have more youthful features than the majority of women of the same age.

Let any woman who doubts the fact make the experiment of a long drive in an automobile or a mountain climb with cosmetics on one cheek and none on the other, and on her return in the evening she will be converted. The non-protected cheek will be hot and smarting and the next day will peel slightly. A week afterward it will be darker in color than the one protected by cosmetics.

Hence features which are to remain youthful must not be exposed quite bare to the weather. When cosmetics or creams are used, if the skin supports them well without redness or smarting there is no need to fear that they will be hurtful.

As regards dyes, Dr. Sabouraud also considers it merely prejudice on the part of many doctors who forbid them.

Hydrogen peroxide dries and hardens the hair and renders it coarse and brittle. Many dyes, if not all, act in a similar way. In the first place, they all necessitate prior treatment with soap, and also subsequent treatment, practised with soft soap or a shampoo with potash soap, which injures the hair. And as a dye rarely gives the desired effect on first trial, hydrogen peroxide is resorted to in order to lighten the shade if it is found to be too dark, and this results in still further injury to the hair and by no means the least.

Accordingly, it may happen, after ten to fifteen applications of the dye, with accompanying intercalations of hydrogen peroxide treatment, together with numberless corrections, that one fine day a part, sometimes as much as a half or two-thirds, of the hair, will fall, broken at a distance of the width of the hand from the scalp.

It is therefore true to say that many dyes render the hair more brittle and fragile. When, however, a head of hair has not been too badly treated, the result is marked but little—little enough to pass unperceived. What must be avoided are counterfeit dyes.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

M. M. E.—I am sending you the name of a preparation which is excellent for blackheads. I do not think there is any danger of the kind you mention from the use of these preparations. Blackheads are often caused by a diet of greasy or too highly-spiced food. I have a friend who declares that as soon as she eats a dish seasoned with pepper her complexion suffers. Wash the face at night with hot (not merely warm) water and a good soap. Soap will not injure the skin if you will use plenty of rinsing water. Dash very cold water on face and neck and then dab chin and cheeks lightly with eau de cologne. Massage with a little good skin food. Try this for a month and see if you are not benefited.

E. J. S.—This is not an altogether unusual state of affairs. You wish to have the window open at night, and your father objects to open windows in the house. Well, well! And yet we are wondering why there are so many cases of tuberculosis or white plague in the land, while there are obstinate "daddies," who persist in having all the doors and windows closed. I do not wish to say anything disrespectful regarding your paternal parent, but he certainly does not deserve to have healthy sons and daughters. I really hardly know what to advise. Perhaps some more experienced reader will make a suggestion. It is positively necessary for you to have your room aired at night, and, if I were in your position, I should lock my door and open the window. Yes, the powder is good for the skin. I am sending you names of several good ones. Try steaming the face occasionally. Do not wear your hair "fluffy" at the side of the head, and—for your age—nothing is more becoming than the old-fashioned plait. I shall be glad to hear from you again and hope you will manage to have plenty of fresh air.

Mrs. B.—Here is what a medical authority says regarding the trouble you mention:

The disappearance of pigment from certain parts of the skin is characteristic of a disease called leucoderma. The cause of it is not known, but it is supposed to be due to a disturbance of the nerves of the skin. It usually occurs in persons who have reached middle age. All authorities agree that any treatment of it is unsatisfactory. Electricity has been tried without result. The general health should be kept up with food and nerve tonics. The change in the skin does not affect it otherwise than in the color. I think it would be well for you to take hot baths upon retiring, and massage the skin with a view to improving the circulation; but I doubt if you can ever restore the color to the patches which have lost it.

M. G.—So your husband objects to your using face powder, and you wish to know what to do. My dear girl, if you get the very best face powder and use it delicately and with discrimination, your husband will never know that it is there. It is none of his business, anyway, but do not tell him so. Just go on and do as you please, in a nice, quiet, ladylike way, and the dear man will forget all about it. This is not a deceitful policy—it is only diplomacy. So far as the use of face powder is concerned, there is a rumor to the effect that men use talcum powder after shaving. I am quite sure that your husband dislikes to see you with a shiny nose—and yet he objects to face powder. I have no doubt that he is an excellent husband in many respects, but in this matter he is a trifle inconsistent. However, if you are a really clever woman (and your writing looks as if you are well supplied with grey matter), you will get your own sweet way without much trouble or any shedding of tears.

—The Demand For— Dorenwend Productions and our advanced methods of manufacturing Hair Goods allows us to carry a variety of hair styles, unattempted by any other hair goods house.

Long Distance Shopping is made as gratifying as a personal visit to our store by our mail order system.

The Newest Fashions in Hair Dressing are not complete without a switch. We are showing special switches for the Tortillion Effects.

Write Now, Enclosing a Sample of Your Hair, and we will quote you prices in all lengths.

Perfect Satisfaction Assured

Free Illustrated Catalogue and booklet on Beauty Secrets sent to any address.

Ladies' Transformations, Pompadours, Etc.

The Dorenwend Co. of Toronto
Limited
(The House of Quality Hair Goods)
103-105 Yonge Street, Toronto

DOMINION EXPRESS Money Orders

and Foreign Cheques are payable all over the World.

They may be sent in payment of produce, tax, gas and electric light bills, interest on notes and mortgages, insurance premiums, subscriptions to newspapers and magazines, and in fact in payment of all kinds of accounts, whether in or out of town.

We give you a receipt and if the remittance goes astray in the mails,

we refund your money or issue a new order free of charge.

TRAVELLERS' CHEQUES ISSUED.
MONEY SENT BY TELEGRAPH AND CABLE.

When purchasing Goods by mail, ALWAYS remit by

DOMINION EXPRESS CO. MONEY ORDERS

RATES FOR MONEY ORDERS:

$ & AND UNDER	$ CENTS
OVER $ TO $10.	3	"
" 10. " 20.	10	"
" 20. " 30.	15	"

AGENCIES THROUGHOUT CANADA.

This Ring given FREE

for selling Assorted PICTURE POST CARDS. In one hour you can earn this handsomely Chased Signet Ring, engraved with any initial desired Free. The design is an exact duplicate of a solid 18K Gold pattern. Given for selling only 18 pkgs. of our Multi-color Picture Post Cards at 10c. a pkge. Each pkge. consists of 6 cards done up in a Valuable Coupon Envelope, which makes your friends buy them on sight. Don't wait a minute. We prepay postage on both Cards and Ring. Big Catalog of all our Premiums sent with each order.

COLONIAL ART CO., Desk OL, TORONTO

The Best Wall Finish
Only one coat required
Easy to apply

Most beautiful, economical and sanitary wall coating made, can be applied by anyone to any kind of surface Will not rub off or peel, Shows no spots or brush marks. Produces that subdued, velvety effect, so agreeable to the eye.

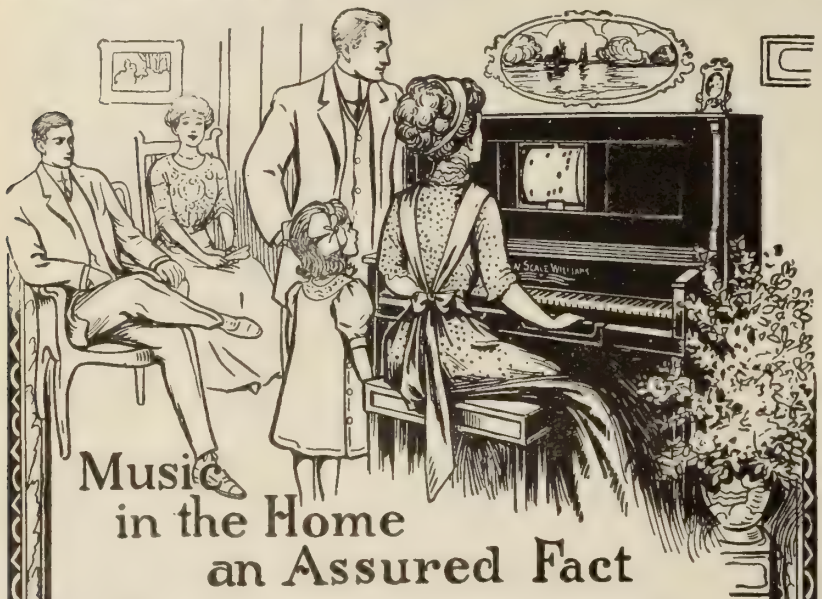
Muresco

Muresco is made in a large line of handsome tints and colors, also white. Ready for use when mixed with hot water. It can be re-coated any number of times, and entirely removed by washing, thus rendering it a simple matter to keep walls in perfect condition.

Beware of wall finishes that cannot be removed by washing; they are neither practical or sanitary. Will even ually peel off, leaving your walls in ruined condition.

Muresco costs no more than othe finishes an goes farther. Call for sample card and see handsome combination effects.

BENJAMIN MOORE & CO. Limited
Sole Manufacturers, Toronto, Canada.
New York. Chicago. Carteret, Cleveland.



Music in the Home an Assured Fact

With the Player-Piano perfected as it is to-day, good music is within the reach of everyone. When we say good music we mean the kind that will not suffer in comparison with an unusually good Pianist. But, to obtain all the beautiful effects of the finished Artist, you must be equipped with a Player-Piano that is "up to the minute" and supplied with the very latest improvements.

NEW SCALE WILLIAMS PLAYER PIANOS contain special features which place them in a distinctive class, and, besides, you get the NEW SCALE WILLIAMS, Canada's Greatest PIANO.

If you have examined any other Player-Pianos with a view to purchasing, make sure they contain all the necessary features to make the perfect Player, otherwise you might regret when it was too late.

Write us for catalogue of pianos and player-pianos and full particulars about our extended payment plan. 248

THE WILLIAMS PIANO CO., LIMITED
OSHAWA ONTARIO

BENGER'S

One of the most valuable foods known to the Medical Profession.—"The Lancet" describes it as "Mr. Benger's admirable preparation."

Benger's Food is distinguished from the others by the ease with which it can be digested and absorbed.

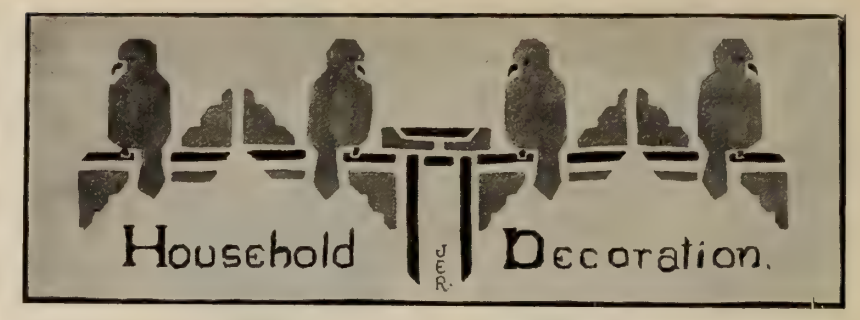
Benger's Food is for Infants and Invalids, and all whose digestive powers have become weakened through illness or advancing age.

Mothers and interested persons are requested to write for Booklet, "Benger's Food and How to Use It." This contains a "Concise Guide to the Rearing of Infants" and practical information on the care of Invalids, Convalescents and the Aged. Post free on application to Benger's Food Ltd., Otter Works, Manchester, Eng.

Benger's Food is sold in tins by Druggists, etc., everywhere.

B24

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.



Furnishing a Home on a Moderate Income

By JESSIE E. RORKE

THE NURSERY

MANY of the homes that must be built and furnished from a moderate income do not include a nursery, but where it is possible at all to devote one room to the children, it adds much to their enjoyment as well as to the comfort of the rest of the family. Where the mother takes entire care of the children the tiniest tots of course must be with her, and the children's room becomes a playroom for the slightly older ones, not a place to banish them, but a room where their toys and playthings are kept, and where they will be glad to spend merry hours that are too damp or cold to be out of doors.

RUG BORDER

Make this playroom pretty. It will probably take time and planning, but it will necessitate very little expense, and it is well worth while. We so seldom pause to analyze our pleasures—the simple happiness of a quiet ordinary day—that we fail to realize how much of it comes from the beauty that surrounds us, the light and color that beauty of form that are about us everywhere, and lend their influence so unobtrusively that we may fail to recognize its source. No carelessness on our part can make us entirely blind to this influence, but our degree of sight is largely dependent on our training, and we may so blunt our faculties that we absorb but a small measure of what is so abundantly offered us. There is no surer way of doing this than by a constant association with what is crude and unlovely, and surely it is most important that we should make the surroundings of the children the reverse of this, letting them grow up amidst harmonies of form and color that will teach them to see and comprehend the greater beauties of the world around them.

Children are fond of bright colors, and these have the merit of proving more serviceable than the dainty pinks and blues and lavenders, but they require more careful handling to ensure harmonious results. Different shades of one bright color with a neutral background will make a pretty room; or a dull tone of one color with a brighter shade of some harmonious contrasting one, as a dull green with a brighter red, or a dull blue and yellow. Blue and green are difficult to handle together in the brighter shades; bright red in large quantities is trying to both eyes and nerves, but when used sparingly with tan, brown or dull green makes a room cheery and attractive.

CUSHION DESIGN FOR NURSERY

Probably no more serviceable covering can be found for the floor than matting. It takes much less labor to keep it fresh and clean than a hardwood floor or linoleum, and though not so warm and cosy-looking as a rug, it is more easily swept, and will wear better, unless the rug be an expensive one. A few small rugs about the room will add to its comfort. These may be found in the shops with pretty and suitable designs, quaintly conventionalized patterns that interest the children, but the hooked rugs that are made at home are more durable and may be quite as artistic. A very pleasing result is obtained by using a plain matting in its natural color, and rugs with a background of a slightly darker shade with design in the prevailing colors of the room.

If the room is intended for little children a wash paper will be most serviceable. These are to be found with designs that are especially adapted for the nursery, Mother Goose and many other of the nursery friends lending themselves as a motif. Another treatment of the walls that will interest the children is to use a plain paper, dividing it at the height of a chair rail with a stencil illustrating some of the nursery rhymes: Little Boy Blue with his horn and the haystack and open gap in the background, will make a very good subject, or Jack and Jill with their pail following the path up the hill. As the children grow older, however, these pictures will lose their interest, and it is better to choose some of the pretty, inexpensive papers that are sufficiently inconspicuous to form a good background for pictures. Have these abundant if possible, and choose them with the greatest care. I scarcely know how to urge the plea strongly enough for good pictures for the children, not expensive ones, but those that are true, as well as beautiful, in light and line and color, and have a subject sufficiently fine to be impressed on small minds that may keep it in memory for many years. No matter how simple fairy tale or nursery rhyme we desire for the children we would not select one that was ill-spelled or ungrammatical, or even poorly expressed. Would we not be wise to exercise equal care in the choice of our pictures? Many different prints of the world's best pictures are offered at very slight cost, both in the brown tones and in color. Among these are numbers that will interest children and by arousing their curiosity provide a subject for many a bedtime story as well. Millais' beautiful picture, "The Boyhood of Raleigh," will not fail to rouse interest in the wistful-faced boy, and beyond the stirring adventures of the man, until he will seem like an old friend when at last he appears in history. "Baby Stuart," too, and Rembrandt's child picture of William, Prince of Orange, will lead to acquaintance with other historical characters, while Watt's "Sir Galahad" will open a way to the wonders of the legends of King Arthur.

PANEL FOR NURSERY SCREEN

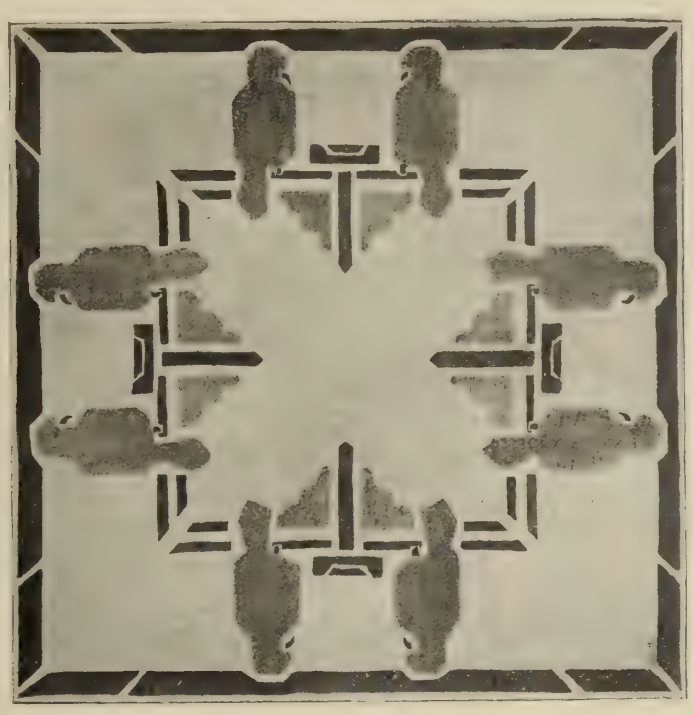
ANIMAL pictures never fail to please, and Rosa Bonheur's and Landseer's offer many to choose from. "A Noble Charger," "A Distinguished Member of the Humane Society," and "The Hunted Stag" are only a few of many that are equally good. Herring's studies of horses are fine. "Pharaoh's Horses" and "Three Members of a Temperance Society" are most familiar, but "The Frugal Meal" is quite as good. "The Dog in the Manger," by Walter Hunt, and "Mother and Son," by H. W. B. Davis, are both charming animal pictures.

Nor will pictures with a deeper meaning fail to appeal to children. Millet's "Angelus," "The Doctor," by Fildes, and "The Arrival of the Shepherds," by Leroile, are familiar pictures that are not beyond their understanding. Indeed there are so many to choose from that the difficulty is not in finding pictures that would be suitable, but in deciding which among the many one would like to use would be most desirable. If the more expensive prints are used, it is better to frame the pictures with simple mouldings and a protecting glass, but pictures that can be easily replaced may be neatly mounted with wide mats of gray, brown or dull green (whichever will harmonize best with the picture itself and the other colors in the room), and hung without frames.

The simplest curtains are, of course, the best. They should be made of material that will launder easily, and hung so they may be drawn back to admit as much light as possible. Some of the pretty muslins will answer the purpose nicely, or cheesecloth or factory cotton with stenciled border will make dainty, inexpensive curtains. Stencil decoration for the nursery may be most effective and full of interest for the little people. The motif may be borrowed from their familiar nursery rhymes or designed from the animals that they know and like, but if more than one motif is used in the room, care must be taken to repeat the line and color used in the first, or unity is lost, and the result is a patchwork effect that soon becomes wearisome. The illustrations show designs adapted to the various furnishings of the room. The parrot design would be very pretty worked out in blues on a tan ground, while yellow, yellow-browns and browns seem to suggest themselves at once for a room done in the bunny motif; but these color schemes are, of course, only suggestions, the designs being sufficiently conventionalized to make any colors appropriate.

If it is possible to furnish the nursery with the dwarf furniture designed for children's use it will not only delight the small owners with the feeling of possessing something that was made really for them, but will add much to their comfort as well. It is so long since we were small that we are inclined to forget the discomfort of sitting with our feet dangling a few inches from the floor, or beside tables that were hardly below the level of our eyes. The designers have supplied us with attractive little chairs, tables and couches in almost as many varieties as in the larger furniture. The better class of these is quite expensive, being made of oak and walnut, and upholstered with leather, but pretty and serviceable little pieces are made up in wicker and some of the less expensive woods. Indeed, every variety of furniture is displayed for the benefit of the little people; easy chairs, diminutive sideboards, small desks, and bookcases are all to be found, made up in different designs and woods. These novelties are an unceasing source of pleasure, but are not essential to a happy and comfortable nursery.

IF the children's room is to be kept neat and tidy it is necessary that there should be a convenient place for "everything," and if possible, a place so attractive that the children themselves will take pride in putting their things away. If one of the pretty little bookcases from the shops adds too much expense one may be made at home that will answer the purpose quite as well. If neatly made and well-proportioned, and stained to match the woodwork of the room, it will be almost as ornamental. The picture and story books will be much more likely to find their way back to this than to any ordinary shelf or box. A built-in window-seat may conceal several small cupboards, or rather sets of shelves without doors, where toys of various kinds can be laid away. Upholster the seat in heavy denim, and let the valance across the front completely conceal these shelves. A drawer in the table will keep the pencils, crayons, paints and brushes, blunt scissors for paper cutting, and other utensils where they can be easily found.



DESIGN FOR CUSHION IN TAN AND BLUE

The Care of Mahogany

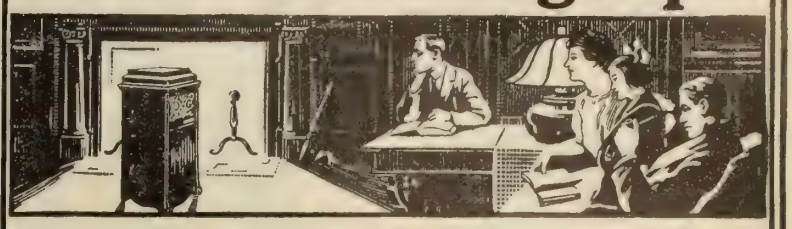
IT is not difficult to keep mahogany beautiful if one is willing to put time and work upon it, but the labor is not a light one as the secret of success is thorough and vigorous rubbing. The cabinet-maker brings a man's strength to the process, but that need be the only reason for his greater success, and the busy housekeeper who develops firm muscle in doing her own housework need not despair of achieving decidedly good results. The application of a good furniture polish may at first seem to be sufficient without the rubbing, but soon a dull haze will appear over the surface of the wood, which only grows heavier with repeated applications of the polish. This is the result of an excess of oil to which the dust adheres, refusing to yield to ordinary methods of dusting. The best way to remove this haze, if it has been allowed to form, is to wash the wood with a damp chamois wet in tepid water and dry immediately with a soft cheesecloth. There is nothing better to use than a good furniture polish which is usually made up of linseed oil and turpentine, but it should be put on very sparingly.

Old pieces of mahogany that are too badly scratched and dented to be restored by rubbing, present such a discouraging problem that unless one has an infinite amount of patience, it is better to send to a cabinet-maker at once. All of the old finish must be removed, and this often means several coats of varnish, and sometimes paint as well.

Do not fail to hear the AMBEROLA

—THOMAS A. EDISON'S highest development of his own instrument, the

Edison Phonograph



Musically—the Amberola has the truest, surest, smoothest tone, the most lifelike reproduction. Exactly the right volume of sound for the home. It has the sapphire reproducing point, which is permanent—no changing needles. It renders all compositions completely, without cutting or hurrying, on Edison Amberol (four-and-one-half minute) Records—and all short selections on Edison (two-minute) Records, as well.

Artistically—a masterpiece of the cabinet maker's art, as beautiful to look at as it is wonderful to hear. You have your choice of four finishes, Circassian Walnut, Mahogany, Golden Oak and Mission Oak.

Mechanically—perfect. The silent motor will play five Amberol Records, each four-and-one-half minutes long without rewinding.

There are various other styles of Edison Phonographs at almost any price you wish to pay—and each offers definite Edison advantages. But the Amberola is the greatest of all. Hear it today.

There are Edison dealers everywhere. Go to the nearest and hear the Edison Phonograph play both Edison Standard and Edison Amberol Records. Get complete catalogs from your dealer or from us. Edison Phonographs, $16.50 to $240.00. Edison Standard Records, 40c. Edison Amberol Records (play twice as long), 65c. Edison Grand Opera Records, 85c to $2.50.

Thomas A. Edison
INCORPORATED
100 Lakeside Avenue
Orange, N. J., U. S. A.

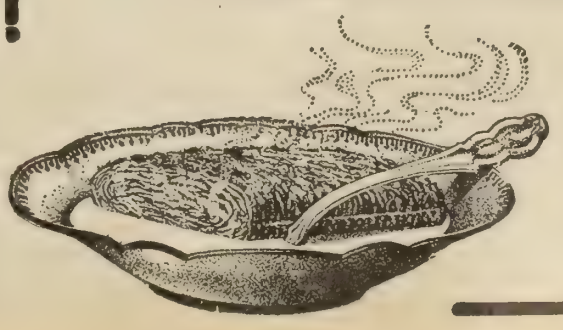
Warmth and Strength on a cold day come from foods that are easily digested and are rich in heat-making elements. For the out-door man or the in-door man, for children to study on, to grow on, to play on, there's nothing so nourishing and satisfying as

SHREDDED WHEAT

It is better than porridges for children because they have to chew it. The crispness of the shreds induces thorough mastication, which develops sound teeth. It is the best "whole wheat bread" because it contains all the rich body-building material in the whole wheat. Delicious and nourishing when served with hot milk or canned fruits.

Made of Choicest Selected Canadian Wheat
A Canadian Food for Canadians



Made by
The Canadian Shredded Wheat Co.
Limited
Niagara Falls, Ont.

Toronto Office:
49 Wellington St. East
I-74

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Ontario Women's Institutes

GEORGE A. PUTNAM
SUPERINTENDENT
PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS, TORONTO

Homemakers of Saskatchewan

By LILLIAN K. BEYNON

"CAN you not provide something for our wives."

It was this oft-repeated request of men at the annual meeting of the agricultural societies of Saskatchewan, that led Mr. Auld, the Director of Agricultural Extension Work for the University, to send out women to organize the women of the province into associations for the scientific study of their work; this, and the knowledge that the women were looking anxiously around for improved methods of work, and they knew not where to find them. It is centuries since the intelligent women of the race knew that they were not born with the knowledge of housekeeping and motherhood duties, but it is a popular fallacy which dies hard. So while men have been studying how to feed the stock, conserve the strength of the soil, and conduct their business scientifically, the women have been groping along, stumbling every few steps over a little grave that they have attributed to the mysterious dispensations of Providence, until some one pointed out that it was ignorance and not Providence. Then all the motherhood, which is one of the grandest attributes of woman, rose up, and they demanded to know. It is this insatiable desire to know, which lies at the foundation of the progress made in the Homemakers' Clubs in Saskatchewan.

It is less than a year since six women met in a small room in the Agricultural Hall at Broadview, Saskatchewan, and discussed the advisability of organizing a club for the study of home problems. None of the women present had ever belonged to such an organization, and none of them knew what the public sentiment regarding such work would be. But they saw possibilities in such an organization and they said: "We will try it."

They organized at once, half the officers belonging to the town, the other half living in the country. They arranged for their first meeting, and without any literature but a roughly-sketched suggested constitution, and with no name but "A Woman's Club," they went to work.

Eight clubs were organized in a number of small towns along the main line of the C.P.R. None of the women in these towns were familiar with the work, and there were many who discouraged it from the beginning. There were those in every town and country district visited who thought the movement was good, and might be a success in other places, but they were quite sure it would be a failure in theirs. The reason was that the women were a little peculiar there, and did not take much interest in such work. There were others who believed that the church organizations served the need. A peculiar thing about it was that the women most active in church work were usually the ones most ready to see the advantages in such an organization, and to help in it.

Then there was always the woman who thought that such organizations would be merely places of gossip, and the women would be better at home. But in greater numbers and with more enthusiasm were the women who saw the possibilities of such work, who had faith enough in the people of their own district to believe they could make a success of whatever others could, and who helped in the organization. An interesting feature about the inception of this work in the West has been the fact that in many cases, the men in the district have been quite as enthusiastic as the women, and often more enthusiastic regarding the success of such an undertaking. And in a readiness to adopt new methods of housework, such as the use of a gasoline engine for churning, separating the milk, washing, and various other things, men are less conservative than women, perhaps because these are things that they are often required to help with; but I think it is more from the fact that the average man regrets that his wife should have so much heavy work, and he is glad of any solution of the work problem on the farm.

Two months after the organization trip, in which eight clubs were organized, a convention was held in the capital city of Regina, at the same time as the annual meeting of the agricultural societies. The organized clubs were asked to send delegates, and all agricultural societies were also allowed to send representatives. This convention lasted for three days, fifteen papers were read and discussed, a name and constitution was adopted. At the sessions the attendance was between two and five hundred women. Every meeting was bright, and the discussions were lively, backed by genuine enthusiasm. A committee of the delegates from the clubs adopted a constitution, which was submitted to the full meeting of the delegates, and was read and adopted clause by clause, with but few amendments. The name "Homemakers' Clubs" was chosen after much discussion. Some thought it wise to adhere to the name of Institute, as in Ontario, but as Manitoba had taken a name of its own, making it impossible to have a complete band of Institute workers from coast to coast, it was decided to choose a name for the province, a name that we believe the province is large enough and enthusiastic enough to make as well known and as influential as Ontario women have made the name Women's Institutes. The band of workers will be none the less sisters in the work, and none the less one band, because in Manitoba they are known as Home Economics Associations, and in Saskatchewan as Homemakers' Clubs.

All the delegates to the convention went home with renewed enthusiasm, but notwithstanding this it was with many fears that another trip to the clubs was planned. Not fears regarding the earnestness of the workers, but many had had no experience in the work, our supply of literature was limited, and the winter had been an exceptionally cold and stormy one. The question was, could the enthusiasm of the little bands of women keep hot amid such odds. The visit made first dispelled all such fears, and gave reason to expect great things from every club, an expectation that was but seldom disappointed. The Pense Club, which was visited first, had more than doubled its membership. It had been visited by a lady from the adjoining town who had been an Institute worker in the East, and who had wonderfully encouraged them. The club had almost completed arrangements for a rest and reading room, to be kept open afternoons and evenings, for the use of farmers' wives and daughters, and for the young people of the town during the evening. Arrangements for a flower show during August had been almost completed, forty-six prizes in all being offered. In all this the men of the district had helped by both sympathy and material aid. The club is also planning to have sewing taught in their school.

HOME OF MR. WEST, SASKATCHEWAN
PHOTOGRAPH BY COURTESY OF CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY

The first club organized had quadrupled in membership, had two rest rooms furnished, and was struggling with the problem of having a caretaker to keep the rooms heated in the winter and keep them open afternoon and evening, so that the town, as well as the country, might benefit. This club, our pioneer, has also many plans for extending the work during the coming year.

It might grow tedious were we to try to give a full account of the plans of each club, but it must interest women the world over to know that these clubs are breaking down the barriers of creed, and the barriers which so quickly grow up between town and country women. In one club some of the members were afraid that with the membership increasing so rapidly, it would soon be unwieldy, and it was suggested that clubs might be organized in the rural districts around. An unexpected opposition was offered by the women of both town and country. Both said that in the club meetings was the only opportunity the women had of meeting socially, and they regarded it as such a privilege they did not wish to give it up, and again divide into town and country. The membership is now over forty.

MR. MARTIN'S HOMESTEAD, NEAR NORTH BATTLEFORD
PHOTOGRAPH BY COURTESY OF CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY

In another the line between the different denominations had been very hard and fast, so hard that the social life was largely determined by it. Since the organization of the club, women who had wished for years to know each other better, had become well acquainted and good friends. Then the clubs have done much to make people forget old feuds, the trouble long forgotten had left merely the cleavage, which has been bridged. This is outside of the practical help which has been gained from reading, and from the experience of others, and is also, apart from the social gain, which is a very large benefit that the members in the West derive from such organizations.

This summer a district convention was held at Wolseley, to consider the organization of county Institutes. The attendance was much smaller than at the provincial convention, but the enthusiasm was just as great, and while the clubs each felt that they had still too many local problems to work out to undertake anything else, many valuable suggestions for future work were made, and it is the intention to organize the county work in the near future. The many practical papers given at the convention were thoroughly enjoyed and fully discussed, and much time was spent discussing the problems that the clubs were trying to solve. Also during the summer a domestic science teacher visited each club and gave a practical talk.

Besides this a lady member of the staff of university extension work, attended all the large fairs in the province and talked to all those interested about the clubs, and distributed much literature. In this work is has been found that the Institute workers of Ontario have turned much sod for us. Wherever an Institute worker has been found we have been sure of sympathy and help, and we have found that those who never took part in the work in the East, but who have read about it, are almost invariably glad to take part out here. In fact, the word Institute has been our first word of explanation about our work, and where it was understood, our road has been easy. I am glad to be able to say this, for Mr. Putnam has given us much encouragement, and also literature that helped us, when we began to feel our way.

During the summer ten new clubs were organized in the southern part of the province and in the newer districts. Most of the meetings were well attended, the women in some cases walking from two to five miles to attend. Some of the women confessed they would not have attended had they not been urged by their husbands. Others spoke of their loneliness, and the social advantages they expected, while others wished practical help. On the prairie there are many young mothers who are ever anxious for any information they can get about the care of children, while there are many women from other countries who do not understand conditions, and are very anxious to learn the methods that have been found best. Others hope that in time the clubs will be able to take up the question of bringing out women help and placing nurses in the districts where they are needed. And there are those who miss greatly the big libraries of the older countries and the abundant supply of papers and magazines, and who hope through the clubs to get much help for the intellectual side of their nature.

Requests for organizers are coming in from all parts, and already the work has assumed immense proportions. It is an organization that is filling a need in our Western life, and is being welcomed by both men and women. All over the province the ministers, the teachers, the nurses and the doctors have been ready to help when asked, not even waiting for an invitation, but willingly offering all the help possible. The newspapers, the agricultural societies, and the business men of most of the towns have given help and encouragement, and there appears to be no obstacle in the way of this great movement, one of the greatest ever started among women, a movement than which there is no greater in the influence it may have on the national life of our country.

Not only is there no obstacle in the way of this work, but with the sympathy of Principal Murray of the University to be depended upon, and the enthusiasm of Dean Rutherford of the Agricultural College, to encourage the workers, the Homemakers' Clubs cannot fail.

Two Programmes

FROM the Stouffville Branch, of which Mrs. Elias Hoover is president, comes the following:

July 19th, 1911—President's Address, Mrs. Elias Hoover; Prize Essay, Miss Brand; Reading, Miss V. Burnett; "Cool Dishes for Summer," Mrs. Mowat.

August 16th—Picnic.

Sept. 20th—Invitation to one of the Branches to give programme.

Oct. 18th—"Citizenship," Mr. Robert Rae; Vocal Solo, Miss Vera Hoover; Question Box.

Nov. 15th—"A Young Woman's Place in the Home and Society," Mrs. Jourdan; Reading, Miss Campbell; Subject to be chosen, Dr. W. A. Sangster.

Dec. 20th—"The True Spirit of Christmas Giving," Mrs. Percy; Vocal Solo, Miss LaFraugh; Question Box.

Jan. 17th, 1912—Reading, Miss Edna Warriner; Report of Convention; Vocal Duet, Misses Hoover.

Feb. 21st—Programme by the girls.

March 20th—Address by District President, Mrs. R. Fairles; Vocal Solo, Miss Garbutt; Reading, Mrs. F. Sangster; Violin Colo, Miss Lorna Wideman.

April 17th—"Bee Culture," Mr. J. L. Byer; Vocal Solo, Miss M. Forsyth; "Spring: Its Beauty and Work," Mrs. W. Mitchell.

May 15th—"How Are We Benefited by Meeting Together?" Mrs. D. C. Smith; Reading, Mrs. Pollock; Annual Meeting, Election of Officers.

June 19th—Paper from one of the Branches; Vocal Duet, Mrs. H. W. Sanders and Mrs. G. Collard; Reading, Mrs. W. J. Thompson.

From Thedford we have received this interesting programme:

August, 1911—"Sunday Dinners," Mrs. M. Willsie; "Canning Vegetables," Mrs. G. R. Jaap; "Life of Queen Alexandra," Miss Jessie Dallas.

September—"Apples: Their Food Value and Their Preparation," Mrs. R. Wilson; "Women's Part in Country Life," Mrs. R. Lithgow.

October—"The Prosperity of Canada," Mrs. J. G. Dawes; "Winter Vegetables: Their Growth and Method of Keeping," Mrs. Leng.

November—Social Evening, Miss G. Wright, Miss E. Willsie, Miss A. Jaap, Mrs. W. Tudor, Mrs. J. Wakefield.

December — "Inexpensive Christmas Gifts," Mrs F. Traver;; "Christmas Decorations for House and Table," Mrs. N. J. Kearney.

January, 1912—"Thoughts on New Year," Mrs. Dr. Clerke; Report of Annual Convention, by delegate; "Breakfast Foods and Their Value," Mrs. H. Mosure.

February—"Desserts," Mrs. J. Houston, Mrs. F. Wright; "Cold Weather Supper Dishes," Mrs. J. Walden; "Life of Laura Secord," Miss Vera Lawrie.

March—"Spring Sewing and Exchange of Patterns," Mrs. R. Thomson; "Pie Making," Mrs. M. Crawford; "Life of Florence Nightingale," Miss Creta Kearney.

April—"Flowers and Bulbs," "Farm Gardening," Mrs. J. Ticknor; "Education a Farmer's Daughter Should Receive," followed by discussion, Mrs. W. P. Johnson.

May—"Most Suitable Foods for Summer," Mrs. Watcher; Annual Business Meeting, election of officers; "Life of Queen Victoria," Miss Myrtle Thomson.

The Effect of an Outburst

ONE of our masculine contributors, "Henry," writes to us as follows:

One day in passing the log schoolhouse where I had spent many days as an inferior student, thinking more of fun and playing what was commonly known as "hookey" than of studying, my attention was attracted by the horses, buggies and wagons standing around, so I strolled in to see what was going on. Twenty years had elapsed since I last set foot inside the gates, and a peculiar sensation passed over me as I pulled the string which held the latch and allowed the door to swing open. Everything came back clearly to my mind, and it seemed as if it were only yesterday I had stood there and held out my hand for a strapping. A loud clapping and cheering greeted me as I entered, only explained when a big man, bigger by far than any other there, jumped up and in a voice like thunder shouted that he would nominate me for school trustee. A yell like a storm greeted this remark, and before I was aware of what had happened I was elected a school trustee. I tried to decline, but nothing would induce that audience to change its mind. When I told them I would erect a schoolhouse worthy of the name, the applause was deafening, and that applause was what gave me encouragement, that outburst made me feel that I could and would do something. For twenty-one years I was a representative, and regularly at the old-time "yearly meeting" and one year after the last of its kind was held, a beautiful $18,000 school stood to commemorate that one outburst of approval.

P.S.—I was reading an account of the Ontario Women's Institute where Dr. Helen MacMurchy asked if women ever took an interest in school trustees, and to the women present she said: "Do you ever say to your husbands, 'No, not that bunch,' evidently meaning that women are afraid of their husbands taking part in public affairs. I would point her to the Crown Princess of Germany, who is ever on the alert to keep her Royal husband before the public; but women are, at time, to blame for the many poor representatives who govern.

The Everett Branch

THE Everett Branch of the West Simcoe Women's Institute now numbers twenty-seven members, with a prospect of two or three more being added in the near future. Meetings are held the second Thursday of each month at the members' homes, tea being served at the close of the meeting. These meetings are purely informal and social, and while it is not always possible for every member to attend, yet it is an established fact that every member tries not to miss a meeting because they are always so enjoyable. We have given the traveling library a trial, and are very much pleased with it.

For the social time of our Institute we always hold a fowl supper every fall, which is looked forward to with great interest. I am enclosing an account of our fowl supper, which took place some time ago.

A very pleasant evening was spent at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Sallons, when the members of the Everett branch of the Women's Institute held their annual fowl supper. Each member had the privilege of bringing with her the husband, brother, or "gentleman friend."

At 7.30 o'clock about forty-five assembled guests sat down to a most sumptuous repast. After everyone had done ample justice to the many good things they were invited into the cozy parlors, where they were entertained in a pleasing manner. A button-hole contest among the gentlemen was of special interest.

Mrs. Mitchell and Mrs. McAlpine were appointed to judge the work. Mr. George Peacock won first prize and Mr. Mitchell the booby prize, although it must be said that Mr. Mitchell exceeded all the rest of the gentlemen in speed. Following this, a programme was given, Mr. Robert Crosbie making a very efficent chairman. Messrs. Herbert and William Wilkinson gave several vocal solos, which were very much enjoyed. Our president, Mrs. Herbert Ludlow, gave a humorous reading, entitled "Lodge Night," which was very amusing, and a reading by Mrs. McAlpine on "Mose and Lize's Courtship," was also very much appreciated. Miss Maud Patton and Miss Clara Ruthven contributed to the evening's enjoyment by rendering several instrumental solos. Mr. H. Gilbert, of Mansfield, gave an interesting talk on his trip to Cuba, citing many amusing incidents. Short speeches by the following gentlemen were also given: Messrs. H. Ludlow, H. Magill, W. A. Ruthven, W. McCrae and R. Sallons.

A pleasing feature of the evening was, its being the anniversary of Mrs. Sallons' birthday.

A hearty vote of thanks was extended to our host and hostess for their hospitality and their kindness in opening their home on this occasion, and we hope we shall have the pleasure of spending together with Mrs. Sallons many more happy birthdays. The social evening was brought to a close by

TAKE IT FROM US
A
De Laval Cream Separator

And you will get efficiency, durability, convenience and general perfection.

Send for list of prominent users and handsome catalog.

Agents everywhere.

The De Laval Separator Co.
173-177 Williams St.
MONTREAL
VANCOUVER—WINNIPEG

You've thought about trying PURITY FLOUR Now Act!!

FOR some time there has dwelt in your mind the thought of trying PURITY FLOUR—the flour that consists wholly of the high-grade portions of the best Western hard wheat.

That's a good thought. It indicates a desire for improvement in your baking-talent—an ambition to increase the deliciousness of your bread and pastry.

Don't let that good thought perish. Turn on your will power. ACT ! !

PURITY FLOUR

"More bread and better bread"

REMINDER: On account of the extra strength and extra quality of PURITY FLOUR, best pastry-results are obtained by adding more shortening than is necessary when using the ordinary Ontario or blended flours. Also add more water when making bread.

Add PURITY FLOUR to your grocery list right now

108

BEETHAM'S La-rola

La-rola is a perfect emollient milk quickly absorbed by the skin leaving no trace of grease or stickiness after use. Allaying and soothing all forms of irritation caused by frost, cold winds and hard water it not only preserves the skin but beautifies the complexion, making it SOFT, SMOOTH AND WHITE, LIKE THE PETALS OF THE LILY.

The daily use of La-rola effectually prevents all redness, roughness, irritation and chaps. and gives a resisting power to the skin in changeable weather. Delightfully soothing and refreshing after Motoring, Golfing, Skating, Cycling, Dancing, etc.

Men will find it wonderfully soothing if applied after shaving. Ask your Chemist for it.

M. BEETHAM & SON - - - CHELTENHAM, Eng.

Canadian Home Journal Patterns—12 cts. each, are the simplest to use.

all heartily singing "Auld Lang Syne," after which all returned to their homes feeling that a very enjoyable evening had been spent with the members of the Institute.

Better Farming Special

THE Canadian Pacific Railway has placed a train at the disposal of the Ontario Department of Agriculture for the purpose of giving instruction to the farmers along its lines throughout Ontario.

The train will consist of four baggage cars and three coaches, to be used for lecture purposes. The former will be equipped with exhibits covering:

Fruit Growing—Samples of fruit nursery stock, mounted specimens of insects and fungus pests, spraying apparatus and mixtures, tools for pruning, packing outfits, sample fruit barrels, boxes and baskets.

Live Stock—Bones showing blemishes in horses, diseased tissues of horses and cattle, models of horses' teeth, hind legs, feet, tuberculosis specimens, common veterinary instruments.

Field Husbandry—Samples of oats, wheat, barley, peas, grasses, clovers, corn, potatoes, germination tests, effects of seed selection, weeds and weed seeds.

Drainage—Leveling instruments, tools, tile, soil samples, charts showing beneficial effects of drainage and proper cultivation, etc.

Dairying—Pails, strainers, churn, butter worker, Babcock tester, cooling equipment, samples showing effect of dirt in milk, samples of cheese, butter, boxes, paper.

Feeds—Bran, shorts, milkfeed, cotton seed, linseed meal, oilcake, alfalfa meal.

Poultry—Model poultry houses and appliances, incubators and brooders, egg cases, apparatus for candling eggs, feeds, trap nests, feeding troughs, etc.

Bee-keeping—Hives, appliances, honey, charts.

Fertilizers — Commercial fertilizers, charts showing results.

Concrete—Blocks, bricks, tile, etc., method of testing, moulds.

The growing of suitable crops for the feeding of live stock, dairy cattle, beef cattle, horses, pigs, etc., will be duly considered, and samples of foodstuffs that are offered for sale upon the Canadian market will be on exhibition, with analysis attached. The places to be visited and the time at which the train will reach each place is given on the last page.

Immediately upon arrival of the train lectures will begin in three lecture coaches. Those in attendance will then be given an opportunity to examine and hear explanations of the exhibits in the four baggage cars.

Lectures at each point will be so arranged as to best suit the requirements and possibilities of the locality. Every farmer, no matter what branch he may be specializing in, will find something of interest and value in both lectures and exhibits.

One lecture coach will be reserved for the women, boys and girls; and lectures on poultry raising, bee-keeping, growing of small fruits, etc., will be given for their benefit.

There will be a staff of from ten to fifteen lecturers and demonstrators with the train, as well as representatives of the C.P.R. Such men as Professors C. A. Zavitz, G. E. Day, R. Harcourt and W. H. Day, find it difficult to leave their work at the Agricultural College, but have been secured for a portion of the trip. The farmers cannot spend two or three hours more profitably than by taking advantage of the demonstrations and lectures to be given by these and other men on the Better Farming Special. P. W. Hodgetts, Director of the Fruit Branch; L. Caesar, of the Agricultural College; Frank Herns, Chief Instructor for Western Ontario; some of our most experienced Institute workers, district representatives of the Department of Agriculture for Essex, Lambton, Waterloo, Grey, Dufferin, Ontario, Hastings, Peterboro, Lanark, Dundas, etc., as well as other men who are giving special attention to some particular branch of agricultural work, will accompany the train, some for only two or three days, others for a greater portion of the trip.

This is an exceptional opportunity to get valuable information along agricultural lines.

The farmers should show their appreciation of the liberality of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Provincial Department of Agriculture by attending in large numbers. Every person (men, women and boys) will be made welcome at the exhibits and lectures. It is to be hoped that Institute members will invite their friends and neighbors to accompany them.

List of Places

Monday, Feb. 26—St. Joachim, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Windsor, 1 p.m. to 3.30 p.m.; Elmstead, 4 p.m. to 6.30 p.m.

Tuesday, Feb. 27—Tilbury, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Chatham, 12.45 p.m. to 3.15 p.m.; Kent Bridge, 4 p.m. to 6.30 p.m.

Wednesday, Feb. 28—North Bothwell, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; North Glencoe, 1 p.m. to 3.30 p.m.; Caradoc, 4 p.m. to 6.30 p.m.

Thursday, Feb. 29—Hyde Park, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Thamesford, 1 p.m. to 3.30 p.m.; Woodstock, 4 p.m. to 6.30 p.m.

Friday, March 1—Belmont, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Tillsonburg, 1 p.m. to 3.30 p.m.; Ingersoll, 4.15 to 6.45 p.m.

Saturday, March 22—Drumbo, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Galt, 12.45 p.m. to 3.15 p.m.; Milton, 4.15 p.m. to 7.00 p.m.

Monday, March 4—Moffatt, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Elmira, 1 p.m. to 3.30 p.m.; Milverton, 4.30 p.m. to 7 p.m.

Tuesday, March 5—Goderich, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Blyth, 1 p.m. to 3.30 p.m.; McNaught, 4 p.m. to 6.30 p.m.

Wednesday, March 6—Streetsville, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Brampton, 12.45 p.m. to 3.15 p.m.; Cataract Junction, 4 p.m. to 6.30 p.m.

Thursday, March 7—Orangeville, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Shelburne, 1 p.m. to 3.30 p.m.; Dundalk, 4 p.m. to 6.30 p.m.

Friday, March 8—Chatsworth, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Markdale, 1 p.m. to 3.30 p.m.; Flesherton, 4 p.m. to 6.30 p.m.

Saturday, March 9—Bolton, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Woodbridge, 1 p.m. to 3.30 p.m.

Monday, March 11—Agincourt, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Claremont, 1 p.m. to 3.30 p.m.; Myrtle, 4 p.m. to 6.30 p.m.

Tuesday, March 12—Pontypool, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Peterboro, 12.45 p.m. to 3.15 p.m.; Norwood, 4 p.m. to 6.30 p.m.

Wednesday, March 13—Ivanhoe, 8.30 a.m. to 10.30 a.m.; Tweed, 11 a.m. to 1 p.m.; Sharbot Lake, 3.30 p.m. to 6 p.m.

Thursday, March 14—Perth, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Smith's Falls, 1 p.m. to 3.30 p.m.; Carleton Place, 4.30 p.m. to 7 p.m.

Friday, March 15—Merrickville, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Mountain, 1 p.m. to 3.30 p.m.; Winchester, 4 p.m. to 6.30 p.m.

Saturday, March 16—Finch, 9 a.m. to 11.30 a.m.; Apple Hill, 1 p.m. to 3.30 p.m.

Demonstration Lecture Course

THOSE who attended the annual convention of the Ontario Women's Institutes held in Toronto on November 15th and 16th, 1911, will remember the report on a series of lectures and demonstrations given to a group of six Institutes in Haldimand County and adjoining districts.

Several who had taken advantage of the instruction given spoke very enthusiastically of the work, and expressed the hope that some method would be adopted whereby the advantage of a regular series of lectures, extending over a period of fifteen or sixteen weeks, would be given to many of our Institutes.

The Institutes' Branch undertook to finance the trial course referred to above, whereby each of the Institutes concerned (six in number) agreed to secure twenty-five members, and as many more as possible, to pay $1.00 each for the course of lectures. The Department agreed to become responsible for additional outlay required to cover the salaries and expenses of the lecturer. The Institutes concerned were required to furnish a suitable place in which to hold the lectures, and to furnish the supplies required for the demonstrations. This cost was not very great in any case.

The net cost to the Department is considerable, and at the present time, such a liberal offer cannot be repeated. The Department is prepared, however, to assist in organizing similar work in other localities. It will be necessary, therefore, for the Institutes concerned to guarantee at least twenty-five students at $2.00 each at each of five or six places conveniently located. Those who take advantage of occasional lectures will be required to pay 20 cents per lecture. The guarantee will, therefore, be $50.00 from each Institute tak-

Politeness —AND— Attention —TO—

HAMILTON
NIAGARA FALLS
BUFFALO
NEW YORK
BOSTON
WASHINGTON
ATLANTIC CITY
DETROIT
CHICAGO
ST. PAUL
TOLEDO
CLEVELAND
CINCINNATTI
ST. LOUIS
KANSAS CITY
OMAHA
SALT LAKE
DENVER
SAN FRANCISCO
LOS ANGELES

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

CANADA'S GREATEST HIGHWAY

Comfort —AND— Fast Time —TO—

WINNIPEG
SASKATOON
EDMONTON REGINA BRANDON
CALGARY
BANFF
LAGGAN
NELSON
ROSSLAND
SPOKANE
VANCOUVER
VICTORIA
SEATTLE
TACOMA
PORTLAND
CHINA
JAPAN AUSTRALIA

UNEXCELLED TRAIN SERVICE

Taking into consideration the magnificent equipment supplied by the Canadian Pacific, even at full tariff rates, every day is a bargain day for the traveling public. The new compartment cars recently put into service between Toronto and Ottawa, and Toronto and Montreal, on trains leaving North Toronto at 10 p.m. daily, in addition to the electric lighted sleeping cars, also operated on this train, make it second to none on the continent. The compartment cars have a style all their own, being the latest in construction and appointment. They are electric lighted throughout; absolute privacy is assured: individual toilet requisites, etc.

PALATIAL HOTELS

Chateau Frontenac—Quebec
Algonquin—St. Andrews N.B.
McAdam Station Hotel
Royal Alexandra—Winnipeg
Mount Stephen House
Glacier House
Kootenay Lake Hotel
Fraser Canon House
Place Viger—Montreal
Banff Springs Hotel
Caledonia Springs Hotel
Chateau Lake Louise
Emerald Lake Chalet
Hotel Revelstoke
Hotel Sicamous
Hotel Vancouver
Empress Hotel—Victoria

FLOATING PALACES

BETWEEN CANADA, LIVERPOOL, LONDON AND ANTWERP.

TO CHINA, JAPAN, HAWAII AND AUSTRALIA

TO ALASKA, BRITISH COLUMBIA COAST AND PUGET SOUND POINTS.

TO KOOTENAY AND OKANOGAN POINTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

M. G. MURPHY, District Passenger Agent, 16 King Street East, TORONTO

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

ing advantage of the work, and one-half of the receipts above this amount must be paid towards the lecturer's salary and expenses.

Branches which think favorably of the above proposition, should communicate with surrounding branches and ascertain whether or not a group of five or six Institutes can be secured. As soon as they are in a position to make a definite proposition it would be well to write to the superintendent.

While the above is the best offer which can be made at the present time, we are in hopes that some method will be provided through the co-operation of the Departments of Education and Agriculture, whereby instruction in domestic science will be given to Women's Institutes at a nominal cost. The whole question is now being considered by the departments concerned.

More About Homemakers

MISS ISABEL C. ARMSTRONG, editor of the Woman's Page in the Regina Leader, has a pleasant paragraph or two in the issue of that paper of January 6th. This is rather late to quote, but it is better now than never.

Our Homemakers' Department is making a very good start for the New Year. This week, we have reports from a number of the clubs that have not been heard from for some time, and all are most encouraging. The editor is very grateful for kind letters received during the past few days, containing appreciative reference to this particular corner. Were it not for the unfailing support and the interest taken by many of the club members, it would not be possible to continue it. We believe it has, in some measure, fulfilled a mission since inaugurated last April, but we have larger ambitions for the coming year. We want it to keep pace with the growth of the movement and to have each and every club in the province regularly represented by reports, helpful suggestions, recipes, papers and other notes of interest from club members. We look to the secretaries for reports and are doubly grateful when these are forwarded as soon after meetings as possible. We want each and every homemaker who is a reader at some time also to become a contributor—if only by asking a question—and to feel that this particular corner is as much her own as the house she calls her home.

To be a faithful and loyal worker in the ranks frequently bespeaks a much finer spirit than to live up to the obligations of office. The responsibilities of position demand effort in order to retain self-respect, the respect of others. In the ranks one may be indifferent or a shirker with apparently only loss to self. Letters received from some of the presidents testify in glowing terms to the loyalty, the unselfishness and faithfulness of the untitled members of their clubs. One president, who has been honored with a second term, writes: "I think I am especially favored with members, the best, or one of the best lot of women to work with. Although I was green as grass and did not know anything about that kind of work—always making blunders, and still do—they have been so patient and kind that it has been a great pleasure to me to attend the meetings. I do hope all presidents have as good members as I have."

FARM OF MR. A. E. GRAY, KENVILLE, MANITOBA

No homemaker can fail to be interested in the year's history of the Pense Club, as delightfully narrated by Mrs. Hugh McGillivray. All the clubs have not been able to achieve so much as this flourishing one, but each club has done something that might prove helpful in the way of suggestion to other clubs. Can't we have more of these stories in brief of the first year's efforts? Perhaps your club is only a few weeks old, but, according to instructions issued by the extension department of the College of Agriculture, you are beginning a new year. Let us hear what you have done and what you propose doing.

A report of the Mayfield Club, kindly forwarded by Mrs. A. Perry, was accompanied by her own recipe for compote of apples, which sounds delicious, as it no doubt tastes. The following is Mrs. Perry's compote: Take about 14 or 16 medium-sized apples, 1 pound of loaf sugar, 1 pint of water and 1 lemon. Peel the apples very thinly, remove the cores carefully with a fruit cutter. Put the sugar and water into an enameled stew pan and boil until it forms rather thick syrup; add the lemon rind cut into very tiny, thin strips, about an inch long, and the strained juice of the same. Put the apples in and let them simmer till tender, then take them out carefully, drain them on a sieve and reduce the syrup by boiling quickly for a few minutes, or until it is a thick syrup. When both are cold, arrange the apples neatly on a glass dish, pour over the syrup and garnish with strips of green angelica, cut the same as the lemons, over the tops of each apple. A preserved or crystalized cherry on the top of each adds to the appearance. These apples look very pretty and dainty with good whipped cream in the centre of the dish and the apples arranged around it.

The topic for discussion at the last meeting of the Maryfield Club was: "Apples: Various Ways of Cooking and Preserving them." Recipes for preserves, pies and puddings were supplied by several of the members, and a number of these have been kindly promised for this department.

An earnest club worker speaks with enthusiasm of the pamphlets being sent out by the Extension Department of the College of Agriculture. She writes: "The monthly pamphlets which are being sent out to us by the Extension Department are splendid helps, and give us new ideas, aiding us greatly."

On Friendship

A BRIEF article on this subject by Mrs. Earley, of Annen, North Grey, is as follows:

What is friendship? Friendship is intimacy united with affection, and where there is affection there must be sympathy. George Moore says sympathy is the grandest word in the world. It overcomes evil and strengthens good. It disarms resistance, melts the hardest hearts, and draws out the better part of human nature. Often we can show our friendship by a smile and a warm handshake. It was only a helping hand, and it seemed of little avail. But its clasp was warm and it saved from harm a brother whose strength was failing.

Do not refrain from doing your own little because you cannot do the much of some one else. To women more than men there is a danger of becoming narrow, and we get narrow when we live only to ourselves. All honor to the women who make good housekeepers and good homemakers, for you cannot be a good homemaker unless you are a good housekeeper. It's a good thing to have a nice home. It's good to have money, and the things money can buy, but it is good, too, to check up once in a while, and make sure you haven't lost the things money cannot buy.

We were not brought into this world to live to ourselves. We are all to do what we can to help others. If you cannot do a kind deed speak a kind word, if you cannot speak a kind word think a kind thought. Be not simply good, be good for something. Drummond says: "The world delights in friendly, sunny people." The old are hungering for love more than bread. There is no anodyne for heart sorrow like ministering unto others.

Dainty, Disappearing Doughnuts.
Devoured near as fast as you make 'em.
Golden — tooth-teasing — able-bodied nuts of dough.
Made from dough that Tastes Like Nuts, you know.
Use FIVE ROSES flour.
Get that individual toothsomeness of Manitoba wheat kernels.
Doughnuts with a Palate-Pleasing Personality.
See 'em bob up in the rich deep fat—swelling, soft-textured.
A hole entirely circled with Light Digestible Food.
Fat without being fat—for FIVE ROSES is the sturdy glutinous flour that resists fat absorption.
Just enough to brown deliciously, to crisp quickly.
No greasiness, heaviness, sogginess.
Filling a vacant place so pleasantly with never an outraged stomach.
Like these make YOURS.
Use FIVE ROSES.
8

Five Roses Flour

Not Bleached Not Blended

LAKE OF THE WOODS MILLING COMPANY, LIMITED MONTREAL

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Royal Vinolia Soap

SUPREME IN QUALITY, PURITY AND FRAGRANCE. CONTAINS NO ANIMAL FAT. YIELDS AN EXQUISITELY SOFT AND LUXURIOUS LATHER, SOOTHING AND BENEFICIAL TO THE SKIN.

THE MATERIALS FROM WHICH WE MAKE ROYAL VINOLIA SOAP ARE WHOLLY VEGETABLE—A WHITE CAKE OF REFINED AND BEAUTIFUL DESIGN. NOTHING QUITE LIKE IT HAS BEEN PRODUCED BEFORE.

Price 15c. a cake, or 3 cakes in exquisite carton for 35c.
SOLD BY ALL GOOD DRUGGISTS.

VINOLIA COMPANY LIMITED BY APPOINTMENT Soapmakers to H.M. The King LONDON, PARIS TORONTO

128

A trial will prove their Quality and Efficiency

These toilet necessities are noted for their purity. This special offer is made in order that you may test them and prove their value without expense.

DAGGETT & RAMSDELL'S PERFECT COLD CREAM

A skin food, rich in tissue-building properties. A daily massage will remove impurities, banish wrinkles, and give the beautiful glow of health to your skin.

PALMER'S HAIR TONIC

50c and $1.00 sizes. thoroughly cleanses and invigorates the roots of the hair. It will then be soft and lustrous because it will be healthy.

LUSTR-ITE NAIL ENAMEL

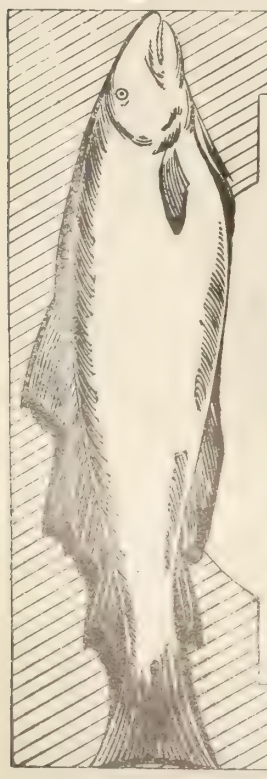
makes the care of your nails a simple and pleasant task. It contains no pumice or grit and imparts a brilliant, lasting polish.

All of the above may be had at most stores that sell toilet requisites.

Special Offer

For six cents (6c) in stamps (to defray packing and postage) we will send you a sample package of Daggett & Ramsdell's Perfect Cold Cream and Lustr-ite Nail Preparations, together with booklets containing information of great interest to every woman.

J. PALMER & SON, Limited
5 & 9 De Bresoles St., Montreal



NA-DRU-CO Tasteless Cod Liver Oil Compound

There is no question as to the very high value of Cod Liver Oil, properly prepared and made digestible, as a "builder-up" for convalescents or those who are run-down.

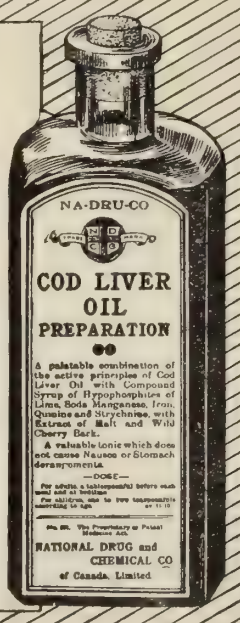
Na-Dru-Co Tasteless Compound contains the valuable properties of the Cod Liver Oil without its disagreeable flavor. In fact, this preparation is decidedly pleasant to the taste. With Extract of Malt, Extract of Wild Cherry, and Hypophosphites of Lime, Soda, Potassium, Manganese and Iron added, it makes a combination that puts an edge on the appetite—aids digestion—invigorates the nerves—relieves and helps to cure affections of the throat and lungs — and generally builds up strength and restores health.

For puny, delicate children there is probably no better "builder-up" than Na-Dru-Co Tasteless Cod Liver Oil Compound. 102

NA-DRU-CO TRADE MARK N D & C Co

FOR EVERY AILMENT THERE'S A NA-DRU-CO SPECIFIC BEARING THIS TRADE MARK. SEE THAT YOU GET IT

National Drug and Chemical Co. OF CANADA LIMITED.



For daintiness in design and simplicity of style Canadian Home Journal Patterns Lead.

They mend all leaks in all utensils—tin, brass, copper, graniteware, hot water bags, etc. No solder cement or rivet. Anyone can use them; fit any surface, two million in use. Send for sample pkg., 10c. COMPLETE PACKAGE ASSORTED SIZES, 25c., POSTPAID. Agents wanted.
Collette Mfg. Co., Dept. D Collingwood, Ont.

125 Egg Incubator and Brooder BOTH FOR $10
If ordered together.

Freight paid east of Rockies. Hot water, copper tanks, double walls, double glass doors. Free catalog describes them. Send for it today.

(11)

Wisconsin Incubator Co.,
Box 79 Racine, Wis.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Canadian Girls' Club

CONSTITUTION AND BY-LAWS

Sec. 1.—We will do our best to make the JOURNAL known to every acquaintance.

Sec. 2.—We will earn as much money as we can for ourselves while we are helping the JOURNAL.

Sec. 3.—We will endeavor to make this an organization of the most successful, most enthusiastic girls' club in Canada.

Sec. 4.—There shall be no age limit nor matrimonial restrictions. All workers will be welcome.

Dear C. G. C. Members:

We want you always to remember the Girls' Club. Now how were we to accomplish that when the money you earn is so quickly spent and the things it purchases are so soon gone? So we needed a permanent souvenir. After thinking over many different things we finally decided that nothing would give more satisfaction and practical service than a watch.

You cannot help liking the dainty little sterling silver timekeeper that we have selected; it is a beauty. It will keep fine time, too, for its internal workings are many jeweled and of high quality. On the back your initials will be engraved, in monogram. Our artist designs most beautiful ones.

This watch is entirely additional to all the regular commissions and bonus as given on the latest schedules. Doesn't that sound important, "schedules"? And this schedule certainly is important to our members. Each subscription pays so much, and then the bonus—why, the bonus is a joy in itself. It increases mighty fast, too, for each few additional subscriptions. That schedule certainly is a surprise to the new members when they first receive it.

THE GIRLS' CLUB WATCH

The Reliable Indicator

It doesn't matter how many members there are; we have a watch for each. And each new member who joins the club is a help to the others, for the more widely we can make the Journal known, the easier it is to get subscriptions.

THE NEW CLUB PLAN.

We are always planning ways to make it easier for members of the club to get subscriptions. In our new plan, subscribers who will help you get up a club will get a special rate, and at the same time will help their friends and neighbors to get the special rate.

So I hope that every reader who cares to see the Journal win will write me. Let me tell you about the new club plan; about the money you can earn for yourself. I feel sure that everyone can get a club of ten subscriptions, and I am confident that once you have been interested in the work you will take as great pleasure as I do in seeing your list getting steadily longer.

Dear Secretary,—

I cannot tell you how glad I am that I wrote you, for I am getting lots of enjoyment from the work, as well as earning lots of money. I am so enthusiastic about the JOURNAL, and believe so thoroughly that it should be in every Canadian home that I would have helped even without pay. Each order that I sent in I added up my list, and when it got above fifty I could scarcely do anything else but talk JOURNAL, I was so anxious to pass the hundred mark. Now I am working as hard to reach the next century.

We just need an enthusiastic member like this in every town in the Dominion to make the Journal the most popular magazine in Canada. Will you join us?

Very sincerely,

SECRETARY.

Canadian Girls' Club,
Canadian Home Journal.

Abbey's Effer-vescent Salt

A good stomach and a merry soul are inseparable—lacking which, try Abbey's Salt.

25c and 60c bottle.

Sold everywhere.

80

Webb's

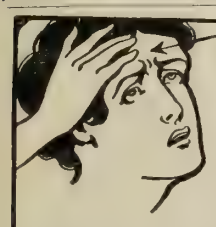
Chocolates

for people who want the best

THE

Harry Webb Co., Limited

TORONTO, CAN.



Why doesn't she take

NA-DRU-CO Headache Wafers ?

They stop a headache promptly, yet do not contain any of the dangerous drugs common in headache tablets. Ask your Druggist about them. 25c. a box.

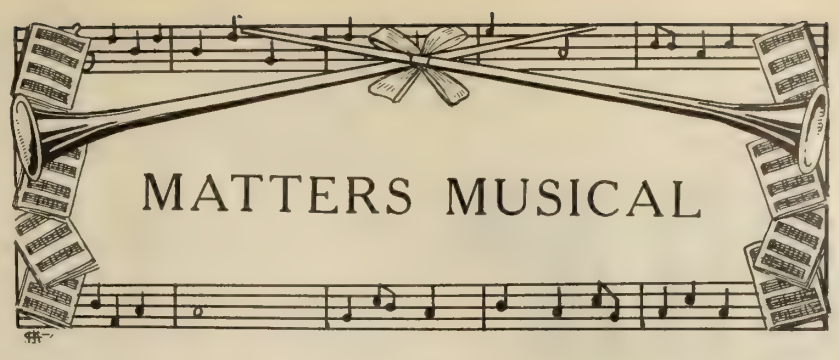
NATIONAL DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO. OF CANADA, LIMITED. 129

H.P. SAUCE

is made in England in the world's largest Malt Vinegar Brewery.

It has a new and delicious flavour, different—quite different—from any other sauce or relish you have ever had before.

All Stores keep H.P. Sauce on their handiest shelf—it saves time—it sells so freely.



EASTER is approaching.

Easter, with its wealth of meaning to the Christian world, and its wondrous story of One risen from the dead, vies with, if indeed it does not surpass, all other events in the world's history.

Poets have written, philosophers have given to the world their great philosophies, and prophets have foretold the future, but it remained for the humble carpenter Jew to rise from the dead. The grave was not strong enough to contain the Spirit of God which had been spoken into the person of man. We trace over again the scene in the garden, the mock trial, the weary trudging along the road to Calvary, with its climax of the cross, and cannot resist the impulse to do homage to Him around Whom the whole scene centered.

Around this event there is woven much of the world's greatest, in art, literature, and music, and it is only natural that much of our Easter music carries a noticeable tone of solemnity. Those in choir work will find among the following many of the most attractive numbers, and we know that much pleasure may be had through study of the same.

For the organ:

"Spring Song"—Mendelssohn.
"Andantino"—Hollins.
"Pastorale"—Archer.
"Contemplation"—Wheeldon.
"Easter Morning"—Mailly.
"Morning Greeting"—Greig.
"March Solennelle"—Mailly.
"Grand Chorus"—Guilmant.
"Hallelujah" Chorus (Messiah)—Handel.

For chorus work:

"As it began to dawn"—Martin, will be found to contain splendid body, well supported by the male voices, and in which the composer works to a very fine climax, using for this purpose Carey's well known Easter hymn.

"Awake thou that sleepest"—Allen, is somewhat similar in weight to the one above and is especially attractive for its strong and pleasing tenor part.

"He is Risen"—Schilling, is somewhat of a general class anthem, with a little more scope for the soloists than the two just named.

"The Magdalene"—Warren. No choir will have a complete Easter repertoire without including this very pleasing chorus.

"Christ is Risen—Turner, is another very appropriate chorus, and "The Heavens are Telling"—Haydn, makes an excellent climax for the Easter day's work.

We might mention a few quartettes and solos suitable for Easter services:

Quartette—
"When morning gilds the skies"—Rompini.
"Come Holy Spirit"—Henrich.
"Since by man came death"—Handel.

Duet—Soprano and alto—
"There is a fountain filled with blood"—Balfe.

Baritone solos—
"The Resurrection"—Shelley.
"The Lord is my light"—Alliston.

Tenor solos—
"Hosanna"—Grainer.
"O Blest Redeemer"—Newton.
"Nailed to the Cross in agony"—Bartlett.

Soprano solos—
"Easter Morn"—Neidlinger.
"I know that my Redeemer liveth"—Handel.

Contralto solos—
"Lift your glad voices"—Holden.
"God shall wipe away all tears"—Sullivan.

Alto solo and chorus—
"Behold they come"—Bartlett.

THE cycle of Mendelssohn Choir concerts, as held in Toronto during the second week of February, added fresh laurels to the honors already won by this champion organization. The audiences of former years were fully equalled, and not an empty seat could be descried at any of the choral events.

The initial concert on Monday night, February 5th, saw the traditional gathering in Massey Music Hall, and it may be said that every member of the audience went away convinced that the Mendelssohn Choir is more complete in equipment and splendid in quality than ever before. Dr. A. S. Vogt, the conductor is as imperturbable and masterly as in the days when he undertook that colossal composition, the Ninth Symphony, and his enthusiasm is unabated in the production of new choral works. On Monday night, such selections as Lotti's "Crucifixus," Gounod's "By Babylon's Wave," and an excerpt from Bach's "Mass in B Minor," already firmly established in popular favor through Mendelssohn Choir efforts, formed the greater part of the programme. "Night Witchery," a chorus for men's voices by Anton Von Storch, proved an exquisite lyric, and "The Nottingham Hunt," by F. F. Bullard, a dashing cavalier song for male chorus, was rendered with such spirit that an encore was demanded. The floral epilogue from "Caractacus" was a magnificent burst of imperial harmony.

On Tuesday night the production of a work novel to Torontonians, Wolf-Ferrari's "The New Life," created general interest, which was heightened by the addition of the children's chorus. The work is a cantata for baritone and soprano solo, chorus, orchestra, organ and pianoforte, and is a musical interpretation of Dante's "La Vita Nuova." It was a most impressive and idealistic performance of a work, intricate in harmony and almost bewildering in emotional transitions. Miss Florence Hinkle, the soprano soloist, and Mr. Clarence Whitehall, the baritone, entered most dramatically into the mediaeval spirit of the composition, and were appreciated by the audience, which showed Toronto's traditional eagerness for repetition. The Berlioz "Te Deum" was the second and not the less interesting number on Tuesday's programme, and was most effectively rendered, with no diminution of dramatic fervor, to the almost overpowering climax.

On Wednesday night the great production of last year, Verdi's "Manzoni Requiem," was repeated, creating an even profounder impression than on its first production. The work of the chorus was superb in tonal quality, which was preserved in distinction and purity, in the most dynamic passages. Miss Hinkle's sympathetic soprano was heard in exquisite clarity; Miss Christine Miller, the mezzo-soprano, Mr. George Hamlin, tenor, and Mr. Clarence Whitehall, were nobly adequate to their parts and the quartette numbers proved the exceptional quality and strength of the assisting artists.

On Thursday night, the programme consisted of excerpts from the programmes of the three previous evenings, and the voices of the choir showed not the slightest flagging in spirit nor faltering in technical perfection. The old Latin poet whose famous dictum was that the art is to conceal the art uttered one of the world's wisest sayings. In the achievements of the Mendelssohn Choir, the hearer realizes the truth of the classic line, for there is no evidence of effort, no sign of the immense and unremitting toil which has gone to the making of "so grave a structure." Dr. Vogt has the satisfaction of having accomplished the unique in our musical annals, and the effect of such work does not die with the echoes of the "Sanctus."

The Theodore Thomas Orchestra, under Mr. Frederick Stark, appeared in all these programmes and impressed the audiences as being more completely equipped than in former years, with a disciplined strength which lent great color to such effects as the climaxes of the Verdi "Requiem" and "Caractacus." Although Toronto is becoming accustomed to advanced orchestral work, the annual visits of this organization are regarded as a great revelation of such achievement, and their educational effect is already apparent. The orchestra matinee performance on Thursday afternoon, with Mr. Josef Lhevinne as piano virtuoso was one of the most brilliant events of the muscial season, and, from Beethoven's "Coriolanus" to the "Tannhauser" overture, the programme was one of varied and memorable charm.

"Best for Baby—best for you."

Baby's Own Soap

Made of specially purified and refined vegetables oils. It will not hurt the most delicate skin.

Refuse all substitutes.

Albert Soaps Limited Mfrs., Montreal. D511

THE WORLD In Colored Post Cards—FREE

We want a chance to cure every stammerer and stutterer. We want their names and addresses and ages as near as you know them. Send us all you know and we will mail you, free of all charge, a series of 25 wonderful colored post cards illustrating a trip around the world. Splendid for your album or to mail to your friends. At the same time you'll be doing a good turn to the sufferers whose names you send us. Send the list to-day to 10b

The Arnott Institute, Berlin, Ont. Can

IF YOU CARRY A

"SWAN"

FOUNT-PEN

you are always ready to "jot it down." The "Swan" has no intricate or delicate parts—consequently it never gets out of order, and is always ready to write without adjusting or coaxing. Good for a lifetime. Sold by Stationers. $2.50 upwards.

CATALOGUE FREE

MABIE, TODD & CO.
124 York St., Toronto
London New York Chicago

WINDSOR TABLE SALT

"Windsor Table Salt is the salt for us. We pay our money for good salt—made right here in Canada—that every one knows is absolutely pure.

We certainly won't pay fancy prices for an imported salt with a fancy name."

Windsor salt is all salt—pure, dry, dissolves instantly, and lends a delicious flavor to every dish.

IT'S WINDSOR 15

"IMITATIONS ABOUND."

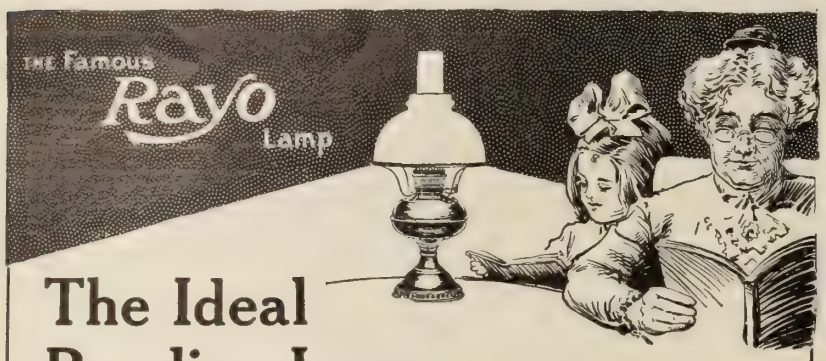
Be on the alert. Don't accept a substitute for "SALADA" simply becausc it leaves your dealer a larger profit. Demand

"SALADA"

CEYLON TEA

011

And you get the genuine unadulterated, unpainted, undoctored article.



The Ideal Reading Lamp

Opticians agree that the light from a good oil lamp is easier on the eyes than any other artificial light.

The Rayo Lamp is the best oil lamp made.

It gives a strong, yet soft, white light, and it never flickers. It preserves the eyesight of the young; it helps and quickens that of the old.

You can pay $5, $10, or $20 for other lamps, but you cannot get better light than the low priced Rayo gives.

Made of solid brass, nickel-plated. Easily lighted without removing shade or chimney. Easy to clean and rewick.

Dealers everywhere; or write for descriptive circular direct to any agency of

The Imperial Oil Co., Limited The Queen City Oil Co., Limited

A Monumental Work

The Canadian Men and Women of the Time

A Handbook of Canadian Biography of Living Characters

—Edited by—

HENRY J. MORGAN, M. A., LL.D., D. C. L., F. R. S. C.

Second Edition, Cloth, with frontispieces, over 1200 pages.

PRICE, $4.00 NET, POSTPAID

This work is indispensable to all Canadians who wish to keep in touch with the men and women of the time who are making history.

A Strong Story written by A Master Hand

Every Protestant Will Read this Striking Story

Every Roman Catholic Should Read it as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" won victory for the slaves, so "The Lad Felix" will win victory for those who are ground under the heel of ecclesiastical tyranny.

The Lad Felix

A TRAGEDY OF THE NE TEMERE

by HENRY MILNER

Cloth, illustrated, $1.25, postpaid

For Sale Wherever Books Are Sold or From

William Briggs

Publisher -:- 29-37 Richmond St. W. -:- Toronto, Ont.

DYEING AT HOME

WE wonder how many of our readers have considered the economy of "Home Dyeing." Until a few years ago, this was quite an undertaking for the average woman to accomplish at home. The majority of the dyeing was sent to professional dyers. But in the last few years dyes have been discovered which make it a very easy process.

Manufacturers of dyes have now "got it down so fine" that the woman does not have to know whether her goods are wool, cotton, silk or mixed. The best dyes on the market color any fabric perfectly with the same dye, thus doing away with all chance of making a mistake in the kind of cloth that they have to color. It has become more and more difficult to tell of what fabrics are made. The so-called "all wool" very often has a thread or two of cotton in it. Material known as pure cotton is often a mixture of wool and cotton. Silk is very often nothing more than a cotton specially prepared. Now these improved dyes do away with all chance of making a mistake in one's goods.

The old style of dyes were decidedly inconvenient in the matter of distributing "color," as they left the hands, floor and utensils very much stained after the dyeing process. The new or improved dyes are a great advance, in the matter of cleanliness, on the old ones. The drug dealer can advise you as to what dye to get, if you tell him the original color of the goods and the new tint desired. The up-to-date manufacturers of these special dyes now have the information for druggists on the back of the color cards. Before purchasing dyes, have the goods weighed when they are dry, and use about a package to a pound of goods. If the article to be dyed is of a dark shade, it will not require so much dye as if it were white or of a very light color. After procuring the dye, all that is required is a little common table salt, water enough to cover the goods, and heat enough to bring it to a boil. There is a special direction book in every package of dye; so that the amateur need not be at all afraid of making an attempt at home dyeing.

Years ago, one sometimes heard the remark. "Oh, I've had my old dress dyed, and it's simply ruined," or "I would not have it dyed, if I were you. The stuff is sure to come off on everything." This was the verdict on poor and cheap dyes, which were too often a sad disappointment to those who expected to see an old garment made new or "different." The scientific advance in the manufacture of dyes has changed all that, and the modern woman need not hesitate to try the experiment of dyeing material which has become soiled or no longer useful in its present hue.

A white gown may become a delightful new garment in reseda, rose or Alice blue—and no one be any the wiser, as to the method which evolved another dress for the wardrobe. The fashion which has recently obtained of using lace or fringe as trimming, in the same shade as the material of the gown, is to be in vogue for some time. The woman who wishes to have mauve, pink or brown lace can easily supply herself with such trimming by dyeing old lace the desired shade. In fact, the possibilities of renovation and re-decoration with the latest dyes appear to be unbounded. It is far better to dye old white lace which has become discolored by continual washing, rather than employ a strong soap, which must necessarily contain strong sodas, in order to bleach it. The best colors are ecru, canary and cream.

You know how children dread to wear any article which has been "handed down." Now, if you wish to make a dress for Dorothy, aged twelve, out of a gown which Ethel, aged sixteen, has outgrown, do not try to adapt it without making an alteration in color. When the material is ripped up, cleaned, dyed and remade, Dorothy will be quite content to wear what is practically a new gown, and will have no fear that the other girls will utter sneers concerning those who wear their sister's old clothes.

In the five illustrations shown on this page, you have the steps in satisfactory renovation. In the first, they are trying to tell whether the article they want to dye is made of wool, cotton, silk or mixed goods. They know if they make a mistake their dyeing will be a failure. Then the housewife hears about the Improved Dye that is guaranteed to color either wool, cotton, silk or mixed goods perfectly with the same dye. She buys a package, and is seen using the stove to bring the mixture to the proper temperature. Then she hangs the new garments up to dry, rejoicing in their fresh appearance. While she is pressing the goods, she is singing the praises of the new dyes, and finally, when we see her in the clothes she has dyed herself, she is radiant with satisfaction over "a perfectly good suit."

Taffeta Frocks

SHOT taffeta frocks with just such lingerie fichus as our grandmothers wore and with flowers tucked into the belt in just the way they had their portraits painted are the most beloved of all the wardrobe for girls and young women this season. Such frocks are worn for little house toilets, for the more conventional purposes of luncheons, and even for all sorts of semi-dress afternoon affairs. Of all the separate white blouses for winter suits the wash net is as well liked as any. It is to be found at most moderate prices in the shops with elaborate tuckings which cover front and back.

NAN'S HOME-MADE HATS AND GOWNS

By FLORENCE MEREDITH

NAN had come in to have a nice cosy evening with me. "It's just ages since I've seen you, Nan," I said, as I helped her off with her coat, and then, "Oh, what a perfectly lovely blouse, where did you unearth it?"

Nan glimpsed a little smile. "I don't know about it being perfect," she answered, "and as for it being dear, if you only knew what it cost me. I'm so glad home-made isn't writ large all over it."

"Nan," I actually shook her. "You didn't make it. Oh, do tell me all about it. How did you, why did you, where ——?"

"Now sit down," said Nan, in her quiet little way, "and I'll unfold to you the mysteries of the art of blouse-making. Then you must try and find out for yourself how simple it is. One afternoon," she began, " I ran in to see the Bigelow girls, and they were having a regular sewing-bee, and such pretty things they were making, too. Then I wondered why I had never tried to make my own things, and I determined then and there that I would at least make an attempt. I bought a little tucked shirtwaist pattern, and some pretty dimity muslin, and set to work, and really, dear, I dare not tell you of my struggles with those tucks; but in the end I turned out a blouse that was at least fit to wear. When you start, try one of the dear little plain shirt-waists that are so much worn now. I have made several, and beside having the advantage of being easily made, they always look so neat and pretty.

A PRETTY BLOUSE

In buying your pattern be sure you have your correct bust measure, and mention that in asking for the size, as all other measurements are graded to that, and any difference may be allowed for at the seams. On the envelope in which the pattern comes is clearly printed the amount of material which will be required, in the different widths. The printed directions also give a list of all the sections of the pattern. The first thing to do, dear, is to familiarize yourself thoroughly with your pattern. Chase everybody out of the kitchen, clear off the table, spread out the pattern, and study it, comparing each piece with its corresponding number on the envelope, until you are sure you know just how each one is to be used. Next comes the planning, and then the cutting. Do be accurate in the cutting, as so much depends on it. In putting your blouse together don't be afraid of spending a little time and patience in basting each seam carefully; in fact, baste all parts before stitching, and you will find it will save you a lot of bother and worry. Next comes the fitting and the making of any necessary alterations, and then down to real work. After stitching the shoulder and under-arm seams, put on the neckband, then there will be no danger of the neck edge stretching. The sleeves, of course, will be sewn in plain, you will at least escape the worry of arranging gathers. Then there is the slash in the sleeve to finish, and the cuff to put on, and you will find that this is the most tedious part of the whole making. It will seem to take you an endless time just to baste the little pieces in position, but with a little care you will succeed, and then it will be so much easier next time. This has rather taken the form of a dressmaking lesson," she finished, laughing.

"Oh, it is so good of you to tell me all this," I cried, "and Nan, I'm going to start to-morrow. You'll come and help, won't you?"

"Of course I will," agreed good-natured Nan, "and by the way you didn't know you were also entertaining a milliner unawares, did you? Don't stare so, dear, but just turn your attention to my little Paris creation and tell me if you don't think it a perfect love of a hat. I knew you would, so as a reward I'll tell you how I came to make it. I saw the original in a most exclusive shop, and as I couldn't afford it I decided to try to copy it. After several observing visits I knew it thoroughly, then I bought a buckram shape and some velvet, and such a time as I had draping it into artistic folds. But as soon as I obtained a good effect, I pinned the folds firmly in place until I could catch them with hidden stitches. And the little satin flowers are not nearly so hard to make as one would think."

"Shall you make your Easter bonnet?" I asked, wonderingly.

"To be sure," she replied, "I will most likely buy one of the little close-fitting hats, which will be popular, and will trim it with lace or ribbon. Ribbon is so easily handled, but I will most likely choose the lace, for, as you know, dear, it will be worn this year in abundance on everything, a lace year as it were. Some of the larger hats among some advance styles which I have seen show a facing of Dresden chiffon, finished with cord at the edge, and one dear wee hat had two rows of box-plaited ribbon around the crown, one pink, the other blue, with a vine of pink baby roses between, quite Frenchy."

"I can see you now in the hat, Nan," I said. "I know your heart is set on box-plaitings and trailers of baby roses."

She laughed. "Yes, I will no doubt try it, and if I don't——"

"Nan," I said, solemnly, "don't dare say you won't succeed. You are surely a wonder, but even wonders must eat, you know, and I hear the welcome rattle of dishes in the dining-room, and know that mother has something good for us. Let us forget all about blouses and hats, and go and investigate."

Suitable Hats

A WOMAN should always try, says a Globe writer, to suit her hat to the shape of her face, and this year it should be most easy, if one has the good taste to know what kind of a hat is becoming. There is the right hat for every woman, but they do not often get together.

The line between the tailored hat and the dress hat is more sharply drawn than usual, and so is that between the small and the large hat. You can have your hat to suit your own style, high or low crown, wide of brim if it is more becoming, or close to the head. You can also use your own taste and judgment as to the trimming—a simple feather, cockade or embroidered ornament. Bows, if cleverly posed and inspired in point of color, may serve to trim even the handsomest of afternoon hats. Ostrich plumes are most smart, curled loosely if at all, and not exaggerated willow plumes. Many of the hats, both large and small, have brims faced with contrasting colors. White velvet faces some of the best looking big hats in black or sombre color. It is so soft and becoming to the face. Carlier leads in the toque shape. He is the genius of the small hat, and has no fear of the unpicturesque.

Paneled Oak Walls at the Price of Good Wall Paper!

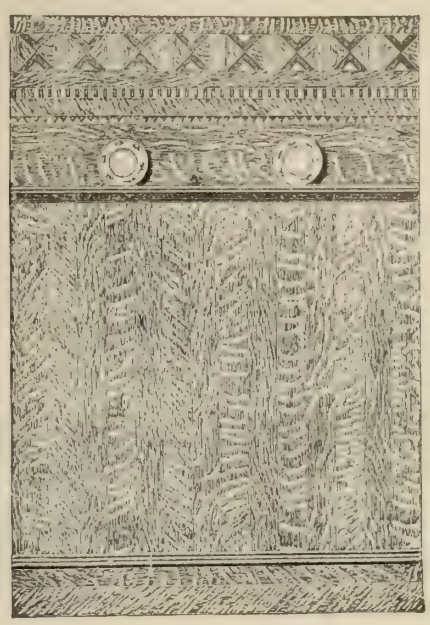

Illustration shows section of dining-room wall with paneled lower (No. 1, Light, or No. 2, Golden) plate rail and parquet design border (No. 13, Light, or No. 14, Golden).

ECONOMY and beauty are perfectly combined in this new material for making your home attractive. You can have your dining-room or library, den, kitchen, bathroom, or hall, as beautiful as you have wished—at the price you have been paying for good wall in oak, either light or golden. This new home luxury can be yours—paper. Imagine your room paneled at so small a price as to seem almost ridiculous.

Fibre Veneer

is an exact reproduction (not imitation) of fine grained oak, manufactured in several panel and parquet patterns. Put up in rolls 36 inches wide by 34 feet long. Fibre Veneer is applied just like wall paper—in fact, more easily—which is still another advantage if you are going to do the work yourself. The Veneer makes a very attractive decoration for walls, and ceilings without using any finish. Being a perfect substitute for hardwood, Fibre Veneer can be used as a border around rugs. Fibre Veneer can be washed like linoleum. After one coat of Orange Shellac, it may be stained or varnished. It is very durable.

Introductory Price only $1.50 per roll, delivered Free at your exp. office.
Send for samples—or order by mail, enclosing remittance.
HUGH S. SILVER & SON - PRESCOTT, Ont.

TO keep on washing clothes the old way is simply to destroy youthfulness and shorten life itself. Why should women do it—since an up-to-date washing machine can change the drudgery of washday into a pleasant pastime? The colored lady knows better.

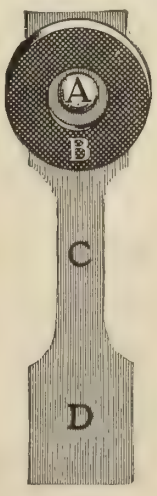
"De washing machine dat can wash moah clo's cleaner in half an hour dan three washerwomen."

The New Century Washing Machine works quickly, easily, and operates far cleaner and more gently than any washerwoman could possibly wash. It gushes the water through the fabric, leaving it fresh, sweet and clean in a few minutes. And it cannot injure the finest, filmiest garments you possess, because it is built right and built to endure.

CUMMER-DOWSWELL Limited
Hamilton, Ontario 2

Don't Doctor Corns With Steel

Don't pare them. That just removes the top layer. It leaves the main part to grow.



A slip of the blade may mean infection. Sometimes a dangerous infection.

This form of home surgery should be ended forever.

A few years ago a chemist invented the B & B wax—the heart of the Blue-jay plaster.

Now you simply apply this plaster. It is done in a jiffy. The pain instantly stops, and the corn is forgotten.

This wonderful wax gently loosens the corn. In two days the whole corn, root and branch, comes out. No soreness, no discomfort.

Please don't doubt it.

Fifty million corns have been removed in this way. Millions of people know it. Just try it yourself and never again will you let corns cause you pain.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

Blue-Jay Corn Plasters

Sold by Druggists—15c. and 25c. per package
Sample Mailed Free. Also Blue-Jay Bunion Plasters (159)

Bauer & Black, Chicago and New York, Makers of B & B Handy Package Absorbent Cotton, etc.

To earn another salary in spare time is not difficult for the local representatives of the Journal. There are many places where we have not a satisfactory representative. Apply to-day. This is a good time to start because WE PAY FOR NAMES in our SAMPLE COPY CAMPAIGN.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, TORONTO

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS

Continued from page 10

overpowering the sense of weakness. She tried to call out sharply—only to find that she could not speak—she was gagged! Thoroughly alarmed now, she tried to raise herself—she could not lift her head an inch from where it lay!

But her hands were free! She could untie the knots, unfasten the gag—after a few moments' frantic effort she found that equally impossible. She could do nothing! She was lying flat upon her back, fastened, not painfully, but securely, to the narrow bed, unable to move, and helpless save for the useless freedom of her hands which could not reach, much less unite a single knot. She knew by feeling that she still wore her rain coat, but her hat had been removed.

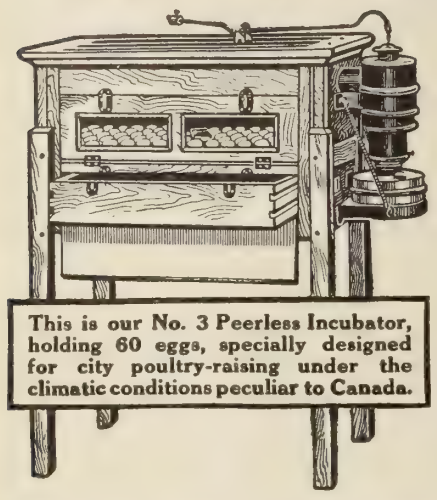
What did it all mean?

Some mistake, perhaps, or was it all a bad dream? She remembered having experienced this helpless feeling in a nightmare. Perhaps she would wake soon? Too tired to struggle any longer, she lay still. The room was not quite dark, as she at first had thought; there was light somewhere—and a murmur of voices. It must be a very vivid dream!

Turning her head slightly, she found that the light came through the open doorway. There was a lamp there, on a table, and seated by the table were the old woman who had pleaded for the sick grandchild, and the man who had been sitting by the stove. With a little painful effort she could see their faces quite plainly. It must have been their voices that she had heard, for they were talking. They spoke in lowered tones, and try as she would, Christine could catch only an occasional word. It seemed that the old woman was demanding something which the man refused. Suddenly he struck the table with his clenched fist and uttered a guttural. "No!" The blow and the sharply-spoken word roused the girl to full wakefulness. She knew that this was no dream. It was terrifying reality. What could it mean? If she could only understand!

Closing her eyes she tried to calm herself; to think out the puzzle. There had been no sick child: she had been lured here and drugged. Yes, that could be the only meaning of the sickly smell, the loss of consciousness, the illness upon waking. But why? And how long had she been here? With a pang of fear she thought of Celia and Ada. How frightened they would be! How Tommy

YOU CAN MAKE POULTRY RAISING PAY IN YOUR OWN BACK-YARD IF YOU WILL ADOPT THE PEERLESS WAY

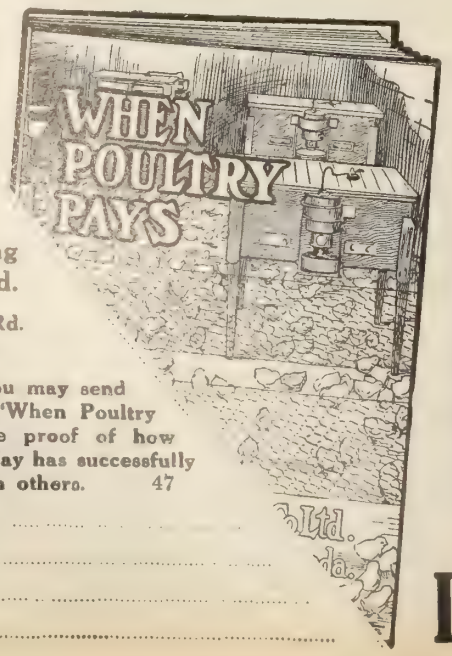


This is our No. 3 Peerless Incubator, holding 60 eggs, specially designed for city poultry-raising under the climatic conditions peculiar to Canada.

RAISING poultry on a city lot or in a backyard can be made far more than merely a fascinating hobby. It can easily be made a mighty profitable business that will bring you in a handsome revenue. At the same time knowledge of how to do it right will make the work doubly interesting. Now all that you need is knowledge—and the right kind of incubator. Yet these two necessities are both within your reach; for, by following the methods of The Peerless Way and adopting the Peerless Incubator, 20,846 Canadian poultry raisers are to-day making big cash profits. Do the same! Make poultry raising both your hobby and a business as well. Ride it as a hobby if you want to—but do more; make it yield you dividends and add to your bank account! You can do it. Remember that twenty thousand successful poultrymen have seen that our experience was worth having and following as operators of the largest and most successful poultry farm in the Dominion, —the Poultry Yards of Canada, Limited, at Pembroke. So they wrote and told us they wanted to raise poultry as we raised it. You can do that too; we have guided these twenty thousand odd successful poultrymen and we are ready to guide you.

This Book Tells About The Practical Solution Of Profitable Poultrying on a City Lot

"WHEN POULTRY PAYS" is a book that tells, by personal letters, what hundreds of followers of The Peerless Way have actually accomplished. It tells about an incubator and brooder especially designed by Canadian experts for city poultry raising in the Canadian climate and about the plans, specifications and blue-prints of poultry houses constructed to meet this country's long, cold winters (after poultry houses actually in use at our own farm), and which form a part of our service in The Peerless Way. "When Poultry Pays" explains just how you can put The Peerless Way to work for you, tells you about an enormous, undersupplied market and gives you full information as to the best way to start. It will show you an unworked field of profit lying in your own back-yard right in the heart of your own town. If you have some spare time in your evenings, a little money and the willingness to follow directions and look after this business, The Peerless Way cannot fail to make money for you. Please bear in mind, however, that this illustrated book has cost money to prepare and publish and is too expensive to distribute haphazard; we send it only on request. If you want it, send us the coupon—



LEE Manufacturing Company, Ltd.

124 Pembroke Rd.
Pembroke, Ont.

Gentlemen:—You may send me your book "When Poultry Pays," and the proof of how The Peerless Way has successfully co-operated with others. 47

Name.....

Address.....

Town.....

Province.....

We Send The Book FREE For The Coupon

There Are Big Profits in Poultrying

TO get the maximum profits out of anything requires experience or knowledge. A bad start may take years to overcome; don't handicap yourself. Use our experience and knowledge instead of purchasing your own through bitter and costly disappointments. The Peerless Way has made smooth the hard road of the beginner and solved his problems before he even knew of their existence. Step by step, we will teach you every detail of The Peerless Way, so that as the business outgrows your back-yard, you can engage in it on as extensive a scale as we do.

It Will Cost You Little To Adopt The Peerless Way

TO start The Peerless Way working and making money for you, will not cost you much money. The principles of this plan are the same on a large or small scale—scientific management. But the cost of proper equipment varies—to start on a city lot in your own back-yard need cost you very little. And as your business grows, its own increases can be made to pay for the extension and yield you handsome profits besides.

Our Poultry Advisory Board Will Teach You

THE Peerless Way teaches our system—complete. But if, at any time, special problems peculiar to you alone, do arise, our Poultry Advisory Board is always at your service free of charge,—not only when you are starting out in business, but to the very last day you are running a Peerless Incubator and following The Peerless Way—ten years hence or even longer! All you need to do is to write and your problems will be investigated individually and answered personally. We stand back of our followers not only in the raising of poultry, but also in turning their poultry and poultry products into revenue producers of the highest type.

We Teach You Co-operative Marketing

THE few extra cents of profit which you might lose through ordinary marketing, cause but a small loss on your total selling price; but they represent a very, very big per cent. of your profits! Our Peerless Co-Operative Marketing Plan will put you in touch with buyers who will take your entire output,—large or small,—at highest, spot-cash, market prices. Or we will show you how you can sell direct to the consumer, or to the special private trade that is always glad to pay higher prices for guaranteed fresh eggs. We will show you how to handle that too. This is merely one more detail of the service offered by The Peerless Way.

Get Into An Under-Supplied Market With Rising Prices

THE rise in prices of both eggs and poultry, during the last few years, will show you that the market must be a tremendous money-maker for someone. Why should not you be among those who are taking the easy profits? You can be as successful as anyone, if you will only let The Peerless Way show you how—if you will follow our methods and devote just a little time and more or less common-sense to the work. Send the coupon and get "When Poultry Pays"; it will tell you more about The Peerless Way.

LEE Manufacturing Co., Ltd. 124 Pembroke Rd. 47 PEMBROKE ONTARIO CANADA

would rage! What terrible catastrophes he would imagine (Tommy was so silly sometimes!) As her senses came back, she felt more angry than frightened at her own plight. The whole thing seemed so foolish, so motiveless. Yet there must be a motive somewhere! The monotonous voices in the other room went on. They must know the motive—perhaps they were talking of it now? With a new incentive, she strained her ears to listen. Yes! either they were talking more loudly or her ears were recovering from the dulling influence of the drug, for she could hear. The man was speaking—

"I tell you we've got to get her out of here to-night."

"I know that, you fool! But it's early yet." (Christine felt relief). "There's no hurry, and there'll never be a better opportunity than now. Haven't I waited long enough for my revenge? I tell you," her voice rose hoarsely, "that I can't wait! What's to be done must be done now—here. The devil knows its safe enough! I tell you I won't wait—"

"You've got to wait! Didn't I tell you at the start—" the man leaned across the table and spoke in lower, but not less forcible tones. Christine could not hear what he said, but could see the effect upon the old harridan who first snarled and then wept and then hoarsely pleaded—all without avail.

There was something which she wanted done, Christine gathered. What, she could not guess, but her sixth sense, now roused to duty, warned her of peril to herself. She found herself praying that the man might hold out—as indeed he seemed very likely to do.

Finally he rose to his feet with an oath. "Enough of this!" he declared. "It's time we got the girl away. She will be less noticed now than later. I'm going to get the cart." Without another word he strode out, slamming the door behind him. The old woman's face was terrible as she watched him go—baffled rage, hate and fear made it hideous; and there was something else! Christine felt her anger chill into fear as she saw it was a something from which all sane people, however brave, must shrink—insanity!

"She's crazy!" gasped Christine. One problem at least seemed solved. Instinctively the girl closed her eyes and pretended to be still unconscious. But her thoughts raced! It did not matter, now, what her plight meant; she put that mystery aside and turned her attention to her present danger. In the other room was a crazy woman bent, for some reason, on doing her harm. She was helpless. She was to be taken away. The man had gone for a cart. When her friends missed her they could not find her. Even if they succeeded in tracing her here, she would be gone. They would not know—unless—unless she could leave something! What?

Danger is a great quickener of wits, and Christine was naturally quick. She realized that a great deal might depend upon leaving a trace of her presence here. But of course her captors would realize it too. They would take precautions! She felt with her free hand in her rain coat pocket—only bottles there. Impossible to leave a bottle. Ah! but the contents?—the acid! It was a bare chance, but worth the taking. The cork was hard to draw, but it was out at last, and stretching as far to the side as she could she poured some of the contents on the blanket. Almost she poured it all—but reflection came in time; she might need it later to leave yet another trace. That the time might come when, in terror of some unknown fate, she might think of this as the deadly poison it was, never entered her head.

In the second pocket of the rain coat there was nothing save the glove which she had taken off as she entered the hovel. It was of light weight silk, dark gray in color and so small and soft that it might be hidden almost anywhere. Very cautiously she felt about the bed with her hands. The mattress was old and torn, but if the glove were missed, it would certainly be searched; the pillow was also out of the question. Moving very painfully she pushed herself nearer the far side of the bed, nearer yet, until her right hand could slip down between it and the wall. She shuddered as she touched the greasy wainscotting, for she could feel its filth upon her finger tips, but fighting down her disgust, she ran her hand carefully along the upper edge. The crevice, though hard to see, was easy to feel. It seemed very small, but there was a chance that it might hide the glove. With trembling fingers Christine pressed it down and in, packing it as tightly as she could. The old woman in the outer room had ceased to mutter and sat sullenly waiting.

The little glove once safely bestowed in the crevice, Christine pushed herself painfully back into her former position—none too soon, for she was still breathing heavily from the effort when the opening of the outer door announced the return of the man.

"Well, is she ready?" he asked roughly. "None of your sulking now or I'll throw up the game—did you give her another dose?"

Another dose? Christine grew cold with fear. If they drugged her again what might not happen! Helpless as she was, she would be doubly helpless then. She lay very still, trying with a terrible effort of will to control the trembling which had seized her.

It seemed, however, that the old woman was afraid of the man in this mood, for she mumbled something which he evidently took for an assent, and together they came in to the room where the girl was lying.

"Where's her hat?" asked the man again. "Look sharp, now, and see that none of the hat pins or fixings are missing. Look and see if her handkerchief's safe and her pocket-book and the bottles she had in her pocket—it won't do to leave so much as a shoe string here."

With sulky haste the woman did his bidding; tying the larger articles securely into a pillow case.

"Where's her gloves?" demanded the man suddenly.

His companion pointed to the glove upon the girl's left hand.

"Where's the other one?"

Christine felt her heart sink. She dared not open her eyes, but she felt that her captors were staring at each other in angry dismay.

"Well, it's got to be found," said the man's voice. "Here, let's get her out to the cart, and then we can search the room. I saw her draw it off as she came in, so it must be somewhere."

Muttering angrily, the old woman bent over the girl. Christine lay very still. A knot was untied, another, and yet another—she was free! No, the man's hand was on her! With a dexterous twist the woman wrapped her skirts tightly around her ankles, and tied them there. "All ready!" she said. The man thrust his arm under her shoulders, and together they lifted the seemingly insensible girl. Christine had the wit to let her arms hang heavily, and to resist the impulse to raise her drooping head. They carried her quickly through the lighted room into the small dark hall, and thence out into the rainy street. Silently, swiftly, she was lifted and laid down upon something hard (the bottom of a cart, she judged). With a wild leap of joy and hope she felt the rain beat down upon her face, and breathed the air, so fresh and clear after the suffocating atmosphere of the room. Oh! If they would only leave her for a moment. Bound thought she was, and unable to make a sound, she might still attract someone's attention by sitting up and using her hands. Now that she could raise her head she might manage to undo the gag! Then she would be safe. Bad though the street was, there would be someone who would listen to a girl's scream. There were people passing by even now, on the pavement. Once she heard the man exchange a surly jest with someone. Oh! if he would only take his heavy hand from her chest. But not even this wild chance was to be hers. The cart had been prepared for her coming, and in less time than it takes to tell it she was fastened as securely to the boards as she had been to the bed. In the agony of realization she forgot her role, and moaned. Instantly the gag was tightened against her mouth.

"She's coming to," muttered the man. "Go you and find the glove. Be quick! If it fell on the floor it may have been gathered up and burned. Make sure—better rake out the ashes."

Again there was silence, save for the occasional rattle of the horse's harness and the swish of the rain. It was very dark, and Christine had no longer need to close her eyes except as a shield from the pelting drops. Presently the man stirred himself, and spread something over her, shutting even the rain out and burying her in a purgatory of ill-smelling cloth and moist old rubber.

Another pedestrian slouched by with a word of greeting; the horse moved impatiently and the man swore. Then Christine heard the muffled slam of a house door and the woman's voice spoke in a whisper close to her.

"It's not there. I've searched everywhere—mattress, bed clothes, pillow, everything. There's no trace in the stove, but it must have been burned."

Again the man swore deeply.

"Don't worry," said the woman. "What I can't find, they can't. The glove's not there. Get in."

Without further words, the two climbed into the cart, which immediately began to move.

(To be continued.)

NO MATTER WHAT COFFEE YOU now drink, it can't cost over a cent a day extra to drink the finest coffee in the land. This is grown from selected seed under the best agricultural conditions.

Seal Brand

PACKED IN ONE AND TWO POUND CANS ONLY

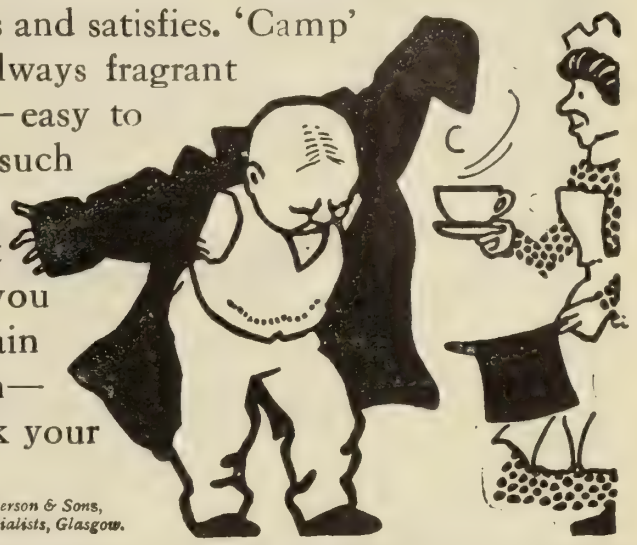
CHASE & SANBORN MONTREAL

130

'CAMP' COFFEE

The Morning Rush!

'CAMP' COFFEE puts things right instantly—it soothes and satisfies. 'Camp' Coffee is always fragrant and fresh—easy to make and such a delicious flavour that once tried you want it again—and again—always. Ask your grocer.



R. Paterson & Sons, Coffee Specialists, Glasgow.

A GREAT SAVING

Doors and Windows tight enough to keep out winter storms—will keep down the cost of fuel.
Write for advice and plans for protecting your home.
Many in your locality are using our system.

CHAMBERLIN METAL WEATHER STRIP CO.
YONGE STREET - - TORONTO, ONT.

Now for a bowl of soup

This cold weather, a plate of steaming hot soup is a warmer to the finger-tips, a rouser of digestions, a finder of appetites and—a bother to make.

But now Edwards' desiccated Soup is here even the bother of making is a thing of the past.

Edwards' Soup comes to you all ready for the saucepan. It's a soup that you'll prefer to your own, just as much as you prefer your own to the ones you taste in a restaurant.

The manufacturers of Edwards' Soup are soup-makers and nothing else. By specialising for over 25 years they have been able to produce an assortment of soups of the highest merit at a price within the reach of all.

Buy a packet of Edwards' Soup to-day.

EDWARDS' DESICCATED SOUP

5c. per packet.

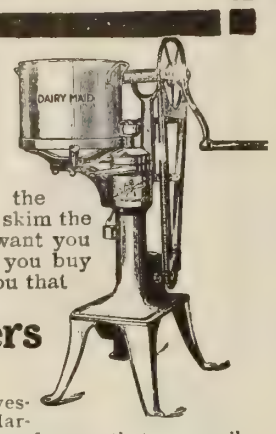
Edwards' desiccated Soup is made in three varieties—Brown, Tomato, White. The Brown variety is a thick, nourishing soup prepared from best beef and fresh vegetables. The other two are purely vegetable soups.

Edwards' desiccated Soup is made in Ireland from specially selected beef and from the finest vegetables that Irish soil can produce.

1204 S.H.B

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Operate Your Dairy For Top Prices



OPERATE your dairy for top prices—and at the same time operate it as economically as possible. Top prices and low expenses mean greatest profits. One way to economize is to buy a separator that is built to give the greatest value for the money you invest in it; that is, one that will skim the closest and last the longest. That is why we want you to examine an I H C Cream Harvester before you buy any separator. An examination will convince you that are superior in design, material, and workmanship. Investigate for yourself. You will find that I H C Cream Harvesters are the only separators with milk and dust-proof gears that are easily accessible; that they are equipped with a patented dirt-arrester which removes the finest particles of dirt from the milk before it is separated; that the frame of an I H C is entirely protected from wear by phosphor bronze bushings; that the I H C has large shafts, bushings, and bearings. They have many other features that mean less work for you and longer life for the separator. I H C Cream Harvesters are made in two styles—Dairymaid, chain drive, and Bluebell, gear drive—each in four sizes. Let the I H C local dealer tell you all the facts, or, if you prefer, write nearest branch house for catalogues and any special information you desire.

I H C Cream Harvesters
Bluebell and Dairymaid

I H C SERVICE BUREAU
The purpose of this Bureau is to furnish farmers with information on better farming. If you have any worthy question concerning soils, crops, pests, fertilizers, stock, etc., write to the I H C Service Bureau and learn what our experts and others have found out concerning these subjects.

CANADIAN BRANCHES: International Harvester Company of America at Brandon, Calgary, Edmonton, Hamilton, Lethbridge, London, Montreal, North Battleford, Ottawa, Regina, Saskatoon, St. John, Weyburn, Winnipeg, Yorkton.

International Harvester Company of America
(Incorporated)
Chicago U S A

It Pays The Housewife

to use the best sugar—because poor sugar means poor cooking.

St. Lawrence Sugar

is the genuine "Montreal Granulated"—absolutely pure, sparkling crystals of the most inviting appearance.

Ask your grocer for a 20 lb. bag of ST. LAWRENCE GRANULATED — also sold by the barrel and in 100 lb. bags.

The St. Lawrence Sugar Refining Co. Limited
MONTREAL. 32

What is the Favorite Dish

after that tramp or good healthy skating party?

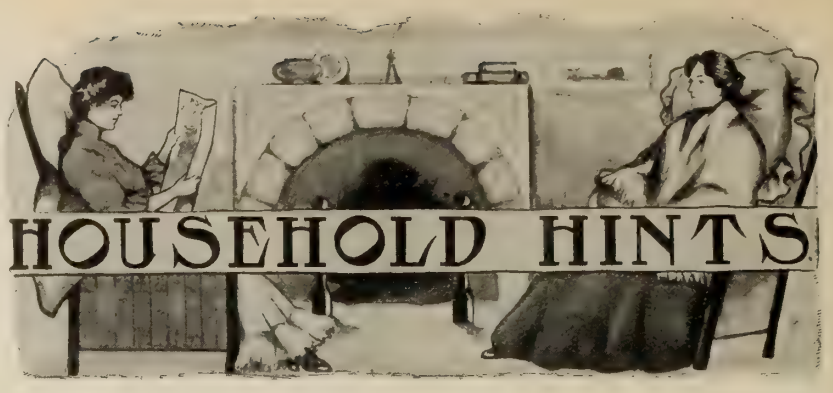
Clark's Pork and Beans

The very knowledge that Clark's Boston Baked Beans will be there adds just the necessary spice to the fun. And say, isn't that poor appetite wonderfully expansive!

W. CLARK - Montreal

Manufacturer of the CELEBRATED Mincemeat in the new style can.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.



Labor Economy in the Kitchen

HERE is the story of a changed kitchen, told by Professor Charles Barnard, in Louisville Herald. It shows how improved housekeeping methods reduce expenses, save labor and help solve the servant problem.

The mistress of the household is our guide. She says: "This is the kitchen, a room twenty feet square and far too big, because it makes too many steps in doing the work. In place of making the room smaller we brought things used in the kitchen nearer together. The coal stove was given up and boarded up to hide it, and the gas stove placed in front of the old stove, to gain more light, for the old stove was too dark to enable the cook to see her work.

"Formerly, we had a big table in the middle of the great room. Now we have a small pastry table with two drawers, one for the flour and the pastry utensils. In the other drawer are the bread, the bread knife and the bread serving plate, all in one place. See what that means.

"Before, the bread box was over there in the closet, and the bread knife hung on the wall on the other side of the room and the bread plate in the pantry. Think of that. Why, the maid had to walk sixty feet to get a plate of bread for the table, and then carry it twenty feet more to the dining table—eighty feet, three times a day. Now she stands in one place and prepares the bread for the table in less than twenty seconds.

"There is the refrigerator by the door to the dining-room. Before, it stood in an extension downstairs. The cook had to go to it at least ten times every day, a walk of forty or eighty feet for the trip, or eight hundred feet a day, or a mile a week. Now all the waste of human labor has been stopped.

"So it has been with all the work of the kitchen. Now, all the things used most are close together. Formerly half of the dishes were washed in one place and half in another place. Formerly all the dishes were carried by hand to the table in many trips. Now, everything is carried to and from the table in a wheel tray in one trip.

"Once the dishes when washed were wiped dry with towels. Now all are placed in a dish drier without wiping. Before, we cooked six foods in six utensils on the red-hot stove. Now we put them raw each in its serving dish and pack them in a steam cooker and all are cooked over one burner of the gas stove.

"Once we cooked a whole dinner on the coal stove and the job took all day. Now we heat up the radiators of our fireless cook stove on the gas stove in thirty minutes, and put the whole dinner in the fireless cooker and forget it. At dinner time, it is ready to serve.

"To have hot water we put the kitchen boiler in the cellar and hooked it to a little bit of a heater, and now we have all the hot water we can use. In a word, our house is now efficient. We have better meals with less cooking, and we have saved time, labor and money."

Around the House

THOUSANDS have no doubt read the commendable articles recently appearing in some of the leading American and Canadian papers on the use of alum in baking. Until the Dominion Government follows the lead of England, France and Germany and prohibits the use of alum in foods, there is but one safeguard against alum, and that is to buy only a baking powder which has the ingredients plainly stated on the label.

When using a lemon in the kitchen for flavoring purposes, it is an excellent plan to heat it before cutting it in half. It may be placed in the oven for a few moments or laid on the plate rack over the fire. When squeezed, the juice will run far more readily than if it were cold.

Old pieces of velveteen are invaluable on cleaning day. They are beautifully soft, and give an excellent polish to woodwork or glass, while they can be washed over and over again.

Dry herbs by spreading thinly on trays or papers, and expose to heat of sun or current of dry air, turning repeatedly. When drying in the sun, cover with thin paper to preserve color. The quicker they are dried the better. When dried enough, shake in a coarse sieve to remove any sand, eggs of insects, etc., that may be mixed with them. In every case, rotten and dirty leaves and branches should be removed before proceeding to dry. Tops and leaves are done in the same way as whole plans. When required for rubbing and bottling, much hand rubbing is saved if the leaves are first rolled with a clean rolling pin. Cork up very tight.

The Flavor of Tea

THE flavor of tea is contained in an essential oil. With age the oil decays and the agreeable aroma and flavor of fine tea is destroyed.

Tea keeps better in sealed packets than it does in open chests or cannisters, but it deteriorates more or less under any circumstances. Fresh tea is as necessary to a successful tea trade as fresh butter is to a successful butter trade. No wholesaler or retailer should keep a pound of tea in his stock for more than four months, yet, with some, the fashion is to keep it for years, during every day of which it is deteriorating.

In Ceylon—that land of eternal summer—every bush in a tea garden is picked over every week in the year, and you always get it fresh and fragrant in the "SALADA" packages. "SALADA" does not show the dealer as large a profit as other teas, but it gives him, through his customers, more satisfaction.

Laundry References

Use borax water to wash sateen. This method will restore the gloss to the goods.

Fine ginghams and percales dipped in sweet milk instead of starch, gives them that dainty, glossy dressing they have when new.

INK STAINS—Soak in sour milk. If a dark stain remains, rinse in a weak solution of chloride of lime.

BLOOD STAINS—Soak in cold salt water, then wash in warm water with plenty of soap, afterward boil.

GRASS STAINS—Saturate the spot thoroughly with kerosene, then put them in the washtub.

IODINE STAINS—Wash with alcohol, then rinse in soapy water.

HOT TEA AND COFFEE STAINS—Soak the stained fabric in cold water, wring, spread out and pour a few drops of glycerine on each spot. Let it stand several hours, then wash with cold water and soap.

IRON RUST—Soak the stain thoroughly with lemon juice; sprinkle with salt and bleach for several hours in the sun.

GREASE SPOTS—Hot water and soap generally remove these. If fixed by long standing, use ether, chloroform or naphtha. All three of these must be used away from either fire or artificial light.

MILDEW—Soak in a weak solution of chloride of lime for several hours. Rinse in cold water.

SEWING MACHINE OIL STAINS—Rub with lard. Let stand for several hours, then wash with cold water and soap.

SCORCH STAINS—Wet the scorched place, rub with soap and bleach in the sun.

FRUIT STAINS—Stretch the fabric containing the stain over the mouth of a basin and pour boiling water on the stain. In cold weather fruit spots can frequently be removed by hanging the stained garments out-of-doors over night. If the stain has been fixed by time soak the article in a weak solution of oxalic acid or hold the spot over the fumes of sulphur.

SEA FOAM Boil two quarts of brown sugar and one cupful of water in a granite saucepan until a hard ball forms in cold water. Have the whites of two eggs beaten very stiff. Pour the syrup into the eggs, beating constantly with a wire egg beater. Add one-half teaspoonful of vanilla, and beat until the mixture is quite hard. Add nuts or candied cherries, and drop on to dishes.

FRUIT BUNS These may be suitably substituted for cage, and are made by rolling out light bread dough in a thin sheet; butter liberally with softened butter, sprinkle with powdered sugar and ground cinnamon, and spread with a fruit mixture composed of chopped dates, candied lemon peel, currants and raisins. Beginning at one end, roll the dough in the same manner as for jelly cake roll, patting it smoothly into place, and flattening it out; then, with a sharp knife, cut into squares. Allow them to rise until double the original size, and then bake in a quick oven for about twenty minutes; glaze when cold with a frosting composed of grated nutmeg, ground cinnamon, confectioner's sugar, and a little cream.

JULIENNE SOUP This soup is ordinarily based upon a regulation brown stock made of shin of beef and vegetables, taking from five to six hours to make. A recipe which is more economical and takes a much shorter time, with very good results, is the following: Into three quarts of water put one-half cupful each of carrot, turnip, onion, and celery, cut into dice; one bay leaf, three sprigs of thyme, one sprig of marjoram, and two sprigs of parsley, bringing all gradually to boiling point. Allow them to simmer for three-quarters of an hour; then add two teaspoonfuls each of beef extract and Worcestershire sauce and one teaspoonful of salt, and simmer for one-half hour longer. Strain, add a dash of pepper and serve.

FIG CANDY Cook in a little water one pound of figs. When tender put through a sieve. Strain off the juice and if it does not make a cupful add enough water to fill it even full. To the cup of juice add two cups of white sugar. When thoroughly dissolved add the fig paste and cook slowly until the mixture looks thick and balls in water. Remove from the fire and add a cupful of chopped nuts. Whip until stiff and put in buttered pan to cool. Press whole nut meats on the top and cut in squares. Allow at least four or five hours for it to set. This candy will keep for a long time, which makes it possible to use it for Christmas boxes.

PLUM SOUFFLE Plum soufflé is delicious. Put a fourth of a cupful of butter and a cupful of milk in a saucepan over the fire; when the boiling point is reached add half a cupful of flour and a third of a cupful of sugar mixed. Stir vigorously until the mixture falls away from the sides of the pan, then turn into a bowl and add, one at a time, the yolks of three eggs, beating well between each additional yolk, a little grated lemon rind and a teaspoonful of cinnamon; lastly, fold in the stiffly-beaten whites of eggs. This mixture may be made early. About an hour before serving, fill a well-buttered baking dish about three-fourths full with fresh plums, seeded and sugared, cover with the cooked mixture and bake in a moderate oven. Serve hot.

RELIABLE OMELETTE An omelette that will not fall, and that is exceptionally good both to eat and to look at, can be made by cooking an even tablespoonful of corn starch in a tablespoonful of butter until it is smooth, adding salt and pepper and half a cupful of milk, and when it thickens take from the stove. Beat two eggs separately, add to the corn starch, pour into hot, well-buttered omelet or frying pan. Cook in the usual way, or set in a moderate oven, leave about ten minutes, take out, double over and serve on hot platter. The omelette is done when a knife drawn across it comes out clean, with none of the mixture clinging to it. This principle can be used in making a soufflé, and it will not fall. First cook the corn starch, which should be about the consistency of soft custard, add to that the fruit, and the last, the whites of eggs beaten stiff and lightly folded in; then bake until done.

VEAL FRICANDEAU Have four pounds cut from the fillet of veal, trim it round and skewer into shape. Lard the upper side; cut one small onion, one small carrot and one-fourth of a turnip into shape with a vegetable cutter and put in the bottom of the braising pan with one bay leaf, one sprig of parsley and one stalk of celery. Lay the fillet on top with the larded side up and pour over it one quart of hot stock. Put the lid on the braising pan and bake in a moderately hot oven for two hours. When done, remove the fillet and strain the gravy from the pan. Garnish the fricandeau with cut vegetables and parsley and serve with a sauce made as follows: Brown one tablespoonful of butter, add two tablespoonfuls of flour, stir until smooth and brown. Add one pint of gravy strained from the pan and stir continually until it thickens. When ready to serve, add one tablespoonful of mushroom or tomato catsup. Season if necessary, but pepper is rarely needed when the Worcestershire sauce is used. In summer, peas or other seasonable vegetables may be used.

PINEAPPLE SPONGE Cover one-fourth of a box of gelatin with one-fourth of a cupful of cold water. Drain the syrup from one can of pineapple; measure and add water if necessary to make one and one-half cupfuls. Heat to the boiling point, take from fire, add the gelatin and stir until dissolved. Strain and set aside until it begins to thicken, then add one-half of a cupful of thick cream whipped to a solid froth and the whites of two eggs beaten until stiff and dry. Stir carefully together and when quite thick add one cupful of pineapple cut into tiny bits. Turn into molds previously wet with cold water and stand in a cold place until firm.

CRANBERRY FRAPPE Soak one-quarter box Knox sparkling gelatine in one cup cold water. Cook one quart cranberries in three cups water until soft. Then force through a sieve. Add two and a half cups of sugar, juice of two lemons and gelatine dissolved in one-half cup of boiling water. Then add one quart cold water. Freeze. This is better if allowed to stand from two to three hours. A delicious accompaniment to the turkey course.

Wheat or Rice Toasted and Exploded

(Prof. Anderson's Invention)

These curious foods—so immensely enticing—have had a remarkable history.

A college professor—an expert on foods—exploded them first in a gas pipe.

He was trying, as men have for ages, to break up the millions of food granules. That's essential to digestion.

The partial result in baking, cooking and toasting he knew to be insufficient. So he set out to turn the grain's moisture to steam, then explode it. Thus to literally blast every granule to pieces.

Now Shot From Guns

The final result was to build bronze-steel guns. To seal up the grain, then revolve the guns in an oven heat of 550 degrees.

After an hour of this heat, inside of each grain there exists an enormous steam pressure. It penetrates every atom.

The steam is exploded by unsealing the gun. All the food granules are blasted to pieces.

The grains are puffed to eight times normal size—made four times as porous as bread. Yet the coats are unbroken. The grains come out shaped just as they were before.

And never before, in any grain, has digestion been made so easy.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c
Except in Extreme West

Another result is this:

A myriad cells are created, each surrounded by toasted walls, so thin that they melt in the mouth.

The crisp grains taste much like toasted nuts. They are used like nuts in candy-making, in frosting cake, in garnishing ice cream.

They are so delightful that people are eating 22,000,000 dishes per month. And others begin as fast as they find the foods out.

Their Unique Uses

They are served largely, of course, with sugar and cream. Or mixed with fruit at breakfast. But they also are eaten like crackers in milk. They form an ideal supper.

Children at play eat the grains like peanuts. Girls use them in candy-making.

They are eaten between meals, at bedtime—whenever one feels hungry. For they do not tax the stomach.

That's the best fact about them. They are whole grains made wholly digestible. And that's the ultimate in food.

When will you enjoy them?

The Quaker Oats Company

Sole Makers—Peterborough

(227)

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

How to Tell Him

"A MAN, like a watch, is known by his works," observes the epigram maker.

"And by the hours he keeps," added the wife.

"And by the spring in him," said the athlete.

"And by his being sometimes fast," remarked the reformer.

"And by the way his hands go up," put in the pugilist.

"And by his not always going when we want him to," finished the girl who'd been robbed of her beauty sleep.

How She Knew

"YOUR husband might have a little solid food directly he begins to mend," said the doctor.

"But how am I to tell?" enquired the anxious wife.

"The convalescent stages of influenza," replied the doctor, "are marked by a slight irritability."

The next day he called and found the patient's wife radiant.

"When I refused to order his steak and onions," she explained, "he came into the kitchen and smashed fourteen soup plates and a dinner service, so of course, I sent out for a steak at once."

Held Up By Venus

IT was a clear autumn evening, and the engineer was running a passenger train in Virginia. He was a little behind time and was hustling his locomotive along at a pretty good clip.

There was a strip of cypress forest to go through, and the road, on clearing it, took a sharp turn to westward. Just as he made that turn his heart came up into his mouth, for there, coming straight down the track (it was a single-track road) was another engine with her headlight flaming in his eyes.

The engineer blew "down brakes," and had his engine reversed before he'd drawn half a breath, and sent the engine back on a dead run to a switch station about a mile behind him.

He got it on a siding, and waited for the other train that he supposed to be just on top of him, but she didn't show up. He got the agent to wire up the line to see if there were any specials or wild engines in the way, but the answer was that the line was clear. The passengers got out and began to ask questions. The engineer was dazed. He thought of runaway engines and train wreckers and tramps. Everything was quiet around the bend so far as he could see and hear.

While standing on the station platform he happened to glance westward across a clearing. There was the headlight shining through the cypresses as serene and steady as you please.

It was the planet Venus.

The engineer got away from there in a hurry, never hinting to anyone what was the matter. "Why," said he, "if it had got around that I had laid over to let the evening star go by I'd never have heard the last of it."

Kind to Them

FOR one so young, his knowledge was extensive in the extreme. All things that came to his hand he read—novels,. newspapers, treatises, or Blue Books.

"Father," he said, "I hear Uncle Oscar is going to be married on Friday."

"Yes," said his father; "Uncle Oscar has only three days more."

The little boy sighed. "The last three days, father," he said, "they give them everything to eat they ask for, don't they?"

A Guessing Match

THE artist and his young wife had just returned from their honeymoon, when a friend dropped in and found them laughing over something.

"Whatever are you two laughing over?" said the visitor.

"Oh, it was jolly," said the wife. "My husband painted and I cooked, and then we both guessed what the things were meant for."

The Question

"YES, George," she said softly, raising him from his knees, "I love you."

"And you will be mine?" he cried passionately.

"Not," she murmured, casting down her eyes and blushing modestly, "not until you answer me one question."

"A thousand if you like, darling! What is it?"

"What," she whispered as the color fled from her rounded cheeks and her supple form trembled like a lily in the breeze, "what are your views on the Servant Tax?"

Cause for Pride

THE River Clyde has been brought up to its present draught for vessels of large capacity by a system of dredging, and the diligent Scotsman is justly proud of it. A party of American sightseers were one day on the lookout for wonders, and passed some caustic remarks on the river's insignificance.

"Call this a river, Why, it's only a mere ditch compared with ours over there—the Mississippi, the St. Lawrence, etc."

"Aye, mon," said a patriotic bystander, "ye can thank Providence for your rivers, but we made this ane oorsels."

The Oil of Sorrow

SMALL Ralph was fond of helping with such little repairs and adjustments about the house as he could. One day his mother suggested that he should oil the squeaky rollers under the library chairs.

"Please give me the key to the medicine closet, mother," he said.

"The medicine closet? What for?"

"Why," exclaimed Ralph in real surprise, "isn't that where you keep the castor oil?"

Her New Hat

WIFEY: "What do you think of my new hat?"

Hubby: "Very pretty. I hope it'll satisfy you for a while."

Wifey: "Of course it will. The color is not quite what I like, and the trimming doesn't come up to my expectations, and the shape is not as good as it ought to be, but otherwise the hat is a splendid bargain, and I like it awfully well."

English as She is Written

(By Terrell Love Holliday).

A farmer boy who had a cough
Made up his mind his job was tough,
So hied him to a well-stocked slough
Where he could fish the whole dav through,
And listen to the soft wind sough
And sigh and kiss each leaf and bough.
"My work's not done," he said, "although
I think that I have done enough.
If dad should kick and cut up rough,
Some other way than at the plough
I'll find to earn my daily dough."

Lippincott's Magazine.

A Thoughtful Host

THERE are various ways, polite and otherwise, of intimating to a late-staying friend that he is exceeding the time limit, but perhaps the most unique of these is that which originated in the fertile mind of a Washington man.

Not long ago he had a relative in town, a good fellow, but a bit of a bore, for he never seemed to know when to go back to his hotel. The Washingtonian and his wife were most patient with him, but one evening the host felt that the case required drastic treatment. Accordingly, when eleven, twelve, and one o'clock had passed, and the visitor showed no signs of leaving, the host, with an affected air of great consideration, turned to his wife and said:

"Marie, dear, hadn't we better get up to bed? Cousin John may want to be going."

Her Question

SUNDAY School Teacher—"In all that immense garden there was only one thing that Adam and Eve might not touch—the forbidden fruit."

Little Girl—"And could they touch the poison ivy?"

Breaking It Gently

THE irrepressible "Tody" Hamilton, who is held to know as much about circuses as any human being could, tells of the misfortunes of an Ohio man who was attempting to pilot a "one-tent show" through the Middle West.

This owner lost a number of valuable animals, by accident and otherwise; so that it was with considerable sympathy that one of his keepers undertook the tack of "breaking gently to the old man" the news of further disaster. The keeper accomplished this with much tact, as follows:

"Mr. Morgan, you remember that laffin' hyena in cage No. 8?"

"Remember the laughing hyena?" repeated the owner. "What the deuce are you driving at?"

"Simply this, Mr. Morgan: he ain't got nothin' to laugh at this mornin'."—Lippincott's Magazine.

A Careful Soldier

PRIVATE LEAHY: "Sergeant, if a private stepped up to a sergeant and called him a consated little monkey, phwat would happen?"

Sergeant Donahue: "He'd be put in the gyard house."

Priv. L.: "He wud?"

Sergt. D.: "He wud."

Priv. L.: "But if the private only knew the sergeant was a consated little monkey and said niver a wurrd, would he be put in the gyard house for that?"

Sergt. D.: "Of course, he wud not."

Priv. L.: "Well, thin, for the prisent we'll lave it go at that."

"The Man Who Would A-Wooing Go"

Continued from page 11

As he drove homeward that night it seemed that a week was too long to wait before he again saw Susie. It was queer, but somehow his feelings toward her were different from his feelings toward the other girls. Never had the six days between his visits seemed so tiresome. In fact they were such a drag that on Wednesday of the second week of his courtship he stopped work at five o'clock (tell it not in Gath), and wended his way along the river road again. Susan was discovered sewing busily, so busily that she had—well, perhaps we would not be justified in saying no eyes for Alex.—but anyway, only a fraction of a glance for him once in a while as her mother talked volubly to him.

"No; none of my girls is married, yet. Some folks thinks that when I have so many I should be always thinking about marrying them off, but they can stand to wait for someone worth while. They're not the kind that has to grab at the first Tom, Dick and Harry that happens along.

"There's no hurry," agreed Alex. "I've been waiting some time myself to find a good likely girl"—and by her industrious sewing in the evening when lots of girls would be gadding around and acting foolishly in other ways, Susan was proving herself very likely.

"Where's Millie?" asked the visitor.

"Oh, she and Anna drove up for the mail," was the answer. "I do declare, if they haven't gone and left those milk pails without being washed, too!"

Gratitude for his escape from such harum-scarums welled up in Alex.'s heart. "All things come to those who wait—even the right girl," was what his reflections amounted to, although they did not take form in exactly those words, as they might have done if his reading had not been sufficiently narrow to exclude that proverb.

Alex. made bi-weekly trips to Susie's parental roof with a zeal which plainly showed that he considered himself on the trail of a good bargain. Not that by his words or actions during these visits you could read ardent affection, but then "Alex. was never much for showing his feelings," as his mother said.

But one Friday night he arrived at his destination, to find Mrs. Nixon seated outside the house placidly enjoying the view, apparently undisturbed by the quarrels of the twins on the swing under the apple tree. She allowed Alex. to tie his horse to a post without summoning Jim to help him put it in, but that stage being past, she raised her voice.

"Jim, bring out a rocking-chair for Mr. Collins. Well, Mr. Collins, ain't this lovely weather we've been having?"

Alex. kept his eyes wandering uneasily in search of Susie, of whom he expected every minute to catch a glimpse through the open door. Surely she wasn't away! He had said he might possibly be there on Friday. But in vain! At last he could bear the suspense no longer. "Where are the rest of the folks to-night, Mrs. Nixon?" he asked.

"Well, Ann and Millie, they've been over getting peaches at Raven's—we're putting down a lot of extra fruit this year—and they're not home yet, and Susie, she's just out driving with a Mr. Betts from town; he's the loveliest man. The other girls are all jealous of Susie. Land, yes, Susie was looking out for herself in London, and she could take her pick, too. I was just saying to her paw to-night that I couldn't have done better if I had been hunting out a man for her myself."

"Is—is Susie going to marry him?" gasped Alex., as the horrible possibility dawned on him, and Mrs. Nixon paused for want of breath.

"Oh, of course we haven't been telling it around, but we know you well, and you won't go telling folks, will you? Yes, she's home making her clothes. Did you ever notice his picture? She has it in the parlor. Kate, you run and get Mr. Betts' picture—Sus. won't mind us showing it to you, Mr. Collins. Isn't he nice-looking, and the photo doesn't flatter him any, either. No, Susie didn't need to take any farmer."

Alex. allowed himself one look at the important-looking man as featured in the photograph, and then he said: "I guess I'd better be going," and moved towards the gate.

"Why, what's your hurry to-night?" exclaimed Mrs. Nixon. "Can't you wait to see Mr. Betts? They'll likely be back soon, although when these girls get off you can't tell when you're going to see them again."

"No, I can't stay this time."

"Well, come back again before long," returned Mrs. Nixon, as she settled back much more comfortable than before in the thought that she had given Alex. Collins (the old slow-poke) to understand what was what—that he couldn't take up with her girls and shake them off just as he chose, although (here she heaved a slight sigh) he had a fine place, and it would have been nice for Anna to have lived there.

As for the disappointed suitor with his fond hopes dashed rudely to the ground, his Heart's Desire by the side of another—ah! there was a subject for a thrilling novel. Only on the pages of such could he have got all the pity he deserved as he once more retraced his way.

The moment he got into his own house he took down the receiver and telephoned to the giddy young school teacher of the section—who spent all her money on clothes, who never did a washing and never set a hen—asking her to go with him to a thirty-five cent concert. Her favorable reply was shown by his closing remark: "All right, I'll be around about seven o'clock."

Let us leave him without condemnation, for even we may be made reckless by wounded pride and the miscarriage of our pet plans. Who knows?

DELIVERY-PAID MERCHANDISE FROM THE SIMPSON STORE

¶ OUR NEW SPRING AND SUMMER CATALOGUE IS NOW READY

SEND FOR IT TO-DAY

¶ Our service has revolutionized the Canadian MAIL ORDER business. It has been BUILT UP on the principle that long distance customers may rely on the quick delivery of a satisfactory article without the bother of calculating express or postage. Our New Catalogue is authoritative in style, and is by far the most attractive that we have printed.

¶ Whether you order Fifty Cents' or Fifty Dollars' worth of goods we Pay all Delivery Charges to nearest Station or Post Office.

THE ROBERT SIMPSON COMPANY LIMITED.
TORONTO

ASTHMA CATARRH
WHOOPING COUGH CROUP
BRONCHITIS COUGHS COLDS

Vapo-Cresolene

ESTABLISHED 1879

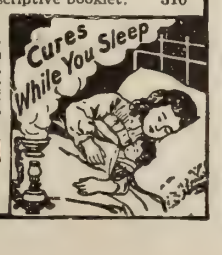
A simple, safe and effective treatment for bronchial troubles, without dosing the stomach with drugs. Used with success for thirty years.

The air rendered strongly antiseptic, inspired with every breath, makes breathing easy, soothes the sore throat, and stops the cough, assuring restful nights. Cresolene is invaluable to mothers with young children and a boon to sufferers from Asthma.

Send us postal for descriptive booklet. 310

ALL DRUGGISTS

Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat. They are simple, effective and antiseptic. Of your druggist or from us, 10c. in stamps.



VAPO CRESOLENE CO.
Leeming-Miles Bldg.
MONTREAL

Bookkeeping, Shorthand, Typewriting, Etc.

We teach bookkeeping, shorthand, typewriting, penmanship and all other right at your home in spare time.

COMMERCIAL COURSES

Our Courses are the Best and our Instructors the Ablest in Canada.

We Guarantee Our Courses
We Place All Our Graduates

Take your course with us and save (two-thirds) of college fees.

Fill in name and address, cut out this ad. and mail to us to-day for particulars.

Name. .....

Address.....

391-397 YONGE STREET, TORONTO
Shaw Correspondence School

Earning Pocket Money

Strangers are getting the profits that you should have. A subscription worker can earn hundreds of dollars in her spare time without going outside of her own territory, by getting new and renewal subscriptions.

Every family buys magazines and getting their orders is easy work and well paid—yet you leave it to an outside agent.

Write for our terms to local representatives.

Canadian Home Journal

The Spirit of Cleanliness

Saves Time and Work

Many uses and full directions on large sifter-can 10¢

APRIL
1912

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

PRICE
10 CENTS

Published by THE CANADIAN WOMEN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO.
53-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

A Timely Reminder

to you of the time and labor saved by the use of Gillett's Lye for house-cleaning purposes, and for numerous other purposes; such as making soap, removing old paint, disinfecting sinks, toilets, outdoor closets, drains, etc., and for ridding buildings of rats, mice, roaches and other vermin. Gillett's Lye is the standard Lye of Canada and conforms to the high standard of Gillett's Lye. Beware of imitations that are claimed to be "just as good" as they are never satisfactory. These imitations cannot be put in larger tins and sold for less than Gillett's Lye except at a sacrifice of quality. Quality goods give the desired result and are more economical.

"GILLETT'S LYE EATS DIRT"

NOTE:—It can be recommended as a positive exterminator of rats and mice and it has none of the objectionable features of a poison. The process for using it is simple. Just sprinkle a little of the Lye in and around the holes made by them. In addition to this, make a circle of Lye about one-quarter inch deep on a thin board about a foot square and place some cheese or meat in the centre. In endeavoring to get at the bait their feet will be burned, and the whole colony, whether large or small, will immediately disappear.

Refuse Substitutes

E. W. GILLETT COMPANY LIMITED

Winnipeg TORONTO, ONT. Montreal

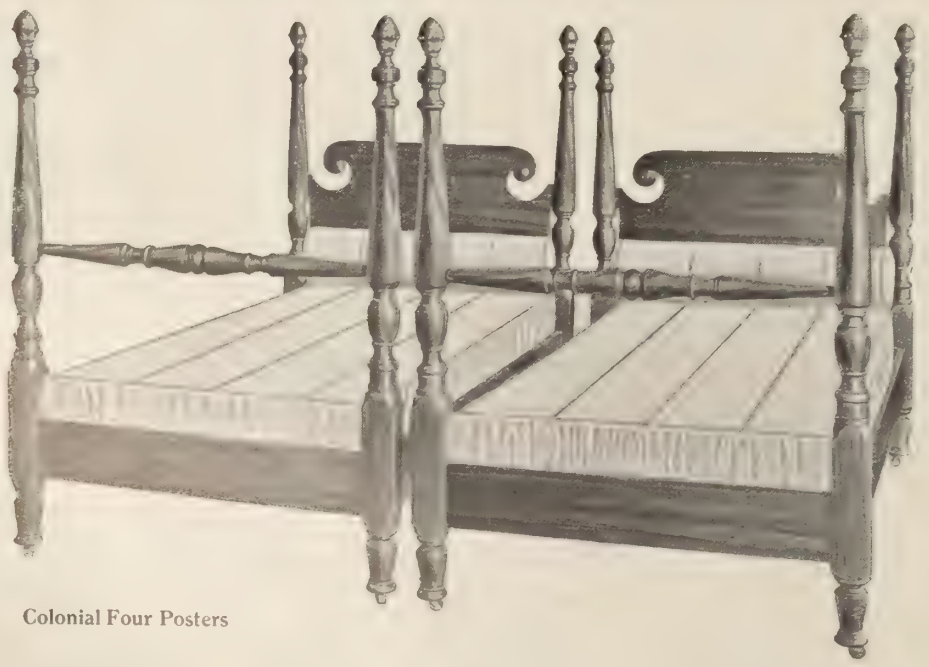
Our Shop Mark

FURNITURE of Character reproduced as near as adaptability to modern requirements will permit is not only a credit to the home in which it has the privilege of displaying its beauty, and the serviceable taste of its designer, but it is also a display of the good taste of those showing their preference in surrounding themselves with this style rather than shams. In buying our goods you not only buy the above qualifications but you become one of our numerous satisfied customers that we have attained by giving everyone that which is genuine.



Colonial Four Posters

Although all our goods are supplied through the trade we welcome your enquiry.

Toronto Furniture Co., Limited, - Toronto, Canada

"Makers of the Better Make of Canadian Quality Furniture"

SUBSCRIBERS' ADVERTISEMENT GUARANTEE

Readers of the "Canadian Home Journal" are fully protected when buying from any of our advertisers. We know that every advertiser in this issue is reliable, and that our readers will be dealt with fairly and honorably. Should any of our readers have any unsatisfactory dealing with any of our advertisers we will undertake to have a satisfactory adjustment made or money refunded.

This absolute guarantee is good only when our readers tell advertisers when dealing with them that their advertisement was seen in the "Canadian Home Journal."

Your Easter Outfit from the SIMPSON STORE

We show here JUST THREE out of the 300 Interesting Pages in our

New Spring & Summer CATALOGUE

Your name on a Post Card will bring it.

Most authentic style book published in Canada this season

Every choice you make will be a safe one; for every price you read is what the goods will cost you at your nearest railway station.

LET US SHOW YOU NOW how quickly and well our smoothly running mail order system can supply everything you need, whether it's fifty cents' or fifty dollars' worth.

The Robert SIMPSON Company Limited
TORONTO

Certainly, Madam, Jap-a-lac is made in 22 different colors

—We thought you knew it!

PERHAPS you think of Jap-a-lac as good for half a dozen purposes. You can just as well use it for half a thousand. For Jap-a-lac is not only a stain and varnish combined. Jap-a-lac Natural is as fine a clear varnish as anybody wants to use. Jap-a-lac Enamels are superb. Jap-a-lac Gold and Jap-a-lac Aluminum are for touching up hundreds of things.

Why not get acquainted with the whole Jap-a-lac family. Learn how a few pennies invested in Jap-a-lac will save you many dollars in preserving articles you would otherwise have to replace.

You will find Natural Jap-a-lac unequaled if you merely want to freshen the finish. It renews faded colors—gives brilliancy, life, to the old floors and furniture.

Then there is colored Jap-a-lac (Transparent). It comes in Oak, Dark Oak, Walnut, Mahogany, Cherry, Malachite Green, Ox-Blood Red and Empire Blue. It retains the beautiful grain of the natural wood—adds a brilliant and durable finish. Use it on your tables, chairs, bric-a-brac—everywhere you require a varnish and stain in one.

Then there are Jap-a-lac Enamels—Apple Green Enamel, Enamel Red, Enamel Green (Dark), Enamel Green (Pale), Enamel Pink, Enamel Blue (Pale), Brilliant Black, Dead Black, Gloss White and Flat White.

Some of these you will want to use on your porch furniture —settees and swings; on lamps, chandeliers, baby buggies. The daintiest, most delicate tints—pale green, blues and pinks —are just the thing for bedroom woodwork and for the nursery.

And then there is Jap-a-lac Dead Black and Brilliant Black for different kinds of metal work—for rejuvenating and protecting screens, for leather work, for fire fronts, andirons, etc. Dead Black Jap-a-lac—the fashionable "wrought iron" effect —is for plate rails, picture frames, etc.

We have merely skimmed through the list of Jap-a-lac uses. Your own ingenuity, Madam, will suggest many more.

But be sure that you get Jap-a-lac itself and not an imitation. Imitations are not like Jap-a-lac. They have not the beauty, the covering capacity nor the durability. And no thinking woman wants an imitation when she asks for the genuine.

JAP-A-LAC
Renews
Everything from Cellar to Garret

10 Cents a Can and Up

Jap-a-lac is now sold in ten cent cans—enough to finish completely a small piece of furniture.

Note New Lower Prices on Jap-a-lac

Other prices and sizes, (Full Imperial Measure)—¼-pt. 18c; ½-pt. 30c; 1-pt. 50; 1-qt. 90c; ½-gal. $1.75; 1-gal. $3.50.

Let us send you the Jap-a-lac booklet of money-saving suggestions.

For Sale at Paint, Hardware and Drug Stores

The Glidden Varnish Company

Factories: Toronto, Can., Cleveland, Ohio.

Branches: New York, Chicago

Notice to Subscribers

Subscriptions are payable strictly in advance.
Remit by Money Order or Registered Letter. We are not responsible for remittances that go astray. Only one and two cent stamps accepted in payment.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Subscription Price

Subscription for Canada and British Isles, $1.00 per annum; United States, $1.35; Postal Union countries, $2.00 (8s.) post paid.
We accept no patent medicine, liquor, narcotic or exploitation announcements.

Published on the 25th of each month preceding date of issue by
THE CANADIAN WOMAN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., LIMITED
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

WILLIAM G. ROOK, President

Edited by JEAN GRAHAM

EDITORIAL CHAT

OUR SPRING COVERS are the very daintiest and most artistic which we have yet displayed. When all the nice things were being said and written about our March cover, we felt very much like saying: "I told you so." Mr. Norman Price did excellent work in that charming study of "Mademoiselle Vanity," and we are sure you appreciated her spring-time freshness and coloring. Mr. Price has promised us other cover designs which will be equally delightful. In fact, one which we have, at present, for an autumn number has a richness of tint and originality of conception which will be a revelation of autumn hues. For this month's cover, we have secured a photographic cover, which is, we believe, the first reproduction of its style and class in Canada. The typical April scene is reproduced in full colors and gives an effect which is eminently artistic. Mr. C. D. Bingham, of Toronto, who has made a special study of photography in its most modern developments, has furnished us with this beautiful "trillium" woodland scene. It will give you a realistic anticipation of the delights of the forest depths as the first warm days come. The trillium is one of our most delicate spring blooms and the picture of its charms will bring back the days when we gathered lavish handfuls of the early blossoms.

SIKH IMMIGRATION has become a burning question in British Columbia, and it is by no means easy for the citizens of Ontario towns to understand the situation. The Sikhs living in that province wish to bring their wives from India to Canada. Some of the citizens of British Columbia oppose strongly such immigration. Dr. Sunder Singh, a gentleman from the Sikh settlement in British Columbia, has recently visited Toronto and other cities of Ontario, speaking and writing on behalf of the immigration project. We decided to publish the views of both British Columbians and the Sikh settlers. You will find, therefore, in this issue, an article on "The Sikh as British Columbia Sees Him," by Ethel Cody Stoddard, a Western journalist whose clever writing as "Lady Van" of the Vancouver Saturday Sunset is well known. We publish also the gist of Dr. Singh's views, as expressed by him in the Toronto press. This course has seemed to us a fair proceeding, as an Ontario journalist is too far from the scene of action to understand both sides of the controversy. The women of Canada, especially the Daughters of the Empire, have become interested in the issue, and we trust that the articles published in this number of the JOURNAL will present the varying views of this much-discussed matter.

OUR FICTION occupies a prominent place in the magazine—and we think we have excellent reasons for the space given to it. There are well-meaning critics who decry the use of light fiction in the modern magazines and ask for a larger supply of "solid articles." These critics forget that a magazine is published for the many, and that most readers in the present day are more interested in fiction than in any other form of literary production. Consequently, it is found that every variety of doctrine and teaching is embodied or expressed within the pages of a novel. It must be remembered, also, that this is an age of rush and bustle. Our grandmothers read a three-volume novel without haste, and considered it relaxation. This age, however, demands more eventful bits of fiction. We have considered carefully, in our choice of serials, and have found the final selection appreciated. Mrs. MacKay's story has reached its most dramatic chapters, and we know that you are intensely interested in Christine's terrible plight. We are not yet ready to announce our next serial, but hope to do so before "The House of Windows" reaches a conclusion. Our Easter story, "The Song of Life," by Katherine Hale, published in this number, is an exquisite breath of the eternal hope, full of the spirit of the divine renewal. Quite different are the quiet humor and evident lesson of "Aunt Mary Ann," which many women will recognize as being true to life, and one of its most vexing problems. Be sure to read "Spring Almanacs," by E. R. C. Webber. It is rather a sketch than a story, and illustrates so piquantly a certain phase of human nature that you are certain to smile over it and admit that you know someone "just like that."

THE GARDEN is the pre-eminent consideration in this number, which comes to you at a time of the year when every wise householder is studying seed catalogues and taking careful account of soil. The writers of the various articles associated with gardening are all experts in horticultural subjects, and are enthusiasts in this most interesting and profitable study. "The Home Grounds" deals with a feature to which we may all pay attention, for, in our Dominion of magnificent area, there are few citizens who cannot possess "a bit of a garden." The article, "In My Lady's Garden for 1912" discusses thoroughly and scientifically the making and keeping of a garden, with special reference to the tastes and requirements of the feminine gardener. The orchard development of the subject is not neglected, and in the article, "Good Fruit Trees From Poor Ones," you will find some valuable hints as to how to make an orchard a paying proposition. Then in "Annuals That Always Please" you will find a discussion and classification of much value to all who care for a well-equipped garden. "A Garden From the Woods" takes up a subject dear to everyone with a spark of real Nature-love in the heart. This article is written by Mrs. White, who has conducted a garden department for years in one of our leading journals, and who knows the woodland blossoms with an enviable intimacy. "Roses in Spring" introduces you to "the queen of all the flowers that blow" in its earlier manifestations. We are sure that you will feel that our garden number deserves a bouquet.

MEDICAL INSPECTION is the cry in the rural districts now, as well as in the city schools. The articles by Dr. Annie Backus, already published in our pages, have attracted much interest and wide editorial comment. The article for this month, "Hygiene for Rural Schools," is more general in its scope than any yet contributed.

April CONTENTS 1912

FICTION

AUNT MARY ANN - - - - - - 8
THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS - - 9
THE SONG OF LIFE - - - - - 11
THE COST OF A CRIME - - - - 12
SPRING ALMANACS - - - - - 42

SPECIAL FEATURES

THE SIKH IMMIGRATION QUESTION - 6
EASTER IN BERMUDA - - - - - 7
HYGIENE FOR RURAL SCHOOLS - - 14
THE HOME GROUNDS - - - - - 15
IN MY LADY'S GARDEN FOR 1912 - - 19
GOOD FRUIT TREES FROM POOR ONES 21
ANNUALS THAT ALWAYS PLEASE - 22
A GARDEN FROM THE WOODS - - 25
ROSES IN SPRING - - - - - 27

FASHION DEPARTMENT

NEW PUNCHED EMBROIDERY - - 23
MODELS FOR SILK AND WOOL - - 34
AFTERNOON GOWNS OF SILK - - 35
IN SHIRT WAIST STYLE - - - - 36
PARIS NOTES - - - - - - - 37
IN THE SHOPS - - - - - - - 39

MATTERS OF MENU

AN EASTER LUNCHEON - - - - 17
CULINARY CONCEITS - - - - 53

FOR THE HOUSEHOLD

HOUSEHOLD DECORATION - - - 40
HOUSEHOLD HINTS - - - - - 52

SPECIAL DEPARTMENTS

THE JOURNAL'S JUNIORS - - - 16
AROUND THE HEARTH - - - - 18
WOMEN'S INSTITUTES - - - - 42
THE DRESSING-TABLE - - - - 47
CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB - - - - 46
FROM THE PUBLISHERS - - - 49

The Hindu As British Columbia Sees Him

By ETHEL CODY STODDARD

IT has been a decided blow to British Columbia to realize that the people of Eastern Canada want—insist on the Federal Government allowing the Hindus now resident in this country, to bring in their families. And this province cannot accept the attitude of the East as being at all neighborly. The East knows full well that British Columbia will be the dumping ground for these people, therefore, it can well advocate the granting of the request now under discussion, since it knows the trouble will not touch its own skirts.

This great western province has endured, tested, and tried the Hindu and found him wanting. The fact that he comes and goes away again is the only reason why it has not exerted its rights, and refused to have him at all. And to be asked to accept him as a permanent citizen, with his family life around him, is one burden too many to lay upon a back already stooped with an Oriental load. The patience of a province should not be pushed too far.

British Columbia is just as greedy for children as any province in the Dominion, but it begs to be allowed once in a while at least, some choice in the matter. This great province wants citizens of which it can be proud, and therefore, resents the attitude of Eastern Canada on this subject because the Hindu does not come in that class.

The Sikh is not the only East Indian who will crawl under this robe of "human desire." It is now popular for the ordinary Hindu to call himself a Sikh—it sounds better. And as he emulates the Chinaman and Japanese in understanding English when it pleases him, and going a step farther, only telling the truth when it pays, there will be absolutely no method of obtaining the facts concerning any man who emigrates from India to Canada. The fact that the Chinese and Japanese of both sexes, and the male Hindus come into Canada, is a matter which cannot with policy be changed; but the bringing in of Hindu families is something that can be prevented, and is in the hands of the government.

Dr. Sunder Singh does well to travel eastward in Canada and there work upon the sympathies of the people. He knows that his value and measure has been taken in British Columbia, and that he could not work openly in this province. As it is, a prominent women's philanthropic society in Vancouver has received a letter from the wily doctor written in his own handwriting. He therein explains that the Hindus now in Canada wish to become permanent citizens, and buy property —in the West. He also states that it can easily be seen that if the request of these men to be allowed to bring in their families is denied, that the result will have a decided moral effect upon the English-speaking people among whom these Hindus are settled. And he concludes with the suggestion that missionary work be done among these men, and advises visitations to them by the women of that society.

These Hindus maintain that they are British subjects, and as such should be allowed the rights of citizenship in Canada. It is not every Briton—even one born on the mother soil, who is allowed entrance here; hundreds of them are stopped at the Canadian border every year and sent home. The Hindu cannot therefore stir up a special grievance on that point.

The Hindu argues that he is not a polygamist. This is to a degree true, since a Hindu is expected to only have as many wives as he can keep, and as the average Hindu is poor, he cannot afford more than one. But on the other hand, his marriage laws are such that if a man's wife displeases him, he can at once write her a bill of divorce and send her away. If this woman is living in Canada, the result is obvious. She will undoubtedly have not been allowed to learn English, and consequently will be helpless. Should the law get after her husband, he can disclaim any marriage with her, and the law can do nothing. That man can then, under the plea of bringing out a female relative, import a new wife. Eastern Canadians will claim this to be impossible, but British Columbians know that the untrue tongue of the Hindu can slip around any situation, and too, that he can always claim to misunderstand.

British Columbians realize that from a human standpoint the bringing in of these families will in the end be cruel. Transplanted from a hot climate to that of Canada will mean an undermining of the Hindu constitution. Consumption is predicted for these people.

British Columbia realizes more acutely than can any other portion of Canada, because of an ever-present Oriental population in its midst, what the bringing in of Hindu women will mean. The Hindu, as this province knows him, is an irresponsible creature. He is not a strictly moral man, in his own country, and in families where poverty reigns, the daughters are frequently sold out as martyrs, for immoral purposes. In cases where this might happen in Canada, and where a Hindu who could not afford to bring out his own wife, was ready to pay, the inference can readily be grasped. British Columbia realizes to the full, every detail of the possible things that are only too certain to occur, therefore it is no wonder that it protests.

The Hindu may now come to Canada—and he usually sticks to British Columbia, and makes money. If his desire for home life is so overwhelming, there is absolutely nothing to prevent him from returning to the bosom of his family and there residing in peace. White men all over the world have had to leave home to seek their fortunes, and been compelled to remain away for years. No one ever set up a controversy because these men did not take their families with them. In due time they returned to their homes and took the separation as a matter of life's ruling.

British Columbia has proved that to give the Hindu an inch means that he will push himself forward till he gains a yard. No other Oriental race will take advantage of a kindness or tolerance as will a Hindu. This province has suffered more or less under the government's ruling of allowing the Chinese, Japanese and Hindu men to come into its midst. Upon the question of allowing the wives of the latter to come in, rests a grave responsibility, and one which British Columbia does not wish to shoulder. It is a prevention that can be effected. The remedy lies in the hands of the country. This province does not want the Hindu as a permanent citizen, and the government that demands its obedience in this respect, will undoubtedly have cause to regret its decision.

The Sikh in Canada

By DR. SUNDER SINGH

THE problem of Hindu, or rather Sikh immigration is so interesting that I shall try to give a brief resume of the facts regarding these, my fellow citizens of the British Empire, says this writer in the Toronto World.

The Sikhs are members of a religious sect founded by Guru Nanak, who was born in 1469 in the Punjab, a province in the north-west part of India.

He preached a belief in One God the Almighty, abolition of caste, idol worship and superstition. He also taught that God could only be attained by service to our fellow-men and helping the poor, the weak, and the fallen.

The first Sikhs to see Canada were the soldiers who were passing through the Dominion on their way home to India after taking part in the celebration of the Diamond Jubilee of the late Queen Victoria. They saw the vast prairies of the West, which naturally reminded them of their homes in the Punjab. They saw waving fields of wheat.

Some of these hardy Jats of agriculturists found their way to British Columbia in the year 1905, but the great majority of the 4000 Sikhs who are at present settled in Canada came here during the three years following, and while on this point let me mention the fact that during the winter 1907-8 a financial panic visited the United States and Canada, when even white men were walking the streets of Vancouver without work.

In the same year 5,000 Japs came over from Honolulu. This added fuel to the fire, and the politicians raised the cry of a "white" British Columbia. It was not a clean, a more sober, a more truthful, or more honest British Columbia, but simply a "white" British Columbia. And the people who had to bear the brunt of all this agitation, were our own fellow subjects, the loyal Sikhs, men who were not only lip-loyal, but most of whom had fought for the Union Jack, the flag which stands for liberty, equality and justice to all the various peoples and races over whom it waves.

Many of the Sikhs in British Columbia wear medals for service to the King, and this was their first reception. Our people naturally bowed to Christian civilization of the Occident in a somewhat hesitating manner. They could not understand why the Canadian people sent missionaries to India to preach the Ten Commandments whilst the very same Commandments were not practised nearer at home. Most of these Sikh settlers have bought land and stock. They have already invested about two millions of dollars in this country. They are physically and morally strong men, and do the hardest and roughest work, which no other man can do. The Sikhs are engaged in dairy farming, market gardening, as farmers' helpers, and clearing land. And most of them will eventually settle on land. They are a steady, temperate, law-abiding and thrifty people, and there is proportionately less crime amongst them than among any other community in Canada.

The question nearest the Sikh's heart is his inability to get his wife admitted to this country, caused by the present immigration restrictions. There exists an order-in-council, passed two years ago, requiring a Sikh woman to come to Canada by "a continuous journey," and as there is no steamer running direct to Canada, the Sikh here cannot get their wives admitted into this country, and out of the 4,000 Sikhs in Canada there are only two women. They might as well have a law requiring the wife of a Sikh settler coming to this country to come via the moon or something similar before she will be allowed to land here.

The law as it stands is a physical impossibility, and it was meant to shut out the Japanese who were coming over from Honolulu. Even the alien Greeks Italians, Galicians, Doukhobors, and the Chinese and Japanese can get their families here if they can afford it, but this is not so with our fellow British subject, the Sikh. A Japanese has to show only $50 on landing here, whilst a Sikh has to show $200, and so on. As a matter of fact, the Sikh has no status in Canada, neither as a British citizen nor as an immigrant, for even the citizens of the most unfavored nations get better treatment than a citizen of our own empire. Why there should be an agitation against the loyal Sikh, and nothing said about the alien Chinese and Japanese is difficult to understand.

I regret to say there are politicians in this country who want to use this question as a cats' paw for their political ambitions. These worthy gentlemen seem to think that by abusing and misrepresenting the Sikhs they can rise to power, but I am afraid they are mistaken. The right of a husband living with his wife is the most sacred human institution, and anything done to impair it goes at the very root of all elementary principles of humanity and moral and social welfare.

EASTER IN BERMUDA

By HELEN E. WILLIAMS

Illustrated by Nina M. Owens

IT was on a morning in mid-April that we emerged from the portals of "Seaward," and stepped out upon a tribe road leading to the Hamilton parish church, where an early communion service was to be held at half-past eight. The day was perfect as only Bermudan days can be. All the sunshine of the hours distilled in the blue sunlight. Around us oleander trees were just blushing into bloom; match-me-if-you-can burned against a night of dark green cedars; white houses of native limestone gleamed between clumps of cocoanut palms, tamarisks, palmettoes and pride-of-India trees; while in the near distance stretched the wonderful expanse of water which is at once the envy and despair of artists. "The blue reminds the traveler of the Mediterranean when the Mediterranean is at its best," wrote Charles Dudley Warner. And the author of "Tuscan Cities" and "Italian Journeys" expatiating upon the Latin range of color and voluptuous overtures of the waves said he "used to recall Italy there, but for beauty Italy is nowhere beside Bermuda."

Skirting a field where a white something shimmers like watered silk, weaving odoriferous arabesques into the soft breezes of this lotus land, we pass through a churchyard where every grave is literally snowed under a profusion of Easter bloom, and enter the church. And then we realize that never before have we seen a church decorated. Oleander leaves, interlocked and sewn together like the links of a chain, festoon the walls. English ivy bewreathes the font, and most of the pillars. Roses—red, white and cream—bank the chancel. Roses are in the cross on the font. But the general effect is of lilies. The six white pillars which separate the choir seats and chancel from the body of the church and reach nearly to the roof, are covered with lilies. The ends of the pews are white with lilies. Thousands of lilies! A riot of lilies! Everywhere lilies—lilies—lilies!

CONVENT, MOUNT ST. AGNES

Some estimate of the extent of the lily fields themselves can be formed by the statement that they cover acres of ground, one "grower" alone having a field which comprises fifteen acres. Before Easter it is customary for the large growers to send off boxes each containing upwards of sixty lily buds, which are placed in cold storage on the boats, and arrive in America, just opening, in time for Easter. But the tendency nowadays is to cultivate the lilies more for the bulb than for the flower. Consequently it is no uncommon sight to see the paths between the rows strewn thick with flowers and buds which have been clipped in order that the entire strength of the plant may go into the bulbs destined for export. Once Easter is over, the fields are shorn of their glory for the same reason, the Bermuda lily bulbs being shipped in scarcely smaller quantities than are the onions and potatoes.

Among the many spots of interest which we pass upon this Easter morning, driving in to that beautiful, albeit unfinished bit of architecture, the cathedral at Hamilton, is one to which the visitor is sure to have recourse, sooner or later, for souvenirs—the Boer's Place. It is only a little low hut by the roadside, but here two of the nine Boer prisoners of war, who alone refused to take the oath of allegiance to Great Britain after the cessation of Transvaal activities, earn their livelihood by carving boxes, canes, and kindred articles, out of the fragrant red cedar wood. Very proud they are of the distinction of their unique position, and in a corner of these souvenirs are always to be found the pricked initials, "P.O.W." (Prisoners of War).

There is a saying in Bermuda that even the birds sing, "Don't hurry—don't worry!" One sees them everywhere, these little choristers, and the cardinal bird, in particular, makes an effective splash of color seen against a background of green foliage, saffron houses of Spanish-American fancy, fronded palm, or pendant hair of palmettoes. But here, as elsewhere, the things which appeal to some are foolishness in the eyes of others, and the "Don't hurry! Don't worry!" message of the birds, approved of and put into practice by the easy-going Bermudans, who love not work of any kind, has been censured by at least one tourist, who in no uncertain accents asserted that what was needed here was "a little American vim and enterprise."

"You work awhile," an onion weeder once epitomized his life philosophy, "and then you raise up and chat, and the time passes." And the attitude is a typical one. In striking contrast with it was a conversation we had with the old gardener who showed us the calabash tree of Tom Moore fame, at Walsingham. We had allowed our admiration for the quaint old place to a little find outlet in the words. "Ah, oui," he grunted, with an accent distinctly French-Canadian, "Good cli-mat, but no monee!" and he bestowed a look of supreme disfavor upon the soil, whose copper coloring, between rows of light green lettuce plants, we had been secretly admiring.

A BERMUDAN ROAD

After attending the full choral service at the cathedral, where Bishop Jones—to whose extensive diocese these Islands belong—delivered an eloquent sermon, we separated. Some of us had planned a drive to Prospect Hill to see the soldiers. Others purposed attending Divine service at St. George's (the most picturesque part of Bermuda, where the narrow, crooked streets remind the traveled visitor of Gibraltar, and where St. Peter's—the oldest church on the Islands—which had for some time previous been closed for repairs, was to be reopened to the public, and the massive silver communion service, presented by William the Third, in 1684, again used). The minority were to participate in their first cave luncheon.

IN THE HAMILTON PARISH CHURCH, BERMUDA

"WHERE ATOLLS RING THE WATER"

Of more recent discovery than Crystal, Joyce, and the Walsingham caves, the one in question yet casts over the beholder the same eerie spell. Everywhere thousands of tapers, especially brought over from England for the purpose, light up the weird and jagged stalagmitic and stalactitic formations. And as you look, almost you can persuade yourself that they have been chiseled by gnomes of a dateless long ago, almost they seem to breathe. And over them play all the iridescences of the kaleidoscope.

WALINGHAM, WHERE TOM MOORE LIVED

Color calls to color. Not the colors we have known above, but the ghosts of those colors. In the inevitable little lake "wedding this marvelous cave to the sea" are all these shapes, with their colors reflected. And the mystic beauty of them carries us through the gates of the actual into a veritable painter's paradise. If, as Amiel believed, every landscape is a state of soul, then are the caves of Bermuda the Maeterlinckism of color.

Returning to "Seaward" by way of the Hamilton Parish Church, one of our party was reminded of an amusing incident which had occurred there at a colored wedding a few days before. The bride-elect, Annie Isobel (familiarly known as "Issy"), had acquired the habit of turning her coquetries to material account by proceeding almost as far on the road to matrimony as the initial strain of the wedding march, only to change her mind—and keep her dowry gifts. On the present occasion, therefore, her mistress had taken the precaution to have her donations brought in her carriage to the church door, and given a former admirer explicit instructions concerning them. So that it chanced that shortly after the minister had somewhat sternly put the fatal question to the fickle charmer, and the watching coachman had seen through the open door that the nuptial knot had actually been tied, the unique spectacle of a wedding cake and its various accessories were seen being rapidly transferred to the carriage of the triumphant Annie Isobel.

But although cave luncheons, colored weddings, greased pole contests, military balls, and clam bakes may for a time engage our attention, it is always to the water that we return. Intense are the rainbow sheens on "these lovely isles that stud the sea like emeralds on a silver zone."

It has a spell, this Bermuda. Colorful, mystic, unforgetable. And when the tang of the salt sea-flats no longer carries with it the suggestion of lily fields, when the summer isles are only a vanishing speck glimpsed from the deck of the "Prince George," this it is that makes us register a silent vow to come back another Easter

AUNT MARY ANN

A Story of How the "Allowance" Was Made

By AGNES FAULKNOR NELSON

"YOUNG man, will you fix my shutter?"

Clayton Sherron turned, perceived that he was the person addressed, and, taking off his hat with an elaborate bow, assured Aunt Mary Ann that he would be delighted to assist her. He was a fine, strapping youth, and Aunt Mary Ann's eyes followed him admiringly as he entered the store and mounted the stairs.

The wind had blown the shutter loose and it was slamming against the front of the house, threatening to break away from the remaining hinge. Aunt Mary Ann went out to the pavement again and craned her neck to see that it was properly done. Suddenly there was a crash and a ripping of canvas and Clayton Sherron landed in a box of Spanish onions.

Aunt Mary Ann, with wonderfully controlled nerves, glanced up at the torn awning and then down at the man and said:

"Jacob 'll be real mad about the awning."

Clayton looked up at her blankly.

"Well, I'll be jiggered!" he gasped. "And I might have broken a leg."

At that moment a girl passed on the other side of the street. She was tall and willowy, dressed in a tailor-made costume of the latest style, and she held her head high on its long, stem-like neck. Her lips twitched and her eyes danced and yet, apparently, she also was quite unconscious of the comedy across the way.

Nevertheless, when he caught sight of her, Clayton Sherron blushed from chin to temple and hastily extricated himself from the box of Spanish onions

"You're the new china store man, aint you?" drawled Aunt Mary Ann, catching up a lock of fluffy, snow-white hair with an invisible hair-pin. "I'm coming to see you one of these days."

Clayton assured her, with the best grace he could summon, that he would be glad of her patronage, relieved her mind by telling her he would order a new awning, and, with a bow a trifle less elaborate than his former one, took his departure.

That afternoon he was waiting on a customer who might take as long as she liked to choose a salad bowl, as far as he was concerned, or who might even depart without buying one at all, so long as she gave him an occasional fleeting glance from a pair of deep violet eyes, while he talked to her of Limoges and Crown Derby, when the door opened and Aunt Mary Ann came in. She wore an old-fashioned black velvet cape and Clayton noticed how stooped her shoulders were. He sprang to close the door after her, for he had been taught to honor and respect old age.

"Good-afternoon," said Aunt Mary Ann. "I came to look at bowls—no, not salad bowls; kitchen bowls. Why, how-do-you-do, Hilda? I declare I must be getting near-sighted; I didn't recognize you at first. By the way, I can kill two birds with one stone. I'm giving a little afternoon tea for Julia to-morrow and I'd like to have you come."

"Thank you," said Hilda demurely; "I shall be very pleased to come."

"My, what pretty cups you have, Mr. Sherron! If there's one thing I have a failing for, it's tea cups. But Jacob doesn't allow me to indulge my taste much in that direction." A dimple showed for a moment in her left cheek and then disappeared. "Say, but that's a beauty—that blue and gold one!"

She raised her hand to pick up the cup from the higher shelf and her cape brushed against a corner of the lower, knocking a Japanese cup to the floor and breaking it into fragments.

"Well now, that's too bad!" drawled Aunt Mary Ann, stepping back to survey the mischief she had done.

"Capes are such awkward things," said Hilda consolingly.

"I guess I'd better leave the cups alone and look at the bowls," rejoined Aunt Mary Ann with a little sigh.

Hilda indicated by a slight movement of the head that Clayton might serve the older lady first, and while Aunt Mary Ann selected her bowls she stood beside the table on which were displayed the salad bowls, quietly and unobtrusively, with her tall slimness seeming to efface herself entirely. Yet Clayton Sherron was every moment conscious of her presence and the faint odor of narcissus in the store.

After much deliberation Aunt Mary Ann finally chose two brown bowls.

"Fifteen cents for the two? Well, there's a quarter and you can keep the change to pay for the cup I broke."

"Oh, no," said Clayton courteously. "I wouldn't think of taking anything for it. It was merely an accident."

"But I'd rather pay for it," rejoined Aunt Mary Ann generously.

Clayton put the dime back on the edge of the counter.

"But I insist," said Aunt Mary Ann.

"Madam, if you will pay for it, the cup was worth seventy-five cents."

"Seventy-five cents!" gasped Aunt Mary Ann. "That little thing!"

Clayton picked up a fragment from the floor and showed her the mark on it.

"Well, I do declare!" Her face twitched slightly and she opened her purse reluctantly. There's forty cents more. Will you call it square?"

"It's the wholesale price, madam. We'll call it square."

When she was gone and Clayton had closed the door behind her and returned to his first customer, Hilda glanced up at him curiously.

"Why did you do it?" she asked.

A slow flush crept under Clayton's tan.

"It wasn't the value of the cup," he replied, with lips firmly pressed together; "it was a matter of justice. Who is she anyway?"

"She's Mrs. Jacob Fairweather—commonly known as 'Aunt Mary Ann.' Her niece, Julia, whom she brought up, always called her that and I guess the name was contagious. They say she has a large bank account: she has been very saving all her life. But I thought you had met before?"

Clayton could not be sure whether Hilda's eyes twinkled or not; rhe lashes were so conveniently thick and long.

"It was under adverse circumstances," he replied drolly.

The following afternoon, Hilda Stratton, in her "best bib and tucker," rang the bell of Aunt Mary Ann's house door. Aunt Mary Ann answered the door herself and conducted her up a narrow flight of stairs to the parlor. It was considerably after the conventional hour of four and yet there were no other guests in the room and Hilda was not invited to remove her coat.

After some preliminary remarks on the weather, Hilda inquired carelessly where Julia was, and was informed that she had gone driving.

Hilda tried to veil her surprise, but there was an awkward pause or a moment or two while Aunt Mary Ann resumed her knitting. At last, looking up at Hilda with an odd expression in her eyes, she said:

"I'm afraid I made a mistake in the day. The tea ain't till to-morrow afternoon." Hilda flushed and then laughed softly.

"But it don't make any difference, of course," said Aunt Mary Ann. "Just you take off your coat and hat and you and me 'll have afternoon tea alone. Then you can come back to-morrow."

Hilda rose to remove her coat and Aunt Mary Ann glanced up admiringly at the silk dress that clung to her slender figure in long, graceful folds.

"My, but you do get the prettiest clothes, Hilda Stratton!" she exclaimed. "And to think you make 'em all your self! The man who gets you will get a clever girl—an economical one too for dressmakers' bills mount up these days. What do you think of the new china store man?" Hilda's cheeks burned a deep rose.

"He seems very nice," she replied.

"He's a fine young man. I wouldn't feel a bit sorry if Julia and he took a fancy to one another.

"Couldn't you come to our sewing-meeting now, on Wednesday?" said Aunt Mary Ann. "You could help us a lot with our work for the Indians." Hilda half promised.

"I am coming to you for a donation, too. I have the collecting to do this year and I haven't been very successful so far. There's Mrs. Morgan—I asked her for something four weeks ago and she said she'd consider it. I guess she's still considering.

Hilda opened her bag and drew forth a dollar bill.

"I might as well give it to you now," she said. "Is that enough?"

"Well, I should say so," drawled Aunt Mary Ann. "I wish I could afford to give that much myself. I've an old cape up in the attic I thought I'd give 'em this year and an overcoat of Jacob's that he's worn for twelve years. It's a bit shabby but it'll keep some Indian warm. Before I was married I was a great hand at giving. It's mostly a matter of habit—giving—and I was brought up to it. But Jacob has always been rather close and I guess he's affected me some. You grow alike after you've been married awhile—unconsciously.

"We were married in March and after much coaxing I got Jacob to promise me I could give fifteen cents a Sunday to the church. I'll never forget that first Sunday in church. I kept the envelope in my muff until the collection was taken up, and when I drew it out Jacob glanced down at it suspiciously and says in a stage whisper:

"'There's more'n fifteen cents in that envelope.'

"I'm sure they heard him all around us; I felt terribly humiliated.

"'There's a dollar eighty.' I whispered back. 'You begin to pay from the first of the year.'

"He just grunted, but I knew he thought I hadn't been square—that I had sort of taken advantage of him. It made me more careful in the future."

Aunt Mary Ann knitted in silence for a few moments and Hilda watched the dimple play in her left cheek and wondered if she hadn't been pretty and alluring in those early days.

"Well, I'd better be steeping the tea," said Aunt Mary Ann. "I think there are some red coals on the kitchen stove, so I'll just make a couple of slices of toast." And she left the room, her slippers making a soft, shuffling noise on the carpet.

In a little while she returned with the toast and the tea and, spreading a large table napkin on one end of the marble-topped table, bade Hilda draw up her chair.

"We'll return thanks."

"I beg your pardon?" said Hilda, whose mind had been wandering.

"I'll just ask a blessing."

"Oh, yes." Hilda bowed her head. Her lips twitched a little.

"Well, I suppose," said Aunt Mary Ann in her peculiar twang. when at last Hilda rose to go. "We'll be hearing of your engagement one of these days? You're too bright a girl to stay single. But then, as my brother Sam used to say, when you get to supposin' you're pretty apt to suppose the wrong thing."

She laughed and Hilda joined in merrily.

"You never can tell," she rejoined, with a wise look.

"Well, there's just one bit of advice I'll give you, said Aunt Mary Ann: "And that is to marry a——"

"Good man?" said Hilda.

"No—a tall man. There's more trouble comes through not being able to look up to your husband than through anything else."

* * * * *

Four months later Hilda Sherron was preparing supper in her own home one night and listening for a familiar step on the walk as she set the table with her best Limoges tea set. Like the majority of men, her husband believed in using the best every day and letting company take the tag ends, and Hilda smiled as she thought of how easily she was slipping into her husband's grooves.

"You grow alike after you've been married awhile—unconsciously."

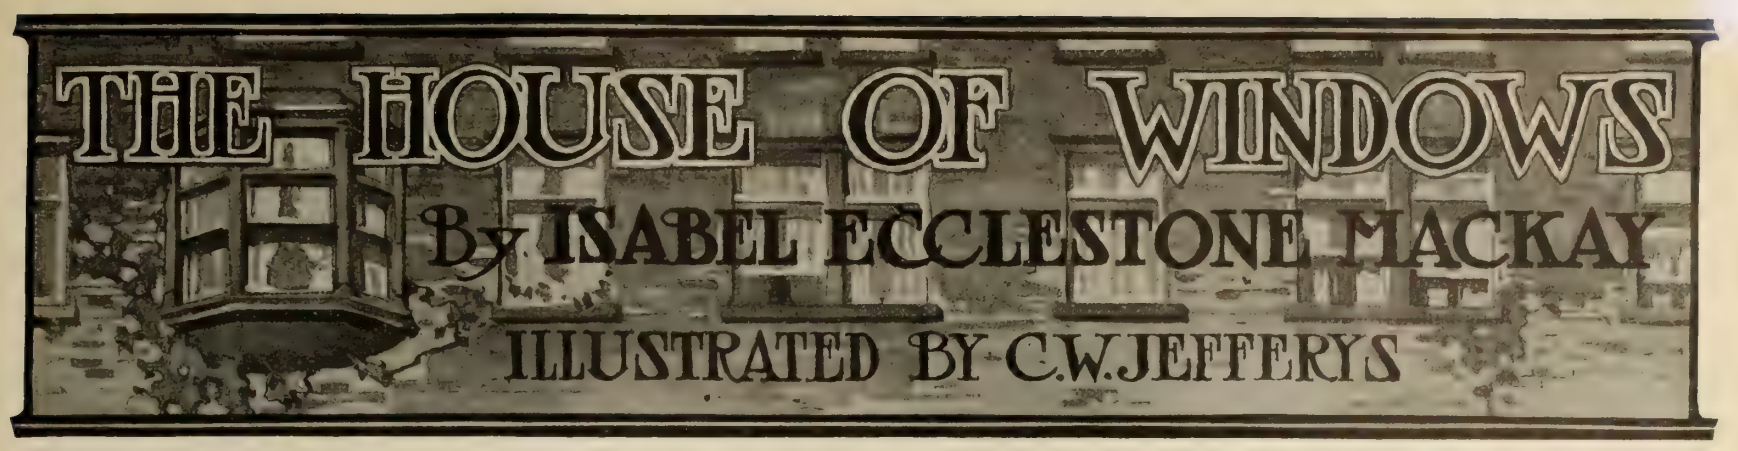
The thought ran through Hilda's mind and she wondered where she had heard it before. Suddenly she remembered and smiled: it was one of Aunt Mary Ann's sage remarks.

Any reference, in word or in thought, to Aunt Mary Ann invariably brought a smile to her lips these days. The poor old soul

Continued on page 50



SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

An infant is deserted by a woman who leaves it in the store of Angers and Son. It is adopted by Celia Brown, who takes it home to "The House of Windows." The child is given the name of Christine Brown. Some time before the desertion, Adam Torrance, the real owner of Angers and Son, has his only child kidnapped. Of this occurrence Celia is ignorant. Adam Torrance hears that his child has died. His wife also dies, and he lives abroad. Sixteen years pass and Christine continues to live with Celia and her blind sister, Ada. Celia is in financial distress and Christine determines to apply for position of "reader" to Miss Torrance. Mark Wareham, nephew of the latter, follows the unsuccessful Christine, and contrives to make her acquaintance. Adam Torrance, who has returned to the city, sends Mark, his nephew, out to British Columbia. Christine secures a position in "the Stores." Christine is followed by a sinister-looking old beggar woman, and is further annoyed by the attention of Gilbert Van Slyke. The woman, whose daughter's employment in "the Stores" long ago, had led to moral disaster, is determined to wreak vengeance on Christine, whom she had stolen. Adam Torrance visits "The House of Windows" in order to relieve the sisters' distress. He shows them great kindness. On his return home he finds a letter informing him that his daughter is alive and in peril. He sets out to find her, and, in the meantime, his nephew, Mark Wareham, returns and is injured in an accident. To complete the catastrophe, Christine disappears suddenly. They find that Christine has been taken off to the old woman's hut and removed thence to an unknown hiding place.

CAUTIOUSLY Christine pushed the smothering cover from her face. It might be of some use if she could find out the way they went. But the sides of the cart were high, and try as she would, she could not lift her head. All she could tell was that they were passing slowly through dark streets, over pavements of whose roughness every bone in her body gave instant evidence. Even these partially lighted ways were left behind, and they passed into the thick blackness of the night.

The mystery of the whole thing enveloped the girl more closely, more ominously, than the blackness of the night. It terrified, it paralyzed, it crushed out every spark of hope in her heart. Here out in the open, with every scent eloquent of the wide, wet country about her, the terror of the thing seemed even more monstrous, more hideously impossible! Perhaps, too, the long strain was telling; her thoughts grew feverish, disconnected. Now she thought of Celia and Ada, and the tears came freely; now it was of Tommy she thought, with a flash of hope; now she shuddered and moaned at the recollection of the old woman's face peering into hers; but most of all it was of Mark that she thought, of his return to find her gone! This was pure torture. What would he think? What could he think? She could see the puzzled wonder on his handsome face, the disappointment, and perhaps disillusion in his eyes. Would he care to think twice of a girl who was the centre of some vulgar mystery? Even as she shrank from this picture some whiff of country perfume brought back that perfect day when they had driven out to the Inn on the Dalby Road. How happy they had been! Somehow as she thought of him as he was that day the other thoughts lost their power to hurt her. Her memory of him was not that of a man easily daunted. Perhaps in him, after all, lay her greatest hope. He was strong, brave, clever! But she was growing weaker; a jolt of the wagon was now enough to turn the current of her thought.

They were going faster. The horse had been whipped up. The clouds were clearing a little; it might be moonlight soon. The two upon the front seat had fallen into grim silence. Christine's head seemed ready to burst with pain; she wished it would rain again to cool the fever in her blood.

Presently her impressions grew less and less distinct. She dreamed of curious things, and was still dreaming when the cart stopped with a jerk. This was important, she knnew; she realized hazily that she ought to be quick to notice and keen to remember, but she could not rouse herself. Even when they lifted her out of the cart she opened her eyes only for a moment. In that moment she had a vision of a door with curious posts which seemed oddly familiar. But the impression faded as quickly as it had come. She knew that she was carried through the door and up some stairs—then she smelled the sickly scent again and remembered nothing more.

CHAPTER XXIX.

MR. JOHNSON held the little grey glove in the palm of his hand, and an expression of admiration spread itself over his broad face.

"Clever!" he said, "Very clever. That young lady has certainly got brains. Also," he made a bow in Mark's direction, "someone else who shall be nameless. Almost you convince me there is something in those story-book methods. This will put fresh heart into the search. Wonderful how comforting it is to know that one is on a live trail! Well, we've done all we can do here, and the neighborhood seems to be waking up. Let's try our luck outside."

"Question the neighbors, do you mean?"

"We'll go through this neighborhood with a sieve and a microscope. There is sure to be someone who can tell us something—unless the kidnappers possessed the art of making themselves invisible. They live in terror of the police in these parts, and it will be easy to get them to speak. Talk about honor among thieves—bah! it doesn't exist!"

"Then I suppose you wish this part of the enquiry left entirely to you?"

"Well, Mr. Wareham, I think that we should get better results. And if you will excuse me, I might mention that you are beginning to look pretty well done up. I will be home and bed for yours if you are wise. I'll run right around with the news as soon as we get any."

Mr. Torrance, who had been watching Mark's growing pallor with anxiety, readily agreed to the detective's suggestion, and even Tommy heaved a sigh of relief when the invalid was safely stowed away in the motor. He was eager to hurry with the news to Brook Street, and glad that for once he must be the only messenger, as Mr. Torrance could not leave Mark. Tommy was too simple, and too loyal a soul to feel jealousy, yet it was with a lightened heart that he watched the two men out of sight and turned his steps in the direction of the House of Windows. And Adam Torrance was conscious of a pang which was very like envy as he thought of how the blind girl's face would brighten at Tommy's news.

"Fine chap, that!" said Mark, as if in answer to his thoughts. "By Jove, he's been better than a brother to those girls. He wanted to marry one of them once, but somehow it never came off."

"Indeed?" said Mr. Torrance; and then, after a perceptible pause, "Which one?"

"Which? Oh, well, I think it was Miss Celia."

"Is that so? Well, I am not surprised. Miss Celia is a charming woman. It would be most suitable."

"But like many other suitable things, it has apparently failed to suit," said Mark carelessly, but as he noticed the sudden complacence with which his uncle approved of Tommy's choice, he turned aside to hide a smile. "If Aunt Miriam had seen that," he thought, "it would have made assurance doubly sure!"

As has been observed before, Mr. Johnson was a man of energy, and so well did he and his assistants work, that by lunch time Hill Street had been thoroughly investigated and hung, so to speak, as limp and empty as an old sleeve, turned inside out.

At one o'clock he presented himself, notebook in hand, placid and self-confident again, at the Torrance home.

"Well," he began, without preliminaries, "we know what there is to know—and it's not much. Granny Bates and the man who passes as her son have lived in the shanty on Hill Street for the past five years. The man is a bricklayer, and makes good wages when he is working, but that is seldom. He is incurably lazy, a born loafer apparently, but harmless unless drinking hard; when in drink, the neighborhood feared him, and even the old woman kept out of his way. But curiously enough he is not an habitual drunkard. He has, it appears, "spells," which are often a month, or even two months, apart. He is known as Tough Wilson. The old woman is popularly supposed to be shy in the upper story. The children are frightened of her (and it takes something to frighten a Hill Street child). Not one of them would venture near her house or follow her in the street. It seems that at first the youngsters played a few tricks—just as a sort of friendly introduction into the neighborhood, you understand, but the reprisals were so swift and terrifying that even the boldest gave it up. The mothers, espousing the children's cause, declared her to be a witch and a devil, and other choice things, and refused the social amenities. Granny became, in fact, a pariah in Hill Street, and as she never made the slightest attempt to be 'friendly,' that position must have suited her to a nicety. I may say the female portion of Hill Street society is frankly delighted with the prospect of her being wanted by the police. They told me all they knew with a lavishness which wasted a few valuable hours. However, boiled down, we learn that:

"First—On the night of Christine's disappearance, Granny Bates was seen slipping down the street at about six-thirty, or thereabouts, with a wonderful lady with shining hair. Little Timmy O'Hagan was the only one who noticed them, but he noticed to some purpose. He says the lady was so pretty that he slid along after them just to have another look. She was walking quickly, he says, and smiling. Evidently she went willingly. Timmy saw her turn and say something to the old woman just as they got to the door. The hag opened the door and the lady went in. Then the door was shut. Timmy was too frightened of Granny to peer in the keyhole, and the window was dark—possibly they had pinned something over it. That is all Timmy knows, except that he waited around about an hour in the rain for the pretty lady to come out, but she did not come.

"Second—Bill Connely remembers the night, because that was the night he got roaring drunk, and was taken in by the police. He remembers starting out for the saloon about nine o'clock, and in passing Granny's hovel was surprised to see the shadowy outline of a horse and cart drawn up by the pavement. Tough Wilson was standing by the cart. The door of the hovel was open, and by the dim light from it he saw the horse, and recognized it as the old white mare belonging to a gentleman named Mike Donlan, over on Everleigh Street. Being in a facetious mood, he stopped and said, 'Hello, Tough! Going home to visit the old folks?' And that pleasant personage had replied with unusual good nature, 'You bet I am.' (Not a very illuminative conversation, unfortunately). Bill Connely did not notice anything at all unusual about the cart, save the fact of its being there at all. He could not say whether or not there was anything in it. He only noticed the horse, because it was a white horse, and the light fell on it.

"Third—Two other men noticed the horse and cart in front of Granny Bates' door, and one other at least spoke to Tough Wilson in passing, but only to pass a word about the weather. One man noticed the cart drive away with two figures on the front seat. The occurrence was discussed in the street, of course, and the general impression was that Tough and Granny had 'lit out.'

"Fourth—Mike Donlan, owner of the white mare well remembers renting the animal to Tough Wilson. He didn't know what for. Never thought to ask. Tough wouldn't have told him if he had; folks on Everleigh Street mind their own business. Tough wanted the mare over night. Paid for her and got her and brought her back at noon next day. She seemed rather tired, but not very much so. She was muddy, but not too muddy. She was hungry, but not more hungry than she often was, having a ruinous appetite at the best of times! Tough hadn't let drop a word about where he had been or what doing—why should he? It was his own business! So much for that interview.

"Fifth—The owner of cart found and interviewed with almost precisely the same result. Tough had rented the cart without reason and returned it without explanation, paid for it, and departed. Yes, the cart was muddy, but it naturally would be muddy after a rainy night. The bottom of the cart was not wet because it had been covered with an old rubber rug, black. There was nothing else in the cart, either when it went away or when it came back.

"That is the sum of the evidence. Problem, what was in the cart, and where did the cart go?"

Mr. Johnson laid the notebook upon his knee and looked up complacently.

"It seems to me," said Mark, irritably, "that we are just exactly where we were—except that we know that there was a cart in the case. We know, of course, who was in the cart. Christine must have been in it—somewhere under that filthy rubber robe, and—"

"Pardon me. I did not say that the problem was who was in the cart, but what was in the cart."

"We do not need to quibble about words."

But Mr. Torrance rose in uncontrolable agitation. "Why, Mark, don't you see what he means? What if—if—"

Mark shrank back as though he feared a blow. "Not that!" he said hoarsely. "You don't mean to imply that she may have been already dead?"

The detective nodded sympathetically. "Not that it's my own opinion that she was," he added. "My knew is that she was alive, but was prevented from making any outcry—drugged, most likely."

"She could not have been drugged when she hid the glove?"

"No—yet at the same time she was undoubtedly alive and not able to call for help; gagged, perhaps, or terrified by threats into silence. But even granting that, they may have drugged her before attempting to remove her. It would be a natural thing to do."

Mr. Torrance turned a haggard face upon him. "But if she were dead—that would account for everything."

"Not quite everything, I think. In fact, I do not like that hypothesis at all. But one has to look at these cases from every side. I believe she was alive. For one thing, if it had been otherwise there would have been some trace in the room; for another thing, this man, from what I have been able to learn, does not sound like a murderer. The old woman's capable of anything—crazy, I verily believe, but the man seems to be merely a good-for-nothing, unless crazed with drink. The men who spoke to him are sure that he was himself upon that night."

Mark drew a long breath. "I agree with you," he said, "besides, I think we may safely place some dependence on what the letters say. The old fiend does not wish Christine dead. It would not suit her plan of revenge. She is alive, I am sure of it—but in danger that drives me mad to think of! Johnson, when we solve the second problem, she will be safe. How are we going to do it?"

The detective fidgeted.

"I'll admit that we are up against it," he said. "Given a dark night with rain; the fact that two people drive away with a horse and cart, and that the horse and cart were returned in fairly good condition next day at noon—that is really all we have to go upon. I think we may be reasonably sure that the young lady was in the cart and that the journey taken by the horse was not a very long one. Therefore we face two possibilities—either the kidnappers are concealed somewhere within a radius of say, fifteen miles (more likely ten), or they drove to some small station within that radius and from there took the train for ports unknown. Do you agree with me that far?"

"It sounds likely."

"Now there are several such small stations near this city, and it is quite on the cards that we may pick up the trail from any one of them. They ought to have been a somewhat noticeable party. If the girl was drugged or even half dazed they would probably represent her as an invalid. As few invalids travel, they would be remembered on that account alone. Of course it is possible that the girl was not drugged, but merely terrified into silence."

□

"I do not believe that would be possible," said Mark. "Miss Christine is too clever and too quick to have submitted tamely to intimidation, and they are too clever to have dared to risk it."

"I agree with you," said Mr. Torrance emphatically.

"You are probably right, but, as I believe, I have remarked before, one must look at every possibility. At any rate, I have men now despatched to every station within a possible radius; on trains, or in autos, whichever would get them there quickest. If there is a vestige of a clue one of them will be pretty sure of finding it. It seems slow work, I know, but it is thorough, and I really do not see what else we can do."

"When ought the reports of your men to come in?"

"Almost any moment. They were to 'phone results immediately, and most of them ought to have reached their destination by this time. I took the liberty of telling them to 'phone directly here, so that you might have the news as soon as I have. I think that is a call now."

"No news from Frampton," he told them, putting up the receiver after a brief dialogue with someone at the other end. "The agent there is positive that no one bought any ticket or took any train upon the night in question. The through trains do not stop there, and passengers are few."

For a half an hour the three men sat there while call after call came in—each reporting, for one reason or another, no trace of the fugitives. The detective's face grew graver as time went on. It was evident that he had expected some result from this enquiry. Mark, on the other hand, seemed distinctly cheered.

"If they don't get away," he kept saying, "then they are still somewhere near. The real danger is that they may have reached New York or some other large city, where search would be hunting for a needle in a haystack. Besides—there is that last letter! It was slipped into the letter box under cover of darkness. Depend upon it, either one of the kidnappers must have placed it there—they would not trust a third party. And where one is, the other is. They would keep together, and where they are, Christine is."

"Good reasoning," agreed the detective, "but it won't help much without a tangible clue. There is still the Dalby man to hear from. I sent our best man there, for as the five o'clock through train will stop for passengers, it seemed the most likely place, and——"

The sharp tinkle of the call bell interrupted him.

"There is your man now," said Mark.

Johnson picked up the receiver eagerly, and a hurried consultation followed. The detective's eyes were bright as he turned from the instrument.

"He's coming here," he announced. "He thinks he's picked up the trail—at least he says he has some curious information."

"And didn't he say what it was?"

"No—but he'll be here in fifteen minutes. It's a good bit of road between here and Dalby."

"Dalby!" said Mark, and he sighed heavily, as he remembered the last drive he had taken on the Dalby Road.

□

CHAPTER XXX.

THE detective from Dalby proved to be a young man with a fresh, ingenious face, whose rounded innocence was somewhat belied by a pair of very keen grey eyes. He was evidently properly impressed with the importance of his mission, but not unduly so. In fact, the three men, for Tommy had arrived a moment or so before him, were favorably impressed upon the instant.

"Would you like my evidence first, or shall I begin by stating my conclusions?" he asked his chief deferentially.

"Your evidence, of course," said the big detective, and the others who would have liked the conclusions first were compelled to stay their impatience as best they might.

"I had some difficulty in fixing the right night in the mind of the agent at Dalby," he said, "but finally he got his bearings by remembering that upon the date mentioned his youngest child had been sick with the toothache. He is sure of the date, because the next day was the kid's birthday, and she cried because she was afraid she would not be able to eat her box of candy. Well, upon that night he very well remembers a horse and cart driving up at about a quarter to five in good time for the through express. He did not see who drove the cart, but the passengers were an ugly old woman and a young girl—" girl—"

Mark interrupted with a smothered exclamation, and the young detective paused for a moment, but as no one made a remark, he went on:

"There is no doubt about the old woman. The agent saw her face plainly in the lighted waiting room, and recognized the photo at once. But the young girl he did not see. It had stopped raining, and was not cold, so he saw nothing strange in the girl staying outside in the air. She was seated on a bench at the end of the building, out of the range of the lamps. She seemed too ill or too weary to rise, and the old woman said that she was not well, and that she was taking her to New York to consult a specialist. The only thing he noticed about the girl was that she had yellow, or very light hair. The old woman's clothes were decent though plain, and a very bad fit, being much too big.

("Borrowed, probably," interrupted Johnson).

"She did not buy tickets for New York or for any place. She said she had her tickets already, but she made no secret of her destinantion, and indeed talked a great deal, and gave her plans with a lot of unnecessary detail. The two went off on the five o'clock express, and that would have been the end of them except for the evidence of the station agent's sister. This sister, it seems, was going to Buffalo by the same train. She very nearly missed it, arriving at the last moment and boarding it in a great hurry. Neither she nor the old woman were provided with berths, and they found seats in the same car.

Now the station agent's sister returned from Buffalo only the day before yesterday, and last night was asked by the station agent's wife to tea. During the meal the agent happened to speak about the old woman and the invalid girl, and asked his sister if the poor thing had been taken worse on the train. In reply she learned the following curious facts:

"First—The sister had noticed the couple very particularly, as they were the only other travelers who boarded the train with her, and the old woman was noticeably ugly. But, strangely enough, she did not get the impression of the girl being an invalid. She seemed, she said, quite ordinarily strong. She wore a veil over her face, but her hair was very yellow. Note particularly that the sister was absolutely convinced that the hair was bleached. I questioned her myself upon this point, and she grew quite angry when I suggested a mistake. She said no one could mistake bleached hair!

"Second—The two did not go to New York at all, but left the train at Hamstead, which is only about twenty miles from Dalby! She is sure of this—indeed, as the couple had interested her from the first she is hardly likely to be mistaken. It was still dark when the train ran into Hamstead, but she saw the two pass under the station lamps, making their way to the exit gate. The girl now wore a veil over her yellow hair as well as over her face, but she walked quite easily, and did not appear ill in the least. That, sir, is all the evidence."

The detective gave a long whistle, but before he could reply, Mark, noting the eagerness in the young fellow's face, insisted they hear his conclusions before beginning to discuss the matter themselves.

□

"Well, sir," said the young fellow, modestly, "the conclusions are fairly obvious. It would seem in the first place that the old woman deliberately tried to make the agent believe that she was bound for New York, that she purposely called his attention to the alleged helpless state of the young girl; that she purposely left the girl's yellow hair uncovered that the agent might notice it. Therefore, the old woman wished to establish a trail for a young lady with yellow hair, which, if investigation occurred, would lead to New York. It would seem, also, that the young woman was not as ill as the old one made out, and, further, that she was on friendly terms with her companion. Also, in my opinion, it is fairly certain that her yellow hair was bleached. It is not likely that another woman would make a mistake in that matter, especially as the missing lady's hair is remarkable for its natural beauty of coloring. Therefore I conclude that the young person in the train was not the lady we are seeking, but one merely intended to represent her, and thereby aid in establishing a misleading trail. It seems, further, that the two undoubtedly alighted at Hamstead. And why not? It was not necessary to go to New York, it was only necessary to seem to go there. The accident of the presence of the agent's sister in the train could not have been foreseen. If you remember, she came at the last moment, and got on in a great hurry, so that the other two did not see her, or if they did, it would not occur to them that she was any connection of the agent's. If we had only the evidence of the agent, we might very possibly have concluded that our quarry had cleared for New York, taking the half-stupefied girl with her. The old hag knew that the agent would never notice that the girl's hair was bleached!"

"I think you have thought it out very reasonably," said Mark. "It all seems to fit together like pieces of puzzle. And the conclusion of the whole thing is—"

"It is rather early for such a conclusion yet," declared Mr. Johnson, who like other successful artists, was not without jealousy. "Still I suppose it will do no harm to hear what he thinks."

"I think," said the young detective, "that the missing lady is concealed somewhere close at hand, probably between here and Dalby."

"Bravo!" said Mark. "I feel sure of it."

"And the young person with the bleached hair?" asked Mr. Torrance.

"She must be partly in the secret, and she ought to be easy to trace. My own guess (it's only a guess, would be that she probably belongs to the house where the missing lady is concealed."

"Hum! well, guessing is not going to help us," said Mr. Johnson, rather sourly. "What we want to do is to spot all the possible places of concealment within a ten-mile radius of Dalby—that is, if there is anything in your theories." He drew from his pocket a large paper map which he spread upon the library table. "Here is a road map. It is a special map made under my own supervision. Every house is marked with a few illuminative notes in cipher. Now then, we will first take the straight Dalby Road. It doesn't look likely. See, these houses set along it at reasonably frequent intervals are all farm houses belonging to old residents, not much chance of hiding a kidnapped girl in any of them, eh? This is the toll-house, kept by a respectable old couple. It consists of one room and a bedroom, a rat could hardly be hidden there. This is the Dalby Road Inn. It is quite well known as a stopping-place for motors. They give quite a decent country lunch there. I've often tried it myself. It is kept by a very respectable woman, by name Haffey, with a pretty grand-daughter. I am convinced that they would not lend themselves—"

□

"Excuse me," interrupted the young detective, diffidently, "but those people are no longer in charge of the inn. They left about a month ago, and are now living in Hamstead."

"How do you know that?" snapped Johnson.

"I—well, you see, I know Miss Haffey rather well. She is, as you say, a remarkably pretty girl."

"Oh, I see—sweethearts! Well, that accounts for it. Perhaps you know who keeps the inn now?"

"No; I have never been there since Mrs. Haffey and Fanny left. I only know that they sold out for a good sum. Stay, though—I came by there to-day in the motor. We were going very fast, but I naturally looked at the house. There was someone at the side door scattering the grain for the chickens. It was a woman. I couldn't see much of her." Suddenly he jumped to his feet with a startled exclamation. "By the lord Harry!" he cried. "She had yellow hair!"

"What!"

"How stupid of me! never to think of it. Of course she had yellow hair! It was the only noticeable thing about her. I remember thinking at a distance it might almost be Fanny, but Fanny's hair was dark brown. This girl's was yellow, startlingly yellow!"

Mark had also risen. He was very pale. "It looks like a clue," he said. "If it is—" he locked the young man's hands in his own with a grip that spoke volumes.

"Plenty of girls have yellow hair," said Johnson the complacent. "So don't get excited. However we'll soon know about this one. Think you can tell bleached hair when you see it, Cunningham?"

"I think I can, sir," said the young detective, modestly.

"Well, you and I will run down to the inn at once—"

But Mark, who had been talking excitedly with Mr. Torrance, interrupted him without ceremony.

"We think that that would be very unwise," he said. "There is always a chance that you may be known to be a detective. If they are as sharp as they seem to be they might have time to get away. Wouldn't it be better for me to go alone in my own motor as I have gone dozens of times before?"

"I do not think so. If they know Mr. Torrance, isn't it likely that they will know you? Be-

Continued on page 46

THE SONG OF LIFE

An Easter Story

By KATHERINE HALE

MARCH was shouting his last wild halloo to winter, there were streaks of sun across the windiest days, the snow had left the valleys, the florists' windows were brilliant with flowers, and piano organs were playing in the streets of the town. Easter was but a week away, and the story was not written.

Her chance of chances had come, and was probably passing forever. She rose from her desk, on which was piled copy paper and various books of travel, and decided to go to the Press Club tea. Anything to get away from the oppressive silence of her own room, and the accusing cry of Conscience that marched with Time and tortured her nerves by the assertion that if she really "had it in her" that Easter story must have flowed from her pen without any hesitation whatever.

For a year she had clipped and signed "Poignant Paragraphs" for the inside page of the Weekly Sun, she had written the minor reviews, attended the lesser concerts, and been a patient and on the whole grateful understudy to the small but mighty staff of that journal whose name is a Canadian household word. She had been patient, and on the whole grateful, because the spirit within her whispered prophecies and seemd to wait on tip-toe for release and the voice of its own expression.

But now the time had come—and where was the expression?

The Editor had asked her for an Easter story. Suddenly and without warning he had made this request. "We're enlarging the supplement for Easter, and I want a story. Lilies, Bells, Choir Boys, anything you like, only bring in a good gripping human interest, and we'll give you special rates, and a decorative border. Turn it in by the first, won't you?"

That was two weeks ago, and as yet the outline of an Easter story had never even faintly suggested itself. There were exactly three days left before the first. Listlessly she turned to the process of dressing to go out.

"You see, it's like this," she murmured to the tired little face in the glass, "after all it's like this; you simply haven't got it in you! All those dreams and possibilities, all the fancies and the convictions and the colors that flash across your brain don't stand you in very good stead when the test comes. Just because a subject is settled for you, you balk. A hundred plots and plans have gone through your mind for weeks, they longed to be written out; but when the time comes to imagine strongly enough actually to create, the fancies dissolve into thin air, they don't last, they are ghosts, not actual beings . . . and just the clipping scissors and the glue pot remain . . . only a thin little dream . . . Easter with the bells and flowers . . . the hope of the springtime . . . the color of the fresh young world . . . a story to be written in leafgreen and flute tones . . . so many people have said it all before . . . what is left for me?"

Tingle went the telephone bell.

She lifted the receiver.

"Yes? . . . Why! . . . Harry! . . . I thought you were still away. I never dreamed of you getting back so soon. . . . Yes, of course I'm glad! . . . Nothing—at least I was going to the Press Club tea. . . . Oh! I think that's unfair. What do you know about the Press Club? We're perfect dears, every one of us. And I need ideas to-day very badly. I have only three days left to write an Easter story—of gripping human interest—and my mind is one small white blank. . . . Of course, I'd love to! But would it be right? I mean the waste of time? Heavens! No, I don't mean that! Yes, truly . . . I'll tie my hat down. Hoot twice and I'll know it's you."

□

FIRST the city streets, then the slums, then the suburbs, then the hard long road with the rough lake tumbling below them on one side and irregular stretches of leafless woods on the other. The purring machine, the girl—and the man.

Silence for some time, as the wild sweep of ozone filled their lungs with the breath of new life.

"Fancy getting you—I was going to say, so easily," he began, turning to her with no attempt to disguise his joy. "It didn't take ten minutes after I had 'phoned you, and for once your line wasn't busy. I've been in luck, ma mia, for you seemed thousands of miles away, instead of dozens, while I was still in Buffalo only this morning. Somehow I felt that you weren't happy all this week. The idea haunted me until it positively interfered with business."

She glanced at him quickly through the pink rays of her motor veil. "Wizard-of-all," she answered in mock mystery, "your telepathy disturbs me! If ever anyone has written cheerful letters to another, I have to you all the interminable time you've been gone."

"Yes, all about nothing," he answered. "That's what bothered me. You don't waste words on pink teas and so on unless you've something up your sleeve that I'm not to be in. And I want to be in everything, you see. That's where I'm so cursedly selfish. As for the outside life—there's much of it I can't enter, of course. But the real thing, the life of your thoughts and hopes and desires. I'm cold when you shut that door."

There was silence, while the little car ran on, gliding up a hill, dipping into a hollow, while the sunlight, borne on the late March wind, seemed to wave and undulate like a banner, riding with them all the way. Sometimes the lazy farm horses shied impatiently as they whizzed past, once some huntsmen in red coats flashed a note of vivid color, white wings of gulls appeared above the grey-green lake, and in the woods naked boughs swayed lightly. Everywhere one felt the movement of an Approach. Nature, all wind-and-sun-swept, was waiting for the first footfall of the spring.

And still the girl allowed a complete silence to follow her lover's appeal. The Difference in them widened as the moments, like the road, seemed to fly past in that bath of golden light.

Presently she turned to ask him what he had been doing all the week.

"Selling stocks up north," he answered rather shortly. "Heavens, it was cold around Cobalt and in North Bay! But keen, glorious! They're great people up there. You got my wire Wednesday? Well, then I struck across to Buffalo, and I've been in and out ever since. I did a lot of the north-east corner of the state by motor. Met some queer characters, too, by Jove! And all the time my brains were working like a machine, my heart was crying out for you, and wondering about you, and hoping, and—yes, really—praying about your answer—your answer, ma mia. That's the thing, of course. It's what I've been dreaming of and working for all year long. Until I proved myself a man among men I couldn't expect you to be sure. And it looked blue enough this time last year. All those months I was fighting to win even your interest, your bare interest, I was just a gambler in dead mines—or so the world said—in dreams and fictions that wouldn't come to life. But don't you see, I held the secret of all life behind me—just sheer Faith. Everything had to come right. And I willed and willed it, and the world had to yield what I wanted, so it has come, slowly, surely, hasn't it? Hasn't it?"

An absurd little hand, evidently designed for the use of a grown-up fairy, stole out of a big grey muff towards his, and a mournful conviction rang in her flutey voice.

"Of course it has come to you, mon ami, success, and the proving of yourself. But not in my case. At the end of a year of work, what do I find? Failure in myself at the first test; the inability to work practically, to write a story when I'm asked; simply to put into shape my own ideas so that they shall live and move for other people. It seems that I only dream. I don't do. Therefore, I haven't proved myself. What you have done I have failed to accomplish."

"Only in one way," he interrupted eagerly. "You've been my entire success, you've stood behind every thought and plan, and carried them out with me. And 'on your own' it seems to me you have done new and hard work, have borne long office hours, loss of home, lack of pleasure, restraint, subordination, all those things that make a woman in journalism one of the Seven Wonders of the World. Is that nothing? I guess no."

"But when the one little shining Chance comes, the bit of creative work that would alone redeem this drudgery and make it worth while, why—the drudgery itself has slain me. The clipping scissors and the glue pot have done their deadly work—my ideas are dead."

"If so, why?" he urged suddenly, in that quick fashion that sought the heart of a subject instantly, "because you've let them die. Because the routine of work—drudgery, perhaps—has crowded out life. Because, thrust out of your own world, you've allowed analysis to come in. Did you ever think what that word means? Well, it's the thing most stories and articles are made of—and it's got nothing to do with life. I bet you have got into the horrible habit of 'wondering' all the time—wondering whether you have really got 'genius' or whether you haven't, wondering if your 'technique' is growing, wondering if you should go to the Press Club and mix with the clan, or keep away from it and nurse originality, wondering whether you should love me, and if, when it 'comes to come' you really do love me or not? Of course you love me! There is no more question about that than the fact that a thousand buds are swelling along those big brown boughs, and the foot of the wind is boosting spring along with us. Just let life alone, and she answers all the questions for us, little heart."

Silence again, while the Difference narrowed in that triumphant bath of the sun.

"As for that Easter story"—catching her unspoken thought—"it seems to me that there is one very sure thing. You won't find it in churches, where they put conservatory lilies in their pots along the chancel, and quartettes sing anthems at so much per minute, nor in heart-stories, where the Easter Bonnet holds sway, nor in descriptions of the Vatican at Rome, nor in the best that you or any human could write about the mystery of Death. Because Easter is a kind of shout that transcends death, and goes on and on forever. Write about anything that lives, ma mia, and you have your Easter story."

□

AND after a little that winged god, the car, ceased suddenly, for no apparent reason, while the man crawled under its anatomy, and the pink girl cooled her heels in idleness until the mood took her to explore a tiny house along the road and warm those selfsame heels.

"I'll come for you in ten minutes," shouted the man, encouragingly.

A bewrinkled dame answered her little knock.

"Of course ye may come in," said she. "I bin watchin' ye since it run down. Is it a break, then?"

Continued on page 45

THE COST OF A CRIME

The Story of Yielding to Temptation and the Tragedy Ensuing

By ANNIE S. SWAN

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Reedham steals thirteen thousand pounds of trust money held by the firm of Lowther, Currie and Company, in London, England. He confesses to his friend, Lidgate, who allows him to escape, and who afterwards informs Mrs. Reedham of the crime. The only child, Leslie, is at school in Surrey. Leslie is brought home from school. Reedham, in the meantime, has found shelter in lodgings with Mrs. Webber, an old servant, and assumes the name of Thomas Charlton. He obtains employment with Archibald Currie, a brother of his former partner and is unrecognized. "Charlton" does well and wins the esteem of Mr. Currie and his ward, Katherine Wrede. Mrs. Reedham suffers from financial stress. "Charlton" prospers for two years and then it is decided to send him to South Africa.

"I HAVE been telling my brother of your hurried preparation, Charlton," said Archibald Currie pleasantly, "and how willingly you have fallen in with all my arrangements."

"It is a duty as well as a pleasure, sir," replied Charlton in a low voice. "Will you excuse me now? A man is waiting on the telephone. I merely looked in to say that I have engaged a second-class berth."

"First-class," put in Archibald Currie.

"No, second, it is good enough. The accommodation is first-rate. I'll go now."

He went out by the door rather abruptly, fancying that James Currie had moved to a position where he could better see his face.

"A queer-looking cuss," he observed, as the door closed. "What does he wear those blue goggles for? I could swear he doesn't need them."

"His eyes are weak. He's a good-looking man enough, Jamie. You're prejudiced."

"I could swear he isn't what he seems. There's a furtive uneasiness about him that is suggestive. But I'm not surprised, Archie, knowing what your fads are. You'll get let in one of these days, perhaps this time, who knows, then perhaps you'll be a little more careful about the scum of the earth."

"Jamie, I wish you'd pick your words," said Archie, good-humoredly. "I am certain Charlton's going to score for me this time."

"Well, let's hope so. I shouldn't care for Stephen to go out with that man, and he wouldn't care for it himself."

He took up his hat and they left the room together. As they passed the clerk's desk Archibald Currie stopped and let his hand fall for a moment with a very kind touch on Leslie Reedham's head. He half paused, as if to speak, and then seeming to think better of it, passed on. But outside he made an announcement which surprised his brother not a little.

"That was John Reedham's boy, Jamie. I would have presented him to you, but I couldn't remember whether you ought to remember him without introduction, and was afraid you might not wish to see him."

"Reedham's boy!" repeated James Currie, stopping in the passage and looking blankly into his brother's face. "Well, upon my word, Archie, what next? Are you incorrigible?"

"The sins of the fathers," said Archibald musingly. "We needn't visit them on the innocent heads. He's working very steadily, a nice lad, and devoted to his mother. It won't hurt you after all, Jamie, so you needn't glower over it. Give my respects to Jane, and if she'll be at home on Saturday afternoon I'll come up and make my peace after I get Charlton away."

They shook hands, and James Currie passed out. There was no good arguing with Archibald, he told himself, as he proceeded slowly down the street. He would be eccentric and unaccountable, to the last day of his life.

The conversation, however, had upset Archie more than he knew. He left business early, and got home to Hyde Park Square a little after tea. Katherine was at home, and flew to wait on him. Whatever worries met him in the world of business, the welcome at home never failed.

He told her about the trouble in South Africa, and of Charlton's hurried commission to go at once. She seemed deeply interested; he even fancied as he spoke that a slight shade crossed her face.

"You don't think with James that I am digging my own grave trusting this man so far," he said, as he took his cup of freshly-made and fragrant tea from her hand.

"No, certainly not," she answered, and the tea was spilled, by whose fault neither of them knew. She stooped, and with her handkerchief wiped the stain from his sleeve, apologizing with a faint smile.

"So you think he's all right, Katie, eh? Well, you've seen a good bit of him lately, and I must say I'd trust your judgment faster than Jamie's. He's a sort of Ishmaelite, with his hand against every man. You never get good service starting on these lines, my dear."

"No, I should say not. Has he been speaking against Mr. Charlton, then?"

"Yes, this afternoon. He thinks he'll make a mess of the Cape business, or perhaps do me altogeter. But I'm easy. I like Charlton. He's straight, and there never was a man who worked with such a will. He's a perfect galley slave. He's coming out to dinner to-night, and he sails on Saturday afternoon."

"How long will he be away?"

"Six months probably. I'm sorry to send him out at this season. Some men would have objected. If I'd been ten years younger, Katie, I would have tried to engineer the thing till August or so, and taken you with me. A big change would do us both good."

She made no reply, but he thought her face unusually grave."

"My brother came to me about another matter this afternoon, Katie. Charlton was by the way. He was championing Stephen's cause."

Her color rose, and he saw her hand clench a little.

"Uncle Archie, it is not kind nor right that I should be pestered like this. Why won't anybody believe, even you, that I have been quite fair and straight with Stephen Currie. I have told him as plainly as any woman can speak that I can't and won't marry him. Will there never be an end of it?"

"Apparently not. He's very much in love."

"But I am not," she said rebelliously. "I shall have to leave London if he keeps on tormenting me like this. I had a letter from him yesterday; I burned it without telling you. I am so tired of it all. Let's go away somewhere where we can't see or hear anything about the James Curries."

Her eyes were full of tears, which surprised Archibald Currie. He could not remember seeing her in tears before.

He was quick enough, however, to enter into her mood, and they drifted into talk of their summer plans, which ended in a project of immediate excursions into the country to look for a suitable home as a permanency. The hours quickly passed, and when Charlton arrived to dine at half-past seven he found Miss Wrede in the drawing-room alone. She was looking extraordinarily handsome, in a diaphanous black robe and no ornaments but a big bunch of roses in her corsage.

"Good evening," she said, and her voice had never sounded sweeter or more womanly. "Excuse my uncle not being down, will you? He will be here immediately. He came home very tired and worried from the city, and I persuaded him to lie down. He has had a lovely sleep, and feels so much better. So you have a long journey in prospect? It is good of you to be so willing to relieve my uncle of part of his anxiety. He is very happy about it."

"And I also. It is the chance of a lifetime. He will never understand how much I owe to him," replied Charlton, in a full voice. "I suppose you are aware that he picked me up a derelict and set me on my feet? He has often spoken of my willing service, making far too much of it. You will quickly understand that any service I can render must first of all be a thank offering."

Her eyes glowed, her sweet, proud mouth trembled a little as she bowed her head.

"I understand that; but nothing will ever make me believe, Mr. Charlton, that you became a derelict, as you express it, through any fault of your own."

"Ah, what a comfort you would be to a man who might aspire to be your friend!" he cried involuntarily. "Your words sink deep into my heart, believe me, I am unable to justify them, I can only say thank you. It is women like you, and men like Mr. Currie, who help to lessen the woe of the world."

She heard the sound of footsteps in the distance and her uncle's voice.

With a gesture of infinite grace and friendliness she took the bouquet from her bosom and gave him a rose.

CHAPTER IX.

THE SPY.

NEXT morning Charlton was startled to find on his desk a letter addressed in a quite familiar handwriting. It bore no stamp, but he needed no telling whence it came. Was not every character familiar; how many times he had joked and teased his wife about her dashing lines, her somewhat fantastic style. Yet it was characteristic, too, for Bessie Reedham with all her sweetness would be very determined when occasion arose. He toyed with the letter, not immediately opening it. He could guess its contents, and also surmised that the boy had brought it. He nodded to him as he came through the office a few moments before, and had even been struck by a certain wistfulness in his expression; a look that put into words might have said: "Why do you go away?" He looked at his other letters, even opened one or two, but so languid was his interest that he realized his wife's letter must be opened first

28 Burnham Road,
Clapton, N.E.
May 14th.

Dear Sir—

I beg that you will excuse my intrusion, but I have heard from my son that you are about to leave England for a considerable period, and I feel I should like to offer you before you go my heartfelt thanks for your very great kindness to the boy. He is never tired talking about it, and I can easily gather how exceptionally considerate and helpful you have been to him. I do not know whether you are aware of the distressing circumstances of my life, of how little chance there is that I shall ever be able to repay you. But at least you have won the lifelong gratitude of a woman who has suffered beyond the common lot. It is my earnest desire and prayer that the boy himself may prove grateful and worthy your almost fatherly kindness. Wishing you the fullest success in your undertaking, and a speedy return.

Believe me, yours gratefully,
BESSIE ALICE REEDHAM.

Charlton smiled strangely as he laid the letter down, and dropping his chin in his hands, kept his eyes fixed on the written words. But it was not of them he was thinking at the moment. A sudden temptation came to him to make a clean breast of the whole circumstances, to go out to Bessie and take her to his heart. His heart beat a little at the thought, but he tried to repress the ardor of his desire, telling himself the time was not yet ripe. This journey to the Cape, if brought to a successful issue, would certainly so consolidate his position that it would be safe to own up. Even the money might then be restored, for everything is forgiven to a successful man. "No, no, we must wait, poor old girl," he said tenderly, as he folded up the letter. "I must not even write unless I dictate it. I'll send a message by the boy."

He replaced the letter in its envelope and slipped it into an inner pocket. It touched something there that impeded its smooth progress. He put his hand in a trifle impatiently, and drew out a piece of tissue paper in which something was wrapped. Then he flushed dully, for it was the rose Katherine Wrede had given him, and which he had said should be his talisman of success. He changed it to another pocket, and then with a sudden effort of the will took it out again and threw it in the small, clear fire, which the chill of May mornings rendered acceptable. It was the right thing to do, yet he did not like to hear it crackle. He rose and stepped out into the office where all the clerks' pens were scratching busily, and made his way to the particularly high stool on which Leslie Reedham was perched. He spoke a few kind, almost tender words to the boy, and while he was speaking the head of the firm came in, smiling genially, as was his wont, on one and all.

"You seem very fond of that boy, Charlton," he remarked, as Charlton followed him to the private room. "I don't wonder at it; he's a promising lad, and his mother will be grateful, I am sure."

"She wrote to me to-day, thanking me," said Charlton, with some difficulty. "But it's a very trifling thing, after all. The initial kindness, the great service, was rendered by you."

"Ah, yes, that's very true; but more even depends on the environment after the chance is given. Now, that lad's spirit would be easily crushed. Put him under Turner, for instance. His jeers and jibes would soon take the heart out of a sensitive lad like that. I wish you'd tell me what to do with Turner, Charlton. I don't like him. I've tried to get over it, and be just to him, but something tells me I ought to get rid of him. He's merely an eye-servant, and a poor one at that. But I think of his wife and children; I am told he has five children, and at his age he wouldn't find a berth so easily. I fear I must endure him a little longer."

Charlton made no reply. He did not care for the man, and could easily have proved a case against him. But gratitude for mercy vouchsafed to himself made him generous and forbearing towards others.

"Keep him on, sir," he said in a low voice, "as long as you possibly can. As you say, he will not easily find a berth."

"Well, since you plead his cause, I'll leave him in the meantime. But I wish I could feel more certain about him. I don't trust him, as perhaps I ought——"

Immediately he changed the subject, for there was much to discuss and settle regarding affairs at the Cape. Next afternoon Charlton left London with a wonderfully lightened heart, determined to put forth the most strenuous efforts on his employer's behalf, to leave no stone unturned to make his commission a success. Had Archibald Currie even faintly guessed what the success might mean to the man who had undertaken the journey, he could not have had a single qualm. But indeed he had none, and that evening, over the dinner table at his house in Hyde Park Square, he extolled him to the skies. Katherine seemed to listen so well-pleased that a curious thought—or, rather, intuition—flashed through Archibald Currie's mind. Seldom had she appeared so interested in any man.

"You still like Charlton, Katie?" he said enquiringly, as he took up the half glass of '47 port with which he invariably concluded his dinner.

"Yes, I like him," she frankly replied. "He is simple, honest, and sincere. And so much a gentleman. I would give something to know the story behind those eyes."

"And if it should be a discreditable story, as James assured me yesterday was most likely?"

"Nothing could make me believe that of Mr. Charlton," she replied, in the same firm, steady tone.

"Well, he's a lucky man to have gained your confidence—generally a difficult feat for his sex," observed the old man whimsically. "There's no doubt about his ability, at any rate; and my mind is extraordinarily at ease about the Cape affair. Well, I heard to-day of an old Dorset Manor House that may suit us, I think. Not too much land, but an ideal house, and the old oak in it they say is worth a king's ransom. Yet it's to be had cheap. It belongs at present to Gelderstein, the stock broker, who bought it from Lord Brinkwell. Shall we go down on Monday and look at it?"

Katherine was all interest at once, and they went on to discuss the advantages and disadvantages of country life, while Charlton, tossing on the English Channel, was thinking of the strange web of his fate, and speculating regarding its ultimate issue. Against his better judgment he had penned a note in a disguised hand from the boat at Plymouth to his own wife. It was unnecessary, also, since he had sent a verbal message of thanks by the boy. But the temptation was too great. A good many people in London thought of Charlton that night, the majority of those immediately interested wishing him well. Among them Mary Anne Webber, busy putting away all his things, having liberty to let the rooms if she could in his absence, pondered on the lapse of time, and how apparently, without regret, he had been able to live the solitary life. It was inexplicable to her. Mary Anne was an elemental creature. Cut her off from the usual routine of life, withdraw from her the ordinary family ties and obligations, and she would be at sea. She could not understand Charlton, she had given up trying. More than once she had hinted that it could not be right for his wife to remain in ignorance of his whereabouts, and on the morning of his departure he had called her in, and partly explaining the nature of his journey, had said that on his return all would be cleared up; with that she was obliged to be content. In the interval, however, another person intervened in time to hasten matters to a crisis.

Turner, by nature a spy, had easily discovered his rival's place of abode, as well as the very few and quite innocent facts regarding his private life. A mere suggestion thrown out by his wife, a stupid creature, at the best, had sent him off on a strange track regarding Charlton. When he discovered that Mary Anne Webber had once been a servant in Reedham's house at Norwood he began to piece the story together; Charlton's absence from London gave him an extraordinarily favorable chance to prosecute the enquiries which, if satisfactory to Turner himself, would put a very effective spoke in Charlton's wheel. There are men to whom no dirty work comes amiss. Turner was in no way troubled with any qualms regarding his underhand dealings where Charlton was concerned, and continued to proceed with them in a leisurely fashion. He had a final step in view, but was in no haste until Charlton should be well across the ocean.

It was the month of June, on a fine Saturday afternoon, when riding on the top of an omnibus all the way from Victoria, he arrived in Camden Road. He wore a light tweed suit, a straw hat, and a flower in his buttonhole; and he smoked hard all the way through the crowded streets, while he pondered on all the issues which might arise from that afternoon's work. If his suspicions should really prove to be correct, he was not even certain that he could not claim a reward from Scotland Yard. Just two years ago John Reedham had been badly wanted by the authorities. The excitement grew upon the spy, and he was glad to get off the omnibus at Brittannia, and take a brisk walk for the remainder of the way.

His visit was to Mrs. Webber, and he had decided upon a very bold move. He found the house without difficulty, having on two occasions shadowed Charlton almost to the door.

The exterior of No. 47 in the crescent was very trim and inviting, with its clean curtains and bright window boxes. A card with "Apartments" printed in bold letters in the sitting-room window furnished Turner with an excuse, if he required any, for intruding on Mrs. Webber.

Mary Anne was very busy getting ready to take her numerous brood out to tea at the house of her sister-in-law at Dalston, and was considerably flustered when Alice said a gentleman was in the sitting-room waiting to see her. She kept him waiting some few minutes, and was profuse in her apologies when she did appear at last, very red in the face, but resplendent in her Sunday clothes.

"Don't mention it, ma'am," said Turner smoothly "I'm in no hurry at all. Merely lookin' for rooms for a friend of mine. Saturday afternoon may be inconvenient for you, ma'am, but for a business man like myself it suits uncommonly well. Fact, it's the only time we have to do a little business."

"Yes, sir. I understands, but though the card is hup in the winder, it carn't be a permanency, as the gentleman wot 'as 'ad 'em is only away for six months, an' I promised to keep 'em ready against the time 'e comes back."

"Yes, yes, I quite understand," said Turner, and in spite of himself his voice betrayed a sort of trembling eagerness. "Fact is," he added, lowering his voice, and suddenly jerking his thumb vaguely round the room, "all fair and square here, Mrs. Webber, nobody but friends in this house, eh?"

"We are friendly folks, sir, yes," said Mary Anne, but a trifle drily, for she did not feel favorably impressed by the stranger, and his familiarity somehow annoyed her.

"Fact is, Mrs .Webber, I shouldn't have known of these lodgings except through the gentleman we needn't name. He recommended them to me."

"Did 'e? Well, it's queer 'e didn't tell me. 'E wasn't at all keen about my lettin' 'em, and would 'ave paid while he was away. But as I pointed out, it was a silly waste o' money; an' 'e 'avin' to spend so much travelin 'about. An I promised to put all 'is things away an' tike great care o' 'em. How long would your friend want the rooms for?"

"Till Mr. Charlton comes back. You see, we're all pals, we saw him the last thing before he sailed. We are in the know, you see, ma'am," he added, lowering his voice. "We were friends of John Reedham's before Thomas Charlton was ever heard of——"

He spoke the words deliberately, and watched with ferret eyes for signs of their effect on the woman listening to him. He saw her start, and a deepened flush overspread her face. But she shut her lips.

"I dunno what you're talkin' abart, sir," said she. "My Mister Charlton will be back this side o' Chrissmus. If any gentleman likes to tike the rooms knowin' 'e'll 'ave to turn hout the moment Mister Charlton come back 'e can 'ave them a sovring a week hand no extries."

Turner nodded and slightly winked. He had not perhaps achieved the instantaneous effect he had looked for, on the other hand he had not failed. The start, the flush, and the uneasy eye of Mary Anne told their tale. Turner was now absolutely convinced that Reedham and Charlton were one.

"Well, I'll tell my friend he may call next week to see the rooms. Meanwhile I'm certainly obliged to you, good-day."

"Good-day," answered Mary Anne with most unpromising severity, and as she closed the door another word escaped her lips. "Varmint!" She sat down trembling on the hall bench, and vigorously fanned her face with her handkerchief. She had very nearly given herself away, indeed she was not quite sure whether she had not done so wholly. The memory of Turner's eyes upon her when he had uttered Reedham's name made her feel cold yet. She was wholly miserable lest she had inadvertently wrought some mischief to the man she had so long befriended. Turner, sneak and spy, had found her off guard. She felt that though her spoken words had been all right, her looks had belied her.

The children came clamoring on the stairs to know when she would be ready to leave for the party, and with a sigh she was obliged to put her own misgivings on one side. To-morrow was Sunday, she told herself, as she gave little Tommy's collar a somewhat impatient jerk to bring it into position. Perhaps then she might steal an hour for quiet reflection. She would send the children to the park in the afternoon, and perhaps pay a visit to Burnham Road, Clapton, where Mrs. Reedham lived. She felt that this might be the right thing to do—something warned her that Turner was a person to be guarded against, and that he had treachery in his black heart regarding John Reedham. As Reedham had promised everything should be cleared up on his return from the Cape, there could be no great harm in letting the secret out. It was weighing on her so heavily she felt she could bear it no longer. At her sister's house in Kingsland Road she suddenly remembered how near she was to Clapton and how easily she might pay an experimental call on her old mistress. Alice Emily—otherwise Mrs. Higgins—made no objection to her leaving the company for an hour, having had the reason partly explained, and about six o'clock she got into the car in the High Street and proceeded out Clapton way. Mary Anne Webber, a Londoner born, was in her element seeking out new places. She found Burnham Road quite easily by a sort of homing instinct as it were. She began to feel very excited as she drew near the house, but reflecting that she could explain her call to Mrs. Reedham on perfectly natural grounds, she calmed herself with an effort and knocked at the door. She was disappointed with the appearance of the house. It did not look well-kept A little sigh escaped her as she recalled to memory the beautiful Norwood home in which her old mistress had taken such pride. She rang twice, and then a maid, out of the usual uniform, though quite neat and tidy, opened the door.

"Mrs. Reedham—no she ain't at home, and there ain't no Mrs. Reedham now," she said somewhat pertly.

"She lives here, don't she? My nime's Webber, I'm an old servant of 'ers, when she was at Norwood. Ain't this 'er address?"

"'As been, but never no more, thanks be to goodness," said the other one. "I think I've 'eard of you. Come in, won't cher, if you've come fur, an' I'll get yer a cup o' tea. I'm on me own jus' now. Keepin' open 'ouse fer Master Leslie till they comes back."

Mary Anne looked completely mystified, and after a moment's hesitation accepted the invitation to step inside. Her new friend conducted her to the little kitchen at the back, which looked upon the garden and was a very cool and shady place on a hot afternoon.

"The stove's hout, but I can boil the kettle in a trice on the gas ring. Sit down, Mrs. Webber. Well, ain't this a how-dye-do?"

"I don't know what you mean," said Mary Anne desperately. "Whatever are you talkin' abart?"

The damsel bustled about quietly, with the important air of one who knew great secrets, but was in no hurry to impart them.

"My, ain't it 'ot fer May? I was that glad yer carn't think to git the stove off. I'm to begin turnin' hup to-morrow, only keepin' Master Leslie's room rite till they comes back."

"Where is Marster Leslie. I should like dearly to see him."

"No; 'e's gone down to 'em to-day in the country. Not at liberty to say where. It's a secret, like it always is in 'igh society," said the damsel, with her finger on her lips. "Missis only told me 'erself yesterday. But everybody'll know this week—leastways, all them as 'as any business. There 'ear the kettle singing'; it's the cutest ring yer ever saw. The pore gel's friend, I should christen it, I should——"

"What is it they're going to tell Marster Leslie, an' who's they?" enquired Mary Anne, with a desperate note in her voice. She did not know what she was going to hear, she only felt a great and growing apprehension, rapidly approaching panic.

"Well, as you're a friend of the fambly, so ter speak, I suppose I may tell yer. There ain't no Mrs. Reedham now; an' pore, dear, she must a bin mighty glad to get rid o' that nime. It ain't ever done 'er no good. But there's a Mrs. George Lidgate now, of 13 Cranbrook Terrace, Regent's Park; a lovely house, with double drorin-room. It's nearly settled, I think, though Missis, I know, was keen on the country. It was only thinkin' on Master Leslie, she said she'd live in London——"

To the damsel's astonishment, the visitor threw up her hands.

"God-a-mighty, it's a lie; it carn't be true. Why——"

She drew herself up sharply there, remembering what mischief is wrought by careless talk. But she moaned, and leaned upon her chair, rocking herself distressingly to and fro.

CHAPTER X.

THE RETURN.

REEDHAM returned to Southampton in November, by which time war had been declared in South Africa, and the long tragedy in England had begun. So rapidly had the time passed, so full of events had it been, that he could scarcely realize that six months had actually elapsed since he left England. He had left in the glory and glow of an English summer, he returned to find winter on the landscape and winter in the souls of men.

By the steamer in which he had his passage were the first batch of wounded from the front, consigned to Netley, where they were sadly, yet eagerly, waiting for them. The great leviathan moved to her dock with a stately dignity, almost as if she felt the importance of her mission. Charlton, standing impatiently on the deck, glanced with but a casual interest at the small crowd gathered on the quay. Among that crowd there would be none to welcome him. A fine, thin rain was falling through the soundless air, and a dense mist hung low over Southampton Water, obscuring the great hospital on the one side and the fringes of the New Forest on the other. It was a dismal, depressing day, reflective of the deep, almost sullen, depression in every Englishman's soul.

Charlton, it may be at once said, had been extraordinarily successful in the object of his journey. He had arrived at a moment the most opportune, and armed with full credentials and power to act immediately, according to his judgment, he had made excellent terms for his employer.

He found that he possessed organizing powers of a high order, these coupled to a conciliatory manner, and ability to work smoothly with all sorts and conditions of men, stood him in good stead.

The opportunity for securing a large share of the transport trade consequent upon a sudden and serious civil war, was certainly unique.

(To be continued.)

HYGIENE FOR RURAL SCHOOLS

The Third Article on the Schools Which Are Making Citizens

By A. A. BACKUS, M.D.

TO sum up the suggestions in our former articles upon this question we will divide this one under four heads, viz.: Light, ventilation, drinking water and seating.

In the first place the fact that so many school children suffer from some form of eye trouble shows plainly there must be something wrong in the lighting of our schoolhouses. The difficulty in cities is sometimes unavoidable, because of the difficulty in procuring open space, but in the rural schools this is never the case. Therefore it is always possible to have sufficient light if care is taken in arranging for windows. To get the best effect windows must reach within a few inches of the ceiling. Lighting from the sides is considered by most of our architects insufficient, and by an oculist impracticable. Therefore the easiest remedy is to have windows at the back as well as at the sides of the schoolrooms. The windows ought to have square rather than Gothic tops, and no projecting outside casing or ornaments to cut off the light. Awnings are undesirable, as are yellow, white and red shades. A neutral grey tint is best, and the same neutral grey tint carried out on the inside walls is pleasant to the eye. Dr. F. Lincoln, M.D., writes: "It is a cardinal rule that no one shall be forced to face the windows while reading or otherwise exercising his sight. Therefore no windows must be in front of the scholars. Excessive use, even under favorable conditions, wearies the eye. It seems well proved that in general, students who spend longer hours over home lessons are affected by near-sight in larger proportions." Poor light not only fatigues the eye, but also induces the pupil to bring the eye closer to the book.

The eye of a child has an astonishing faculty of seeing things at the distance of two or three inches—and this cannot be done except by the "muscle of accommodation" and in using this muscle, which arranges the focus, there is a change in the shape of the eyeball. An eye in this condition is working in a state of tension and if too long continued is liable to produce permanent change in the form of the shape which produces eventually the near-sighted eye.

□

THIS peculiarity of accommodation also makes it difficult to get children to obey the physiological laws of distance, particularly as there are so many faults in the school furniture to encourage this defect. Separation of the seat from the desk rather than having the desk partly over the seat is one fault, a desk too high in proportion to seat is another, and the stooping position of children in writing is not only bringing the eyes too close to the object, and consequently harmful to them, but the body as well.

During childhood, while the tissues are soft and in formation, it is easy to acquire any deformity, and the eye of the growing child is peculiarly liable to conform to wrong adjustments which are sometimes difficult to connect with any form of lens. The limit at which a book should be held from the eye for small children is from nine to fourteen inches, for larger children, fifteen or sixteen inches, and in the well-lighted schoolroom with properly adjusted desks and seats, there will be little difficulty in getting the pupils to adopt this "physiological" distance. Hypermetropia—long-sight—is a common trouble, astigmatism is also common, both of which are aggravated by poor lighting, and require the attention of an expert medical doctor.

A poorly lighted schoolroom is not only the cause of abnormal conditions of the eye, but the cause of general ill health as well. Sunlight must enter the schoolroom, and will enter it if proper attention has been given to the lighting. Ventilation is a part of lighting, for without that there can be no proper ventilation. When we remember that for every scholar there should be an allowance of two hundred and fifty cubic feet of space, this air space being renewed and changed from time to time, it is easily seen that in no way can that change be brought about so readily and so well as through the open windows.

□

AS schoolhouses are now built, ventilation must be carried out through open windows. Until the system of ventilation by flues is more perfect than it is at present. There must be, even when flues exist, an additional income of fresh air through the windows. This is accomplished by lifting up the lower sash and lowering the upper sash: window boards are placed under the lower sash, filling the entire space, the air entering the crack between the sashes. In this way all direct drafts of air are avoided.

Heating and ventilating go hand in hand, and in our rural schools both are left to the care of the teacher. Here we have wood fires, and often the fuel is green, so that under the very best management the temperature will vary from 50 degrees to 85 degrees, and a thermometer is something almost unknown in the country schoolhouse. The only way to discover the amount of heat or cold is that teachers and children are burning or freezing.

There are some ventilating stoves now on the market, and no doubt, although they cannot supply a quantity of air sufficient with the needs of a school, yet they are good as far as they go.

Fireplaces in private houses are remedies for bad ventilation, but are not equal to the requirements of a school, although a partial remedy in some cases.

The great difficulty in ventilating schools in cold weather is that the impurities in the air cannot be got rid of by themselves, and as the question is not of pure air, our only remedy being to dilute the air by letting out some that is foul and letting in some that is pure. In some cases there is a greater fear of too much dilution by fresh air than of contamination by foul, as children and teacher suffer the consequences of the present conditions through many years to come, and without doubt many patients in consumption hospitals to-day are now paying the penalty of bad ventilation in the schools which they in childhood attended. Of so great consequence is the ventilation of schoolrooms that the thought governing the mind of the architect ought to be, "How can we get rid of the bad air from the exhalations from all these lungs? How can we introduce enough pure air properly warmed to feed these same lungs?" Every device of flues, fireplaces, ventilating stoves, windows, sunlight, ought to be considered and introduced in rural schoolhouses regardless of present cost, as it will be a better investment for the future than even Weston Farm, and will enable the children to develop into strong, vigorous men and women.

□

SOME teachers of the present day have very wisely introduced the custom of opening the windows for a few minutes during school hours, and at the same time giving the children some form of calisthenics. If a school is so fortunate as to own a piano a musical march or drill of five or ten minutes' duration does a great deal of good, helps discipline, relaxes the tension of the mind, relieves the eye and prevents any tendency to take cold from the open windows as the pure air comes in, and the contaminated air escapes. Perhaps there is no greater need in the physical development to-day than increased breathing capacity. This could be greatly encouraged by suggestion during exercise.

There can be no more profitable education than that which fits each for the everyday duties of life, and surely the knowledge of hygiene, or the laws of health, is most important, and this teaching should be practical rather than theoretical, carried out every day in the school life and its adjustments.

Light and ventilation are the most important sanitary agents, and put the body in condition to withstand the onsets of disease.

Care of drinking water for school children is often neglected, and the custom of all pupils drinking from one common cup is not only unsanitary, but has a tendency to develop habits of carelessness and an indifference to the common and "sweet civilities of life." There is a form of nervous drinking by children, and much water is taken which is not needed at all. If you have noticed children in the train, you know the constant running up and down to and from the drinking cup. This is not so much evidence of thirst as of an uncontroled nervousness. This same thing is carried out in school, and many children if not checked will drink fifteen or sixteen cups of water each day. This causes distended stomachs, and results eventually in some form of indigestion difficult to correct. That the supply of drinking water should be uncontaminated is so evident it would seem unnecessary to write of it, but the condition of the pumps and platforms at the wells in the rural school grounds so often indicates a disregard of ordinary cleanliness, we cannot but call attention to the need of care in this respect.

Pure drinking water, individual drinking cups, a proper pitcher from which to pour it, are some of the requisites to remember in the water supply. The obvious disregard of the comfort of school children is evident in the manner of supplying seats and desks for the pupils, and that this very disregard is the cause of physical deformities there is no doubt. The rarity of a well-formed body is a disgrace to the race; in the lower animals deformity is most uncommon, but probably ninety per cent. of all children after the age of fourteen show some lack of symmetry acquired at school from improper seating, the attitude taken at the desks when writing, and the lolling habits indulged in, both at school and at home.

Perhaps of all the departments in school hygiene to be considered, that of the country privy is most needed, and if the checking of youthful immorality is desirable, here is a splendid place from which to work. "Unclean! unclean!" is the cry of this wooden leper from its ever prominent position in the rural school grounds.

The sanitation and beautifying of our rural schools means so much to the education as well as the health of the pupils that only from the educational side it is worthy of consideration. Children coming from well-regulated, sanitary, orderly schools must bring ideals of health and system which will be carried out in their own homes later on, and the three greatest elements towards health are light, ventilation, proper physical development.

The Home Grounds

By C. ERNEST WOOLVERTON

THERE is perhaps no subject on which opinion differs so widely as on the ideal treatments of home grounds. Why this is so, and what home owners should do to strike the right trail, I will endeavor to explain.

First, why is it that in walking down a city street or along the country road, you pass homes which you not only see, but feel that the surroundings belong to the home and the home to the surroundings. One seems a part of the other. And again you pass homes that at once give you a feeling of something wrong—out of place, and not the homelike surroundings of the former place.

Let us suppose that each person belonging to the two different types of homes has had equal advantages in building up his home and surroundings. Neither have employed expert aid and neither have an expert knowledge of landscape work. Then, why the difference? Why has one succeeded where the other has failed? Is it not because each person has displayed his own individual taste? Now the one person's taste was educated along right lines while the other's was not. I do not mean by that that either person had studied landscape art, but simply that the one's good taste would express itself in whatever he did in dress, in the inside or the outside of his home, etc., while the other's would be vice versa Therefore, if you wish to have beautiful homes and home surroundings, you must first educate your taste to appreciate that which is good.

The reader may ask: How are we to know what is really good or bad taste in landscape art? How are we to educate our tastes along this line? I would reply by asking you, for instance, if you intended to acquire good taste in your dress, how would you go about it? Would you order a suit made up just because the goods were of the latest fashion or would you select a color and pattern that would best suit your own requirements. Or again, if you were furnishing and decorating the interior of your home and had no expert advice, would you choose furniture, wall coverings, draperies and rugs without taking into consideration the fitness and harmony of each when brought into their respective relations. If you use your judgment and common sense you would not. In the first instance. you would first study what color and style of clothes were most becoming to you. In the second instance, if your house was colonial architecture, you would wish for colonial furnishings and colors in draperies, upholstering and rugs that would harmonize one with the other. Therefore, you will see that in educating your taste along any line whatever you must not only study and consider the individual merits of the parts, but these parts must harmonize when brought into relationship one with the other.

This applies directly to the ideal treatment of your home grounds. If you are to make a success of laying out your own grounds you must think not only of the merits of each component part, but these parts must be placed and arranged so as to form an harmonious whole. You are, in fact, making an outdoor picture and using real models instead of brush and color. Just as the artist in painting a picture always has some central object or feature with all other parts of the picture in subordination, so you must plan your home surroundings. Your home is the central feature in the picture you are making. You must group your large trees and shrubs to the rear to form a background or setting for the home, and if your lawn is spacious enough, frame in the sides with massed shrubbery, trees and flowers. Always keep an open unbroken expanse of turf in the front and widening as it recedes from the house. Use the brighter colored flowers and shrubbery near the house, being careful that the colors harmonize, and, as you recede, tone the colors down to dull greys and greens.

Do not place any formal flower beds on your lawn. They belong to formal work and should be kept for the formal gardens. Such a garden must have a reason for existence. It must be built on some produced axis of the house and be connected to the house by one or more straight walks and located preferably in the rear.

For instance, you may have a living room with a door or French window located at the rear, and on the centre axis of the room. Now produce the axis from the door by a straight walk leading to some architectural terminus. With this, then, as your major axis, the formal garden may be designed.

As to hard and fast rules, none can be given, for each and every place requires a different treatment according to location, surroundings and existing natural features. I can only say that in planning your own grounds each one must use good common sense and good taste. Think not only of the different flowers and shrubs that you wish to include on your lawn, but think of the composition as a whole. Your success depends proportionately on the amount of harmony that you are able to produce. The design, of course, must fit; that is, it must be in keeping with the surroundings or lack of harmony would result. Study to make your home homelike, try to give it that feeling of repose and rest which only comes through unity of design, by avoiding loud and gaudy colorings and by using colors that rest the eye instead of dazzling it.

THE GARDEN AT "FLAGCOURT," RESIDENCE OF MR. JOHN FIRSTBROOK, TORONTO

Artistic Porch Boxes

By C. A. BARRY

WHEN it is not convenient to cultivate flowers in beds, resort may be had to the use of boxes on the porch or veranda. Pretty porch boxes, containing bright-hued flowering plants, add to the attractiveness of the home, whether there is a garden or not.

Any strong box that is long and narrow with a depth of six or seven inches will be suitable for the purpose. It may be painted the color of the house or be of a contrasting shade. Green is most useful as it harmonizes with the foliage of the plants the box contains.

For an interesting effect the box might be covered with rough bark. Large pieces should be selected. This scheme makes an ornament of the box itself. When filled with blooming plants and trailing vines the effect is very pleasing.

In the bottom of porch boxes a layer of barnyard manure should be placed. It is not necessary to provide for drainage as the excessive moisture will escape through the crevices in the box. The soil needs to be quite rich. If an abundance of water is used almost any plants will do well.

If geraniums are to be used young and thrifty plants should be secured. Petunias and nasturtiums give good satisfaction in boxes. Foliage plants are favorites for the purpose, and a fern or two is a pleasing addition. Crowding should be avoided. Do not forget to provide lots of water.

AN INTERESTING DETAIL OF THE GARDEN AT "FLAGCOURT," RESIDENCE OF MR. JOHN FIRSTBROOK.
Chadwick and Beckett, architects. Courtesy of Construction.

Ask the Best Cook You Know About Knox Gelatine

Ask your neighbor or friend who is "A Splendid Cook" and see if she will not tell you that Knox Gelatine is just as much a staple article in the pantry as flour, sugar or butter.

Thousands of housewives have used Knox Gelatine in countless ways for twenty years or more. Most of them buy at least two packages at a time—and order two more when the second package is broken into—so that Knox Gelatine may never be wanting at the critical moment in preparing a meal.

The transformation of any seasonable fruits—such as apples, oranges, or bananas—into a quickly prepared dessert is a delight both to the eye and to the palate.

KNOX
PURE · PLAIN
SPARKLING
GELATINE

—Try This New Dessert—

Maple Sponge Boil 2 cups Brown or Maple Sugar and ½ cup hot water to a syrup. Soak ½ package Knox Pure Plain, Sparkling Gelatine in 1½ cups cold water and pour the hot syrup over this.

Put in cool place and when nearly set beat in the stiffly beaten whites of two or three eggs and a cup of English walnuts cut up fine.

Serve with a custard made of the yolks of the eggs, 1 pint milk and 3 tablespoonfuls sugar.

Knox Gelatine comes in two packages, both in GRANULATED form, QUICKLY DISSOLVED—the PURE, PLAIN, SPARKLING, UNFLAVORED, UNSWEETENED and the

Knox Pure, Sparkling, Acidulated Gelatine

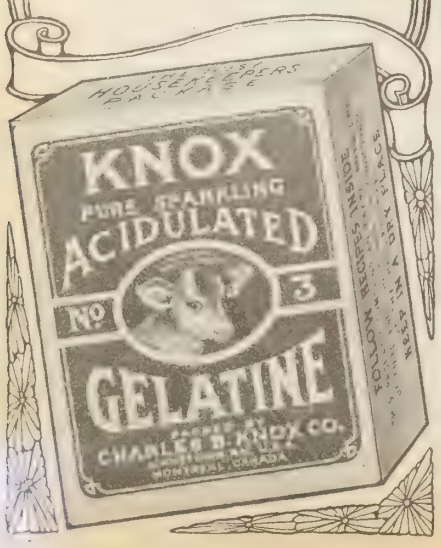
called "The Busy Housekeeper's Package" because in addition to the two envelopes of Pure Sparkling Gelatine, it also contains an extra envelope of Pure Concentrated Fruit Juice (Lemon), affording the busy housewife a ready prepared flavoring.

Knox Recipe Book FREE

More than 100 recipes for Desserts, Salads, Candies, Jellies, Puddings, Ice Creams, Sherbets, etc., have been reproduced in our illustrated recipe book sent FREE for your grocer's name.

Paste coupon for 2-cent stamp and grocer's name.

501 Knox Avenue Johnstown, N.Y.
Branch Factory: Montreal



With the Journal's Juniors

A Corner for the Small Person

By COUSIN CLOVER

The Winter Adventure

WE have received from our young friends quite a number of letters on the subject of a winter adventure—and have found a variety of experiences narrated by the writers. In next month's JOURNAL we expect to announce the names of the prize-winners, and hope that we shall be able soon to announce also another competition. In the meantime, write to us and let us know how you are geting on. Some of you forget, and write on both sides of the page. This is breaking the rules—and you must remember in future to write on one side only.

Some Winter Letters

Gore Bay, Ont., Jan. 30, 1912.

Dear Editor:

Seeing that a competition on "A Winter Adventure" was open, I decided to send in a description of one of my adventures.

One beautiful winter afternoon (when my cousins were visiting me) we decided to go out sleigh-riding. The day being appointed, we were ready when the sleigh arrived at the door to take us to the hill immediately after dinner.

Soon we were flying over the new-fallen snow, delighted with the thoughts of the beautiful afternoon we had planned to have.

When we came to the hill which was very well beaten, because the boys and girls went coasting there frequently, we saw a number of our friends who had arrived in advance.

After enjoying ourselves immensely for about two hours, my brother returned to take us to his house for tea.

On our way, I am sorry to relate, the horses became frightened at a couple of dogs fighting on the road, and ran into the ditch, sending us flying in the snow. Fortunately no one was severely injured. After geting the sleigh and horses on the road we were once more on our way.

We soon arrived at my brother's, and I was very pleasantly surprised by seeing an old friend of my father's and mother's, who had been traveling around for years. We knew he would have many interesting stories to relate. After partaking of a delicious supper and hearing some of his very interesting stories we started for home, taking my friend with us.

We soon arrived home, tired but happy, and our little adventure was brought to a close.

My little cousins soon went away, and I was very sorry when they were gone.

Aged 11 ETHEL MCCRACKEN.

I certify that this is the sole work of Ethel

MRS. T. MCCRACKEN.

* * *

Dear Ethel:

This is a very nicely-written letter for a young person eleven years of age. I am a little uncertain about the whereabouts of Gore Bay, but think it is on Manitoulin Island. If this is correct, then you are a very fortunate girl, for I remember how beautiful that island seemed when I visited it many years ago. Write to us again.

JOHNNIE CANUCK IN WESTERN COSTUME

Hampton, Ont., Jan. 15th, 1912.

Dear Cousin Clover:

I am just going to tell you about the place where I live. I am ten years old, and live in the village of Hampton. It is in the township of Darlington, the county of Durham, and the province of Ontario. It is about fifty miles from Toronto. I go by rail on the C.N.R. My father keeps a store, and I am going to try to help him when I get older. We grow apples, pears, grapes, turnips, mangels, and other things here. We have a great deal of snow at present. Skating in this place is very good. In the summer I go boat riding and bathing. I enjoy going to Toronto, because I have a sister up there. We have just one church here; it is a Methodist, but we have a good Sunday School. We have about one hundred and thirty scholars, when all are present. I go to Sunday School, and I have a lovely teacher; her name is Mrs. Kerslake. I go to school; it is called S. S. No. 11. I am in the third book. There are seven boys in my class. We have one mill here. I think I have told you all, so I will close now. Hoping Cousin Clover much success with the letters,

Yours truly,

MILTON AVERY.

This is to certify that the above letter was written and composed by himself.

Yours respectfully,

RICHARD AVERY.

* * *

My Dear Milton:

So you are a Durham boy! I belong to that good old county, too, and was born in Canton, near Port Hope, ever so long ago. So I have always been fond of Durham, and am glad to receive such a well-written letter from you.

Orillia, Feb. 17th, 1912.

Dear Cousin Clover:

I am sending you a composition for the competition, title, "A Winter Adventure." This is quite true, and happened last winter.

One afternoon, about two o'clock, my brother and I started for the "Muskoka Hill," one mile to the north of us. Reg. was pulling our new "Mountain Flyers," which we received at Christmas. The Muskoka Hill is quite steep, and is situated at the extreme north of our beautiful town. By the time we reached the summit we were slightly tired.

The hill was coated with ice, which made it good for coasting. Reg. sat at the front and steered. We needed no shoving, so I jumped on and we started to descend at a rapid rate. The first ride we were successful enough not to have an upset. The second time we weren't quite so successful. Near the foot of the hill there is a huge tree in the centre of the sidewalk. Each time Reg. had to steer to one side, but this time he hadn't measured the distance accurately enough. One side of the bobs touched the tree, and over we went into the deep ditch. We picked ourselves up, and were relieved to find no bones broken, but bruises, we had plenty of them.

Neither of us were at all alarmed, so ascended the hill the third time. Just as we reached the summit, we saw our cousin, come in from the country in his cutter. He called to us to race his new racer down the hill. We called back, "Ready." One, two, three, go! We both started at the word "Go." For a while we kept in advance, but having to turn out for the pine tree stopped us some. George (our cousin) said he was surprised, because he never dreamed we could go so fast.

We ascended once again, and Reg. said, "See that side street, Ruth; let us turn down it for a change." We did so, and this time took the road. Neither of us thought of the railroad track or the time. We were going at our highest speed, and never noticed or heard the 4.20 p.m. train coming, until we were right in the centre of the track. Luckily for us the bobs never stopped, or we should have been crushed to death.

We both concluded we would have no more rides on that hill. We went up the Muskoka Hill, then jumped on and rode down. Our father was out driving, and just happened to come around the corner as we got off the bobs. We were driven home, left the bobs there, and went for a drive. While out driving we came upon other children coasting. My brother and I decided the next time we went coasting we would try the west end, where there were no railroad tracks.

Yours sincerely,

RUTH ROBINSON.

Age 14. Certified, MRS. A. ROBINSON.

AN EASTER LUNCHEON

PREPARED BY

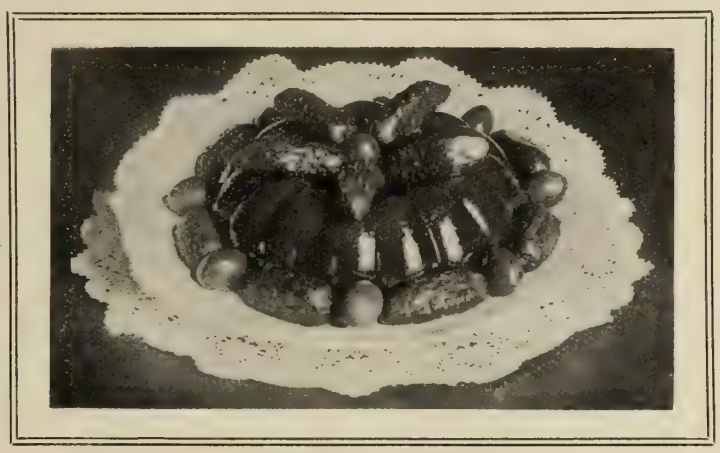
MARY H. NORTHEND

WITH the many suitable decorations purchasable at slight cost, the arrangement of the Easter luncheon table is a simple matter. No season of the year, with the possible exception of Christmas, boasts a more complete array of appropriate adornment, and the many pretty flowers typical of springtime afford to the Easter table the same sense of fitness and beauty, as do the lovely greens of December woods to the Christmas scheme.

One effective theme is described as a blossom table. Here the dainty cherry blossom, with its delicately tinted petals, is used as the central feature. Clusters of this fragrant bloom have been massed with wide spreading ferns into a green and white wicker basket, sounding the keynote of the color scheme. Tiny white candy rabbits outline the basket base, and between the projecting ends of the fern mat, crystal candlesticks, with green tapers, lend a decorative touch. Good-sized bunnies, with green ribbon bows tied around their necks, serve as favors, and the bon-bon dishes are small green and white baskets filled with egg-shaped green and white candies. There is not an inharmonious note in the entire theme, and the restfulness of the coloring renders this table particularly attractive.

Jonquils and narcissi may be used to excellent effect in an Easter luncheon scheme. Combined with ferns or smilax either is sure to prove wonderfully attractive. One of the prettiest tables I have seen showed a central arrangement of the former. Into a round tin pan, filled with moist sand, jonquils were solidly massed on an outline of curly fern leaves. Smilax covered the pan base, and surrounding the whole were tendrils of this same pretty greenery looped into wide half-circles. Brass candle holders, equipped with yellow candles, graced the several loops, and the completed arrangement in its effective coloring of green and gold was most artistic. Small ducklings served as place cards, and for favors, yellow egg-shaped boxes, filled with candies, were used.

The star-like narcissus permits of a wider scope of treatment than the jonquil, the slenderness of the bloom adapting itself to any number of artistic effects. One pretty scheme shows as a central feature a narcissi-filled birch bark covered basket, depended by smilax tendrils from the chandelier, directly above a circular mirror, wreathed in smilax, studded with narcissi. Small crystal candlesticks, with white tapers, outline the whole, and ropes of smilax extend from the candle holders to each plate. Egg-shaped boxes or baskets, filled with candies, and tied with yellow ribbons to match the gold of the narcissi centres, can be used as favors with this scheme, and for place cards simple white cards adorned in one corner with a spray of narcissi will be attractive.



BEEF TONGUE IN JELLY

POTATO SNOW

OYSTER PIE

As to the menu suitable for an Easter luncheon, any number of attractive and appetizing dishes suggest themselves as appropriate. The following is offered as an idea:

Corn Soup

Olives — Nuts

Jellied Tongue.

Oyster Pies

Potato Snow — Buttered Peas

Tomato Salad

Compote of Pears with Rice

Cake

Coffee

CORN SOUP—Press one can of corn through the colander and add to one quart of boiling milk. Season to taste with butter, pepper and salt. Serve hot.

JELLIED TONGUE—Cook beef tongue until tender, cool and slice. Fill a mould with alternate layers of the tongue and aspic jelly. When hard, unmould on a lace paper doily, and garnish with tiny gherkins and olives. To make the aspic jelly, soak half a box of gelatine until soft. Add to one and one-half pints of clear beef stock mixed with the white of one egg beaten with one spoonful of the cold stock. Season with salt, pepper, two cloves, and one large slice of onion, if desired. Let come to a boil and then strain.

OYSTER PIES—Make generous shells of good puff paste, bake and fill with hot oysters in cream sauce. Top each pie with slightly slated whipped cream and garnish with halves of pimolas. To make the puff paste, take two teaspoons of baking powder and one teaspoon of salt and mix with one quart of sifted flour. Then sift the whole. Measure one teacup of butter and one of lard, hard and cold. Rub the lard into the flour until very fine, smooth paste. Then add one-half cup of ice water, mixed with a beaten white of egg, to mix very stiff dough. Roll out into thin sheet, spread one-fourth teacupful of butter, sprinkle over with little flour, then roll up closely in long roll like a scroll, double ends toward centre, flatten and re-roll, then spread again with another one-fourth teacupful of butter. Repeat this operation until butter is used. Put it in an earthen dish, cover with cloth and set in a cool place. Let it remain until cold before making pie cases.

TOMATO SALAD—Slice six ripe tomatoes and lay on bed of parsley. Serve with dressing of vinegar, salt, pepper and oil. Garnish with pimolas.

COMPOTE OF PEARS WITH RICE—Cook a cup of rice till soft and put into a double boiler with one cup of milk, half a cup of sugar and the beaten yolks of two eggs. Cook to the consistency of soft custard, then fold in the stiffly-beaten whites of the eggs, and pour over a dish of fresh or canned pears. Garnish with slices of pear and candied cherries.

Mustard and Cress

TWO small salad plants, each of the cruciferaceae, dwell yearly in the kitchen garden, occupying small patches of ground, which they enrich with the brightness of their vivid greenery. One is white mustard, near akin to Sinapis Nigra, which gives us the biting, yellow condiment of our tables, the other is Lepidium Sativum, the garden cress, excellent in the salad dish, famous as an accompaniment or garnish with cold meat.

Tossed in oil and vinegar, a very little of Sinapis Alba, the white mustard, with its companion cress, Lepidium, goes a long way in giving zest to a cold dinner. Eaten with a good mayonnaise sauce or salad dressing, the mixed cress is equally good. Made into green butter, it is delicious at tea time, the succulent leaves, juicy and sharp, blending with the fat.

The green butter is made by chopping the cress as finely as mint is chopped for mint sauce. Then equal quantities of the cress and mustard will be worked up with butter, half and half of each being the rule. The green butter, formed into dainty pats, set with pats of plain butter in a glass dish, is very nice for tea. It makes a pretty sandwich also.

Mustard, like cress, is an annual, bidden to depart at once when autumn brings frosty nights. White mustard lacks a property called sinigrin that is found in the black musard, otherwise the two are identical. In the salad bed, however, only the seed leaves of the mustard are wanted, hence the fixed oil that comes from the seed itself is not developed. Fifty seeds of mustard weigh one grain, and the tiny seed leaves that emerge from these minute specks of protoplasm are charged with some of their pungency.

What one Man has Done

Several years ago E. D. Smith felt that there was a demand in Canada for a line of absolutely pure Preserves and Jams.

His faith was so strong that he spent thousands of dollars in equipping up-to-date, sanitary kitchens in Winona, right in the garden of Canada, where he could preserve the fruit picked just when in perfect condition and without having it shipped half ripe in dusty cars, where freedom of contamination was impossible.

The motto of Absolute Purity has been followed ever since starting until now these goods can be found on every high class grocer's shelves in all parts of Canada.

"Purity" means that the true flavor has not been spoiled by the use of preservatives or glucose and you may always feel sure when buying a packing bearing this trade mark that you can enjoy eating the contents.

E D S

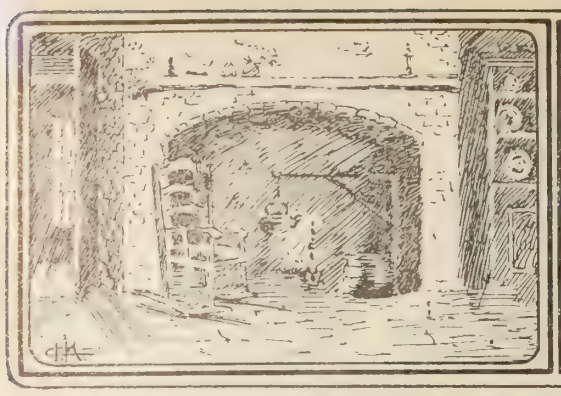
Preserves
Jams
Marmalade
Catsup
Jellies
Grape Juice

E. D. Smith
Winona, Ont.



AROUND THE HEARTH

Written for the Canadian Home Journal

By JENNIE ALLEN MOORE

Out over the great wide prairies we go,
Through lofty mountain peaks white-capped with snow,
Away to the end of the track.
Through villages small, towns, and cities great,
Till we reach the port of the Golden Gate,
To the broad Pacific and back.

WESTWARD HO!

"I'M off fer the West to-morray," a man said to his chum.

"How far are yez goin', Mike?"

"Jist as far as the thrain will take me."

"Begorra, an' I'd like to go wid yez."

"Sure, now, an' I'd like to go mesilf," said I in my heart, but it looked a long way off. And true enough, it has been a long time since I heard that, but the reality has come at last. I find myself packing the new steamer trunk, gathering together from all corners of the house the things I will need, and many, I suppose, that will go along for the trip. "Take as little as possible," warns one friend, and "Take plenty of stuff along, for you don't know what you may need," cautions another. I filled the trunk and toilet satchel too; handbag likewise, and before I reached Fort William found I had forgotten my tooth brush. Ah, well, I console myself, better that than "me shpecks," for then I could not write at all, at all.

The train is an hour late, so I seat myself at the table in the handsomely equipped waiting-room of the C.P.R., and haul out a handful of postals I addressed yesterday, also my new fountain pen, and proceed to inform my relations and friends of the trip that is rapidly materializing. In the midst of it all, in steams the great mogul of an engine, with its long string of cars, and faces peering through the frosted panes, as we hurry along to where the porter stands with his stool. Hurried good-byes, up the steps, followed by the man and the grips, into the coach where sleepy people are just emerging from behind the curtains; take a seat anywhere until we are placed "All aboard," from outside; toot-toot, the wheels begin to move; we're off for the West, and our tickets take us "as far as the thrain kin go," right until we run into the Pacific Ocean, and farther, for that is at Vancouver, and we sail right on to Victoria, which is the jumping-off place, for certain, because it sits secure on its "right little, tight little island."

WHO are we, do you ask? I sphoke of the man and his grips follerin' me in. Now, who do you suppose would be darin' to do that but me ouwn ould man, and whisper, it's off on a silver weddin' honeymoon thrip we are, so we are! Yis, that's the thruth I'm tellin yez. 'Tis a memorable day this, when after twenty-five years we set sail on another "tower." I am thinking of that other day, and have been resolving that I'll be just as "pacable" and tractable during this journey as I was in the long ago, that I'll not permit any propensities that have developed in the quarter of a century in the line of managing a man to interfere with his happiness in arranging to give me this holiday.

More than that, I can be perfectly happy in my corner of the luxurious car, if he spends hours of the journey in the smoking compartment. I can lie back on the cushions and close my eyes and day-dream. I can take time to go slowly backward over the years, I can rest my hands in my lap, and then I can smile when he sits opposite me with a cheery "Well, how are you getting along?" and not even feel a pang because he stayed out of my range of vision. That's the difference in the two trips—I ask no questions. You see he is twenty-five years older, and so am I, and again whisper, women don't expect as much attention on silver wedding trips, because they have more sense, and understand their husbands better. Then the bond has cemented between the two lives—or should be—and they have confidence in each other, an abiding trust that somehow is delineated in the face, a smoothing over of little tyrannical ways on the one side, and selfishness, perhaps, on the other; the women do not recognize their failing, and the men, bless 'em, they mean well!

I have always held that an occasional trip from home is a necessity for every woman. It lifts her out of her usual surroundings, and sets her brain thinking in a new direction, and a new world of thought has been the means of saving a person's reason at times. One gets tired physically and mentally, and a change of scene rests the strained nerves, and awakens fresh vigor. When I have traveled around for two or three months, and am set down at my own door again, my pulses beat time to the joy I feel. The lassitude is gone, the weariness fled, and as I hang my belongings in the closets, or place them in the drawer, there is a song in my heart that wells out in "There's no place like home." The simple breakfast of toast and coffee outshines all the menu cards of train and hotel. Coffee—made as I like it, clear, amber, not too strong, and cream right off the top of the bottle; toast, hot, made to suit my taste, ah, away with the long list of fruit, fish, eggs, meat, omelettes, etc., that are so tempting on paper, and tasteless on the plate. It is good to wash the dishes, to wield the broom, to brighten the silver, even to wash and scrub. Give your wife a trip, man, whenever you can arrange it, if only for a day, a week, a month. It pays, yes, doubly; she will come back happy; she will appreciate the homely things that make up so much of woman's life; she will be grateful for the blessings of her home, no mater how small or plain.

WINNIPEG! the hub of the West, with its cosmopolitan population, its broad streets, its splendid educational institutions, and magnificent churches, not mentioning the stores, and our own Toronto Eaton's, where we can shop, and have tea, and hunt bargains. Oh, the delight of again wandering through Eaton's, and when tired, quietly writing in the rest room, letters to our friends! The hum of the city sounds good after the barren country through which we traveled to reach there, just rocks and trees—not maple, either—and frozen rivers and lakes, with some villages scattered along the road. No nice farm lands, with comfortable brick houses and large frame barns like in old Ontario. Judging by the rabbit tracks on the otherwise unbroken and unsullied snow banks, there must be millions of those small animals in that territory. It was interesting to note the criss-cross racing in and out among the trees. What unmolested gambols they must enjoy!

But back to Winnipeg and the Royal Alexandra. That is "some hotel," to use a popular phrase, and within five minutes after our entrance there was an expression of loyalty that was good to witness. The orchestra was closing its evening programme, and as the first notes of "God Save the King" were struck, every man in that vast rotunda rose to his feet and remained standing until the close of the national anthem. It did me good, all honor to our king and country. Everything around that palatial hotel was on a grand scale, even to the prices, which are startling at times, when the "tips" are added in, but one becomes more used to that as they journey westward. Winnipeg has grown enormously since our last visit six years ago, and despite its rigorous climate, people are crowding in and making business and homes.

The next break in our journey was Calgary. Such a surprise there, with its real estate population of sixty thousand—the real count being some thousands less. It is a busy city, a delightful place, and bids soon to outrival its neighbors, but there is no telling in this land of mushroom growths what will develop in a few years. One can only stand amazed at the conditions as they exist in those places of phenomenal increase for the few years of their existence. There we shook hands with many old friends and neighbors, and formed new acquaintances, rubbed up against the hustling crowd, took in the view from the highest vantage point, and renewed our journey filled with a profound respect for Calgary and its possibilities.

THE trip through the mountains must be seen to be appreciated. Lovers of scenery, mighty and stupendous, would find their longings gratified in the grandeur of those lofty peaks piercing the sky. The immensity fills one with wonder and awe. They tell me the day must be bright to reveal the beauty of the magnificent panorama, but we were not so favored, the skies being clouded; however, my impressions are none the less vivid and memorable. It was entrancing to behold the vastness, straining the eye to reach the top, then a sudden plunge into the inky blackness of a tunnel, emerging again into the welcome light. How like our lives, I thought, is this journey through the mountains! We sail along smoothly, and then right in our path a mountain looms up. Sometimes we make a circuit around it, again we cut through the difficulties, hewing a hard but sure pathway; we are plunged into the darkness of despair where we see no ray of light, then a gleam of hope appears, and on we glide again. The spaces between the dark passages are sometimes close, then at longer distances, the stops are where we are laid aside from sickness or other causes, the outlook is bright and variable as our anticipations, the views are fleeting like our pleasures, the journey is often irksome, like many of our duties, but we are borne along by an unseen but irresistible influence until the goal is reached.

As we sped along in our luxurious coach, mile after mile on the southern side of the Thomson River, we saw the C.N.R. in its incipient stages, sort of blazing the trail in places, and again blasting operations, or the roadbed was in course of preparation, men and machinery being in evidence. In fancy we could see, ere long, another giant engine speeding along the mountain side, carrying the living cargo, and the tremendous freight that must be the product of the vast and resourceful country through which we have traveled. I wondered would I ever glide over steel rails laid on what looks now to be impossible places. There is no doubt that the privilege will be mine, for the engineering feats of to-day cannot be conquered by such minor obstructions as rivers and mountains.

How insignificant alongside looked the old Caribou trail which we followed, winding along the mountain side! What thoughts the sight of it gave rise to! In imagination we could see the seekers for gold carrying their heavy packs, bowed down with their loads, wending their way on that lonely trail far from human habitation, the eager gleam in their eyes for the yellow metal that would mean fortune and comfort for the rest of their lives. What about the hardships they would have to endure, that counted for nothing! The lure of the precious mineral beckoned them on, the fever was in their veins, and home, friends, everything, was sacrificed in the mad rush for Caribou gold. Many of them never returned along the trail, another and more treacherous fever consumed their life-blood, friends watched in vain for their return, but a grave in the mountains, lonely and unmarked, tells the tale.

WHAT a change! Twenty-five below at Winnipeg, and at Vancouver the first sight that greeted my eyes the morning after our arrival was that of the plants and flowers of the hotel all drinking in the balmy rain. Beautiful palms were out on the balcony being washed by a warm midsummer shower. This is the rainy season we are told, and truly the skies have been weeping. The fog is dense that settles over the city at times, but no one seems to mind rain and fog. The women dress up and go about seemingly unconscious of the wetness, which corresponds to the Irishman's description of a flannel shirt, which "no matter how cowld and wet, was always war'rm and dhry." And so it would seem, one would meet a man dressed in working clothes carrying an umbrella, and a few steps farther a lady with a plumed hat would be without any shelter. A man laughingly explained, "Our rain is like your cold." You will say, "Yes, we have it twenty below zero, but it isn't cold, so we have rain, but it isn't wet."

Vancouver city is almost an island, surrounded as it is by False Creek, caused by the tides, and which is crossed by many splendid bridges scattered through the city. There is a great influx of people, the population is said to have doubled in the last five years. There are many magnificent homes and beautiful helges of ivy, rose anl privet; which, of course, were not at their best at this season. We drove through Stanley Park, and went through Carnegie Library, the museum being well worth the trouble. The unfavorable weather during our stay did not permit of viewing the scenery, but we will visit there on our return, so more anon.

Four hours' run on the "rale salt wather," and we are in Victoria. This is no city of mushroom growth. You can tell that by its architecture, you can feel it in the air, you can see it in the people you meet, the British lion is everywhere, and especially at Esquimault, where the old fortress still looks impregnable, and where the guns given by the English, which have lain on the scrap heap for sixteen years, are now being placed in position ready to defend our land. There, too, we saw an immense freighter in the dry-dock for repair, result of a collision. We see activity everywhere, but not rush; there is business, but seemingly no boom; there are doings without dash, and a climate that the citizens claim is unexcelled. incomparable, hard to beat. Listen, those of you who are shoveling in coal, and making paths to the gate, there has been no heat in our room since we arrived four days ago. I am writing between two open windows on this day in early February, have on a thin dress and elbow sleeves, am listening to the sound of carpenters' tools at buildings near, and to-day watched men sodding and making flower beds, and children playing in the parks. Time's up.

In My Lady's Garden for 1912

CONSULTING EDITORS:
MISS M. E. BLACKLOCK AND MR. A. B. CUTTING B.S.A.

(Dates of planting, when mentioned, are for Toronto and vicinity. Allowances must be made for local differences in climate)

VEGETABLE GARDENS FOR TOWN AND COUNTRY

By A. B. CUTTING

MUCH loss of time in planting a vegetable garden can be avoided, and better results can be secured by making a diagram of the plot to be planted some weeks before the work is to begin. Whether the garden is to be large or small, in a city or village backyard or on the farm, the vegetables to be grown should be decided upon in advance, and a definite plan made of their arrangement. An excellent system is to arrange the vegetables in the order in which they are to be planted. By planting hardy kinds first, following later with half-hardy kinds, and still later with the warm-season crops, the requirements in temperature and moisture of the respective classes are met as closely as possible and the poor results of haphazard planting are overcome. The scheme facilitates also the preparation of the land, and makes it easier to maintain the unplanted portion in good friable condition.

The size of the garden will depend chiefly upon the amount of land that is available for the purpose. On the farm, almost any area desired can be had, and vegetables for winter storing can be grown as well as the summer supply. In the village, the area available for gardening may restrict the kinds to those grown only for summer use, and it even may be necessary to eliminate those vegetables that require a large amount of space. On the city lot, which may be and often is, very small, only those vegetables should be grown that give the most edible product for the space occupied. Whether in town or country, the principles that govern the planting and care of the garden are the same, although the distances of planting, methods of tillage, intensity and systems of cropping may differ considerably.

THE FARM GARDEN.

In the farm vegetable garden, horse power should be substituted for hand labor wherever possible. The garden should be laid out in long rows, sufficiently far apart to permit the use of a horse and cultivator The saving of labor and time is an important consideration, not only in tending the crops, but also in harvesting them, and therefore the garden plot should be located as near the house as possible.

The accompanying diagram of a farm garden (and also the one of a village garden) is drawn after a plan proposed by the Illinois Agricultural Experiment Station, and adapted to Canadian needs and conditions. It suggests an arrangement that will give a large assortment and a continuous supply of vegetables throughout the growing season with some for storing, and at the same time simplify the planting and minimize the labor of tillage. The area designated comprises nearly half an acre. Smaller or larger gardens could be arranged in much the same way. Some of the vegetables mentioned in the plan may not be suited for growing in all parts of the country. The personal choice of the grower, as well as local climatic conditions, will influence the selection.

The vegetables are arranged strictly in the order of their planting, so that planting may begin at one side of the garden and proceed across the area as the season advances. This makes it possible to fit a piece of land for planting or to harrow the unplanted portion at any time desired, and thus keep it free from weeds, and in a moist, friable condition. Another feature of this plan is that while two or three kinds of vegetables may be planted in the same row, all the crops in a given row require essentially the same kind and amount of tillage and other care. It is also true that the crops occupying the land, about the same length of time are planted together. After the early-maturing crops are harvested, it is therefore possible to clear quite a wide strip of land for the planting of turnips and other late crops, if desired.

While this farm garden plan specifies four different times of planting, besides the celery, late beans and turnips, it is possible in some seasons to combine the second and third plantings, so that if celery is omitted, there will be only three plantings besides the turnips or other incidental late crops. This simplifies the planting, and better adapts the garden to the tastes of the average farmer.

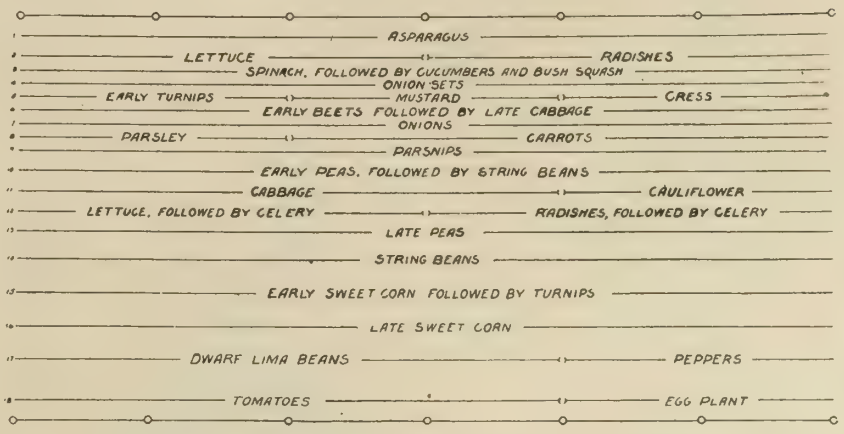


DIAGRAM OF VILLAGE GARDEN 30 BY 60 FEET

	Distance from preceding row.
Early planting, beginning as soon as soil is ready (about May 1):
Row 1.—Permanent row of asparagus. 1.5 ft. from edge	1.5 ft.
Row 2.—30 ft. lettuce; 30 ft. radishes	1.5 "
Row 3.—Spinach (followed by cucumbers and bush squash) planted in early June)	1 "
Row 4.—Onion sets	1 "
Row 5.—20 ft. early turnips; 20 ft. mustard; 20 ft. cress	1 "
Row 6.—Early beets (followed by late cabbabe set in July)	1 "
Row 7.—Onions from seed	1 "
Row 8.—20 ft. parsley; 40 ft. carrots	1 "
Row 9.—Parsnips	1 "
Row 10.—Early dwarf peas (followed by string beans planted in July)	1.5 "
Second planting, about May 15—
Row 11—2 dozen cabbage; 1 dozen cauliflower	1.5 "
Row 12—30 ft. lettuce; 30 ft. radishes (followed by celery set in July)	1.5 "
Row 13.—Late wrinkled peas (with support)	1.5 "
Third planting, late May—
Row 14.—String beans (green and wax)	2 "
Row 15.—Early sweet corn (followed by 2 rows turnips sown August 1)	2.5 "
Fourth planting, early June—
Row 16.—Late sweet corn	2.5 "
Row 17.—40 ft. dwarf Lima beans; 20 ft. peppers	2.5 "
Row 18.—1 dozen tomatoes; ½ dozen eggplants	3 "
Margin	1.5 "
Total width of garden	30.0 ft.

THE VILLAGE GARDEN.

In a village garden where space is likely to be limited, the rows of vegetables may be planted rather close together, and hand methods of tillage must be employed. The latter feature, unlike on the farm, is not looked upon as troublesome or a waste of time, for village gardening is often done fully as much for the pleasure of working among the plants and seeing them grow, as for the edible products they yield. Planting may begin as soon as a strip of land wide enough for one or two rows has

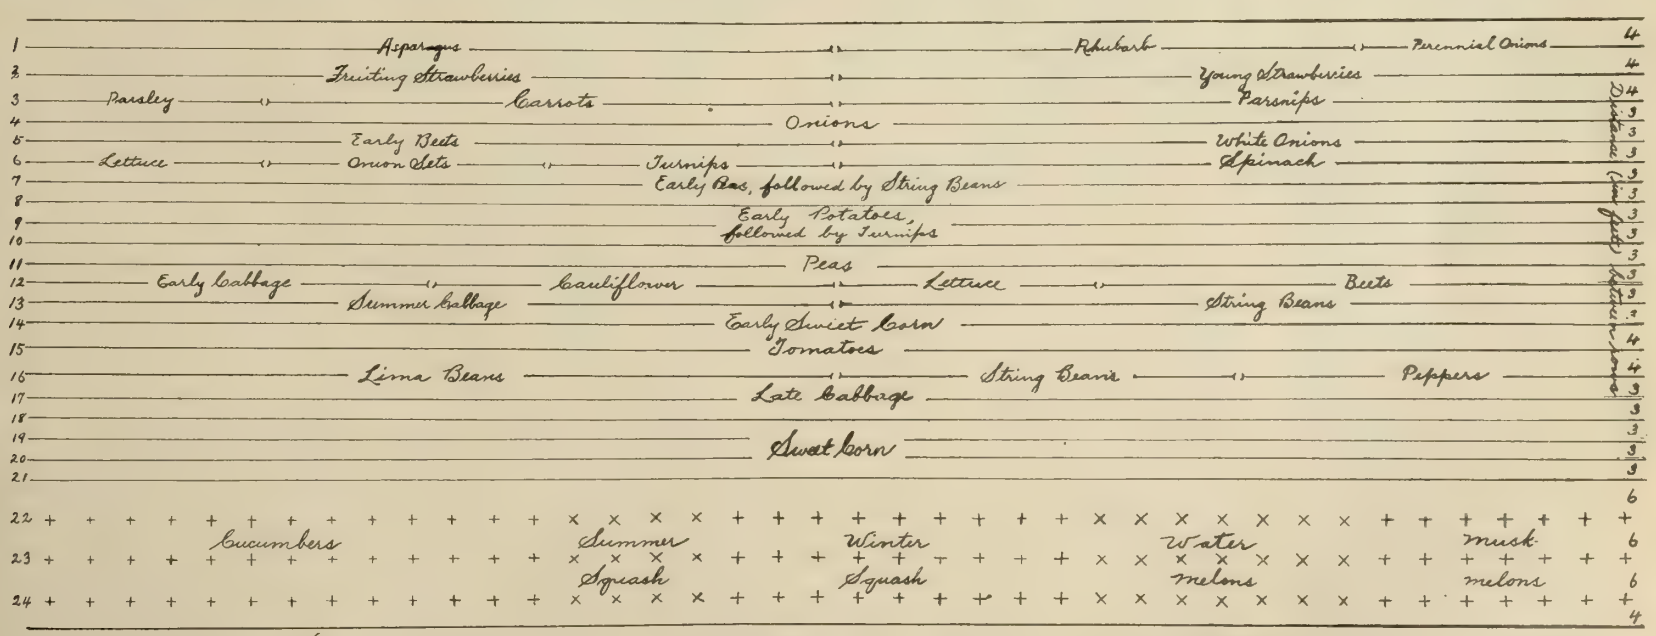

DIAGRAM OF A FARM VEGETABLE GARDEN 90 BY 240 FEET, WITH ROWS ARRANGED IN ORDER IN WHICH THEY ARE TO BE PLANTED.

First planting, as soon as ground is ready in spring (about May 1st)—
- Row 1.—Perennials: ½ row asparagus; 1-3 row rhubarb; 1-6 row perennial onions.
- Row 2.—½ row old strawberries; ½ row young strawberries. (First year half of the row may be planted with vegetables.)
- Row 3.—1-6 row parsley; 1-3 row carrots; ½ row parsnips. (Marked with turnip radishes.)
- Row 4.—Onions (yellow).
- Row 5.—½ row early beets; ½ row onions (white). (Marked with long radishes.)
- Row 6.—1-6 row lettuce; 1-6 row onion sets; 1-6 row turnips; ½ row spinach .(Followed by celery planted in July.)
- Row 7.—Peas: ½ row extra early, smooth; ½ row early dwarf, wrinkled. (Followed by string beans planted in July.)
- Rows 8, 9, 10.—Early potatoes. (Followed by turnips sown August 1.)

Second planting, about May 15th—
- Row 11.—Peas: ½ row early dwarf, wrinkled; ½ row late, wrinkled.
- Row 12.—¼ row early cabbage (30 plants 2 feet apart); ¼ row cauliflower; 1-6 row lettuce; 1-3 row beets. (Marked with long radishes.)

Third planting, late May—
- Row 13.—¼ row summer cabbage (transplanted); ¼ row of same (seed sown) ½ row string beans
- Row 14.—Sweet corn: ½ row extra early; ½ row second early.

Fourth planting, early June—
- Row 15.—Tomatoes (60 plants 4 feet apart)
- Row 16.—½ row Lima beans; ¼ row string beans; ¼ row peppers (30 plants).
- Row 17.—Late cabbage (seed sown).
- Row 18.—Sweet corn: 1 row extra early.
- Row 19.—Sweet corn: 1 row second early.
- Rows 20, 21.—Sweet corn: 2 rows late varieties.
- Rows 22, 23, 24.—Vine crops in hill, 6 by 6 feet, in blocks crosswise the three rows, as follows: 39 hills cucumbers; 12 hills summer squash; 27 hills winter squash, 21 hills watermelons; 21 hills muskmelons.

Just WHY

Woodenware

(Bread Boards, Rolling Pins, Chopping-Bowls, etc.)

Is Kept Sweet & Clean

By Scrubbing With

Old Dutch Cleanser

Because this pure Cleanser is absolutely hygienic. There is no caustic, acid or alkali in it. Avoid dangerous chemical cleansers in the kitchen.

Sprinkle a little Cleanser on a brush, and scrub the utensil carefully. Then wash in clean water. This removes every trace of stale dough or meat juices and leaves the woodenware clean and sweet-smelling.

Many Other Uses and Full Directions on Large Sifter-Can, 10c

been prepared. By planting the same day that the land has been prepared, quick germination of the seed will be insured, and weeds will not have time to gain headway.

Most of the work in a village garden can be done with a spade, a hoe, a rake, a chalk line and a few stakes, but greater pleasure can be had by the use of a wheel hoe. By its use a person can cultivate his whole garden before breakfast, and feel proud of the accomplishment. As it does not do satisfactory work in badly-crusted or weedy ground, the experienced gardener will use it often, and thus keep the soil in ideal condition.

THE CITY GARDEN.

The conditions attendant upon gardening operations in the residence portions of a large city are in marked contrast to those of the village or farm. Usually space is very limited, and the soil is often ill-adapted to gardening on account of being "filling," composed principally of clay, but often combined with brickbats and other refuse. The limitations of space are partially offset, however, by an abundance of water from the city supply, and the nature of the soil can be radically changed by proper treatment.

The city garden is often purely a personal matter, a place where the gardener can give expression to his own ideals in gardening, irrespective of printed rules or professional practice. All laws regulating distance of planting and direction of growth may be disregarded, and plants that normally crawl made to climb.

The first essential in making a small area yield an abundant harvest is the improvement of the soil. At the first spading, all stones, brickbats and other trash must be removed. A stiff clay soil should be lightened by the addition of sand and manure. Sand to the depth of about one inch should be spread on the surface and spaded in. One wagon load of sand containing two cubic yards will cover an area of 640 square feet to the depth of one inch. Fine manure at the rate of about one-half ton to each square rod of ground should then be worked into the soil.

In order that maximum yields may be produced from a minimum space, it is essential that the ground be kept fully occupied all the time. This means not only that the rows of vegetables should be planted close together, but that short season crops should be planted between the rows or even between the plants of longer-season crops, and that as soon as one crop is harvested another will be planted in its place. Transplanting may be practised also to a considerable extent to save space during the early growth of the plants. By virtue of the richness of the soil, combined with heavy watering, the land is kept at work from early spring until late in autumn, and two, three, or even four crops may be harvested from the same spot.

The city garden should be devoted chiefly to such crops as lettuce, radishes, parsley, cress, mustard, beets, chard, carrots, onions from sets, string beans and table turnips. Cabbage, spinach, peas, peppers, tomatoes and cucumbers may sometimes be included. If tomatoes and cucumbers are grown they should be trained in an upright position so that little ground space is occupied. This close planting calls for an abundance of tillage as well as of plant food and water.

Transplanting Seedlings

By A. C. BLAIR

WHEN the seedlings in the hotbed or in boxes in the house begin to show the third or fourth leaves of fair size, they should be transplanted to about two inches apart each way, either in the beds or in other boxes or "flats." By the time that they begin to crowd again they will be ready for the garden. Such plants as cucumbers, melons and beans, which do not transplant readily, may be grown in strawberry boxes or on inverted pieces of sod, sowing enough seed for one hill in each box or sod.

When the time comes for transplanting to the garden, thoroughly soak the soil that contains the plants, so that in lifting them, a portion of the soil will adhere to the roots. The garden soil should have been previously prepared. Choose a cloudy day for transplanting, or one when rain seems likely to come soon. In a dry time, it is best to set the plants at evening. Thoroughly compact the soil about the roots of the plant when set and leave the surface soil loose around the plants to prevent the escape of moisture.

Using Leftover Seeds

By K. A. KIRKPATRICK

WITH many persons the question of using left-over seeds from last year's operations will arise. Such may be used with perfect satisfaction in many cases. In fact, where a strain has proved especially good in one season's trial, it is often much better to use old seeds rather than to risk buying a new strain. Even if several years old, seeds may be tested for germination; and if they give a high per cent. of strong germination, they should be used.

To test such seeds is a simple matter. Secure two large dinner plates and some pieces of blotting paper of about the same size as the plates. Place a blotter in one plate and place one hundred of the seeds upon it. Over them lay another blotter. Pour water into the edge of the plate until it rises high enough to soak the blotters thoroughly. Turn the second plate upside down on top of the first, covering the blotters, to prevent the evaporation of the moisture. Set the improvised tester in a room at about 70 degrees F. Supply moisture as needed, and within a week the germinated seeds can be counted, and the value of the sample ascertained.

If seeds have ideal storage, i.e., a dark, cool, airy place, they will retain their germinating power longer than where they are stored in a close, warm or moist place. The conditions under which the seeds were grown, and their stock of original vitality, also determine the length of time for which the seed will remain viable. Oily and starchy seeds usually deteriorate more quickly than those of an albuminous character. With good conditions, the following may be roughly stated as the dependable length of life for the various garden seeds:

Muskmelon, 4 to 6 years; cabbage, 3 to 4 years; cauliflower, 3 to 4 years; cucumber, 3 to 4 years; kale, 3 to 4 years; lettuce, 3 to 4 years; watermelon, 4 to 6 years; radish, 3 to 4 years; tomato, 4 to 10 years; sweet corn, 2 years; squash, 3 to 4 years; turnip, 3 to 4 years; asparagus, 1 year; beet, 3 to 4 years; carrot, 1 year; celery, 2 years; egg plant, 1 year; onion, 2 years parsnip, 1 year; pepper, 2 years; bean, 2 years; parsley, 1 year; pea, 2 years; salsify, 2 years.

Quality Vegetables

By A. B. CUTTING

THE leading commercial varieties of vegetables are not always the best for home use, especially after being in a store window a few days. The only way to have quality vegetables is to grow them yourself. Some kinds of vegetables which the amateur may grow are never seen in the market because they will not stand shipping well or do not make as attractive an appearance as some of the other sorts. Moreover, many kinds of vegetables ought to be eaten as soon as they are harvested. Corn loses much of its sweetness in twenty-four hours. The best early corn for quality is Golden Bantam, but seldom is it sold in stores, because it is yellow. Peas must be eaten the day they are picked, if one is to have them at their best.

In growing potatoes the intelligent amateur knows that the dry, mealy tubers come from sandy soil, while soggy flavorless ones are the usual production of heavy soil. The commercial grower may know this; but he also knows that the heavy soil grows the biggest crops, and it is quantity not quality that he is after.

To realize what quality lettuce is like one must eat the new young leaves, and these are not to be found in the markets.

In the home garden tomatoes can be picked at just the moment when they are fully ripe, and that is the stage at which they should be eaten, for they begin to deteriorate quickly. It is seldom possible to buy tomatoes at the quality stage of ripeness.

No one knows the taste of a melon at its best until he has eaten it within an hour or two after it has been parted from the vine. Melons sold in stores are very unsatisfactory substitutes for the kind one may grow in his own garden.

In the home garden all kinds of vegetables can be picked when they are at their best, and that usually is in the cool of the morning when the dew is on the plants. The commercial grower picks his vegetables when he has the opportunity, and that occurs often at the time when the sun is withering or has withered the product.

Another advantage in favor of the home garden is that the owner is able to gather young vegetables which seldom reach the market; for instance, beet greens with tiny beets attached are a delicacy, and these are secured by merely thinning out the rows. Young carrots also are delicious, and string beans, peas and cucumbers should be picked before they have reached full size.

By making a succession of sowings one may have vegetables at their best for a long season. String beans, peas, lettuce, radishes, spinach, carrots, corn and other things may be had practically all summer.

To have quality vegetables the amature must not think that it is necessary to follow only haphazard methods in his garden. A rich, loamy soil, well tilled, the use of manure and water in abundance, and a plot that slopes to the south will give most satisfactory results.

The main thing in gardening is good seed and intelligent use of the soil. We have all seen gardens on rich soil that were anything but good, and again we have seen fine gardens on rather poor soil. It requires lots of work to have gardens when the soil is not the best, but it can be done. Never work the soil unless dry enough. Thoroughly pulverize the clods before any seeds are planted, and frequent cultivation will bring good crops if the seed is good. Enrich the soil and get it in as fine tilth as possible as soon as it can be done.

QUANTITIES OF SEEDS REQUIRED TO PLANT THE GARDENS DESCRIBED WITH DUE ALLOWANCE FOR NORMAL AMOUNT OF REPLANTING

	The Farm Garden	The Village Garden	The Garden
Asparagus	100 roots	50 roots
Beans, green podded	1 pt.	½ pt.	½ pt
Beans, wax	1 pt.	½ pt.
Beans, Lima	1 pt.	½ pt
Beets	2 oz	1 oz.	1 oz.
Cabbage, early	1 pkt.	1 pkt.	1 doz. plants
Cabbage, second early	1 pkt.
Cabbage, late	1 pkt.	1 pkt.
Carrot	1 oz	1 pkt.	1 pkt
Cauliflower	1 pkt.	1 pkt.
Celery	1 oz.	1 pkt.
Chard			1 pkt
Corn, sweet, extra early	1 ½ pt.	½ pt
Corn, sweet, second early	1 ½ pt.
Corn, sweet, late	1 qt.	½ pt.
Cress		1 pkt.	1 pkt.
Cucumber	1 oz.	1 oz.	1 pkt.
Eggplant		½ doz. plants
Lettuce, leaf	1 oz.	1 pkt.	1 pkt.
Lettuce, head		1 pkt.	1 pkt.
Mustard		1 pkt.	1 pkt.
Muskmelon	1 oz.
Watermelon	1 oz.
Onion seed	2 oz.	1 oz.
Onion sets, bottom	1 qt.	1 qt.	1 qt.
Onion sets, top (perennial)	1 qt.
Parsley	1 pkt.	1 pkt.	1 pkt.
Parsnip	1 oz.	1 pkt.
Peas, extra early smooth	1 pt.
Peas, early dwarf, wrinkled	1 qt.	½ pt.
Peas, late, wrinkled	1 pt.	½ pt.	½ pt.
Pepper	1 pkt.	1 pkt.	½ doz. plants
Potatoes	3 pks.
Radish	3 oz	1 oz.	1 oz.
Rhubarb	25 plants or 1 oz.
Spinach	1 oz.	1 oz.	1 pkt.
Squash, summer	1 oz.	1 pkt.
Squash, winter	1 oz.
Tomato	2 pkts.	1 pkt.	1 doz. plants
Turnip	1 oz.	1 pkt.	1 pkt.

Good Fruit Trees for Poor Ones

By GEO. W. TEBBS

IT is surprising to notice how many people everywhere are contented even in small gardens to allow trees that are doing no good to occupy valuable space, when with a little trouble the "barren fig tree could be made fruitful." Why should it be so? Why need it continue if this be true? One of the causes may be that the trees are of poor varieties, or else have been neglected from their youth up.

There are only two ways of dealing with trees that produce fruit of only poor quality: First, cut them into kindling wood, or else graft some good variety upon them. Why should you not get as much fruit as your neighbor? There is a great deal of fascination and pleasure in tree grafting, and it is not as difficult as many people imagine.

It is strange yet true that a graft will really grow even although the grafter (and I use the term in the good sense) has not passed an examination in pomology, and it really is quite unnecessary to be put on just when the moon is at the full. New moon time is just as good.

TOP-WORKING OLD TREES.

When you have your trees already in the garden, you have no choice as to the stock upon which to place your graft. All I would say is that providing proper care is taken, you can graft on anything made of wood. I have had pear grafts growing on maple trees, just as a curiosity of course, and with no idea of increasing the sweetness of the fruit; and it might be quite possible to get a scion going on a fence post, providing the latter was not too long dead. But it should be remembered in grafting upon old trees, say upon an old seedling apple, as in one of the accompanying illustrations, there must be lots of vigor and healthy wood as a basis for operations. There is always the disadvantage also in working upon an old tall tree that the fruit from your new grafts will be away up in the ethereal blue.

In commencing operations do not cut all the top of the old tree away. Leave enough branches and foliage for breathing purposes, otherwise "tuberculosis" rapidly ensues. Be moderate in the amputation of the limbs.

The new scions or slips, should be taken from the good variety early in the spring, taking off vigorous shoots some three or four inches long for scion making, and laying them in a moist, cool shady place until wanted. Head back the old tree as stated above, clearing the branches away in good time, before the sap begins to rise, thereby preventing unnecessary bleeding, and facilitating the actual operation when the proper time comes. It will only be necessary then to saw off one or two inches to get to fresh wood, and the tree is ready for grafting. The actual work had better be done early in April.

Personally I prefer cleft grafting. It makes tying scarcely necessary. In this operation the stump is split to a depth of one inch by laying the edge of a strong heavy blade across the centre, and giving a sharp tap with a mallet. The blade is removed, and the cleft held open by inserting a small upright chisel in the centre. A portion of wood is cut out of each edge at both sides so as to form a wedge-shaped space, and the scion which is two to four inches in length, is cut to fit it. By slightly depressing the chisel the scion can be got well in, and directly the chisel is withdrawn the cut pieces come together and hold the graft tight.

As so much of the success of grafting depends on excluding the air, it is necessary to cover the stump, especially the cuts, with grafting wax. The following is an excellent recipe: Melt together in a pan on the stove, with care, four parts of resin, two parts of beeswax and one part of tallow. When all are thoroughly melted and mixed together pour a handful at a time into a pail of cold water. Grease the hand and roll like toffee until light-colored.

WILD PEAR TREE GRAFTED

An old broken sickle makes an excellent grafting knife. I had an old wild pear growing in my garden, which I have successfully grafted, as the accompanying illustration shows, and the new grafts are now in full bearing, four years after the scions were placed on the tree. The illustration shows the young grafts overweighted with blossoms.

FEEDING THE TREES.

If the trees are of a good variety, and yet are not doing their duty, it is probably due to one of three causes: It may be that either root pruning or top trimming is necessary, or that the soil needs attention. You cannot starve or neglect a tree and get good results. Try it on yourself if you don't believe it.

See that your varieties, if you are thinking of planting, are such as will suit your neighborhood. Don't force trees to grow which are unsuitable to your locality. Give them a fair chance. See that the drainage is good. Apple trees are not water lilies.

Trees are often treated, when heavy croppers, as if they were light bearers. Poor soil is left alone just as though it were richly stored with nutriment, and the owner of the trees doesn't need any lecturer to show him or any writer to tell him that he is wrong. Here is a splendid fertilizer for unsatisfactory trees: Eight parts of superphosphate, six parts of nitrate of potash, four parts of basic slag, four parts of nitrate of soda, and four parts of sulphate of lime. Mix and use at the rate of four ounces per square yard as soon as the frost is out of the ground.

THINNING OUT THE BRANCHES.

The thinning out of trees is most important. Let in air and light and so stimulate the remaining fruiting branches, but it must be done with care. Don't butcher the poor tree. Err on the side of leniency. Remove small branches growing inwards, and all the sprouting suckers from the main limbs.

Root pruning must be done with care. I only attempt it on one side of the tree each year when it is necessary. It is the fibrous root that is fruit-producing, and the object of root-pruning is to create more of these by removing some of the heavier roots whose tendency is to produce wood. In cutting away the roots, remove them with a sharp saw, leaving no jagged edges.

NORTHERN SPY GRAFTED ON AN OLD USELESS TREE.
The first season. Three years after fruit was produced.

Spray the Fruit Trees

By E. C. McROBERT

IN these days when insects and fungous diseases of fruit trees are so prevalent, it is necessary to spray in order to get clean fruit. No up-to-date commercial fruit grower would consider for a moment the possibility of growing fruit without the aid of the spray pump. The need for spraying is just as great in the city and village garden; in fact, insects and fungi often are found in greater numbers on small lots than on equal areas in large orchards.

There is nothing mysterious or difficult about the operation of spraying. It is a simple matter when prepared spray mixtures are purchased and not much more troublesome for the gardener or fruit grower to prepare the mixtures at home. For the average amateur, the best plan is to find out from a well-informed neighbor or from the nearest agricultural college or experiment station the names of the pests that are troubling his trees or crops, and also the kind of spray mixture to use for their control.

Probably the best all-round remedy for fungi and some kinds of insects, such as San Jose scale and oyster shell scale, is the lime-sulphur wash. A commercial form of this can be purchased, which requires only mixing with water to be ready for use. For applying in winter or spring, before the buds commence to open, the usual proportion is one part of lime-sulphur to ten of water; in summer, one to thirty. To make this mixture effective for controling insects that bite and chew their food such as the codling moth, it is necessary to mix with it an arsenical poison, such as arsenate of lead.

Another solution that is commonly used for orchard and garden spraying is the Bordeaux mixture. It can be made at home as follows: For one barrel of the mixture use four pounds of bluestone, four or five pounds of lime and four ounces of Paris green or two pounds of arsenate of lead. Dissolve the bluestone in a half barrel of water; slake the lime and add another half barrel of water; then bring the two solutions together, making a barrel. It is important not to mix the bluestone and lime together, except when well diluted. Mix four ounces of a good Paris green to a paste, with a little water, dilute with water enough to enable it to pour and add same to the mixture in the barrel. Arsenate of lead is more adhesive than Paris green, and is absolutely harmless to the foliage. Buy a knapsack spray pump and go to work.

It is best to spray fruit trees four times. First, when the trees are dormant in spring, for fungi; second, when the buds are opening, for bud moths and cigar case bearer; third, immediately after the blossoms fall, for codling moth; fourth, about three weeks later, for apple scab and leaf-eating insects.

Planting vegetables, with the possible exception of peas, onions, lettuce, beets and early potatoes, before the soil is thoroughly warm, is labor and seed almost as good as thrown away.

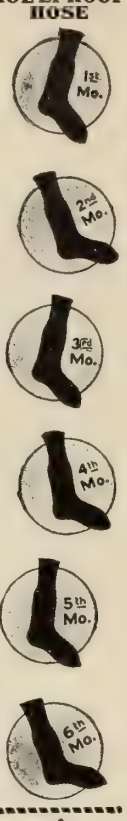
Silverware of Unrivalled Reputation
The durability of 1847 ROGERS BROS. silverware is beyond question. For 64 years it has been proving its wearing qualities. To-day it is the standard in silver plate.
1847
ROGERS BROS. X S TRIPLE
is guaranteed by the largest makers of silverware in the world. Local dealers everywhere sell this famous
"Silver Plate that Wears"
Send for catalogue "E48" illustrating the most popular patterns.
MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO.
(International Silver Co. Successor)
MERIDEN, CONN.
New York Chicago
San Francisco
Hamilton, Canada

6 Pairs Holeproof Sox $1.50
Stockings . . 2.00
By Mail, Guaranteed Six Months

No Darning! No Discomfort! Cuts Hosiery Expense Half! Write for List of Sizes, Colors, Grades and Prices. Absolutely Finest Hosiery Made. A Million Wearers.

ORDINARY HOSE

HOLEPROOF HOSE



Don't buy any more hosiery until you get the $1.50 Trial Box of Holeproof Hosiery containing six pairs of the finest, softest, best fitting hosiery made, and the Holeproof Guarantee Ticket which insures the wear of these six pairs for six months.

There's a coupon for each pair. If any or all pairs wear out in six months, return them with a coupon for each and get new hose free.

30,000 Pairs a Day

are made in our great factory to supply the demand. 95% of the 26,000,000 pairs that have been sold have outlasted the guarantee. We always replace without question the few pairs that do wear out. You are taking no chance whatever, so order right from this advertisement.

FAMOUS
Holeproof Hosiery
FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN

"Holeproof" is made for men, women and children, so that no woman need do any darning, no matter how large her family. We pay the top market price for our yarns. No cotton hose can be made any better. We make the lightest weights if you want them, guaranteed just the same. Send your order.

Use a trial box of these excellent sox at $1.50 (women's or children's trial box $2.00). Don't spend the same money for hosiery that wears out as common hosiery does. Get the six months' guarantee on "Holeproof." Learn how stylish they are—how they fit and how they feel. You'll never wear anything else once you try them.

HOLEPROOF HOSIERY CO. OF CANADA, LIMITED
138 Bond Street, London, Canada

Trial Box Order Coupon

Holeproof Hosiery Co. of Canada, Ltd., 138 Bond Street, London, Canada

Gentlemen: I enclose $1.50 ($2.00 for women's or children's), for which send me one box of Holeproof Hose. Weight..... (medium or light?) Size.....Color (check the colors on list to your right). Any six in a box, but only one weight and one size.

Name .....

Street.....

City..... Province.....

List of Colors
For Men and Women
Black
Light Tan
Dark Tan
Pearl
Lavender
Navy Blue
Light Blue
For Children
Black, and tan, only; and medium weight only.

Reg. U. S. Pat. Office, 1906
Carl Freschl
Look for the Above Marks
Others are Imitations

Are Your Hose Insured? (277)

MUSKOKA

Six thousand miles of islands, lakes, rivers, and wooded mainland, one thousand feet above the sea. Miles of unhindered waterways for the canoeist, scores of likely spots for the ardent fisherman, winding paths through leafy ways for the nature lover, and many a happy rendezvous for jolly company and picnicking parties. The only scenic route, and most direct way.

The Lake Shore Line

which runs through the heart of the district with wharf side stations at Bala Park and Lake Joseph. The wide expanse of the waters and the marvelous beauties of Muskoka can only be realized by a journey along the shores of the lakes. The route from Toronto by the Canadian Northern Ontario is a baptism in beauty itself, from the time the train enters the exquisite valley of the Don to the moment you step from the train to the waiting steamer.

Canadian Northern Ontario

Office; Cor, King and Toronto Sts., Toronto, Ont.
Phone Main 5179.

ANNUALS THAT ALWAYS PLEASE

By F. E. BUCK

YOU may or you may not remember that in your childhood days your baby fingers had a habit of reaching after some flowers in preference to all others. You may or you may not recall that as you grow older there were sweet odors in the garden which made you love to pluck, in the cool of the evening, those flowers which appealed so strongly to the sense of smell. You may not now care for the flowers you once loved long ago. But this last statement is hardly likely. Be you man, filled with the cares of business and the interests of other hobbies, or woman filled with the cares of the house and the pleasures of the enlarging realm of social activities, you are almost sure to possess some measure of interest in, and love for, flowers. As to the kind of flowers that appeal to you, that will depend to a large measure on past associations and present temperament. Almost everyone has at least a passive admiration for the flowers. The measure of your admiration will depend upon the way you view life, and upon the liberty you have given to your more poetic self when it tries to assert its legitimate function in your life's economy.

The "flowers which always please" of this article are all annuals, and consequently if you are looking for certain ones to be mentioned—for which you have always had a good word or a strong admiration—and are disappointed at not finding them in the list, remember that the length of the article forbids the mention of "many dear old familiar" flowers because they come under the heading of perennials rather than of annuals.

The aim of this article is to reintroduce to your notice some of the most popular of the annuals. A semi-descriptive style will help us best to find out why they please. A feature of the article will be its appeal to you personally to grow some of them in a way that, perhaps, may be new to you.

FAVORITES OF CHILDHOOD.

There is no doubt at all that many of the flowers which please us most do so because they were known and loved by us when we were young. The many colors and velvety feel of the pansy petals always appealed to our youthful tastes. The primness and purity of the button-like heads of the daisies caught our eye with equal force. And flowers which possessed odor or had "honey pockets," as we used to call them, such as the foxgloves, which are favorites of the bees, had also a particular charm for the inquisitive mind of childhood.

As typical of this class, and to show that odor is a big factor in making us love a flower, let us take the well-known mignonette, because that certainly could not appeal to us on any ground other than that of fragrance.

Mignonette.—The fragrant mignonette, or "little darling," to give the word its French interpretation, is one of the most cherished of all garden favorites. It is the simplest and sweetest of plants; so modest that it hardly pretends to be a flower. Perhaps it is because of its modesty that we love it the more. It is of Egyptian origin, and with us is still less than two hundred years old. Many have called it the love flower or herbe d'amour, because it once played a part in marriage ceremonies. In this connection, a story may not be out of place:

The mignonette has found a place in the armorial bearings of a noble family of Saxony, and it is said that it got there in the following way: The Count of Walsthim once loved a lovely maiden by the name of Amelia of Nordbourg, who was, however, a spoiled child and a coquette. This same Amelia had a humble companion whose name was Charlotte. One evening when they were at a party together it was arranged by the hostess that all the ladies present were to choose a flower, and the gentlemen were to make verses on the selections. Amelia picked the beautiful rose and Charlotte the modest mignonette. But in the course of the evening Amelia coquetted so much with a dashing colonel who was also present, that the Count could not suppress his vexation. On this he wrote a verse for the rose, which translated, is as follows:

"She lives but for a day, and pleases but for a moment."

He then presented the following line on the mignonette to the gentle Charlotte:

"Your qualities surpass your charms."

The Count transferred his affections to Charlotte, and when he married her he added a bunch of sweet mignonette to the ancient arms of his family, repeating this motto.

Maeterlinck says that "the mignonette hides herself in her laboratory, and silently distils perfume that gives us a foretaste of the air which we breathe on the threshold of Paradise."

We love some flowers then because of the associations with which they are entwined, and we love the fragrant types, perhaps, as much as any. And that is why they please. In this list then we must include the sweet "old-fashioned" annual pinks, and the stocks, the wallflowers, in addition to those mentioned earlier.

THE TOMMY ATKINS TYPE.

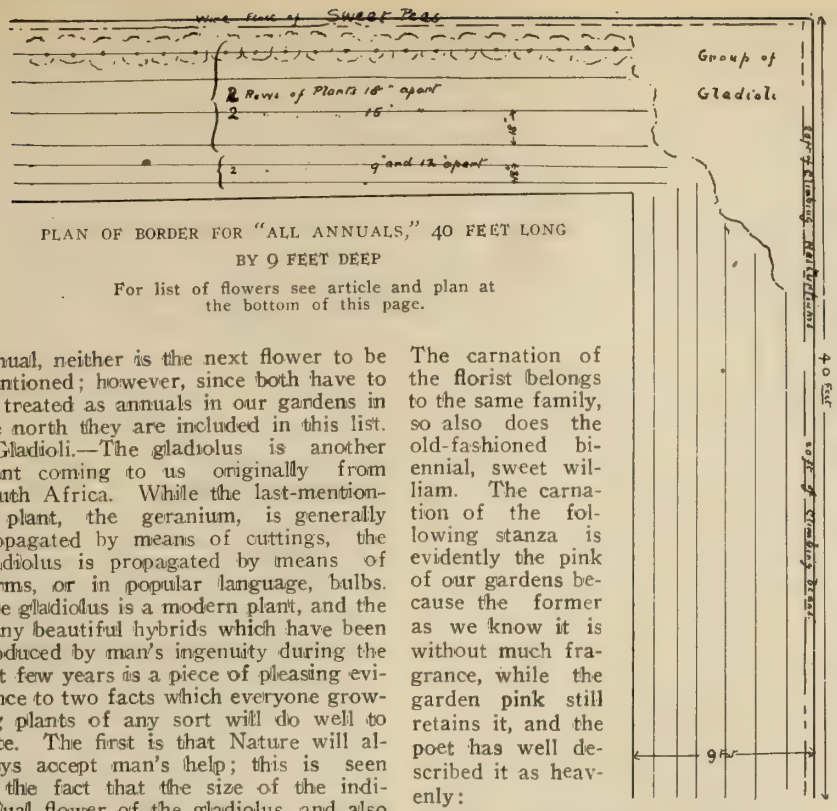
There is another class of annual flowers which appeal to us for quite different reasons. Some of them may be slightly fragrant, but that is not the ground of their appeal. As a rule they make us conscious of their worth by means of their gay colors. As types of this class we might mention petunias, geraniums and verbenas. We often see flowers of this type in our public places, and sometimes get the impression that they lack refinement of character. But that is not really so. They are not to be thought of as decking themselves in gaudy colors like the African native. But it is permissible to think of them as attired in bright congruous colors like Tommy Atkins on parade. Nature is never incongruous, and we should, and do love, these gay flowers because they are gay—and in a way belong to the public life. They must be thought of as "heroes for foreign service." But before we give up our "boys" for foreign service we learn to love them in the home. So with these flowers. There is no reason why we should not grow and love these flowers in our gardens because they have the merit of being fit for public service.

Petunias.—Amongst the showiest flowers of this class are the petunias, Petunias make very rapid growth. They come to us from South America, and next to geraniums, they are without doubt the most satisfactory flowers for massing in beds. Some are quite strongly perfumed, and all are varied and most attractive in their colors.

Verbenas.—The verbena, or "herb of grace" was worn in olden times as a charm to ward off evil associations. We have found at Ottawa that some of the modern strains of verbenas are unsurpassed by any flower if a gorgeous mass of beautiful color is required. Some are sweetly fragrant. Verbenas grow with a very spreading habit, and will stand a good bit of cutting back if such is necessary, to keep them in bounds.

Geraniums.—The very word "geranium" calls to mind bright patches of color on open lawn or in public park. The fact that this flower is so popular is its best recommendation. Apart from the fact that the geranium is a flower which will continue in bloom for the whole season, we should remember that it has other merits which have raised it to such a high place in the national esteem. It has attractive foliage at all reasons, and this is in most cases pleasantly aromatic. There is a sweet-scented section of these plants which is not so well known as it should be. The geranium comes to us from South Africa, and the very large number of varieties of all gradations of color which may be obtained would give the geranium a place amongst the "flowers that please" if it had no other merit. But it has merits belonging to few other flowers. It can be propagated with the greatest ease from cuttings, and the number of different ways in which it may be used is greatly in its favor.

In a sense the geranium is not a true



PLAN OF BORDER FOR "ALL ANNUALS," 40 FEET LONG BY 9 FEET DEEP

For list of flowers see article and plan at the bottom of this page.

annual, neither is the next flower to be mentioned; however, since both have to be treated as annuals in our gardens in the north they are included in this list.

Gladioli.—The gladiolus is another plant coming to us originally from South Africa. While the last-mentioned plant, the geranium, is generally propagated by means of cuttings, the gladiolus is propagated by means of corms, or in popular language, bulbs. The gladiolus is a modern plant, and the many beautiful hybrids which have been produced by man's ingenuity during the last few years is a piece of pleasing evidence to two facts which everyone growing plants of any sort will do well to note. The first is that Nature will always accept man's help; this is seen in the fact that the size of the individual flower of the gladiolus, and also the length of its flower spike have both been vastly improved by skilful breeding. The second is that although Nature will accept man's help, she will not yield into his hands her secrets by means of which she establishes her claim to be the great Artist; this is seen in the most marvelous blendings of several colors in a single flower. This blending of color she does with perfect congruity, and gives man no reason to think that he has a share in the result.

Other Favorites.—While it is not necessary to discuss in a list of "annuals that always please," every flower that one would place in such a list, it would be impolitic, if not unfair, to pass by altogether some which have merits equal to others discussed at some length. However, space, the purpose of this article, and the "fortunes of war" require that many of the most worthy will have to be dismissed with the briefest word possible.

Zinnias are well-known garden annuals, bearing large showy flowers of several colors. Well-grown and selected zinnias often produce flowers almost as large and attractive as dahlias. They are particularly pleasing when flowers of a formal type are required for vase use.

Balsams are among the showiest and most popular of the garden annuals. A strong point with them is that they are seldom troubled with any insect or other pest, and in addition they have a very bush-like and attractive habit of growth. They are generally covered with an abundance of bloom.

HOME FAVORITES.

There is still a third class of flowers which may very well be named "home favorites." For generations flowers of this class have made home surroundings brighter and happier by reason of their ever radiant or fragrant presence. Most of these, like the two last-mentioned, will have to be dismissed with a short word only.

Who is he that does not know the odor of pinks? In the annual pinks, both single and double varieties may be obtained which are always worth growing. Pinks seldom fail to attract our attention and win our regard. They are loved particularly by the children. The carnation of the florist belongs to the same family, so also does the old-fashioned biennial, sweet william. The carnation of the following stanza is evidently the pink of our gardens because the former as we know it is without much fragrance, while the garden pink still retains it, and the poet has well described it as heavenly:

"Red carnations blushing bright,
Sun-kissed flowers of love's own hue,
Fair adorers of the light,
Heavenly odors spring from you."

Next to the sweet peas, the nasturtiums seem to hold their own as popular climbing plants for the home surroundings. Some very desirable colors are now obtainable in the dwarf or "Tom Thumb" types. The popularity of both forms is due to the many merits possessed by this "old-fashioned" favorite.

Poppies are obtainable in many annual varieties, and should have a place in every garden. The Shirley poppies are among the best.

Salvias are entitled to premier place amongst the best scarlet flowers.

Asters are wonderful flowers, and no list would be complete without asters, and the next, and last, flower to be mentioned.

A few other flowers which might well be included in this section of "the home favorites" will be found at the end of the article.

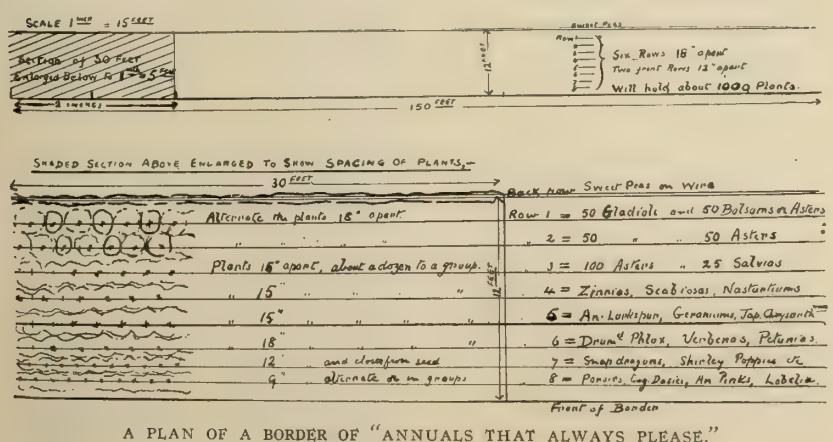
It might be mentioned, perhaps, that the three divisions into which "annuals which always please" have been placed, namely, "favorites of childhood," "Tommy Atkins types" and "home favorites," are divisions suggested by the flowers themselves, and that such divisions are used to suggest the functions of the flowers more than for any other reason.

SWEET PEAS.

The sweet pea is the emblem of delicate pleasures. It is so universally admired and so easily cultivated that perhaps no one would question its right to a place in any list of "annuals that always please." Its original home is the island of Sicily, and it is only within the last few years that it has been developed both in its form and popularity to its present high standard.

It is a beautiful flower for table decoration, and as evidence of its popularity in this connection it may be mentioned that there are in existence now national sweet pea societies, and that quite recently a first prize equal to about five thousand dollars was given for the best table display of these flowers.

In the garden it shows up to fine



Scale 1 inch = 15 feet
Section of 30 feet enlarged below to 1 inch = 5 feet
Sweet Peas
Row
Six Rows 18" apart
Two front Rows 12" apart
Will hold about 1000 Plants
150 feet
Shaded Section Above Enlarged to Show Spacing of Plants.
30 feet
Back row Sweet Peas on Wire
Alternate the plants 18" apart
Row 1 = 50 Gladioli and 50 Balsams or Asters
" 2 = 50 " " 50 Asters
" 3 = 100 Asters " 25 Salvias
Plants 18" apart, about a dozen to a group.
" 15" " " "
" 15" " " "
" 18" " " "
" 12" and drop from seed
" 9" alternate as in groups
4 = Zinnias, Scabiosas, Nasturtiums
5 = An. Larkspur, Geraniums, Jap. Chrysanth.
6 = Drum.d Phlox, Verbenas, Petunias
7 = Snapdragons, Shirley Poppies &c.
8 = Poppies, Cyp. Daisies, An. Pinks, Lobelia.
Front of Border

A PLAN OF A BORDER OF "ANNUALS THAT ALWAYS PLEASE," 150 FEET LONG BY 12 FEET DEEP

As arranged above, the dwarf plants are all placed in the front row (row 8). Poppies, mignonette and candytuft do better if the seeds are sown in the open ground. If these are sown in row 7, the verbenas, etc., in row 6 will spread forward and fill up the space after the poppies are past.

Housecleaning Made Easy by Dusting With

LIQUID VENEER

LIQUID VENEER robs housecleaning of its drudgery. It is easy to use. No special directions are necessary, and there is scarcely anything in the house on which it cannot be used with wonderfully beautifying effect.

In the one simple dusting operation LIQUID VENEER takes off dust, scratches, stains, blemishes and brings on the beautiful finish that the article originally had. Doesn't matter what it is—leather chair, brass bed, chandelier, hardwood floor, table, dresser, piano or woodwork—LIQUID VENEER makes and keeps it just like new.

Also, LIQUID VENEER will prevent cracking and checking when used on varnished surfaces before the varnish has become dry and brittle. It instantly dispels that foggy film from pianos and highly finished furniture and acts as a perfect disinfectant A room dusted with LIQUID VENEER is as sweet and refreshing as a pine grove..

Trial Bottle Free

Send the coupon to-day for free trial bottle of LIQUID VENEER and learn what a great help it will be to you this housecleaning time, and how its constant use in the daily dusting will make future housecleanings still easier.

BUFFALO SPECIALTY COMPANY
240-D, Liquid Veneer Building,
BUFFALO, N. Y.

HOME OIL is the best oil you can use on squeaky door hinges

"CHEER UP" COUPON

BUFFALO SPECIALTY CO
240-D, Liquid Veneer Building, Buffalo, N.Y.

Please send me free and without further obligation on my part, sample bottle of LIQUID VENEER.

Name.....

St. and No.

City and

Fertilizers in the Garden

Extract from "Fertilizing Orchard and Garden" by B. Leslie Emslie, C.D.A. (Glas.), F.C.S., P.A.S.I.

"For flowering plants Potash and Phosphoric Acid are of great importance in the production of flowers with brilliant colors and scent, while the application of Nitrogen contributes to the size of the flower and to the growth of stem and leaf. In the production of large fine blooms on strong stems, Potash and Phosphoric Acid ought to be liberally used, while Nitrogen should be applied cautiously, since an excess of the latter would promote the growth of stems and leaf at the expense of the flower."

Experiment on Asters, conducted by J. H. Lock, St. Clarens Ave., Toronto

This photograph shows the plot to which the Potash was applied

Readers of "The Canadian Home Journal" can obtain free copies of the above named booklet by applying to

The German Potash Syndicate

1102-1106 Temple Building, Toronto, Ont.

MADE IN BERLIN

The "Onward" Automatic Vacuum Cleaner

Price, $25.00

The "ONWARD" Automatic is a real Automatic Cleaner at a price that brings it within the reach of every overworked housewife.

The One Hand-Power Cleaner that blows as well as sucks.

It sucks all the dust and grit out of carpets, rugs, upholstered furniture, curtains, mattresses and clothes. Cleans fabrics through and through, inside and out, and holds all the dust in the tank.

Easiest to empty, because our exclusive double tank device for separating the dust from the air catches 95 per cent. of the dust in the bottom of the tank, without screens or water. Only 5 per cent. is screened, and that on the outside of one canvas-covered cylinder. Other makes of Vacuum Cleaners have only one tank and screen 100 per cent. of the dust in complicated screens, bags, etc.

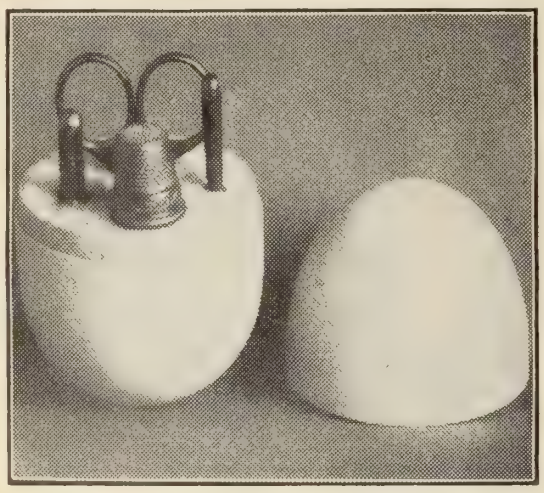
May be operated by one or two persons.

The price of this machine complete, with two attachments, is $25.00, delivered your nearest station, charges paid by us. We sell this machine under a strict guarantee that if not satisfactory, return same to us at our expense and your money will be cheerfully refunded. Send your order to-day. Free circular mailed upon request. Write for it.

MANUFACTURED BY

Onward Manufacturing Company

Berlin, Ontario



AN EASTER GIFT

An egg-shaped case of White Parisian Ivory containing Embroidery Scissors

Needle Case
Bodkin
Thimble

1.50

Postpaid to any address

Money back if not satisfied when you see it

ONE OF THE MOST ATTRACTIVE NOVELTIES OF THE SEASON
Mention Canadian Home Journal when ordering.

HENRY BIRKS & SONS, LIMITED
JEWELLERS MONTREAL

So Simple A cake of Maypole Soap Dye—the directions in our booklet "How to Dye"—some faded, discarded clothes, curtains or cushion covers—and a few minutes work—will yield new things for old.

MAYPOLE SOAP

The Clean, Easy Home Dye

washes and dyes, at the one operation, cotton, wools, silks or mixtures. Gives even, brilliant, fadeless colors, without muss, fuss or stained hands or kettles. 24 colors—will give any shade. Colors 10 cents, black 15 cents—at your dealer's or postpaid with booklet, "How to Dye," from advantage, and when grown as will be suggested later on in this article, it nearly always thrives in all seasons. Here again it should be noted that Nature seems to have selected the sweet pea to show how color may be blended in perfect harmony. Seldom do the varied colors clash. It always pleases. It dispenses its fragrant odor to all alike without regarding the rank of its possessor or begrudging the calls which the bees make on this store of sweet nectar. The fanciful lines of the poet Keats well describe some of its features:

F. L. BENEDICT & CO., MONTREAL 103

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

"Here are sweet peas on tiptoe for a flight,
With wings of gentle flush, o'er delicate white,
And taper fingers catching at all things,
To bind them all about with tiny rings."

As everyone knows, the petals of the sweet pea flower are called the "standard" the "wings" and the "keel," because they bear a resemblance to these objects in both shape and position. The Rev. W. T. Hutchins, a great American authority on sweet peas, pleasingly alludes to them thus: "The sweet pea has a keel that was meant to seek all shores; it has wings that were meant to fly across all continents; and it has a fragrance like the universal Gospel; yea, a sweet prophecy of welcome everywhere that has been abundantly fulfilled."

HOW TO GROW THESE FLOWERS.

Many of these flowers, as has been suggested, are ideal for massing in separate beds on the lawn or in a public park, but where flowers for the home or for cutting are required, the best way is to grow them in mixed borders.

Nothing, perhaps, is nicer than a well-arranged perennial border, but if you call that to mind that is not what is meant here. A border of all annuals is what is meant, and that is not very common. The way in which it is suggested that these should be grown, and the way that has given us great satisfaction is to prepare a special border for their exclusive use.

The arrangement of such a border should be quite different to that of the perennial border. In a perennial border the flowers must be arranged in clumps, and straight lines must be avoided as much as possible, but in growing annuals in a border the straight line method should be used as much as possible. Sketch out a plan of your border beforehand, and grow these flowers in the greatest abundance which are likely to be in the greatest demand for cutting.

Annual flowers are splendid for giving away to friends, hospitals, churches, etc., and in a border of annuals you appreciate those flowers which you "can cut and come again." But at the same time you will find that you will need some that are not suitable for cutting in order that the border may not be left too ragged after an extra severe demand upon its resources.

Grow several types of those flowers you like best, therefore, and give them all an equal chance to show you that they will please you if they have a fair opportunity. A fair opportunity is one where they will have a good soil and be so arranged that in dry weather all the ground will be shaded by their foliage in order that the moisture may not evaporate too quickly. Flowers so grown, simple as this sounds, will please about ten times as much as flowers grown under medium conditions only.

The accompanying plans are suggestive of borders of the type suggested.

CULTURE METHODS AND COST.

In this article very little will be said about the cultural methods or the cost of making borders of this type. Such features would not fit in with its general aim, but perhaps a little resume of the general procedure of making will not be out of place.

The cost will vary from one dollar to several, according to the time you have to give to the actual work. If all the plants, with the exception of the gladiolus bulbs, are raised from seed by yourself the cost will certainly be less than three dollars. That is if you have ordinary gardening tools at hand already. But if you buy the plants from the florist, which you may prefer to do, the cost will be greater.

Instructions and details for growing the seeds can be found in any good book on flower gardening. The salient points for making a border of all annuals are:

1—Get the border itself ready in the previous autumn.

2—If it has not been prepared in the autumn, preparations as early as possible in the spring will answer, provided that the ground is well enriched, with the best well-decayed compost.

3—Select the flowers you intend to grow, and be sure and order them not later than March.

4—Sow the seeds in late March or early April, some perhaps earlier than this. Sow them in flats or pots.

5—In April and May transplant the young seedlings, and put outside to harden off. Sweet peas must be sown as early as possible outside. Sow about two inches deep.

6—Plant out the border in late May or early June. Chose a cloudy day for this work.

7—During the growing season water very heavily about twice a week if watering be necessary.

8—Until the flowers commence to blossom keep the ground slightly stirred, even if there are no weeds.

9—In October dig up the border ready for the same process another year.

The best annuals to grow this way are: Pansies, daisies, pinks, stocks, wallflowers, nasturtiums, petunias, zinnias, asters, salvias, poppies, balsams, verbenas, sweet peas, gladioli, lobelia, annual larkspur, annual phlox, scabiosa, golden orange daisy, candytuft, single Japanese chrysanthemums, annual hollyhocks, mignonette, coreopsis, cosmos, marigold.

English Cowslips

By J. E. ORR

FOR perhaps more than fifty years we have had abundance of these pretty flowers. They are a dearly loved favorite with all who see them. They grow with very little care. Some of the most beautiful blooming plants grow in the grass and in the shade of the trees.

During May and June they produce armfuls of flowers, and burst forth in a great variety of colors, from bright yellow to deep crimson. Many are variegated and extremely rich in markings, and all have pretty centres. Their perfume is sweet and pleasant to inhale, as it is wafted through the air. For bouquets they are first-class, for they have long stems, and while lasting well, they never litter up a room with falling petals. They are well adapted for the country, as they can care for themselves, and also add much to the cheerfulness and beauty of the surroundings.

The cowslips and tulips bloom at about the same time, and a mixed bouquet of them looks well. They are a hardy perennial; therefore are not disturbed by zero weather. Many Old Country people show a decided pleasure when they see the cowslips in Canada, as they are reminded of scenes in the Old Land.

A Garden of Sweet Odors

By C. B. ALDEN

FRAGRANT flowers are the special joy of gardeners. A hardy annual that gives off a delightful fragrance at night is the sweet-scented stock Mathiola bicornis. Although its flowers are inconspicuous, this annual is well worth growing near the veranda where you are accustomed to sit in the evening. Sow the seed in the open ground just as soon as the soil is in good condition to work. Later on, thin them somewhat, but not enough to prevent them from growing in a compact mass. As they are rather weak-stemmed, the plants require the support of each other.

To have a garden, the odor of which will perfume the air and delight the owner and the passersby have, in addition to the sweet-scented stock, mignonette, verbenas, sweet alyssum, sweet peas, lily of the valley, pinks and nicotiana or tobacco plant. Mignonette, sweet alyssum, verbenas and nicotiana may be started indoors and transplanted to the garden, thereby ensuring earlier blossoms, if one cares to take that trouble. All the kinds mentioned, however, may be sown in the open as soon as the soil is ready. Mignonette needs cool soil, not too rich, and shade part of the day. Verbenas like the sun. Sweet alyssum makes a pretty border. Sweet peas should be planted as early as possible for best results. Lily of the valley comes up each year; plant the roots in a shady place. Nicotiana is very fragrant at night and, like the sweet-scented stock, will add another charm to the evening hours.

A Garden From the Woods

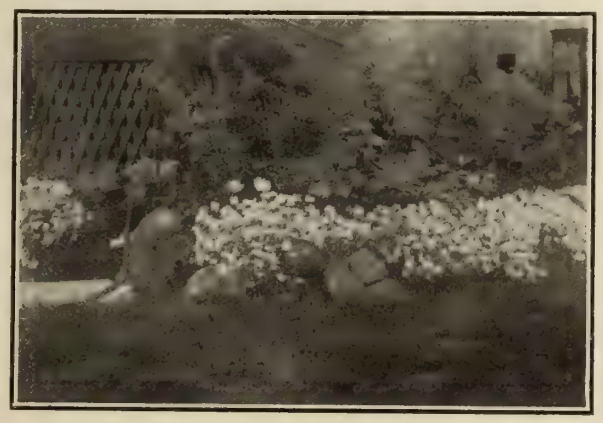
By MRS. A. G. H. WHITE

A GARDEN should be, in a measure, the expression of the owner's self. It represents an idea of beauty or usefulness, according to the taste and pocket of the possessor.

If it fall to you to have wide spaces in which to garden, then you can dream dreams and make pictures to your heart's content. But if only a narrow city lot be your portion, imagination must work out something that will show your individuality. Copy as little as possible. Let your garden be a phase of you.

WILD CRANESBILL—GERANIUM MACULATUM

Of course, soil is the great factor. If a heavy clay that will not drain, get your coal ashes worked under the surface, and a heavy coating of manure on top. If put on in the fall this will render the top soil easier to work with in the spring, but it takes a long time to make a clay soil friable. It has its advantages, though, because there is always moisture at the roots of things, that helps them through the hot days of summer. But drainage is indispensable; otherwise the clay packs about the roots and no air reaching them, they rot away and the plants die.



ALPINE CRESS WITH TULIPS GROWING OVER BIG STONES
Behind are elder and Japanese knotweed as shrubs—planted to make a high, bare veranda look lower.

If your neighbors are not severely conservative, you may induce those on either side to do away with the high board fences which keep out the air and sunshine and harbor ice until late spring. A light wire fence, open meshed, over which vines can clamber, lets all the breezes through, and is a dainty background for the flowers.

The plea of "destroying privacy" by removing board fences does not hold very well, because if you are really so interested in your neighbor's doings, and cannot see him through the fence, it is so easy to walk upstairs and look at him out of the back window.

With soil and fences arranged to satisfaction, next comes growth. If the lot is long and narrow, shorten it by putting shrubs in the corners. Not a straight line of them, "nature abhors straight lines," but group them so as to make a kind of semi-circle at the back.

In these groups, some of the native shrubs are exceeding beautiful, and only need energetic hands and car fare to get them. The red- osier dogwood, with its rich crimson wood, dainty green oval, deeply-veined leaves, is beautiful at all times—in the winter against the white snow, in spring just budding, in summer with its masses of white flowers, and through autumn with its heavy clusters of white berries.

The elders, both red-berried and black-berried, also are useful. The red-berried elder blooms early, and its pyramids of creamy white flowers, are followed by groups of red berries. If planted with a black-berried elder, which flowers late, the large flat flower masses of the latter, mingled with the red berries of the former, make an effective group, if the birds leave you the pretty fruit.

The viburnums, maple-leaved, and high-bush cranberry, are beautiful shrubs. None requires any care after planting, as they are used to looking out for themselves in their woodland home, and scorn wrappings and coddling.

Along the fences bunches of boltonia will give fountains of white bloom towards autumn. Under these have a few rare pæonies, with their exquisite flowers of varied colors, some groups of stately iris, and phlox of any kind you fancy. Our own wild phlox makes a dainty garden flower if a mass of it is planted with something richly green behind. The large lavender-blue flowers are lovely. Wild geranium also is not to be despised in a large clump, but it must be kept within bounds, or will become troublesome.

BLACK-BERRIED ELDER—SAMBRICUS CANADENSIS

The Canada lily, with its deep red-orange bells, spotted with brown, is a graceful guest to be entertained. Anemones and bloodroot, violets of five or six kinds and wild columbine, with its scarlet and gold swaying honey-cups, are beautiful reminders of golden days of rambling, when seen in the border.

Along the edge, following the lines of the border, Alpine cress is the prettiest of pretty things. The foliage is so compact, and there are so many thousands of white blossoms, and they come so early that they make the heart joyful. Among this, many bulbs of tulips, squills and snowdrops may be hidden, which in blooming above the snowy mass of tiny cress-flowers in the early season, give an effect which puts the finest confection in Parisian hats into the shade.

Asters for fall bloom must not be forgotten, and these may be planted al-

THE BEST OF THE PATCH
RENNIE'S SEEDS
ARE SUPPLIED TO YOUR DEALER DIRECT FROM US-AFTER EACH HARVEST-AND ARE ALWAYS FRESH AND RELIABLE-TESTED BY GOVERNMENT-BUY THEM IN SEALED PACKAGES-CATALOGS FREE
WM. RENNIE CO. LIMITED
TORONTO. MONTREAL.
WINNIPEG. VANCOUVER.

BRUCE'S SEEDS

THE SEEDS THAT SATISFY

SPECIAL OFFER. ALL POSTPAID.

Bruce's Royal Nosegay Collection Sweet Peas, 1 pkt., each 8 superb sorts, separate colors, for 25c.

Bruce's Peerless Collection Dwarf Nasturtium, 1 pkt., each of 7 finest sorts, separate colors, for 25c.

Bruce's Empire Collection Asters, 1 pkt., each of 5 magnificent varieties separate, for 25c.

Bruce's "A" Vegetable Collection, 8 pkts., different varieties, our selection, for 25c.

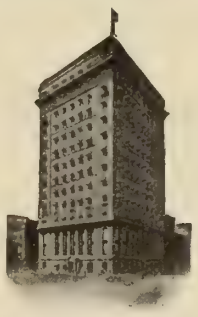
Bruce's "B" Vegetable Collection, 15 pkts., different varieties, our selection, for 50c.

Bruce's "C" Vegetable Collection, 14 pkts., different varieties and ½ pint each, Beans and Corn, ¼ pint, Peas, our selection, for 75c.

BRUCE'S Seeds—The Standard of Quality since 1850.

FREE — Our handsomely illustrated 112-page catalogue of Vegetable, Farm and Flower Seeds, Plants, Bulbs, Poultry Supplies, Garden Implements, etc., for 1912. Send for it.

John A. Bruce & Co., Ltd., HAMILTON, ONTARIO
Established Sixty-two Years.



The average deposit of the Canadian people is $122.00 per person

Saving money can be made a habit. A portion of your weekly or monthly wage deposited regularly in a savings account will soon bring you up to the average, and you will be surprised how rapidly $2 deposited weekly will amount to enough to make a substantial payment on a home.

618 M

Head Office . TORONTO

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS
$6,850,000

TOTAL ASSETS
$52,000,000

The Traders Bank of Canada
INCORPORATED 1885

113 BRANCHES THROUGHOUT CANADA

There was a MISTAKE
In the Address

Probably you noticed the big, double-page advertisement printed in colors in the February issue of The Canadian Home Journal. If you did not, look it up now, it's worth reading. Unfortunately, through a mistake some of the advertisements gave the address as Canal Road, Cleveland. It should have read 897 Centre Street, Montreal.

You should have a copy of the portfolio of twenty color plates of interiors mentioned in the advertisement. It is not too late to get one. Sent free on request, so write to-day. You and everyone else interested in the interior decoration and furnishing of your home will want a copy. Be sure and write to-day.

SHERWIN-WILLIAMS PAINTS & VARNISHES

Write The Sherwin-Williams Co. of Canada, Montreal - Toronto - Winnipeg

ARE YOU BURNING TOO MUCH COAL?

Is your furnace heating your house? All of it---or are you perpetually shovelling in coal and not getting sufficient heat? Is it the quality of the coal or is it the construction of the furnace that is at fault. The

Pease Heating Systems

Steam, Hot Water, Warm Air or Combination

are so constructed that they must give the maximum amount of heat for the minimum amount of coal consumption.

If You Are Troubled

with insufficient heat in your house our heating engineer will be able to help you. A post card or phone will bring him.

Ask the man who has a Pease Heater if his house is economically heated.

Let us send you our books, "The Question of Heating" or "Boiler Information."

PEASE FOUNDRY COMPANY
LIMITED

TORONTO - - - WINNIPEG

Western Representatives

Pease Waldon Company, Limited, - - Winnipeg

313

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

most on top of the bulbs, whose foliage dies away after the bloom is over. Lots of white asters, pale and deep pink, rich Burgundy purple and lavender make a lovely show, and supply house flowers in plenty. One hundred plants give countless flowers if the plants are strong. Of course there are thousands of other things to put in, but this garden of my mind's eye is one that is to be inexpensive, not requiring great care, supplying work for brain and hands without overworking strength, and giving an immense amount of pleasure to one who likes a quiet place with specks of beauty in it and a chance to see nature at play with her little children, the birds and bees and flowers.

CELERY FOR THE HOME GARDEN

By GEORGE BALDWIN

THE elements of success in celery growing are many. First and foremost among them is a love for your work. If you do not like your job you will never be a real success, no matter what line of business you are in.

I will now give a few brief details of my own experience in growing celery. For two reasons my remarks in reference to raising your own plants will be very brief, as by the time this article is in print it will be too late for sowing seed of early celery, and then again you can procure all the plants you require from local seedsmen at very reasonable rates. In the latter case, do not leave the ordering until too late.

To begin with, get all the seeds you want about the end of February. I should recommend (providing you can make room for a three-row trench) White Plume, Paris Golden, and Rose Ribbed Paris. Next prepare your hotbed or seed pans. Sow the seed thickly. firming the soil down well before putting the seed in, and then again after you have sifted about one-eighth of an inch of soil on top of the seeds. Give lots of air and moisture. As soon as the seedlings have got three leaves, prick them out into more space, giving them about one inch of room each way. Keep them as close to the glass as possible to prevent them getting too long and spindly. Stir the earth frequently with a small pointed stick. When they are about two inches high, transplant again, giving three inches of space. Along about the second or third week of May they will be ready to plant out in the trench.

Prepare your trench in the following manner: Mark off your ground six feet wide by length required to take care of the quantity you intend planting. Dig this out to the depth of eight inches, throwing the earth equally on each side, then fill this eight inches up with good rotten manure and dig it in thoroughly and deeply. To insure it being thoroughly incorporated with the soil, tramp all over it and then dig it up again, then level and rake it over, after which mark off with a string the three rows which should be from eighteen inches from each bank and eighteen inches between the rows, which should run north and south. Next get your plants, which should now be about eight inches long; that is, four inches of tops, and one-quarter inch of roots. Take the shears and clip off about one-half inch of foliage and one-half inch of roots, and then plant eight inches apart in the rows. Be sure in planting that you do not have the roots turning upwards, but dibble your holes big enough to allow the roots to go down in their natural position, and above all, press the earth very firmly around the roots. Give a good supply of water and shade for a day or two with boards or paper.

Along each side of your trench you have a hill running the whole length, probably a foot high. Level this off on top to about eight inches wide, and sow radishes, which will mature long before you need the soil for earthing-up purposes; in fact, I get two crops of radishes off these hills.

From this out (your rows being wide enough) run your hoe through one day and water the next day by taking off the nozzle and holding the hose down close and giving a liberal supply. About once a week give the rows a watering with liquid manure, and about the end of July you will have some celery fit to pull. About the second week in July start the earthing-up operations by drawing from the hills on either side and putting about four inches of earth around the stalks. Do this by holding each individual plant firmly with your left hand, and using your right to draw the earth, being very careful not to let any earth run in between the stalks.

To thoroughly bleach the celery fit for table use, allow yourself ten days or two weeks, covering up to within four inches of the tops of your foliage. Scatter a little sulphur or slacked lime over your bed twice during the season. Look occasionally for a green and yellow caterpillar. Do not squirt water on the foliage. Carry out the foregoing instructions, and you will have celery fit to place before a king.

My reasons for recommending the earth instead of paper or boards for bleaching is because I have tried all three ways, and find the earth far preferable. It gives the celery a sweet nutty taste, and the bleaching is more complete.

GARDEN OF MR. GEORGE BALDWIN, TORONTO

This garden in 1911 produced 82 varieties of vegetables and 100 varieties of flowers.

There is no reason why the city man should not have a garden as well as the man in the country. It is not necessary to have a large area of land to get good returns. Often the 5 or 10-acre farm returns as much as one of 40 or 60 acres; good results may be obtained from a city lot of 50 by 50 feet. It depends very much upon the man (or woman), as well as on the crop raised.

My Garden of Ten Square Rods

By W. N. ROBERTSON

THE rear half of our city lot is an important factor in the domestic economy of our home.

Before coming to East Toronto to reside I had been for two years roving about the district of the Bay of Quinte, digging up data relating to the United Empire Loyalists, and previous to that time for a number of years following historical pursuits in far-away Australia, where the almond-eyed Celestial monopolizes the truck industry and daily brings the vegetables round to your kitchen door.

The lot belonging to my residence on Danforth Avenue is 54 feet frontage by 150 feet deep, with a lane at the back and a water tap, of which I have the use, at the north-west corner. My house stands about twelve feet from the street, with a strip of land thirteen feet on each side of the building, which with the front forms a lawn, while from the back of a shed at the rear of the kitchen there is the whole of the remaining portion of the lot available for garden purposes, to which it has been devoted since I came into possession.

As a gardening experience, perhaps the spring of the first year I tackled the proposition was the most strenuous, as I found the surface of that area which I intended to operate had been used by previous occupants as the handiest place to throw old tins, and every other worn-out accesory of civilized life. However, there was nothing else for it, so I raked the surface fore and aft and basely threw everything found over the fence into an adjoining vacant lot, owned, as I was told, by an Italian who, at the time, was on a protracted holiday among the olive groves of his native country.

Having in childhood and youth been reared on a farm in Grey County, I realized from the subconsciousness of early rural experience that the soil should be dug over and dug deeply. This I did thoroughly, and may say that nearly every second spadeful would bring up some kind of metallic nuisance in the shape of a jam tin, a piece of wire or any other kind of broken rubbish that had been discarded by the tenants of the past. This second crop of obstructions which the spade unearthed supplied a fresh contribution to the Italian's lot, which by the way, is still vacant, and as I have hopes of buying it to add to my own property, the just retribution in store for me as a result of my method in the solution of a difficulty will be sufficiently obvious.

I bought two loads of manure from a dairyman who delivered it, and as I dug each bed I incorporated it with a fairly generous portion of the fertilizing medium as the simplest way to enrich the soil if poor, as an incentive and assistant to the regular routine that Nature follows as a law.

I adopted the plan of making one garden bed and planting it before starting another, carefully observing the directions on the outside of the seed packet used, which I take it, are mainly correct as to instructions concerning preparation, suitability of soil and the right time to sow.

Peas, cucumbers, wax beans, shallots and radishes we sowed first, and afterwards duplicated them, the second crop of each coming into useful maturity as the first was going out. This system gave a continuous supply, and far beyond the usual season of each.

Onions, beets, parsnips, salsify, carrots and turnips were planted in drills and thinned out to proper space when old enough, the leaves of the extra turnips and beets furnishing excellent greens for table use in the meantime, and being quite equal to spinach, a bed of which had not been omitted. Sweet corn we sowed later on, as to plant it prematurely invites disaster from early rains, which are apt to be too copious and rot the seed.

Pumpkins, squashes of the Hubbard variety, melons and potatoes we put in last, as a possible frost would be fatal to the three former, and the tubers, except for very early use, are apt to be better if planted round about the 24th of May.

From a florist we bought tomato and cabbage plants, and set them in odd corners that were otherwise unprovided for. Here and there among the potatoes were a few English marrows, which during their career evinced marvelous growth and productivity, the only drawback to their presence was their tendency to crawl everywhere and over everything that came in their way, and while they well repaid all pains and care, they had to be watched and guided in their devious progress to prevent strangling their inoffensive neighbors.

I also planted some diminutive beds of parsley, sage, thyme, garlic and mint, all of which flourished and furnished seasoning material for the various products of the garden that were converted to pickles, catsup, chutney, sauces and the many other conditions of preserving that may be applied to the majority of vegetables.

I may say that the garden was a great success from start to finish, and grew more vegetables than our family of myself, my wife and two little girls, could consume. From the middle of May, when the first lettuce, green onions and radishes were ready for use, until the snow flurries of late November, our garden of ten square rods furnished a plenteous supply and variety of food that favorably reflected on the expenses of the household, while the healthful recreation of planting, watching and cultivating during the season, filled our leisure hours with a solicitude and interest that was both pleasurable and wholesome.

My two little daughters, Isabel and Jane, became quite proficient in the useful knowledge they gained through Nature study thus afforded, and when the muskmelon patch materialized, about the middle of September, there were as many as 175 of the Montreal variety, from small to very large, that ripened at the rate of four or five each day. These occupied the especial attention of the two children who considered them the most valuable yield of the garden, and they could be frequently seen wending their way to school in the morning with a melon under each arm.

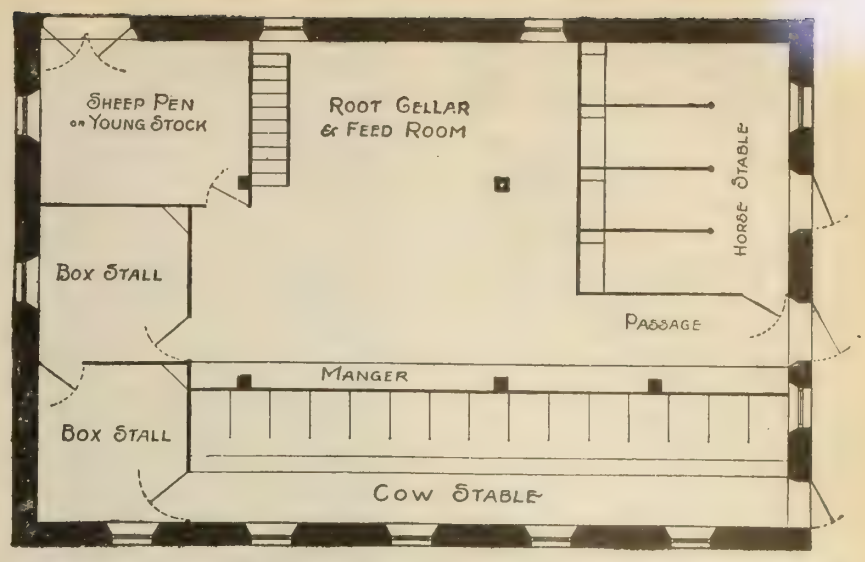
We employed no secret nor particularly scientific methods with our first vegetable garden, nor have I supplemented any different process since, although I have made and enjoyed five successive gardens in the same place. Plenty of manure, plenty of cultivation, and plenty of watering in season may be defined as the three principal factors of success. Of course, I kept the garden clean, right from the first, as a weed should no more find a place in a garden than a pug dog on a farm.

In gardens I have had since, I have added to the variety of vegetables first grown, as for instance, celery, rhubarb, artichokes, horseradish and perhaps one or two other products which are generally planted in odd corners or places in the garden to make the most of space available.

I also grow my own cabbage plants, and have them well up in a box inside the house, so they will be ready first thing in the spring. Whenever a bed early becomes vacant, like that of green peas, shallots or radishes, I dig it up at once and set cabbages or tomatoes, if it be not too late for the latter, and in this manner I keep every square foot of the garden land, except that used for paths, occupied and producing something that will eventually find its way to our dinner table.

I might say that to those who have much of the æsthetic or artistic in their temperament, the vegetable garden lends itself to those two phases of the senses more than is generally supposed. The different and varied foliage of the many plants can with a little forethought be so arranged for when sown as to form a color scheme that will be extremely restful to the eye and the mind.

The brilliant light green of the lettuce, the burnt sienna and vandyke brown of the beets, the emerald of the pea beds and the blood-veined gamboge of the rhubarb, the silken blonde of the corn tassels contrasted with the tropical russets and greens of squash and pumpkin leaves, with all the colors here and there relieved by the tawny patches of well-tilled soil, create a harmonious picture that might vie with many a flower garden, and suffer little or none by comparison.



One of the modern barn plans prepared by our Builders' Service Dept.

Above is shown one of the modern barn plans prepared by our "Builders' Service Dept." Others are shown in a portfolio that will be mailed to you on receipt of the coupon attached to this ad, properly filled out.

If you will tell us the size of the barn you expect to build, and the number of cattle you want to house, our Board of Advisers, consisting of ten of the best barn builders and contractors in the Dominion, will co-operate with you to plan a building exactly suited to your own particular requirements.

This service is offered to you FREE of charge. It's our way of showing our appreciation of the generous and hearty support the farmers and builders of Canada have given our products, particularly Preston Safe-Lock Shingles.

Preston Safe-Lock Shingles merit the tremendous demand they enjoy to-day, for they afford guaranteed protection against lightning. They keep out the rain, snow, moisture, wind and fire, too. They cost nothing for up-keep, as they never need painting or repairs.

Our latest edition of "Truth About Roofing" booklet tells all about them. We'll send a copy along with the Portfolio of Barn Plans. You want the Portfolio, that's certain, if you intend to build. So send the coupon by first mail. Address it to

C. Dolph Manager

Metal Shingle & Siding Co., Limited

Branch Office and Factory, Montreal, Que. Preston, Ont.

Please send me portfolio of Barn Plans showing framework construction and plans of interior. I intend building a barn.....ft. by.....ft. Do you intend re-roofing or re-siding any building this year? (Yes or No.)

Name .....

P. O. Address .....

County .....

Province .....

Paper .....

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

201

OUR PRICES INCLUDE ALL CHARGES, BOTH DUTY AND POSTAGE.

Best quality Hair only used.

All Goods securely and Privately Packed and sent Duty & Post paid direct to your Home.

THE UNIVERSAL HAIR Co

TRANSFORMATIONS Guaranteed only finest quality pure European Human Hair used

ANY STYLE 9.50, or extra full of Hair 13.00.

Only measurement required is circumference of Head.

Send Sample of Hair, and also remittance, either by Express or Postal order, or Registered letter.

For Light, Grey, Pale, or Auburn Shades, an extra charge is made.

SWITCHES of PURE HUMAN HAIR.

16 inch..	$1.10
18 "	$1.35
20 "	$1.85
22 "	$2.50
24 "	$4.25
26 "	$5.00

Any length to order.

Our Extra Full Cluster of Curls mounted on Comb 3.00.

Send for New Illustrated Catalogue No. 7 to CLOUGHER SYNDICATE, 449 Spadina Avenue, TORONTO.

OUR NEW WAVED CHIGNON, very light in weight, most easily adapted, only 6.50.
SWATHE OF PURE LONG HAIR, to complete this effective Dressing, from 5.00

Address all ORDERS Manageress 84, FOXBERRY ROAD, BROCKLEY, LONDON, S.E. ENGLAND.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

SEEDS

We know that you are not aware that our seeds have been giving pleasure and profit to our customersfor over forty-five years.

With your care our mixture of Spencer Sweet Peas will give you the loveliest of bloom, surpassing anything that you have had before. Write for one ounce, 20 cents, postpaid.

Our Nasturtiums will also delight you;
Tall, mixed per ounce 10c.
Dwarf, " " " 15c.
Postpaid

Asters:—Our supplies have been procured from a famous house in France and may be relied on for beauty in color and size. White, Pink, Blue, Scarlet, 10c. per packet or any four for 25c., postpaid.

A mixture of the above, 10c. per packet.

Ask for a catalogue

Geo. Keith & Sons

Seed Merchants Since 1866

124 King St. East, Toronto, Ont.

TURNBULL'S Knitted "M" Bands

FOR INFANTS

These knitted "M" bands are necessary to the comfort and health of every infant.

They are the only articles on the market that will hold the diaper in place properly.

The above picture shows how the tapes are carried from over the tabs at the front and back to which diaper is attached, absolutely preventing sagging or stretching or tearing of the garment.

The wool used is made from the Australian Merino Sheep, noted for its beautiful softness.

Put the "M" bands on the baby first—then put on the vest or shirt afterwards.

Price, 25 cents each

Sold by the best dealers or by mail.

The C. Turnbull Co. of Galt, Limited

GALT - - ONTARIO

Beautifying Outbuildings

By C. B. ALDEN

NOT only should the farmer and the village or town householder plan to beautify the house and its immediate surroundings, but also something should be done to make more attractive the appearance of outbuildings, sheds and even the barns. I know a farmer who takes as much pride and pleasure in what he has done in the way of planting vines and flowers by his barns and carriage shed as he does in his lawn and flower garden. The front and the sides of the barns are covered with vines, and along the front are narrow beds of herbaceous plants, such as columbines, foxgloves, bleeding heart and similar old-fashioned sorts which, when once planted, require very little after-attention. At the rear of the buildings, where is located the barnyard, no planting has been done.

The idea could be applied with advantage to hundreds of farm buildings in this country. Schemes of improvement like this attract the attention of passersby, add to the value of the place, and make it more pleasant and more worth working and living for on the part of the owner and his family.

Propagating From Cuttings

By T. McVITTIE

FOR propagating plants by cuttings in the home, use a shallow box, say, four inches deep. Put in one inch of cinders or broken crocks for drainage, and fill with clean sharp sand. Insert the cuttings in the sand about one inch deep and two inches apart each way, making the sand quite firm around each. Then soak thoroughly, place in the window and shade for a few days. Cuttings should root in about three weeks' time, and be ready for planting in stronger soil.

One good soaking is usually sufficient until the roots appear. A light spraying may be given on bright days to keep the leaves from wilting.

As soon as well-rooted, the cuttings should be potted or boxed, and carefully watered until well established. Keep the blooms pinched off until the young plants are well rooted.

There are a great many plants which can be propagated in this way, such as coleus, heliotrope, geranium, ageratum, several varieties of begonias, alyssum, cuphea, fuchsia, salvia, abutilon, etc.

Coleus require a closer and more humid atmosphere, and more heat than the others, but this can be secured by covering the boxes with panes of glass. Coleus should root in about eight days.

Ferns of the Boston type can be increased at any time by taking off some of the smaller pieces with roots that grow around the edge of the larger plants. Pot them in small pots at first, but care should be taken not to overpot them. Overpotting is putting a large plant into a small pot. They root more quickly in small pots, and can be repotted as often as they require it.

Plants require a shift into a larger size of pots as soon as the present ones get full of roots, and they should never be potted sooner. They grow more quickly if only a small shift be given each time. It is best to use a pot about one size larger than what the plant has been in.

There are quite a number of plants which with a little care can be readily propagated at home, and the pleasures of gardening are greatly increased by this practice.

Some Good Dahlias

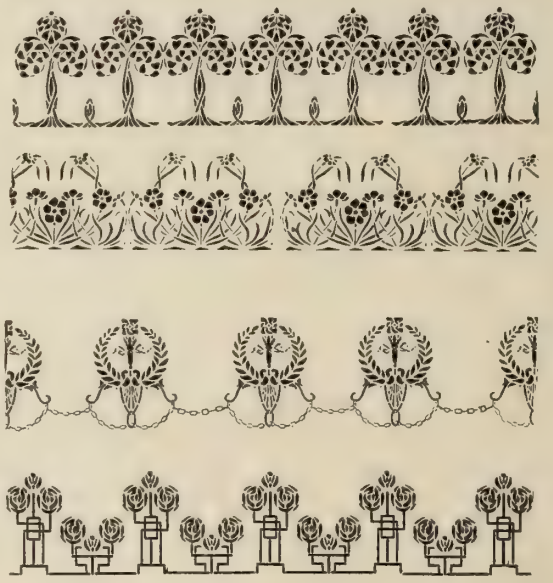
By ALEX. BALLOCH

THE decorative type of dahlia has always been my favorite, although there are quite a number of the standard type that I like very well. especially in the whites, "Mrs. John Walker" being one that I would not be without. "Mrs. Winters" and "Henry Patrick," decorative whites, are good and free blooming. (Delice, a new variety, is one of the best of the decorative class. —Ed.) "Grand Duke Alexis," a very large white with sometimes a tinge of pink, is a good one; the petals overlap to the point.

"Mrs. A. D. Livonia," standard, shell pink, although neither new nor very large, is still a favorite for its pretty shape, rich color and free blooming qualities. Another good one is "Gloire de Lyon," being very large and pure white.

To have large-flowered peonies, remove some of the early buds.

Stencil Decoration



Stencilling is, comparatively, the most inexpensive method of producing artistic, hand made, decorative effects in the home. Interest never lags, owing to the variety of results to be produced. It is equally as effective when executed by the novice as when carried out by the professional. Besides the pleasure obtained in doing the work for one's self, it offers the opportunity of applying design just where and how one wishes, and in the colors suited to their individual tastes.

Maple Leaf Stencils Applied Over Maple Leaf Flat Wall Colors in interior wall and ceiling decoration completes perfect home decoration.

Our Complete Stencil Catalogue contained in the book "TheWall Beautiful and Hygienic" will be mailed to you Free if you fill in the coupon and send it to us. "Our Maple Leaf Decorative Aid Department" will help you plan your stencil decoration, and tell you how to produce the most artistic decorative effects. This department will also plan your home decoration, by suggesting the best colors to choose, the best materials to use, and just how to apply them. Get suggestions from the "Decorative Aid Dept." before you plan your spring decoration.

PLEASE SEND ME FREE "The Wall Beautiful and Hygienic" and Complete Stencil Catalogue.
Name .....
Address .....
City .....
C.H.J. 4-12

The Imperial Varnish & Color CO., LIMITED
6-24 MORSE ST., TORONTO
108 Princess Street WINNIPEG
365 Water Street VANCOUVER

How to Grow Asters

By LEN. W. BARCLAY

ANY flower lover who is not already acquainted with the aster and its culture should try to have a few plants this season. With ordinary care asters give flowers until hard frosts destroy the plants. They are most desirable for midsummer and autumn blooms. The types and varieties have been much improved in recent years, and some of them now are perhaps equal to choice chrysanthemums.

CHOICE ASTERS IN GREAT PROFUSION
Corner of a field of three thousand plants grown last year.

Asters succeed best in a rich loamy soil, although with a little care they can be made to give good results in any good ground.

The seed should be sown as early in April as possible. Various methods are used to start the young plants. I find a cold frame more suitable than a hotbed. The plants are more hardy, and do not mind transplanting like tender hotbed-grown plants do.

Sow the seeds in shallow drills one inch deep and three inches apart. Cover lightly and press firmly. Water well and cover with newspapers for two days to hasten germination. Do not leave the papers on longer. Transplant to the open ground when the plants are three inches tall. The young plants will stand light frosts without injury. Do not set closer than twelve inches in the row, and have the rows twenty-four inches apart. Asters need plenty of water and frequent cultivation throughout the entire season.

In varieties, the Queen of the Market and Express Comet are the earliest bloomers, and very desirable. Early Branching Rose is a choice variety. The Cregos are among the best and should be given a trial. Royal Purple, Mikado, Rochester Pink and Late Branching also are excellent varieties.

Asters are not much troubled with insect pests. Out of over 3,000 plants that I grew last year not fifty were lost. If the ground is too rich, or if fresh manure has been added to the soil the same season that the plants are set out, they may be troubled with stem rot. In this case the only remedy is to pull and throw away affected plants.

Marguerite Carnations

By C. M. BEZZO

THESE beautiful flowers will do well in any fairly rich garden soil. To insure a long season of bloom the first year, seed of this flower should be planted in a cold frame as early in the spring as the weather will permit it being brought into use. They may also be planted in the open seed bed when the trees are bursting into leaf, covering to a depth of one-eighth of an inch, firming the soil over the seeds to prevent it drying out before they germinate.

When the young plants have made a good start they should be transplanted to the lower bed, setting about one foot apart. They usually commence to bloom about four months from the time the seed is sown, and under good cultivation many of the flowers will be equal to those grown and offered for sale by florists.

Their value is enhanced, as they are not injured by the first frost.

SIMMERS' $ COLLECTION OF FLOWER SEEDS
This Collection Contains Only True and Tried Kinds

Note: They are free by mail on receipt of price. Not subject to any discount or premiums.

Considering the extremely low rates we cannot possibly permit any change in the varieties.

Contains 30 Pkts. of Flower Seeds for $1.00

Alyssum, Sweet--Little Gem
Balsam, Double--Mixed
Calendula
Canarybird Flower
Candytuft
Carnation--Marguerite
Castor Oil Bean
Chrysanthemum--Annual Sorts
Cosmos--Mixed
Double Japan Pink--Best mixed
Eschscholtzia
Everlasting Flowers--Mixed
Gaillardia--Annual
Godetia--Mixed
Gourds, Ornamental
Marvel of Peru
Marigold, Double--Mixed
Mignonette
Morning Glory
Nasturtium--Tall mixed
Nasturtium, Dwarf--Mixed colors
Nasturtium, Tall--Lobb's mixed
Petunia
Phlox Drummondi--All colors mixed
Poppy--All kinds, mixed
Portulaca--Mixed Sorts
Scabiosa--Mourning Bride
Snapdragon
Sunflower--Many kinds, mixed
Sweet Peas

Orders Promptly Attended to
J. A. SIMMERS, Limited
141 to 151 King St. East, Toronto, Ont.

BEETHAM'S
La-rola

La-rola is a perfect emollient milk quickly absorbed by the skin leaving no trace of grease or stickiness after use. Allaying and soothing all forms of irritation caused by frost, cold winds and hard water it not only preserves the skin but beautifies the complexion, making it SOFT, SMOOTH AND WHITE, LIKE THE PETALS OF THE LILY.

The daily use of La-rola effectually prevents all redness, roughness, irritation and chaps. and gives a resisting power to the skin in changeable weather. Delightfully soothing and refreshing after Motoring, Golfing, Skating, Cycling, Dancing, etc.

Men will find it wonderfully soothing if applied after shaving. Ask your Chemist for it.

M. BEETHAM & SON - - - CHELTENHAM, Eng.

W. H. Scroggie, Limited, Montreal
New Catalogue Now Ready for Mailing

DO NOT PLACE YOUR ORDER until you ha ve seen this WONDERFUL VALUE GIVING CATALOGUE. We have planned this issue to be the BEST we have ever published. Offering a larger and BETTER SELECTED range of MERCHANDISE than we have hitherto placed before Canadian Mail Order Shoppers.

Buying from this Catalogue means a positive saving and a fair deal every time.

ALL WOOL NOVELTY TWEED SUITS

WOMEN'S SUITS of good quality, all wool tweed, new whip cord effect; a very striking and stylish model coat, silk serge, lined collar and cuffs, trimmed with satin and pearl buttons. Skirt side trimmed effect with braid and buttons; colors, Black and White, Green and White, Brown and White. Also comes in Brown and Navy Serge. Bust 32 to 42 Wonderful value $11.98

WOMEN'S FINE LAWN WAIST. Price 69c

WOMEN'S WAISTS OF FINEST QUALITY PERSIAN LAWN, made in a very attractive style, embroidered front, ¾ sleeve, high collar, both edged with lace, tucked over shoulder and down back, open back, buttons covered with box pleat; sizes 32 to 44. Our Special. Price 69c

R 500. SCROGGIE'S FAMOUS AMERICAN BEAUTY SILK ROSE, comes in all the new Spring shades Pink, Cardinal, Tea, Coral, Old Rose and Mauve. Large size Rose, mounted on first-class foliage. A regular $1.00 value for ... 49c

THE HOME OF TRUE ECONOMY
SPRING & SUMMER CATALOGUE NO 29 1912
W.H. Scroggie Limited
THE SERVICE OF OUR STORE BROUGHT TO YOUR DOOR.
SATISFACTION OR YOUR MONEY REFUNDED
MONTREAL CANADA

All delivery charges free

Write for your copy to-day.

NA-DRU-CO TRADE MARK N D & C Co

NA-DRU-CO ROYAL ROSE TALCUM POWDER

NA-DRU-CO Royal Rose Talcum is as comforting to Baby's tender skin as it is to Mother's wind-chafed cheek or Father's chin smarting after a shave. Its remarkable fineness—its pronounced healing, antiseptic qualities — and its captivating odor of fresh-cut roses — have won for Na-Dru-Co Royal Rose Talcum the favored place on the dressing tables and in the nurseries of the most discriminating people.

25c. a tin, at your Druggist's— or write for free sample to the NATIONAL DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO. OF CANADA, LIMITED, - MONTREAL.

191

WHAT TO PLANT AND WHEN

By JOHN CAVERS

WHEN the winter snows disappear and the sunshine begins to revive what has been dormant for several weeks, the question, "What shall we plant?" recurs annually to many people. It is not generally recognized that much of this annual anxiety about planting might be avoided by the more general use of bulbs and herbaceous perennials, which, when once obtained, are a permanent source of floral beauty and ornamentation. It is not claimed that these should take the place wholly of annual flowers, but that the latter may, with advantage, be relegated to a secondary place.

The herbaceous perennials when once well planted, come up year after year without any attention as to arrangement, and they require only some cultivation of the surface soil about them to yield annual dividends of floral loveliness. The half-hardy bulbs and plants, such as dahlias, gladioli, kniphofias, etc., must be taken up before heavy frost occurs in the fall, wintered in a cellar, and replanted in the spring, but the annual increase of these bulbs and plants richly compensates for the annual digging and planting of them.

Most of the herbaceous perennials increase in strength and vigor of plant, and in wealth and quality of bloom for several years without disturbance, and all of them increase their kind from year to year. The pæony, for instance, should remain undisturbed for eight to ten years, by which time it will have increased many fold. It should then be taken up, divided into sections, and replanted. The delphinium, helenium, iris, phlox and others should remain for three years, then be divided and replanted. The daffodils and late tulips may also remain undisturbed for three or four years without deterioration of the bloom.

The best six perennials in the order of their merit are: Pæony, iris, phlox, delphinium, chrysanthemum (hardy). and helenium. The most reliable of the flowering bulbs are gladiolus, daffodil, tulip, lily, hyacinth and ismene.

It is not difficult to arrange for a continuous succession of bloom from bulbs and perennials for six or seven months, beginning with May and ending with November. The following suggestions may be helpful:

For bloom in May—Columbine, daffodil, Dicentra spectabilis (bleeding heart), German iris, hyacinth, etc.

For bloom in June—Achillea, Clematis recta, German iris, hemerocallis (day lily), oriental poppy, pæony, pyrethrum, spiræa, etc.

For bloom in July—Anchusa, delphinium, gaillardia, Japanese iris, Lilium Candidum, phlox, shasta daisy, stokesia, yucca, etc.

For bloom in August—Dahlia, gladiolus, helenium, helianthus, Hibiscus Moscheutos, kniphofia, phlox, etc.

For bloom in September—Anemone Japonica, boltonia, hardy aster, hardy chrysanthemum, kniphofia, phlox, etc.

For bloom in October and November —Hardy asters and hardy chrysanthemums.

When shall we plant? is another question frequently asked. This general rule may be given as a reply, viz., bulbs and perennial plants that bloom in May or June should be planted in the fall; plants that bloom later than June may be planted in either spring or fall. There are exceptions to this general rule; e.g., the half-hardy bulbs and plants, such as dahlia, gladiolus, ismene, kniphofia, etc., as well as the hardy yucca, must be planted in the spring, while the lilies should be planted in the fall. The oriental poppy should be planted in August, and the daffodil in the latter half of August or first half of September.

Just a word as a plea for a closer knowledge of the flowering plants. Plant nothing, except the mixtures, that is not named and labelled, and preserve the labels until the name and characteristics of the variety have become familiar. To quote Mr. W. T. Macoun, the Dominion Horticulturist:— "How much more interesting it is to know the names of the species and varieties of plants that we grow than to merely know that they are phloxes, or pæonies, or irises!"

The Giant Purple Cone-Flower

By M. E. BLACKLOCK

THE giant purple cone-flower (Rudbeckia purpurea, syn. Echinacea purpurea) is not seen often enough in our gardens. It is a handsome showy plant, the flowers, from 5 to 6 inches in diameter, being of a rather peculiar but pleasing shade of soft magenta pink with a large cone in the centre of a strongly contrasting rich brown. It needs a warm soil and sheltered position, to stand our Toronto winters, for although a native of this continent, its home is considerably south of us, Gray's manual giving its range as W. Pennsylvania to Virginia to Iowa and southward, adventuring occasionally eastward.

Echinacea augustifolia, a sister, is found on our north-west prairies around Brandon, Manitoba. The flower of the latter species is somewhat smaller, and the color, Gray tells us, is rose or red. If some enterprising gardener would produce a hybrid from these two species, a hardier plant would probably be the result. This proves that, where the snow lies steadily all winter long, many things can be wintered that die where it is milder, and the snow cannot be depended upon as a covering that will "stay put."

Even if you live in a locality where this plant does occasionally winter kill, so stately a perennial is well worth growing, as it can be bought for fifteen cents, and at that price one can afford to renew one's stock when necessary. By the way, Why is it that people who spend large sums on tender bedding plants each season seem to think it the height of extravagance to spend a few cents on a perennial plant that is tolerably certain to give them one or two seasons' bloom, but may eventually winter-kill? This seems to be the particular form of economy that pertains to the average gardener, reminding one of Miss Matty and her candle saving, in Cranford.

SPECIAL 25c. OFFERS

1

Containing one packet each of the following most beautiful and useful flowers: Nasturtiums, dwarf mixed; Pansy, Giant Orchid flowered Mixed Sweet Peas; Candytuft, Mignonette. Aster, Mixed; California Poppy, Marigold, Balsam, Morning Glory. If bought separately at regular prices would cost 70 cents. but will be mailed to you for 25 cents.

2

Contains one packet each of the following 10 varieties of Selected Vegetable Seeds: Tomato, Cabbage, Onion, Corn, Radish, Cucumber, Parsley, Carrot, Beet, Lettuce. If bought separately would cost 60 cents; all neatly packed and mailed for 25 cents.

3

Contains 10 separate packets of the Largest, Best and most Distinct Grandiflora Sweet Peas; worth 60 cents, for 25 cents.

4

Contains six Giant Orchid flowered Spencer Sweet Peas, in six separate packets; worth 80 cents for 25 cents.

5

Contains five separate packets of the most distinct Giant Asters in cultivation in five separate colors; worth 50 cents, post paid for 25 cents.

6

SPECIAL $1.00 COLLECTION

1 Each of the 5 collections, in all 4 packets, carefully packed and sent post paid for only $1.00, together with one full-sized 35-cent packet of the new Giant Orchid flowered Spencer Sweet Pea Florence Nightingale—universally pronounced the largest, strongest and best clear lavender variety ever introduced which usually throws four gigantic waved flowers on stems from 12 to 16 inches long. Also a 15-cent packet of the Giant Nicotiana Hybrids, as illustrated, making in all

$3.70 worth of the Best Seed Grown post paid for only $1.00

If you do not agree that this is the biggest Bargain ever offered!your dollar will be promptly returned without a question. Not more than one of each collection will be sent to one address. Every packet is full sized. These offers hold good only as long as stocks last. Write to-day.

ROBERT T. PINKERTON, 709 EASTERN TOWNSHIPS BANK BUILDING MONTREAL

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

ROSES IN SPRING

By WILLIAM HUNT

THE first week in April is usually early enough to prune roses. Rose bushes should not be pruned until growth buds show the first signs of breaking into growth. It is then an easy matter to distinguish between the dead wood and the live wood. This is not such an easy matter if they are pruned earlier in the season. Even to an expert rose grower, it is difficult to pick out the wood that is partially or wholly dead very early in the season. Pruning should be done, however, before the growth buds really burst into leaf. It must not be delayed too long.

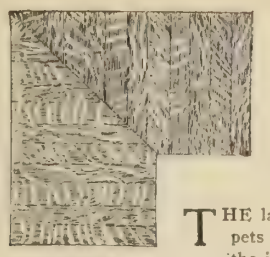
Remove all of the main dead branches first. Then cut out the small weak shoots that start from near the ground. These should be cut off close to the ground, as small weakly main shoots are of no use either to produce roses or to replenish the growth of the tree. After these have been removed, the remaining growth may be thinned out so as to secure the proper density of growth. It is seldom, however, that many of the main stems have to be taken out. If any are cut out, remove the very old ones, and leave if possible strong young canes or shoots that have started right from the ground or near to it. The lateral or side shoots of last season's growth on the main stems should now be pruned. These should be cut off about three or four inches from the main stem or branch, removing as a rule about two-thirds of the length of each lateral shoot. The top or terminal growth of the main stems should now be pruned. The shape of the tree has to be taken into consideration in this operation. Most rose bushes can usually be pruned into a dome or balloon-shaped bush, or possibly the natural habit of the bush may tend more to a conical or pyramid shape. Do not attempt to make any radical change in the natural contour of the bush. And do not prune so as to have the shape of the bush too stiff and formal, as if pruned with a hedge-clipping shears. The terminal shoots should be pruned so as to present a broken, but on the whole, a symmetrical shape. About one-third to one-half of last season's growth should be removed from the terminal or top shoots. It it difficult sometimes to leave a rose bush symmetrical-looking after pruning, from the fact that very often a great deal of the growth is winter-killed, and has to be cut out.

It will be seen by the description given that after thinning out the dead wood and the unnecessary growth, the pruning proper is done by shortening back from one-half to two-thirds of the length of the last season's growth, leaving short spurs only of the base of the growth near the main stems. The terminal point of growth on roses is not the kind of growth that produces roses, hence the need of its removal. These directions refer more particularly to the hardy hybrid perpetual roses (H.P.), such as the General Jacqueminot, Mrs. John Laing, Magna Charta, and similar hardy roses.

HYBRID TEA ROSES (H.T.)—The method of pruning given for H.P. roses will also apply to the hybrid tea type of rose. As a rule, however, the hybrid tea roses, being of a more tender nature, and not of such vigorous growth as the hybrid perpetual roses, do not require quite such severe pruning as the last named. At the same time, if the best blooming results are to be obtained, the young growth of the preceding season must also be shortened back on hybrid tea bushes. The hybrid tea roses are becoming more popular every year,

A CHARMING RUSTIC PERGOLA THAT WILL BE A DELIGHT WHEN VINE-COVERED.

A pergola properly used is a delightful adjunct to a garden. The one illustrated is a very pretty rustic one, that is very effective in the beautiful garden of Mr. W. G. McKendrick at his summer cottage on Toronto Island. The construction is simple, and in a country place where the rustic posts could be easily obtained it ought not to be a very expensive or difficult thing to make. In the city, of course, this simplicity (and almost everything else), is a luxury. One can easily imagine that in time this pergola will be covered with such roses as Dorothy Perkins, Hiawatha, Tausendschon and Crimson Rambler, and with Clematis paniculata, Adlumia cirrhosa and other dainty vines forming a background for the roses. —M. E. B.



No. 1 Light
No. 2 Golden

Rugs - and Parquet Borders have taken the place of Carpets

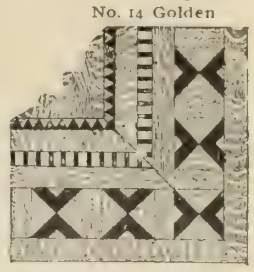
THE last objection to replacing old, dusty and unsanitary carpets with attractive, easily cleaned rugs has been removed by the introduction of Fibre Veneer for Parquet borders. Hardwood floors are too costly and hard to lay. With this new material, you can make your floors beautiful at a very small expense, and save yourself forever the drudgery of trying to keep carpets clean.

This is not an imitation—it is an exact reproduction of fine grained quarter-cut oak parquet—made from the actual wood itself.

Fibre Veneer

is manufactured in rolls 36 inches wide and 34 feet long. Several designs in addition to those illustrated. Applied over any kind of floor, and so easy to lay you will like to do the work yourself. Can be stained after being shellaced—or left in natural shade and varnished to finish. Perfectly sanitary and washable. One roll sufficient for parquet border—18 inches wide around room 16 feet x 16 feet, allowing for mitres at corners. Full directions for laying and finishing accompany each roll. Write for samples.

No. 13 Light
No. 14 Golden



Introductory Price only $1.50 per 34 ft. roll delivered FREE at your express station

HUGH SILVER & SON, PRESCOTT, Ont.

Prevents Chills in Early Spring

Jaeger Pure Wool Underwear, by keeping the body at an equable temperature prevents the changeable spring weather from affecting the health.

It keeps you fit always. Don't wear any other if you want "to have and to hold" the best health. Made in all sizes and weights for men, women and children.

Catalogues Free

TRADE MARK
DN
JAEGER
UNDERWEAR

Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woollen System Co.
Limited

261 Yonge St., Toronto
316 St. Catherine St. West, Montreal
Steele Block, Portage Ave., Winnipeg

BEAUTIFY YOUR HOME SURROUNDINGS

A PARTIAL VIEW OF OUR PAEONY FIELD IN JUNE

OUR CANADIAN GROWN

ROSES and SHRUBS

Are admirably adapted to enhance the Floricultural Pleasures of Canadian Homes.

FOR $5.00

To introduce our high grade quality we will securely pack and deliver PREPAID to any express office in Ontario the following 25 two and three year old Nursery grown ROSES and FLOWERING SHRUBS

5 Climbing Roses, value $2.50

1 Crimson Rambler
1 Dorothy Perkins, shell pink
1 Lady Gay, delicate pink
1 Veilchenblau, blue Rambler
1 Tausendschon, rosy carmine

5 Hybrid Tea Roses, value $1.25

1 Gruss an Teplitz, bright red
1 Kaiserin Victoria, white
1 Madame Testout, silvery rose
1 Mamon Cochet, pink
Le Progress, Golden Yellow

5 Hybrid Perpetual Roses, value $1.25

1 Frau Karl Druschkki, white
1 General Jacqueminot, brilliant red
1 Magna Charta, bright pink
1 Ulrich Brunner, cherry red
1 Julus Margottin, glossy pink

5 Baby Ramblers, value $1.25

1 Madam N. Levavasseur, Pink Baby Rambler
1 White Pet, White Baby Rambler
1 Mrs. W. Cutbush, Baby Dorothy Perkins
1 Perle des Rouges, Velvety Crimson
1 Mosella, clear Yellow

5 Flowering Shrubs, value $1.25

1 Hydrangea Paniculata Grand
1 Althea, Rose of Sharon
1 Deutzia, Pride of Rochester
1 Weigelia, Eva Rathki
1 Spirea Van Houttii

The above splendid collection delivered to you direct from our nurseries.
Catalogue of Roses, Shrubs, Herbaceous Plants, and Perennials on application.

J. GAMMAGE & SONS, Limited, 213 Dundas St., LONDON, ONT.

Grasselli
TRADE MARK
ARSENATE OF LEAD PASTE

Arsenate of Lead

Means sure destruction of leaf-eating insects when used on rose bushes, shrubs and trees.

Lime-Sulphur Solution

Should be used to prevent fungous diseases, which are often more destructive of plant life than insects.

Both of these insecticides are put up in a manner to permit their being easily used in small or large gardens or orchards.

Grasselli spray products are used by the most successful growers in Canada and the United States.

Write us for detailed information.

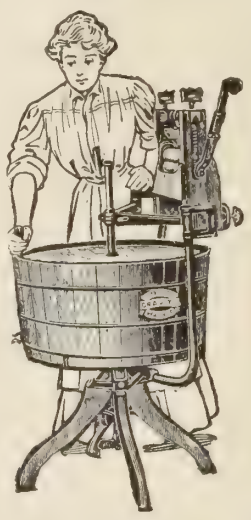
The Grasselli Chemical Co., Limited

Head Office and Works: HAMILTON, ONT.

Warehouse and Office: 131 Eastern Ave., TORONTO, ONT.

This Washer Must Pay For Itself

A MAN tried to sell me a horse once. He said it was a fine horse, and had nothing the matter with it. I wanted a fine horse. But I didn't know anything about horses much. And I didn't know the man very well either.



So I told him I wanted to try the horse for a month. He said, "All right, but pay me first, and I'll give you back your money if the horse isn't all right."

Well, I didn't like that. I was afraid the horse wasn't "all right" and that I might have to whistle for my money if I once parted with it. So I didn't buy the horse, although I wanted it badly. Now this set me thinking.

You see I make Washing Machines—the "1900 Gravity" Washer.

And I said to myself, lots of people may think about my Washing Machine as I thought about the horse, and about the man who owned it.

But I'd never know, because they wouldn't write and tell me. You see, I sell my Washing Machines by mail. I have sold over half a million that way.

So, thought I, it is only fair enough to let people try my Washing Machines for a month, before they pay for them, just as I wanted to try the horse.

Now, I know what our "1900 Gravity" Washer will do. I know it will wash the clothes, without wearing or tearing them, in less than half the time they can be washed by hand or by any other machine.

I know it will wash a tubful of very dirty clothes in Six minutes. I know no other machine ever invented can do that, without wearing out the clothes.

Our "1900 Gravity" Washer does the work so easy that a child can run it almost as well as a strong woman, and it don't wear the clothes, fray the edges, nor break buttons the way all other machines do.

It just drives soapy water clear through the fibres of the clothes like a force pump might.

So, said I to myself, I will do with my "1900 Gravity" Washer what I wanted the man to do with the horse. Only I won't wait for people to ask me. I'll offer first, and I'll make good the offer every time.

Let me send you a "1900 Gravity" Washer on a month's free trial. I'll pay the freight out of my own pocket, and if you don't want the machine after you've used it a month, I'll take it back and pay the freight too. Surely that is fair enough, isn't it?

Doesn't it prove that the "1900 Gravity" Washer must be all that I say it is?

And you can pay me out of what it saves for you. It will save its whole cost in a few months, in wear and tear on the clothes alone. And then it will save 50 cents to 75 cents a week over that in washwoman's wages. If you keep the machine after the month's trial, I'll let you pay for it out of what it saves you. If it saves you 60 cents a week, send me 50 cents a week 'till paid for. I'll take that cheerfully, and I'll wait for my money until the machine itself earns the balance.

Drop me a line to-day, and let me send you a book about the "1900 Gravity" Washer that washes clothes in 6 minutes.

Address me this way—

A. D. Bach, Manager 1900 Washer Co., 357½ Yonge St., Toronto, Ont.

being continuous flowering during the summer, but they are not, as a rule, quite as hardy as the hybrid perpetual type of rose.

PRUNING CLIMBING ROSES.

The method of pruning these differs very little from that of the bush roses. The dead wood and the weak, puny canes must be cut out, leaving only strong, vigorous canes. It is best to leave a young, vigorous cane or two of last season's growth on each bush, cutting out any old canes more than three years old. The old canes do not, as a rule, produce such fine roses as the younger canes. The young canes should be shortened back about one-third of their length from the top of terminal point of growth. The lateral or small side shoots of last season's growth on the old canes should be shortened back about one-half or two-thirds, leaving a short spur about four or five inches in length.

BLACK SPOT AND RUST.

All trimmings and dead leaves should be carefully gathered up at once and burned to prevent the spread of the fungous diseases known as black spot, mildew and rust. If the dead leaves of last season are left lying around, the spores of the fungous growths mentioned will develop as soon as warm weather comes, and possibly give a great deal of trouble later in the season. Spraying the bushes with a solution of lime sulphur, as used for fruit trees, or with Bordeaux mixture, will not only help to keep down black spot and rust, but will also prevent to a very great extent the visit of insect pests later on in the season. These solutions must be applied before the leaf buds open, or they may do very serious damage to the bushes.

After the pruning is done, all weeds should be carefully forked out from around the bushes, and a good coating of well-rotted barnyard manure forked in around them as soon as the ground is dry enough. About half a pound of bone meal for each bush may also be added to the manure. Chicken manure is also a good fertilizer for rose bushes. Care must be taken not to apply too much of this. About a pailful will be sufficient for five or six good sized bushes. A potato fork should be used for digging around rose bushes, or, in fact, around any small bush or tree. A spade should never be used; it often injures the root system very badly, especially if used by an unskilful person.

LISTS OF VARIETIES.

The following lists of roses will be found to be suitable varieties for almost any locality in any part of Canada where roses can be grown at all:

FIFTEEN GOOD HARDY H.P. BUSH ROSES—Frau Karl Druschki, pure white; Margaret Dickson, white; Clio, pinkish white; General Jacqueminot,, scarlet crimson; Prince Camille de Rohan, crimson maroon; Jubilee, very dark crimson; Dupuy Jamain, bright cerise red; Jules Margottin, cherry red; Magna Charta, rose red; Ulrich Brunner, cherry red; John Hopper, rose pink, with reverse of petals silvery lilac; Mrs. John Laing, soft pink; Oakmont, bright pink; Soliel d'Or, yellow.

FIFTEEN GOOD HYBRID TEA ROSES—Alice Lindsell, creamy pink; Bessie Brown, creamy white; Caroline Testout, salmon pink; Countess of Annesley, rosy salmon and old gold; Dean Hole, silvery carmine shaded salmon; Florence Pemberton, creamy pink, large; Grus au Teplitz, bright crimson; Kaiserin Augusta Victoria, cream, shaded lemon; Killarney, flesh pink; La France, silvery rose pink; Meteor, velvety crimson; Mme. Ravary, golden yellow; Richmond, rich bright red; Souv. de Wootton, reddish crimson; Viscountess Folkestone, creamy pink, shaded salmon.

FOUR GOOD CLIMBING ROSES—Crimson Rambler; Dorothy Perkins, pink; Lady Gay, pale pink, shading to white; Queen Alexandra.

FOUR RUGOSA OR JAPANESE ROSES—Blanc Double de Coubert, white; Conrad F. Meyer, pink; Sir Thomas Lipton, white; Rubra, deep rose. The rugosa roses are very hardy. Suitable for hedges or planting in a shrubbery as well as in a rose bed. These roses require very little pruning, except to shorten back the main growth.

FOUR MOSS ROSES—Blanche Moreau white; Comtesse de Murinais, white; Crested Moss, rosy pink; Laneii, rosy crimson. The moss roses require much the same pruning as the hybrid perpetual (H.P.) roses.

FOUR POLYANTH AND SMALL-FLOWERING ROSES—Hermosa, silvery pink, a beautiful little rose, hardy, flowers nearly all summer; Clotilde Soupert, creamy white; Baby Rambler, crimson; Yellow Soupert. A bed of these dwarf-growing roses is very pretty and effective.

An Indispensable Vine

THE Allegheny vine, fairy vine, mountain fringe and climbing fumitory are all popular names for Adlumia cirrhosa. This dear little vine is a biennial, but reproduces itself very freely from self-sown seed. The first year the young plants form beautiful clumps of foliage, as fine and as useful as the fronds of maiden-hair fern for putting with cut flowers, and very much more lasting.

ALLEGHENY VINE—MOUNTAIN FRINGE

The second year they climb, flower and die at the end of the season. The photograph shows the vine in bloom. The flower, of a faint dull pink, is not conspicuous, but a trailing bit of it is the daintiest possible addition to a boquet, and as it festoons itself on some shrub or fence one sees the appropriateness of the name of "mountain fringe." Try it for a season, and you will feel that you can never again get on without it.—M.E.B.

The cypress vine is very acceptable for running over trellises, as it grows rapidly, and is a free bloomer. Sow the seed where it is to grow, or it may be sown in the house and transplanted to the garden when the weather becomes fine and warm.

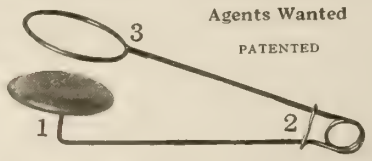
White Swan Yeast Cakes

can always be depended upon to make good, light, wholesome bread. Ask your grocer for a 5c. package, containing six cakes, or send for free sample. White Swan Spices & Cereals, Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Darn the Stockings
With a Handy Stocking Darner

Agents Wanted

PATENTED



With this simple device a woman can save time and darn the holes much better and easier than by the old fashioned way.

HOW IT IS USED—Place cap (No 1) in stocking under the part to be mended, slide link (No. 2) up, which clamps ring (No. 3) to stocking and holds it in place while being mended.

Can be used to darn anything from a stocking to a dress; does not stretch the hole, but holds the stocking or goods securely.

You are so sure to like it that we will send one to you on trial for 25 cents post paid. If you do not like it return it and we will refund your money. Send cash with order.

V. B. CONVIS 159 Dufferin St. TORONTO

"The Acme of Perfection of the Gladioli"

Mr. Cowie, N.Y., who grows over 15,000 varieties, thus pronounces the collection below.

Peace, white — Blue-Jay, blue
La Luria, yellow — Victory, the best yellow
Dawn, salmon — Faust, crimson

This collection, one bulb of each $2.00 post paid. Dahlias the best. Catalogue.

H. P. VanWagner, Stoney Creek, Ont.

Abbey's Effer-vescent Salt

A clean stomach and a clear head are the guarantees of Abbey's Salt 25c and 60c bottle.

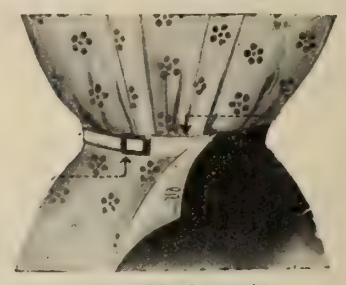
Sold everywhere.

81

Neat Women Need It

No woman can look neat unless her blouse and skirt are properly adjusted. The Vanatter Blouse and Skirt Holder keeps both garments in correct position. It will not tear the most delicate fabric.



Price 25c. Postpaid

VANATTER SUPPORTER Co.

22 Essex Avenue, Toronto

AGENTS WANTED — The Vanatter Supporter sells at sight. Agents are making big money every day selling it. You can do the same.

Write for terms and territory.

Douglas Gardens, Oakville, Ont.

China Asters are more prominent this year than ever.

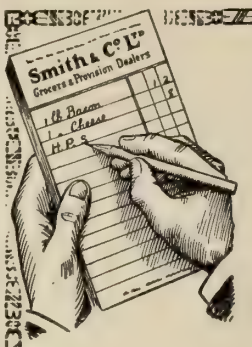
Queen of the Market, White and Pink, Lavender Gem, Royal Purple, Vick's Branching White and Crego Pink. 75c. per 100, carriage prepaid.

Gladioli, Groff's Hybrids, 10 for 25c., 25 for 55c. " " Light colors, 25 for 75c. " " Red and Scarlet 25 for 60c. Carriage prepaid.

Kniphofia, syn. Tritoma, (Torch Lily) var. Pfitzeri, grows 3-4 ft. high with spikes of bloom of a rich orange scarlet. A free continuous bloomer. Highly recommended. Each 15c., 10 for $1.25. Carriage prepaid.

JOHN CAVERS

MENTION HOME JOURNAL



Your Grocery Order is Incomplete Without a Bottle of

H.P. SAUCE

Even the plainest fare becomes dainty and appetising with a few drops of H.P.

Wouldn't it be worth your while to get a bottle to-day?

The Fashionable Punched Embroidery

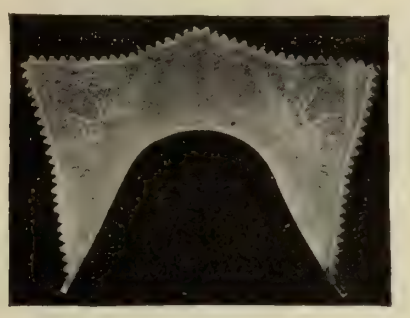
Want of space will not permit us to illustrate the large diagram which shows the method of working this embroidery, but a stamped envelope sent to the address given at the end of this article will bring

No. 8502—Waist on 45inch Voile, 75 cents.

by return mail a diagram lesson clearly showing the method of working this embroidery.

NEW ideas in embroidery are being constantly brought out, and sometimes one is instantly taken up and springs into widespread and sudden popularity. This has been the case with the "punched" work.

One sees complete matched luncheon sets, cushions, towels, etc., in fact, there seems to be no limit



No. 8227—Coat Collar, 25 cents.

to the possibilities of this embroidery. There is nothing difficult about the working of punched embroidery, as it consists simply in punching the threads of the material with a large special needle and tying the strands securely with fine, strong thread. Punched embroidery is used chiefly for backgrounds, the materials being stamped with evenly spaced rows of dots so that the designs clearly show the placing of the stitches. Special linens of a rather open weave are necessary for this work, which may be also successfully applied to either voile, sheer linens and lawns. The other portions of the design may be worked in either solid padded embroidery, that is, if the designs are small; but large, bold designs require outlining, only using a corded outline stitch worked with a rather coarse thread, this brings the linen design in high relief against the lace-like background.

No. 8226—Coat Collar, 25 cents.

A beautiful example of this is shown on the embroidered waist, No. 8502, which has been embroidered on a 45-inch voile, the design being outlined with heavy thread and the background being filled in with fine punched embroidery.

Design No. 8227 shows a beautiful coat collar, which has been embroidered on fine handkerchief linen, with a combination of punched and solid padded embroidery.

No. 8226 shows another collar somewhat different in shape, medallion forms are filled with punch embroidery, while the remainder of the design has been embroidered solidly.

No. 1503, towel, which is a figured damask, bordered towel, with a fine huckaback centre, has been beautifully embroidered with a simple, graceful pattern. The other end of this towel is finished with a plain scalloped edge only.

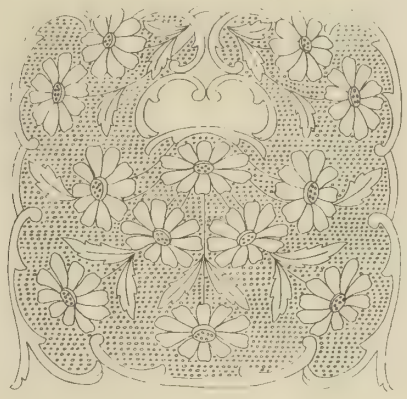
No. 2227 shows one of the fashionable deep sailor collar shapes, with cuffs to match. This beautiful

No. 2227—Collar and Cuffs Set, 60 cents.

design would be effective worked upon either cream or white linen.

No. 6500, cushion, is a dainty design which could be effectively worked up on either a white or cream linen background. The design on this need only be outlined with the exception of the centres of the daisies which must be worked in satin stitch and French knots.

Another effective pillow is 5608, which should be embroidered on fine linen. This cushion, if preferred,



No. 6500—Cushion, 75 cents.

may be stamped as a lingerie pillow within the scalloped border. Front and back are supplied to be laced together with ribbons run through the eyelets.

Belding's lustered cotton is one of the best threads for this embroidery. Letter F is suitable for the punched background and B or C for the outlining; if the design is to be worked in solid padded satin stitch letter D will be found suitable. If the designs are to be worked with silks Dresden Floss is the right size for the punched background, and Mountmellick E is a suitable size for the remainder of the designs.

No. 5608—Lacing Pillow, 60 cents.

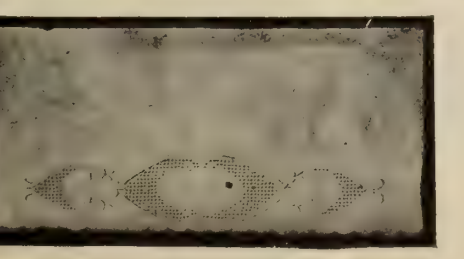
Special needles for the punched embroidery can be supplied at five cents each.

Readers will please note that the prices quoted on this page are for stamped linens only. If further information is required as to prices for materials to finish, etc., address Belding, Paul Corticelli, Limited, Linen Dept., Montreal.



No. 1503—Towel 75 cents.

IF YOU WILL SEND US

— 35 CENTS —

we will send you

8 SKEINS OF EMBROIDERY SILK

which is sufficient to finish a

15 INCH CENTRE PIECE

which is stamped for

"THE NEW HEATHER EMBROIDERY"

This is the very latest embroidery which will be fashionable for 1912.

We will

SUPPLY FREE

sufficient lace to edge this Centre Piece, and the diagram enclosed will furnish full instructions for this beautiful embroidery which is simple but effective.

Send at once as this generous offer is made for a short period only.

Our Art Embroidery Silks are the best on the market.

Send 10 cents for a copy of Belding's Needle and Hook Book which contains all the latest suggestions for Art Embroidery. :: ::

Address

BELDING, PAUL, CORTICELLI
LIMITED

Dept. L MONTREAL, P.Q.

HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

When two numbers are given with one costume, two patterns are required at 12 cents each. Send cash to PATTERN DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, 59-61 John Street, Toronto, Canada Order always by number, stating size wanted. Patterns are mailed from our Toronto office the same day as order is received. PAPER PATTERNS TWELVE CENTS EACH POST PAID.

Models for Silk and Wool

THE indoor gowns of the spring are very charming and very graceful. The three shown are typical The girl's dress shown to the extreme left is in the favorite semi-princess style, and is made of crepe de chine, with trimming of dotted foulard. The design is an excellent one, for it can be utilized both for silk materials, such as this one, and for the lightweight wools of the season, and for washable fabrics. It can be made just as illustrated with a stock collar and long sleeves. The three-piece skirt is lapped on to a narrow panel and is joined to the blouse, which is cut with front and back portions and with sleeves sewed to the armholes on the long shoulder line. For the 16 year size will be needed 5¾ yards of material 27, 4¼ yards 36, 3½ yards 44 inches wide, with 1½ yards 24 for the trimming. The pattern, 7348, is cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

The second costume is designed for evening and dinner wear. It is exceptionally graceful, altogether showing the styles at their best. The blouse includes over-portions in surplice style that can be made from banding, as in this instance, or from material trimmed. If a decoleté effect is desired it can be cut out to form a square neck. The skirt is made in three pieces that are lapped on to a panel. It can be finished at the high or natural waist line. When cut to the natural waist line it is gathered at the upper edge. In the illustration the gown is made of charmeuse, trimmed with lace. For the medium size the blouse will require 3 yards of material 27, 2⅝ yards 36, 2⅛ yards 44 inches wide, with 2⅛ yards of banding 8 inches wide, and ½ yard 18 inches wide for the V-shaped portions; for the skirt will be needed 6¼ yards 27, 5¼ yards 36, 4 yards 44 inches wide, with ½ yard of banding. The train allows of three lengths. It can be made round and longer or shorter, and it can be made pointed and longer than shown in either view. The width with the train in pointed outline is 3½ yards, with long round train 3 yards and with the short round train 2⅝ yards at the lower edge. The pattern of the blouse, 7323, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust, of the skirt, 7352, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist.

The third and last costume is made of the taffeta that is promised such favor throughout the entire season. It is finished with scalloped edges that are bound with the same, and such finish is exceedingly new and eminently smart. The blouse is a simple one with separate sleeves that are sewed to the armholes. It can be made with or without lining that includes under-sleeves. The fichu is arranged over it and the closing is made at the back. The postillion can be used or not, as liked. The skirt is made in two pieces, with three slightly circular flounces, the uppermost one being scalloped at both upper and lower edges. It can be finished at the high waist line or at the natural waist line with a belt. For the medium size the blouse will require 2⅝ yards of material 36 or 44 inches wide, with 1⅝ yards of all-over lace; for the skirt will be needed 4½ yards 36 or 44; the width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2 yards. The pattern of the blouse, 7351, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 bust; of the skirt, 7344, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist.

Smart Models for Spring Costumes

SPRING fashions have many charming features to recommend them. In the illustration are shown two typical costumes, one for the street, one for indoor wear, that are admirably well adapted to the bride's trousseau, and also to general use.

The gown on the left is made from one of the new foulards that shows tiny dots arranged in a way to give almost a checked effect. It is combined with a blouse of lace and it is trimmed with little satin buttons. Many of the smartest features of the season are included. The deep trimming portion, or girdle, on the blouse that matches the skirt is an important one. The same model could be used for a variety of materials. It would be very charming made from taffeta with coat to match, making a three-piece suit, or from light weight serge or any seasonable suiting material, and for the upper portion of the blouse can be used chiffon, lace, net, crepe de chine, or any pretty material in contrast to the lower portion. The blouse can be made with or without a lining, and the lining can be used with or without under sleeves, and the neck also can be made high. The skirt is made in two pieces, and the trimming portion is arranged over it. The finish can be made at either the high or natural waist line.

For the medium size the blouse will require 2 yards of material 27, 1¼ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 1 yard 27, ¾ yard 36, ⅝ yard 44 for the trimming portion, 1⅝ yards of banding, and 1¼ yards of allover lace 18 inches wide for chemisette and under sleeves when these are used. For the plain skirt will be needed 3½ yards 27, 2⅝ yards 36 or 44; and for the trimming portion, 2¼ yards 27 or 36, ⅞ yard 44 inches wide; the width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2⅛ yards.

The pattern of the blouse, 7357, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust; of the skirt, 7280, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist.

The street costume shows one of the very new coats that are semi-fitted, yet give exceedingly straight lines, and a skirt that gives quite the effect of a complete overskirt and foundation, yet which in reality consists of upper and lower portions that are stitched together at the line of the facing. Such a model is adapted to every seasonable suiting. Serge is a favorite for the early season, taffeta is a pronounced feature, satin is to be used, heavy ribbed silks are exceedingly smart, wool poplins and ratine are much in vogue, and for simpler use there is the long list of cheviots,

Dress Pattern No. 7348

Blouse Pattern No. 7323
Skirt Pattern No. 7352

Blouse Pattern No. 7351
Skirt Pattern No. 7344

homespuns and the like, while broadcloth is one of the stand-bys for handsome suits. Ratine, satin, silk and contrasting wool materials are used as trimming. In the illustration taffeta is combined with satin, and the collar and cuffs are made of ratine. The coat can be trimmed to give the Empire effect or made with a plain back, as liked, and the skirt can be finished at either the high or natural waist line.

For the medium size the coat will require 4 yards of material 27, 2¾ yards 36, 2¼ yards 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard 27 inches wide and ¼ yard of satin for the trimming. For the skirt will be needed 3¾ yards 27, 2¾ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 1½ yards 21 inches wide for the foundation; the width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2⅛ yards.

The pattern of the coat, 7368, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 bust; of the skirt, 7372, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist.

Blouse Pattern No. 7357
Skirt Pattern No. 7280

Coat Pattern No. 7368
Skirt Pattern No. 7372

Afternoon Gowns of Silks

SILKS will be extensively worn throughout the spring and summer, and they are very charming. Many of them are extremely light in weight and sufficiently cool for even real warm weather, while they are so soft and pliable that they take exceedingly graceful lines and folds.

The costume to the left is of chiffon taffeta with trimming of a darker color and tiny little satin buttons. These buttons are being extensively used, and they can be applied after this manner or in any way to suit the fancy. The model is an exceptionally attractive one, simple in the extreme, yet exceedingly smart. The blouse is made with a little vestee that is in every way attractive, and with one-piece sleeves that are sewed to the armholes. It is closed at the back. If liked it can be made with high neck as shown in the back view. The skirt is a simple two-piece one. It is slightly full and gathered at the upper edge, and it can be made in walking length or with a train, and with high or natural waist line. The model is a pretty one for voile and for crepe de chine, as well as for the taffeta, and also for many of the simpler cotton and linen fabrics.

For the medium size the blouse will require 2¼ yards of material 27, 1⅝ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with ⅜ yard of allover lace; for the skirt will be needed 3¾ yards 27, 2¾ yards 36 or 44; the width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2⅛ yards. To trim the entire gown will be needed 1¼ yards of silk 21 inches wide.

The pattern of the blouse, 7354, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust; of the skirt, 7304, in sizes from 22 to 32 waist.

The second gown combines silk serge with satin, but it could with equal success be made from wool serge with satin or with taffeta, from striped and plain taffeta, or from striped and plain linen. The blouse is a very practical, as well as smart one, for it is closed at the left of the front. The centre portion or chemisette, can be made of two materials or of one, and the collar can be cut with a pointed or square back, while the square back may be extended to the shoulders or to the waist line, as preferred. The skirt is one of the very newest. There is a two-piece tunic portion that is joined to a two-piece foun-

PERFECT EASE and comfort—always the most popular feature of C/C a la Grace Corsets—is more important than ever since the present trend of fashion is toward the natural figure.

C/C

à la Grâce
CORSETS

have never sacrificed comfort for fads or extremes of style. Each model is designed to preserve the natural poise of the figure and give flexibility and freedom—at the same time meeting fashion's requirements. Many models—all sizes—one that just fits YOU.

The best stores sell them.

If you'd like to see all the new à la Grâce models, write for free style book to

Crompton Corset Company, Limited, Toronto

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

The Primrose Path

OF

Freshness and Beauty

of complexion is open to all who care to travel it. Many think it necessary to live in or near a large town or city, where the beauty culturist may be consulted. This is a wrong idea. We have assisted tens of thousands we have never seen, during the past twenty years to attain clear healthy skins and we can do the same for you.

——PRINCESS—— Complexion Purifier

is the foe to many troubles that the skin is heir to and is within reach of all. For Freckles, Mothpatches, Rashes, Blackheads, Eczema, Red Nose or a bad scalp it is invaluable. It is one of the best skin beautifying agents that science has produced or money can buy. Price, $1.50, express or postpaid, with special instructions. For chronic cases of Pimples the Acne and Pimple Cure ($1.50) should be used in connection.

Superfluous Hair, Moles, Warts and Red Veins permanently destroyed by our reliable method of antiseptic Electrolysis which is positively the only sure treatment for an abnormal growth of hair. Booklet "H" and sample of White Rose Cream mailed free.

Hiscott Dermatological Institute
61 College Street, Toronto

LONDON PLUMES

Catalogue Mailed Free

London Plumes are prominent in the fashion salons of London, Paris and New York—they excel everywhere for beauty, style and workmanship.

10 days' Approval

You take absolutely no risk in buying "London" goods. Write for illustrated catalogue C4—it informs you fully of our "money-refunded-if-not-satisfactory" guarantee?

LONDON PLUMES

are made from the finest quality raw ostrich feathers imported direct from African farms and made up in our own Toronto factory. We sell direct from "maker to wearer"—an economical system that has built up a world-wide business. Prices, $1.00 to $50.00.

New Plumes from Your Own Feathers

Fashionable new willow plumes or ostrich bands can be made at moderate cost from your own feathers. Our catalogue C4 gives full particulars. Write for it to-day.

London Feather Co., Limited
144 Yonge St., Toronto
London Paris New York Montreal

BUST AND HIPS

Every woman who attempts to make a dress or shirt waist immediately discovers how difficult it is to obtain a good fit by the usual "trying-on-method," with herself for the model and a looking-glass with which to see how it fits at the back

"HALL-BORCHERT PERFECTION Adjustable Dress Forms"

do away with all discomforts and disappointments in fitting, and render the work of dressmaking at once easy and satisfactory. This form can be adjusted to 50 different shapes and sizes; bust raised or lowered, also made longer and shorter at the waist line and form raised or lowered to suit any desired skirt length. Very easily adjusted, cannot get out of order, and will last a lifetime.

Write for illustrated Booklet containing complete line of Dress Forms with prices.

Hall-Borchert Dress Form Co., of Canada, Limited.
70-72 Pearl St., Toronto, Can.

A PREMIUM TO SUBSCRIBERS

for getting up clubs at special rates. Write for premium lists, Circulation Dept., CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

dation, and this foundation is laid in inverted plaits at the sides, consequently there is a suggestion of the slashed effect that has been so much talked of, and there is freedom for walking, while the straight lines are preserved. The finish can be made at the high waist line, as in this instance, or at the natural waist line, as preferred.

For the medium size the blouse will require 2⅞ yards of material 27, with 1¼ yards 21, and 1 yard of all-over lace 18 inches wide; 2⅜ yards 36, 2⅛ yards 44 inches wide; for the skirt will be needed 2½ yards 27, 36 or 44 for the lower portion, and for the upper portion will be needed 3¼ yards 27, 2 yards 36 or 44 inches wide; the width at the lower edge is 2½ yards, 2 yards when the plaits are laid.

The pattern of the blouse, 7362, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust, of the skirt, 7367, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist.

Colors for Coming Season

HERE is the color-man's list of shades for spring, 1912, in the order of their popularity: Pigskin, Indian, Manila, Reseda, Castor, Apricot, Amethyst.

The blues will, as usual in the spring season, hold first place, the medium shade of navy blue, with just a tinge of purple, being best; then the Wilhelmina, Nattier and Copenhagen shades. Next to the blues will come the tans, including Manila chamois and pigskin (the color of the pigskin leather).

Then, in about equal demand, will come the amethyst, violet ash, castor and reseda; and in pastels, apricot (a pinkish tan shade) champagnes, corals and reddish tints.

Other colors, staple or hold-overs, in the spring color scale include French grey, taupe, king's blue, maduro, snuff, olive, seaweed, wildrose, edge, salmon, Saxon green, hunter's green, myrtle, mullein, salmon, covert, smoke, steel, and a light navy.

White and cream will play the most important part in the demand for spring suits, inasmuch as no smart woman's wardrobe will be complete without this addition.

Semi-Princess Dress

SEMI-PRINCESS frocks are smart and exceedingly well liked this season, and this one will be found excellent for small women as well as for young girls. It can be made in two quite different ways, as shown on the figure and as shown in the small view. The two effects are so essentially different that they scarcely suggest the same model, yet only the neck line and sleeves are changed. The skirt gives the tunic effect and is as smart as it is new. In the illustration chiffon broadcloth is combined with satin, but any two materials can be used.

The dress consists of blouse and skirt. The blouse is made with front and back portions and with straight sleeves that are joined to it. When made as shown on the figure the right front of the blouse is finished with a revers and the closing is made beneath it. When made as shown in the small front view, the collar finishes the neck

Blouse Pattern No. 7354
Skirt Pattern No. 7304

Blouse Pattern No. 7362
Skirt Pattern No. 7367

Home Dyeing Made Easy

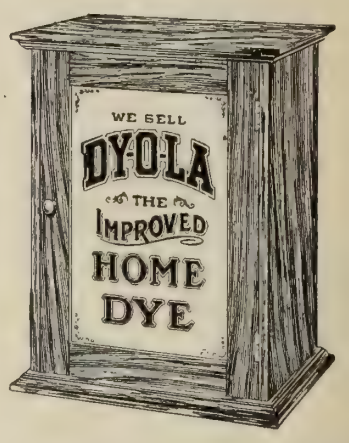
It looks just like "New," doesn't it? That's because I DYED it with

DY-O-LA
ONE DYE FOR ALL KINDS OF GOODS

The "Home Dye" that colors either Wool, Cotton, Silk or Mixed Goods Perfectly with the Same Dye, doing away with all chance of mistakes.

This is How it Was

One day I went into a drug store and saw a little cabinet like this on the counter.



I asked the obliging drug clerk if he really thought one could have any luck with dyeing one's own things. "Well" he said, "the manufacturers of DY-O-LA furnish us with a Signed Guarantee that if it doesn't give Perfect Satisfaction that we are to Refund the Money."

Just for fun I tried it. I had never done any "Home Dyeing" before, and you can imagine how delighted I was when it turned out---"Simply Splendid."

Why don't you try it? DY-O-LA is so Simple and Clean to use.

Don't forget to send a post card for a copy of the story booklet, "How Dot Saved the Day." DY-O-LA Color Card and booklet that will tell you what color your goods will "Take" successfully.

The Johnson-Richardson Co., Limited

Montreal, Canada

and front edges. The skirt is made with a three-piece upper portion and a two-piece foundation.

For the 16-year size will be required 5⅝ yards of material 27, 3½ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 1¾ yards 27 inches wide for the foundation and trimming, ⅛ yard 18 inches wide for collar.

Pattern No. 7272

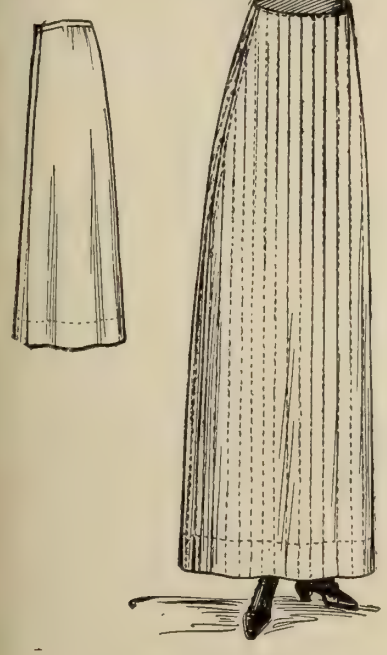
The pattern, No. 7272, is cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

Button Trimmings

BUTTONS are to play an important role in the trimming of both coats and suits. They are varied in size and material. Belts and belt effects are also good for coats and suits, either made of the self fabrics or of leather in matching or harmonizing tones.

Two-Piece Skirt for Small Women

THE two-piece skirt is a favorite one and in addition to its smartness, it is simple and easily made. This one is of moderate width, and the seams at the sides can be left plain or trimmed. A pretty effect is obtained by arranging buttons in groups over the hips and again above the facing, and often braid is arranged over the seams. The skirt is an excellent one, both for the street and for indoor wear, and as it can be finished either at the high or natural waist line, it can be adapted to all figures.



Pattern No. 7283

The skirt is made in two pieces. When it is cut to the high waist line it is arranged over a belt; when it is cut to the natural waist line the back is gathered, and the skirt is joined to the belt. The closing is made at the left side.

For the 16-year size will be required 3¼ yards of material 27, 2¼ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, the width of the skirt at lower edge is 1⅞ yards.

The pattern, No. 7283, is cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

Paris Notes

ALL waists are of the surplice, or shaped in the Marie Antoinette style, the sleeves being very long. Some of the new kimono sleeves are right at the top of the arm, while the rest is of puffed chiffon. Generally the waists are collarless, in some cases suggesting the De Medici collar kept close to the neck by a velvet band. Sashes of heavy embroidered gold and silver worn over simple dresses are in as great favor as the English embroidered sailor collars.

The waist line is normal behind, with a tendency to run up a couple of inches in front.

Taffeta striped shot pompadour, heavily glace or very dull, is almost the only material employed. In the panier skirt it gives an effect that can hardly be called pretty.

Evening skirts are all draped, of satin or changeable taffeta, on which a great deal of lace is used, also Hungarian embroidery in vivid colors. Empire effects are still retained in some evening gowns, the sleeves of which are very wide and made to go into folds under the arm, giving the effect of negligee.

Tea gowns are of Grecian style, generally with black satin showing in wide folds under a dress of white lace. Crash toweling, a cotton material in all colors, is used for walking costumes. One feature of the season will be the rich coloring of materials,, peach,

The Spring Fashion Book of Canada Is Ready for You

IF YOU ARE NOT ALREADY ON OUR MAILING LIST, SEND IN YOUR NAME TO-DAY FOR A COPY.

You will be delighted with it

It is a work of art and shows the very latest styles before the public, and at reasonable prices, which will appeal to you. It does not cost you any more to buy from us, no matter where you live, as we pay everything to your nearest Post Office or Express Station. We make to your own measure without extra charge, if stock sizes do not suit. If you are not satisfied, we refund your money.

SEND FOR YOUR COPY TO-DAY. IT IS FREE.

The Book itself will tell the story.

Montgomery Ross & Company

General Offices, Montreal

"THE MAIL ORDER HOUSE DE LUXE OF CANADA."

BON-TON from Factory

to You

Paris & London Styles

brought to your own home at no trouble nor expense to yourselves, by the Bon-Ton Spring & Summer 1912 Style Book.

GET THIS BOOK — WE SEND IT FREE.

LADIES' AND MISSES' CLOTHING AT FACTORY PRICES

You can dress just as smartly and a good deal more economically by shopping through "Bon-Ton" Catalogue than by tiring yourselves out at the counters of the large city stores.

Whether you live in cities, or live far from Fashion centres, the "Bon-Ton" Catalogue is the most effective means to dress stylishly and cheaply.

This book contains almost 70 pages, all illustrated, and showing the latest styles in Women's, Misses' and Children's Clothing.

Write for it to-day. We send it free on request.

Remember, we guarantee every article we sell, and money is refunded without question if goods fail to satisfy.

AND WE PAY SHIPPING CHARGES on every order, large or small.

The "Bon-Ton" system is an effective means of saving money, while obtaining increased satisfaction —so, do not delay, write for your copy to

THE BON-TON CO., 439 St. Joseph Street, QUEBEC

2-3-12

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Pen Angle Hosiery

Only SEAMLESS Hosiery Fits Right!

You should wear Pen-Angle Hosiery, and no other kind. For this is the only Canadian-made hosiery that is seamless AND priced moderately AND guaranteed. All three merits ought to be in your hosiery. Because no hosiery that is not SEAMLESS can be comfortable—and Pen-Angle machines are the only ones in Canada able to knit such hosiery, form-shaped to the leg and foot, instead of merely water-shrunk into shape. Thus, though priced reasonably, Pen-Angle Hosiery holds its shape indefinitely. And it is reinforced wherever wear falls.

To these merits add the GUARANTEE you read here—two pairs for one if Pen-Angle Hosiery disappoints. Note next the modest price you need pay to get all this—and then remember name and trademark when next you need hosiery.

PEN-ANGLE HOSIERY

Pen Angle — WARRANTED HIGH PENMAN'S GRADE HOSIERY

FOR LADIES

No. 1760—"Lady Fair" Black Cashmere hose. Medium weight. Made of fine, soft cashmere yarns, 2-ply leg. 5-ply foot, heel, toe and high splice, giving strength where needed. Box of 3 pairs, $1.50; 6 pairs, $3.00.

No. 1020—Same quality as 1760, but heavier. Black only. Box of 3 pairs $1.50; 6 pairs, $3.00.

No. 1150—Very fine Cashmere hose. Medium weight. 2-ply leg. 4-ply foot, heel and toe. Black, light and dark tan, leather, champagne, myrtle, pearl gray, oxblood, helio, cardinal. Box of 3 pairs, $1.50; 6 pairs, $3.00.

No. 1720—Fine quality Cotton Hose. Made of 2-ply Egyptian yarn, with 3-ply heels and toes. Black, light and dark tan, champagne, myrtle, pearl gray, oxblood, helio, sky, pink, bisque. Box of 4 pairs, $1.00; 6 pairs, $1.50.

No. 1175—Mercerized. Same colors as 1720. Box of 3 pairs, $1.00; 6 pairs, $2.00.

FOR MEN

No. 2404—Medium weight Cashmere. 2-ply Botany yarn with special "Everlast" heels and toes. Black, light and dark tan, leather, champagne, navy, myrtle, pearl gray, slate, oxblood, helio, cadet blue and bisque. Box of 3 pairs, $1.50; 6 pairs, $3.00.

No. 500—"Black Knight" winter weight black Cashmere half-hose. 5-ply body, spun from pure Australian wool. 9-ply silk splice heels and toes. Box of 3 pairs, $1.50; 6 pairs, $3.00.

No. 1090 — Cashmere half-hose. Same quality as 500, but lighter weight. Black only. Box of 3 pairs, $1.00; 6 pairs, $2.00.

No. 330—"Everlast' Cotton socks. Medium weight. Made from four-ply long staple combed Egyptian cotton yarn, with six-ply heels and toes. Black, light and dark tan. Put up in boxes. Box of 3 pairs, $1.00; 6 pairs, $2.00.

READ THIS REMARKABLE GUARANTEE

We guarantee the following lines of Pen-Angle Hosiery to fit you perfectly, not to shrink or stretch and the dyes to be absolutely fast. We guarantee them to wear longer than any other cashmere or cotton hosiery sold at the same prices. If, after wearing Pen-Angle Guaranteed Hosiery any length of time, you should ever find a pair that fails to fulfill this guarantee in any particular, return the same to us and we will replace them with TWO new pairs free of charge.

ORDER THIS WAY

Ask at the store first. If they cannot supply you, state number, size of shoe or stocking and color of hosiery desired and enclose price, and we will fill your order postpaid. Remember we will fill no order for less than one box and only one size in a box. BE SURE TO MENTION SIZE. 57

ADDRESS AS BELOW:

PENMANS, LIMITED

Dept. 39

PARIS, CANADA

WARRANTED HIGH PENMAN'S GRADE HOSIERY

DYEING BUT NOT DEAD

LADIES of refinement and culture know that fine gowns add lustre of youth to the appearance.

FINE gowns and everyday dresses cost money, but the life of a costume may be doubled by proper care.

PROPER care includes timely cleaning or dyeing before the stains become ingrained.

WE are alone in guaranteeing a jet black on Raw or Pongee Silk.

OUT of City orders as cheap as city trade. We pay express.

WILLOW PLUMES made from your old feathers.
$3.00 to $8.00

Write for price list and advice.

RELIABLE AGENTS WANTED IN EVERY TOWN

SINCLAIR DYE WORKS

656 College St. - Toronto, Ont.

Phone Coll. 621.

GROCERS are firm friends of Windsor Table Salt. They like to sell it, because it is pure and clean and good.

Ask any grocer for his best salt, and he will give you Windsor Salt every time.

Not because it costs more—it does not—but because the grocers know that Windsor Table Salt pleases their customers. 62

WINDSOR TABLE SALT

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

geranium, red, apricot, yellow, new blue, that is between royal and nattier.

The hair is worn low, without coiffure ornaments, in perfectly flat bands an inch and a half wide, retained by means of a diamond buckle, with an osprey drooping backward, following the line of the head.

Worth shows an evening dress trimmed with a great deal of rhinestone. Nearly all his dresses have tunics, also black satin robes opening over white linen, with elaborately embroidered petticoat, plenty of buttons being used.

Beer is conservative this year. Drecoll is using long sleeves even on evening gowns, and much lace. Doucet shows one suit entirely made of chamois leather, of geranium color, very simple. It is understood to be for the Riviera season. Artificial flowers are used by everyone.

Poiret is featuring the Empire style in real Recamier gowns, cut V-shaped and exceedingly low at the neck, with rather a high back. The colorings are rich, the trimming being of strikingly luminous silver braiding mixed with brilliant wool embroidered with flowers. Poiret is the only one to retain the narrow skirts. He uses paniers, but the skirts tighten immediately below them, and above the knees there is a polonaise, showing the petticoat in each case.

Semi-Princess Gown

SEMI-PRINCESS gowns such as this one can be made from many different materials, and consequently, are adapted to many uses. In the illustration mohair is trimmed with plaid silk and the gown is adapted to afternoon wear, but it is just as appropriate for linen and for other washable materials, and it would be charming made from broadcloth or similar wools. The trimming is effective and smart, but it is not necessary; or, if a very simple gown is wanted, it can be finished as shown in the small view.

Pattern No. 7340

The gown consists of blouse and skirt. The blouse is made with front and back portions, and with one-piece sleeves that are stitched to the armholes. The skirt is six-gored, and the closing of the gown is made at the left of the front.

For the medium size will be required 9¼ yards of material 27, 5¾ yards 36, 4⅝ yards 44 inches wide, with 1 yard 27 for the trimming; the width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2 yards.

The pattern, No. 7340, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42-inch bust measure.

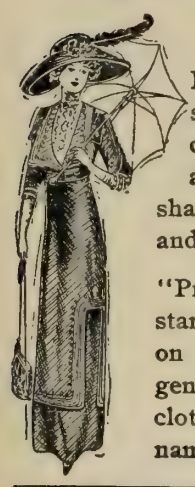
IF YOU WANT AN EXQUISITE HOUSE GOWN or something unusually dainty for evening wear, ask to see

Priestley's



AMBROSE

It is a beautifully soft silk-and-wool cloth—and comes in all the most wanted shades for afternoon and evening wear.

"Priestley's Limited" stamped every 5 yards on the selvedge of genuine "Priestley's" cloth. Look for the name.

3

Dry Cleaning will Remove the Spot

Perhaps you have always thought it impossible to clean fine Silks, Satins, Opera Cloaks, Suits, Laces, Feathers, etc. so they would look new.

Our special Dry Cleaning Process and years of experience, enable us to do work that your local cleaner knows nothing about.

We pay express one way on goods from out of town.

Write for free copy of our book, which tells all about our work and our prices.

Fountain "My Valet"
30 Adelaide St. W., Toronto.
14

WHOOPING COUGH

CROUP ASTHMA COUGHS
BRONCHITIS CATARRH COLDS

Vapo-Cresolene

ESTABLISHED 1879

A simple, safe and effective treatment for bronchial troubles, avoiding drugs. Vaporized Cresolene stops the paroxysms of Whooping Cough and relieves croup at once. It is a boon to sufferers from Asthma. The air rendered strongly antiseptic, inspired with every breath makes breathing easy; soothes the sore throat and stops the cough, assuring restful nights. It is invaluable to mothers with young children.

Send us postal for descriptive booklet. 309

ALL DRUGGISTS

Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat. They are simple, effective and antiseptic. Of your druggist or from us, 10c. in stamps.

VAPO CRESOLENE CO.
Leeming-Miles Bldg.
MONTREAL

PARISIAN women are searching for Persian veils, the more elaborate and the older the better. No inclination to use them as face coverings has manifested itself; the ladies are merely tired of Russian embroideries, and they see in these Persian patterns something novel. Attractive, too, they are, for, from their length and suppleness, they lend themselves to decoration of all sorts. An evening dress may be draped with an antique Persian veil.

In French eyes it is absurd for the woman of limited income to wear light or flimsy dresses, or to wear the extreme of fashion, which is bound to pass away long ere she finds herself in a position to renew her costume. A black muslin dress for evening wear, cut square, and outlined with jet, is her idea of cheapness combined with nicety, and she dresses her hair low on the neck.

HATS are still the objects of special feminine interest and observation, and the new models are carefully studied and copied by those anxious to keep up with Dame Fashion's vagaries. The one illustrated on this page is an Eaton sample, a charming hat for misses, a most becoming shade of fancy straw braid, with dome crown and rolling brim; artistically trimmed with piece satin shirred on wires around crown and upper brim, trail of moss roses around crown and pretty bunch of flowers at side. Colors white, burnt, light navy, light brown, with satin to match, and roses to harmonize.

A PRETTY APRIL HAT

SOME of the hair ornaments which the girls are using are the prettiest things seen in ages. On a little head there was seen the other night a fine plaiting of tulle which was mounted aigrette fashion in a small jeweled sheath. The ornament was worn just at one side the front with the tulle aigrette pointing off slantingly toward the back. Another ornament consisted of a narrow band of black velvet outlined on each side with a single row of rhinestones, and just at the front there was a diamond-shaped ornament catching an aigrette. On still another pretty head there was worn a double bandeau made up of tiny green velvet ferns and little cerise satin berries. Such garnitures as this can be bought by the yard at the trimming counter. They are easily fixed up for hair ornaments. A very original ornament had a handsome satin ribbon rose centred with a rhinestone, and the rose was fastened to pale green loops and ends which were shaped and veined like long slender lily leaves.

THE kimono sleeve maintains a degree of popularity which his really remarkable, but at the same time there are variations appearing which relieve the strictly kimono sleeve of its severity and at the same time retain its lines. On the more dressy models the sleeves are of the three-quarter type, but on tailored and demi-tailored lines the full length is much shown. While the regulation sleeve is in excellent request and favor, and the set-in designs show a considerable strength, there is still a noted demand for the peasant styles.

The Work You do Tomorrow Depends on What You do Tonight

After a wearing grinding day, you need more than food and an easy chair to make you ready for to-morrow's work.

Music smoothes away the trials of the day—brings the brain back to its normal rythm—soothes, quiets and rests, because it appeals to the best that is in us.

The best investment a business man can make for himself and family is a

NEW SCALE WILLIAMS PLAYER PIANO

the one that contains the special features which appeal to everyone and makes it possible to produce the best in music.

We will be pleased to give you full particulars about the New Scale Williams Pianos and Player Pianos, and if there is no dealer in your locality we will arrange to supply you direct from the factory.

ASK ABOUT OUR EXTENDED PAYMENT PLAN.

The WILLIAMS PIANO COMPANY, Limited
OSHAWA, ONT. 249

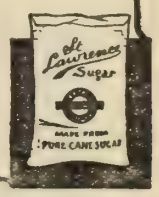
It is True Economy

to use the highest grade of sugar like

St. Lawrence Sugar

It is brilliantly white and sparkling—looks dainty and tempting on the table—and goes further because it is absolutely pure sugar of the finest quality. Make the test yourself. Compare "ST. LAWRENCE GRANULATED" with any other.

The St. Lawrence Sugar Refining Co. Limited
MONTREAL. 33



Says Home Oil Tommy:

All Goes Glidingly

when things are oiled with HOME OIL. That's because HOME OIL is a quality oil—best every way—by every test. It took years to produce

HOME OIL

Made by the LIQUID VENEER People

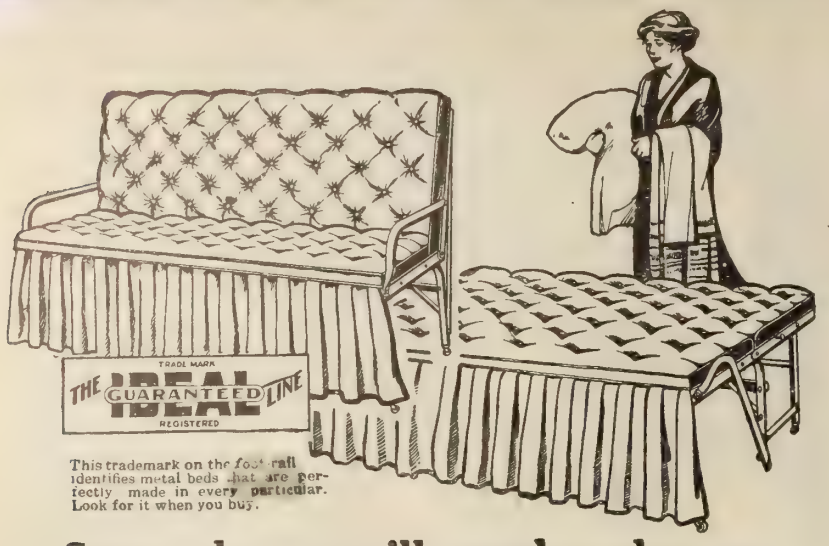
because it first had to beat them all in the friction, heat, cold and safety tests. That's why a money-back guarantee goes with every bottle. That's why it is sold everywhere. That's why it is best for oiling outside as well as inside the home. You get more oil for your money when you buy HOME OIL. No fussy directions—just go ahead and oil.

Write for free trial bottle and prove its high quality.

Trial Bottle Free

BUFFALO SPECIALTY COMPANY,
336 D Liquid Veneer Building Buffalo, N. Y.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.



This trademark on the foot rail identifies metal beds that are perfectly made in every particular. Look for it when you buy.

Some day you'll need a davenport like this. Not too expensive, yet strong, attractive, roomy and comfortable. No home should be without one.

The thing people most like about the "IDEAL" Steel Davenport is its simplicity. Nothing burdensome, intricate or breakable about it. Nothing to get out of order, or collapse at any time. Back is quickly lowered to make a thoroughly comfortable bed when desired.

All steel frame, finished in gold bronze. Springs in seat and back. Mattress securely fastened to both back and seat, covered with green denim. Length is 73 inches, width of seat 22 inches, width when open 47 inches.

Be sure and ask your dealer to show you the "IDEAL" Steel Davenport. Our trademark identifies the genuine. Other "Space-Saving Specialties" are shown in our booklet, sent free if you write our nearest office for Book No. S66

THE IDEAL BEDDING CO. LIMITED

MONTREAL—TORONTO—WINNIPEG 31

ONE GOOD FEATURE OR EVERY FEATURE GOOD WHICH?

AS long as a cream separator skims close, it is a good investment. But one good feature or a few good features do not make a separator that will skim close for any length of time.

A good separator is one in which the minor parts have been just as carefully designed and just as well made as the most important parts. A defect in a minor part will, by throwing the entire machine out of adjustment, offset all the perfection attained in any other part of the machine. In the one feature does not overtop all others because the same I H C standard of quality in design, material, and workmanship is maintained throughout. They are the only separators with dust-proof and milk-proof gears which are easily accessible. The frame is entirely protected from wear by phosphor bronze bushings. These separators have large shafts, bushings, and bearings; the flexible top-bearing is the strongest and most effective found in any separator. The patented dirt-arrester removes the finest particles of dirt from the milk before the milk is separated. I H C Cream Harvesters are made in two styles—Dairymaid, chain drive, and Bluebell, gear drive—each in four sizes.

I H C Cream Harvesters

Dairymaid and Bluebell

The I H C local agent will be glad to let you examine one of these separators, or, write nearest branch house for catalogues and other information.

CANADIAN BRANCHES: International Harvester Company of America at Brandon, Calgary, Edmonton, Hamilton, Lethbridge, London, Montreal, North Battleford, Ottawa, Regina, Saskatoon, St. John, Weyburn, Winnipeg, Yorkton.

International Harvester Company of America
Chicago (Incorporated) U S A

I H C Service Bureau

The Bureau is a clearing house for Agricultural data. It aims to learn the best ways of doing things on the farm, and then distribute the information. Your individual experience may help others. Send your problems to the I H C Service Bureau.

Don't Throw it Away. Does Your Granite Dish or Hot Water Bag Leak?

USE MENDETS A NEAT PATCH

They mend all leaks in all utensils—tin, brass, copper, graniteware, hot water bags, etc. No solder, cement or rivet. Anyone can use them; fit any surface, two million in use. Send for sample pkg., 10c. COMPLETE PACKAGE ASSORTED SIZES, 25c., POSTPAID. Agents wanted.
Collette Mfg. Co., Dept. D Collingwood, Ont.

STAMMERERS

The Arnott Institute treats the CAUSE, not the HABIT, and permanently cures the most hopeless looking cases in four to eight weeks. Write for proofs, references and information to 12

THE ARNOTT INSTITUTE, BERLIN, ONT., Can.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

By JESSIE E. RORKE

THOUGH few of us can claim really to enjoy housecleaning, it is not without a certain amount of pleasure that we begin the campaign against the season's accumulated dust, and watch the house growing fresh and spotless under our busy hands. Then, too, there is the pleasure of the new things, for each cleaning is likely to bring with it some added piece of furniture, a rug or curtains replaced, or freshly-decorated walls, or, perhaps, it is only a cover for the table or a new cushion, but whichever it may be it fills its own place in completing our plan for a beautiful home. But it is possible that we may as far advance this "house beautiful" by discarding some of our possessions as by adding new ones. We are not always as ready to bring the severe tests of good taste to the consideration of furnishings to which we have become accustomed in our home, as we would be in the purchase of new ones. This appears to be especially true of the things that are purely ornamental. We tolerate many things because they have become so familiar that we have long ago forgotten to consider their claims to be really beautiful, and put them back in their places as a mere matter of course when even the empty spaces might be greatly to be preferred.

DESIGN FOR NUT BOWL

As a rule we are quite too much afraid of empty spaces, and in our fear of leaving a room bare and unfurnished fail to achieve the quiet simplicity and beauty that is attained by the repetition of a few simple, graceful lines and harmonious tones of color. One or two ornaments of real merit will give an effect that can only be marred by the use of other poorer ones, while even if all were exquisitely beautiful too many would only divide the interest, and each would lose something of its charm. A mantel with only one ornament, if that fails to be beautiful, will be poorly furnished indeed, and will be insufficiently so if the ornament fulfils every requirement of beauty and still lacks interest enough to hold our attention, and fill so large a space. One of the dainty rose bowls of iridiscent glass, while a perfect thing in its way, with its pretty lines and glowing bits of color, will give its full share of pleasure for the moment, but for the moment only, and will seem quite inadequate if placed alone upon the mantel, but put in its stead the Winged Victory or the Venus of Milo and we look for nothing more, but find sufficient interest no matter how often our eyes may return to the place.

Though the costliest things are assuredly not always in the best taste, it is true that much that is most beautiful in the line of ornament is expensive, and some of it no doubt to be placed among the things we may only admire but not possess, yet if we counted the cost of the bric-a-brac in our rooms would we not often find that we might have replaced it with one or two of the pieces we coveted at no greater cost and with infinitely better effect. And even if we cannot afford the things that fulfil our standard of what is most beautiful, at least we need not tolerate that which has no claim to beauty at all. If we could only spend a few moments as strangers in our own houses and view our possessions with impartial eyes, seeing only the final effect and forgetting all the associations, how differently things would impress us. The blue vase on the mantel would present itself as a jarring note of color amongst the tan and red furnishings of the living room instead of a familiar wedding gift calling up pleasant memories of the donor; and the clock that we did not altogether like in the first place, but that has just been "the clock" to us for so long, would suddenly look cheap and tawdry with all its gilt trimming. Perhaps it is well for our comfort that we find it difficult to take this impersonal view of our surroundings, but once a year at least, it is wise to compass it if possible, and surveying our bric-a-brac, ruthlessly discard any that only our sentiment, and not our knowledge of the beautiful can approve.

IT is not sufficient that an ornament shall be beautiful in itself; it must also be appropriate and in harmony with its surroundings. The character and uses of the room must be considered, and if ornament is not its sole purpose, the first consideration must be appropriateness to its own uses. It is often here that we may add rich touches of color that may repeat and intensify the colors of the room or give a pleasing note of contrast. A few pieces of silver give a charming effect in the drawing-room furnished in gray and old rose, while a piece of dull red pottery amongst furnishings of green or a brass bowl or jug contrasting with blues will be equally beautiful. The placing of an ornament will often enhance or detract from its effect. A brass or copper bowl while beautiful in any position, will be doubly so if placed where it catches the flickering light from the open grate or near a window where it becomes a glowing piece of color in the sunlight.

Pottery, vases or bowls in artistic glass, pieces of brass, copper or silver, casts in plaster and bronze are among the things from which we may safely select our ornaments. The rich colors of the pottery make it very suitable for the living-room or library, and some of the pieces are exceedingly beautiful In glass one finds pretty graceful shapes that are ornamental in themselves and most suitable for holding flowers, while in the metals there are candlesticks, bowls, fern bowls, artistic-looking jugs and jardinieres. When the surroundings are in keeping there is nothing that will add greater dignity and beauty to a room than a cast. That it may be only of plaster makes little difference, as if it is faithfully reproduced it loses little in its change from the marble, and is more in keeping with the simple furnishings of an ordinary home. Though we are told that tinting invariably takes away from the delicacy and clearness of detail of a cast, the dead white rarely harmonizes with the color scheme of the room, and one turns in preference to the ivory. What is called a snow finish gives a medium between the dead white and ivory. Many of the casts taken originally from the bronze are tinted a dull green, and harmonize beautifully with some color effects.

DESIGN OF FRAME FOR ROUND MIRROR

Flowers, the most beautiful of all ornaments, are within reach of all of us, but most especially those who are fortunate enough to possess country homes. Endless variety in beauty of form and color are at our hand only waiting for us to choose. For our living-room with its tan and brown furnishings we may follow the round of the season always with something new yet equally harmonious—gay crocuses, yellow daffodils, the many-tinted nasturtiums, orange lilies, roses, yellow and red, gladioli, marigolds, goldenglow, sunflowers—until winter comes, and we coax the daffodils to bloom indoors, to replace them later with pretty red geraniums or some of the many varieties of ferns. And so, if we are fortunate enough to possess a garden, we find something for each of our rooms whatever its color scheme may be that looks as though it might have grown just to be placed there. Among the costly bric-a-brac that is offered in the shops few things will give greater pleasure than an old ugly gray stone mustard jar filled with graceful branches of purple lilac. To be sure they are not so lasting as a piece of pottery or brass (perhaps that is part of their charm), but when they are gone the irises will be here, and then the white roses and the August lilies, each one seeming with its first coming more beautiful than the last.

DESIGN FOR JARDINIERE

When all has been said on the subject of ornament we come back to the old familiar rule—each piece must be more beautiful than the space it occupies, or there is no excuse for its presence. Furnishings that are a necessity we can only make as beautiful as we may, but ornament that fails to meet the test has no reason for existence at all.

Concerning Pyrography

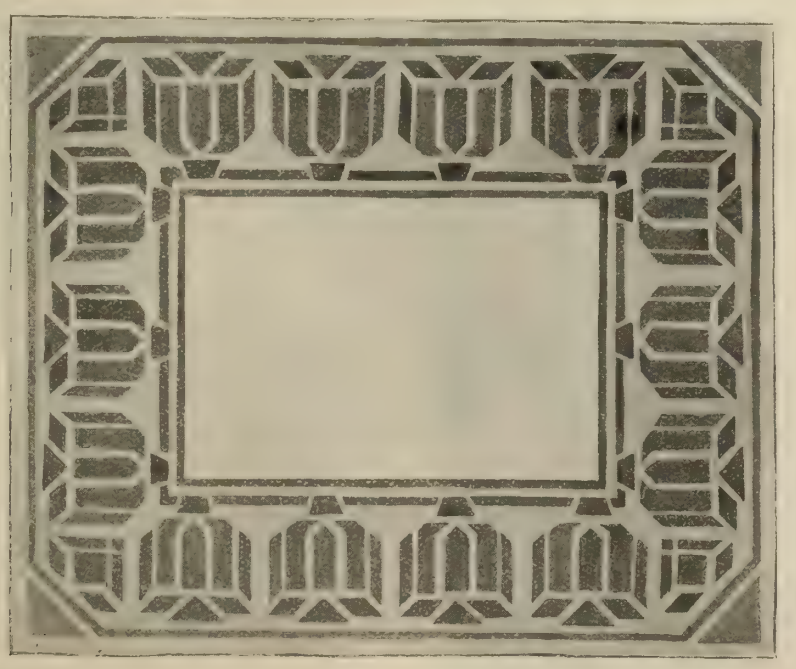
OF the various arts that are used in the decoration of a home pyrography is perhaps the oldest. Some of the earliest attempts at expression in the form of a picture or design were made with some sort of red-hot tool upon wood. Nations that had made but little progress in civilization produced wooden aticles decorated with quaint arrangements of lines and dots burnt upon the surface, while familiar objects are outlined in the same way, sometimes traced so delicately that some very fine tool must have been used. Some of these old specimens of burnt work may be seen in the museums and are exceedingly interesting, the very simplicity of the design frequently giving a most pleasing effect.

It is said that the first outline drawing was made when a man, charmed by the shadow of the woman that he loved as it fell upon the wall, caught up a charred coal from among the embers and traced its outline. It is probable that burnt work may have had some similar origin; some idler dreaming by his camp fire attempted perhaps to trace his thought on a nearby piece of wood with the hot end of his poker, or perhaps only to trace the strange pattern made by the shadow of the dancing flames.

This first tool would do its work but awkwardly, and yet the result might have more artistic value than much of the pyrography that is done to-day with our greatly improved point and facilities for heating it. Skill in the handling of a point is so easily acquired that a knowledge of the technical part of the work is often considered sufficient, and poor, and inefficient work is the result. It is to this that the varying popularity of pyrography is due, and after a surfeit of department store designs applied without artistic feeling or consideration of appropriateness we are inclined to turn in dislike from it all. Yet it has all the possibilities of any work in black and white, and the warm rich brown of the burnt wood gives a most attractive color. But the work must be done with the same careful study of effects, of light and shadow of the varying tones of color, of harmony of lines and appropriateness of design that would be given to work with the brush or crayon. The fact that the article to be decorated is usually of wood or of leather and seems to demand a choice of subject more bold and decided than we might use in decorating china or designing some exquisite bit of embroidery, should not prove hampering, but rather lend individuality to the work.

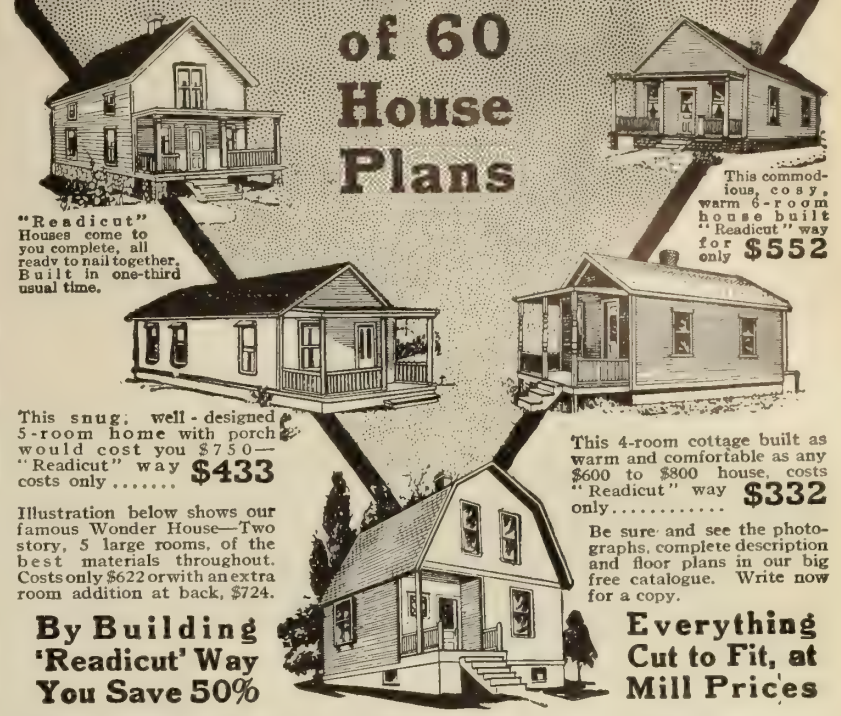
Basswood is most commonly used for this work, and most of the pieces that are shown in the shops for burning are made from it, though some which are imported from Germany are holly, which on account of the shortness of its grain is better for burning. If one is near a reliable cabinet-maker, however, it is better to have the pieces that one desires made up by him. The workmanship will be better than in the ready-mades, and one may exercise their individual taste in the choice of shape and wood. Basswood, butternut and pine are soft woods, and burn most easily, but where a design is to be finely executed and not too deeply burned such hardwoods as oak, maple and elm may be used. Of the three mentioned, elm will give the blackest line under the pencil. There is no wood that will give more beautiful results than teak, though it is, of course, expensive.

The illustrations offer some suggestions in design for the amateur burnt wood worker. It is wiser to attempt only the smaller pieces, unless one has perfect confidence in their own good taste and skill. A piece of furniture such as a chair or table, may not be lightly discarded when we become tired of it, and this we will be sure to do unless the design is extremely simple, conforming to the lines of the furniture itself, and having sufficient decorative value to give it added interest and beauty.



DESIGN FOR TRAY IN BURNT WOOD

Before You Build Write for Our FREE Book of 60 House Plans



"Readicut" Houses come to you complete, all ready to nail together. Built in one-third usual time.

This commodious, cosy, warm 6-room house built "Readicut" way for only $552

This snug, well-designed 5-room home with porch would cost you $750—"Readicut" way costs only $433

This 4-room cottage built as warm and comfortable as any $600 to $800 house, costs "Readicut" way only..... $332

Illustration below shows our famous Wonder House—Two story, 5 large rooms, of the best materials throughout. Costs only $622 or with an extra room addition at back, $724.

Be sure and see the photographs, complete description and floor plans in our big free catalogue. Write now for a copy.

By Building 'Readicut' Way You Save 50%

Everything Cut to Fit, at Mill Prices

Houses 2 to 12 Rooms, Summer Cottages, Stores, Schools, $175 Up

Let us show you how you save architect's 5%, builder's 10% and lumber dealer's big profits by buying ALL materials direct from our mills. Sovereign "Readicut" Buildings come to you with every piece cut, fitted, ready to nail. No skilled labor. You get everything at wholesale cost—lumber trimmed, fitted and marked; roofing, doors, windows, glass, plaster board, interior trim and finish, hardware, even the nails and paint. Also plans, blue prints and detailed building instructions—all so clear you can put it together yourself or with unskilled labor.

Built Like Any Substantial, Well-Constructed Building

Sovereign Houses are not the portable kind, but are built like any other well-constructed, warm, substantial building. Our plan is not an experiment. It will pay you to investigate.

In our catalogue you see exactly what the completed house looks like and know exactly its entire cost. No extras. No delays. Shipped anywhere, promptly.

Learn How We Save You Time and Money

Write NOW for our big book full of photos, plans and detailed descriptions of more than 60 attractive homes that you can build with utmost economy the "Readicut" way. Send 6 cents in stamps and ask for Book No. 52.

Sovereign Construction Co. Limited 852 Lumsden Bldg. TORONTO

MAXWELL'S

PURITAN MOTOR WASHER

is in daily use in thousands of homes that have running water in the house.

The strength and simplicity of the motor—and the fact that it washes cleanly and quickly on very low pressure—has made it famous. The tub and mechanism are the same as in the old standby "CHAMPION" High Speed—and that means, the best there is.

If you have electric lights, you will find the MAXWELL ELECTRIC WASHER AND WRINGER just splendid. It washes clothes by electricity and washes them quickly and clean. Simply attach to ordinary electric lamp socket. The only electric washer manufactured in Canada.

If your dealer does not handle all styles and sizes in Maxwell Electric, Water Motor and Hand Washers, write us for catalogue.

DAVID MAXWELL & Sons, St. Marys, Ont.

Money In Spring Weather. Don't stay cooped in the house in fine spring weather. Hire a woman to do your scrubbing and sweeping. Pay her from the big earnings you receive for getting subscriptions to CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL. Hundreds of women are earning thousands of dollars.

Circulation Department, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Ontario Women's Institutes

GEORGE A. PUTNAM
SUPERINTENDENT
PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS, TORONTO

Flowers for Rural School Grounds

By MRS. JOSEPH DAVIDSON

A PAPER on the above subject by a member of the Kemble Branch should be of special interest at this season. The writer says:

This is a sweet and beautiful subject. How eagerly we look forward to the first flowers of spring, and watch each sunny slope and rock for the resurrection of the first "pinks." And, having found a few, how our souls warm and glow with joy and love toward the Creator Who has been so bountiful in beautifying the earth that it may be pleasing in our eyes and educate us in all that is good, pure and lovely.

I have read somewhere that Canada produces more species and their varieties of wild flowers, shrubs and trees than any other part of the world, and I know that a great variety can be got within our own township (Keppel). The woods are carpeted with flowers, and no sooner does one fragrant beauty close it short life than several others awake to the call of the season.

As to the educational value and refining influence of flowers there is no question, and our native wild flowers are by far the most potent. The flowers of the hothouse and garden, the so-called improved varieties, are over-fed and coarse in comparison. They are not so delicately fashioned, they have not the inimitable shadings or the subtle woodsy perfume of so many of our native wildlings. So the wild flowers are the very best to bedeck our school grounds, and they cost nothing but the labor of planting them. The first thing to see to is the soil. It should be a rather light loam, but if it is clay, and too heavy, then we will have to haul enough leaf mould to make it right. I have known of more than one fruit and flower garden made up in this way, and it brings the quickest and best results. If the drainage has not already been seen to, it should be done before anything is planted. If there is a low wet corner it does not matter, as we can get suitable plants to put into it, and thereby have a greater variety. But the trees should be the first planted. After marking off a liberal space suitable for a playground, we can plant trees, shrubs and flowers in the space left, the flowers and low shrubs in front, and the trees and taller shrubs more as a background, and none so near the school as to keep out air and sunlight. Now, having the ground prepared, we are ready to chose the stock and plant it. I have practiced puddling the roots for a number of years, and find it is the best and surest of success. It is done this way: Dig a hole large enough to admit the tree, or plant without doubling any of the roots, and deep enough to set it just an inch or so deeper than it was before. Set the tree or plant in straight up, then pack fine earth in all round the roots; fill in about two-thirds of the earth, packing well down, then throw in water till the plant stands in a soft wet puddle or mud, then throw in rest of earth, and finish with fine dry earth on top to keep the moisture. Carefully planted in this way, there will be no more watering needed, and the plant will go on growing with but very little check. Therefore we will use the same method throughout with trees, shrubs and plants.

Our greatest difficulty in choosing our stock will be in the great number of fine things we have to choose from. In our own township we have at least four varieties of maple—and where can you find anything more handsome than a well-grown maple tree? They are the aristocracy of the forests. The "mountain maple" is little more than a shrub with us. I have never seen it taller than a well-grown lilac. We usually find it on rocky ground along roadsides. It blooms in June, and its spikes of creamy yellow flowers and its bright orange red foliage in autumn make it quite ornamental. The "silver maple," with beautiful sharp-cut leaves, white beneath, glossy dark green above, which turns to a brilliant red in the fall, has long drooping branches, and makes a very distinct specimen tree, not plentiful, and found along the lakes. The "red maple" is found in swamps and low damp woods near lakes and on river banks, and can be easily distinguished when not in leaf by its dark red branchlets. This also makes a fine specimen tree, and most helpful in the coloring, and would do well near our damp corner.

Last, but not least, is the emblem of our country, the "sugar maple." This is the most common maple we have, and taking it all round, there is no other tree that will bear comparison with it. It should be planted largely, not only in the school grounds, but along the roads and in waste places everywhere. It is clean, fresh and shapely at any time, and in its autumn dress of red, green and yellow, it is a most brilliant sight. A few "paper birch" helps to light up the coloring, also some "mountain ash," whose bright red berries are fine in the early autumn. A few "hawthorn" and "june berry" are to be recommended. Beech is splendid as a specimen tree. There are a great many more desirable trees which could be utilized if room permitted, but the usual rural school grounds are not often more than an acre, and we must not omit evergreens. We have a fine list to choose from: "White" and "red pine," the "black" and "white spruces," "cedar," "balsam" and "hemlock." The "tamarack' with its slender limbs, makes a very graceful tree, and a fine variety, although not an evergreen.

Our native shrubs are as plentiful and beautiful as the trees. "Leatherwood" and "shipherdia" are the earliest in flower, blooming before the leaves come. The "holly" is another fine shrub, with its dark green glossy leaves and bright red berries in late fall and early winter. Then we have two varieties of spiræa which would grace any grounds. Common "meadowsweet," both red and white flowered. "Nine bark" is a beautiful shrub, and easily grown. "Button bush" does well in a damp place. Our numerous family of "dogwoods" should have a place; C. Paniculata is one of the best, and the "bush honeysuckles" are some of them worthy of a place, and "staghorn sumach" makes a good showing in the fall, with its spikes of bright red seeds. Our wild rose is another family that has some beautiful members. I would not confine myself entirely to wildlings in the case of shrubs. There are so many hardy varieties which bloom later in the season, and some of them are so much like a part of home, such as the syringias or lilacs, spiræa in variety, yellow flowering currant, French honeysuckles in pink and white, etc. Among the wild native climbers there are a few fine ones. The wild clematis (Virgin's Bower), is fine in both flower and fruit, because of the long, fuzzy tails to the seed vessels the children call it "old man" and "fuzzy head." Then there is the "virginia creeper," another fine clean climber. In the fall its leaves turn to fiery red. "Climbing bittersweet" is another good one, with its bright orange fruits, which burst in the fall and expose a scarlet pulp, which renders it quite ornamental.

Of herbaceous plants, the first to greet us is hepatica and "spring beauty." Either will succeed without special selection of soil or situation. The former can be lifted in early spring as soon as you can find the plants, and if laid on a plate in the window and kept moist, will bloom right away, and will be very interesting to the children to watch the blossoms come up and expand. "Spring beauty" is a fitting name for so fair a flower, so dainty is the cluster of blossoms between the two dark green leaves. Look into the tiny floral cup of delicate blush, veined with crimson-purple, which no human hand can imitate, so delicate is the penciling. It has a long stem like fragile silvery cord, sometimes over a foot in length, and springs from a tiny tuber buried in the ground. Closely following are three members of the fumitory family, "Dutchman's breeches" and "squirrel corn." The school children often call them "boys and girls," also I have heard some call them "white hearts." The third one is the "pale corydalis," with its pale lilac blossoms just tipped with yellow—not common, but is found in rocky or burnt woods.

The wild columbine is another beauty, and easy of cultivation, and the trilliums, or wake robins, are general favorites. We have three varieties of them: T. grandiflorum, with its large white blossoms is beautiful; T. erectum is the dull brick red variety, and T. erythrocarpum, or painted trillium, is a pink and white beauty, who loves good living; but all are easily grown. The "dog-tooth violet" is the most common flower of our woods, and in beauty will hold its own with soft yellow blossoms, the petals curving backwards like a lily, and trimly set on variegated foliage and grows anywhere. We find the wild blue phlox (P. dwaricata) in damp woods. And the large family of violets; who could desire flowers more lovely than they? And we must not forget the ferns for shady places. There is a host of other flowers appearing throughout the summer, such as the wild geraniums, the toothwort, blue and yellow flags, orchids, the pink and yellow lady's slipper, wild ginger, or coltsfoot, with its curious scented buds, blue and "cardinal mimulas," "wood betony," Jack-in-the-pulpit, campanula or bluebells, the tender touch-me-nots, the shy but beautiful pirolus. Bloodroot is a curious plant with red, blood-like juice, and pure white blossoms. In the fall we have the two great families of asters and goldenrods. What a bare autumn we would have without them! But it would take months to enumerate all the beautiful flowers of our woods. On going into the woods it always seems to me like entering the Temple of the Living God not made with hands, and when I am particularly tired or worried about something, I like to steal away into the unbroken forest and let the little birds and squirrels come close to my feet. The murmuring of the trees sounds to me like prayer making continual intercession for a sinful world, and anon as the wind rises I fancy I can hear psalm-singing, and great anthems of praise for all God's goodness to us. As I look above and see the long limbs stretched forth, as arms in solemn benediction, one's soul is refreshed and strengthened to go back and take up life's work with renewed vigor, as Mrs. Browning tells us: "Every bush is a fire, but only he who sees takes off his shoes."

GARDEN DETAIL OF "GREY GABLES," RESIDENCE OF MR. J. H. EVANS, LAWRENCE PARK, TORONTO
Chadwick and Beckett, architects. Courtesy of Construction.

Books for Children

By MRS. J. McDONALD

FROM the Ethel Branch comes a paper on this subject, which contains many suggestions of value.

The books we read have a wonderful power in moulding our character for good or evil. While reading we are usually unconscious of any influence upon our minds, but after we have mastered the book the thought will work out in our daily lives. We cannot say how much the sense of honor, the courage, the energy and the broader outlook upon life is due to the inspiration of our reading; while on the other hand we cannot tell how much the dwarfed mind, the gloomy outlook on life and the lowered morals are due to the reading of a bad book. For these reasons the choice of reading material for our children is a matter of great importance.

Gibbon says, "My early love of reading I would not exchange for the treasures of India."

Joseph Cook says: "When a boy has once acquired a keen interest in biographical and historical reading he cannot thereafter be wholly vulgar in his taste for literature."

Beecher says: "Books are the windows through which the soul looks out." A home without books is like a room without windows. No man has a right to bring up his children without surrounding them with books, if he has the means to buy them. It is is a wrong to his family; he cheats them. Children learn to read by being in the presence of books.

Parsons says: "If you teach a child to economize time and fill him with a love of good books, you ensure him an education far beyond anything he can get in the university, an education that will cease only with his life."

Ruskin says: "And I would urge upon every young man, as the beginning of due and wise provision for his household, to obtain as soon as he can, by the severest economy, a restricted, serviceable and steadily—however slowly—increasing series of books for use through life, making his little library, of all the furniture in his room, the most studied and decorative piece, and one of the earliest and strictest lessons to the children of the house being how to turn the pages of their own books lightly and carefully with no chance of tearing, or dog's ears."

The cultivation of the child's taste for good reading should begin early in life It is a sad thing to see children deprived of books. It is worse to see them supplied with literature injurious to their moral or intellectual growth. Before the children learn to read much may be done to prepare the way for good literature The love of stories in some form or other is a characteristic of childhood. In all lands and in all conditions of life the mother's words, "Once upon a time" open up to the young child a vague retrospect of the past. Fairy stories are types of certain feeling which pertain to the early years of life. They are most effective when they are told rather than read. "Ghost stories" are objectionable, as they foster a dread of the unseen. On the other hand to cut off "Jack and the Bean Stalk, "Red Riding Hood," "The Three Bears," "Jack the Giant Killer," "Cinderella" from a child's life is to proclaim him to be stupid after he grows up.

It is scarcely necessary to be reminded that the stories of the Bible can never be surpassed, either from an intellectual or from a moral aspect. The history of Adam and Eve, of Cain and Abel, of Abraham and Isaac, and of Jacob, the lives of Joseph, Moses, David and Daniel will ever have their interest for children.

Aesop's fables are very popular among children. Many of them are valuable in consequence of their teaching of moral principles. For instance, the evil of greediness is shown in the fable of "The Dog and the Shadow," of lying, in the fable of the boy who cried "Wolf," and of improvidence in the case of the man who killed "The goose that laid the golden eggs." As the young reader advances in knowledge, stronger food should be furnished. "Grimm's Fairy Tales" and "Household Stories," and the delightful "Wonder Stories" of Hans Andersen should form part of every child's library Other books that will be read with interest are: "The Fairy Land of Science," Charles Kingsley's "Water Babies," "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments," Hawthorne's "Wonder Book" and "Tanglewood Tales." The stories of Indian life, "Swiss Family Robinson," "Gulliver's Travels," "Robin Hood" and "Robinson Crusoe." Later the romances of Scott and others will have place, also Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," Lamb's "Tales From Shakespeare" and books of stories from history.

Stories of real men of adventure like Livingstone, etc., "Books of Golden Deeds," by Charlotte Yonge, would shape the taste away from cheap novels, and detective stories. "Servants of the King," by Robert E. Speer, contains eleven stories of lives of Christian missionaries, written especially for young people. Chapman's "Book on Birds," "Adventures of Nils," by Selma Lagerlof is full of Swedish folklore and one of the best new books for children.

Hamilton W. Mabie's selections of books are good; his "Heroes and Heroines" are books which boys and girls are very fond of. "Peeps Into Other Lands" is a good series. Girls especially should be given more stories of the world's famous women that their ideals may not be shaped altogether by stories of men. Too often the mistake is made of fostering a relish for nothing other than the novel. Many novels are far from being desirable food for children. Books about places and people of far-off lands will implant a love for geography and works of travel. Cultivate a taste for poetry, history, biography and science. It is a mistake to suppose that children should be kept in ignorance of these fields until they become fit to enter a High School.

Hints on Flower Culture

MISS CLARA RUTHVEN of the Everett Branch makes the following remarks regarding this seasonable subject:

The long bright days of March are with us again, and we will very soon have to make preparations for our spring gardening. And what a pleasure the average housewife finds in making the various small changes to brighten up her home in honor of spring's coming. Soon there will be the gardens to make, the flower beds to arrange, vines to set by the porch, and seeds to plant of the flowers we like the very best. I think it is best to plant your flower seeds in a hotbed early in the spring, or if these are not convenient, plant in shallow boxes in the house, and set in windows where there is plenty of sunshine.

I generally plant the seeds about the last of March. In doing this you have bloom much earlier, and can see much more for your labor. Select good loamy soil, not having it heavy, as when it is watered frequently it makes it soggy. I generally mix some of the soil in the woods (decayed leaves, etc.) with rich garden soil, thus making the soil light, and it does not harden. Water lightly every day. (I would say here that it is advisable to have these boxes ready in the fall, as it saves time in the spring), and perhaps you cannot always get the earth just when you need it.

Do not sow the seeds too thickly. It is better to sow the seeds sparingly, as the little plants grow more sturdy and strong. When these are an inch or two high they can be transplanted into the garden. It has been remarked that flowers started in the house should not be set out in the garden till corn-planting time. However, care should be taken not to set them out too early, not till all danger of frost is over, and the nights are warm. As a rule, people rush out at the beginning of a rain to set out their plants. If a few cloudy or rainy days succeed, this will be all right, but if the shower be immediately followed by a hot sun, it is all wrong.

Hence the most successful transplanters do not depend on rainy days, but set out their plants even on a warm, bright evening. In the first place, the beds should be made a few days, at least, ahead, so the soil may have had time to settle. Now then very carefully take out just a few plants, so few that you are absolutely certain they will not have time to wilt before you get them in the ground again. Disturb the roots just as little as possible during the moving process.

Have holes made quite large enough to receive the roots without danger of overcrowding, and pour in a little water. Next set the plants very gently (remember that the young rootlets are very tender and delicate) and work in the

You Won't Believe It.

There's no use telling you over and over again that the will actually save you one hundred per cent per year on your investment.

DE LAVAL CREAM SEPARATOR

TRY IT FREE

Then you'll believe it

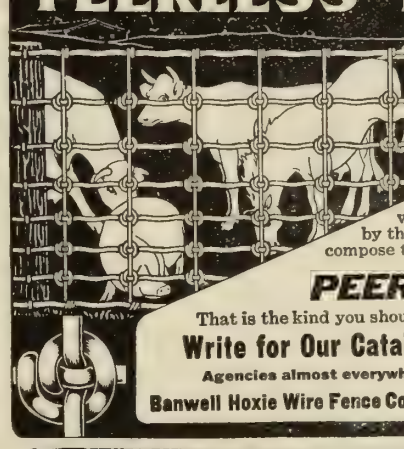
And looking back—won't you be sorry.

Send for Catalog.

The De Laval Separator Co.

173-177 Williams St.
MONTREAL
VANCOUVER—WINNIPEG

PEERLESS-PERFECTION



Real Fence Service Guaranteed

Peerless Wire Fence is built to give absolute fence satisfaction and makes good. Best quality wire galvanized to prevent rust and securely held at each intersection by the Peerless Lock combined with fence experience compose the Peerless Fence.

PEERLESS WIRE FENCE

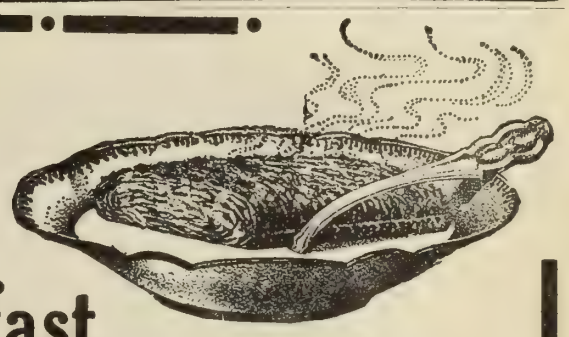
That is the kind you should use on your farm and save expense and worry.

Write for Our Catalog Today Peerless Poultry fencing and Farm Gates are unequaled. Try them.

Agencies almost everywhere. Agents wanted in unassigned territory.

Banwell Hoxie Wire Fence Co., Ltd., Dept. Winnipeg, Man., Hamilton, Ont.

An Early Breakfast



An early breakfast without getting up early! That's Winter joy without Winter worry or work. Such a thing is possible in the home where forms the daily breakfast. Being ready-cooked and ready-to-serve one does not need to wait for kitchen fires or slow servants for a warm, nourishing, strengthening breakfast.

SHREDDED WHEAT

Simply heat the biscuit a few moments to restore crispness, then pour hot milk over it and salt or sweeten to suit the taste. Deliciously wholesome with stewed prunes, baked apples, sliced bananas, canned peaches or other canned fruits. At your grocer's.

Made of Choicest Selected Canadian Wheat

A Canadian Food for Canadians

Made by

The Canadian Shredded Wheat Company, Limited

Niagara Falls, Ontario

Toronto Office: 49 Wellington Street East I-75

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Would you like to try these toilet necessities?

A trial is all that is necessary to convince you that these three preparations combine all that is necessary to enable a woman to appear at her best all the time.

DAGGETT & RAMSDELL'S PERFECT COLD CREAM gives a perfect complexion. Not by trying to cover up the blemishes, but by removing them. It's good because it's pure.

PALMER'S HAIR TONIC 50c and $1.00 sizes. for dandruff, hair that combs out, or coarse, straggling hair. It cleans perfectly, and promotes a vigorous growth.

LUSTR-ITE NAIL ENAMEL used frequenty, gives that tasteful, well-groomed appearance that no care in dress or other details can obtain.

All of the above can be obtained at every good store handling toilet requisites.

Special Offer

For six cents (6c) in stamps (to defray packing and postage) we will send you a sample package of Daggett & Ramsdell's Perfect Cold Cream and Lustr-ite Nail Preparations, together with booklets containing information of great interest to every woman.

J. PALMER & SON, Limited - 5 and 7 De Bresoles St., Montreal

Pin Money—Hat Money—Fur Money—Theatre Tickets

All to be earned in your spare time, by telling your friends and acquaintances why you like the Journal, and why they should subscribe. Tens of thousands of women in Canada do not know Canada has a home magazine, and thousands more do not realize into what a splendid magazine it has grown. Ladies are earning thousands of dollars in our magazine subscription work. If later you care to give us all your time there is a good salary and expense money ready for you. Write for our salary and commission offer.

Circulation Department, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

KODAK SIMPLICITY

Every step in photography has been made simple by the Kodak system. Loading in daylight, focusing without a ground glass (no focusing at all with the smaller sizes), daylight development and Velox printing---these are Kodak features.

The Kodak Film Tank means more however than the mere doing away with the dark room —it means better results. All the guess work of the old dark room methods of tentative development is done away with. Certain ready prepared powders are dissolved in a certain amount of water of a certain temperature; developement then continues for a certain length of time. It's all by rule, and thereby gives the best possible result from every exposure.

The Experience is in the Tank.

Canadian Kodak Co., Limited

Toronto, Canada

Complete Kodak Catalogue free at the dealers or by mail.

clay over and above the roots, pressing it down firmly, but not too roughly as to bruise any of the little threads. Last of all, cover the surface of the ground about the plant completely with fine, perfectly dry earth. This will act as a mulch, and conserve the moisture about the roots, instead of allowing it to pass off into the air.

I think people who find it impossible to have a flower garden should at least try to have a few outside window boxes to attract the butterflies and humming birds, and add a little more of the glory of summer to the long bright days. We cannot have too much of it. In selecting plants for the window box one should always choose one or two for drooping, one or two for climbing, and a few uprights. Do not overcrowd, but give each plant room to develop Choose your colors carefully, and if possible, have some white flowers to give tone to the assortment.

For southern and western windows, geraniums, heliotrope, petunias, nasturtiums, phlox, verbenas, and ivy geraniums, will be found very satisfactory, as these can stand the sun's hot rays. It would be as well to keep the windows open as much as possible in order to do away with the harsh reflection of the sun, from the glass, which is so injurious to plants on a hot summer day.

From Several Branches

THE Meaford Branch of the Women's Institute met in the auditorium of the town hall, January 25th. There were two hundred and seventy-five ladies present at the afternoon session. The president, Mrs. B. Long, presided at this meeting, and greeted the audience in her usual cheerful and cordial manner, giving all a hearty welcome. The president in her opening address stated that a very important feature in our Institute work here was the starting of a special fund to assist in erecting a General Hospital in Meaford at no far distant day. The collections to be taken up at the afternoon and evening meetings are to be put aside for that purpose.

Miss C. Smith read a letter from the head nurse of the Oshawa Hospital, which was full of encouragement and inspiration to the members of this Institute to press on with the noble work. Fifty new members were added to the roll, which now makes Meaford Branch the largest in North Grey district. Mrs. Parsons, the talented and gifted representative of the Provincial Government in the interests of the Ontario Women's Institute, was present, and gave the audience a rich, intellectual treat, which was highly appreciated. The subject of her address was "The Books We Ought to Read." The solo by Mrs. S. A. Gray, accompanied by Mrs. (Dr.) Bennett, was well received. Miss McPhee, a representative from the Ogilvie Milling Company, gave demonstrations at the afternoon and evening sessions on pastry and breadmaking. These practical demonstrations were both interesting and helpful to the members.

Miss Langton of the Melagama Tea and Coffee Company, was also present at both sessions, and gave the audience the opportunity of testing that brand of tea and coffee.

Miss Wright favored the audience with excellent music, while refreshments were being served. The meeting adjourned to meet again in the evening with the Farmers' Institute. The mayor, Dr. Clark, presided at the union meeting in his happy, jovial manner. The first number on the programme was an instrumental by Miss Mary Wright.

Mr. Shearer, the Provincial Government representative for Farmers' Institutes, gave an excellent address on the advantages of agriculture.

Mr. Duff, B.S.A., the provincial representative of agriculture for Grey County, gave an excellent address on the "Problem of Co-operation in Agriculture," showing the advantages to be gained, also stating that it required the producer and the consumer to fully realize their interests were mutual. He said that was most necessary in order to bring to a successful issue the co-operative system. The speaker also recommended the advantages to be gained by adopting the methods which were advised by the Provincial Government in the improvement of orchards. Miss Georgie Sutherland then delighted the audience with a patriotic reading entitled "The Private of the Buffs."

Mrs. Parsons in her closing address set forth fully the aims and high ideals of the Women's Institute which centred in their motto, "For Home and

Kellogg's
TOASTED
CORN
FLAKES
Twenty generous platefuls for ten cents! You'd pay more, once you taste these sweethearts of the corn.

DOMINION EXPRESS
Money Orders
and Foreign Cheques are payable all over the World.
They may be sent in payment of produce, tax, gas and electric light bills, interest on notes and mortgages, insurance premiums, subscriptions to newspapers and magazines, and in fact in payment of all kinds of accounts, whether in or out of town.
We give you a receipt and if the remittance goes astray in the mails,
we refund your money or issue a new order free of charge.
TRAVELLERS' CHEQUES ISSUED.
MONEY SENT BY TELEGRAPH AND CABLE.
When purchasing Goods by mail, ALWAYS remit by
DOMINION EXPRESS CO.
MONEY ORDERS
RATES FOR MONEY ORDERS:
$ 5. AND UNDER 3 CENTS
OVER 5. TO $10. 6 "
" 10. " 30. 10 "
" 30. 50. 15 "
AGENCIES THROUGHOUT CANADA.

"SWAN" FOUNT PEN.
Always Ready
Never Fails.
Fitted with gold iridium tipped nib and perfect feed.
Prices from $2.50
Sold by leading stationers and jewellers. CATALOGUE FREE
MABIE TODD & Co., 124 York St., Toronto
London, New York, Chicago

SHAW'S SCHOOLS
of Toronto, operated by the Central Business College of Toronto, train young men and women for office positions. Why not get your training under "Specialists"—some of whom are well-known authors of commercial text books? We have students in attendance from Halifax and Vancouver. Send for free catalogue to W. H. Shaw, Pres., Yonge and Gerrard Streets, Toronto.

Sterling Silver Hat Pin
given for ONE new six-months subscription to the JOURNAL.
Offer open for one month only.

Country." This organization is strictly non-political, and has as its aim the removal from its meetings of all creed, church or social distinction. One strong feature is combined in the improvement of home and national life, for in the love of home the love of counntry has its rise.

Annual Meetings

IT is again time for the Institutes to begin to plan for their annual meeting, and it is advisable that arrangements be made at the April meeting, for the annual meeting in May or early June.

If there are any accounts outstanding in the Institute, these should be paid, if there is money to meet the same, so that the books may be properly closed at the end of the Institute year.

It is important that the annual report of each branch should be sent promptly to the district secretary. The work of the district secretary is very often delayed because of the neglect of perhaps one branch secretary.

The district officers might also at this time begin to plan for their annual meeting, and should urge that each branch in the district be represented at the said meeting. The department will be glad to make suggestions regarding district annual meetings.

If any branch secretary has not already done so, she should at once send paid members for 1911-12 to the district secretary, or where there is no district secretary, direct to this office, in order that all members may receive the annual report for 1911.

Nobleton Joint Meeting

THE Women's Institute of Nobleton held their joint meeting with the Farmers' Institute at Nobleton, January 18th, in the basement of the Methodist Church. The first exhibition of cooking and butter took place, and was a decided success, notwithstanding the unfavorable weather. Judging from the number of entries, there being sixty-two in all, a live interest is shown in Institute work in Nobleton, and the branch is only a year old.

The following is a list of prizes given:

Cake, Dark Layer—1st, Mrs. J. A. McCutcheon; 2nd, Mrs. Jeffry.

Tarts, one dozen Lemon—1st, Mrs. W. Snider; 2nd, Mrs. H. Snider.

Pie, Plain Apple—1st, Miss M. McCutcheon; 2nd, Miss Ella Fry.

Pie, Fancy—1st, Miss E. Stewart; 2nd, Miss A. Ballard.

Fruit, 1 quart Preserved Pears—1st, Mrs. W. Snider; 2nd, Mrs. A. Hill.

Jelly—1st, Mrs. S. Hill; 2nd, Mrs. A. Campbell.

Marmalade—1st and 2nd, Mrs. H. Snider.

Cucumber Pickles—1st, Mrs. H. Snider; 2nd, Mrs. S. Davis.

Catsup—1st, Mrs. H. Thompson; 2nd, Miss Flo. Fry.

Bread—1st, Mrs. W. Snider; 2nd, Mrs. George Hill.

Butter—Mrs. S. Davis won the first special given by Mrs. J. W. Larkin. Mrs. John Mitchell was successful in winning Mrs. H. Pringle's special.

Butter, Institute Class—Three-pound prints, 1st, Mrs. H. Snider; 2nd, Mrs. Dew.

Cake, White Layer—1st, Miss Ella Fry; 2nd, Miss Dobson.

Proceeds from selling prize articles were $6.35.

After judging competition, meeting was addressed by delegate, Miss S. Campbell, Brampton, subject, "Housekeeping and Home-making." Miss Campbell congratulated the ladies on their display and said she did a great deal of judging at fall fairs, and this was as good a specimen of articles as she had judged at many places in the agricultural buildings. "Progress" was the word for Institute workers, and Miss Campbell hoped to hear of more competitions in future. Housekeeping was a fine art, and if the young ladies were taught this art, how many happy homes we would have in future. The Farmers' Institute members came in and an auction sale of articles took place.

Tea was served to all and the gentlemen made happy with the good cup of coffee and nice dainties. Prize articles were sampled. Joint meeting was held in the evening, when a large number were present. Nobleton is to be congratulated on the success of their meetings owing to the systematic management of the ladies.

Any Edison dealer will demonstrate to you how Thomas A. Edison doubled the entertaining capacity of The Edison Phonograph

when he invented
Edison Amberol Records
—the record which plays twice as long
Then you will understand why so many good songs, so much good music or every character never appeared in record form until the Amberol Record was perfected.
Then you will understand how, when you own an Edison Phonograph, you can now have all of the very best entertainment of every kind.
Then you will understand how this one advantage alone makes the Edison Phonograph the greatest sound-reproducing instrument as well as the greatest musical instrument—even if it had no other advantages. But it has: the sapphire reproducing-point, that does not scratch or wear the record and lasts forever—no changing needles; exactly the right volume of sound for your home; home recording—the ability to make and reproduce your own records in your own home.
Any Edison dealer will demonstrate these great Edison advantages to you.
BRITISH RECORDS
FRENCH RECORDS
In addition to our regular monthly list of Edison Standard and Edison Amberol Records, we issue regularly a number of British and French Records. Our British and French record catalogs contain the completest list of these selections, published in record form. Be sure to get them from your dealer when you go to buy your Edison Phonograph—and ask to have the new Record Supplements mailed you free every month.
There are Edison dealers everywhere. Go to the nearest and hear the Edison Phonograph play both Edison Standard and Edison Amberol Records. Get complete catalogs from your dealer or from us. Edison Phonographs, $16.50 to $240.00. Edison Standard Records, 40c. Edison Amberol Records (play twice as long), 65c. Edison Grand Opera Records, 85c to $2.50.
Thomas A. Edison
INCORPORATED
100 Lakeside Avenue, Orange, N. J., U. S. A.

A SMALL CROP IS A WARNING
A small crop is proof that your land is run down—it is a warning to fertilize promptly.
Manure is the ideal fertilizer because it contains the very elements that crops have extracted from the soil. To get 100 per cent value from the manure you spread, you must use a good manure spreader. The pitchfork method is wasteful, entails hard, disagreeable work, and takes too much time.
When buying a spreader, be sure you get one that will last. You can make sure of the quality, efficiency and durability, by investing in one of the
I H C Spreaders
Corn King Cloverleaf
These spreaders are used on thousands of farms. Their strength, simplicity, and durability are matters of record. Why not look into the matter?
When investigating, remember that the power transmitting mechanism used on I H C machines is the most durable used on any line of spreaders. This results from the fact that the beater gears are held in a single casting which prevents them from springing out of alignment and cutting the teeth. The teeth are long and chisel-pointed to insure positive pulverizing of all manure. There is no wedging of manure against the beater bars. The teeth do not rim the bars.
The beater is large enough in diameter so that it does not wind. You will find many other striking advantages which will convince you of I H C superiority.
Why not see the I H C local agent at once? I H C spreaders are made in different styles, in many sizes for every need. If you prefer, write nearest branch house for catalogues and full information.
CANADIAN BRANCHES—International Harvester Company of America at Brandon, Calgary, Edmonton, Hamilton, Lethbridge, London, Montreal, North Battleford, Ottawa, Regina, Saskatoon, St. John, Weyburn, Winnipeg, Yorkton.
International Harvester Company of America
Chicago (Incorporated) U S A
I H C Service Bureau
The Bureau is a clearing house for agricultural data It aims to learn the best ways of doing things on the farm, and then distribute the information. Your individual experience may help others. Send your problems to the I H C Service Bureau.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Make your pastry with PURITY FLOUR It will be delicious

WE tell you frankly that it will likely cost you slightly more to make pastry with PURITY FLOUR than with an ordinary flour. But thousands of home-cooks, who have tried both, willingly pay the difference.

Because of its extra strength and extra quality more shortening must be added to PURITY FLOUR than to blended or soft wheat flours, when making pastry.

PURITY FLOUR gets its extra strength and extra quality from the high-grade portions of the hard wheat berries. There is no low-grade hard wheat flour, nor no soft wheat flour, mixed with PURITY. It is all high-grade.

But think of the added delicacy of flavor, the extra deliciousness of the pies and the cakes! Surely it is worth paying a little more for greater enjoyment.

And the pleasure of using such a high-class, reliable flour for all manner of cooking and baking purposes cannot be counted in mere dollars and cents. And remember that PURITY FLOUR makes

Naturally, such a high-class flour will cost you slightly more. It costs more to make. It is worth more money.

"More bread and better bread"

It takes more water because it's a strong, thirsty flour. It goes farther in the baking. Get a pencil and add to your grocery list right now.

PURITY FLOUR

101

Say Farewell to Every Corn

Don't pare off the top layer and let the real corn go. That's simply folly.

It is dangerous, too. A slip of the blade often means an infection. Sometimes it means blood poison.

That form of home surgery doesn't belong to these intelligent times.

The treatment used by millions is this:

Apply a Blue-jay plaster. It is done in a jiffy. The pain ends instantly—the corn is forgotten.

Then the B & B wax gently loosens the corn. In 48 hours the whole corn comes out, root and all.

No soreness, no discomfort.

Fifty million corns have been ended in this way since this famous wax was invented.

Let it remove one for you. That will show you the end of corn troubles forever.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

Blue-jay Corn Plasters

Sold by Druggists—15c and 25c per package

Sample Mailed Free. Also Blue-jay Bunion Plasters (150)

Bauer & Black, Chicago and New York, Makers of B & B Handy Package Absorbent Cotton, etc.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

SPRING ALMANACS

By ELLEN R. C. WEBBER

HAVE you ever questioned "Why" when you see half the neighborhood semi-ill each spring? All nature is recruiting, the earth is putting forth new life, the birds are rejuvenated and fairly overflowing with happiness and joy. Only humanity is at its lowest ebb, is ill, tired, depressed, sick with a nameless, unplaceable, indescribable, might-be-most-anything sort of disease; a combination of universal symptoms hastily summed up as "spring fever."

Oh, yes, I know the explanation your doctor gives; poor fellow, he must give some seemingly logical explanation, else where would his chance for a fee come in? So he says: "Too much fat and sugar in the winter diet; a superabundance of hydro-carbonates; a serious tendency towards perihepatitis, or perhaps hydatids, or it might be icterus neonatorum. Anyway, this prescription will help you: two dollars and fifty cents, please."

Goodness gracious! If that wouldn't scare you loose from two-fifty, what would? And after all, boiled down into everyday English it simply means that your liver is "out of whack." But I know better; I have learned from experience, and when a woman has learned a lesson from that teacher, she is a fool no longer; and a Latin word as long as a boa constrictor could not detach her from that hardly-gained knowledge. My lesson? Well, I'll tell you about that.

We are, as a rule, a healthy lot; and had been as well as usual all winter, so that when one after another of my family fell a victim to some death-dealing malady, I was sorely puzzled to account for it.

I looked about for a cause, but so far as my knowledge went I saw none. The table, while not luxurious, was well supplied with wholesome food. The cooking was no worse than usual. The meals were regular, and yet John suddenly developed strong symptoms of dyspepsia.

IT was only at Christmas, that upon my remonstrating with him upon a tendency towards overeating, he assured me that he had the digestion of an ostrich, and the only limit to be set upon the capability of his stomach was its capacity. Yet, while the second month of the new year was still in its morning, here he was a victim of dyspepsia in its worst form. Melancholy had claimed him for her own; he made his will (my half to go to the children in case I married again; just as if I hadn't earned twice as much as all he owns) and he chose a spot to be buried in. His face grew long and solemn, and the children were not allowed to laugh in his presence.

He must have felt very miserable, judging from his success in making everyone else feel so. At last he went down to the drug department of the village store and bought a bottle of—never mind what; I'm not drawing commissions on free ads.—but whatever it was, it brought no relief to John, though he took it with the same regularity and faithfulness that a man always gives to a bitter dose—twice the first day, and a second portion three days later.

However, John was just; he didn't blame the medicine; but said "he thought his case was an unusually severe one, and that in all probability he was a doomed man." While the symptoms in John's case were rapidly growing worse and more numerous, Fred was seized with severe pains in his back; and at last he broke the news as gently as possible, that he expected to pass away before the summer waned, through the agency of kidney disease. He, too, purchased a well-advertised remedy, and took his doses every two hours; though the directions only asked you to step along towards the next bottle at the rate of three doses a day.

Fred said "he didn't believe in spending money on medicines and then not giving them a fair chance." Fred's medicine had its "fair chance" till the bottle was two-thirds emptied. I overheard eleven-year-old Joe telling him "he had better burn the cork and eat the powder so as to get everything there was in the bottle." But poor Fred was too near the grave to take kindly to childish jokes. His disease developed so rapidly that by potato planting he was unable to do a stroke of work.

Joe and I had to "help"—at least that's what John called it, though I maintain yet that John hindered Joe and me—in the planting of the potato crop. With this extra work added to housekeeping and the nursing of John and Fred, I was pretty well done out; so I could not fail to observe that Melinda, my daughter, was unable to help me, even to the extent of washing up the dishes. I turned to her woes, to learn that she was wasting away through a cough, which, unless speedily checked, would end in consumption.

I had noticed her little hacking, nervous cough, which I had taken for a disagreeable habit rather than any real disease, but she insisted that it was the first symptom of consumption.

I saw that she would be unhappy without her deadly complaint, so I gave in, and let her enjoy her misery. She asked me to get for her a particular preparation of cod liver oil, as this was the only known remedy for such a case as hers.

Now Melinda, as you know, can roll as well as she can walk, and I wondered if she would be obliged to omit walking, and roll altogether after her course of cod liver oil. However it did not increase her flesh any, for Melinda being fond of the good things of life, did not find cod liver oil, even in its most refined form, at all to her taste. She recovered quickly from consumption, and developed various symptoms of apoplexy; was afflicted with vertigo, almost by falling fits. I think the only thing that saved her was her inability to concentrate her mind firmly on her symptoms; the distraction being due to the fact that she was in doubt as to whether she was threatened with apoplexy or epilepsy. She asked me which I thought it was, and I was obliged to admit that there were one or two items regarding these diseases upon which I was not altogether certain. I could nearly always tell measles or smallpox within an hour after the health officer had gone round; a white flag meant measles and a yellow one smallpox. And without any assistane whatever, I could distinguish toothache from sciatica; but beyond this I was a complete failure, and always consulted a physician when I thought I needed rescuing from a premature grave.

And right there I discovered one peculiarity about my sickly family. They one and all declared against doctors. Their arguments sounded so much alike that I was amazed at the unity of ideas, particularly between Fred and Melinda; it is so unusual to see these two agree upon any subject.

THEN, too, there was a mystical, elusive familiarity in their arguments against the medical fraternity that haunted and yet puzzled me, till I settled it finally in my own mind as being a memory from a past incarnation. Whenever I fail to recall an idea clearly, and haven't time to look it up, I always shunt it on to a past incarnation. It's satisfactory, and saves bother.

Next I found Joe boiling the drinking water, as he explained, "to kill the typhoid germs." It seemed he already had it, "would take to his bed in another five days." I rose in rebellion; I simply could not run a ranch, a house and an hospital single-handed. Going to the big apple tree I cut a switch, and then interviewed Joe in the woodshed.

"Joe," I said, "you see this switch; now I'll wear it out across your back if you show any more symptoms of typhoid fever! I'm worn to death with dyspepsia and kidney complaint, consumption and apoplexy, and I won't have any more invalids in the family. Now tell the truth, Joe, and I'll let you

Continued on page 54

THE DRESSING TABLE

Edited by MARIE

THE winds of early spring-time that are so invigorating to wearied hearts which have grown tired of the long winter, are rather trying to the woman of delicate skin. There is a peculiar, "burning" quality in the March winds which leaves the nose and cheeks red and smarting. Some women are so fortunate as to be little affected by the most blustery roar which the March lion can produce, but most of us are sensitive to the breezes of early spring and prefer their attention in modified form. There are many good vanishing creams which may be applied to the face before one goes out on a windy day which will prevent the worst ravages of the boisterous breezes.

A veil is almost a necessity in the days of early spring, and the thin chiffon variety is the most appropriate. "Every spot in that veil means five dollars to an oculist," said a doctor to a woman who was wearing a veil dotted with a few huge "coin" spots—and, before many months had passed, the wearer realized that the doctor's words were only too true.

A home-made powder is preferred by many to the bought article, and here is a formula, given by an authority on matters of toilet preparation:

Pure rice powder, one ounce; powdered boric acid, twenty grains; powdered oxide of zinc (best quality), two ounces; powdered carbonate of magnesia, one ounce; oil of rose, two drops. Sift each ingredient through bolting cloth, throwing away all coarse particles. Combine and sift repeatedly, adding the oil of rose before the last sifting.

WOMEN who have a fondness for the perfume of sandalwood can supply themselves now with small sticks of the wood for perfuming their dresser drawers and closet compartments. The sticks retain their odor for an indefinite period, and when they seem to be on the point of losing their native fragrance an immersion in water will restore all their Oriental charm. Sandalwood perfume and toilet water are a fad among some women, who prefer this spicy aroma to others of flower-like daintiness. The sandalwood scent is fresh and inviting and it does not grow stale and unpleasant.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

TROUBLESOME—Well, you have given me quite a list of questions, which I shall answer to the best of my ability. 1. Deep breathing is an excellent exercise for developing the chest. The use of a good skin food on the neck would be beneficial for such a condition as you describe, but remember that results are not to be expected in a day. A diet of milk and eggs would help in the good work. 2. The three "foods" you men tion, especially the first, are to be re commended. You can understand that in this column it is not desirable to mention such articles directly. A stamped and addressed envelope for reply would enable me to send you information which must be given private ly. 3. The yellow or brown line on the neck may be caused by wearing the collar too tight. The use of the cream mentioned should prove beneficial. 4. The exercise you describe should result in improvement, if persisted in. 5. The recipe you quote is quite safe. 6. I would not care to say what is the best dentifrice. If you care to send stamped envelope, I shall give you a list of the most favorably known. Use dental floss, as well as a powder or paste, if you wish to keep the teeth in good condition. 7. If your hair is in the condition you mention, you are not washing it too often. If you could consult a good hair-dresser on your next visit to the city, there might be discovered some slight ailment of the scalp. 8. I could not undertake to advise as to the tonic you should use. I do not care for those which you mention and would advise that you consult a physician. Many of these "patent" remedies are worse than useless. Fresh air, sunshine and the proper diet are more to be desired than most drugs. We women make the pill proprietors rich by rushing off to the nearest drug store on the slightest provocation. Write again and tell me if you are better.

MRS. A.—I am replying to your note in the addressed envelope which you sent, but I may say here that a good cold cream is almost essential if one desires to keep the skin in good condition. As the years go by, Time does some unkind scribbling on forehead, cheeks and neck, and the cold cream is one method by which we may conceal some of his marks. In fact, he may be kept away much longer than we suppose by the use of simple "preservatives." The woman who obviously tries to look young has been ridiculed frequently. However unpleasant she may be when she over-powders and colors her face, she is not more distressing than she who has no regard for her personal appearance, and who is quite indifferent to shiny nose on stray locks. Only—remember that the skin should be treated delicately—not scrubbed as if it were a washboard.

CANOVA—I have not known the substance you inquire about to have such an effect as to make the hair come out. I am glad that yours is improving. Let me know how it progresses. I know nothing about the preparation you men tion. For the discoloration referred to, you might use a solution of peroxide of hydrogen, but be very careful to note instructions on the bottle, as a weak solution would probably be all that would be required.

The Spring Fashions in Hair Dressing

It is every woman's wish to have her hair well dressed. Particular people consider the proper care and arrangement of the hair, not as an exhibition of vanity, but as an expression of appreciation of propriety and good taste.

DORENWEND'S HAIR GOODS

represent the highest achievements of expert hair workers and challenge your impartial comparison

Our Handsome Illustrated Booklet "X" of Spring Fashions.

will be sent to you on request. This book illustrates and describes all the latest styles of hair dressing. WRITE NOW.

THE DORENWEND CO. of Toronto, Limited

The House of Quality Hair Goods

103-105 Yonge St., Toronto

Crow's-feet.

Yes, very disfiguring and aging. But you can avoid them all the same.
Never mind. Simply rub in Vinolia Cream—that will soften, and feed your skin, making it smooth as satin, flexible as elastic.

Royal Vinolia Cream

35 and 50c. On sale at all good Druggists and Stores 105

The Rosy Bloom On a Woman's Cheek

is the most alluring beauty in the world. It is a prize within reach of almost every woman, if she will but give proper attention to her skin and her general health.

The evil effects of raw winds, dust, extreme cold, working in overheated and steamy rooms or in bad air, can be counteracted by using

NA-DRU-CO Ruby Rose Cold Cream

This is a snowy-white preparation with a delicate rose perfume. It cleanses the skin, nourishes and fills out the deeper tissues, smoothes out wrinkles and imparts a velvety softness, free from roughness, redness or chaps. It keeps the skin healthy, and Nature supplies the rosy bloom.

In 25c. opal glass jars, at your Druggist's.

NA-DRU-CO Witch Hazel Cream is a delightfully soothing preparation of Witch Hazel, presenting all its wonderful cooling and healing properties in a most agreeable form.

For the skin irritation which winter brings—chaps, wind-burn, cracked lips, frost-bites or chilblain—it is a remedy as pleasant as it is effective.

25c. a bottle, at your Druggist's.

Always look for the Na-Dru-Co Trade Mark when you buy.

National Drug and Chemical Co. of Canada, Limited. 182

$1.00 for One and a Half Spare Hours

A lady who is getting subscriptions writes: "I have worked seven days and only 1½ hours a day." She earned $7.25. This was her first experience and she is confident of doing better There is a similar opportunity in every village, town and city for spare-time workers. Write for information. CIRCULATION DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

Gerhard Heintzman Pianos
Pianos of Prestige

Consider Only The Best

THE piano question is peculiar unto itself. Everything about a piano is vital to its tone or life and a weakness anywhere proves eventually to be like the bad apple in the barrel. In other words, there can hardly be "a pretty good piano"; it is good or it is not good.

The Gerhard Heintzman
Canada's Greatest Piano

has no weak feature. It has a construction, tone, quality and finish that eminent musicians, music lovers, yes, and competitors, look to with respect.

And this is no new thing---it has been true for a generation.

There can be no wiser choice than a

Gerhard Heintzman Piano

Your present instrument taken as part payment and convenient terms arranged.

Gerhard Heintzman, Limited

41-43 Queen St. West (Opposite City Hall) Toronto, Ont.

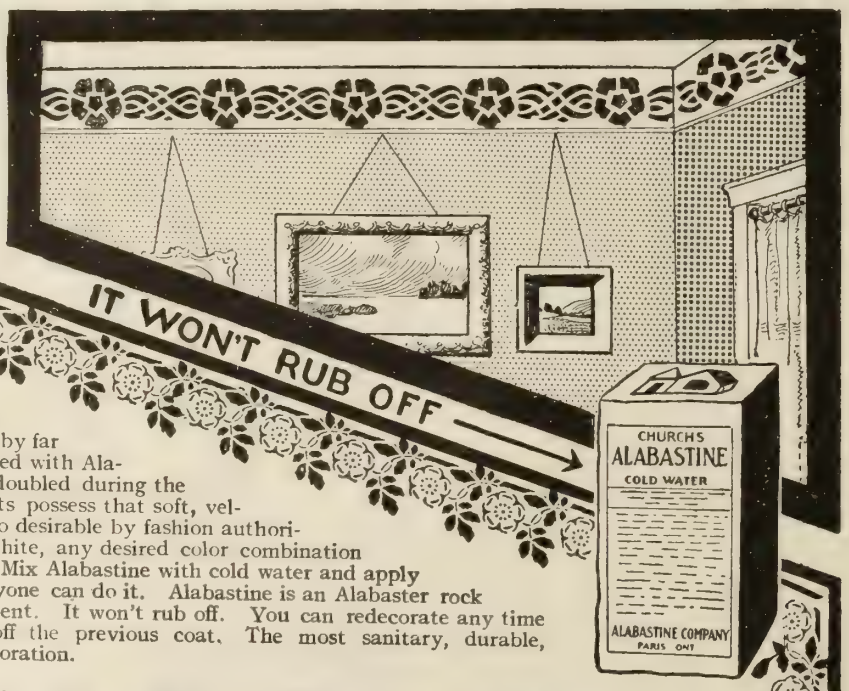
New Salesrooms in Hamilton, next to Post Office

J-66

Are Your Walls In Style



Kalsomine and wall paper are hardly up-to-date. Tinted walls are now the vogue. And by far the most popular are those tinted with Alabastine, the sale of which has doubled during the last two years. Alabastine tints possess that soft, velvety, restful effect considered so desirable by fashion authorities. With the 21 tints and white, any desired color combination can be produced quite easily. Mix Alabastine with cold water and apply with a flat bristle brush. Anyone can do it. Alabastine is an Alabaster rock cement. Its colors are permanent. It won't rub off. You can redecorate any time without scraping or washing off the previous coat. The most sanitary, durable, economical and stylish wall decoration.

CHURCH'S COLD WATER Alabastine

FREE STENCILS To enable those who use Alabastine to secure the most beautiful and artistic effects we will have our expert decorators prepare suitable Color Schemes free of charge, and in addition give Free Stencils. Write to-day for particulars and handsome booklet. For sale by all Hardware and Paint Dealers.

THE ALABASTINE CO., Limited
25 Willow St., Paris, Ont. 10

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Canadian Girls' Club

JUDGING from the letters we are getting it will not be long before dozens of members will have secured the little silver watch that I told you about in the February Journal. They will be a band of honor, a club within a club. It will be a reason for constant "boosting" of the Journal. Every member of the club will want the watch, but she will appreciate even more the honor of belonging to the watch circle. Listen to what they tell me.

Dear Secretary:—

What a splendid present the watch will be. I am sure I'll have it in a few weeks. It has been too stormy this winter to really do any work, though I have got an occasional subscription from my friends. But now that I can get out again, and with this special inducement, besides all the commission and bonus, I'll certainly give some of the leaders a hard run for their honors.

Very sincerely.

A WESTERNER.

That is what lots of members have written me. It certainly has been a hard winter—too bad to work—but after the winter's rest all the members will get busy again. There are lots of acquaintances, I am sure, who have to be told of the Journal, and renewals to collect.

Dear G. C. Secretary:—

You are always offering us something nice. I don't see how you can afford to do it. The commissions have been a great help to me. I do not know what I should have done for pin money without them. And now that you offer a watch in addition to these, I certainly will work. for I have always wanted one.

Very truly,

A. R.

The answer to "How can you afford it?" is that we are particularly anxious to have a good hustling member in every town, someone who knows a lot of people and whose opinion of a magazine has influence.

Then we do not have to bother about getting the renewals, confident that you will look after them. These same renewals, by the way, are the very best part of our subscription plan, for they are so easily secured, and pay just the same.

Dear Miss F.:—

Thanks very much for writing to me about the watch. You can look for me to be one of the first to receive it. It certainly is a splendid offer, the best, I think, of all you have made. . . The Girls' Club has been fine for me. I must send you a photograph of the room that has been decorated and refurnished "almost entirely from earnings in the Club."

Very sincerely,

R. L.

I am hoping to get that picture to place among the collection of photos of rooms in which the Girls' Club has an interest. They range from the girl's own sanctum, pretty and comfortable, that invites long conferences on personal things, to reception rooms and dining-rooms, and even kitchens, with shining aluminum ware. In some it is just a Morris chair or a comfortable rocker or curtains and wall paper or a gleaming toilet set, in othes a larger share.

Dear Secretary:—

I must annex that silver watch to add to my Club collection of pretty and useful things. I wish I had more time to work, but a busy housekeeper has her hands full most of the day. It is easy to champion the JOURNAL when I find it so attractive to me, and believe that all loyal Canadians should give their support. The subscribers I have secured are delighted with it, and I know I'll get renewals from nearly all of them.

Wishing you all success,

K. N.

Dear Miss F.:—

Please tell me all about the watch offer. I have already told a number of my friends that I am going to win a watch, and they have promised me their subscriptions. You will be surprised to hear from me after such a long time, since I did any work for the Club, but we moved out here and have been very busy settling in the new home. I am going to make this a JOURNAL town. My neighbors who have been reading my copies of the JOURNAL are delighted with it.

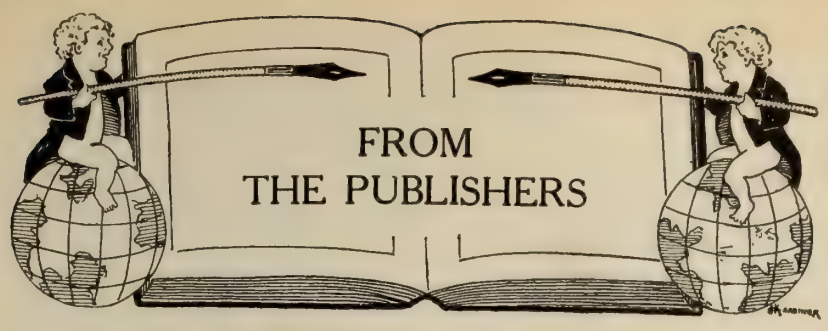
Yours sincerely,

F. B.

I feel sure that the Girls' Club and its members are going to have the most successful season in its history, and I hope that we will have hundreds of new members to share in our success. We will welcome them gladly, just write us to tell you all about the club.

THE SECRETARY.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL,
Toronto.



FROM William Briggs, Toronto, comes a biography which should be in every household, "The Story of Tecumseh," by Norman Gurd. Canadians are deplorably ill-informed concerning their own history, and in this respect may be compared unfavorably with their cousins in the States. The people of the neighboring republic may have gone too far in their spread-eagle type of patriotism, and may have exalted their great men into figures of impossible and extravagant heroism. However, we have erred on the other side, and have shown a regrettable slowness in acquainting ourselves with the prominent characters of Canadian history. Tecumseh is one of the most admirable and picturesque figures of the War of 1812-15, and showed a devotion to British interests which was not excelled by any of the generals of Saxon breed. He was a born warrior, and his death for the cause he loved gives him a place with the brave soldiers who have been ready to sacrifice all for the Empire. Kipling tells us that it is "on the bones of the English that the English flag is stayed." He might have gone further in his description of British evolution, for the deeds which won the Empire have often been accomplished by those of other race and color.

This story of Tecumseh is well and graphically told by the author, and the narrative is illustrated in spirited and historic fashion by Mr. C. W. Jefferys. In this book, it may be noted that the description of the Battle of Tippecanoe differs very much from the account of the Battle of Tippecanoe hitherto accepted. In the researches by the author he was fortunate enough to come across a despatch signed by Colonel Elliott, Superintendent of Indian Affairs at Amherstburg, to Major-General Brock, containing a full account of the battle as related to Colonel Elliott by a Kickapoo chief, who was present at the engagement. His description of the battle is founded on this Indian account, and on the account given in the pamphlet issued by the Louisville Historical Society written by Captain Pirtle of the American army, who had made a thorough examination of the archives at Washington. These accounts corroborated one another in many details, and differed from the account of the battle given by Drake in his Tecumseh, which was published in the early thirties, and by Eggleston, in his later work, published in 1878.

The book is one which teachers and parents should give to Canadian youth as a biography of one of the race which stood manfully by Britain throughout a critical conflict. It will be read with interest by all who enjoy a good story.

From the War of 1812-15 to the dark days of the Vendean War in France, is not such a very long jump backwards. In "Chantemerle," a story by D. K. Broster and G. W. Taylor, published by the same firm, we have a romance of the thrilling old-fashioned order. Lucienne, the heroine, is a vacillating but attractive heroine, whose charms win more hearts than one—and then the trouble begins. Gilbert and Louis, both ardent Royalists, fighting valiantly for a lost cause, are well-depicted in their contrasting characteristics, and we hardly know with which lover to sympathize, as the course of true love proceeds on its unsmooth way. The strongest and most memorable personality in this eminently readable story is that of M. des Graves, the priest who ministers to his bewildered and stricken people throughout the horrors of war and pillage. "Chantemerle" is a story you will find worth while.

"My Lady Caprice," also from Briggs, is by Jeffery Farnol, the English novelist who made such a success of "The Broad Highway" last year. This story of a heroine of many moods was written at an earlier date than "The Broad Highway," but is now being republished, by reason, no doubt of the latter's great popularity. "My Lady Caprice" is a dainty bit of fiction which may be read in an hour and which will afford pleasing diversion for those who enjoy a story of love-in-idleness. The Imp is a small boy of engaging pranks whom we shall hope to meet again.

The Song of Life

Continued from page 11

"Oh, nothing much," she answered. The sun through the western window, or some other flame, nearly blinded her eyes with joy. "I could see the flowers in that side window, right up there on the road. What daffodils!"

"Eh, they're gay bits of flowers," answered the hostess, joyfully.

"And you grow them here yourself?"

"Where else? My bulbs lie in the dark all winter, ye ken, but by the first of March they get that green you can almost see them pricking up through the earth in these tubs I plant 'em in. They cry out for the sun. And I let 'em have it. They grow so fast there is a windowful by April."

"It's my only way of Easter," she continued gaily. "I never get to the church, as I am crippled with rheumatism. So I send these along to our meeting-house on the next concession. You'd pass it on the way. A fine red building it is. Sam used to carry 'em down every year, regular as Easter Sunday morning came. He was took away last year. It was awful sudden—the only son I had. Neighbors say I'm too old to grieve over Sam like I would if it had been that he and I was both younger. But it ain't that"—she walked over to the side window so blazing in green and gold—"it ain't that. It's just I've got to know something lately—that, we all go on—through the dark, like these daffodils, to the spring. He ain't dead. You don't need to tell me that, any more than these flowers will die in a week or so. They've roots, ain't they? They all come again. . . . Well, here's your young man I guess. And hope you're warm again. . . . I'm sure I'm glad you came in."

And then—after a breathless proposal. . . . "A story? Me, to have given you a story! And for the Weekly Sun! Why, we've took that paper as long as I can remember. They did used to say Pa believed every word of it, like the Bible itself. I guess the Sun is about the biggest paper in America. And to put me into it and this kitchen—into a photo—why, I ain't even got it spring-cleaned yet. Come right along tomorrow. The daffodils will look beautiful. Bring your young man, too, I like his looks. . . ."

Back through the deepening day, to their little city-of-life, rode two who had found the springtime through gates of Faith and Work.

The Evening Luxury

"SALADA"

CEYLON TEA

012

Anticipated with delight by all who use it

LEAD PACKETS ONLY. BLACK, MIXED OR GREEN.

AT ALL GROCERS.

HIGHEST AWARD—ST. LOUIS, 1904.

A Monumental Work

The Canadian Men and Women of the Time

A Handbook of Canadian Biography of Living Characters

—Edited by—

HENRY J. MORGAN, M. A., LL.D., D. C. L., F. R. S. C.

Second Edition, Cloth, with frontispieces, over 1200 pages.

PRICE, $4.00 NET, POSTPAID

This work is indispensable to all Canadians who wish to keep in touch with the men and women of the time who are making history.

JUST ISSUED

New Volume in the CANADIAN HEROES SERIES

The Story of Tecumseh

BY

NORMAN R. GURD, B.C.L.

Uniform with "THE STORY OF ISAAC BROCK"

By WALTER R. NURSEY

Cloth, ornamented with insets in colors on cover. Profusely illustrated, containing five illustrations in colors from original paintings by noted Canadian artists, and nineteen illustrations in sepia from photographs and sketches.

$1.00 Net - Postpaid

Every boy and girl in the country should have the volumes of the CANADIAN HEROES SERIES on his or her bookshelf

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS OR FROM

William Briggs

Publisher -:- 29-37 Richmond St. W. -:- Toronto, Ont.

THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS

$1.25 By ISABEL ECCLESTONE MACKAY With Color Frontispiece by Dudley Tennant $1.25

One of the most remarkable books by a Canadian Author that has been published for Years

¶ That this wonderful story of an abducted child with its marvellous witchery of plot and action will be read everywhere is a foregone conclusion.

¶ The malignant revenge carried out with superhuman cunning by a deranged woman forms the groundwork of a story that will immediately take its place amongst the talked of books.

¶ That a story built upon revenge should overflow with the most beautiful of human passions—affection, courage, persistency and devotion shows the great versatility of the author's powers.

¶ Read "The House of Windows," it will grasp you with the intensity of its action and the reality of its actors.

Ask Your Local Bookseller to Show You a Copy

Cassell & Co., Limited, Publishers, 42 Adelaide Street West, Toronto

Other Recommended Books

By H. Rider Haggard
MARIE
$1.25

By E. Philips Oppenheim
THE DOUBLE FOUR
$1.25

By G. K. Chesterton
THE INNOCENCE OF FATHER BROWN
$1.25

Two Good Detective Stories and a thrilling novel. Make your own choice

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

IF YOU ARE USING A
cheap grade of coffee, a few cents extra per pound will give you an immeasurably finer beverage worth many times the extra expenditure.
A trial of Seal Brand
coffee will prove it.
PACKED IN ONE AND TWO POUND CANS ONLY
CHASE & SANBORN
MONTREAL
131

House of Windows

Continued from page 10

sides you are a sick man yet, and these people are dangerous. If it came to a struggle, what chance would you have?"

Mark slipped a serviceable pistol out of his pocket. "I'm a dead shot," he said cheerfully. "I wouldn't need to commit murder in order to effectually disable any undesirable opponent. And I feel quite sure that they will not be on their guard against me. I am known to be a sort of useless fellow, and I have been back from Europe for such a short time—most of which I spent in Vancouver—that it is ten to one against their knowing me by sight. Besides—well, the other is a sentimental reason."

"Let's have it anyway."

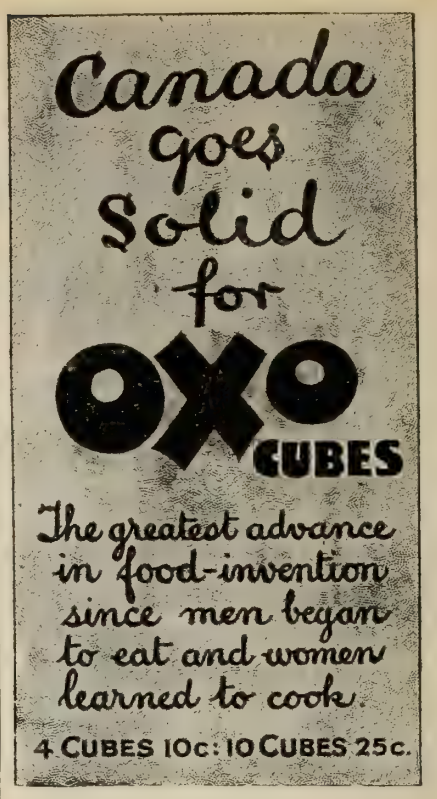
"Well, you see, the one ride Miss Christine and I took together was along that very road and to that very inn. I showed her a way to make the motor horn, which is out of order, scream like a banshee. If she is anywhere in that inn she would remember the sound of it, I am sure. That would put her on the watch for some way to help us. She would recognize my voice also if I could get within hearing distance—and," bluntly, "I do not think that any one of you (except the governor, whom they know by sight), could possibly have the thing at heart quite as I have."

"Think we might fall down on the job, do you?" grinned the big detective. "But there may be something in what you say. Only there must be modification of the plan. You do not realize how desperate these people will be. Now, how long do you think you will need to convince yourself whether or not the girl is in the house?"

"A half an hour—twenty minutes ought to do it."

"It would certainly give the thing away if you loafed longer than that. Well, then, in twenty minutes a second auto will be on hand, and on it will be reinforcements. Mr. Torrance, Mr. Burns, Cunningham and myself. We

MURESCO
Only One Coat Required. Easy to apply.
Muresco can be applied by anyone, to any kind of surface. It will not rub off or peel, shows no laps, spots or brush marks, and is the only material producing that flat, subdued, velvety effect, so much admired. It is made in a large variety of handsome tints and colors, also white. Ready for use when mixed with hot water. It can be recoated any number of times and removed easily by washing when desired, thus insuring walls being kept in perfect condition. Beware of wall finishes containing lime or plaster that cannot be removed by washing when desired; they are neither practical nor sanitary, and will eventually peel off, leaving the walls in ruined condition.
Muresco is in use by the best decorators in the country, and sold by leading paint dealers everywhere.
Send for sample cards, descriptive matter and prices.
BENJAMIN MOORE & CO
Limited
Sole Mfgs., Toronto, Canada
New York Chicago Carteret Cleveland



Canada goes Solid for OXO CUBES
The greatest advance in food-invention since men began to eat and women learned to cook.
4 CUBES 10c: 10 CUBES 25c.

Webb's
Chocolates
for people who want the best
THE
Harry Webb Co., Limited
TORONTO, CAN.

$100 For a $100 SHORT STORY
This is an average price paid by large American magazines for a good story.
WE TEACH YOU HOW to successfully write stories that will sell.
The Magazines Go Begging for bright interesting stories.
This Appeal is to You—Learn How
Cut out this ad and mail to-day for particulars.
Name.....
Address.....
The Shaw Correspondence School
391-397 Yonge St., Tnronto

Royal Victoria College
McGILL UNIVERSITY
MONTREAL
For Resident and Day Students. Students prepared for degrees in Arts, Pure Science and Music. Scholarships are awarded annually. For all information apply to the Warden.

$3 a Day Sure
Send us your address and we will show you how to make $3 a day absolutely sure; we furnish the work and teach you free; you work in the locality where you live. Send us your address and we will explain the business fully; remember we guarantee a clear profit of $3 for every day's work, absolutely sure, write at once.
ROYAL MANUFACTURING CO., Box 1713, WINDSOR, ONT.

Sweethearts for everybody!
Once you or yours realize the rich, wholesome savor of crisp, toasted flaky hearts of sweetest sugar corn, you'll banish porridge from your breakfast menu. It will be 'sweethearts for everybody' OFTENER than once a day when you offer 41
Kellogg's
TOASTED
CORN FLAKES
Ten Cents A Package
Kellogg's
TOASTED CORN FLAKES
W. K. Kellogg
BATTLE CREEK
TOASTED CORN FLAKE CO.
LONDON, CANADA.
The sweet heart of the corn

MEXICAN RICE

TRY this Mexican or Spanish dish for your husband, and see if he won't like it. Three strips of bacon fried until crisp, one-third cupful of rice browned in bacon grease, four good-sized tomatoes, one large pepper and a medium-sized onion—all cut up together and poured over the rice and bacon. As it cooks, add water enough to keep the rice from sticking. Cook slowly for three-quarters of an hour, and add salt and a small piece of butter when ready to serve.

CARROT GINGER

SCRAPE and boil some carrots and mash them, and to each pound of pulp allow three-quarters of a pound of sugar, and to every three pounds of pulp the grated rind of a lemon and two ounces of powdered ginger. Boil for half an hour and you will have a delicious jam.

CREOLE PUFFS

BLANCH half pound almonds, finely shred half of them and dry slowly in the oven; put quarter cup boiling water and half cup sugar in a saucepan, and as soon as it boils add the remaining almonds and cook until the syrup is of a golden brown color; turn into a pan, cool, and finely pound; beat the whites of four eggs till stiff, add gradually one and a quarter cups powdered sugar, half teaspoon vanilla, almonds and quarter teaspoon salt; put into shape, sprinkle with the shredded almonds and sift sugar over them. Bake in a slow oven for twenty-five minutes.

SCOTCH WAFERS

SCOTCH wafers are well adapted for children's luncheons and also are much enjoyed by convalescents. Mix one cup fine oatmeal, one cup rolled oats, two cups flour, quarter cup sugar, one teaspoon salt, one-third teaspoon soda; melt quarter cup butter or lard in half cup hot water and add to mixture, toss on a floured board, roll as thin as possible, cut in strips with a sharp knife and bake on a buttered sheet in a slow oven.

POTATO SCRUB

BOIL and mash six good-sized potatoes, add salt, pepper, and butter to taste. Put into a baking dish, sift over the top one-half cupful of grated bread-crumbs, pour over the whole one-half cupful of sweet cream, and bake twenty minutes.

MAPLE PUDDING

A DELICIOUS pudding that is easily made, and is nicer than ice cream, is as follows: whip four eggs very light, add gradually, constantly beating, one cup of well warmed but not hot maple syrup. Put on fire in double boiler and stir till it resembles rich cream. Set aside and when nearly cold add one pint of rich whipped cream. Do not add any liquid cream. Pack in salted ice for five hours. Do not stir.

CABINET PUDDING

BUTTER a mould or pudding dish and scatter in it bits of candied orange peel, chopped nuts, chopped raisins or currants, or a mixture of these; fill the dish nearly full of bits of broken cake, and through it add more bits of fruit or nuts; mix a cup of milk with two tablespoonfuls of sugar, the beaten yolks of two eggs, and a pinch of salt; pour this a little at a time over the cake; cover tightly, and set in a pan of boiling water in the oven and bake an hour, or till it is firm. Turn out and serve with a fruit sauce.

RICE LOAF

STILL another way of utilizing odd scraps of meat is this: Chop the meat, put into the frying-pan with gravy or water, season well, and let it simmer till it is hot and smooth; thicken with a spoonful of flour rubbed with one of butter. Cook half a cup of rice till very tender and dry; season well; butter generously a bread-tin or any mould, and line it with the rice, pressing it firmly; in the centre put the meat, draining it if it is not thick; cover with more rice, and bake in a pan of boiling water in the oven half an hour; turn out on a hot dish and serve as it is, passing gravy in a boat, or put a tomato sauce around it. Croquettes are, of course, one of the best ways of using up meat.

CHEESE PUDDING

BUTTER a baking-dish, and put in thin slices of bread on the bottom and sides; lay on this slices of American cheese; salt well, and add a sprinkling of cayenne and a tiny bit of baking-soda; repeat till the dish is full, with cheese on top; pour on milk to just cover, and set in a hot oven for about half an hour or till the dish puffs and browns; serve at once.

SALMON CUTLETS

DRAIN and pick up a small can of salmon; add sufficient thick white sauce to make a paste; season well, spread it out, and let it grow firm; cut into chop shape, dip in fine crumbs, and egg, and let it stand an hour; fry two at a time in deep fat; put a bit of parsley stem in the small end of each one.

FIG TAPIOCA

COOK till clear three tablespoonfuls of granulated tapioca in two cups of water with a teaspoonful of butter. Stir constantly. Chop fine half a pound of figs, add a cup of water, and one of sugar; cook these till smooth and thick, and cool; mix the tapioca, and add half a teaspoonful of vanilla. Chill well, and serve in glasses with a little whipped cream on top.

ORANGE COMPOTE

PEEL small seedless oranges; dip each one into syrup made of boiled sugar and water so stiff it will thread; pile up the oranges one at a time on a glass dish, and slowly pour over what is left of the syrup till all are well coated; serve very cold with whipped cream around the base.

CHOCOLATE CREAMS

MAKE a fondant of a pound of granulated sugar and a little over a gill of boiling water. Boil until the mixture threads, then drop a little into iced water, and when it can be rolled into a ball between the thumb and finger it is done. Season with vanilla, and beat the mixture until soft and white; then knead with the fingers to a soft doughlike mass and form into round balls. Spread these on waxed paper to dry. Melt in a double boiler a cake of sweet chocolate. Run a tiny skewer or a stiff wire into each cream ball, roll it over and over in the melted chocolate, then set on waxed paper until dry.

CREAM CANDY

Put two cupfuls of granulated sugar and one cupful of brown sugar into a saucepan and pour over this one cupful of water and two tablespoonfuls of vinegar. Cook until it hardens, when put in cold water. Pour into pan and cool. Then pull for about thirty minutes, then cut into small pieces with scissors. Set aside to cool. When thoroughly chilled put into quart jars and seal tightly. In a couple of days you will have the finest cream candy you ever ate. Flavor with peppermint and you have something for "after dinner mints."

This Costly Process-- Why Foods Are Shot From Guns

Most people imagine that Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are made to be merely enticing.

That the grains are exploded—puffed to eight times normal size—just to make them porous. thin-walled, nut-like. crisp.

But these foods were invented by a college professor—an expert on foods. And his whole object was to make them digestible, so every atom feeds.

Blasted Grains

The whole object of this costly process is to change the moisture in the grain to steam.

Then to cause an explosion—a separate explosion inside of each granule of grain.

This blasts the food granules to pieces, so digestion can act. All the other results are merely incidental.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c
Except in Extreme West

But you merely see gigantic grains, with countless cells surrounded by toasted walls.

You taste crisp, nut-like whole grain foods, ready to melt in the mouth.

And people forget, in sheer delight, that these foods were designed to be healthful.

How to Serve

For breakfast, serve with cream and sugar. Or mix with any fruit.

For supper or luncheon, serve like crackers in a bowl of milk.

Let boys at play eat them like peanuts. Let girls make candy with them.

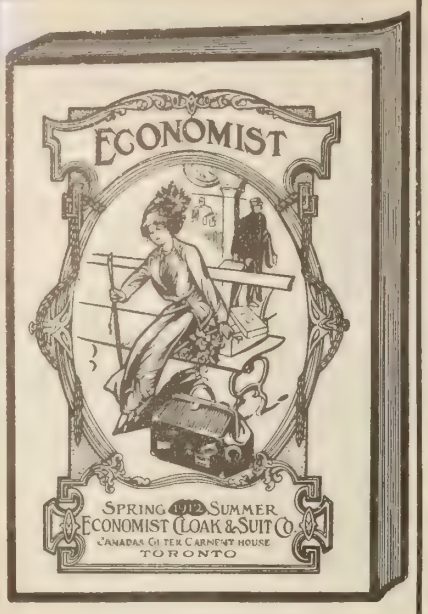
In pastry making use them just like nuts.

Almost a million dishes a day are being served in these ways. Do your folks get their share?

Telephone your grocer now.

The Quaker Oats Company

Sole Makers—Peterborough



LADIES!

We Have a Copy of This Style Book for You

This picture is a reproduction of the front cover of the Economist Style Book. We want every women reader of this paper to have a copy and if you will send us your name and address, will mail one to you FREE.

Thousands of Canadian women use our "Style Book" always, to assist them in purchasing their clothing, Suits, Coats, Dresses, Millinery, etc. All goods shown in the Style Book and bought from us carry our guarantee of

Satisfaction to You or Money Refunded

We would like to convince you at our Risk, that by buying from the Economist Style Book you can dress in the latest fashion, in garments that from every standpoint are exceptional value for your money.

Write to-day for Your Copy

Department H. J.

The Economist Cloak & Suit Company
"Canada's Outer Garment House"
TORONTO, ONTARIO

Why accept inferior Preserves when

UPTON'S ORANGE MARMALADE

can be procured at a reasonable price? You are absolutely sure of obtaining a pure preserve because nothing is contained in Upton's Marmalade but the choicest, selected oranges, imported direct from Spain, and the highest grade granulated sugar.

Ask Your Grocer for Upton's Marmalade

Sold in one pound jars and five pound pails

J.36

AUNT MARY ANN

Continued from page 8

had tried to be such a help at the time of the wedding, and had ended by being so in the way. As Hilda had no mother, she had offered to take her mother's place, coming over every evening, for a fortnight previous to the event, to watch the progress of the trousseau, to praise and to admire and hinder Hilda with her sewing. One night she had brought two gifts—a centre piece and a d'oyley, with calling cards attached, from Julia and herself, and three times she had reminded Hilda "not to get the cards mixed."

But the climax had come when Hilda finally agreed to let her run the luncheon, and Aunt Mary Ann, waiting on the table herself, had gone from guest to guest with the enquiry: "There are seven courses. Will you have soup?"

A firm, springy step on the walk brought her back to the present. She was in the hall, and had the light turned on before her husband could open the door.

He let in a draught of cold air and she snuggled into his embrace for he had been away since the day before.

"I can look up to you," she said, kissing the cleft in his chin.

"Who was insinuating that you could not, little girl?" said Clayton.

"No one. But Aunt Mary Ann advised me to marry a tall man. She said more trouble came through not being able to look up to your husband than through anything else."

"I hope you'll always be able to do that, little woman. Speaking of Aunt Mary Ann, she was on the train yesterday. She was taking a basket of live stock to the city—a clothes basket—hens, I think it was. She got off at every station between here and Brighton for fear she would miss her own. The fourth time I saw the conductor pick her up in his arms—basket and all—and deposit her on the platform of the train. He was ripping mad, and he told her that if she dared to get off again before she reached her destination she might stay there."

"Oh, Clayton. Why didn't you look after her?"

"We were on different cars; and, to be frank, I dislike traveling with fussy people. Is supper ready, dear? I'm famished."

Hilda hurried out to the kitchen. Her husband followed her and thrusting a hand into his coat pocket, drew out the mail. There was one letter for Hilda, which he threw on the kitchen table.

"What does that mean?" he asked, a little coldly.

Hilda turned from the stove in surprise, and picking up the letter, which had been opened, drew forth the single sheet and perused its contents swiftly.

"It's the end of the year," she said, looking her husband frankly in the eyes, "and there is a deficit in the church funds. All the members were asked to help wipe it out. I am a member, so I sent ten dollars."

"I thought it was addressed to me or I would not have opened it," said Clayton. "There's just one thing that I wish to be fully understood, Hilda, you may have all the money you want to spend on yourself, but I don't believe in subscribing to the church or to foreign missions. I was brought up in a house where all the spare money was given to the church, and I saw my mother wear her life out slaving and slaving, and trying to make ends meet."

She lifted the supper, and all through the meal there was a grim silence.

Later, when the dishes were washed, she threw herself on the divan and closed her eyes.

Clayton took up a book and pretended to read. Finally the tension grew unbearable. He threw down his book, and crossing the room, knelt beside the divan.

"What is it, dear?" he asked.

"My head aches."

"Oh, Clayton," she cried, taking his big hand in two of hers, "I can't bear to quarrel."

Clayton lifted her head from the pillow and held her close.

"We won't, dear," he said.

"I think I would always rather give in to you than have any coldness spring up between us—even when I thought you were in the wrong." Clayton held her closer.

"You grow more alike after you've been married awhile—unconsciously." Hilda shivered.

"Clayton, dear, would you like me to be like Aunt Mary Ann when I'm old?"

"Heaven forbid!"

"And yet at my age she was soft and pretty and pliable—generous, too."

"It's a big stretch of imagination," said Clayton, drolly.

"Clayton" — Hilda's fingers closed tensely over her husband's—"when we were married you asked me if I would like a regular allowance, and I said 'No.' May I change my mind?" There was a long silence.

At last Clayton spoke. "Am I such a miser, little girl, that you alter your mind in four months? All that is mine is yours, dear, and to-morrow I shall see that our bank account is made joint. And"—he drew a deep breath as though the resolution cost him something—"you may spend the money as you like."

"Thank you, dear."

SPRING ALMANACS

Continued from page 46

off on this whipping. Where did you get those symptoms of typhoid you told me you had?"

Joe whimpered a little; but soon solved the mystery of all our troubles by the astonishing confession: "I got 'em outen a nalmanac over in Fred's room!"

"Goodness gracious!" exclaimed I, dropping the stick. "I believe the whole family got their sickness 'outen a nalmanac.'"

That elusive memory wasn't from a past incarnation after all: it was just the same old almanacial theory.

"Joe," said I suddenly, "you're a treasure to your mother." And in my exuberance of gratitude I made a foolish offer. "I'll bake you a turnover for every almanac you find and burn," I promised. "We will clear the atmosphere of 'symptoms,' and that will be equal to destroying germs."

Then I went to Fred's room. On the wall at the side of his bed hung his source of misery. I opened its pages only to be surprised at the many symptoms of kidney disease which were my own daily companions, though they had not held my attention before. I often had a pain in the back—especially after doing my own work, and then helping the men folks out on theirs, weeding a couple of hours. "That tired feeling," well I guess every rancher's wife has that occasionally.

Fred's almanac pointed to the disease with one hand, and to the "cure" with the other, while it preached loudly of the failures of doctors to help the patient even. In Melinda's room was another death indicator, and I grew so dizzy over its many and intricate paths to the grave as almost to believe that I too was either apoplectic or epileptic.

On the sitting-room table lay a hotbed of dyspepsia which John had just left off studying, to lie on the lounge and moan as he gripped his waist between two weak hands. No wonder he thought he was doomed. No man could revel in all those symptoms daily and live. I gathered all these sources of contagion and destroyed them by fire. The remnants of the "cures" I collected and poured down the drain.

A few days later I found that my indebtedness to Joe amounted to thirty-two turnovers. He had proven himself a financier on a sure proposition, and had begged from the stores and borrowed from the neighbors many extra almanacs before I wakened to his methods; thereby earning for himself a steady diet of pastry. But the family, lacking fuel to feed the fires of imagination, became healthy and able-bodied once more.

And this is the lesson I learned from experience, in answer to that question, "Why?"

BENGER'S FOOD

Wherever there is a case of enfeebled digestion, whether from advancing age, illness, or general debility, there is a case for Benger's Food.

When the stomach becomes weakened, the digestion of ordinary food becomes only partial, and at times is painful, little of the food is assimilated, and the body is consequently insufficiently nourished.

This is where Benger's Food helps. It contains in itself the natural digestive principles, and is quite different from any other food obtainable.

All doctors know and approve of its composition, and prescribe it freely.

For INFANTS, INVALIDS, AND THE AGED.

The "British Medical Journal" says: "Benger's Food has, by its excellence, established a reputation of its own."

BENGER'S NEW BOOKLET deals with the most common doubts and difficulties which mothers have to encounter. It is sent post free on application to Benger's Food, Ltd., Otter Works, Manchester, England.

Benger's Food is sold in tins by Druggists, etc., everywhere.

B19

A Good First Impression

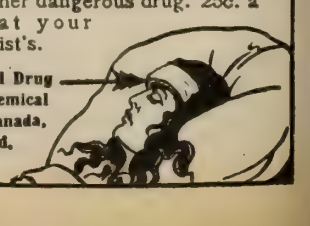
At a little cost you can insure a good first impression by touching up your hall furniture with "LACQUERET." Why not brighten up your Hat Rack, Hall Seat, Staircase, etc. Your guests will notice these on entrance.
Light Oak, Dark Oak or Mahogany "Lacquret" on those furnishings will work wonders.
Or if you wish to retain the original effect, try clear "Lacqueret" on any piece of woodwork.
It's effect is almost magical.
Our little book, "Dainty Decorator," tells of the many uses of "Lacqueret" in the home.
A copy is waiting for you, free for the asking.
Cans contain full imperial measure. Ask your dealer. Don't accept a substitute.

International Varnish Co., Limited
Toronto - Winnipeg H2

Sick headaches—neuralgic headaches—splitting, blinding headaches—all vanish when you take

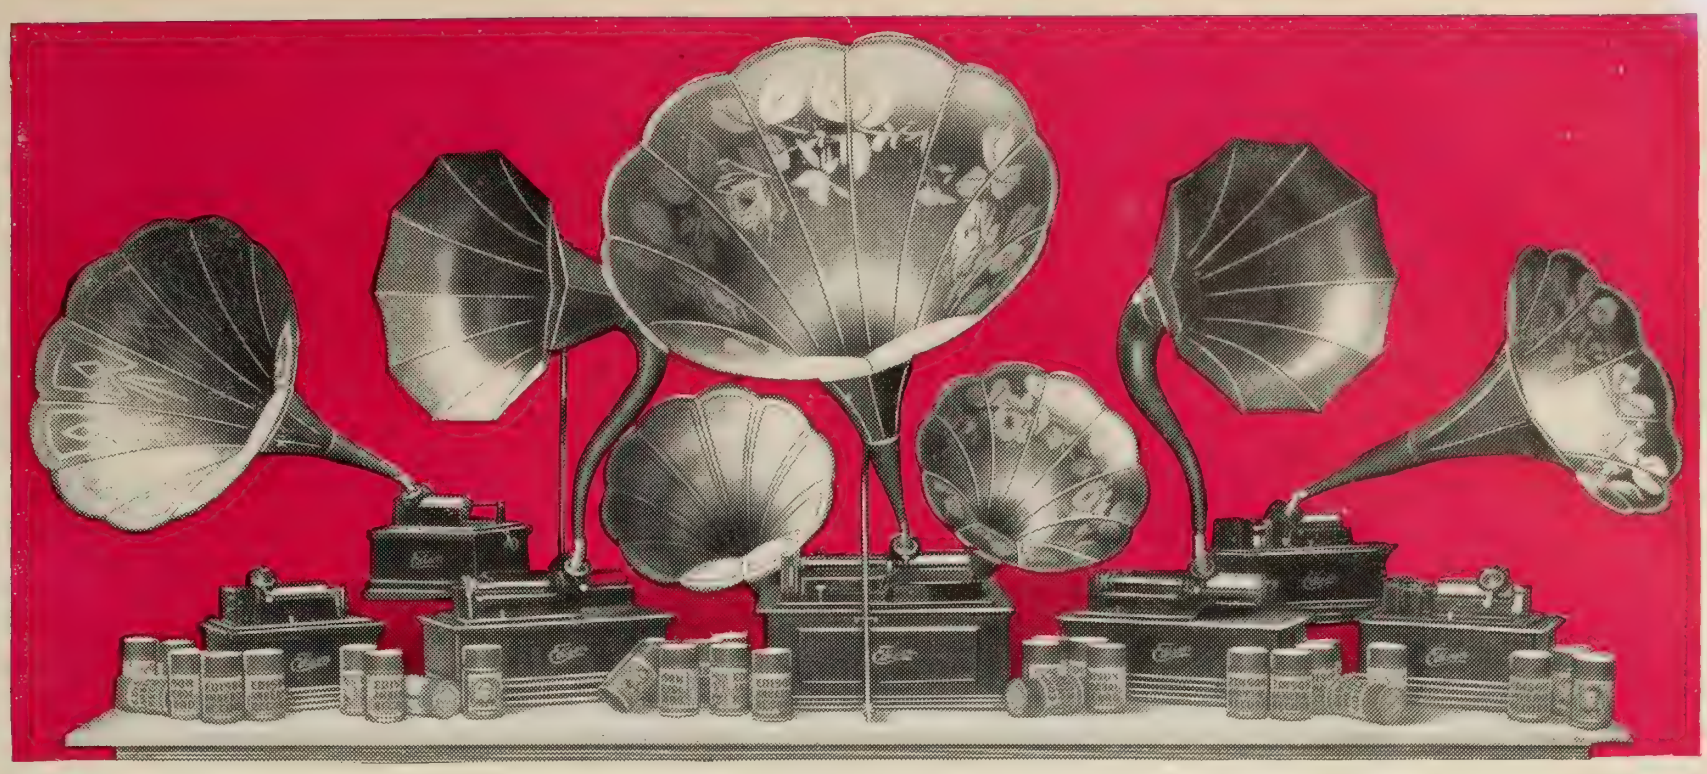
Na-Dru-Co Headache Wafers

They do not contain phenacetin, acetanilid, morphine, opium or any other dangerous drug. 25c. a box at your Druggist's.



National Drug and Chemical Co. of Canada, Limited.

130



YOUR CHOICE Of These Wonderful New Style EDISONS Shipped FREE

THE EDISON! THE GENUINE EDISON!—Thomas A. Edison's superb new style instrument shipped free on this REMARKABLE offer

Mr. Edison Says: "I want to see a Phonograph in every American Home."

For the Phonograph is Mr. Edison's pet and hobby. He has worked for years to make this Phonograph excel all others, and now you may obtain any of these wonderful new style outfits on an ultra liberal offer.

Just Take Your Choice You Don't Have to Buy Anything

The Edison Offer:

We will send you a New Model Edison Phonograph and your choice of all the Amberol records on an absolutely free loan—no obligations, no deposit, no guarantee nor C. O. D. to us whatever. We want you to have all the waltzes, two-steps, vaudevilles, minstrels, grand operas, also the sacred music, etc., by the world's greatest artists. Entertain your family and your friends. Give plays and concerts right in your own parlor. Hear the songs, solos, duets and quartettes, the pealing organ, the brass bands, the symphony orchestras, the choirs of Europe's great cathedrals, the piano and violin virtuoso concerts—all these we want you to hear free as reproduced on the Edison phonograph. Then—when you are through with the outfit—send it back to us.

Endless Fun

Such a variety of entertainment! Hear the latest up-to-date song hits of the big cities. Laugh until the tears stream down your face and your sides ache from laughing at the funniest of funny minstrel shows. Hear the majestic choirs sing the famous anthems just as they sing them in the cathedrals of Europe. Hear the pealing organs, the crashing brass bands, the waltzes, the two-steps, the solos, duets and quartettes. Yes—an endless variety of entertainment. You will sit awe-stricken at the wonderful grand operas as sung by the world's greatest singers. You will be moved by the tender, sweet harmony of the quartettes singing those dear old melodies that you have heard all your life. Take your choice of any kind of entertainment. All will be yours with the Edison in your home. Send coupon today.

Our Reason:

Why should we make such an ultra-liberal offer? Why should we go to all this expense and trouble just so you can have these free concerts? Well we'll tell you. We are tremendously proud of this new instrument. When you get it in your town we know everybody will say that nothing like it has ever been heard—so wonderful, so beautiful, such a king of entertainers—so we are sure that at least some one—if not you, then somebody else, will want to buy one of these new style Edisons (especially as they are being offered now at the most astounding rock-bottom price—and on easy terms as low as $2.00 a month). Perhaps you yourself will be glad to keep this outfit. But even if nobody buys we'll be glad anyway that we sent you the new Edison on the free loan—for that is our way of advertising quickly its wonderful superiority.

Now Then Get Free the New Edison Book

We will send you our handsome new Edison book and full particulars of our wonderful free loan offer absolutely free and prepaid. You should see our grand new Edison book. It will give you the list of thousands of records and all the machines you have to choose from. Write to-day—do not delay. Get the free book and learn about this wonderful free trial offer. Send postal or letter, or just the coupon, without any letter—but WRITE NOW.

Edison Phonograph Distributers

For the free catalog address the Vice-Pres. and Mgr., F.K. BABSON

355 Portage Ave., Dept. 8124, Winnipeg, Canada

Western Office—65 Post St., San Fransico, Cal. U. S. A. Office—Edison Block Chicago, Ill.

Free Catalog Coupon

Edison Phonograph Distributers

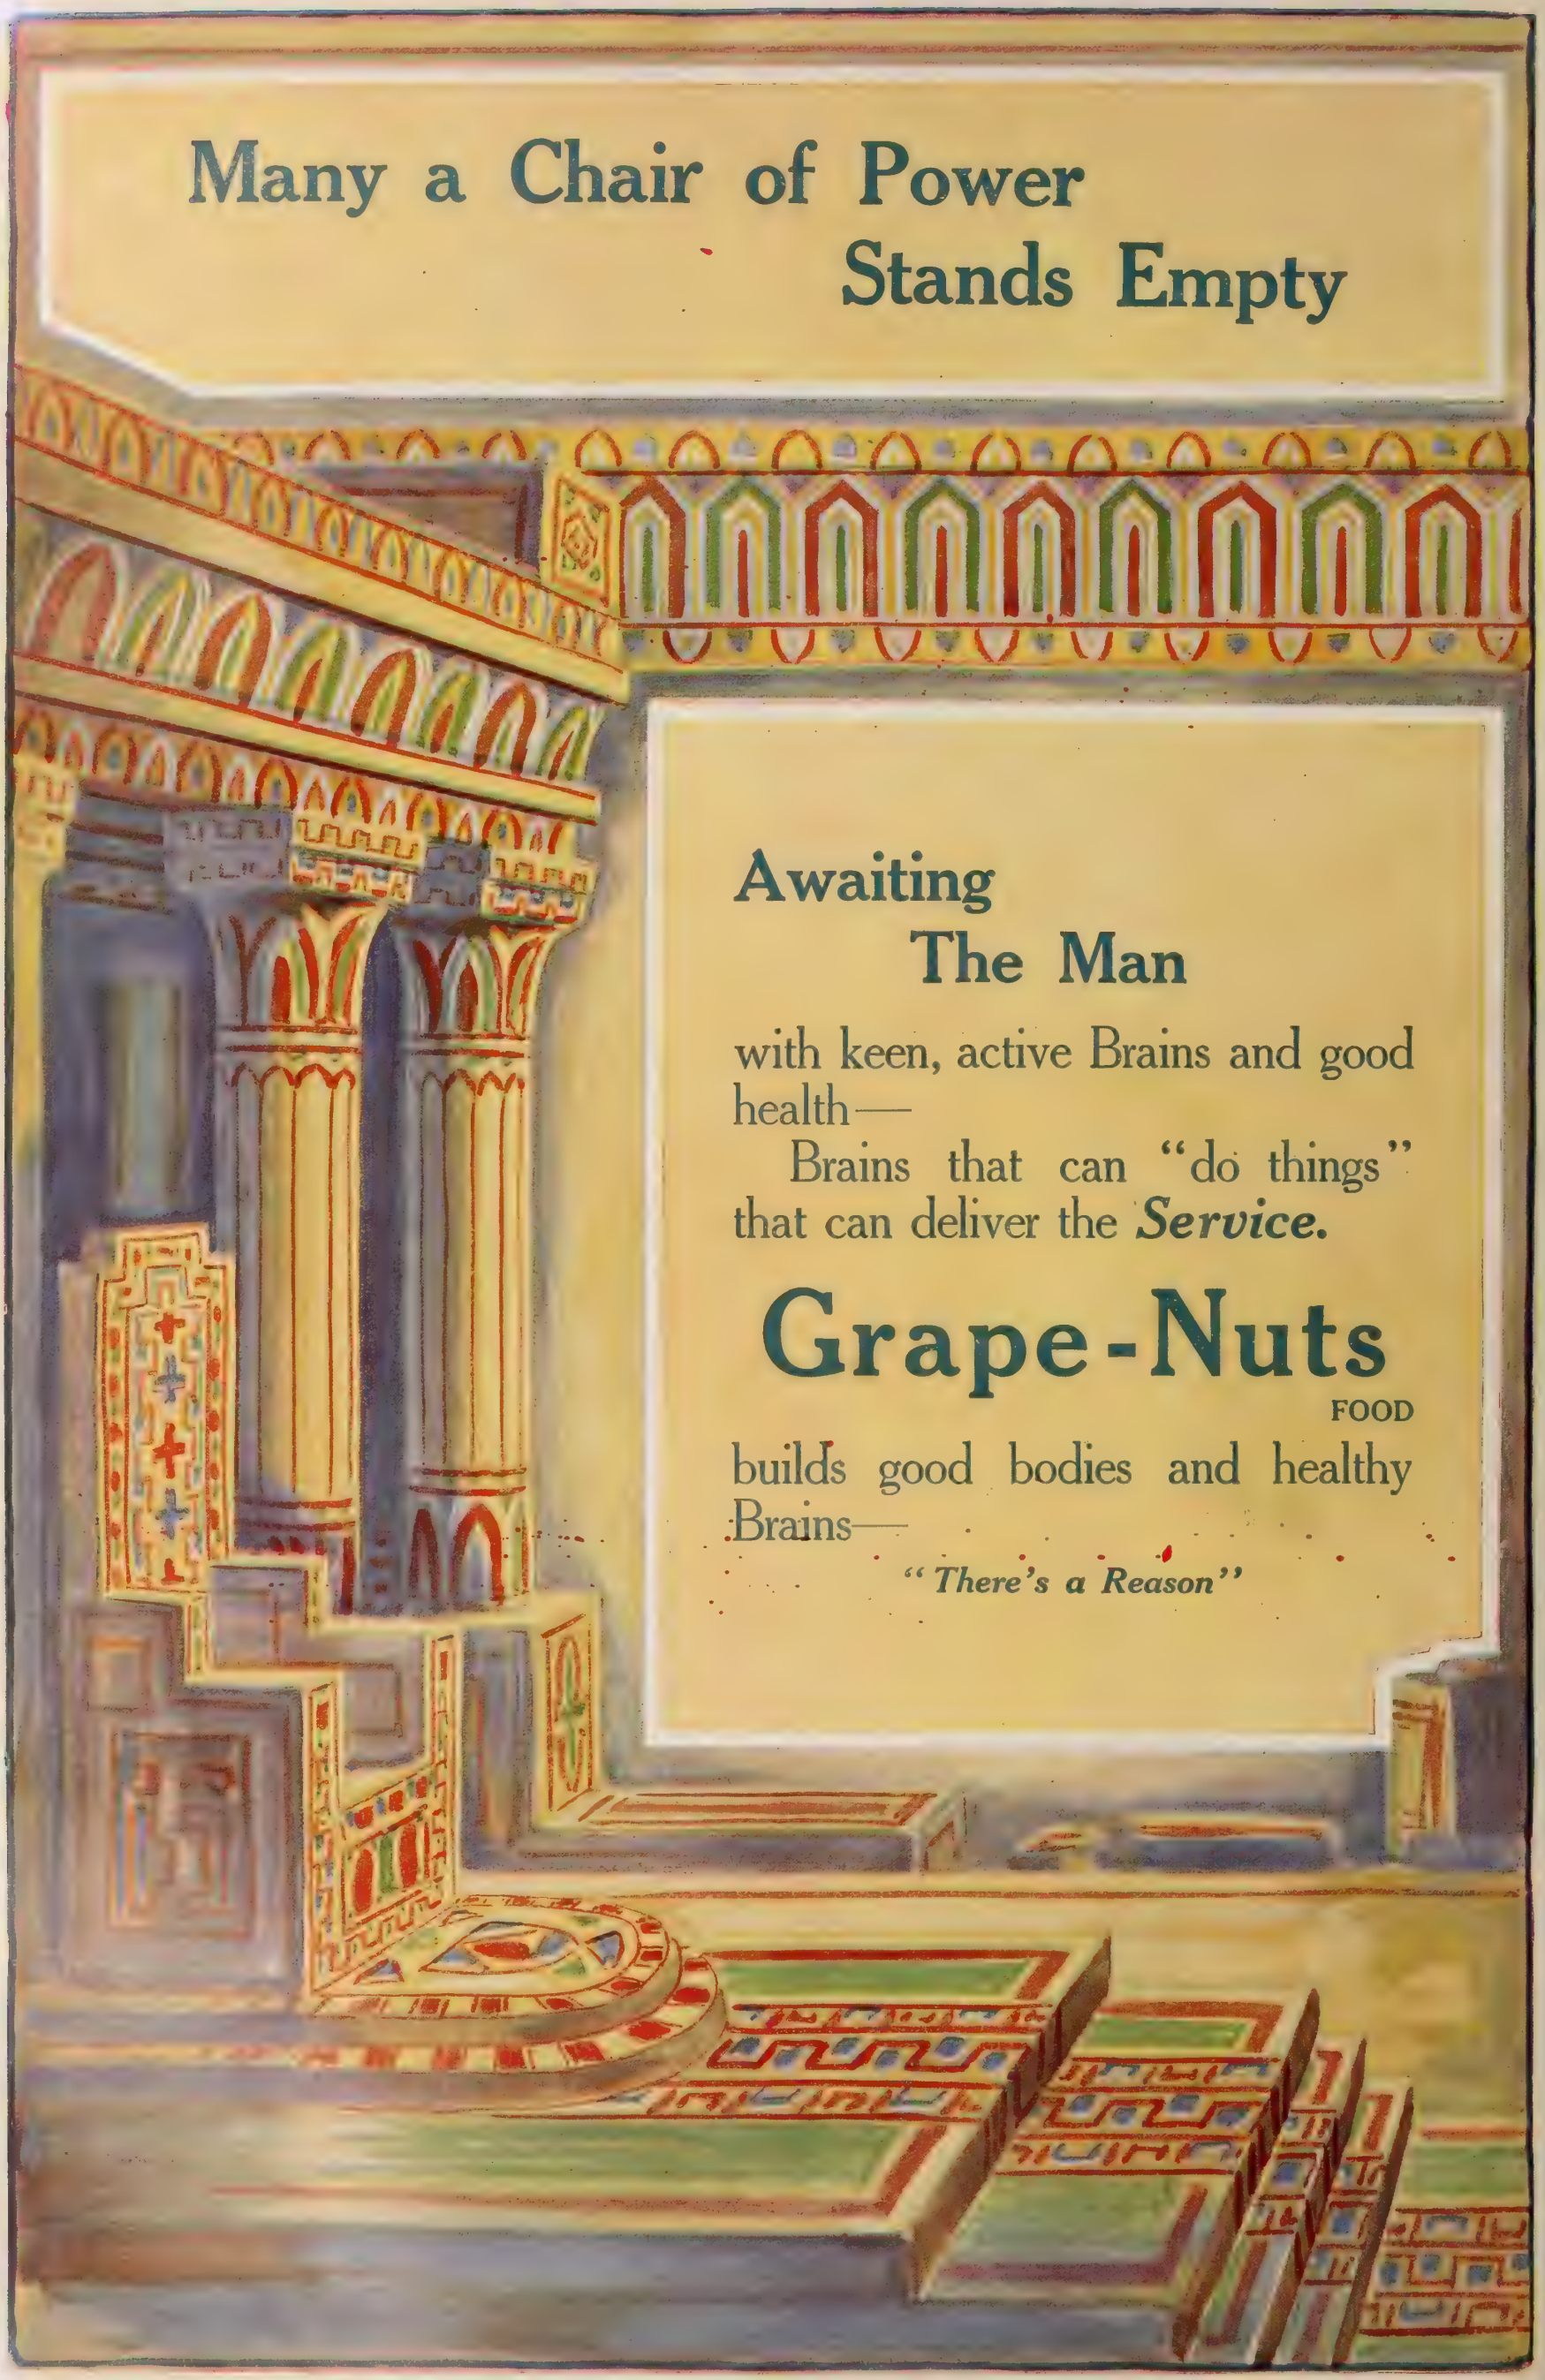
For the free catalog address the Vice-Pres. and Mgr., F. K. BABSON

355 Portage Ave., Dept. 8124, Winnipeg, Canada

Without any obligations on me whatsoever, please send me your [illegible] Book and full particulars of your new special free loan offer on the improved EDISON phonograph.

Name

Address



Many a Chair of Power Stands Empty

Awaiting The Man

with keen, active Brains and good health—

Brains that can "do things" that can deliver the Service.

Grape-Nuts

FOOD

builds good bodies and healthy Brains—

"There's a Reason"

Canadian Home Journal

THE SCHOONER GIRL
COMPLETE IN THIS ISSUE

MAY
1912

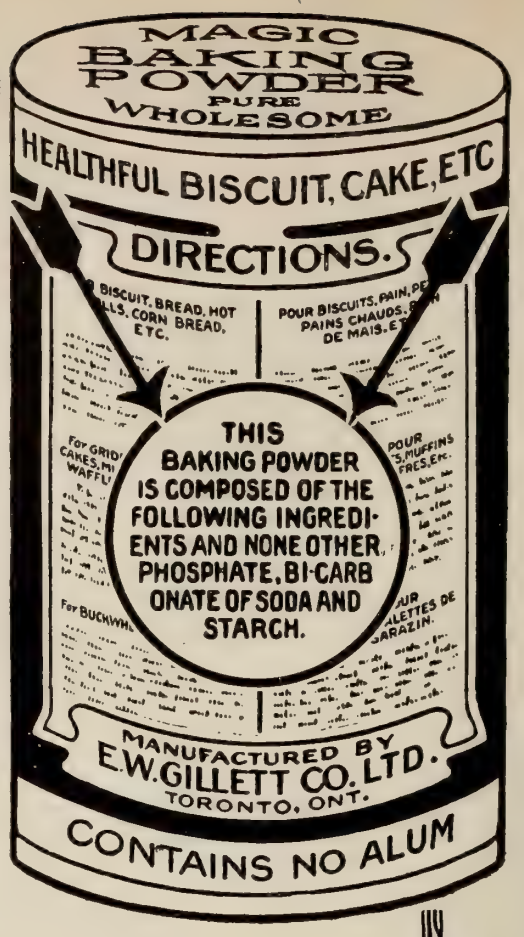
Published by THE CANADIAN WOMEN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., Limited
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

PRICE
10 CENTS

READ THE LABEL

The use of Alum is condemned in England as well as in several other countries, and its sale disguised in Baking Powder is prohibited. Its use is also condemned by leading physicians and pure food experts. To guard against being imposed upon refuse to purchase any Baking Powder that has not all the ingredients plainly printed on the label.

The manufacturers of alum baking powder never put the ingredients on the label, but they sometimes do print the words "No Alum" on labels or in advertisements. This is no guarantee—but is wilful deception. The safe and sure way is to buy only the kinds that specify all the ingredients.



MAGIC BAKING POWDER

Contains no Alum and Conforms to the High Standard of Gillett's Goods.

The price is the same. Why not buy the healthful, good kind?

E. W. GILLETT COMPANY LIMITED

Winnipeg TORONTO, ONT. Montreal

Made in Canada

Our Shop Mark

FURNITURE of Character reproduced as near as adaptability to modern requirements will permit is not only a credit to the home in which it has the privilege of displaying its beauty, and the serviceable taste of its designer, but it is also a display of the good taste of those showing their preference in surrounding themselves with this style rather than shams. In buying our goods you not only buy the above qualifications but you become one of our numerous satisfied customers that we have attained by giving everyone that which is genuine.

Although all our goods are supplied through the trade we welcome your enquiry.

Toronto Furniture Co. Limited - Toronto, Canada

"Makers of the Better Make of Canadian Quality Furniture"

SUBSCRIBERS' ADVERTISEMENT GUARANTEE

Readers of the "Canadian Home Journal" are fully protected when buying from any of our advertisers. We know that every advertiser in this issue is reliable, and that our readers will be dealt with fairly and honorably. Should any of our readers have any unsatisfactory dealing with any of our advertisers we will undertake to have a satisfactory adjustment made or money refunded.

This absolute guarantee is good only when our readers tell advertisers when dealing with them that their advertisement was seen in the "Canadian Home Journal."

The Robert SIMPSON Company Limited

TORONTO.

Have just published a new Spring & Summer Catalogue, now universally regarded as

The Authoritative Style-Book for Canadian Men and Women.

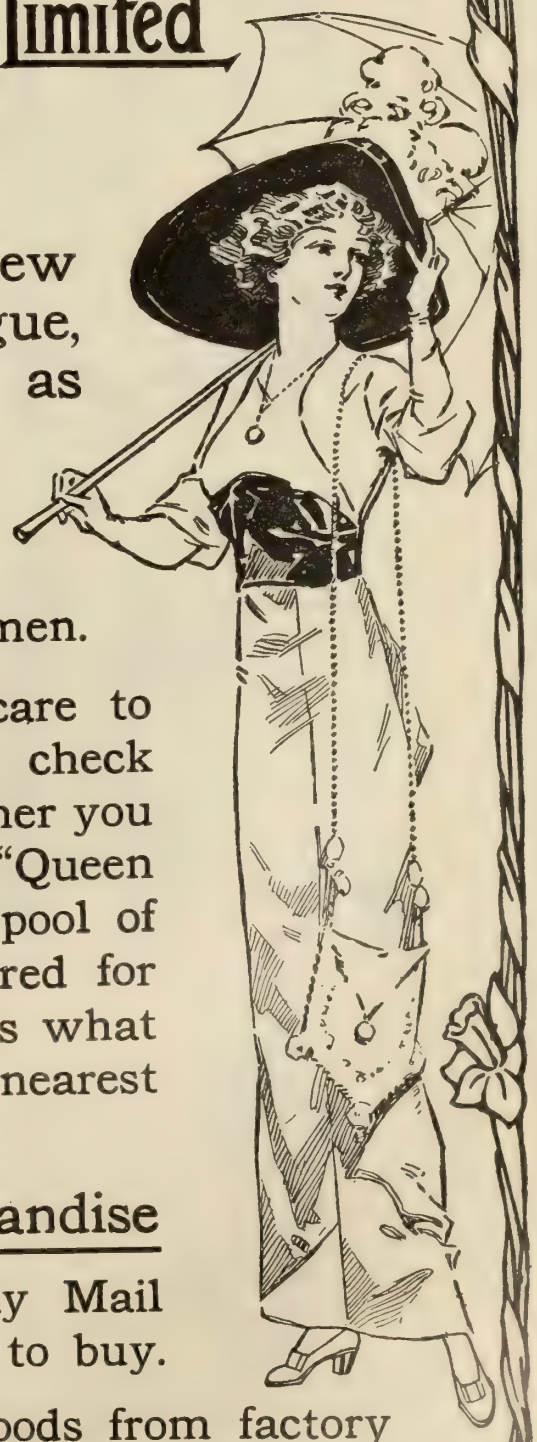
This is a book you'll hardly care to be without; it is an absolute check upon your cost of living. Whether you want a smart frock, stylish "Queen Quality" shoe or merely a spool of thread, the article is pictured for you and the price printed is what you pay for it at your nearest station. This system of

Delivery-Paid Merchandise

will soon be the only way Mail Order Customers will want to buy.



Try it once, and see how efficient it is—goods from factory to consumer with never a hitch and everything paid.

YOUR NAME ON A POST CARD WILL BRING YOU THIS NEW CATALOGUE

There is Nothing in the World Like

JAP-A-LAC

The King of Household Finishes

THE secret of Japanese Lacquer has remained unsolved for centuries, and what is true of Japanese Lacquer is true of JAP-A-LAC—there are scores of imitations, but there is no substitute for JAP-A-LAC.

Why? Simply because JAP-A-LAC is made from the secret formulas and by a secret process that the imitators of JAP-A-LAC have tried in vain to discover. Among the ingredients of JAP-A-LAC are especially prepared oils imported from China and rare and costly gums from far New Zealand, but the method of blending and manipulating these oils and gums is ours and ours alone. JAP-A-LAC is made by skilled hands under the personal supervision of trained experts and specialists. It is a product of The Largest Varnish Plant in the World.

A brush and a can of JAP-A-LAC are all you need to make your home beautiful. JAP-A-LAC makes old things new and keeps new things from getting old. It is so easy to use JAP-A-LAC that it requires no special skill. Any clever woman can produce beautiful results with JAP-A-LAC.

JAP-A-LAC is made in 21 colors and Natural (clear). JAP-A-LAC your woodwork, make your old furniture new, give it new life, new lustre and new beauty. JAP-A-LAC renews everything from cellar to garret. It has a thousand and one uses. It comes in all sizes. Don't spoil your furniture, woodwork or floors experimenting with any unknown article.

REDUCED PRICES

Quarter Pints	formerly	$0.25	now	$0.18
Half Pints	"	.35	"	.30
Pints	"	.60	"	.50
Quarts	"	1.10	"	.90
Half gallons	"	1.90	"	1.75

Also special Jap-a-lac cans 10c.

Jap-a-lac is for sale by all paint and hardware dealers

The Glidden Varnish Co.

Canadian Factory, TORONTO, ONT.

Spring is the Time to Jap-a-lac Everything

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

CANADIAN
HOME JOURNAL

Subscriptions must be paid in advance and are stopped on expiration. To change address we must know former and new address. No address chang'd later than 15th

Published on the 25th of each month preceding date of issue by
THE CANADIAN WOMAN'S MAGAZINE
PUBLISHING CO., LIMITED
TORONTO CANADA
WILLIAM G. ROOK, President

Yearly subscription price for Canada & Gt. Britain is $1. U S., $1 35. Foreign, $1 60 Remit by Express or P.O Orders Add collection charges to checks.

EDITORIAL CHAT

By all means read "The Schooner Girl." You will find it a most unusual story. The scene is on the Labrador coast, perhaps an out-of-the-way place for a love story, but they love there just the same as any other place in the world. Then the story has an unusual and happy ending quite unlike most stories, but read it anyway and find out for yourself.

We know you will like "The Unforeseen," as it is the kind of a story that keeps you guessing until the end to know who will be the bride.

"A Slave to Fashion" is another good story, and the two serials have proved to be the best stories we have ever published.

"Mother's Day" has, in Canada, inside of two years, become one in which thousands have become interested. The second Sunday in May is the day in each year on which each of us should do honor to our mother. Read of this splendid movement on page 20.

Most women are interested in babies, and much time is taken up in discussing the "dear wee things." You will be able to talk with more authority on this subject if you read page 19. There you will find out just how much the baby should weigh and measure at almost any age. Read it anyway and judge for yourself when you next see a baby if it is well developed or not.

Our Dressing Table page is becoming one of the most popular pages in the magazine. "Marie" is always willing to answer questions on any subject covered by her department.

So many of our readers have written us asking for more music that we have resumed our music page in this issue.

Women's Institute members will note a change in their department. We are more than anxious to make this department of such value to the Women's Institute movement that it will lead the way in place of merely being a place in which to state that certain meetings have been held.

Members of Institutes will find this department helpful in giving them suggestions that will make their work more effective and it may help them solve some of the difficulties that confront them in their work.

We want to do anything that will help along the Institute work and we are open to receive suggestions for publication that will increase the efficiency of this splendid movement.

Preparations are under way for our "June Brides' Number." Doubtless this number will prove interesting to many of our readers, if we may judge from the past. We are anxious to extend our congratulations to our lady readers who send us a card asking to have their name and address changed. They recognize that the JOURNAL will be of value to them in their new home.

It is not often that we say much to our readers about our advertising, but there is such a strong connection between the two that we believe our readers must be somewhat interested.

Our friends have been so busy telling their neighbors about the good qualities of the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL that it now takes 25,000 copies each month to supply the demand, and still new names and renewals keep coming in at least fifty per cent. greater than last year.

The circulation of the JOURNAL is now where it commands attention from the very largest advertisers in Canada and the United States, and if you will take a few minutes to look over the advertisements you will see that they are the best and most reliable firms in business anywhere.

The guarantee published on page 3 shows just how much we trust our advertisers, and we want our readers to believe every statement they make, and buy from them or ask for their goods every time an opportunity presents itself.

The greater the returns our advertisers receive from their advertisements the more they will advertise and the better magazine we will be able to give to our readers.

Did you ever stop to think of the work necessary in the publishing of a magazine?

The reading of manuscripts sent in for publication is in itself something that requires considerable time and careful thought, that we pick only the best for our readers.

For every story accepted and published, there are many returned to the authors for various reasons. We much prefer stories by Canadian authors, but if we cannot secure stories from Canadians up to the standard, then we must search elsewhere for them.

Stories come to us from all parts of America, which is only one indication of the international importance of this magazine.

Starting with our June Number we propose introducing into our Journal Juniors' Department, a number of puzzles which will, we are sure, prove entertaining to our younger readers, both boys and girls. We may offer prizes for the correct solution of the puzzles, and we advise our junior readers to watch their department for the announcement and particulars in next issue.

We have just received word from the Deputy Minister of Agriculture for British Columbia, that the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL has been appointed the official organ of the Women's Institutes of that province.

The letter is as follows:—

"Sir,—I have the honor to inform you that the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL has been selected by the Women's Institutes of British Columbia as their official organ.

"I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

"WM. G. SCOTT, Deputy Minister."

It is pleasing to note the wonderful growth of this movement. We believe it is now the largest women's organization in Canada, and its influence for good throughout the Dominion has no limitations.

Institutes are now doing good work in Ontario, New Brunswick, Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Manitoba.

May CONTENTS 1912

FICTION

THE SCHOONER GIRL - - - - - 6
THE UNFORESEEN - - - - - 8
THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS - - - - 9
A SLAVE OF FASHION - - - - - 11
COST OF A CRIME - - - - - - 12

SPECIAL FEATURES

THE NORMAL BABY - - - - - - 19
MOTHER'S DAY - - - - - - - 20
MY LADY'S GARDEN - - - - - - 22
HARDY PHLOXES - - - - - - 23
HOME ADORNMENT - - - - - - 24
LOVELIEST OF SUNFLOWERS - - 25
GLADIOLI—HOW TO GROW THEM - - 26
MUSIC - - - - - - - - - - 29
CONCERNING CONVENTIONALITIES - 32

FASHION DEPARTMENT

FASHIONABLE EMBROIDERIES - - 33
SILK AND LINGERIE GOWNS - - - 34
NEW NECKWEAR - - - - - - 35
COLLARS AND CUFFS ON SUITS - - 36
FASHIONS FOR CHILDREN - - - 37
THE PLAIN SHIRTWAIST - - - - 39

MATTERS OF MENU

MAY BREAKFAST - - - - - - 15
CULINARY CONCEITS - - - - - 53

FOR THE HOUSEHOLD

HOUSEHOLD DECORATIONS - - - 16
HOUSEHOLD HINTS - - - - - - 52

SPECIAL DEPARTMENTS

JOURNAL'S JUNIORS - - - - - 14
AROUND THE HEARTH - - - - - 18
WOMEN'S INSTITUTES - - - - - 40
GIRLS' CLUB - - - - - - - - 44
DRESSING TABLE - - - - - - 45

THE SCHOONER GIRL

A Story of Love on the Labrador Coast

By FELIX J. KOCH

"T'AINT the job I'd be pickin' agin' for the summer; not by a good deal! Why, there be nothin' to it. You clean an' you throw, an' you clean an' you throw, an' then, you no quicker'n get the first mess out of the way but the punt's down there to the foot of the ladder with more of 'em, an' then you start the whole business afresh!"

Clothilde threw her head back; the thin Roman nose, heritage of centuries of Latin ancestors, dilated; the brown eyes looked half sadly out of the seaward opening of the curing-barn; the narrow lips pursed and the red cheeks grew taut, and, if you had been a close observer, as, unfortunately these fisher-folk were not, you might have detected a glassiness to those eyes and a huskiness to the voice, which betokened bitter disappointment. Meanwhile the girl ran fingers, visibly unaccustomed to manual labor, nervously through her wavy black hair.

She seized another cod resentfully and took the curing-knife in hand. Then, quite as quickly, she threw the two down once more, drew the little white sunbonnet far over her head, and, arms akimbo, gazed out at the sea.

"Still sorry you come?"

Big, lubberly, good-hearted Nikolaus Weddle leaned across the table and laid a brawny hand, scarred with the oar-galls, on the white, slender fingers of the girl.

"'Deed I am that! It's bad enough in the towns on Ste. Pierre or Miquelon, but there you get some change at least, an' there's the shops, even if they be nothing to them to St. John's, an' there's books and you git yer mail . . "

"We gets mail by the Lake when she kin come up the tickle," Thomas Crosby, —Shamus they called him, interjected.

"Which ain't one trip in a fortnight. The Lake only makes up-trip once in two weeks, an' it's ten days down, with fog permittin' an ice allowin'."

The girl's voice grew thicker, it trebled more with each word of her retort.

The people of the curing-barn gathered closer. It wasn't the first case of the sort they had known, and they always pitied a schooner girl, come from the settlements up sooth, (in the higher latitudes, you know, up is south and down is north, for doesn't the north slope down as it nears the Poles?)—growing weary and rebellious of the monotone of day after day of nothing but cod and ice and fog, with a cruel sea lapping to froth on the rocks before and an unexplored, inhospitable no-man's land behind.

Nikolaus winked to the others slyly.

"Let's be stoppin' for a while, you an' me," he said gently.

"We'll go off an' gather some bake-apples on the mountain and you can tell me of your town to home."

The girl, feeling the need of just such sympathy as his at this moment, washed the blood and scales from her hands in the water-pail, dropped the apron, cut from a coffee sack, and gave it a kick to a corner, set the curing-knife in the ledge of the wall, and followed the man.

The two strolled up the trail leading to the ridge of Cape Harrigan, the summit of the range, from which broad No-Man's Land unfolded.

"You never been away from hum so long?" Nikolaus asked her, for the dozenth time that summer, the question breaking the silence as best he knew how.

"Oh yes," again she answered, but this time with a brutal frankness. "Never though, where there weren't nothing, like here. You see, it be's mighty hard to get used to it, the lonesome. You people are all good and kind to me, I ain't a mite complaining; but of course you're interested most in the fish. The more fish you'uns get, the better.

"I come up here to make pin-money, what comes handy, but ain't just needed, and as I might instead of stayin home for the time. What's more, I'd heard so much about the Labrador schooner-girls havin' such a jolly good time, and how," (she laughed slyly despite herself), "they comes home one and all with a lover they'd caught with the fish up the coast . .. ."

"Down coast you means, don't you?" Nikolaus asked quickly.

The girl caught herself.

"Yes, down north I mean. But I thought, with all the summer for fishing and fish to be had by the millions, you people kept fairly good hours, an' that, inside the curin'-barns at least we'd be warm, an' I didn't spose how, when the traps was heavy, we'd be stayin' up half the night to clean an' cure."

The pent-up disappointment of days rushed forth, once the floodgates had been opened.

"More'n that, t' tell the truth, I didn't 'spose we women would have anything to do with that work. They told me, when I applied for the job, there at Brigus, that we'd just be expected to cook your meals for ye; tidy up, and do odd bits of sewin', an' keep you men from gitting homesick for the company of wimmin' and comin' back before the cod stopped their runs!"

"That was the up shot of the bargain, and while I guessed that at times we'd of course help you at your jobs, I didn't suppose things to be near as they are."

Nikolaus was picking the path on the rocks, which grew more rugged and jagged with each step of the way. As he sat his foot down, pace by pace, to test the pathway, he answered—

"Well, that's sure the rule of it in some 'plants' on the coast. An' it's all you'd be asked to do.

"But you know how 'tis with the rest o' us. We gets paid by the 'lay' an' the more quintals we brings in, the more there'll be comin' to us. It's our own sisters or wives or daughters as we men's got, an' a woman as is a fisherman's wife 'spects to work, for o' course it'd be to the interest o' all to get all we can."

The girl understood thoroughly. According to the contract, as signed with the planter, she need not have raised a hand other than to cook, bake or sew, meanwhile making herself agreeable and companionable. But, find yourself alone in a wee group of maroons, dropped, as it were, weary miles from the rest of their kind, in a broad wilderness of sea and fog and rock, and realize how absolutely dependent on their goodwill you may be for every moment of your happiness or peace of mind, and you'll very soon come to the wise conclusion that while in such Rome one must follow the Romans. Adroitly as she could, the girl tried to explain this to her escort. Reaching a somewhat sheltered ledge of mountain, she suggested they rest for a time on the rocks.

FISH BY THE ARMS FULL

The man, with a skill born of long practice, picked for her a natural armchair made soft by a bed of the reindeer moss; he shoved the rocks out of the way to make room for her feet, and then, satisfied that she was cozy as possible, he threw himself full-length into the trail itself, his stomach resting on the shreds of rock, his head poised on his two brown fists.

"Gosh dern it!" he exclaimed, as his eyes ranged seaward, taking in the prospect which the elevation allowed. "Them 'bergs is goin' to close up the tickle. The wind's veerin' that big one square to the mouth."

The girl looked instinctively toward the mouth of the "tickle," off which, but still some miles to sea, a magnificent iceberg rode before the wind, drifting gently landward. Companion to this, like the ice palaces of fairyland, 'bergs of all shapes and sizes rose from the waters. The fog had lifted suddenly, as it is wont in Newfoundland; the sun beat full upon the 'bergs, these of rich deep blue, as seen from here,—the crest of the waves, as they rolled to the ice floes were touched with the tiniest rim of gold, and where a flock of gulls circled above a pinnacle on an iceberg, a single ray of sunlight caught the very spire of ice and sent off a heliograph flash.

Neither man nor girl saw beauty in the picture. To them it meant that the huge berg, which they hoped would drift seaward, was coming in, it would stand and block the way for boats to the fiord, at either side of whose entrance the cliffs rose so sheer as to forbid all attempts at portage. The mail-boat would at once know that the fishermen could not come to sea in their punts and so there would be no stopping. What mail there might be would be carried on to Nain and then back, which meant two weeks at the very least.

"Oh Nikolaus," the girl burst forth wildly, "we won't get our letters! Last time the mail boat was due, the fog sent her to sea and she skipped us; and now it's the icebergs. I haven't had a letter for over a month. You don't know what can happen it that time! It's terrible! Awful! I can't stand it."

Nikolaus put his strong arms, fisher-fashion, around the woman.

"There, there! Don't go on so! See, you be worryin' so you're adlin' your brain. Why your very speech be's different from natr'l. You was usin' high flutin' words like teachers and preachers just now, —that ain't no good sign with simple folks. Come, we better be gettin' back."

He raised her gently and found a way across the rocks to what seemed a shorter path to the sea.

Nikolaus, though he did not let her know, was thoroughly frightened. He had heard of people who'd gone insane from sheer loneliness in the north. Trappers, out a full winter by themselves in the wild, sometimes did that, and when found were gibbering idiots. No plain schooner-girl in her senses could furbish the king's English, as he later put it, as Clothilde just had done. More and more solicitous of her safety was the fisherman, as the girl continued giving vent to her keen disappointment in words of an English which the Labrador hardly knew.

"You be's not feelin' well," he said, with quiet firmness. "You need restin'. I guess I'd better be carryin' you down to the village."

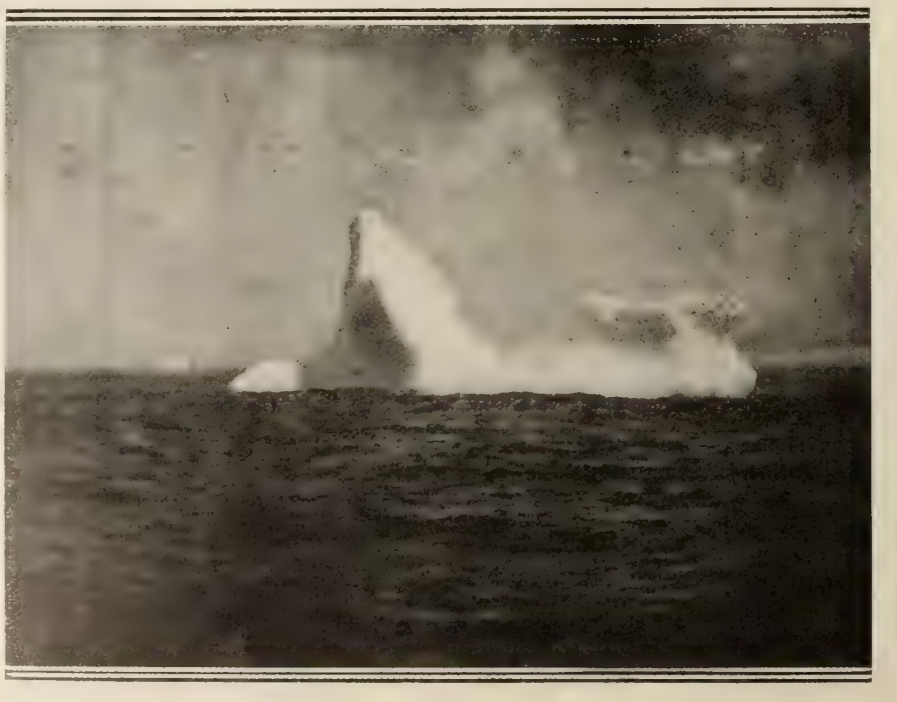
Without so much as a by your leave, the strong young fisherman had the girl in his arms and began a more hurried descent of the mountain. Down mountain is often more trying than up, and when, after a time, on this little-used trail, he came to another of the little levels so frequent here, the man stopped and deposited his burden.

Something in the girl's very helplessness, as he bore her, had seemed to be impressing upon him the fact that this would be the opportune time, indeed, for discussing a matter he had often attempted to open with her, but which, with a woman's deftness at manoeuvering, she had always staved off successfully.

"Clothildy," he began, "you ain't well,—you ain't been well. I seen that, and so did all of us. I ain't goin' to stand for it, seein' you wastin' from me,—an' I'm goin' to run me punt to the end of the tickle. an' if the berg's closin' the inlet, when the mail-boat comes, I'm goin' to stay nigh and hail the Lake with me flag.

"I'll have the doctor come out to shore in the dowry, an' then I'll bring him up here to see ye, if I got to raise him up the cliff in a rope, as we did the time Brokamp died."

All the roughness of a Labrador fisherman had vanished from Weddle. The voice, accustomed to bellowing above the roar of the sea, had become mild as a baby's, and the tall, sun-



THE ICEBERG DRIFTED SLOWLY LANDWARD

ON THE LONELY COAST OF LABRADOR

bronzed fellow went down on his knees holding his hand to the woman's brow, stroking her wrists, trying, as best he could, to make her comfortable.

"Clothildy," he was saying, "I been mighty sorry for ye, ever since you come here. I seen from the outset how you ain't fit woman to do this work, an' I ain't fit for no other. You shop-folks down to Ste. Pierre may be sellin' the fishers all yer lives; but some how, taint in yer blood to be fishers yerselves.

"Now, that's what's been worryin' me, Tildy, all this fortnight. You means well, an' all that, but you ain't cut out by nat'er for a fisherman's wife."

The girl, to whom had come that buoyancy of spirit which is Nature's eternal reaction on grief, bolted up and looked at him squarely.

"Why, Nik., I don't quite see what your aimin' at! I ain't got the marryin' bee in my bonnet. I'm mighty thankful to you for your thoughtfulness, Nik., but you mustn't worry about me trying to turn myself into a fishwife.

"You mustn't take it so hard as that. I'll live through the summer, and then I'll get over it. It was my blunder, that's all, and I'm gettin' my medicine. I thought I'd like a season up here, with the fishermen, earning pin-money and testin' the life of a schooner girl, of which I'd always heard so much. I'll live through it, I tell you, and once I get home, and put the plump in my cheeks again and get the tan off my nose, I'll be thankful all my life that I done it."

The iceberg was veering before a change in the wind. Chilling blasts, cooled by those refrigerators of the sea, came sweeping across the ledge. Strangely incongruous in the prospect, a robin, harbinger of glorious springtime in the southland, soared from among the rocks, perhaps to find a warmer shelter.

"I don't follow clear!" the man answered slowly. "You come here to us like a regular schooner girl, far as we know. Now you talks of going and you say you won't be returning, never—

"I don't follow. An' you keep saying you ain't even cut out to be a fisherman's wife, even sposin' he worked double hard, so you'd have no work to do."

"No," the girl laughed merrily; what she took to be to his assumed soberness was really funny. "That being a fishwife I am certain I'm not cut out for."

She was marvelling at his wonderful solicitude for a woman, who, two months before, he did not know existed.

With him, however, a different line of thought was swinging its way through the brain. Bit by bit he was putting two and two together, arriving at last at the obvious sum.

The boy in him turned rampant. He threw his arms up and down savagely; he whirled and danced in fiendish rage, and meanwhile, burst forth in his scornings:—

"Then, why did you keep trickin' me, 'Tildy? Ain't I been kind's I could be te ye all the six weeks? Ain't I done all a lover could do for a girl, on the Labrador?

"An' now, you know's well as I do, I'm goin' to be laughed at for always fer being just a silly lolly as was duped by a schooner girl. No other Labrador girl'll be havin' me, bein's you've done proved me a ninny.

"It's mean, dirty mean, that, Tildy. I never once thought you was one of them men-trickers we'd heard of, nor had any of the rest of us.

IN CHARGE OF THE POST

"You shore could a seen the very fust week you was here, 'Tildy, whether you was comin' like the most of 'em is, to be broken in for a fish-wife, an' ought to accept our encouragement or no. Why the girls come all way from Novy Scoshee, some of 'em, to be teached, this, and make ready for the life they's to lead. We men takes our fancy to 'em, the first day or so, almost—love at first sight, Parson Briggs calls it, an' we all of us gets to know each mighty quick, cause we be's eating, drinking, workin', playin' together, as we will do when we's married. So it ain't no question 'bout likin' later or not,—us be testin' right here now, an inside a fortnight, if both be likin' the other, they're ready to hitch up, soon's the travellin' parson comes by.

"If you likes me, as you pretended, an' I likes you, as I shore shown you, why d'ye want to wait or go home? We can do away with a lot of this workin' at curin', seein' as you ain't got the strength."

He subsided, his energy spent for the moment.

The girl saw, for the first time now, how the land really lay. Point by point a dozen things, seeming strange at the time, were explained to her. It had started already on her arrival at Cape Harrigan on the mail boat—the young men at the shore, where the ship's dowry landed, and these, each and all so kind to her, the first day and the second. Then the whispered confab on which she had stumbled, come to sudden silence on her approach. After that Nikolaus alone paying her marked attentions, helping her, guiding her, her inseparable companion when not working, and the others friendly, but that was all.

Little did she know that this was the way of the North land, the manner of mating on the lone Labrador coast. Single women are few on 10,000 miles of coast here, and the men of the Labrador seize the first opportunity of picking a life mate. Then, if she decline, they are quite as quick to give a brother a chance.

The very first evening of a single woman's arrival at a settlement, such of the unmarried men as think of her favorably, draw lots as to who shall be the first to go courting. Conventions are dropped, north of Belle Island, and if, in a day or two of the close confinement of the fish barns the fisher-swain finds that the girl does not take kindly to him, or he, in his turn, regrets of his choice, he comes forth openly to the others, to give them their chance in turn. On the part of the women here, "the sooner married the better," is their feeling, so the chance of a nuptial is never delayed very long.

The women of Labrador, obviously, aware of this picking by lot among suitors, act accordingly, and a girl of the Peninsula, true to its ethics, either frowns or smiles on the suitor, within a few days of their meeting. The summer season alone will bring them together, and if they part unmarried in autumn it will be parting forever.

A feeling of supremest pity kindled itself in Clothilde for the man sobbing there on the rocks.

"Don't cry," she said, as she might have counselled an infant. I'll straighten it out for you yet.

"First, though, let me explain it all to you, for I think it's only right now that you know."

She stood squarely before him, put her hand on his shoulder and repeated:

"I had no idea of this thing. I did not know. I'm just terribly sorry about it all."

Continued on page 49

THE LOVER

FISH SPREAD OUT TO DRY

ON THE BEACHES

THE UNFORESEEN

The Story of a Bachelor's Proposal

By ANNIE S. SWAN

"MOTHER," said Kate Eardley, as she came in from an afternoon walk in the village, "I have great news for you. Someone has taken the Moat House."

Mrs. Eardley looked up from her needlework with an expression of pleased surprise on her sweet face. Mother and daughter were very much alike, and so youthful was the elder Katherine that they might very easily have been taken for sisters. Katherine, or Kate, as she was commonly called, was what is usually termed a fine young woman, and her clear-cut, determined features and beautiful, honest grey eyes betokened considerable strength of character.

Mrs. Eardley was the widow of an army surgeon, and as their means were very limited she had come back to the village of her girlhood, where she had been the rector's daughter. Lindford was an ideal little spot, tucked away among the Suffolk hills, very remote from the world and very quiet in the winter. Kate loved Lindford, and never found it dull. She was a singularly well-balanced and healthy-minded young woman.

"Who told you, and who has taken it, dear? There have been so many rumors, I shall only believe it when I see the new owner."

"But the rector has seen him—in fact, he is here to-day. He has bought the place, and is going to make wonderful alterations at once. I only hope he won't fill up that dear old moat, or the chief charm of Lindford will be gone."

"Did you hear his name?"

"Yes, Calderon; Geoffrey Calderon."

"Quite a good name," said Mrs. Eardley musingly. "Now I wonder what Calderons he belongs to."

"He's a bachelor, mother, and Mr. Somerset thinks he must be very rich, he talks so freely about improving the place."

"Young, middle-aged or old?"

"Middle-aged; Mr. Somerset thinks about forty-eight, but Gracie says he doesn't look a day more than thirty-five, and I can see," added Kate with a little smile, in which there was no maliciousness, "that she means to set her cap at him. So do I. It will be a race between Grace and me, who is to be mistress of the Moat House."

Mrs. Eardley merely smiled at Kate's harmless little joke, which could never by any chance have a foundation in fact.

Both Kate and Grace Somerset were above any such suspicion, but the arrival of a marriageable man in a quiet neighborhood is always something of an event. And a rich man, able to buy the Moat House, and spend unlimited money on its improvements, was more interesting still.

"He is coming to live in Lindford while the alterations are going on—and mother, what do you think? Mr. Somerset actually asked whether you would take him in as a boarder for six weeks or so. Do you think we ever could?" She shrugged her shoulders as she spoke, and finally broke into a ringing laugh.

"When the rector said that I told Grace she couldn't have a chance—could she, mummy?"

Mrs. Eardley somewhat reprovingly shook her head.

"I shouldn't mind if he were nice, and would pay sufficiently to let us do things well, while he is here. We should have to get an extra help. But do you think Mr. Somerset was in earnest about it?"

"Oh, quite; they would love to have him themselves, only they haven't room. The only other alternative would be for him to live at the Red Lion at Craydon and ride over every day."

"Well, we can't do anything until we hear from him; or until the rector speaks to me about it. Probably it will never come to anything, but I'm pleased to hear that the old place is let at last, and I hope Mr. Calderon will turn out to be a pleasant neighbor. After all, that is all that can possibly concern us."

At that moment the front door bell rang, and Kate herself went out to open it. The Eardleys only kept one young maid, who was at that moment dressing in her attic bedroom. But Kate had no silly pride; she was just as pleased to open the door to a guest as to wish her or him good-bye on the step, but she felt a trifle embarrassed when she beheld a tall stranger in the porch, a middleaged, gentlemanly-looking individual with a fine, strong, kind face, and abundant hair, slightly touched with grey.

"My name is Calderon," he said courteously, as he raised his cap. "Could I see Mrs. Eardley?"

"Yes," answered Kate readily enough. "Please come in."

She held open the door wide and ushered Calderon straight to the drawing-room to her mother.

"I have to apologize, Mrs. Eardley, as well as to confess," he said, with the easy grace of a man accustomed to make himself at home in any company. "I am here at the instigation of the rector, who inspired in me the hope that I might find quarters here while I am waiting for my own place to be put in order."

"Sit down, Mr. Calderon," said Mrs. Eardley, pleasantly. "We are just going to have tea, and we can discuss the matter over it. I fancy it rests with my daughter, as she does the most of the housekeeping for me, thereby inciting me to indolence."

Calderon shook his head.

"I shall never believe in your indolence; I have heard already too many of your good deeds in the parish. As for Miss Eardley, I must at once throw myself on her mercy. If she could see the chaos of the Moat House she would be moved to instant pity."

"But should we ever be able to please you, Mr. Calderon?" said Kate brightly. "We have only one little maid, the natural product of the village, a little raw, and very decidedly gauche. Wouldn't you be afraid to trust yourself to such tender mercies?"

"She must never know! She must never know!"

Calderon glanced round the pretty, homelike room, the prettiest room, he decided, that he had seen since his boyhood.

"I have been a soldier in my time, and don't forget that I am a bachelor. Bachelors are generally supposed to be satisfied with anything."

"Ah, that is quite misleading! Bachelors are the most exacting of men," said Kate, smiling as she left the room to hasten the progress of Patience with the tea tray.

Within an hour Calderon left the house, having entered into a compact with its inmates, and having arranged to move his belongings from the Red Lion at Craydon in the course of the next day.

Then began a period of delightful interest and companionship for these three, so oddly thrown together. Calderon had found a home after his own heart. Mother and daughter delighted him, they were so womanly, so perfectly natural, so entirely free from guile. At first his feeling was that of some long-absent relative who had suddenly and unexpectedly come home. He consulted them about everything; each day he insisted that Mrs. Eardley or Kate should drive with him to the Moat House to deliver an opinion on some part of the work, regarding which he was not quite decided. That he was a very rich man was evidenced by the lavishness of the improvements; and withal he was so anxious to preserve all the old features of this historic house that expenses were considerably added to.

Mother and daughter did not speak very much to one another about their new friend, who had slipped into his place in their home and their hearts. But both were conscious of a quickened interest and pleasure in life, and neither paused to enquire the reason.

One day, when Calderon had been an inmate of Rosearbour for about five weeks, Mrs. Eardley's eyes were suddenly opened. She had gone to pay a marriage call at a house about four miles distant, and when she arrived found a large gathering to greet the bride on her first "at home" day. She felt sorry for the moment that Katherine had not come with her, but she had gone to the Moat House as usual with Calderon, and had expressed not the slightest desire to exchange her outing for the wedding "at home."

Mrs. Eardley, a general favorite, found plenty of people whom she knew, and who were glad to see her, and presently she was pounced upon by the Dowager Lady Pigott, one of the grandees of the neighborhood, to whom everybody paid court because she was rich and because her tongue was so outspoken and dangerous.

"How do you do, Mrs. Eardley! I haven't seen you for generations. Come and sit by me in that alcove. I can't think why people come to things of this kind to be crowded and bored to death. And do you think Peter Leyden and his wife will be happy? She gives herself a good many airs, but she hasn't come up against the nether millstone of Peter Leyden's heart yet. All the Leydens are hard nuts. I remember old Anthony. He proposed to me once, and I very nearly accepted him, so you see I might have been Peter's mother, and then I should have had the pleasure of putting that chit in her place. Well, and how are things going with you?"

She put up her heavily-jeweled lorgnette and surveyed the sweet, high-bred face of Katherine Eardley with a sort of malicious curiosity. She had some disagreeable things to say presently, acting up to her favorite role of candid friend; meanwhile, she wondered how the woman managed to keep her youthful face and pretty figure, when Katherine, to her certain knowledge, was twenty-three.

"Where's your girl? This is the sort of thing she shouldn't miss," she said presently, keeping her eyes mercilessly fixed on Mrs. Eardley's face.

"She's gone out for the afternoon with a friend," answered Katherine a little lamely, for the first time finding it difficult to speak quite frankly of the demands Calderon made on Kate's time.

"I know—she's gone to the Moat House with Geoffrey Calderon. I hear all about the goings-on; and if you can hook him for your girl I'll congratulate you. He's worth having, and I say it was a very clever move on your part getting him as a boarder. However did you manage it?"

Katherine Eardley's face flushed painfully with anger and humiliation. The dreadful, vulgar old woman, whom people endured on account of her title and her wealth, positively enjoyed the effect caused by her words.

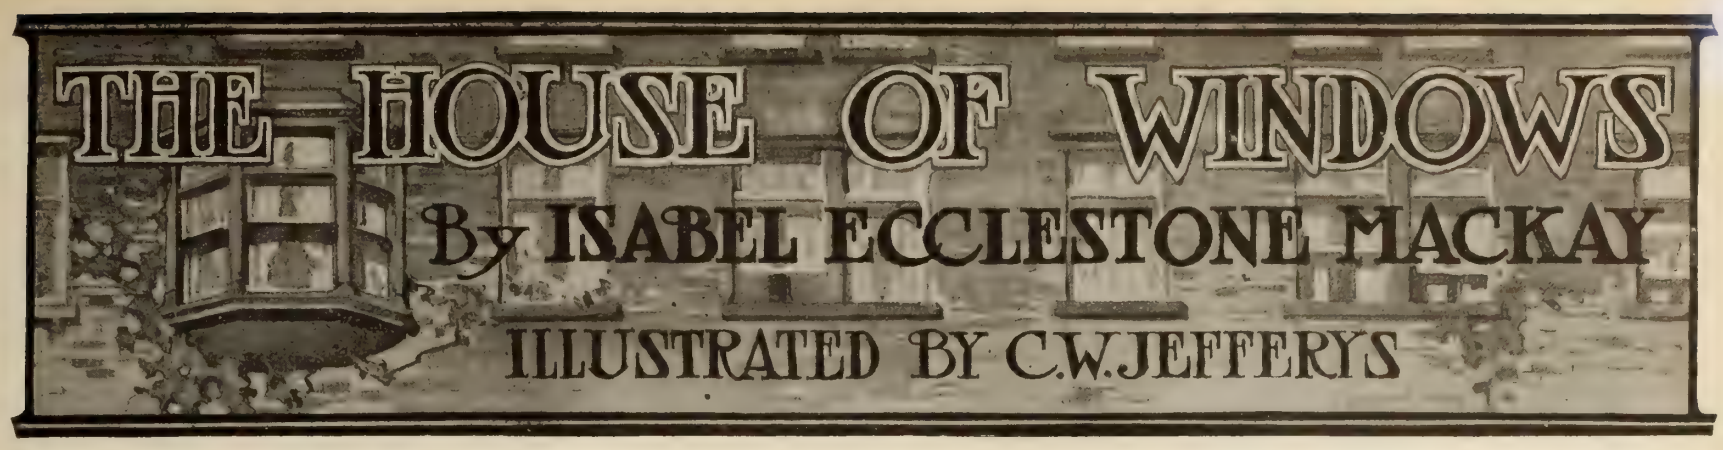
"Lady Pigott, I don't understand you. It is very rude to speak like that, besides being untrue," she said quickly. "We took Mr. Calderon under pressure from the rector, and himself as a neighborly kindness, and to save him driving every day from Craydon. How dare you say such a thing of me or of my daughter!"

The unusual heat of the reply seemed to the astute old woman to prove the case against her, and she chuckled behind her lorgnette.

"Don't lose your wool, my dear," she said, giving her an affable tap on her arm. "I assure you I admire you for it; and if you succeed in getting Geoffrey Calderon for a son-in-law I'll congratulate you with all my heart, and give them a handsome present. I knew his father well. He was one of the best."

A something swept over the vain, frivolous, evil-tongued old woman that for a moment made her more human. But Katherine Eardley, usually the most sympathetic of women, was too much hurt and

Continued on page 28



AT least she tried to scream. She put all her remaining strength into one mighty effort, but the first thread of sound had hardly passed her lips when the girl's hand was over her mouth. The door opened, as if the man had been waiting there, and in a moment she was securely gagged.

"Got some spunk, I see!" said the man, gazing at her for the first time with something like admiration in his eyes. "Lucky for you this tavern isn't doing the business it used to do, or you'd be wearing that ornament about all the time."

Christine heard the farmer come out, climb into his buggy and call "Ged-up." The old horse and rattling rig moved slowly away, and with it seemed to go the girl's last hope. Careless of the giggling regard of the yellow-haired girl, she threw herself on the bed and gave way to hysterical weeping.

CHAPTER XXXII.

UPON that first day in the gable room Christine, in a flush of hope, had told the yellow-haired girl that her friends would certainly find her soon. She had believed it, too, for it seemed impossible that such an outrage could have been perpetrated and remain undiscovered and unavenged in this commonplace age of the world's history. If she had been a kidnapped maiden in medieval times, shut up in a high tower, guarded by men-at-arms, with appropriate stage settings, there might have been some element of reality in the affair; but to be snatched up suddenly from a busy city street at the glorious beginning of the 20th century, to be imprisoned in an ordinary road hotel, in an ordinary gable room, within a very few miles, she felt convinced, of her own home, and to be as completely helpless, as utterly isolated, and in as certain a danger as that other medieval maiden, seemed a thing too fantastic to think about.

And yet, as day succeeded day, the truth of this unbelievable fact crept into the girl's soul. From angry wonder and childish petulance, she passed to frightened misgivings, from frightened misgivings to terrified apprehension. The sinister purpose of these people was in the air. She did not know what it was, but she read its signs in the careless giggle and vulgar jest of the yellow-haired girl; in the hard determination of the girl's mother, whom she seldom saw, but who was apparently the mistress of the house; in the continual watchfulness of the man, and, most of all, in the evil gloating of the old woman, whom she now found out was called Granny Bates. This sinister old hag was with her more and more as the days dragged by. Usually she spoke little, but sometimes she would mutter and mumble to herself, and more than once she had a raving fit, during which she screamed out at Christine a torrent of abuse and vituperation, of which, happily, the girl did not know the meaning. At other times, again, she would seem to forget the girl and sit for hours talking to and weeping over a faded photograph. The photo was that of a young girl of about Christine's age, with a pretty, silly face and much tawdry ornament.

"As good a girl as ever lived," the old woman would murmur, "and pretty, too, as pretty as the best of them. Always laughing and so kind to her old mother—a good girl—a good girl."

"She's dead now," she said one day looking at Christine with unseeing eyes. "But there was nothing the matter. I'll take my oath on that. She died of felony—on her lungs, you know." And then, suddenly, as if the pretences were too much for her, she gathered the picture into her arms and rocked it passionately, moaning, "Ruined, ruined! As good a girl as ever lived. And so pretty, so young. Dead! They killed her. Oh, see her white, dead face, so pretty, so pretty!" She burst into hard sobs, and Christine, startled and shocked into pure pity, came over to her, murmuring words of sympathy. But at her touch the old woman sprang up with a curse so terrible that the poor girl shrank back appalled. The man, who was as usual not far from the door, heard, and, coming in, took the woman away.

"Don't you go near her when she's like that," he warned Christine. "She'd just as lief kill you as not, and we don't want that to happen."

The last words were uttered with a kind of rough sincerity, which, together with the look accompanying them, made Christine vaguely aware of a new danger. It made her realize that of late the man, who at first had been utterly careless, had gradually changed in his manner towards her. The change had begun with that admiring glance bestowed upon her when she had tried to scream for help. From that on he had taken more notice of her, had been kind in his vulgar way, and stood as a buffer between her and the old woman's worst rages. But Christine was under no misapprehension as to the nature of his regard. She knew it for what it was, a menace and not a refuge. Once, in desperation, she appealed to him. He laughed, not unkindly, but in a way which killed every hope.

Between him and the old woman, Christine knew, was continual war. Evidently she wanted something of him which he refused to give. By turns she stormed, entreated and cajoled. He met her always with an unmoved refusal. In this refusal, Christine realized vaguely, lay her safety. But was she mistaken or did his attitude grow less assured as the days went by?

One day, after she had been in the gable room for over a week, the yellow-haired girl, with cheerful malice, told her of the false trail which had been laid, and which, in the unlikely event of her friends tracing her, would lead them far away to New York. Christine did not question the truth of her words, and from that moment she began to droop; she lost her appetite, her interest in everything; she no longer listened for a familiar voice at the inn door. For the most part, she lay upon the bed, staring with unseeing eyes at the sloping ceiling. This change was watched by the yellow-haired girl with complacence, and by the man with uneasiness. It is doubtful if the old woman noticed it at all. Christine herself, morbid and half-starved, began to think that it would be quite easy to slip out of life this way.

But she was to be forcibly aroused from her indifference. One day toward the end of the fortnight, the man came in to her room alone, and, after carefully ascertaining that no one was outside or upon the stairs, shut and locked the door. He came over to her with a sheepish grin upon his common, rather handsome, face.

"See here," he began at once. "This has got to stop. The old woman is determined to have all or nothing, and I'm tired of going on like this. All the same, I said I wouldn't harm you, and I don't want to. You and me must get the best of the old woman, that's all. I'll tell you what—I've thought it all out. We'll let her think what she wants to think, and we'll go away together. But I'll swear to do fair by you after. We'll get married by the first parson we find!"

Christine sat up, slow horror brightening in her eyes and flooding the pale cheeks with crimson. "What do you mean?" She could hardly gasp the words.

"What I say. I'll marry you fair and regular. You'll be Mrs. Wilson as tight as a wedding ring can make you. We'll have the laugh on the old woman—eh?"

But Christine, in the first moment of actual realization, had fallen backward in a dead faint.

"Guess I was a trifle sudden," said the man ruefully. He went out awkwardly and sent in the girl.

It was when she recovered from the swoon that Christine first thought of the little bottle tucked inside her dress—and remembered, with relief unspeakable, that it was poison. To gain a respite she pretended to be much more helpless than she was. She refused to talk to anyone, and ate scarcely enough to keep herself alive. But Tough Wilson's patience would not stand this long. He forced the question to an issue, and this time no fortunate fainting fit concealed the young girl's rage and loathing. When he left the room she knew that he had become dangerous. The yellow-haired girl also told her cynically that Bill was going to have a "spell." He had begun to drink, and in drink he was a devil. The old woman was openly exultant, and kept whispering to the faded photograph that soon she would be avenged—soon—soon.

At last there came a day when Christine said: "If he does not come to-day, he will come too late." (Through it all she had clung to a thread of blind faith in Mark.)

Wilson had been in to see her that morning, smelling strongly of whiskey, and with red fire in his eyes. Once more he had urged his proposal and she had not answered him a word. He went out quietly, but she knew that he was at the end of his self-control. She felt the cold glass of the bottle with her hot fingers—and waited.

It was a beautiful morning. The sun shone, the air was crisp with the tang of last night's frost. Some late birds sang. It was a good day for motors, and, as the goalers were too busy to watch her, Christine, after the early visit of the man, had been securely but not painfully gagged. She lay now looking up through the window at the cloud-flecked sky, thinking of nothing, in a kind of stunned quiet.

Suddenly there rose from the road outside a piercing, long-drawn, elfish scream. Its first note brought Christine upright on her bed. When it had died away in a choking gurgle she was on her knees, sobbing, beneath the open window. She knew that scream. Some time, long ago, a merry girl had pressed that broken bulb, and laughed at its fiendish echo. It was Mark's auto horn.

And then she heard his voice (very loud it seemed) at the inn door, and his step upon the porch. He had come.

As she knelt there, weeping, the door behind her quietly opened, and the man and the old woman came in. They said nothing, but, picking the girl up as if she had been a parcel, they laid her on the bed as they had done upon the first night, wrapping her skirts about her ankles and securing them firmly. In the moment that they needed for this, Christine had found and uncorked the bottle of carbolic, saturating her clothes and filling the air with the odor.

"What's that smell?" asked the man in a whisper.

"Be quiet. I don't smell anything." Indeed, the old woman had lost her sense of smell long ago.

"It's carbolic. Have they been cleaning up here?"

"Maybe. Be quiet." In silence they fastened the girl's hands by her side, and tied a fresh knot in the gag. What were they going to do?

She was not left long in doubt. The old woman moved quickly to the great clothes press and wardrobe by the far wall, and threw open the doors. The upper part of the interior was a mass of indescribable litter, but the bottom was a chest with a lid, which the old woman lifted, disclosing a perfectly empty space quite large enough to conceal a slight girl like Christine. They were going to put her in there—they were going to smother her.

Are the airholes big enough?" asked the man. The old woman nodded. "I saw to that. I didn't want her dead. Here, lift her in." (She was not to smother, then.)

Wilson hesitated for an instant. "Are you sure it's the man?" he asked.

"Sure—would I make a mistake? He's Torrance's adopted son, and he knows the girl too. I saw them together once. What are you waiting for?"

Whatever it was, he waited no longer, and together they lifted Christine and placed her in the long coffin-like chest. Then, with deft hands, they covered her with old clothes and litter from the top of the cupboard. Her face they covered lightly, but in such manner than no trace of human outline showed. "It will be pretty hot when the lid goes down," said the man loudly enough for the girl to hear, "but you can't smother. The airholes are free."

"Leave the lid up until the last moment," he commanded the woman. "It may be a false alarm. What were you doing in the hall? What makes you think he caught a glimpse of you?"

"I saw his face," snapped the old woman. "I tell you, he's on the scent. But he'll never get her. I'll see to that."

After this ominous remark there was strained silence.

Ten, fifteen minutes passed. Christine fought to keep from swooning. If Mark were near she must help him. But she could hear nothing now. Only she knew that he had not gone away.

Twenty minutes. There was a whirr of another motor upon the road. The man sprang to the window and turned back again with chalk-white face. "It's Torrance!" he whispered, "and Johnson, the detective. If they find her it's all up."

"They won't find her." In an instant, while the man stood there stupefied with his own fears, the old woman slipped from behind him. Before he could spring upon her, she had drawn something from her dress and struck through the open lid of the chest downwards.

The man flung her from him upon the floor. "If you've killed her I'll do for you," he said, almost quietly. But the first step he took toward the chest was stayed by a confused murmur of sounds from below. Doors opened and shut. There were steps upon the stairs. "Too late," he muttered. "Here, let's get out of this." He closed the lid of the chest gently and swung-to the doors. The old woman scrambled to her feet. The steps and voices of the searchers were now distinctly audible.

Very quickly the man and woman unlocked the small door on the wall and disappeared through it into the sunlight on the roof.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

WHEN his car had swung lightly in at the inn door and the long screech of its wailing horn had died away, Mark lived through a moment in intensest expectation. He hardly knew what he expected, but anything could have happened without surprising him. In some vague way he had thought of himself as a modern Jack the Giant Killer, winding the enchanted horn before the castle of the imprisoned princess. In that adventure one remembers, the gates immediately fell open, and the princess herself appeared smiling upon the threshold. But in this adventure only Mrs. Hornby appeared upon the threshold, and she was not smiling. It seemed to Mark that there was a veiled hostility in her manner. However, he doffed his cap to her courteously, and asked, in an unnecessarily loud voice, if she could serve him with luncheon. The woman replied, curtly enough, that she could, but he noticed that she did not move aside at once to let him enter. She was a big woman, and, coming as he did from the bright sun into the shade of the porch, he could not see very clearly past her into the still darker hall. But, eyes sharpened by love and expectation are keen, and in the moment during which he confronted the immovable barrier of her stout person, he saw something—a glimpse, a fleeting vision of a face behind her—a face indescribably ugly. His heart gave a great leap and then began to beat with sickening rapidity. Once before, under a street lamp, he had seen that face. The certainty that he was upon the right track unmanned him more than any disappointment would have done, and he grasped at the trellis of the porch to steady himself. Nevertheless, he managed to reply lightly to the landlady's unnecessary remarks about the weather and the state of the roads, and the next moment was able to follow her through the now empty hall into the pleasant old dining room, where he and the lost girl had had their merry meal together.

□

It all looked different now, the atmosphere was changed, the charm departed. Instead of the rosy country girl, who had waited upon them before there was a waitress of the worst city type—pallid, hard, wearily indifferent. But (Mark's heart leapt again as he saw it) this particular waitress had an astonishing head of very yellow hair.

In one corner of the room a solitary bicyclist, busy with fried ham and eggs, looked up and nodded.

Returning the friendly nod, Mark drew a chair and sat down at a nearby table. The waitress, with a bored air, dropped a menu before him and stood by superciliously while he pretended to study it.

"Not like the grub one used to get here, is it?" asked the friendly bicyclist, unmindful of the listening girl.

"I have not been here since the inn changed hands," said Mark, "but I used to know it well and one was always sure of a good meal."

"That's so," with enthusiasm. "Old Lady Haffey kept a good chop and knew how to serve it. Only decent thing you get now is ham and eggs." Then, as Mark had given a hurried order and the girl had left the room, he dropped his voice and said with a confidential wink, "What I would like to know is how they make it pay? Must be some way. They're not here for their health. Say, isn't that girl a corker?"

"It depends," said Mark, who was talking against time, "upon what you mean by corker."

"Oh, well, you can see what sort she is, can't you? What's she doing out here in the country?"

"Her health, perhaps?"

The bicyclist laughed and applied himself to a remaining egg. "These eggs are fresh, though. Did you order eggs?"

"I—really, I don't know what I did order—just anything."

"You'll get that alright."

"Do you know this house well? It seems a picturesque old place?"

"Yes, it is. Darned picturesque. It must have been built at a time when they never made a room square if they could possibly put a twist in it or top off a corner. The rooms upstairs are all kinds of shapes, and there are little rooms higher up in each of the gables, with windows set so high that you'd need a chair to see out."

"Very interesting," said Mark, spilling some salt on the tablecloth and carefully heaping it into little mounds.

"Think so? I don't like that kind of thing myself. Are you motoring alone?"

"No—that is, yes, of course." Mark glanced at his watch and found that he had still ten minutes to wait. Why, oh why had he asked for twenty minutes? He had found out all he wanted to know in the first glance—the old woman, the yellow-haired girl. There could scarcely be any possibility of being on the wrong track. And if they had by any chance recognized him, what might not be done in twenty minutes. What might be happening even now.

He jumped to his feet in uncontrollable impatience.

"Oh, don't get the jumps," advised the bicyclist. "They take their own time in serving here. If you ordered fried chicken they'll have to catch the bird first." He laughed at this ancient jest with hearty appreciation.

"It's very quiet here," said Mark. "Do they keep no boarders?"

"That's it?" said the other. "Do they? I've never seen anybody round at this time of day except that girl and the landlady and the chore man."

"What's the chore man like?"

"Just like any other chore man."

□

Mark glanced at his watch again. Five minutes yet. Should he begin the search alone? No, he dared not risk a failure. But why had he asked for twenty minutes?

"Say, you are in a hurry, aren't you? That's what comes of motors. They give a man the jumps. Great road for motors this. Here comes another, a big one. Gee, they're making the dust fly."

Mark did not wait to look. He sprang for the door, nearly knocking down the girl, who was coming back with a loaded tray. Unable to control himself another moment, he flung all caution to the winds and rushed down the passage, pushing the stout landlady aside as carelessly as if she had been a bag of meal. His white face in the door was all the signal that the others needed. With businesslike promptitude Johnson produced the warrant.

"Now, then," he said to the heavily protesting Mrs. Hornby, "we're here to search. There's no use having words about it. No good comes of resisting the law, you know."

In the hall his directions were brief and to the point.

"Cunningham, watch the back and side doors. Burns, stay here by the front. Don't let this woman move. Mr. Torrance, go through every room on the ground floor. Mr. Mark and I will take the upstairs. If any of you need help, whistle. If I whistle, come as quickly as possible."

Before he had finished Mark was half-way up the stairs. The landlady had ceased her protests and there seemed an absolute silence in the house. Upon the upper landing the door of the hotel parlor alone stood open, all the other doors were bafflingly alike.

"Do not let us waste time here," urged Mark, seeing the detective produce a formidable bunch of keys. "There are gable rooms, higher up—a man told me—look, there is the stair."

"Get your pistol ready, then. It's a bad stair for a fight. And let me go first. I must, you fool, the door is closed and I may have to break it in."

The door at the head of the narrow stair, however, was not locked. It opened easily, and the two men found themselves in a small dark entry with a door at each side of them. Mark sprang for one door and the detective for the other. Both opened without trouble and both led into empty rooms. The rooms themselves were very similar, store rooms evidently, though in each of them stood a small camp bed for use, probably in times of overcrowding.

The blank disappointment on Mark's face was reflected upon that of the detective, but almost as they turned to rush downstairs again a breath of wind from the open window brought an odor, faint, yet unmistakable, from the left-hand room.

The two men paused as if a voice had called them.

"Carbolic," whispered Mark. "She has been here."

The detective sniffed the air like a pointer. "Yes," he admitted, "and not long ago—and look! The window is barred. But where is she?"

Mark pointed silently to the little door in the low side wall. It was partly open.

"There," he said, "they have gone that way, while I waited downstairs. We've lost her."

The big detective shoved him unceremoniously down upon a chair, and, opening the little door, looked out. There was bright sunshine on the roof and some pigeons cooed by the old red chimney. No one was in sight. A little to one side and in the shadow of one of the projecting gables a strong ladder leaned against the eaves. The detective peered over gingerly. Its lower end dropped straight into some shrubbery, which, in its turn, straggled away to the good-sized bit of maple and beech wood, which made such a picturesque background for the picturesque old house.

□

"A clean get-away," murmured the detective. "That's what comes of unbusinesslike methods. The old girl recognized the boy and they've made off."

"Well," he said, returning to the room. "They've gone, I guess. But we'll look through the place below to make sure. They have such a small start that with two autos and a bicycle (I see one standing by the fence) we ought to get them before they go far. Buck up, sir. We're only beginning. Let's get a glance at these clothes presses first."

With practiced hand he flung open the big doors. "Nothing there. Wait, let's look in the chest." He lifted the lid and peered in. "Only the usual litter," he said. "The kind of thing one keeps for seven years to see if it will come in handy. I think we are wasting time here. Come along, sir."

But Mark did not come along. He was sitting very stiffly upon the chair into which the detective had thrust him, staring, as a hypnotized man might stare, at something upon the floor—over by the closed chest.

"What is it?" asked the detective startled.

Then, as Mark did not answer or unfix his dreadful gaze, the other, with a thrill of communicated horror, followed the direction of the staring eyes, slowly, over the board floor, to a spot near the wardrobe where something slowly trickling from a warped seam of the chest had formed in a tiny pool of red. The detective needed no second look.

His shrill whistle rang out, loud and menacing in the quiet room. A rush of footsteps sounded from below. Then he laid Mark, who had fainted, upon the bed.

. . . . . .

In after years Mark never forgot the slow torture of his recovery from that swoon. The sight of a gable window was always enough to bring it back in its full horror. He shuddered at the sight of a wardrobe, he could never sit comfortably in a room with sloping ceilings, yet his first really conscious look fell upon Mr. Torrance's face alight with tender anxiety—and something else. The first words he heard were:

"She is safe."

Just who was safe Mark's clouded brain did not realize, for the moment, but the monstrous horror which had enveloped him seemed to fall away. Somewhere a clutching dread loosened. He smiled contentedly and let the bicycle man feed him fiery stimulant with a spoon.

"Most remarkable thing I ever heard of," said the bicycle man, between spoons.

Mark's eyes strayed to the window, a gable window, high up. It all came back, the chest, the red spot on the floor. Don't go off again," said the sharp voice of the bicycle man. "It is all right, you know; really it is. Have another brandy."

"Better tell him at once," said Johnson's familiar voice.

"She is safe, Mark." This time the words had definite meaning, a meaning to which the look upon Mr. Torrance's face gave point and force. Mark saw him raise his hand unaffectedly to eyes which were wet with tears of thankfulness. He lay quietly, trying to realize.

"But," he said in a whisper, "I saw blood."

"Yes, I know. It is only a trifle, thank God. A knife thrust in the arm. She is quite safe, my little daughter, quite safe."

□

Mark drank the remainder of the bicycle man's brandy in a gulp and sat up, but, seeing the chest, he fell to shuddering. "Let's get out of this horrible room," he said. "I can't realize it here."

The big detective offered his help with alacrity and Mark found himself glad enough to lean upon his arm. Mr. Johnson, it is needless to say, was quite himself again. Success (after a few trifling setbacks) had restored him to all his usual complacency.

"I'm afraid you weren't just cut out for a detective, Mr. Mark," he told him with kindly banter. "You faint just a little bit too easy. It doesn't do in the detective business. Why, first thing when you see something that shows you we've hit on the scent at last, what do you do? Keel over."

"I thought—"

"Yes, but you shouldn't have thought. Find out first, think after. As a matter of fact it was that knife thrust that saved her. If it had not been for that blood we might have gone away, chasing the fugitives, and left her in that devilish chest. As it was, we got her out of it none too soon."

"Don't talk about it, Johnson," entreated Mr. Torrance. "I only want to remember that she is safe."

"Where is she?" asked Mark, when he could trust himself to ask the simple question.

"She is in one of the rooms downstairs. The doctor is with her. He says she must have absolute quiet. I broke down and he sent me away. You shall see her soon."

The two men clasped hands in an ecstacy of gratitude. Drawing himself up, Mark inhaled the first free breath he had known since the search began.

"We have sent for her sisters," said Mr. Torrance. "They will know by now that she is safe."

"Have the ladies come yet?" asked the doctor, putting an anxious face in at the door. "If not, it is quite necessary that someone who knows the patient well should see her at once. It must be someone in whom she will feel implicit confidence. She has awakened in what seems to be an agony of terror. I cannot reassure her. It is imperative that she should be quietened. Which of you gentlemen would be most likely?"

He paused and glanced at them enquiringly.

The three men who loved her looked at one another. Then the glances of two of them fell upon Mark. But Mark was seized with sudden fear.

"I dare not," he said. "How do I know? She may not—"

"I think she will, son," said Mr. Torrance, and Tommy gravely added, "I think she will."

"Come quickly then," said the doctor, somewhat mystified.

Mark followed him down the corridor into a quiet room, where the sun of early afternoon lay

Continued on page 47

A SLAVE TO FASHION

A Story of How a Feather Brought Happiness

By HELEN M. DRUMMOND

"LAN' sakes," said Miss Tiggs, as she studied a fashion sheet that she had rescued from a neighboring ash barrel, "Lan' sakes, if tight sleeves ain't in again." She glanced rather wistfully at her own puffed ones, and stroked the shabby stuff with careful fingers.

"Guess it won't turn no more," she murmured, thinking very rightly that a blouse that had first seen light at a rummage sale, and that had been turned and sponged twice already, could not enter the social life of Binders Alley again unless subjected to some stronger method of renovation. Miss Tiggs shook her head; to dye it would cost twenty-five cents, and in its proudest moments it had only been priced at fifteen.

"I do love to be got up stylish, too," she said, reverting again to the fashion sheet, "an Mis' Hogan's got her new hat for $1.49—it ain't got much style, though," she ruminated, thinking that if by any chance, Mrs. McWhirter should pay her the dollar that she owed her for fixing over her last year's skirt, she could get a cheap straw and trim it herself. But Mrs. McWhirter's paying of bills was an event too far in the future to allow of any present consideration, and Miss Tiggs not being given to melancholy except at the spring and fall millinery openings, recovered her spirits and commenced to eat her frugal supper. Life had not dealt altogether kindly with Miss Tiggs, sewing at its best was never very profitable, but hers was a cheerful spirit, and one that took interest in everything, from the naming of the Hogan twins to the number of times that Mr. McWhirter, Sr., came home in a state fit to be interviewed only by the wife of his bosom. So she ate her bread and dripping contentedly, and with a fine disregard for social etiquette, scooped up her potatoes with the only knife that her cupboard possessed.

"I do wish't I'd a new hat," ste observed," pensively, "but then, lan' sakes, I guess I can fix up the old one so that it'll look real smart. Maybe Mis' Smith'll give me a bit of trimming when I take back her plain sewing." Mrs. Smith dwelt in a world far removed from Binders Alley, but occasionally a bundle of old finery found its way to the humble dwelling of Miss Tiggs, and then it was that that lady appeared in gowns and hats that were the envy of the whole neighborhood for months afterwards.

□

"Susan Tiggs is that stuck up," Mrs. McWhirter had observed on one of these occasion, "that there's no bearing with her; Lor' ye'd think she was the only person that ever had a muff." But the old velvet muff had been worn out many a month before Mrs. Smith thought of the little seamstress again, and gave her a few sheets to hem.

Miss Tiggs finished her supper and put the plates in the sink.

"Guess I'll take the parcel to Mis' Smith now," she reflected, "the walk'll do me a mite of good after settin' in the house all day." She put on her things, and locking the door, went downstairs.

"Goin' out, Miss Tiggs?" called Mrs. McWhirter grimly, from over the banisters. "If you see Mr. McWhirter anywheres, you tell him to hustle right along, I've got somethin' real important to tell him."

"Yes, Mis' McWhirter," answered the timid Miss Tiggs, fervently hoping that she would not meet that gentleman, whose condition at that hour of the day would probably be best described as "unstiddy on his pins." So she hastened to the front door pursued by howls of the Hogan twins, who having only arrived a few weeks ago, seemed to find the world not at all to their liking.

"Poor Mis' Hogan," soliloquized the little seamstress, as she trotted along, "she might a been satisfied with one, but then they always did want more'n anyone else, them Hogans, they're a graspin' lot."

Up town she went till the houses grew bigger, and at last Mrs. Smith's mansion appeared, and Miss Tiggs, climbing the great stone steps, rang the bell.

"Mis' Smith at home?" she enquired, with dignity, of the butler. "Tell her Miss Tiggs is waitin." Mrs. Smith appeared after a few minutes, and smiled pleasantly over the sheets.

"Very nice indeed, Miss Tiggs," she said, as she paid her, "and I have here a little bundle of what I thought you might find useful." Miss Tiggs' eyes glistened gratefully.

"You're real kind, Mis' Smith," she said, visions of old lace and ribbons by which a hat not unworthy of the name of Tiggs might be trimmed, passing in front of her dazzled eyes. Mrs. Smith smiled, and the little seamstress trotted the long way home again, weighed down by delightfully anxious thoughts concerning the adorning of a new hat that was to electrify the elite of Binders Alley. She crept up to her room, the twins were hushed, but the lively tones of Mr. McWhirter and his spouse showed that the important piece of news had not been all that it was expected to be. Miss Tiggs unlocked her door, and lighting the lamp, put the bundle on the table and cut the cord with trembling fingers.

□

"Maybe it'll be a blouse waist. I just needed a new one, or a bit of silk," she observed hopefully, as she drew off the last wrapping; but, alas for the vanity of all human wishes! out fell an eminently useful pair of blue serge bloomers! Then Miss Tiggs burst into tears. All her hopes of astonishing the neighbors vanished into thin air. Nobody would be astonished, or even interested in a pair of bloomers. She turned them over.

"Not a mite of trimmin', even," she said hopelessly, "I better give 'em to the twins, Mis' Hogan kin put one in each leg an' carry 'em, kind of Indian like." She shook her head and wiped away a bitter tear.

"I guess you can't pay the rent an' have a new hat too," she observed, clinking the five quarters in her hand, and then in a burst of unsatisfied longing: "Oh, I do wisht I could have a mite of style about me, just once't."

A month passed and Miss Tiggs fell ill, not seriously, but rheumatically, and was obliged to keep to her bed.

"No, I ain't sick," she answered to all enquiries, "it's only them bones of mine, they won't stop their aching." Mrs. Hogan brought the twins in for company, and cheerfully gave her afternoons to her sick neighbor; Mrs. McWhirter sat up nights and administered tonics, while even Mr. McWhirter was considerate enough not to make his nightly tumble right opposite the invalid's door.

"Ain't they pleasant, though," thought little Miss Tiggs, turning painfully around in her bed. "Everybody's so kind, an' them bloomers'll come in real useful when I git around again." She stifled a sigh as Mrs. Hogan displayed her fashionable straw at $1.49, and chased away a tear at the sight of Mrs. McWhirter's last year's bonnet, imposingly renovated by the milliner across the way.

"Them strings with the rosettes is real classy," she observed wistfully, trying to take an interest, as Mrs. McWhirter turned from side to side at the cracked mirror.

"Ain't they, though," responded the stout lady in question, "I'm real pleased an' McWhirter is too." A smile crept into Miss Tiggs' eyes at the mere thought of the beer-loving Mr. McWhirter taking an interest in anything beyond his own strictly personal likes and dislikes, but she tactfully suppressed it.

"There, if that ain't a knock," grumbled the other regretfully, putting the bonnet under the bed. "Now whoever is looking for rooms at this time of day?" She left the room, but soon stumped heavily up again.

"Visitors, Miss Tiggs," and before the words were fairly out of her mouth the imposing form of Mrs. Smith loomed up behind her.

□

"I take this as real kind of you, Mis' Smith," said poor little Miss Tiggs, raising herself up painfully in bed. "I didn't expect no such pleasure, or I'd a bin fixed up a bit." Mrs. Smith sat down on the one chair that the room possessed, and looked at the pitiful little figure with the skimpy knot of grey hair, and the toil-worn hands, moving painfully on the shabby coverlid, and her heart was touched.

"You poor soul," she said, leaning forward. "Now, what can I do for you?" Miss Tiggs looked gratefully at her, then at the roses that she had brought.

"I hain't seen a rose, not since four Easters ago, when you give me one, just like that, for me hat."

"Oh!" said Mrs. Smith, "I remember, but dear Miss Tiggs, I came to bring you a little present from our sewing circle." Miss Tiggs looked at the five-dollar bill laid on the counterpane, and her face flushed.

"I never took charity before."

"But it isn't charity," explained Mrs. Smith, with unusual sympathy, "we just wanted you to buy something for yourself, something perhaps that you've wanted." Miss Tiggs sat up in bed with a jerk.

"Oh, ma'am," she demanded pitifully, "have you ever wanted anything all your life, and didn't have no money to buy it with?"

"What is it?" asked Mrs. Smith, gently. Miss Tiggs lay back on the pillow with flushed cheeks.

"An orstrich feather," she whispered, and then with tears in her eyes:

"Oh, I shouldn't have said it, ma'am, but somehow when you've been thinkin' all your life of one thing, an' it so foolish, too," she concluded weakly.

"But why a feather?" asked Mrs. Smith in a puzzled way. Miss Tiggs raised herself up in bed, and leaning her chin on her skinny hand, looked pathetically around the bare room.

"You see, Mis' Smith, you've allays had all you wanted, you never had to do without your supper to buy a mite of trimmin' for your hat, did you? An' you ain't never hankered and hankered for jest one thing, an' never been able to think on it even; once't I found a cock's feather in your stuff, but it wasn't no good, it blew away immediate." She sighed at the sad memory and went on:

"An' oh, Mis' Smith, the day I went to your house, I put up a bit prayer, I was so hopin' that I'd get somethin' real toney, but I guess the Lord didn't mean me for style, for he only sent me a pair of bloomers." Tears came into Mrs. Smith's eyes.

"Oh, you poor dear," she cried, "you send right out and buy a feather, or wait, I can get one and send it over."

□

"Do you really mean it?" questioned Miss Tiggs, weakly.

"I do," said Mrs. Smith, decidedly. "And I'll go out and get one this very minute."

"But the ladies?" queried Miss Tiggs doubtfully, "what'll they say?"

"Don't you mind about the ladies," answered Mrs. Smith, "I'll see to them." She nodded her head decidedly, and with a bright smile said "goodbye."

An hour later came a business-like ring at the door, and a small message boy left an interesting-looking box at the door, which Mrs. McWhirter, wiping her hands upon her apron, received with haughty dignity. She turned it over and over, shook it, and then applied her nose gently to the crack.

"Lor', what kin it be?" she ruminated, and then in a piercing whisper:

"Mis' Hogan, there's a box for that Susan Tiggs." Drawn by this enticing piece of news, Mrs. Hogan poked an interested head out of her door.

"Smell it, why don't yer," she adjured.

"It have," answered Mrs. McWhirter irritably, "an' it ain't no use."

"Be it heavy?" queried Mrs. Hogan, reaching out for a comfortable feel.

"No, it ain't," responded Mrs. McWhirter, with a frown, trying to peer under the cover. Just then Miss Tiggs' weak voice called:

"Oh, Mrs. McWhirter, was that a parcel? Maybe it was my orstrich feather."

For one long agonized second Mrs. McWhirter and Mrs. Hogan looked into each other's eyes.

"An ostrich feather," breathed the one in an awestruck voice. "Mercy me!"

"An ostrich feather," whispered the other faintly, "Oh, Lor.'"

They stumbled upstairs to the little room where Miss Tiggs lay, and gave the box into her trembling fingers, then watched with envious eyes as the downy plume was lifted out of its tissue paper wrappings.

"For me new hat," said Miss Tiggs, proudly, turning it around so that its several charms could be admired, "a present from some friends," she added, with a fine affectation of carelessness, just to show that she was accustomed to a society above that of Binders Alley. Mrs. Hogan sat in silent astonishment, too overcome for speech, but Mrs. McWhirter was haughtily admiring, saying that she'd seen as good, indeed as much as had as good, in her day. But Miss Tiggs was lifted to heights far above the envious feelings of her neighbors, and only smiled complacently.

"To think it's mine," she breathed ecstatically, as she smoothed its silky ends, "me that's never had a mite of style about me hats; Lord, ain't I the thankful creeture!" She put the feather lovingly back in the box, and then as a sudden thought struck her, twinkled all over.

"What with me new feather an' me new bloomers, I'll be the only thing in the hull place."

THE COST OF A CRIME

The Story of Yielding to Temptation and the Tragedy Ensuing

By ANNIE S. SWAN

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Reedham steals thirteen thousand pounds of trust money held by the firm of Lowther, Currie and Company, in London, England. He confesses to his friend, Lidgate, who allows him to escape, and who afterwards informs Mrs. Reedham of the crime. The only child, Leslie, is at school in Surrey. Leslie is brought home from school. Reedham, in the meantime, has found shelter in lodgings with Mrs. Webber, an old servant, and assumes the name of Thomas Charlton. He obtains employment with Archibald Currie, a brother of his former partner, and is unrecognized. "Charlton" does well and wins the esteem of Mr. Currie and his ward, Katherine Wrede. Mrs. Reedham suffers from financial stress. "Charlton" prospers for two years and then it is decided to send him to South Africa. While absent on a six months' trip in Africa, Turner, a fellow-employe, determines to find out more about "Charlton."

CHARLTON did not fail to grasp the opportunity and he had established Archibald Currie's South African affairs on a sounder basis than they had occupied for a long time. Currie had never so far been fortunate in his Cape representative, and had suffered through not having an agent on the spot absolutely devoted to his interests. Charlton then was the right man at the right moment; and he had done his work well. The satisfaction which ought to have been his in contemplating the issue of his journey was strangely tempered by a singular depression of soul he could not shake off.

He had no doubt of his reception by Archibald Currie, nor did he anticipate disappointment or lack of appreciation; also he thought of Katherine Wrede, with a strange mingling of pleasure and pain. Nevertheless the depression remained. He was astonished at the magnitude of the crowd, and wondered half dismally how long it would be before the boat train should get away.

He traveled with very few encumbrances, indeed it would be possible for him to rise and walk with all his belongings in his hand. But there were mountains and stacks of baggage in the hold, many rich women panic-stricken by the very name of war, were hastening back to England, and appeared to have brought all they possessed in the way of personal worldly goods with them.

Charlton, unencumbered as he was, was one of the earliest to leave the ship. As he stepped from the gangway, his face flushed, and the hand gripping his heavy portmanteau distinctly trembled. For his eyes fell upon the face of Katherine Wrede. She seemed to be alone, an immense thrill shot through him, and his heart beat. What could this mean? For what reason should she take this journey to Southampton to meet him? He took off his hat as he approached her, and kept it in his hand until they had exchanged greetings.

She was looking well and most attractive in a long, close-fitting coat of tweed, and a small coquettish felt hat with an eagle's quill. Her speaking eyes were aglow with pleasure. She welcomed him back to England as if she felt really glad he had come.

"Of course, you are surprised that I am here alone? Uncle Archibald is at the hotel. The gout is bad this morning, and in view of the character of the weather he thought he would be safer indoors. Oh, except for the offending toe, he is in the best of health. Yes, and spirits, they have been rising hourly at the prospect of your return. You have no idea how he has missed you."

Charlton smiled, and the somewhat strained tension of his features relaxed.

"And I hope you are quite well?" he said, with a glance at her glowing face, as he put his portmanteau down, and beckoned to a porter.

"Yes, don't I look it? I certainly feel it. We have had a very busy summer, yet it has seemed quite long."

"I do not go by the boat train, then," he said, doubtfully.

"Why, no; tell them to bring the stuff to the hotel. We slept there last night, and I think Mr. Currie will not return to London until to-morrow. Perhaps not even then. Do you know, we have got quite settled at Wareham, and we came from there yesterday?"

"Mr. Currie wrote to me, of course, that he had bought the place, but has the Hyde Park Square house been given up?"

"Oh, dear, no; we are going up presently for the winter. You will love Clere Minster. It is the most beautiful place I have seen in England, and we are in the very heart of Hardy's country. I am taking a course of him in consequence. But you have not yet told me how you are, after all your anxious and arduous labors."

Charlton only paused to give his instructions to the man handling his luggage, and then turned to walk by her side. His depression seemed to vanish at her touch, her friendliness was so spontaneous and so sweet to his starved heart that he could not thrust it away.

"I am quite well, thank you very much."

"You look well, but like one who has lived the strenuous life. I have heard from Uncle Archie how hard you have worked, and what marvelous results you have achieved. He is so enthusiastic about it, you can't think. That is why we are here. Are you pleased that we have come to meet you?"

A little shyness seemed to creep into her clear voice as she spoke the last words, and once more Charlton permitted himself to look at her face.

"You can imagine what it is to a lonely man," he answered readily enough. "Just before I saw you I was contemplating with a great impatience, I must confess, the probable length of time such a welcoming crowd would take to be satisfied."

"Uncle Archie thought you would like it, and he said he owed it to you," she said quietly. "Well, do tell me about the war. Did you see anything of it?"

He shook his head. "I never was nearer than fifty miles from the front. Part of the aftermath has come over with us to-day. That explains the size of the crowd, I expect."

Her eyes grew large and luminous with compassion.

"You mean that there are wounded in the ship?"

"Yes, about two hundred, the fruits of the Modder River. What are they saying about it here in England?"

"The interest is getting keener every day. I believe that people are beginning to realize that it may in the long run prove more serious than has been expected. This place, for instance, has become a perfect military depot. Yesterday afternoon I watched the troops embark in the Semiramis. You must have met her in the Channel."

"We did, but it is time they were waking up. It's going to be a very serious matter indeed, Miss Wrede. I fear more serious for England than for South Africa."

"The Boers? I am afraid I sympathize with them more than I ought," she said, with a sigh. "They are splendid fighters."

"Yes, and well prepared. They have expected this, and been preparing for it for years."

"Then you think it will be a long war?"

"I do."

"How interested Uncle Archibald will be! And are you glad or sorry to come back to England?"

She would come back again and again to the personal note, which of all others, Charlton wished to avoid.

"I have not much to make me glad," he replied unexpectedly. "If I had been a free lance I should not have come back, but gone out to the front and taken my chance."

"We should not have liked that. Uncle Archibald can't spare you. He has missed you so much," she repeated. "But I think I understand how you feel. Many men are volunteering now, even Mr. Currie's nephew, Stephen Currie, has spoken about going, but his mother will never permit it."

Charlton did not immediately reply. With the mention of familiar and suggestive names there rushed in upon him a realization of his position. Judged from the ordinary standpoint it was both assured and promising, but there was always the dread background of the past, the shadowy phantom of a future that might at any moment yawn open to engulf him. He told himself that he had made a mistake in returning to England, at least so soon, and he could easily have multiplied reasons for prolonging his mission. But of late Archibald Currie's letters had pressed for his speedy return; he had frankly said that he missed him greatly, and would even sacrifice something to have him once more at Old Broad Street. In the last letter he had said that the question of partnership would come up for immediate discussion and settlement on his return, as since the purchase of the Dorset place, of which both he and his ward were deeply enamored, it was his desire to withdraw gradually from business life. This, he said, would be impossible, unless Charlton would pledge himself definitely to remain at Old Broad Street.

In an amazingly short time, then, considering the strange circumstances of his life, Charlton had reinstated himself. Only his great gifts and his special determination, as well as the unique opportunity presented by Archibald Currie, would explain this; yet there was no elation in his soul. Nay, he was conscious of a prevision of evil he could not, with all his efforts, shake off. Katherine Wrede's welcome dissipated it for a moment, and when in the hotel sitting-room he received the hearty, even affectionate, welcome of Archibald Currie, it once more disappeared.

"You are looking well, but thin, very thin. Don't you think so, Katherine?" said the old man delightedly, as he took him by both hands. "We are glad to see you back, and I am profoundly grateful for the service you have rendered. I hope you don't need to be told that?"

"Thank you, sir," said Charlton, with a faint smile. "The circumstances were special, the opportunity unique. It would have been criminal had they been neglected."

"I will leave you to discuss the dry details," said Katherine brightly. "Perhaps I shall go back to the dock again. I am thinking all the time of those poor fellows bound for Netley. Oh, it is horrible!"

She went quickly out of the room. In a word Charlton explained her words, and then, sitting down together, they went minutely into the details of the South African business. Charlton had it all at his finger ends, and his clear, succinct account of what had been done, and what would still be done, filled Archibald Currie with the liveliest satisfaction.

"You have proved yourself invaluable, Charlton, and, believe me, I can never, I will never, forget it. We must discuss the future later on. Meanwhile, unless you are in a hurry to return to London, for any personal reason, you might come down to Wareham with us to-night, and we can all return to town to-morrow together."

Charlton hesitated a moment.

"I think if you do not mind, I will go back to London to-day."

"Very well; we can all go up. The Hyde Park Square house is open and ready for us. You had better come there for one night at least."

"My old lodgings are ready for me. I wrote to my landlady last mail, telling her to expect me by this boat."

"Yes; but now, perhaps, it might be advisable for you to remove from Camden Town. Your means will permit of a better neighborhood."

"I am very comfortable," replied Charlton, biting his lips; "my landlady is an old servant of my family, interested in me. I feel at home with her."

Archibald Currie looked surprised. It was absolutely the first time Charlton had made the most remote allusion to his private affairs. His employer, though aware that he journeyed from Camden Town every day, did not even know his exact address.

"Well, I don't wish to press you; but at least you will come out to dinner, and we must have a week-end at Wareham very soon. You will be charmed with the Old Manor House. Miss Wrede is making an idol of it. Nothing has surprised me more than her apparent love for, and adaptability to, country life."

"I should say that Miss Wrede had wonderful gifts in that direction. She is so bright," said Charlton sincerely enough. He was immediately struck by the keen, wistful look his employer cast upon him.

"You like her?" he said enquiringly. "You would have a good deal in common."

"She has been more than kind to me, Mr. Currie, and to a man in my position, kindness from a lady in hers means a great deal."

He chose his words with care, but their humility did not please Archibald Currie.

"Tut, tut, don't speak like that. A man of your ability and conscientiousness is any woman's equal. Believe me, Charlton, it never pays to undervalue one's self."

Charlton was silent a moment.

"Have you forgotten the circumstances in which we became acquainted, Mr. Currie?" he asked hesitatingly. "I came to you an unknown man without credentials, you must have understood that there was something behind?"

"Yes, yes, of course,' 'said Currie hastily, as if he would rather not be reminded in that direction. "But it is open to any man to work out his own salvation. Whatever fault may have been yours in the past, Charlton, and I can never believe that it could be a bad one, you have nobly redeemed the time. We all make mistakes, only we are not all found out."

The words immensely comforted Charlton, and his eye softened.

"Sir, if there were more men like you in the world," he said unconsciously, repeating the words he had spoken over two years before, "the world would be a different place."

Archibald Currie broke into a cheerful laugh.

"Well, well, I have been richly repaid. And now we shall have no more long faces. We are going to make a night of it when we get back to London to celebrate your return. Well, so far, everything has been going well at Old Broad Street, and Turner is still at his desk. But upon my word, I seem to grow less and less just to that man, I really dislike him intensely. He reminds me of a snake in the grass. I wish I had the courage to give him his marching orders."

"Don't see or speak to him," suggested Charlton. "I don't like him myself, but I shouldn't allow his existence to worry me."

"Well, he's a disturbing element in the place. I wish he'd take the craze of going to the front. I could spare him with great alacrity. He owes his place to you, Charlton, and he ought to know it. He will know it one of these days, if I get any more of his offensive looks."

"How's young Reedham?" enquired Charlton, with interest he could hardly disguise.

"Working steadily, but——" At the moment there was a knock at the door, and some letters and telegrams were brought in, some of them requiring immediate attention and reply. So Charlton did not hear what his employer had been going to say regarding the boy. His heart beat almost to suffocation at the thought of seeing him again, and his longing explained his eagerness to return to London without delay. When they reached Waterloo the carriage was waiting to take his fellow travelers to Hyde Park Square.

He left them there, and putting his own luggage in the cloak room, proceeded by omnibus to Old Broad Street.

It was only five o'clock, and he could have a word with Leslie before business closed, see for himself how the boy was looking.

He enjoyed his ride on the top of the omnibus, albeit the wind from the river was chill. It seemed to help him to clear his mental vision, to realize what he had come home to. And he was glad to get away from Archibald Currie and from Katherine Wrede in order to force his position, perhaps more particularly in regard to Katherine Wrede.

He wondered as he was trundled in leisurely fashion across the crowded bridge and down Fleet Street towards St. Paul's how long it would be before he would dare to walk a free man again under his own name on London streets.

It would not be possible for him to accept a partnership from Archibald Currie without telling him the truth. Everything would depend on the manner in which he received that truth. If the deception were forgiven then there would be no difficulty about the paying back of the money he had abstracted from the trust. It could be advanced easily from his interest in the new firm. If, on the other hand, Currie should take the harsher, narrower view, if he should resent the deception and think punishment was due, then his last end would be worse than the first.

But the telling of the truth, something told him, could not be long delayed. His position had become intolerable to himself. If ever the home he had deserted was to be restored, now was the time. But his heart no longer beat at the prospect. He was conscious of a strange, almost complete detachment in spirit from the old Norwood life.

His longing to see the boy was all that was left.

Surprise was depicted on various faces when he entered the office. It was known that he might return any day, and in the main the looks were welcoming looks. Turner merely glanced at him with a curious malignancy, and made no answer to his greeting. He had been biding his time, the time that had now come. A dull flush overspread the man's coarse features as he bent lower over his desk, but presently raised his head again to watch Charlton make his way as an arrow to its mark, to the far corner where Leslie Reedham sat. He even craned his neck to observe the close and dear intimacy of the greeting, the tremulous smile about the man's lips as he laid his hands on the boy's head. He could not hear the low spoken words, but he could imagine them, and his own smile was crafty and sullen as he made an entry on the page before him.

"How are you, my boy? It is an uncommon pleasure to me to see you again," said Charlton in a low voice. The boy's eager face flushed and his fingers gripped the offered hand. He had been very lonely without Charlton's fostering and kindly supervision, and had missed him more than he could have expressed.

"I am quite well, sir, thank you," he said. "I hope you are quite well? I—I—am very glad you have come back."

"Are you? You seem to have changed and grown. I find you altered greatly."

"Yes, sir, I am six months older, and—and—but I have no right to speak of my troubles."

"What are your troubles?"

The boy's lips quivered, and he glanced round almost piteously.

"Sir, I could hardly tell them here, when I should be at work."

"Surely not. Well, will you come home with me to tea to-night. I will see that you get safely back."

"I should like to come if you do not live too far away."

"I live at Camden Town."

"Ah, then, I could easily walk through Regent's Park home."

"To Regent's Park? Have you moved, then, while I have been away?"

"Yes, sir, some months ago."

"I am glad, it has brought you nearer to me. Well, you tell me about it as we go home. I shall be ready at six o'clock, wait for me when you are finished."

The boy nodded, and returned comforted to the contemplation of his work. The lonely feeling that had been so acute of late, and daily increasing, seemed to disappear at the sound of Charlton's voice. Comfort came to him.

They left the office together, and took a train at Broad Street for Camden Town. The compartment was so full that they had to stand the greater part of the way, thus intimate conversation of any kind was impossible.

When they alighted at the Camden station the rain had ceased, and the stars were beginning to shine steadfastly in the sky.

"It is fresher out here," said Charlton, as they stepped across the road. "It's only a few minutes' walk. Tell me now why you have moved to Regent's Park. Does your mother not find it a more expensive neighborhood?"

"That doesn't matter now," said the boy, dully, yet with a note of resentment in his voice. "I thought, perhaps, that you would have heard that my mother has married again."

"What?"

Charlton stood still on the kerb and helplessly stared. They had happily left the busier main thoroughfare, and turned into one of the quiet squares that abound on both sides of the road, so that their attitude was quite unobserved. Charlton's face had grown strangely white, and his features seemed to work convulsively.

"Married again, boy? It's impossible," he cried shrilly.

"It's quite true," said the boy in a patient voice. "She has married Mr. George Lidgate. He was my father's partner, and very kind to us since father went away. But—but I think it was horrible of them to marry so soon, I only knew after they had been married several days."

"Married to George Lidgate!" repeated Charlton in a hoarse whisper. "Let us get on, Leslie," he added, trying to recover himself. "Only a few more steps to the house."

He put his hand through the boy's arm and held him fast, and his steps seemed to totter as they began to move up the gradual ascent to St. Paul's Crescent.

"I wonder they were not afraid," pursued the boy, "because I know that my father is not dead. Lidgate talked to me about it one night trying to show me that I was treating my mother badly. I can't be the same. How can I be the same? I feel it is horrible."

"It seems so, and, as you say, your father should be alive it would be a terrible business."

"He is alive, I tell you," said the lad fiercely. "And I shall see him some day. I said that to my mother at the time, and she cried all night and could not sleep. And then Lidgate was angry, and spoke to me about it."

"Do—do they seem happy?"

"Happy?" said the boy vaguely. "Oh, yes, I think so. My mother looks ever so much younger, and, of course, he can give her everything she needs. But I—I can't bear it. We were happier at Clapton, even when we were poor. It doesn't seem right."

"This is the door," said Charlton, heavily fumbling for his key. "I sent her a telegram from Southampton, so she will be ready for us, I hope."

"Surely I have been here," said the boy, seeming to struggle with some memory. "I am sure I have been to this house before, once with my mother. I remember the red flower pots in the window."

Charlton knew that he had, but made no answer. He opened the door and stood aside to let him in. At that moment Mary Anne Webber appeared at the top of the basement stairs, and the moment Charlton saw her face he knew that she knew. He put up his hand as if to ward off some blow.

"A moment, Mrs. Webber," he said, "I will speak to you later."

He pushed the boy before him into the sitting-room and closed the door. The gas was lowered. He reached up above the round table, neatly laid for tea, and turned the light full on.

Then very deliberately, while the boy was looking interestedly round the room he took off his blue spectacles.

"Leslie," he said, and his voice rang out clear and strong, vibrating with all the passion of the fatherhood that had been so dear a part of him.

The boy startled, turned round sharply, and met his yearning gaze.

Mary Anne Webber, standing irresolute, wondering much, on the top step of the basement stairs, was suddenly startled by a great cry.

CHAPTER XI.

THE BOMB.

"YOU are all we have, Stephen, and it is your duty, for all our sakes, to stay at home."

Mrs. James Currie made this deliverance at the dinner-table at Fair Lawn on the evening of Charlton's return from the Cape. She had just been reading in the evening paper an account of the arrival of the first batch of wounded officers and men at Netley, and her fears, which much persuasion had lulled to sleep, leaped into new being at the news.

In appearance, a large, comfortable, motherly person, she had a narrow, nagging, unlovable nature, which made life sometimes very difficult for all the inmates of Fair Lawn. But none could accuse her of lack of interest in her children. She loved them, indeed, with a jealous, selfish love, which gave them little peace. Disappointed because her daughters had not made the brilliant matches she had desired and hoped for, she had concentrated her whole ambition on her son. And though much wroth, she was in a measure grateful to Katherine Wrede for having refused him.

Her knowledge of that young woman was sufficient to assure her that, had she married Stephen she, his mother, would have had no sway or voice in their establishment. She still hoped he might turn to the girl she had chosen for him, Susan Bracebridge, a colorless person, only too pleased to be guided by Mrs. Currie. Katherine Wrede's final decision, however, delivered in no ambiguous terms, had decided Stephen on a new venture. It was the time when war was in all men's mouths, and the blood of old and young alike was fired with the desire to do great deeds for their country's honor. Stephen had announced his intention of going out to the front with the C.I.V.'s.

"There are lots of other chaps without brothers going out, mother," replied Stephen, as he carefully pared an apple. "Don't be silly about it. Nothing's going to happen to me if I can help it; I mean, I'm not one of the reckless sort. I'll do my duty, but I'll look after my own skin, and take jolly good care those confounded Boers don't get a pot at me."

"What are you laughing at, Sophy?" he asked suddenly, when his younger sister suddenly giggled.

"I was wondering what's the use of going out if you're thinking of your own skin all the time," she said flatly. "I don't suppose these poor chaps that came to Netley thought much about themselves. If I went to the Cape I should try to distinguish myself at any price. I only wish I had the chance."

Sophy sighed as she uttered these unexpected words. There were times when she rebelled against the grey order and monotony of her life. She had been brought up well, if strictly, surrounded by every luxury; but she was not content. The womanhood in her stirred often in vague, rebellious longings. Put into words, Sophia desired to live.

"Don't talk about what you don't understand," said her mother severely. "Well, Stephen, I like your prudence; it is reassuring. Of course, I know you won't run any needless risks, but, all the same, I shall never know a moment's peace till you come back."

"We shan't be long gone," said Stephen cheerfully.

"Are the arrangements made, or any date for sailing fixed?" enquired his father interestedly. Personally, he was rather pleased that his son was going out. He could easily spare him from London Wall, and it would give him a certain distinction to say he had given his only son up for the country's good. Like many another, he did not anticipate a tithe of the woe yet in store.

Before Stephen could reply to his father's question, the servant came back to the room with the coffee, and at the same time gave a message to Stephen.

"There's a gentleman for you in the breakfast room, Mr. Stephen. He did not give his name."

"A gentleman, are you sure, Jane?" he asked suspiciously. "You know most of the gentlemen who come here, are you sure it's not a beggar or an imposter?"

"No, sir; I think I have seen him before. He is a perfectly respectable man."

Stephen pushed back his chair and left the room.

The breakfast room was on the opposite side of the spacious hall, a pleasant apartment looking across the Heath. Stephen opened the door with a quick impatience. A tall, broad-shouldered man in a dark overcoat stood by the table. He recognized him in a moment, of course, as Richard Turner, who had once served an apprenticeship in their own business.

He was not pleased to see him, and could conceive of no reason for such an intrusion after business hours except a begging appeal of some kind. Stephen Currie had been reared to be suspicious, and to give no help unless absolutely obliged. And then never gracefully, but grudgingly, as if the obligation were resented.

"Hulloa, Turner," he said abruptly. "What brings you here?"

"A bit o' private business, Mr. Stephen," replied the man, and the trembling note in his voice indicated that for some reason or other he was moved. "I wasn't sure whether to ask for you or your father, but I came to the conclusion it concerns you most."

Stephen was interested, and stepped back to close the door more carefully.

"Well, what is it? I can't conceive of any private business you can have with me, but go ahead."

"Yes, Mr. Stephen, I will. Do you remember a man called Charlton that Mr. Archibald Currie took on from God knows where, a couple of years or so back, and who has wormed himself very high up in the governor's good graces?"

Continued on page 46

Silver plate renowned since 1847 for beauty and durability bears the popular trade mark

1847
ROGERS BROS.
XS
TRIPLE

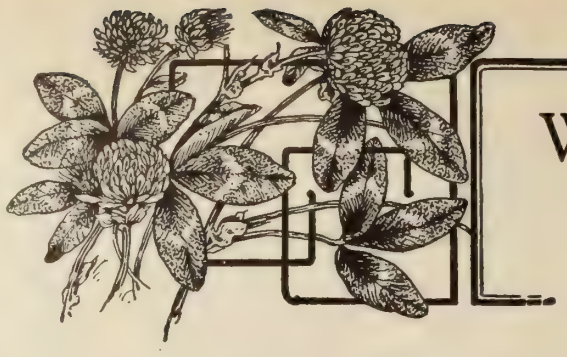
—the guarantee of the heaviest triple plate, assuring even longer service and greater satisfaction than ever before.

"Silver Plate that Wears"

Vintage Pattern

This famous silver plate is sold by leading dealers. Send for Catalogue " 82 " showing designs.

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO.
HAMILTON, CANADA
New York Chicago San Francisco



With the Journal's Juniors

A Corner for the Small Person

By COUSIN CLOVER

Our Winter Competition

WE have received some delightful and instructive letters on the subject of "A Winter Adventure," and the competition which closed in March has shown us just what good correspondents we possess in our many cousins. The first prize goes to Miss Agnes Florence Aylward of Penzance, Saskatchewan, the second to Miss Jennie A. Brown, Empey, Ontario. Congratulations!

Some Winter Letters

Empey, Ont., Feb. 2, 1912.

Dear Editor:—

Seeing that a competition on "A Winter Adventure" was open, I decided to send in a description of one of my winter adventures.

Christmas holidays having come, two of my girl friends and I arranged that we would go out for a sleigh-ride one afternoon. One of the girls having come from the city to spend the holidays with me in the country, seemed to think it a delightful idea.

At two o'clock we were on our way. The air was keen and brisk. The distance was about ten miles, but it seemed more like two for we chatted all the way, each one in turn telling about other experiences

When we arrived at the place we started for we were in a large village. It had a post-office, several general stores, and all places necessary to do a good day's shopping.

After doing our shopping, we had some ice-cream, and about four o'clock started for home.

The horse seemed specially frisky, and when we were about a mile from home, a piece of flying paper frightened him, so badly, that he threw us into a deep snow bank. We were not hurt, but felt very uncomfortable, with snow nearly up to our necks. With some of the said snow still on us, we climbed back into the cutter, and hoped to arrive home in safety.

After reaching there, and having a good hot supper, we sat around the fire and laughed about our adventure, which now seemed to us a huge joke.

JENNIE E. BROWN.
(Aged 14)

* * *

My Dear Jennie,

Yours is such an interesting letter that we have published it, although you have forgotten to have it certified. Being upset is not so bad when it means nothing more serious than a tumble into a snow bank. Isn't it strange that horses are so frightened of paper? I remember a runaway, which came from the frisky horse becoming alarmed at a wheelbarrow. Write again.

Pelham Centre, Ont., Mar. 18, 1912.

Dear Cousin Clover.

I am going to write to your charming Circle.

Gertrude you did certainly have a Bob ride. We have some dandy hills around our place. My brother and another boy put their sleighs together by two long scantling, and a sleigh at each end. They made something (I don't know what you would call it) to steer with, you can imagine for everyone calls it the automobile sleigh.

Cousin Clover, do you like to read? I do. I could read all the time if I didn't have anything else to do. Did you ever read "Jane Eyre"? It is a dandy book, and the "Elsie Books" are also good.

I think I had better close. So adieu Circleites, and Cousin Clover.

CROSS PATCH.

Clara wrote this, age 13.

MRS. BECKETT.

Fairview, Van., B.C., 1499 8th Ave.W

Dear Cousin Clover:

We take the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL and I like it very much. I always read the Juniors' Page. In the summer holidays we go out in the country. I and my brother found a camp stove and we cooked potatoes and carrots and beans, and we ate them.

We have two ponies, named Nip and Tuck. I ride on Nip with the saddle up and down the road. Tuck is only a colt. We have a calf and a cow. One day the calf got away and we had great fun catching it. I will close now.

Yours sincerely,

MARTHA MCKECHNIE.

Martha has received no assistance. She will be ten years of age next January.

MRS. ANNIE C. MCKECHNIE.

* * *

Dear Martha:

With such a name you ought to make a famous housekeeper some day, and, indeed, your neat handwriting gives assurance of your tidy ways.

Nip and Tuck are new names for me for ponies, and I am sure you must enjoy your rides on the former. I wish you had a photograph of your small self on his back.

Brownsville, Ont., Aug. 17, 1911.

Dear Cousin Clover:

My sister Elsie and I spent our summer holidays at our Auntie's, who lives a mile and a half west of Mount Elgin. A beautiful creek runs through the end of their farm. One nice afternoon we all went down to the creek to bathe and fish. This photo, which we are sending you, is where we are in the creek bathing. One other afternoon we spent down to our little friends, Edythe and Jack George. We had a good time down there playing all kinds of games. We played baseball, hide-and-go-seek, drop the handkerchief, and a lot of other nice games. The most that surprised Elsie and I was that a new baby brother came to our house.

I think I will close, wishing the page much success.

Aged 10 years. RUBY WILLIAMSON.

I certify that Ruby has done this without aid.

MRS. WILLIAMSON.

* * *

Dear Ruby:

Your letter is most interesting, and the photograph is very good. You look like a happy group, and as if you were enjoying yourselves. The baby brother must have been a most joyful surprise, and I hope he is happy and healthy.

VISITING OVER THE BACK FENCE

Cats in Japan

ACCORDING to the Japanese, the domestic cat appeared in their country at a relatively recent epoch, having traveled from China with the missionaries of Buddhism. In the middle of the sixth century of the Christian era sacrifices were offered to the cat, which was known by all as "the guardian of the manuscripts."

"The guardian of the manuscripts" kept away the mice, which otherwise would have eaten the precious papyrus. In some instances placards were set in conspicuous places among manuscripts as a warning to the mice: "Beware! The cat is here. She drives the mice." Portraits of cats were also placed in parts frequented by mice.

The cats were revered. For a long time they were kept in the temples. But their general desirability, and the charm of their grace, affection for men, and adaptability to human conditions so appealed to the layman that one by one very gradually their kittens were permitted to leave the temples and to become the pets of nobility After entering the families of the high officials of the empire they won their way into humbler households.—Our Dumb Animals.

Dear Cousin Clover:

I am sending you a composition on "Easter."

Easter is celebrated because it is the time of the year when Christ arose.

It is celebrated by dyeing eggs and trimming them with ribbons, getting a different variety of eggs, and by eating eggs. Some children think it a great pleasure to hide eggs about a week before Easter and bring in a large quantity on Easter and surprise their parents.

At our Sunday School we always send a large quantity of eggs to the Sick Children's Hospital. We take a box or a large basket and place a little straw in the bottom to imitate a nest, and all that have any to give place them in the box or basket. We have had as many as twenty-two dozen, but not always.

We country girls always look forth for sport in Easter holidays, gathering wild flowers, but this year it is too cold for them yet.

We celebrate Easter in the church as well as at home, special Easter services are held, and suitable hymns are sung, and the church is decorated with flowers.

We all should try to make Easter pleasant for everybody as well as ourselves.

Yours sincerely,

Aged 14. LULU HAGERMAN.

Certified, Mrs. W. Hagerman.

A MAY BREAKFAST

PREPARED BY

MARY H. NORTHEND

JUST wherein lies the difference between a May breakfast and a May luncheon seems to be a matter of some doubt. The degree of formality is determined by the time of day; therefore, a breakfast would be less formal than a luncheon just as a lunch is less formal than a dinner. A breakfast should be served earlier in the day than regular lunch hours, and the bill of fare does not differ from that used in the ordinary luncheon.

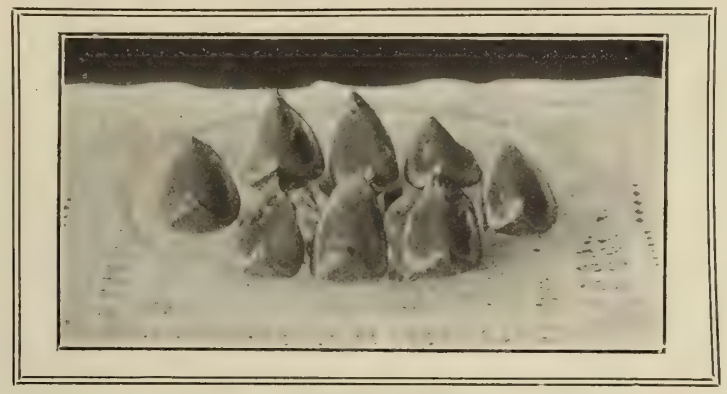
The May hostess should make the most of the beautiful and abundant spring flowers. It is well to select some particular one of these as a central theme, arranging menu and accessories to agree with the color scheme embodied in the chosen flower. The result is a remarkable degree of harmony, a feast for the eye as well as the palate. There is a wide field for choice, and there will be no difficulty in fitting the decorations to the occasion.

Suppose that the hostess wishes to use her gold-banded china. Let her invite her friends to partake of a narcissus breakfast, and decorate the room with potted ferns and great jars of the fragrant poet's narcissus nestled among its own sword-shaped leaves.

Spread the table with a fine white cloth, and see that the napkins match it. A tall reed-and-raffia basket of graceful shape may well serve as a centrepiece. Mass the narcissi gracefully, in a natural manner, using no leaves, for these are too stiff. For greenery, substitute the delicate twining smilax, with ferns to form a continuation of the mat. Place cards may be unobtrusively attached to the basket by means of narrow white ribbons, and candles in crystal sticks may be added to heighten the effect of yellow and white in the color scheme. The gold-banded china upon such a table will appear perfectly harmonious.

While it is not necessary to introduce the same colors into the bill of fare, it will be found that the scheme is made much more effective by so doing; and while it may take a little more thought, the results more than justify the planning. The following menu will be found reasonably simple and easy to serve, while is is also very satisfactory.

Grape Fruit Cocktail
Tomato Bouillon
Toasted Crackers
Olives
Eggs in Ambush
Lambs' Tongues in Jelly
Asparagus and Green Pea Salad, Cream Dressing
Meringue Tart
Candied Oranges
Candied Mint Leaves
Coffee



CANDIED ORANGE

MERINGUE TART

LAMB'S TONGUE IN JELLY

To make the grape fruit cocktail, take as many grape fruits as there are to be guests at table. Make a fancy shell from each lower part, by scalloping the edge of the part removed. Taking out the whole contents, place the pulp and juice in a large bowl. Add pieces of fresh or canned pineapple, halves of skinned and seeded Malaga grapes, sections of oranges cut into halves, and canned pears or peaches, with the juice that belongs to them. Sweeten to the taste, chill thoroughly, and serve in the natural shells, with a lace paper doily between plate and fruit.

TOMATO BOUILLON—Cut two cups of tomatoes, either cooked or fresh, into very small pieces. Add two cups of boiling water, half an onion, two sprigs of parsley, four slices of carrot, and a bit of bay leaf. Set it over the fire, and let it simmer for twenty minutes. Then drain it through a sieve that is sufficiently fine to hold back the seeds, but let the pulp pass through. Add a quart of meat broth or a quart of boiling water in which a tablespoonful of beef extract has been dissolved. Season to the taste, and serve very hot in the ordinary bouillon cups. Stand each cup in a soup plate, with a garnish of parsley branches thrust through rings of lemon peel.

CREAMED FISH—Use sliced halibut and a good white sauce. Arrange a garnish of parsley like a wreath about each round of toast. Care must be taken to serve this hot.

LAMBS' TONGUES IN JELLY—Cook four good-sized lambs' tongues, and set aside to cool. Partly fill a mould with clear aspic jelly, add the tongues when firm, and pour on the rest of the liquid jelly, which has been allowed to become cool, but not hard. Unmould when firm, and garnish with sliced lemon, cranberries and chopped aspic jelly, tinted yellow.

EGGS IN AMBUSH—Line small buttered tins or moulds with a mixture of flake boiled fish, bread crumbs, and seasoning. Moisten with milk and a well-beaten egg. Drop a raw egg into each cover with the fish mixture, and steam for thirty minutes. Unmould and serve at once with a white sauce.

ASPARAGUS AND GREEN PEA SALAD—Drain one can of green peas and half a bunch of cooked asparagus. When cold serve on individual lettuce leaves, or arrange the whole in a salad dish or platter, and serve with:

CREAM SAUCE TARTARE—To a cup of good mayonnaise dressing add two tablespoonfuls each of fine-chopped olives, capers and gherkins. Just before serving, add a cup of double cream, beaten solid, and salt if it is needed.

MERINGUE TART—Make a stiff meringue of eggs and fine granulated sugar. Drop in circular mounds on a board covered with wax paper, sprinkle with grated cocoanut, and bake about forty-five minutes in a slow oven. When cool, hollow out slightly, and fill the cases with raspberry jam. Serve cold with sweetened whipped cream.

CANDIED ORANGES—Peel the fruit and separate the sections without breaking the white skin that covers them. Place on plates in a warm room until they dry. Make a syrup with granulated sugar; boil until it will thread, and then add two tablespoonfuls of vinegar for each pound of sugar. Boil until it begins to turn a light yellow. As soon as this change in color appears, lift the kettle at once from the fire, and set into a pan of boiling water. Now take the sections of orange upon a greased fork, dip them carefully into the syrup, and drop them upon waxed paper to dry. Be very careful not to stick the fork into the orange, simply lay the pieces across it, and never stir the syrup. Candied mint leaves are prepared in similar fashion.

Roses are being used in profusion for dinner table decorations, and a pretty idea at a restaurant party was where the guests sat down in groups of ten at four tables and upon each table there was a large, low crystal bowl, in which roses of various shades were arranged.

At another dinner different shades of roses were represented upon each table, beginning with the most delicate pink, and shading through tones of almost a mauve coloring to the duskiest crimson.

A great liking is being shown for roses in the old-fashioned tea shades, a rather pale lemon and an intensified tawny yellow, all of them of exquisite beauty.

A FEELING OF PLEASURE

Is added to any meal or lunch that has for its part pure fruit, that is properly preserved, or a catsup that lends a tempting charm to any dish.

E D S

Preserves and Catsup

Conform to the wish of the most fastidious tastes for their genuine goodness. Only the choicest fruit is selected for E. D. S. Preserves and Catsup, mingled with the finest grade of sugar and the proper care in cooking and bottling that make it a delight and a feature of every meal.

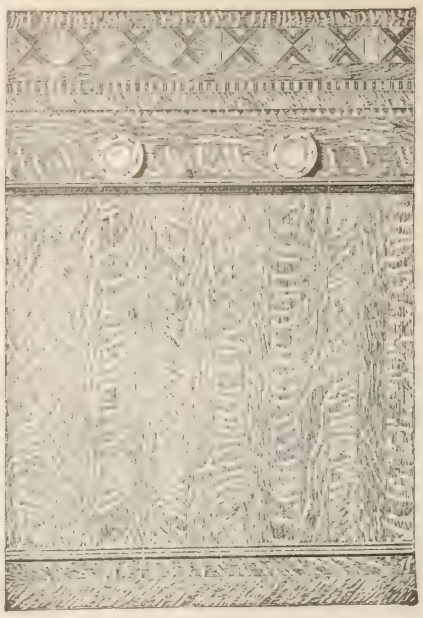
Remember the trade mark and see that your next grocery order includes E.D.S. Preserves and Catsup.

Made by

E. D. Smith

At His Own Fruit Farms

Winona, Ont.



How Your Walls Will Look With Fibre Veneer

Now you may have the beauty of paneled oak walls in dining-room or library at the cost of good wall paper. Plain quarter-cut effect in lower, above the plate rail border of parquet 12 or 18 inches wide. Fibre Veneer is hung like wall paper, is sanitary, washable, and very much more durable. It is not an imitation, but a perfect reproduction made from the actual wood itself.

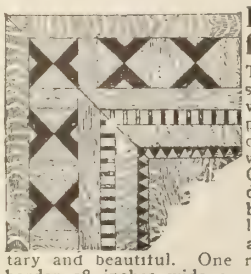
How much you will need

Fibre Veneer is 36 inches wide and 34 feet to the roll. One roll will cover a space equal to 3 rolls of wall paper. Chart below gives approximate quantities required for rooms 8 feet high to plate rail.

Room size.	Rolls wall required.	Rolls border.
10 x 13	4	1
14 x 18	5	1
16 x 22	6	2

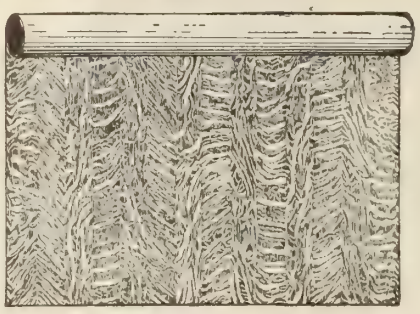
How Fibre Veneer is made

Fibre Veneer is reproduced from fine quarter-sawn oak, preserving all the beauty and distinction of the grain. It comes in rolls 36 inches wide, 34 feet long. Parquetry patterns can be divided into either two or three widths, 12 or 18 inches. It is made in a number of patterns. Samples sent on request.



Fibre Veneer for Parquetry

This is a perfect substitute for hardwood. Can be applied over any kind of floor. Shellaced varnished finish. Can be stained any desired color, after having been shellaced. Very durable, entirely sanitary and beautiful. One roll is sufficient for border 18 inches wide around room 16 x 16.



How You May Buy Fibre Veneer

Order by mail, enclosing remittance and specifying design and shade wanted. Send for samples if you wish to choose from full selection. We may have a dealer in your vicinity. If he cannot supply Fibre Veneer, we will be glad to fill your order direct. Write to-day.

Special Introductory Price
$1.50 per 34 foot roll.
Delivery charges prepaid.

HUGH SILVER & SON, PRESCOTT, Ont.

The Care of Silverware

Ever go into the home of a prosperous friend for dinner, and see the beautiful silverware arranged on the snow-white table linen and sideboard?

Ever in your own home notice how beautiful the silver looks after being properly cleaned, the different articles of jewelry, rings, toilet sets, silver handbags, etc.?

Ever stop to think of the hard labor and work it takes in the average household to clean Silverware? All the rubbing, scrubbing and polishing.

Ever think of the cost of the Silverware and consider that the rubbing and cleaning of it by the old methods wear away more silver than the hardest ordinary usage—rubbing is Positively Ruinous to plated ware?

The average life of Silverware is all the way from three months to a century according to the care that is taken of it. In some cases priceless heirlooms are handed down from generation to generation and the problem is always how to restore the natural lustre and brightness without injury.

There is one ABSOLUTELY SATISFACTORY way to clean Silver, Gold and Plated Ware, and WITH NO RUBBING. Thus the articles are not scratched—the surface is not marred or injured in the slightest—in fact we guarantee Wonder-Shine Silver Cleaner in every possible way. It does the work perfectly in one-quarter the time, and many articles can be cleaned at once.

At All Leading Dealers 25c and 50c per package

THE ORIGINAL GENUINE

WONDER-SHINE
SILVER CLEANER

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

By JESSIE E. RORKE

NEVER before have wall decorations shown daintier or richer colors than are to be found among those that are displayed this season. While tans, browns and a warm, deep green seem to be the leading shades, every variety of color is to be found; cream and ivory white, old ivory and champagne, all the delicate shades of green and blue and pink; greys without number in the prettiest shades that one could imagine, greys with a suggestion of blue or pink, greys that touch the borderland of lilac and heliotrope, and soft cloudy greys that are just grey and nothing more. Among the many browns and greens of the darker papers are a few dull blues and rich, deep reds, but the latter are shown very sparingly.

The most characteristic feature of the season's design is the stripe. It appears in every paper that is not entirely plain, sometimes as the whole design, sometimes forming a framework for the floral pattern, and sometimes the merest suggestion in a paper that is almost plain, but always there. Some of the bedroom papers have a quaint old-fashioned design that reminds one of the dainty flowered dimities that our grandmothers used to wear. Tiny pink rosebuds arranged in the inevitable stripe go clambering up a background of grey or mauve or palest blue. This background usually has some small design in self-tones—often the little check or spot that is suggestive of the dimity. Sometimes the design repeats the pink in the rosebud, but so sparingly that one feels the color harmony without searching out the cause. Frequently these papers are used without a border, the ceiling being re-turned and separated by a moulding from the wall paper, but the borders, when used, are decidedly Colonial in design, the rosebuds being arranged in the conventional wreaths and garlands that were distinctive of that period. Sometimes the roses are absent and the small fabric patterns of the background form the only design, the decorative effect being added by the border or by panelling. The cut borders are still most prominent and roses are certainly the prevailing flower. One most attractive paper is a delicate shade of madder brown, with wide satin stripe; the cut border is of roses in deeper madder brown, rose madder and brown green leaves.

DESIGN FOR FLOWER VASE

Panelling is used to an even greater extent than formerly, and the papers designed for the purpose are accompanied not only with borders, but strips for panelling, and a narrow design, which is used as a base trim. The latter is shown in very pretty designs, and is sometimes used when the walls are not panelled. Some of the papers are accompanied with cretonne, printed in a design to match the border and panelling, that may often be used with good effect. An exceedingly pretty paper was of soft grey, just shading into lilac, with a small self-toned design. The border base trim and strips for panelling had a slightly conventionalized lilac design in two tones of lilac against the grey background. The pretty cretonne had the same lilac design. These cretonnes are used for curtains, cushion covers and upholstery, but one must bear in mind the general rule that figured curtains should only be used with plain walls, and even the most charming designs should not prove tempting unless the wall treatment has been the simplest.

HONEYSUCKLE BORDER

One reason, no doubt, for the increasing popularity of panelling is the opportunities which it offers for originality and individuality of treatment. Each different room not only permits but demands an arrangement suited to itself alone, the placing of doors and windows, the height of the room, and its proportionate length and breadth are all factors that must determine the size and shape of the panels. Sometimes only one kind of paper is used, the panels being merely outlined by a border of some conventional or floral design; at other times two papers will be used, one figured and the other plain or nearly so, the panels being separated by a narrow moulding. Some very good effects are obtained in rooms that are treated in this way, but there is a danger of making the walls too elaborately decorative. They form a background not only for whatever may be hung upon them, but for the whole rooms as well, and all nature teaches us the beauty of what lies close to us, depends in a measure upon the quieter color and larger spaces of the background against which we view it.

Fabric effects appear everywhere; not only the dainty muslins and dimities are represented, but in the darker-papers one finds narrow stripes in soft dull browns and greys and greens that seem to have the very texture of the tweed and cheviot suitings. Some of the tapestry papers are very beautiful. They are shown both in self-tones and in color, the latter usually in rich, warm tones, that are suitable for library or living-room, while the self-toned silk tapestries in all the pretty, delicate shades that one can imagine are very rich and effective for the drawing-room. The ingrain and oatmeal papers still hold their place and vary little from other seasons, unless it is in the variety and delicacy of their colorings.

If the only requirement in selecting paper was to find something pretty it would be an easy task this season, but when the pretty paper is found one must consider whether it is entirely suitable, and this is not so easy to determine. If the room is light and, most particularly, if the windows are of plate glass, colors that fade quickly must be avoided. Green is the most difficult color to hold and should not be used in a bright room, except in expensive paper. Blue and pink are also fleeting colors that make a good quality of paper a necessity, if they are to be exposed to much light, but yellows, tans and browns, and some of the greys are more to be trusted. Satin-stripe or silk-finished papers are less likely to fade than those of an ordinary finish, so that less expensive papers in this style may be more readily trusted.

BORDER FOR TABLE SCARF

The size of a room has much to do with determining the style of paper that may be used. Small rooms will look best with the greatest simplicity of treatment. Plain papers or those with quiet, inconspicuous patterns, are best. If the room is low these may be finished with only an angle bead where they join the ceiling, but if high enough to permit it may have a deep frieze or border. The large designs of the tapestry papers are particularly suited to large rooms, and the panel arrangement and the upper and lower third (which is still in use, though less popular than formerly) may be used to advantage here. Decided stripes will make a room appear higher, while a re-turned ceiling will have the opposite effect. The use of a dark ceiling paper not only makes the room seem low, but gives a most unpleasant feeling of oppression and should always be avoided. Floral designs have almost entirely disappeared from the ceiling papers, but some very pretty designs in self-tones are shown. Cream and white ceilings are most widely used, but with many papers a lighter shade of the same color will give the best effect.

The paper will do more than anything else to counteract the effect of a dark room, the warm, bright colors, more particularly the yellow and yellow browns reflecting and intensifying the light, where duller colors would absorb it.

An efficient decorator may be trusted to consider all these details and bring a well trained taste to the selecting of our papers so that we may more safely rely on his judgment than our own, yet I wonder if, even at the risk of blunders, we are not wiser to do our own choosing. If left to the decorator our house may fulfil every requirement of good taste, yet it will lack personality, will have failed to be any expression of ourselves, and so will have lost a charm that has greater force than any harmony of color and design can give.

With the coming of May with its occasional warm, bright days, we begin to plan for the out-of-door living that will begin in another month at least. We are wisely learning to use our rooms as little as possible during the summer months, and not only spend our leisure hours, but eat and work, and perhaps sleep as well in the open air. We have different ways of arranging this, according to the planning and location of our homes; a wide porch or vine-covered pergola may serve as a living-room, or it may be a sheltered corner under the balsams, where hammocks, easy chairs, a table and rugs make every degree of comfort possible.

A very attractive jar for flowers may be made by stenciling the design in oil colors on one of the big creamy butter crocks, and a pretty addition to the afternoon tea table is one of the new linen trays, recently described in the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, with the design stenciled instead of embroidered. The protecting glass makes this quite serviceable. It is a mistake, however, to repeat the design too constantly; the cushions, for example, will be prettier if only one or two are decorated and the others left plain. The honeysuckle motif is simpler and would be pretty in only one color against some neutral ground.

STENCIL DESIGN FOR CUSHION

Light Housework

These two words tell the whole LIQUID VENEER story—they tell of cheery furniture, fixtures, metalwork, woodwork and hardwood floors—of sanitary rooms—of time, labor and money saved—and of a home that's always sweet and clear

When You Dust With

LIQUID VENEER

Simply moisten a cheese cloth duster with LIQUID VENEER and dust everything with it—from the grand piano to the dainty gilt frame on the mantelpiece. Always dust with LIQUID VENEER and your duster will carry off all the dust instead of scattering it, your home will always look like new, and your housework will be lightened in a way that will surprise you.

Trial Bottle Free

Write to-day for free trial bottle and let LIQUID VENEER speak for itself. Send the coupon.

"CHEER UP" COUPON

Buffalo Specialty Co.
240-E Liquid Veneer Bldg.
BUFFALO, N.Y.

Please send me, free and without further obligation on my part, sample bottle of LIQUID VENEER.

Name .....

Street & No. .....

City & State .....

BUFFALO SPECIALTY COMPANY
240-E Liquid Veneer Bldg., Buffalo, N.Y.
Accept no substitute, insist on the yellow package with the black tilted letters Liquid Veneer.

Home Oil, our new product, makes stiff scissors and shears cut easy.

Making Records at Home

a great feature of the

Edison Phonograph

The ability to make and reproduce your own records in your own home—the songs and stories of every member of your family and all your friends—in addition to all of the greatest entertainment of every kind

Think what that means! The Edison Phonograph—the instrument that you would choose anyway, because of the purity and sweetness of Edison tone; because its volume of sound is exactly suited to your home; because it plays both Edison Standard and the long-playing Edison Amberol Records; because it has the sapphire reproducing-point that does not scratch or wear the records, and lasts forever—gives you this great home-recording feature besides! And this feature doubles the pleasure of owning a sound-reproducing instrument.

Most Edison styles are regularly equipped to make records at home. Recording equipment for styles not so equipped can be purchased at slight additional cost.

When you go to your Edison dealer to pick out your Edison Phonograph, be sure to ask about this home-recording feature, and to get recording equipment with the instrument you buy.

There are Edison dealers everywhere. Go to the nearest and hear the Edison Phonograph play both Edison Standard and Edison Amberol Records. Get complete catalogs from your dealer or from us. Edison Phonographs, $16.50 to $240.00. Edison Standard Records, 40c. Edison Amberol Records (play twice as long), 65c. Edison Grand Opera Records, 85c. to $2.50.

Thomas A Edison
INCORPORATED
100 Lakeside Avenue,
Orange, N. J., U. S. A.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

AROUND THE HEARTH

Written for the Canadian Home Journal

By JENNIE ALLEN MOORE

We have seen the sun dip into the sea,
And steamers sail forth for cargoes of tea,
To China, and far distant lands.
The attractions are such we fain would stay,
But our home and duties call us away,
So respond to beckoning hands.

HOMEWARD BOUND

WE were at Victoria when we left you last month. A few hours' run by steamer brought us to Seattle, the place that was once described by a traveler as "a dirty, hillside town." It is now one of the loveliest of cities, vying with Naples in its magnificent view from Queen Anne and Capitol Hill, the waters of Puget Sound, and numerous small lakes glistening at the foot. The beautiful residences are not small and cluttered together as in many cities, but spacious as regards the building and grounds, leading on to the business part of the city, where all is the liveliest sort of activity. I like Seattle, its clean, broad streets, its delightful climate, its attractive and up-to-date stores, its optimistic citizens, its natural beauty, and that grandest of all attractions for visitors, the scenic drive, one hundred feet wide, for driving and motoring, extending for miles around the city, providing the most artistic and picturesque driveway one could imagine or desire; now winding up an incline, and around the hills at the water's edge, bordering on a precipice, through a primeval forest, the same wide, smooth, white boulevard, and at every turn the picture changes.

We visited the exhibition grounds, where the world's fair was held two years ago, and highly approved of the policy adopted by the city in building upon the principle of future benefit to its citizens rather than tearing down and destroying the vast structures, leaving not a trace of the loveliness in the shape of broad walks and drives and artificial lakes. The grounds comprised the three hundred and twenty acres that were set aside for the State University, and the buildings left standing are for the use of the students. The great Forestry Building, with its pillars of gigantic Washington fir trees in the rough, is converted into a museum; another is a library, provided with individual desks, each having a shaded electric reading lamp, and as we looked in, there sat students quietly preparing their lessons, with all kinds of reference books at their disposal, which must mean a great assistance.

Yet another building was used for a gymnasium, and entertainment was provided for the young people in much the same form as in the Y.M.C.A. The music hall provides an auditorium for concerts, as also does the great natural amphitheatre with its seats for twenty thousand people for outdoor recitals or discourses. Machinery Hall makes an excellent laboratory for chemical experiments, and electrical training. These buildings, with the dormitories and the residences of the president of the University, which is the "replica of the home of W. Seward," are artistically arranged, rendering the campus a miniature city.

WE chose between rail, tram, and boat, the water route to its rival city, Tacoma, and again was impressed with the broad spaces for streets and private property. There looms "The mountain that was God"—Tacoma, forty miles distant, and let no one be indiscreet enough to mention "Rainier," the name Seattleites give it, for that is a bone of contention which present historians are trying to settle by compromising "Tahoma," one of the names used by the different Indian tribes. On the map at present it is known by the hybrid Rainier—Tacoma, the monarch of the Cascades. One writer thus apostrophizes it:—

"O, rarest miracle of mountain heights,
Thou hast the sky for thy imperial dome,
And dwell'st among the stars all days and nights,
In the far heavens familiarly at home."

We saw in Tacoma the largest stadium in the United States, a veritable Coliseum, built of cement, capable of seating thirty-five thousand people, overlooking the Sound, beautiful in situation, and centrally located.

Two other places we visited across the border were Puyallup and Everett, two "dry" towns of five and thirty-five thousand respectively, and both well satisfied with the dry conditions. The only drawback to the first mentioned is its name, which, it is claimed, cannot be pronounced save by old-timers—Pew-all-up—accent on the second syllable. It is a suburb of Tacoma, connected by street railway, and between the two places there are numerous market gardens, and chicken ranches. Everett is a great lumbering centre, with twenty-five sawmills along the waterfront. Such enormous logs, in the mill yards I never saw! The climate in all these places is ideal, neither extreme heat nor cold.

Back to Vancouver, where the weather redeemed itself, for it was an uninterrupted week of sunshine, enabling us to see to advantage all points of interest, one of which was Capilano. It certainly deserves a trip to see the canyon, and view at close range the majestic scenery of mountain and gorge. To cross the narrow bridge, suspended by cables, the height of mountain above, and depth of chasm below, is something to which tourists aspire, but an experiment better to be avoided by nervous people. As the train pulled out we cast lingering looks at the "Two Lions" crouched in safety on a mountain top, keeping guard over North Vancouver, each with a giant paw stretched out on the snow-clad height. Good-bye Vancouver, city of mountain and beautiful scenery, busy, bustling, delightful place, reaching out to Australia, Japan, and many foreign ports, with a great future ahead, good-bye.

STAY, just one word before we part! Among our fellow travelers we met many who had been over much the same ground as ourselves, so we had common topics for conversation. In discussing the various cities we all agreed with a certain article one of them had read, which pronounced Vancouver the—I will not use the word, but say "smokiest" city of all, and the original word follows. Wherever one goes they are deluged with tobacco smoke. A few seats in the rear of the street car are reserved for smokers. Passengers are required to enter there, pass through the sickening cloud which is wafted forward at every entrance, so that the whole car is practically converted into a smoking room. This was the case in many cars I rode upon, and it reminded me of a controversy that arose in our home city in regard to regulations along that line. Our chief magistrate—all honor to him—in his remarks said: "Any man that cannot refrain from smoking while taking a street car ride deserves to walk." He was right. We are, as a nation, rising to a high platform on the pure air question, and are trying to live outdoors to get the benefits derived therefrom, and everywhere we meet this pollution.

We entered a cafetaria and found ourselves enveloped in smoke. We decamped, because when I eat my meals I want a place as far removed from tobacco smoke as possible. One woman related how she had watched a young man opposite her puff at a cigarette, lay it down, and swallow a few mouthfuls from his plate, then a few more whiffs, saturating his food with the taste and aroma of the weed, evidently to his great satisfaction. What are we coming to? Oh, yes; perhaps I am behind the times in not knowing that this is tolerated in first-class eating houses, both in Canada and the United States, but all the same, I hope Vancouver stands alone in this respect in our fair Dominion.

And women have to endure this! Well, on street cars they do, and on the public highway, but they do not have to remain in eating places where it is allowed. They can refuse to buy a seat in a grand stand, and be suffocated by the vile odors from cigars—by the way, why cannot special stands be erected for those who forget themselves in the presence of women, many of whom are too delicately constituted to swallow second-hand smoke, and for others who cannot live an hour without the eternal pipe in their mouth?

On the C.P.R. boats that run on the small connecting lakes there was solid comfort in this respect. The cabins for ladies and gentlemen were at opposite ends of the boat, and placards outside, midway, reading, "No smoking allowed beyond this notice." Would that such were universal! "Can we smoke in this car?" "No, sah, dere is de smokah," answered the burly porter, so I was free to enjoy my chair in the observation car.

Twice before I have touched on this subject, the second time in response to a letter; now, I will promise—no I will not, for I may get warmed up on the subject again. There seems to be something to fight against always, and when we are through with the liquor curse, we can shoulder arms for the tobacco crusade, for nothing short of legislation will help a city to rise above the debasing effects of habits that should be, but are not, under personal control, inasmuch as they deprive helpless individuals of their rights, and allow the stronger sex to be absolutely selfish, and inconsiderate of women's pleasure in public places. Men's rights as regards smoking in their own homes, is a private affair, and a question they settle for themselves.

HOME by way of Crow's Nest Pass. Don't ever miss it, reader, when you make this trip, as you surely will some day. This is early March, and I can imagine what it will be like three months hence. One night out from Vancouver, and we arrive at Arrowhead, where we take the boat for several hours, making five changes during the day from boat to train and vice versa, the last at Nelson, B.C., where we boarded our vessel, and in calm seas, anchored at the dock, slept peacefully until the signal to start at six in the morning was given, and the pulsations of the machinery informed us we were started on our journey through the waters of Kootenay Lake. It made a restful break in the long train trip, and we did not mind the changing in the least, as in every case we stepped from one to the other with porters and waiters to assist with the grips and bandboxes.

Just here it might be in place to tell you that we sent our trunk on ahead containing many things that as I supposed, "went along for the trip." Travel is a great teacher, and this I have learned, and pass it on, that if one goes to the coast to spend the winter, unless intending to visit in the middle provinces, there is no need of fur coats. A long cloth coat with a set of furs is all one requires for the climate there. A sweater coat to wear under the long cloth comes in handy for motoring, or for steamer trips, when sitting outside is enjoyable.

I have often seen the question asked as to what one should carry when traveling. I think I could arrange to go around the world with an extension suit case and a toilet bag. You see, one is on the move, and extra hats and boots and underwear are useless baggage. The first two can be replaced if they fail to last the trip, and one can easily arrange to have clothes laundered as they journey. A cloth suit with several tailored and one fancy waist, an evening gown of silk that does not crush easily; a simple little morning dress, if one intends visiting friends; a kimona, and let this last be of light weight material, preferably soft dark silk. With a few other little accessories, one can do considerable globe-trotting without the inconvenience of a trunk.

AFTER watching the mountains on either side of the train it was a relief to find ourselves on the prairie, and able to see things from the level. But the cold struck a chill after the balmy weather we had been enjoying, and it was comfortable to don the long-rejected fur coats. We made two stops in the prairie cities, and renewed old friendships, spending a delightful week with relatives near Moosejaw. This was a new experience, looking out of the window across miles of level country all covered with white glistening snow. It brought to mind an impression once written me from a friend living her first year in a prairie city, "If I could only command a mountain to rise up, it would be such a relief to the monotony of flatness." As far as the eye could reach in any direction, nothing but the dazzling whiteness, no trees nor shrubs, nothing but a few straw stacks and several houses to break the smooth surface. I can understand how easy it must be to lose one's way on the trackless expanse when caught in a storm, and how lonely for strangers coming to our country, to face week after week of winter snow and sunshine, looking out into space, and listening to the wind sweeping over the broad plain until, as one woman described it, "I felt as though I must shriek in company with the constant sound of the blast."

We have passed Winnipeg, and now the train is rapidly nearing Fort William. Four miles farther on is Port Arthur. These are called the Twin Cities at the head of the lakes, with great elevators and railway terminals. Here is where passengers can again break a train trip, and enjoy a voyage of nearly one thousand miles in majestic steamships, going by C.P.R. to Owen Sound, or to Sarnia by the Canadian Northern route, passing through Sault Ste. Marie, the canals and scenery being well worth seeing. These cities are fair rivals, Fort William boasting a larger population, while Port Arthur has the choicest situation, the former nestling at the foot of Mount McKay, and the latter, from its elevated position, looking across the bay at the Sleeping Giant on Thunder Cape, guarding the harbor entrance.

Icebound still are these prosperous cities, but ere many weeks elapse, the blue cold waters of Lake Superior will dance in the sunlight, and the sound of the boat whistle will be heard in the land, and great freighters will be carrying the millions of tons of wheat in storage to the world's markets, and steamers will be arriving with their cargoes of merchandise and human freight, the bay will be dotted with every design of water craft, and all kinds of business will be set humming.

We find ourselves clasping and buckling the straps on our grips for the last time, the porter gives us our final brush, the train slows up at Port Arthur, and as we draw near to our own door we feel with Farmer John, that "After all, the best of a journey is getting home."

THE NORMAL BABY

By GEORGE E. DAWSON, Ph.D.

GREATER than the conservation of natural resources, greater than the regulation of the trusts, greater than the science and art of flying, greater even than woman suffrage, is the question of the baby. And yet—paradox of paradoxes!—it is just as obviously true that no large section of mankind, nor any considerable number of individual men and women, have yet intelligently and consistently made the baby the chief interest of their lives.

Where is there a civilization whose domestic life, whose government, whose industries, whose culture, have been consciously ordered so as to insure the proper quantity and quality of offspring? How many men and women have yet deliberately and intelligently chosen to be, beyond everything else, good parents? Whose name has ever been inscribed in the Hall of Fame because he or she has contributed to the world a baby, fashioned according to the full measure of love and wisdom?

Nevertheless, the great parental impulse of mankind has always been sound. The baby has been nearest to the heart of the world. All the qualities of life that enter into what we call motherhood and fatherhood have been evoked by the baby, and they must ever be renewed through the mystic process of the generation and birth of children.

If, then, babies in general command the instinctive interests of men, and if such interests should be rendered more intelligent and effective in conserving the welfare of individuals and society, we may well enlist the aid of science in forming a judgment as to what an average baby should be. A few of the more obvious and best ascertained standards for such a judgment are herewith submitted:

OPEN YOUR MOUTH AND SHUT YOUR EYES

Height and Weight—While the size of a baby varies naturally according to racial and family peculiarities, within these limits it is a very significant measure of vitality. Elements of size, height and weight are the most obvious, as they are probably the most important. The average height of the new-born male child has been generally taken as 19.68 inches, with about one-fifth of an inch less for the female. The average weight of the male child at birth is 7.3 pounds; and of the female, 7.1 pounds. These are standards derived from the authorities of continental Europe.

Warner, an English authority, gives, for English children, a height of 19.34 inches for males, and 18.98 inches for females; and a weight of 7.55 pounds for males, and 7.23 pounds for females. On the other hand, Dr. Holt, one of the best American authorities, gives for American children, a height at birth of 20.6 inches for males, and 20.5 for females; and a weight of 7.55 pounds for males, and 7.16 pounds for females.

The baby grows very rapidly during the first year, increasing in height about 8 inches, and in weight something over 12 pounds. During the first six months the male baby grows nearly 5 inches in height and 8 pounds in weight; and the female baby grows 4.5 inches in height and about 8 pounds in weight.

Growth in height is affected by hereditary influences more than is growth in weight; whereas growth in weight is affected by nutrition and other environmental causes more than is growth in height. Roberts estimates that the baby at birth is about one-sixth of the height it will ultimately attain under good conditions.

Girth and Diameters of Trunk—The baby's development of chest and abdomen is another important measure of its vitality. A large chest indicates a robust child, while a small chest is apt to indicate a delicate one. Dr. Holt gives the average chest girth at birth as 13.4 inches for males, and 13 inches for females; while at six months the corresponding girths are 16.5 inches and 16.1 inches respectively. At birth the diameters of the baby's chest; that is, the breadth and depth, are about the same, giving the chest a roundish appearance. The diameters of the chest of the male child at birth are about 4.3 inches, respectively; and those of the female child, 4.2 inches.

As age advances, the breadth of the chest increases more rapidly than the depth, giving gradually a more elliptical form to the chest. Throughout infancy the girth of the average child's abdomen is about the same as that of the chest. As late as the end of the second year the girths of the chest and the abdomen are often identical, but after that time the chest girth increases much more rapidly. Too great enlargement of the baby's abdomen indicates intestinal disorders, and is especially a symptom of rickets.

Length of Limbs—There is a certain proportion between the limbs and the body, and a certain symmetry of the limbs, that indicates a properly balanced development. At birth the limbs are relatively short in proportion to the trunk. Dr. Holt has found that the legs, measured from the anterior-superior spine (the upper projection of the pelvic bone, on the front side of the body) of the ilium to the sole of the foot, are 43 per cent. of the total length of the body; that is to say, something over 8 inches in length. Whereas at five years they are 54 per cent. or 11 inches in length. Roberts, measuring from the trochanter (the protuberance at the hip joint) to the sole of the foot, estimates the length of the lower limbs at birth as about 7.6 inches on the average; and the upper limbs, measuring from the axilla to the ends of the fingers, as about 8 inches. The lower limbs develop more rapidly than the upper. Thus, in adult life, the arms are four times as long as they are at birth; while the legs are five times as long as they are at birth.

Head Measurements—The size and shape of the head are significant for the general vitality of the baby's life, while for its nervous and mental development they are the most significant criteria we have considered. The head is the largest division of the organism at birth, proportionately. From birth to the completion of full development the head only doubles in height, and less than doubles its dimensions otherwise, while the body as a whole elongates its dimensions three or four times.

The circumference of the head at birth is 13.9 inches for the male child, and 13.5 inches for the female child. This increases to 17 inches and 16.6 inches, respectively, at the end of six months; and to 18 inches and 17.6 inches respectively, at the end of the first year. The breadth of the head at birth is about 3.8 inches, and the length about 4.5 inches, this ratio increasing somewhat as the child grows older.

The divisions of the skull are united by sutures, and these are not commonly ossified before the end of the sixth month, very frequently some mobility being detected at the end of the ninth month. The symmetrical closure of the sutures means a well-shaped head. There are two fontanels, a posterior and an anterior one. The former is usually closed by the end of the second month, while the latter, which is much larger, closes on the average about the eighteenth month. An open fontanel at the end of the second year indicates that the baby's development is not proceeding normally.

This paper has presented only the credentials of the average baby, and that, too, according to the scientist's view of such things. But the limits of variation in the baby world, as fixed by Nature, are wide ones, and so our human standards must needs be flexible. It will not do even for a scientist to

Continued on page 49

Are You Accepting Steamed Beans Thinking They Are Baked?

IT'S only a question of what you want, Madam. Only a question of getting what you ask for.

We have no quarrel with the manufacturer who offers steamed beans—or the grocer who sells them—or anyone who wants to buy them.

But the Government insists that there shall be no misrepresentation on the can. Only beans that are baked can be labeled "baked." Steamed beans cannot be labeled "baked." To be sure of the kind you are getting, read the label on the can.

Heinz Baked Beans

(Oven-Baked)

are the only well-known brand on the market to-day allowed to use the word "baked" on the label. "Heinz" Baked Beans are really baked—in great ovens under intense dry heat. They come out brown, mealy and tender—delicious—digestible, and with that real Boston baked bean flavor that cannot be brought out by any other than the baking process.

First, last and always, flavor, flavor, FLAVOR is the real reason for their enormous popularity.

Another thing, "Heinz" Baked Beans have the moisture baked out. Boiled and steamed beans have the moisture boiled and steamed into them. By actual analysis, "Heinz" Baked Beans contain much less water than boiled and steamed beans—far more nutriment—food value—the quality you pay your money for. So "Heinz" Beans, though they sell at the same price as boiled and steamed beans, are actually one-fourth cheaper.

For just these reasons, "Heinz" Baked Beans are the largest selling brand on the market to-day. And, remember, while you pay the same price, the grocer willingly pays a little more for "Heinz" to give you their extra flavor and food value.

There are four kinds of Heinz Baked Beans:

Heinz Baked Beans With Pork and Tomato Sauce

Heinz Plain Baked Pork and Beans (Without Tomato Sauce)

Heinz Vegetarian Baked Beans (Without Pork)

Heinz Baked Red Kidney Beans.

Try "Heinz" Baked Beans at our risk. If you don't prefer them to any other you have ever eaten your grocer will refund full purchase money.

H. J. Heinz Company—57 Varieties

Member of Association for the Promotion of Purity in Foods

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

On every Outing:

KODAK

CANADIAN KODAK CO., Limited

Catalogue free at the dealers or by mail.

TORONTO, CAN.

Head Office . TORONTO

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS
$6,800,000

TOTAL ASSETS
$52,000,000

An Account for Two or More Persons

A joint account may be opened by two or more persons, and it may be agreed that any one of the depositors may draw on the account. This privilege is a boon to travelers or people away from home frequently. Should any one of the parties to the agreement die, the survivor may obtain all moneys in the account on their own cheques without any expense or delay.

The Traders Bank

of Canada

INCORPORATED 1885

113 BRANCHES THROUGHOUT CANADA

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

MOTHERS' DAY

Celebrated the Second Sunday in May

THE wonderful growth of Mother's Day in Canada is shown by the following clippings taken from a few of the daily papers in Canada last May:

The celebration of yesterday as Mother's Day was a popular movement. —Winnipeg Free Press.

Mother's Day was generally observed throughout the city yesterday, in common with all of the large cities throughout the continent, and wherever people went the majority of them were wearing the white flower for mother's memory.—Montreal Witness.

Mother's Day was marked by reference in many of the city pulpits and the custom is evidently growing in favor.—St. John's Telegraph.

For the first time in Hamilton's history, Mother's Day was quite generally observed yesterday. Almost every one on the streets in the morning wore flowers.—Hamilton Times.

Mother's Day is to be celebrated in New Westminster if the ambitions of those behind the movement are realized. —Vancouver Province.

The Mother's Day celebration in Montreal yesterday was largely observed, many hundreds of people wearing white flowers.—Montreal Gazette.

Seven hundred and forty-four children and their parents listened to an address (on Mother's Day) on "What We Owe to Mothers." Both children and older auditors wore white flowers. —Toronto Globe.

Mayor Hopewell has issued a proclamation asking citizens generally to observe Sunday as Mother's Day and signify they are doing so by wearing the white flower. * * * Last year the Y.M.C.A. took an active part in the observation and will do so again this year.—Ottawa Citizen.

At the opening of the meeting of the common council yesterday afternoon, Mayor Frink said his attention had been called to the fact that to-morrow was being observed in many cities by the wearing of the white flower in honor of mothers. * * * He asked the press representatives to call attention to the observation.—St. John's.

Two years ago the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL co-operated with the founder of Mother's Day movement, Miss Anna Jarvis, of Philadelphia, to make the movement better known in Canada.

Mayors of cities, ministers, publishers and other prominent persons have assisted in making known the objects of the movement, and it is expected that on Sunday, May 12th, every person in Canada will unite in honoring the best mother that ever lived, their mother.

Public opinion prevails that Mother's Day has become national and international in three years simply because some one happened to suggest it, and the idea proved popular; that it is like Christmas, Easter, Fourth of July, Memorial Day and Thanksgiving Day, requiring no personal endeavor or funds. It should be remembered that all of these holidays have had the church or nation behind them to crystallize sentiment into observance.

Mother's Day has not had these forces. No public funds have ever been contributed. Not even stamped envelopes have been sent to answer letters or for information requested. All of the expense, as well as the labor (which has required working from May to May) has been borne by the founder.

But now, because of the great growth of the movement, the burden has become too heavy for one person, and the Mother's Day International Association will assume a share of it, with the founder as its president.

Through members in other lands it is expected that Mother's Day will become universal in observance.

The Mother's Day International Association should become the largest in the world, because you and every worthy man, woman and child of a mother-loving heart are eligible to membership.

Some of the largest organizations of the country are interested in the Mother's Day movement, as well as live governors, mayors and men of international prominence here and abroad.

Mother's Day is for everybody, and it is desired that it have the interest of all fraternal, military, business, social, civic, educational and other organizations, as well as all persons who honor the home, or a mother.

Like all good things, Mother's Day has its imitators, who endeavor to start "varieties" of it, and use its plans and methods. If such persons better understood the movement, they would know the day very fully embraces all they are seeking to establish, and that they should not trespass, if they are really acting in good faith, to give the people something new.

Mother's Day is in no way connected with any woman's organization, notwithstanding impression has been given to that effect.

WEAR AN EMBLEM.

Every person is asked to wear a white carnation—or his or her mother's favorite flower—on Mother's Day, as a filial honor badge.

If possible, send, in a mother's name, the "memory" flower (or, better still, some needed comfort) to the shut-in in a sick room, hospital, orphanage, home for the aged or incurable, or to some one else with whom a little joy goes a long way. It may set the blood tingling in the veins of some one you think has no heart, and who may think you have none.

THE CHOSEN FLOWER.

The white carnation is the chosen emblem of the day, because it may be thought to typify some of the virtues of motherhood. Its whiteness stands for purity; its form, beauty; its fragrance, love; its wide field of growth, charity; its lasting qualities, fidelity.

In selecting the white carnation as the Mother's Day emblem, it was not a matter of choosing the choicest flower, but a purely white flower and one not now used by any nation as a national flower, or any of our states as a state flower.

It seems strange a flower so beautiful and popular as the white carnation should not have been thus used.

That it is, and has been, a favorite flower in many countries is attested by its sale in the streets of cities in Europe, and by its reproduction in works of art of almost every character found in European museums. One notable reproduction is on Napoleon's desk in the Louvre in Paris; another on an old vase in the Capitoleum museum in Rome; another on some very old Turkish plates of centuries back.

A clever florist has endeavored to make the Mother's Day emblem "red flower for the living" and "white flower for the dead." It is a mistake for any one to accept such a suggestion.

It is not intended that the honor badge of Mother's Day be a mourning badge through any such distinction. The emblem of Mother's Day is the white carnation.

THE TIME FOR OBSERVANCE.

The time of observance of Mother's Day is the second Sunday of May—a fixed time rather than a fixed date.

OBSERVANCE.

The manner of observing Mother's Day is left to every one's own heart in the injunction:

"Live this day as your mother would have you live it."

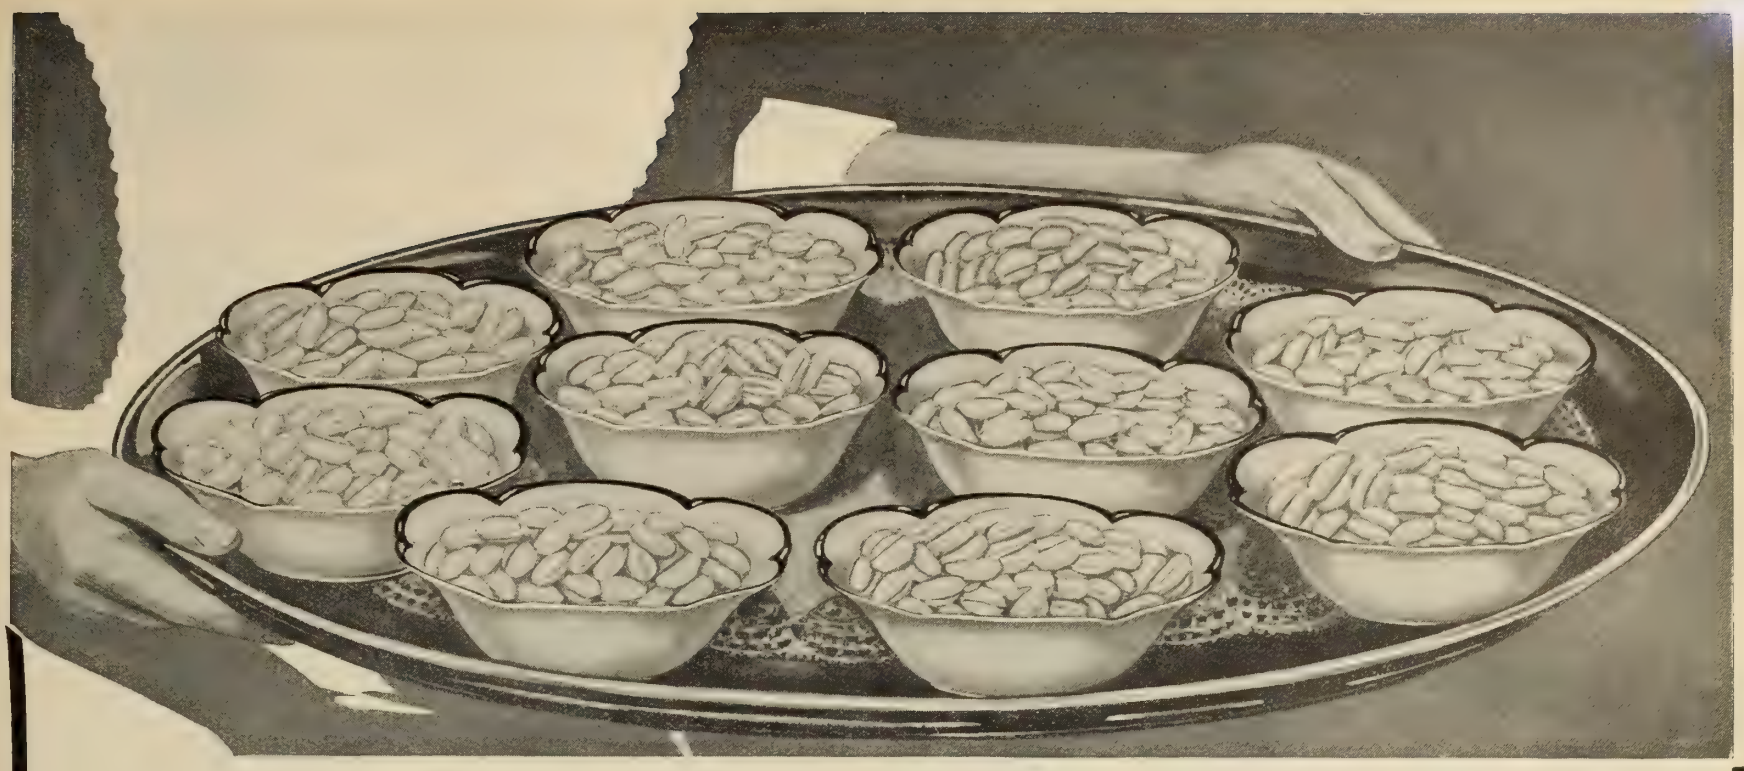
Don't try to be "an earthly saint," but just the "big boy" or "girl" your mother believes you are.

If possible, have your mother and father as your guests of honor this Mother's Day, or go home and visit in a way which will make this a day of pleasure to them.

If you can not do this, through letter, message or gift, stamp the day with kindness.

If this is "a memorial day" to you, reverence it as such in your own best way—it is not for any one to tell how.

"The observance of Mother's Day appeals to all social, fraternal, civil, military and religious organizations alike; to him who has missed life's crowning joy, the tender ministrations of a mother's love, no less than to the one who has derived the elements of a noble character from the maternal care bestowed in childhood."



Ten Dishes Free

To Every Reader of This Magazine

Pay Nothing at All

The coupon we print here will buy from your grocer one 15-cent package of Puffed Rice. We pay the grocer for it.

This offer is made—for this time only—so every home may know this food delight.

One package means ten big dishes. Serve them in several ways.

Then none at your table will ever forget these crisp, enticing grains.

These Curious Creations

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are curious foods. One never saw anything like them.

The grains are eight times normal size.

Each grain is filled with a myriad cells, caused by the steam explosion.

Each cell is surrounded by toasted walls, crisped by terrific heat.

So these thin-walled grains, while nut-like, melt like snowflakes in the mouth.

Breakfast Dishes

Which Taste Like Toasted Nuts

These crisp, brown grains taste much like toasted nuts.

Serve in the morning with sugar and cream. Or mix them with berries, to give a nut-like blend.

Girls use them in candy making, in place of nuts.

Boys eat them like peanuts, when at play.

Chefs use them to give a nut-like garnish to ice cream. Also in frosting cake.

In all these ways the nutty flavor gives a keen delight.

"The Good-Night Dish"

For luncheons or suppers—between meals, or bedtime—serve like crackers in a bowl of milk.

The grains are crisper than crackers. They are four times as porous as bread.

They are whole-grain foods. And never before were cereals made so digestible.

A tempting, ever-ready dish that doesn't tax the stomach.

A hundred times this summer you will want to serve Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice in milk.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c
Except in Extreme West

Prof. Anderson's Invention Foods Shot From Guns

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are scientific foods.

Their inventor is Prof. A. P. Anderson. He spent seven years in working out this process.

The grains are sealed up in great bronze-steel guns. Then the guns are revolved for sixty minutes in a heat of 550 degrees.

That heat turns the moisture in the grains to steam, and creates tremendous pressure.

Then the guns are unsealed and the steam explodes. All the food granules are blasted to pieces, so digestion can instantly act.

The grains are puffed to eight times normal size, yet the coats of the grain are unbroken.

The result is these crisp, gigantic grains, honeycombed with countless cells.

Never before were grains made so digestible—never so delicious as these.

Good for 15 Cents

At Your Grocer's

Take this coupon to your grocer and he will give you, at our expense, a full-size package of Puffed Rice.

The price of this package is 15 cents, which we pay the grocer for it. The package to you is entirely free.

Accept this offer in fairness to yourself. It means a ten-meal treat. You will never forget the delight of them.

Cut out this coupon now. Lay it aside, and present it when you go to the store.

P 39

Sign and Present to Your Grocer

Good in Canada or United States only

This Certifies that my grocer this day accepted this coupon as payment in full for a 15 cent package of Puffed Rice

To the Grocer

We will remit you 15 cents for this coupon when mailed to us, properly signed by the customer, with your assurance that the stated terms were complied with.
THE QUAKER OATS COMPANY
Peterborough, Ont.

Name .....

Address .....

.....

Dated 1912

This coupon not good if presented after June 25th, 1912
Grocers must send all redeemed coupons to us by July 1st.

NOTE—No family is entitled to present more than one coupon. If your grocer should be out of either Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice, hold the coupon until he gets new stock. As every jobber is well supplied, he can get more stock very quickly.

15 Cent Coupon

The Quaker Oats Company

Sole Makers — Peterborough, Ont.

260

In My Lady's Garden for 1912

CONSULTING EDITORS:
MISS M. E. BLACKLOCK AND MR. A. B. CUTTING, B.S.A.

(Dates of planting, when mentioned, are for Toronto and vicinity. Allowances must be made for local differences in climate)

LIMITATIONS IN TOWN FRUIT GROWING

By ALEX. McNEILL
Chief of the Fruit Division, Ottawa

THE city or town gardener is under many limitations, most of which in the last analysis get back to the limitation of space. He is limited in his ground room, limited in his air space, limited in sunshine, and these limitations ramify in many directions.

As a partial remedy for the lack of surface space, the city gardener will make his garden space as deep as possible. If roots have moisture and plant food, it is astonishing how they may be crowded, and since the streets are usually well drained by sewers, the owner of a city lot can usually deepen his soil far beyond that of the ordinary cultivator.

Wherever the surface space is limited, it will pay to indulge in the Old Country method of trenching the soil. This consists in digging a trench along, we will say, the back end of the lot, throwing the surface soil to one side so that it is not covered with the sub-soil; then proceed to take a second spading at the bottom of this trench, but turn it over as one would in digging an ordinary garden, without raising it to the top.

Of course, some old-fashioned gardeners insist that it pays even to take a second spade trenching of sub-soil and treat it in this way. If so, this simply means leaving room to the right to take the first spading of sub-soil to the surface. The sub-soil at the bottom of the trench is then loosened as in ordinary digging, and a layer of coarse manure can be put on top of it with good effect.

In starting the second trench the surface soil will be thrown far enough to cover the first spading of sub-soil taken out. Of course, the spadings will thus go on methodically, so that the sub-soil will be thoroughly loosened for about two to two and one-half feet down, and manure, even very coarse manure, can be conveniently worked into the sub-soil, and whatever rotted manure can be obtained can be worked in with the surface soil. A town plot so worked will be in excellent shape to produce four or five times as much as ground treated in the ordinary way.

The market gardeners in the suburbs of Paris, France, each cultivating from one to two and one-half acres, treat practically the whole of their ground in this way. Of course, they keep something growing on this high-priced and intensely cultivated soil from the earliest moment in spring until it is frozen in the fall, and get enormous crops.

It is not yet sufficiently recognized, even by market gardeners, that more depends upon keeping the proper mechanical texture of the soil than upon enriching the land. Consequently, the limitations of space can be further overcome by constant cultivation. The city dweller who would like to have the most succulent of vegetables and the most vigorous flowers will find that even a slight raking of the soil about his plants each day will yield excellent results.

Whether the cultivation should be deep or shallow will vary, of course, with the particular plants, but speaking generally, two or three inches is as deep as cultivation should go generally, and for many plants an inch is quite deep enough if the cultivation is frequent.

No need of vegetation is more urgent than water. There must be neither too much water nor too little. The proper quantity is just what a thoroughly-tile drained piece of soil will contain five hours after a soaking rain. It will be found that in thoroughly loosened soil, finely divided, every particle of soil will retain by capillary attraction just the proper quantity of water to enable the roots to exercise their proper functions. It is much better to retain the ground water by surface cultivation at frequent intervals than to attempt to supply it by means of the hose.

The too-frequent application of water from the hose is a besetting sin with many city gardeners. Such a way of supplying moisture is almost certain to leave the soil in a bad mechanical condition. Instead of being friable and open, with hygroscopic water about every grain of soil, the soil is apt to be run together in soggy, heavy masses. However, it is necessary to use the hose at intervals. Where this is to be done it is better to imitate, in a small way, the irrigation methods of the arid regions, that is, make trenches at not too great a distance apart, and allow water to run into these trenches, and soak gradually on each side until the earth is thoroughly saturated. If possible, arrange the water so as to have the whole soil saturated at about the same time. Watch the ground carefully after this thorough soaking, and as soon as it can be worked without "puddling" or running the soil together in waxy masses, cultivate the whole surface thoroughly, and continue this cultivation at frequent intervals. That can hardly be too often until the ground is quite dry, when it will require another watering. There could hardly be a worse practice than sprinkling the surface of a garden with the hose. Complete saturation is almost impossible, and the water is put where it can do the least good and the most harm.

THE LIMITATION OF SUNSHINE.

The next—and a most serious limitation—is the limitation of sunshine. No matter how rich and well-watered the soil may be, a healthy, vigorous growth cannot be obtained without exposure to sunshine, and here the skill of the gardener may be shown in so training his plants and thinning and arranging them that every glint of sunshine will be utilized upon a green leaf. Every useless obstruction that casts a shadow will be removed. Dead and dying leaves will be taken off, excrescent growths will be cut away, and all imperfect specimens will be discarded as soon as their imperfections are discovered so that they will not be occupying the root space or taking the sunshine from plants of value.

Much may be done to utilize sunshine in training vinelike plants upon vacant wall and fence spaces. It is astonishing how large a yield of tomatoes may be grown from a few plants, placed even a few inches apart in the earth, but whose stems are skilfully trained to a wall, fence or trellis in such a way as not to shade each other or other plants.

I have known the roof of a lean-to kitchen being utilized for trellis space for grape vines The whole roof space was occupied with trellises, and these were covered with luxuriant vines, bearing large quantities of fruit. The single stem occupied practically no space, running down from the earth, and flowers and vegetables were grown over the whole surface below where grew the roots of the grape vine. It made a pretty arrangement, and in point of economy of space was certainly a triumph.

LIMITATIONS IN VARIETIES.

A limitation of another sort is in varieties, whether it be fruits or flowers. If the space will not permit everything one would wish, by all means make the selection that will give you what you cannot buy. If the climate will permit you to grow peaches, and you have room only for a single tree, by all means grow a Mountain Rose or a Champion, and buy your common sorts on the market.

So with strawberries, grow for quality rather than quantity. The market gardener will supply you with the coarser sorts, the only ones that are profitable for him, but you will find it impossible to buy the tender, high-flavored varieties, and hence must grow them if you have them at all.

So, too, with certain flowers. The florist can only deal in florist flowers, or those that will hold up well to stand the hardships of being exposed for sale. You can grow the fragile, delicate, beautiful things that money cannot buy.

The city dweller who has a lot large enough for one apple tree has a source of pleasure that few of the uninitiated can appreciate. He has the possibilities in that one tree of a delightful succession of fruits, from the earliest Yellow Transparent to the late Northern Spy. The one tree with a little care will give him Duchess, Gravenstein, Primate, Fameuse, St. Lawrence, McIntosh Red and as many more varieties as his fancy will suggest if he will but learn the simple art of grafting and employ it judiciously. I have seen as many as forty different varieties of apples growing on one tree, and one tree properly managed will grow apples enough for the immediate consumption of one family. The cooking varieties and winter fruit, of course, will be purchased.

Limitations of a different sort might be provided for, but this would take me too far afield. For instance, the city gardener will quite frequently want to take a holiday, and this imposes a limitation. If a garden is left for two or three weeks, the owner may return to find it almost ruined with weeds, drought and lack of cultivation; yet even here a judicious selection of varieties and a careful planning of the dates at which the sowings of seeds are made and a final clean-up, will often work wonders. Things may be so arranged that nothing material arrives at maturity during the holiday. Such flowering plants will be selected as will flower before and after this period, and in other ways the holiday may be provided for.

One other limitation I might mention—not for the purpose, however, of assuming to suggest how it may be effectively met. That, I fear, would involve another and a longer paper. I refer to the limitation placed upon the town gardener by the average town boy. I very willingly take refuge in the convenient subterfuge that I lack space to deal with this subject. I cannot resist, however, suggesting that education will go further than harshness, and a well-timed exchange of confidences, a few ripe apples and an odd bouquet will do more than a policeman's club. A fence is no use; it only serves as a convenient ladder. To attempt to guard our treasures by watching them is a task beyond human endurance.

I know of only one efficient remedy, and that is the formation of a juvenile fruit and flower guild. Catch the worst offender by means of an initiation into the mystic circle of youthful horticulturists, make him president of the guild, and spend a few evenings after office hours in showing them how in their own back yards they can grow beautiful and luscious things, and the problem is practically solved, and in the meantime you will acquire a new interest in life, and will begin to think that this old world is not so bad after all.

FLOWERS AND FOLIAGE PLANTS IN BEDS OF VARIOUS DESIGNS
Corner of grounds of Mr. A. Joyce, Ontremount, near Montreal.

Raspberry Culture

By W. G. HORNE

SOME varieties of raspberries can to some extent be grown on nearly all kinds of soil. The Marlboro and Herbert varieties are suitable particularly for medium heavy soils, and the Cuthbert variety for the lighter soils. The Cuthbert is the all-round best one, especially for quality. It has never been excelled so far in this respect. The fruit should be gathered each alternate day to have it at its best. This variety will do very well on very light sandy soil.

The planting of the raspberry can be done either in the spring or late fall. If in the spring, do it as early as possible for best results. Watch the roots for "anthracnose" disease, and discard affected plants. I prefer planting the young summer shoots. Showery weather is necessary to give success with this planting. A good distance is six feet by three feet in the rows. Cultivate thoroughly, and up to time for gathering the fruit.

Cut out the old canes as soon as possible, after fruiting is over. Cut down your canes in the spring to about four feet. Thin out all weak canes, and leave from three to five of the healthiest in the hill for cropping.

HARDY PHLOXES

By M. E. BLACKLOCK

THE hardy phlox (Phlox paniculata syn. decussata), and its hybrids, is one of the most useful, easily grown and showy perennials in existence, and its hardiness is indisputable. We should be very grateful to the hybridists who took the phlox in hand and who have given to us the brilliant colors, immense trusses and the huge individual flowers of the present varieties.

No two people would agree as to which are the best twelve phloxes, but in every "best dozen," Comte von Hochberg is conceded to be the best deep crimson. It is a magnificent color, dark, rich and velvety, and has a large flower and good truss. A mass of it would be a glorious sight.

Another that is nearly always included in these lists is R. P. Struthers; it is generally described as "rosy carmine" in the catalogues, but to me that always sounds like a color with magenta in it, and R.P.S. has not the faintest trace of magenta. I should call it a deep salmony-rose. It has all the glare and self-assertiveness of the salmon-pink-colored things, and there is the same difficulty about getting it to harmonize with other colors, but nevertheless, it is a beauty. It has large flowers, a great spreading truss, and splendid blooming qualities, beginning early and lasting, if the old bloom is cut off, until frost. In masses it is brilliant to a fault.

DWARF PHLOX HERMOINE

Pantheon, a rose pink. is a general favorite. It has neither magenta nor salmon to mar the beauty of its color, and is a lovely soft shade with large flowers. A new one named Rijnstroom is said to be an improvement on Pantheon, with blooms "larger than a silver dollar," but until it gets a little cheaper Pantheon will probably still hold its own.

The most vivid rose-pink that I have come across is almost overlooked by the compilers of best dozens—it is Wolfgang von Goethe. It is a peculiar and very lovely shade, and has a large white eye. Mine has not been a very free bloomer, and this may explain its absence from most lists, but probably its position, under a plum tree, where the chances are that it is not sufficiently well nourished, may explain this deficiency.

Coquelicot, with comparatively small flowers, has reigned for many years as the fiery scarlet, but the florists tell us that it is likely to be deposed. New aspirants for its throne are Siebold, "brighter in color and a stronger grower"; George A. Strohlein, scarlet-orange with "extra large flowers in huge clusters"; and Baron van Dedem, "glistening scarlet blood-red with immense flowers and trusses."

Another intensely brilliant one is General van Hentsz; it is described as "salmon-red, with a white eye," and occupies a conspicuous place amongst the new varieties. Mine could not have been true to name, as it had a mauve eye, but it was a magnificent variety, nevertheless.

As to the best tall white, there seems to be much diversity of opinion. F. G. von Lassburg, Frau Antoine Buchner, and Mrs. Jenkyns are all so superlatively good that, when seen growing close together, it is very difficult to choose between them.

Of the dwarf whites, Hermoine is charming, though few of the authorities rave over it. It is from twelve to fifteen inches in height, and is one solid mass of bloom, the individual flowers being large, and of snowy whiteness, and its lasting qualities are wonderful. White Lady is also a beauty, with immense flowers, larger than those of Hermoine, but the trusses are not so large. Tapis Blanc, the shortest of all, said to be only from six to eight inches high, and to have the largest individual flowers of any white phlox, seems to be the favorite dwarf white, and is very useful as an edging to a bed of the taller varieties. The only colored dwarf variety that I have tried is J. L. Temple, a lovely pure pink, which makes an excellent companion for Hermoine, being about the same height.

To return to the tall ones again. Selma is a lovely soft pink, with a large crimson centre, and is quite different from the ordinary one on that account. It is on most lists, and is deserving of the honor. Of white varieties with large crimson eye, Henri Murger still holds its own, though there are rivals in the field that may yet oust it, such as Bridesmaid and Josephine Gerbeaux. Charles Pfister, soft rose; and Lady Molly, ditto, both with white centres, are very beautiful and desirable varieties, with large flowers. L'Aiglon, a rose pink, is another delightful variety, with a lighter halo round the eye. These three I marked in Barr's catalogue as being particularly good when going over their enormous block of phloxes at their Surbiton nurseries in 1910.

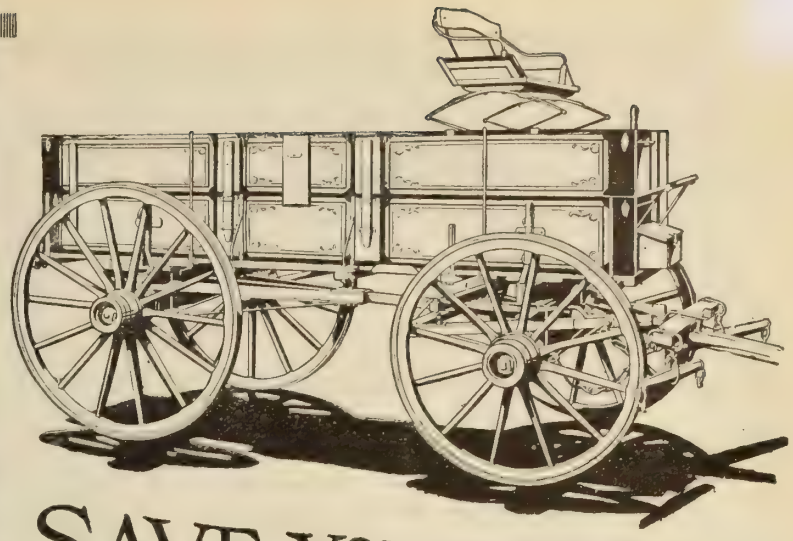
There is a rich rose that is frankly of a magenta tint, that I have had under three different names—Jourdain, Eclaireur, and Edmond Rostand. If they are not identical they are so much alike that no ordinary mortal could detect any difference. The color is soft and beautiful, with a large eye extending into a halo of a very much paler tint. The flowers are very large, and so are the trusses. There are some others of the magenta-pink type that harmonize with the magenta-crimson. Crepuscle, with enormous mauve-pink, crimson-edged flowers, is one of them, and it is a phlox of renown. Canadian Beauty, with very large lovely flowers of soft, luminous, mauve-pink and large white eye, is another, and it is a particularly fine variety. If Antonin Mercie, another beauty that I fell in love with at Barr's, a soft rose-lilac with large white eye, would harmonize with these, one could form a very charming group of them alone, but they must be separated from the rose, salmon and scarlet varieties by a plentiful use of white, or there would be a terrible discord.

Eugene Dauzauvilliers, one of the most refined and beautiful of phloxes, is farther away from the magenta-mauve and is more of a heliotrope; its white eye is so large that it has more the effect of a white flower edged with heliotrope.

Mme. Paul Dutrie has not flowered for me yet, but if it is half as lovely as the description, "delicate lilac-rose, like a soft pink orchid," it must be a most fascinating variety. Needless to say, it is on many lists of "best dozens."

NOTES ON CULTURE.

The cultivation of the phlox is simple if you will remember these few rules: It likes deep, rich soil, with plenty of water in the growing season. One authority says that to dig out the soil two feet deep, and put in one foot of well-decomposed manure, and fill up with alternate layers of good top soil and manure, is the correct thing to do. I have never tried quite such rich soil as this, and would be a little afraid of making my plants dyspeptic from overfeeding, but they may be equal to the task of assimilating it; if so, there certainly should be fine flowers from such



SAVE YOUR HORSES

WHEN a wagon is designed for light draft, and the workmanship carries out that design, you have a wagon that is easy on horses. You need not be afraid to make your I H C wagon work. That's what it's built for. Loads and roads that make hard hauling are expected conditions for I H C wagons. I H C wagons have every advantage that first grade material and skilled labor can give them. They back up with actual results every claim we make for them. They haul heavy loads, with least strain on horses. Ask any farmer who has driven one of them. I H C wagons:

Old Dominion Hamilton
Chatham Petrolia

will do all the work you would ask of any wagon.

I H C wagon wheels—the foundation of wagon service—are built from selected, air-dried wood. Hubs, spokes, felloes and rims are designed for strength and service, and the workmanship on them carries out the plans of the designer. Hubs are accurately bored and mortised. Boxes are forced to position in the hubs by hydraulic pressure. Therefore, they fit accurately, and, the skeins and skein boxes being paired, easy running is assured. The wheel has the proper amount of dish to make it as strong as a wheel can possibly be made.

The care and thought given to wheel construction and tire setting is evidence of equal thoroughness in the building of all parts of I H C wagons. Let the I H C local agent show you the extra value of other strong I H C points of construction. You can get literature and full information from him, or by writing the nearest branch house.

EASTERN BRANCH HOUSES

International Harvester Company of America
(Incorporated)
At

Hamilton, Ont. London, Ont. Montreal, P. Q.
Ottawa, Ont. Quebec, P. Q. St. John, N. B.

Just what you want for summer comfort on lawn, porch or in camp, the

"IDEAL" Hammo-Couch

Everywhere replacing the old-fashioned, saggy, shift "half-moon" hammocks. Used as a seat or lounge or as a couch for outdoor sleeping it gives real comfort and years of service.

But be sure you get the genuine "IDEAL" Hammo-Couch—the kind with steel frame supporting the springs. Others have insecure wooden frames, with uncomfortable hard edge. No others have the back support, all-round windshield, adjustable canopy sun-shade and other "IDEAL" features.

Complete description and nearest dealer's name promptly sent free if you ask for Booklet H 11 35

THE IDEAL BEDDING CO. LIMITED
21 Jefferson Avenue, Toronto

Sold with steel frame support for lawn use, or without if to be hung from porch roof.

Be sure the Hammo-Couch you buy bears this trade mark — and get greatest comfort and service.

Some Spring SPECIALS

A Hoosier Chronicle
By MEREDITH NICHOLSON
Author, "The House of a Thousand Candles."
Price $1.50

Tante
By ANNE DOUGLAS SEDGWICK
"Magnificent. It is a great work of art."—Daily Graphic.
$1.25

Maid of the Whispering Hills
By VINGIE E. ROE
A stirring romance of the Canadian West.
$1.25

The Drunkard
By GUY THORNE
Author, "When it was Dark."
Some readers give this book first place among his former works.
$1.25

Joseph in Jeopardy
By FRANK DANBY
Author, "The Heart of a Child."
This is one of the big books of the Season.
$1.25

The Matador of The Five Towns
By ARNOLD BENNETT
Author, "Clayhanger," "Hilda Lessways."
$1.25

Postpaid at Above Prices

WILLIAM BRIGGS
Publisher
29-37 Richmond St. W. TORONTO

BEETHAM'S
La-rola

La-rola is a perfect emollient milk quickly absorbed by the skin leaving no trace of grease or stickiness after use. Allaying and soothing all forms of irritation caused by frost, cold winds and hard water it not only preserves the skin but beautifies the complexion, making it SOFT, SMOOTH AND WHITE, LIKE THE PETALS OF THE LILY.

The daily use of La-rola effectually prevents all redness, roughness, irritation and chaps, and gives a resisting power to the skin in changeable weather. Delightfully soothing and refreshing after Motoring, Golfing, Skating, Cycling, Dancing, etc.

Men will find it wonderfully soothing if applied after shaving. Ask your Chemist for it.

M. BEETHAM & SON - - - CHELTENHAM, Eng.

I always use WINDSOR Table Salt.

When Baking

are you as careful about the salt you use, as you are about the flour or baking powder?

Poor salt will ruin a baking, just as surely as poor flour.

In the kitchen and on the table, use the fine, pure 63

WINDSOR TABLE SALT

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

liberal feeding. Young plants give the finest flowers. In England they frequently use plants of one stem only for beds, planting them out about a foot apart, and carpeting the ground around them with some low-growing plant with flowers of a contrasting color; the size of the trusses and of the individual flowers is enormous when treated this way; they use all of the same variety to a bed, of course. This is too formal a method of gardening for my taste, but it certainly shows what a phlox can be made to do when young plants are used.

No phlox should remain undivided for longer than two or three years, or both flowers and trusses will diminish greatly in size, the shoots crowding each other out. October is the best month for dividing and transplanting though this may be done in spring, but to be successful then it should be done very early, as the phlox makes its way up almost as soon as the snow goes, and the more nearly dormant it is the better it will grow when transplanted.

If the dead flower heads are cut off as soon as the first crop of bloom is over, a second lot will take its place, and the plants will flower more or less until cut down by frost.

Home Adornment

By J. McPHERSON ROSS

NOW that spring is here it is time to look after the ornamental part of our home adornment. Our lawn will need attention by top dressing with some fertilizing material, and if any bare spots occur, re-sod them. If your lawn is of a size to permit it, a few trees judiciously dotted here and there would improve it. Never plant one in the centre or between the window and the street; you must never obstruct the view either way.

A most beautiful tree for lawn decoration is the cut-leaf weeping birch. The mountain ash is another. We do not appreciate the mountain ash as we should. A compact tree of graceful fern-like foliage, with abundant fragrant blossoms in spring, followed by scarlet berries in the late summer, nothing can be more attractive or showy; planted in conjunction with silver birch and a few Norway spruce, they make a charming group, effective and striking. This tree is subject to the attacks of bark louse, so prevalent on apple trees. An emulsion of kerosene and soap, syringed freely about the 1st of June, will generally destroy this pest, as that is the time it hatches out and travels over to locate itself in the young growth. This advice applies to other trees, such as thorns and fruit trees, which it infests.

Amongst the shrubs will be found suitable places to plant some desirable perennials or herbaceous plants. For masses of color nothing can be easier grown than a good collection of hardy phlox. A few hollyhocks grouped together and a clump of gladioli are exceedingly showy. The funkia, or day lily, is a most useful and decorative plant, and serves to form a good margin or bold edging to finish a border of shrubs and herbaceous plants or act as a division between the lawn and shrubbery.

Another favorite flower is the paeonia, and, most effective as single plants or grouped in beds on large lawns. A bed of paeonies margined with the lemon day lily (Hemerocallis flava) is most effective.

Good combinations can be made of annuals and perennials to keep up a successive show of flowers all the summer. We have so many to suit our fancy that it is a good plan to give a certain plant the dominant decorative figure for one season and another the next year. We are glad to notice the interest gardening has now with the public; they appreciate better its true value and all of us welcome the change.

After the seeds are sown we must keep careful watch and be ready with the hoe to loosen the soil and to kill the weeds. Thin out the plants when too thick. Have the watering pot handy or the hose, to water when things become too dry. Watch for the insects, and sprinkle with hellebore, Paris green, tobacco water or soapsuds.

We cannot too strongly urge the use of the hardy perennials, amongst which we select delphinium, phlox, paeonies, rudbeckias, iris, Oriental poppy, achillea and columbine. In planting those intended for ornament, avoid straight rows; group the plants in colonies or families where possible, and vary the outline of your border. Low-growing, free-flowering plant, such as lobelia and sweet alyssum make capital edging to flower beds composed of nasturtiums, geraniums, petunias, etc. Beds for conspicuous places may be made circular with the central plants, cannas or castor oil plant, next a ring of caladiums, then Coleus verchifelti or C. perilla, then a ring of scarlet geranium, a ring of blue ageratum and completed with an edge of alyssum, centaurea or graphalium. For smaller beds a pleasing effect is made by planting pink geraniums edged by alyssum.

The public can now see how much they have missed in the past, what they might have been enjoying all along, such as tastefully laid-out home grounds with verdant lawns surrounded with borders of beautiful flowering shrubs, and beds of fragrant beautiful flowers, kitchen gardens filled with choice fruit and vegetables, porches and verandas covered with climbing roses, clematis, honeysuckle, trellises filled with luscious grapes, and all produced with but little labor.

Saving Aster Seed

By MAX MOINEAU

MY interest in asters began years ago, when I bought my first variety of seed from a reliable grower. Since then I have saved my own seed, with excellent results, but only from flowers that particularly please me. I select a few of my very best blooms, strip the plants of all but three or four buds, and cover with cheesecloth to prevent cross-fertilization by insects. The flower attains full development before the pollen is ripe, and I can easily pass judgment upon it before there is danger of accidental cross-fertilization.

If I wish to cross a variety, I cover the two selected for the purpose, and when the anthers burst to shed their pollen, I use a camel's hair brush, filling it with the pollen of one flower and dusting it over the stigma of the other; the one I have crossed I keep covered with cheesecloth. Ninety-five per cent. of my flowers come true, and I have originated several varieties which I consider as fine as any that I have seen. The reason that I do not secure an hundred per cent. of true flowers is due to the Mendelian theory of reversion. But this would lead us into a lengthy theoretical discussion, and I shall not touch upon it. Suffice it to say that my method has produced the finest seed that I have ever seen, and it stands to reason that it should. Under a reading glass I select only those seeds that are the best developed. I leave my seed flower upon the stock until it has thoroughly ripened, and dry enough to fall loose at the mere touch of the finger.

After selecting the seed I place them in envelopes, which I mark with a description of the flower, and date of the year it was grown. I also mark the seed flower with a wooden label upon which is a description of the flower, and if crossed, with a description of the two flowers.

My experience has taught me to use only last year's seed. Those which are more than a year old will not give satisfaction, and some will not grow at all. I have learned this from actual experience. I maintain that if one is careful enough he can have finer seeds, and better flowers from his own collection than can be secured from many of those that he buys. I have bought seeds, which, from a whole package have produced only six or seven plants, and perhaps only one of them true to type.

I have practised saving my own seed for several years, and whenever I cover the flower in time, I have not been disappointed. This covering must be done before the pollen ripens, or it will be of no avail.

For amateurs I am an advocate of saving seed from the best of their favorites, but I would not confine them to this method alone. Look the catalogues over for the latest novelties, secure only the best from the most reliable growers, and study the improvement, by cross-fertilization, of old favorites. Herein lies the greatest fascination.

There is a long list of plants which can be used for hedges where one merely wants a line of demarcation between sidewalk and lawn or in the garden, or a screen not growing more than six or eight feet high. Of all the plants used for this purpose, we believe the Van Houtte's spiraea is the best. We have seen several hedges of this plant that made an effectual screen for the back yard, and when they were in bloom they were a beautiful sight to behold.

LOVELIEST OF SUNFLOWERS

By M. E. BLACKSTOCK

HANDSOME perennial sunflowers are fairly numerous. Nearly everyone is familiar with the very double one known as the "dahlia sunflower" (Helianthus multiflorus plenus), and there are other hybrids of H. multiflorus, Meteor, Soliel d'or, Bouquet d'or, etc., differing only slightly in either color, size or shape from the type, and all handsome in a prim, stiff way. But the most beautiful of the sunflowers to my mind is the one illustrated—is it Miss Mellish?

LOVELIEST OF THE SUNFLOWERS

The authorities at the Central Experimental Farm, Ottawa, on being sent a spray in bloom and asked if it were the hybrid of H. rigidus, known as Miss Mellish, replied that they saw no reason why it should not be that variety, but they did not say absolutely that it was. Kelway's catalogue describes Miss Mellish as having "semi-double flowers with very long petals of golden yellow," which is an excellent description of this flower. Barr also calls it semi-double, with very large flowers, but of bright orange yellow. The other English catalogues are silent on the question as to whether it is single or double. The American catalogues of both Dreer and Farr expressly state that Miss Mellish is a single variety. This is a case of doctors disagreeing. Nevertheless, I pin my faith to the English florists, as it most likely originated in England, and it may be possible that seed, and not plants, were first imported to the United States. We all know how disappointingly often the seed of double flowers will produce single-flowering plants, and the descriptions of plants, as a rule, are so meagre that it is quite impossible to identify them by it, and the United States florists may have thought the single one was true.

SPRAY OF SAND SUNFLOWERS

The Care of Shrubs

By R. L. CANNING

IN the spring examine each shrub, and cut away dead wood, or prune any branch that needs it. If any shrubs are dead replace them at once before the hot, drying suns and winds arrive, and while the soil is cool and moist. A good plan is to top-dress or mulch with stable manure, or even short straw, any newly-planted shrubs, and this will save lots of labor in the summer with the hose, as it assists to prevent excessive evaporation.

The flowering shrubs probably were badly hurt this past winter through the intense cold and I fear that the hydrangeas suffered badly. Carefully examine them, cut away any dead wood, and if the tips are dead, prune hard, so as to get them to start strong from the base, and form a good head. If any are dead, replace as soon as possible. If the new ones are large specimens, secure them with a stake and make them firm.

All flowering shrubs, such as duetzias, Japanese lilacs, hydrangeas, spireas, mock orange;, bush honeysuckle and others, will be greatly improved by attention during the growing season. Stimulants can be given, such as liquid manure, sheep manure or any other manure which can be obtained at the seed stores. The better the wood this year the better the flowers next year.

There are lots of little things the amateur can do to help his shrubs grow. The grass from the lawn forms a splendid manure, the wood ashes from the summer stove judiciously applied, are excellent, and the soap suds from the domestic washtub once a week is hard to equal.

The Lemon Verbena

By C. M. BEZZO

THIS is a half hardy shrub, which grows about two feet high with numerous branches which terminate in a pyramid of white bloom. But it is grown chiefly for the delicious fragrance of its leaves, the green sprays of which render it most acceptable for bouquets and other cut flower decorations.

Sow the seed in a warm sunny window or a cold frame, or in the open ground, when the trees are out in full leaf. Plants started in the house should be grown singly in flower pots from the time they are large enough to transplant from the seed box until time for planting in the open ground when all danger of frost is past, setting the plants two feet apart.

Plants may be taken up in the fall and if planted in boxes and kept dormant in a warm cellar, will be ready to plant out again the following spring.

After having all but disappeared from the old gardens, the everlasting pea (Lathyrus latifolius) is making its way slowly into the new ones. It is an admirable climber for the garden gate, wall or fence, and it will do for a low cottage porch, as it easily will run up eight feet in good soil. Generally speaking, however, it is not at all particular as to soil, and it may be said of it that it will grow anywhere. It is particularly valuable for planting among rocks, on banks and in low ground.

Wear Guaranteed Hose Send for Price List

Look for this Trademark

YOU ought to wear hosiery that really WEARS. Write for the price list on HOLEPROOF HOSIERY —six pairs guaranteed to wear without holes, rips or darns for six months.

A MILLION PEOPLE are wearing Holeproof Hose because of the wonderful service and comfort they give. These hose are so made that they wear longer than any other hose and yet they are soft and flexible. They are made in the lightest weights if you want light weights. No hose were ever more comfortable. Wear them this summer and your feet will be cool, yet the hose will wear SIX MONTHS. That is guaranteed. Think what it means!

6 Pairs Wear 6 Months Or NEW HOSE FREE!

That's what we do. If they wear out (one pair or all pairs) we give you new hose free. 6,650,000 pairs outlasted the guarantee last year. But we replace every pair that does wear out without any question or quibble.

Here's how we get the "wear" and the softness that have made "Holeproof" famous—

We use a yarn that costs an average of 70c a pound, while common yarn sells for 30c a pound. It is Egyptian and Sea Island cotton, 3-ply strands, the softest and strongest yarn that's produced.

We spend $55,000 a year for inspection—just to see that each pair is perfection, capable of the guarantee.

Then we have had 39 years of hose making experience. We know how to make hose wear, and how to make them stylish, too.

These are the original guaranteed hose—the whirlwind success—the most popular hose in existence. You ought to try them.

Send for Trial Box!
Stop Darning! End Discomfort!

Men need not any longer wear sox with holes in them. Children may now always wear neat-looking stockings. WOMEN MAY SAVE ALL THE DARNING! Think of the darning you do now; then order. Or send for the "Holeproof" list of sizes, colors and grades.

Don't pay out good money for hose that wear out in a week. Get this Trial Box of "Holeproof" and learn how hosiery should wear—even the lightest weights. Send the coupon and $1.50 now while you think of it. ($2 if you want them for women or children.) Remit in any convenient way.

Holeproof Hosiery Co. of Canada Ltd.
179 Bond Street, London, Can.

Are Your Hose Insured?

(320)

FAMOUS Holeproof Hosiery
FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN
TRIAL BOX ORDER COUPON

Holeproof Hosiery Co. of Canada, Ltd.
179 Bond Street, London, Can.

Gentlemen—I enclose $1.50 ($2 for women's or children's) for which send me one box of Holeproof Hose. Weight.....(medium or light?) Size.....Color (check the color on list below.) Any six colors in a box, but only one weight and one size.

Name.....

Street.....

City.....Province.....

List of Colors
For Men and Women—Black, Light Tan, Dark Tan, Pearl, Lavender, Navy Blue, Light Blue.
For Children—Black and tan only—medium weight only

You Can Own a Summer Home in Muskoka

It is easily secured with the co-operation of the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway. This company, holding a limited number of splendidly located island lots at Bala Park is granting practical ownership under conditions particularly attractive.

A Nominal Rental of five dollars per year on a ten-year lease, and the assurance that a cottage costing not less than $300 dollars will be erected is practically all that is required.

Surely no one can cavil at such conditions as these. This is the chance for the Muskoka enthusiast.

There is nothing small or cramped about these lots, and they are so located as to ensure absolute privacy and freedom from the noise of passing trains, while yet convenient and easily reached. A few minutes' walk from the railway station and the traveler is on the verandah of his home. There the dust and turmoil of the city are forgotten and the peculiarly beautiful Muskoka environment exerts at once its magnetic influence.

Bala Park

is only a little more than three hours' ride from Toronto on the splendidly equipped Lake Shore Express of the Canadian Northern Ontario, and special trains for the benefit of Muskoka lovers are run at most convenient hours during the summer season at attractive rates. This service is designed to give week-enders the maximum holiday with minimum loss of time.

Muskoka is rapidly being adopted by nature lovers from all parts of the continent. The opportunity that is offered here may never be duplicated, and any one thinking of establishing a summer home in ideal natural surroundings will be well advised to write for further information to.

F. V. Higginbottom
City Ticket Agent

R. L. Fairbairn
Asst. Gen. Pass. Agent

Canadian Northern Building, Toronto, Ont.

Most Grocers Will Give You

"SALADA"

Ceylon Tea when you ask for it, but there are others who would rather make a big profit than serve you well. Ask for "Salada" and see that you get it.

BLACK, MIXED or GREEN. 013

Sold Only in Lead Packets. By all Grocers.

The Best Wall Finish
Only one coat required
Easy to apply

Most beautiful, economical and sanitary wall coating made, can be applied by anyone to any kind of surface. Will not rub off or peel. Shows no spots or brush marks. Produces that subdued, velvety effect, so agreeable to the eye.

Muresco

Muresco is made in a large line of handsome tints and colors, also white. Ready for use when mixed with hot water. It can be re-coated any number of times, and entirely removed by washing, thus rendering it a simple matter to keep walls in perfect condition.

Beware of wall finishes that cannot be removed by washing; they are neither practical or sanitary. Will even ually peel off, leaving your walls in ruined condition.

Muresco costs no more than othe finishes an goes farther. Call for sample card and see handsome combination effects.

BENJAMIN MOORE & CO. Limited
Sole Manufacturers, Toronto, Canada.
New York, Chicago, Carteret, Cleveland.

An IHC Manure Spreader Saves Valuable Fertilizer

THE farms of Europe have been worked for centuries, yet the average production of wheat from those farms is nearly 30 bushels per acre; more than double the average yield of American farms What is the reason for this tremendous difference?

The reason is that European farmers know the value of stable manure as a fertilizer. The average European soil is not as fertile as the average American land, but the European grows heavier crops because the fertility of the soil is kept up constantly by the liberal use of stable manure.

While there is not so much stable manure in this country, what there is can be used to far greater advantage when an I H C manure spreader is used to distribute it make one ton of manure go as far as two tons spread by hand By pulverizing the manure and spreading it in an even coat, light or heavy as may be needed, all over the land, they insure a perfect combination of the plant food elements with the soil. There is no over fertilizing in spots, to produce an uneven stand of grain. Each square foot of ground gets the same treatment.

I H C Manure Spreaders
Corn King, Cloverleaf

The superior mechanical construction of I H C spreaders is the reason for their effectiveness. They solve every problem of correct spreading Light draft is secured by the proper construction of wheels and correct principles of gearing. When I H C spreaders are thrown in and out of gear the beater drive chain is not shifted.

The advantages of this construction are: Positive traction—the chain engages nearly half the teeth on large sprockets instead of only a few; chain worn on one side only instead of on both sides as in other constructions; simple, effective chain tightener instead of a complicated, troublesome one. These all add to the durability of the spreader.

I H C spreaders have no reach. They do not need one. Because of this feature an I H C spreader can be turned in its own length, a great convenience at any time. I H C spreaders have many other advantages which the I H C local dealer will explain to you. See him and get catalogues and full information, or if you prefer, write

CANADIAN BRANCH HOUSES:
INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER COMPANY OF AMERICA
(Incorporated)
At Brandon, Calgary, Edmonton, Hamilton, Lethbridge, London, Montreal, N. Battleford, Ottawa, Quebec, Regina, Saskatoon, St. John, Weyburn, Winnipeg, Yorkton

I H C Service Bureau

The purpose of this Bureau is to furnish free of charge to all the best information obtainable on better farming If you have any worthy questions concerning soils crops land drainage irrigation, fertilizer etc make your inquiries specific and send them to I H C Service Bureau Harvester Building Chicago U S A

Gladioli—Why and How I Grow Them

By H. H. GROFF

AFTER a more extensive experience than that which falls to the lot of the average amateur who follows intensive horticultural practice for personal satisfaction and love of the beautiful, and after having built and pulled down $2,000 worth of hot, cool and propagating houses, the accumulation of an interested experience, twenty years ago I concentrated all my attention and activity on the one and most beautiful flower possible of general cultivation throughout the civilized world, the gladiolus.

There is no flower of such easy cultivation that has such a full and complete range of color, not only the primary whites, reds, blues and yellows, but an absolutely limitless range of combinations of all of these in endless variation and ever increasing quality and beauty far beyond the power of human mental conception.

If I am able to make this claim after the extended experience of many years spent in critical investigation of the world's best quality, and after having produced for distribution over half a million distinct varieties, with many thousands more of varieties not yet disseminated, it surely is worth considering and proving by every grower of flowers who may desire the greatest satisfaction and delight.

There is much to learn by experience as to the influence of your soil and location on the plant of my choice. Not only this, but it is desirable that we understand the influence of various and diverse seasons on those varieties grown, for the reason that each season will affect a variety more or less favorably, according to the character and condition of the soil and situation in which we place it.

The influence of hot and dry conditions on warm and well drained soils is directly opposite that of those grown in cool, moist locations. The same variety grown under these decidedly diverse conditions will be almost impossible of recognition by the untrained grower.

For this reason, assuming that the season is one of normal extremes of heat and drought, certain varieties, if planted early and matured during such a period, will not produce characteristic flowers. The effect on variegated and striped types of any and all shades and colors, is to intensify and spread the darker shading without exception. Late planting and later harvesting is the only remedy for this natural effect of a natural cause. This influence, however, has its compensations, for all dark and highly colored types give a most attractive intensity when grown in full exposure to the light and heat with limited moisture in the soil.

It is for the foregoing reasons that I say you must fully inform yourself as to the environment in which your gladioli are grown, if you desire to control their development on preferred lines.

The influence of the best conditions for the production of the most beautiful flowers, is not the most beneficial for the strength and vigor of the plant and corm. The gratifying result in increased beauty and coloring of the flower, however, compensates for this commendable diversion of the vital forces for our pleasure. It is not unreasonable to expect that the vigorous field grown corm of 1911 will lose much of its constitutional vigor when grown under pampered and relaxing conditions for flower development in 1912.

It is not necessary for me to detail the everyday and well understood methods of soil preparation and cultivation. The gladiolus can be grown anywhere excepting on cold humus and stiff clay, but even these soils can be prepared with little trouble for thousands of corms on a very limited area.

Full exposure to the sun and air are as important as the selection of soil, and if we are able to combat the extremes of natural influences, no plant will respond in a more gratifying manner.

The subject is too extensive for proper treatment in all of its aspects by a single article. For plenty of flowers secure a liberal supply of the corms and plant them at intervals from April to the middle of June, and you will secure a three-months' season of the greatest beauty and pleasure possible in the whole range of modern horticultural development.

The Poppy

By C. M. BEZZO

POPPIES are hardy annuals of rapid growth and producing in profusion gorgeous flowers ranging from the single cup or saucer shape to the perfectly double bloom of ball-like form, three or four inches in diameter of the finest, silky texture, and soft though brilliant colorings.

Poppy seed must be sown in the ground where they are to grow as they cannot be transplanted. Sow as early as possible, as the young plants do much better in the cool, moist weather of early spring. Broadcast the seed very thinly over the surface of the ground and lightly rake it in, and when the young plants are well started thin out to stand from ten to fifteen inches apart.

If it is not intended to remove the spring-flowering bulbs, poppy seed may be sown over the surface of the bed while the former are blooming, and will not only give a succession of bloom to that bed, but enable the bulb foliage to ripen more leisurely without becoming unsightly.

Pick the seed-pods off as soon as the petals have fallen; for this purpose go over the bed every day and the plants in their effort to perpetuate their existence will throw out branches and bloom far into the season. Keep well watered during periods of severe drouth.

Walks and Driveways

By A. B. CUTTING

WALKS and driveways often detract from the natural effect that is so desirable in the home landscape. They should serve simply to link the more important features of the landscape together, and to serve as entrances. There should be as few of them as possible. The general idea of the arrangement should be simplicity and convenience. On large grounds, they should be laid out in moderate curves, not winding nor twisting, but gracefully curving from the point of entrance to the house. It is usually better to enter a place near one corner or the other. Whether the road should come out again at the same point as it entered or whether it should leave the place at another point, are questions which the size of the grounds and other considerations will govern. The curves should not be so marked as to induce short-cuts across the turf. Have the curve appear necessary by planting trees or shrubs at a point where the curve is most marked. By planting trees and shrubs here and there along the side of the driveway, the house will be screened from view and therefore will present different views as it is approached.

On small lots, economy of limited space restricts the walks to straight lines. In such circumstances, the best road or pathway is the one that takes the shortest time.

The width of driveways depends upon their length and the amount of travel upon them. Short driveways may be only eight to ten feet wide, but long ones should be wide enough for two rigs to pass easily. Have the footpaths from three to five feet wide. Walks and driveways should be properly graded. Have them convex so as to have drainage. Keep the edges of the turf cut and remove all weeds, stones and rubbish as often as necessary.

One deep cultivation is usually all that should be given to the vegetables. After this one, which should be done as early as possible after the seeds are up, shallow cultivations frequently given produce the best results.

THE WALL BEAUTIFUL

EXTERIOR

INTERIOR

HOME DECORATION

AT this season of the year home decoration is a matter of primary importance. How to produce the right effects? How to obtain the most durable results? How to procure the best all-year-round satisfaction and pleasure in the up-keep of the house? The problem has an easy solution for you, because you can find any finishing material you like, for any part of the home in

Maple Leaf Paints and Varnishes

Exterior Finishing

The choice of finishing materials for your exterior home decoration is largely influenced by their known ability to endure and preserve as well as their suitability for producing harmonious effects with their surroundings. They must be good resisters to sun and atmosphere, and be able to exclude moisture for the purpose of preservation.

Every essential feature for beautifying and preserving is found in MAPLE LEAF EXTERIOR PAINT, ELASTILITE VARNISH, MAPLE LEAF SHINGLE STAINS.

Interior Decoration

To make the inside home attractive, individual artistic feeling must be shown. Durability and sanitary treatment is an economic consideration also. Wall paper and water paints have been superseded by oil paints because they are more lasting. Flat paints permit greater freedom in selecting and adapting color schemes. They greatly decrease the necessary amount of housework and renovating. For these reasons the very best results are obtained by using MAPLE LEAF FLAT WALL COLORS, MAPLE LEAF STAINS and ELASTILITE VARNISH, MAPLE LEAF STENCIL DESIGNS.

Floor Finishing

Floor finishing requires extra care and attention. Not only must a floor be finished to look well, but it must wear well also. It must have finishing materials specially designed to resist the abrasion of boot heels, chairs, tables and the grit of sand. Floors also must be finished according to the kind of wood they are made of, natural finish for hardwood floors, imitation finish for soft wood floors, solid colors for old floors. There is a particular Maple Leaf line for every kind of floor. GRANITINE FLOOR FINISH, FLOGLAZE SOLID COLORS OR LAC SHADES, IMPERIAL PREPARED WAX.

Free Decorative Aids

If you are planning to paint or decorate, fill in the coupon below and mail to "THE MAPLE LEAF DECORATIVE AID DEPARTMENT." They will help you by suggesting the best materials to use, the best colors to choose, and specifications for their application. They will send you color schemes showing just how your work will look when completed.

This Service is Free

Exterior	Interior	Floor
Style of House.....	Kind of Room.....	Wood .....
Kind of Roof.....	Walls (State, Plaster, etc.).....	Finish Desired .....
Body Brick or Frame, etc.....	(If not new, kind of decoration used)....	If Previously Finished, How?.....
Surroundings	Woodwork
How Previously Finished.....	Dimensions
	Furniture and Draperies.....

Name.....Address.....P. O.....

The Imperial Varnish & Color Co., Limited

6-24 Morse St., TORONTO

108 Princess St., Winnipeg, Man. 365 Water St., Vancouver, B.C.

Every Artistic Home Should Contain a

Gerhard Heintzman Piano

because the instrument presents the most up-to-date features and improvements; is in fact the

Ideal Piano

for the home. This reputation has been gained entirely through merit during the past half century of honest endeavor. A demonstration at our salesroom will convince you. Descriptive literature sent free on application.

Gerhard Heintzman,
LIMITED
New Salesrooms—41-43 Queen Street West
(Opposite City Hall)
TORONTO

Hamilton Salesrooms—King Street E.
(Next Post Office)

FLOWERING BULBS
GLADIOLUS

These are most effective in the garden, the colors are magnificent and they are easily grown. We offer:

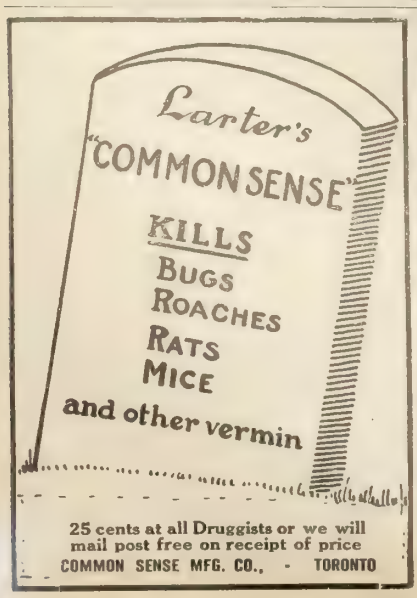
Choice Mixed—10 for 25c; 25 for 60c.; $2.00 per 100—postpaid.
Groff's Hybrid Seedings, Mixed—10 for 30c; 25 for 60c.; $2.00 per 100—postpaid
Bruce's White and Light Shades—10 for 40c.; 25 for 85c.; $3.00 per 100—postpaid
Childsi Mixed—10 for 50c; 25 for $1.00; $3.75 per 100—postpaid
Bruce's Superb Mixed, made up by ourselves from all varieties, the best—10 for 60c; 25 for $1.25, $4.50 per 100—postpaid
Named Varieties, any color, (see catalogue), 10c. to 30c. each

DAHLIAS

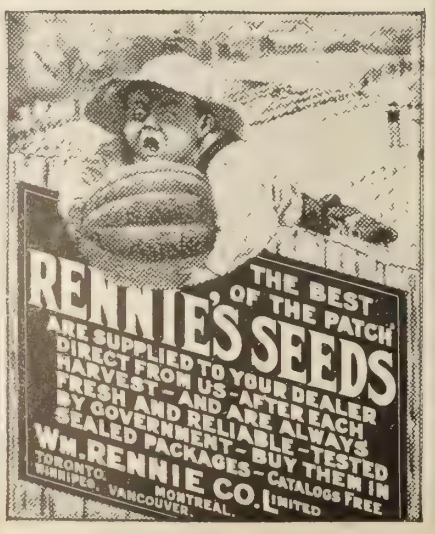
Splendid named, sorts all colors, 22c. each; $2.20 per doz.—postpaid.
Ordinary varieties, mixed, 12c. each; $1.20 per doz.—postpaid.

FREE—Our handsomely illustrated 112-page catalogue of Vegetable, Flower and Farm Seeds, Bulbs, Plants, Poultry Supplies, Garden Implements, etc. Write for it

John A. Bruce & Co., Limited
Hamilton, Ontario
Seed Merchants (51) Established 1850



25 cents at all Druggists or we will mail post free on receipt of price
COMMON SENSE MFG. CO., - TORONTO



THE BEST OF THE PATCH
RENNIE'S SEEDS
ARE SUPPLIED TO YOUR DEALER DIRECT FROM US-AFTER EACH HARVEST-AND ARE ALWAYS FRESH AND RELIABLE-TESTED BY GOVERNMENT-BUY THEM IN SEALED PACKAGES-CATALOGS FREE.
WM. RENNIE CO. LIMITED
TORONTO. MONTREAL.
WINNIPEG. VANCOUVER.

THE UNFORESEEN

Continued from page 8

wounded by the aspersion cast upon herself to be at all responsive. Someone else came up at the moment, and the subject naturally dropped, but the wound remained. As she drove back in the hired fly to Lindford, she asked herself quietly and dispassionately whether there could be any truth in Lady Piggott's words. Had she planned, even hoped, that Katherine should one day be mistress of the Moat House? Did she wish Geoffrey Calderon as a son-in-law? Her face grew hot and flushed again under this painful self-arraignment, but by the time she had reached home she had not arrived at any answer or conclusion. Only she knew she was hideously, desperately uncomfortable, and wondered how she was going to appear natural and self-possessed at the dinner-table that evening. Should she tell Katherine? Something told her she would not be able to help herself.

Kate was at home when she stopped at Rosearbour, looking out for her, so happy and bright and interested in everything that had taken place that Mrs. Eardley hated to disturb her peace of mind. But it might be necessary.

"Did you enjoy yourself, mamma? And do tell me about Peter's wife. Did anybody miss me, and who were all there?"

Mrs. Eardley found a certain relief in answering these trivial questions; but Kate, watching her keenly, easily discerned that there was something disquieting at the back of her mother's mind.

"Somebody worried you at The Grange, mummy. Who was it?" she asked in her direct, straightforward way.

"It was only Lady Pigott; she was even more disagreeable and horrid than usual. She accused me of being a designing mother, inviting Mr. Calderon here for the express purpose of trying to make you mistress of the Moat House."

To Mrs. Eardley's relief Kate burst into a peal of clear laughter which had the effect of almost completely reassuring her.

"Is that all, dear? But nobody minds Lady Pigott, and everybody who knows you will absolve you from any such ulterior motive."

"I don't feel reassured altogether, dear. Of course it was a little unusual, perhaps, for two ladies, living as we are, to make accommodation for Mr. Calderon. But he was so nice about it, and of course the money was acceptable. Why should we pretend otherwise?"

"Don't trouble about it, mummy. I'm sure there is no such idea in Mr. Calderon's head. He is just like a big, kind brother, and I can't think how we got on without him."

Once more Mrs. Eardley was reassured. Kate must be fancy free, or she could not speak so carelessly. Yet in her heart of hearts there still lurked something she was afraid to face, to acknowledge, even to herself. She dared not put it into words. Something had crept into her life in the last weeks, and she knew that when Geoffrey Calderon should pass out of it the days would be greyer. What this could mean to a woman in middle life she did not ask herself—the fact was sufficient.

"What kind of a day did you have at the Moat House?" she asked presently, thinking Kate might wonder at her silence.

"Oh, perfect as usual. The drawing-room frieze was just going on, and it is really lovely against the dark oak. It is a perfect room, and it does seem a shame to think no woman is going to enjoy it for her very own."

"Some woman will, I don't doubt, one of these days. At least, they will do their best to provide him a wife."

"But I don't think he is a marrying man, mummy. He said to-day that if he could go on living with us and doing up the Moat House to the end of his days, he would be perfectly happy."

"A curious ambition for a man," replied Mrs. Eardley, with a little smile which sprank from a sudden inexplicable lightness of heart.

"How much is there to do now? Will they finish soon?"

"They really are practically finished now, and there is no earthly reason except the one he gave, why he shouldn't be living at the Moat House now."

"Then I think I will tell him, dear, and you and I will go away to Eastbourne for a month. I always find Lindford relaxing just about now, so it will fit in nicely."

Kate was secretly astonished, but made no demur.

Nothing was said that evening about Eastbourne, nor the next morning. Kate had to attend the sewing meeting at The Rectory the following afternoon, which meant that she stayed to tea. Geoffrey Calderon, perfectly aware of the simple and very regular routine of these women's lives, remembered that, and came back from the Moat House just after four o'clock, in time to have tea alone with Mrs. Eardley. She gave a little start when she heard his step across the lawn, but she had quite recovered her serenity when he appeared in the drawing-room, and even felt glad that so convenient an opportunity had occurred for her to mention the subject of their going to Eastbourne.

"I'm all alone this afternoon. It is the Dorcas day," she said. "And, to tell the truth, I've just been having a very early tea. But Patience will bring you some fresh in a moment. What has happened to bring you back so soon to-day?"

"Several things. Of course, I remembered it was the Dorcas day," he answered quite frankly and quietly. "In fact, I came because it was. Did Miss Kate tell you yesterday that the place is nearing completion, and that I haven't any reasonable excuse for trespassing any longer on your kind hospitality."

"It has been a great pleasure to us to have you, Mr. Calderon," she answered with perfect serenity. "And I am very glad you have spoken of it to-day, because I was only saying to my daughter last night I should like to go off to Eastbourne for a month for a change."

"Ah, yes, Eastbourne. So you are tired of me?" said Calderon, with a note of reproach in his voice. He was looking intently at her, and she was quite conscious of his gaze, which fluttered her heart. She now believed that he had come purposely to speak to her about Kate, in Kate's absence, and she longed to get away. His next words were absolutely convincing.

"I came over this afternoon, because I made pretty certain of finding you alone. There is something I wish to speak to you about."

"Something about Kate," she said faintly, and wondered how long it would be before Patience should bring in the tea.

"Well, it concerns her, I suppose, indirectly, but it concerns you more, Mrs. Eardley," said Calderon, as he took a step nearer her, still covering her with his grave, kind, and rather penetrating eyes.

"What is it?" she asked, and at the moment Patience brought in the teapot and immediately retired.

Mrs. Eardley busied herself pouring out his tea, not daring to meet his glance, and even wondering whether she could invent some excuse for leaving him. She knew what he was going to say, that he wished to ask her for Kate, and why was she not glad?

"I hardly know how to begin; my presumption seems so great," he said, with the humility of a man whom love has ennobled. "I've got the place almost right, but it can't be a home for a man there alone. Will you come and make it a home for me?"

"You mean Kate, of course, you are asking me for Kate, Mr. Calderon? Surely you know that I could make but one answer, though I wish for some reasons it had not happened."

Calderon laughed a little, and the light deepened in his eyes.

"I'm not asking for Kate; she's a dear girl, but—but a trifle young for a staid bachelor like me, don't you think? It's her dear mother I want. Katherine, I love you, you must have known it of late. I haven't troubled much about hiding it. Are you going to take pity on a lonely bachelor and come and give the Moat House its finishing touch, its inspiring presence?" She sprang up; her color flamed, and then receded.

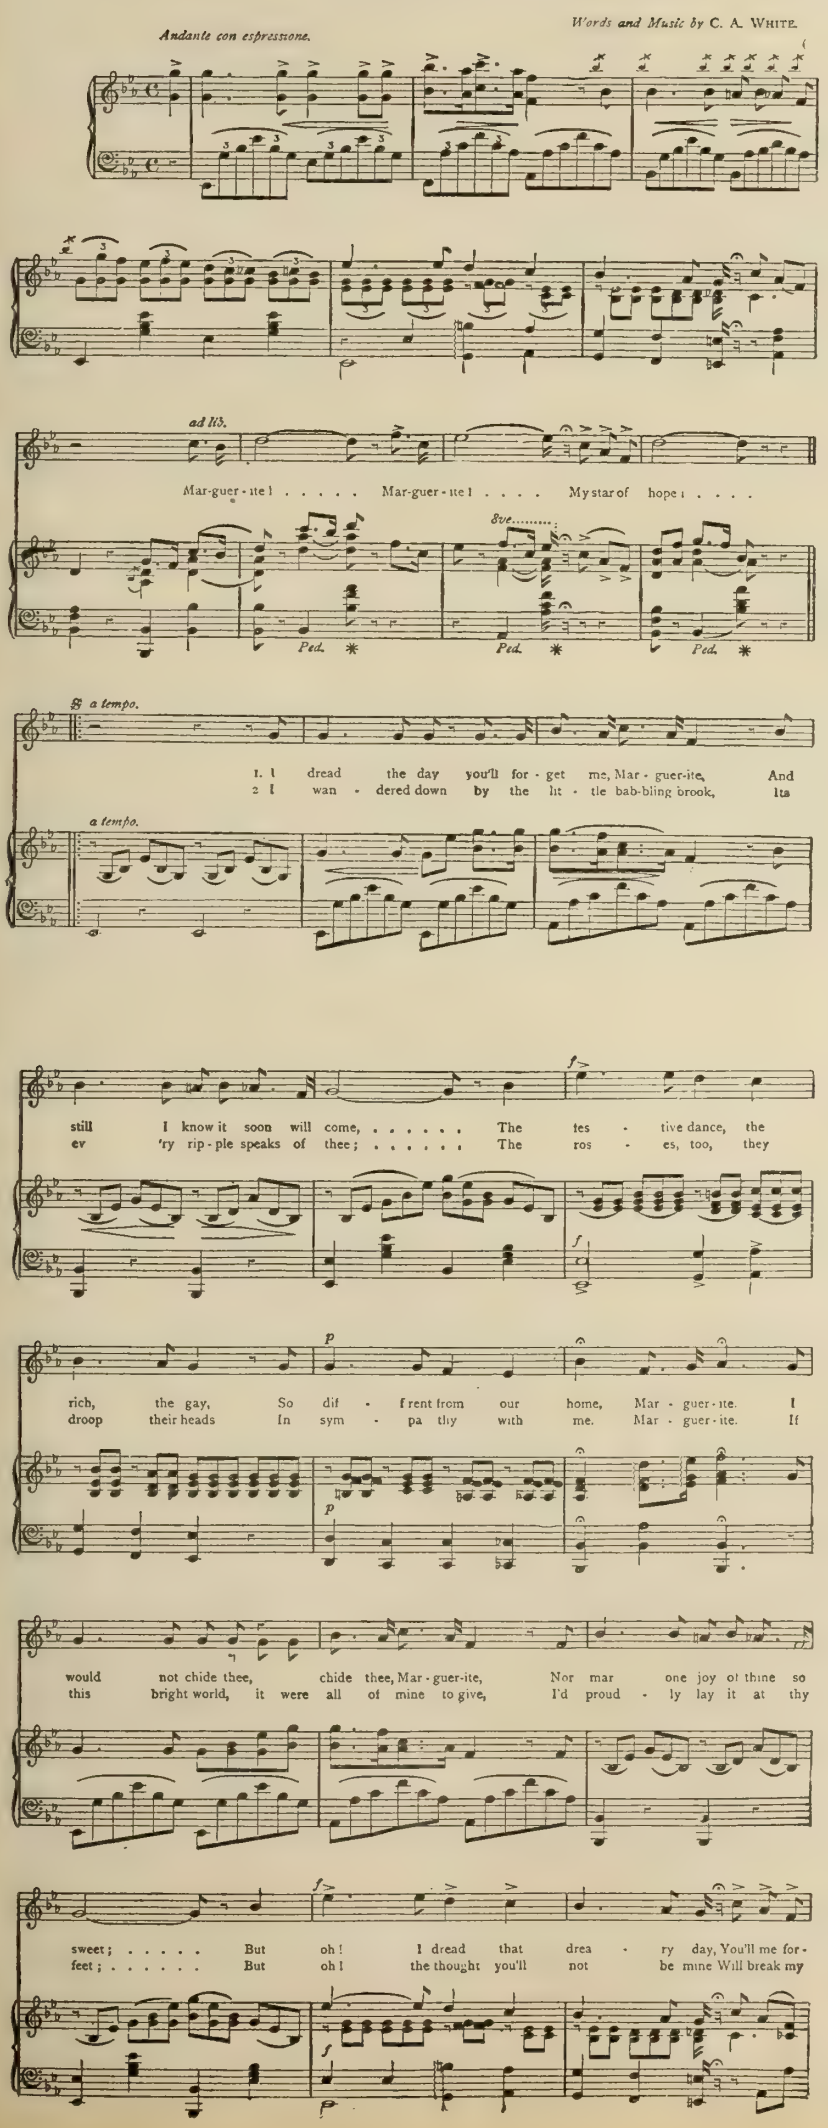
"Oh, Mr. Calderon, what is it you say? You are surely laughing at me—an old woman—I have not deserved this

Continued on page 54

Music and Matters Musical

An Old Song But Still a Favorite

Marguerite.



Andante con espressione.
Words and Music by C. A. WHITE.
ad lib.
Mar-guer-ite! . . . . . Mar-guer-ite! . . . . My star of hope! . . . .
8va.....
Ped. * Ped. * Ped. *
a tempo.
1. I dread the day you'll for-get me, Mar-guer-ite, And 2 I wan-dered down by the lit-tle bab-bling brook, Its a tempo.
still I know it soon will come, ... The tes-tive dance, the ev'ry rip-ple speaks of thee; . . . . . The ros-es, too, they rich, the gay, So dif-f rent from our home, Mar-guer-ite. I droop their heads In sym-pa thy with me. Mar-guer-ite. If would not chide thee, chide thee, Mar-guer-ite, Nor mar one joy of thine so this bright world, it were all of mine to give, I'd proud-ly lay it at thy sweet; . . . . . But oh! I dread that drea-ry day, You'll me for-feet; . . . . . But oh! the thought you'll not be mine Will break my

The Eternity of Music

WHO was it, when He formed this temple of creation, that first introduced into it sculpture, painting, poetry, music; those marvelous missionaries of the beautiful, that, like the angels in the vision of sleeping Israel, bring earth and heaven into sweet union? Who was the first sculptor that struck with His chisel the marble rocks, and fashioned them as He would? Who was the first painter that touched with His brush the flowers of the valley? Who was the first decorator, that studded with gems the Milky Way, and spread this arch of splendor across the concave of this, His temple? Who first told the strong sons of God to "shout with joy," and bade "the morning stars sing together," when all creation was ringing with the notes of Him, the first composer? Who has sanctified this art of music, not to oppress the intellect, not to cloud it, not to silence it, nor to lull it into a sleep fatal to its powers; no, but to beautify, elevate, and influence even the intellect itself, by purifying the imagination and the heart.

He it was, who declared that music should become in heaven itself eternal; that when all the others should, as it were, faint at the gates of heaven; when the chisel should fall from the hand of the sculptor; when the painter should cast away the brush in view of the glorious coloring beyond the stars; when the poet should breathe no more the song of hope; when the architect need no more to build a house with hands in view of the eternal temple of Almighty God; when the sacred mission of all the other arts shall have been fulfilled; that then glorious music shall survive them all, and, flying in, as it were, through the gates of life, give her lesson to the angels, then all the other artists shall become for eternity the children of song.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Could you tell me how to keep my piano keys white?—Mother.

Answer.—Use a cloth thoroughly wrung out of cold water to wipe them; but best of all is to make sure that plenty of sunshine reaches the keyboard. It will indeed surprise you, all through the home, what that old sun will do for you.

What is the meaning of the following terms: Prestissimo, Accelerando, Largo, Allegro, Allegretto, Andante?

Answer.—Prestissimo — A direction for a quick lively movement or performance.

Accelerando—A gradual quickening of time, just the opposite to a ritard movement.

Largo—Slow.

Andante—Moderately slow.

Allegro—Quick, brisk and lively.

Allegretto—Moderately quick.

These terms will, of course, be governed by the composer's signature of time and movement at the opening of the work.

What is a triad?—R. M. Y.

Answer.—A triad is a common chord consisting of a tone with its third and fifth, with or without the octave.

I have had considerable trouble in my class of young pupils, in trying to win them from ragtime to the really good music; or, in other words, to create in them an ambition to play the best. What would you advise me to do?—Teacher, Orangeville.

Answer.—Yours is certainly a common difficulty. But we can only remind you that the best fruits and flowers are the result of cultivation and hybridizing.

Birks' Cut Glass for Wedding Gifts

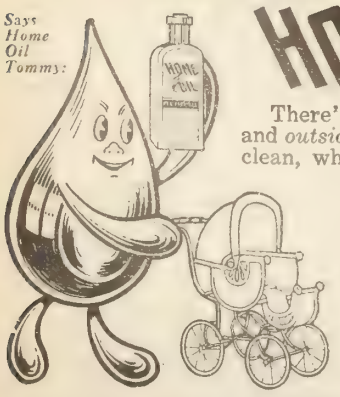
YOU run no risk in ordering a piece of Birks' Cut Glass for a wedding gift. It is sure to please. We pay express and guarantee safe delivery to destination. While our illustration fails to show the real beauty of this product, it will serve to give some idea of form. If, when you see the piece ordered, it is not to your liking, return it and we will cheerfully refund the purchase price.

No. 1000—Water Jug, capacity 2½ pints, height 7¼ ins., $5.00.
No. 1001—Bowl, diameter 8 ins., $4.50.
No. 1002—Salad Bowl, diameter 10 ins., with salad servers to match, $16.25.
No. 1003—Flower Vase, height 10 ins., $4.00.
No. 1004—Salad Servers, cut glass handles, Silver Plated Spoon and Fork, pair, $2.00.
No. 1005—Butter Dish, diameter 6¼ in., $2.00.
No. 1006—Cut Glass Lemonade Set, $5.00.
No. 1007—Cut Glass Lemonade or Water Set with 12-in. Mirror Tray, $12.00.
No. 1008—Sugar and Cream, height of jug 2½ ins., diam. of bowl, 3¼ in., pair, $4.00.
No. 1009—Bon-Bon Dish, diameter 5 ins., $1.25.

Send for our list of Wedding Gifts, which we can deliver in the United States FREE OF DUTY

Henry Birks & Sons, Limited
Phillips Square JEWELERS Montreal, Que.

Says Home Oil Tommy:



HOME OIL BEATS THEM ALL

There's no oil like HOME OIL for every oiling use inside and outside the house. A drop or two goes a long way. Pure, clean, wholesome, smooth, non-explosive, safe and wonderfully effective as an all 'round lubricant. An oil for the home, office, farm, factory, camp, motor boat and automobile. An oil that took the LIQUID VENEER people years to produce.

More oil for your money, and more service from each drop of oil—that's the HOME OIL story. No special directions—just go ahead and oil.

Write today for free trial bottle.

BUFFALO SPECIALTY COMPANY
336-E Liquid Veneer Building Buffalo, N. Y.

Trial Bottle Free

CLUBS AND GIFTS

You can say to your friends, "Join in a club and help us get a low price clubbing rate." And while giving your friends this fine rate you get a fine premium for getting up the club. You can get Sterling Silver Table Articles, Cut Glass Dishes, Limoges Tea Set, Letter Paper, Fountain Pen, etc. Write for red premium list.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

And so in music the taste for the best must be slowly cultivated in the student by a gradual raising of the standard of the composition, and not by a sudden break from old loves. The teacher must, with much patience, explain the beauties of certain movements, and in your conversation tactfully create a desire on the part of the pupil to understand the meaning and even the very thought of the composer. In other words, create a new atmosphere in the mind of the student, by crowding out gradually the commonplace by crowding in the good things.

We have been fortunate in Canada of late years in having many eminent musicians choose this land as their permanent home. It is indeed a compliment to our growing country, showing, as it does, the high estimate placed on our possibilities and on our present high position in the world of art and music. When we see new schools and places of instruction being erected and carried on here in Canada, it must impress us very surely of the fact that we have a people, who, while not being extremists, are reaching out for that sensible culture which is always attractive.

We have too long been content with the old school, which taught that this passage or theme must be placed thus-and-thus, because the composer had this-or-that rule or theory in mind. We seem to have assumed that there were hard and fast rules which dictated against any freedom on the part of the student or artist, and have discouraged the student from showing any originality or new conception of possibilities in a given composition.

One of our Canadian musicians of high standing, in the person of Mr. Peter C. Kennedy, has associated himself, as director, with a school of advanced and unique methods, and in the Columbian Conservatory of Music we have a method which should create a keener perception of the art of expression and which will no doubt produce many leaders among pianists and organists.

It is impossible to go fully into the methods of teaching adopted by the conservatory, and which are absolutely unique, differing from any other method in existence to-day. It will be interesting to touch briefly upon the distinctive features of the course. By becoming a pupil, one practically has a lesson every day, and at the same cost as a single lesson under ordinary circumstances. Each pupil receives a personal lesson at the conservatory, but he takes away with him the lesson, fully printed and every detail made clear to him. He is minutely instructed how to study them at home and how to recite them.

With each lesson there is a set of review questions, which are filled in and submitted to the teacher. As an evidence of how complete the course is no pupil is allowed to go to a more advanced lesson until he has graded as high as 90 per cent. in the previous one. Until that grade is secured the lesson is returned again and again until perfection is reached, and this without any extra charge.

This course consists of 48 lessons, and this procedure of examination is adopted throughout, even if it takes a couple of years to pass the four examinations which are periodically held. If the pupil will do his part, the conservatory guarantees to give complete satisfaction. Each pupil is supplied with 50 pieces of graded music, all by well known composers, also a Tonograph, free of cost. The conservatory is authorized to issue diplomas on completion of the courses.

AMATEUR HYBRIDIZING

By M. E. BLACKLOCK

SPEAKING of the bees and their work makes one think of all the wonderful flowers and fruits that have been evolved, of late years, by men who understand the crosses that were likely to produce certain results. That is the part where brains are necessary, and where much study is required. The actual hybridizing itself, while it sounds terribly scientific and difficult, is really the most simple of operations. It is merely the placing of ripe pollen from the anthers (the little knobs or boxes filled with powder on the top of the stamens) of one flower and placing it on the stigma (the top part of the pistil) of another of the same species. This is really the act of fertilizing rather than hybridizing. It is only called hybridizing when the flowers, thus fertilized, belong to different species. For example, take the genus Rosa, it has numerous species (which are again split up into almost innumerable varieties, by hybridizing), of which our own wild rose (Rosa blanda) is one. If we were to take pollen from one of these roses and place it on the pistil of another of them that would not be hybridizing, but if we took pollen from it and placed it on the pistil of a Japanese rose (Rosa rugosa) that would be hybridizing, because we would be crossing one species with another. The crosses of different species belonging to the same genera will generally be more or less fertile, unless the species are very opposite in character. When you try to cross flowers that do not belong to the same genera, although they belong to the same family, it is very much more difficult to produce any results. Scientists tell us that it is absolutely useless to try and cross plants of different families. To illustrate this, you can produce hybrids from two entirely distinct species of roses, because they belong to the genus Rosa; you might possibly get a cross between a rose and a spiraea, because spiraeas, though they do not belong to the genus Rosa, yet do belong to the order Rosacæ, or rose family.

The real fun of hybridizing for the amateur is in trying to improve our existing species by new varieties, rather than by creating freaks. It is best to begin on annuals, because they give the quickest results. Let us suppose we have two plants of petunia for an imaginary experiment. The one, which we will call "A," is a perpetual bloomer, with a strong constitution, and has an abundance of flowers, but the color is poor and the blossoms small. The other, which we will call "B," has enormous flowers, with large, open, beautifully pencilled throat, but the plant is not robust and produces but few flowers. So we will try what reciprocal crossing will do, which means that we will fertilize a flower on "A" with pollen from "B," and a flower on "B" with pollen from "A." This may seem precisely the same experiment, but it is not. It is a fairly well established fact that from the male or pollen parent, color and appearance is generally obtained, while the seed bearing or female parent gives its constitution to the offspring; so if this theory is true, the seed from "A" crossed by pollen from "B" should give the best results, as what "A" needs is color and size, which ought to be produced by this cross. To make sure of the flowers we are experimenting with not being self-fertilized, we must see to it that their own stamens are removed directly the flower opens, and it should be protected from the danger of insect fertilization, either by carefully removing the colored part of the flower, which tempts them to visit it, or, better still, by tying a little leno bag over it, that insects cannot get through. Of course, there is a certain amount of the wind carrying the pollen from flowers on the same plant, to the pistil but that is a risk you cannot well guard against out of doors. Another important thing is to watch for the time when the stigma is at the proper stage to absorb the pollen. This is quite easily seen in that of a petunia, as it has a shiney appearance, a viscidity to which the pollen grains readily adhere. The pollen also must be at that very floury stage known as "ripe." The pollen can be applied either by a small camel's hair brush or by the blade of a pocket knife—it does not matter how, so long as you succeed in dusting it over the stigma. When this has been done replace the leno bag and label your flower or make a note of what you have done. The sooner the flower fades, after it has been fertilized, the more certain you may be that your experiment is successful. It is a sign that its chief object in life has been accomplished, for the beauty and sweetness are given to the flower to attract insects to visit it, so that they may carry pollen from one flower to another. It is a very exciting time when seedling hybrids of our own raising have reached the blooming stage, and there is no need for discouragement if the first flower to unfold and a large number of its brethren are quite commonplace. The first to bloom are frequently the poorest, vitality being their one virtue. Possibly, when the weaker ones have arrived on the scene, we shall get our reward in a specially beautiful blossom, and great will be the joy thereat.

WE PREPAY ALL CHARGES ON ORDERS OF $25.00 AND OVER, AND HEAVY GOODS SENT FREIGHT PAID.

EATON'S

HAVE YOU GOT A COPY OF OUR NEW WALL PAPER SAMPLE BOOK? IT'S FREE.

A CATALOGUE WORTHY OF YOUR HOME

✲ A BUYING GUIDE THAT HELPS TO GREATER ECONOMY ✲

Just picture to yourself what a wealth of opportunity EATON'S Catalogue opens up to you. So great a variety of dependable, desirable merchandise, and also so moderately---savingly priced. Truly, a service worth knowing about, because it's so helpful, and this New Catalogue presents our wares at their best. It's a specially prepared book containing carefully selected goods that are in season and that appeal quickly to one's sense of good judgment and thrift. In many instances you'll find actual color reproductions of the goods, beautifully illustrated, adding a wonderfully realistic touch to the merchandise we offer. By all means see that this Catalogue gets a chance to demonstrate its great helpfulness. Send a trial order and judge for yourself how well we can serve you and how that if you are not absolutely satisfied you have this guarantee

MONEY BACK IF WE FAIL TO PLEASE

You have to be suited absolutely or else we refund your money and pay all charges. Don't pass by the opportunity that now comes to you through this Catalogue. Get to know its helpfulness---its saving qualities---its far reaching guarantee. If you have not received our Spring and Summer Catalogue No. 102 tell us---quick.

Don't Forget that we Prepay Charges on all $25.00 Orders and all Heavy Goods as quoted in our Catalogue.

WE HAVE ISSUED A SPECIAL STYLE BOOK

Those who have not received our New Style Book listing fashion's latest decrees in Millinery and Women's Wear, are invited to send us their Names and Addresses and we will forward this interesting Booklet by return Mail---Free.

THE T. EATON Co LIMITED
TORONTO - CANADA

YOU NEED THIS FREE BOOK OF PROOFS

—because it demonstrates conclusively that you don't need electricity for thorough vacuum cleaning—that the "Onward" Automatic Vacuum Hand Power Cleaner is the only "Automatic" Vacuum Cleaner made—affording the full power of the large, expensive vacuum cleaners, and at a price that brings it within the reach of every overworked housewife, reducing the work of housecleaning from hours to minutes.

It earns its cost over and over again —in the saving of wear and tear on carpets, furnishings and in the elimination of housecleaning drudgery. In speed, thoroughness of work, simplicity of construction—it is without a rival, and while light, easily carried about, it will do all the work expected of the average electric machine.

The Only Hand Power Cleaner That Blows

It does not get out of order, and will last a lifetime. It is the standard of efficiency to-day, and still will be after 20 years of constant service, and it runs so easily a child can operate it.

The 1912 Models of

"Onward" Automatic HAND POWER Vacuum Cleaner

Now Ready—Guaranteed

Our exclusive double tank device separates 95 per cent. of the dust automatically, without the aid of screens, baffles or water. It contains no tin or cast iron; malleable iron, steel and brass being used exclusively in its construction.

For Sale in all the Leading Hardware and Furniture Stores

Try it 10 Days Don't buy any vacuum cleaner until you have tried the "Onward Automatic." Write for our free book of proofs which shows many exclusive features and we will give you the full particulars of our plan whereby you may try the "Onward" Automatic Vacuum Cleaner in your own home for 10 days—if, after a trial, you are not satisfied that this is the best hand power Vacuum Cleaner you ever saw, you may return it to us and your trial will cost you nothing.

"Onward" Electrics for any building Wired for Electricity Three styles—mechanical marvels, without competition—doing just as thorough work as a most expensive wagon or installed outfits. Write for Booklet.

Onward Manufacturing Co.
BERLIN, ONTARIO

FOR ADVERTISING MEN ONLY!

Will You be the Guest of Texas?

In Dallas, May 19 to 27, there will meet the strongest assemblage of advertising men ever brought together. The eighth annual convention of the A. A. C. of A. will be attended by men from every corner of the continent. The progress of the year and the problems of the day are to be made known by those whose names stand for leadership in advertising efficiency.

There is serious work to be done. Grave questions of policy are to be discussed. The advertising man who cannot be present will do well to charge some good friend to watch events closely; there'll be much of value that the printed reports will never get. The man who comes will have an opportunity to "sense" conditions and futures that will pay him twice over for the time and money represented. Many of the great national advertisers will have their captains at Dallas just to get that "sense"—to listen for the significant overtones in the roar of debate, possibly even more than to the debate itself.

Texas hospitality is to other hospitality as the big commonwealth itself is, in size, to lesser members of the Union. The native son of the Lone Star State rises to the occasion when strangers are within his gates. To say that he "entertains" them is hardly to do justice to the multitudinous dinners, smokers, auto rides, boat trips and singfests of every sort that are showered upon the happy guest. But the spirit of welcome running through all the fun is the best entertainment and the thing that sticks longest in memory. One is made to feel that "Glad to see you," in Texas, is no empty formula.

A New Idea

It is a common experience of men attending conventions to derive more benefit from a single chance conversation than from the whole round of set discourses. The talk one picks up by the way constitutes, in fact, the real value of these gatherings. Conventions like the "lunch conferences" which Carnegie introduced in the steel business, afford an opportunity for busy men to meet and clean up a lot of ideas of the discussive kind that have accumulated in their minds. Again, the occasion is handy for long-postponed business interviews between men from different cities.

In order to systematize the coming together of men who want to meet, or could profitably meet, it is requested that those interested in special subjects, or anxious to see any one person in particular, send their names to "Texas Secretary, Room 1020, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York City." Every effort will be made to get them in touch with the individuals they name or with delegates known to be well informed on given topics.

As to Arrangements

The four days' "swing around the circle" to Fort Worth, Houston, Waco, and San Antonio will be without expense to delegates, as they will be during that period the guests of the Texas Advertising Clubs. Full details regarding transportation, hotel and the like may be had by addressing Secretary,

Dallas Advertising League
Dallas Texas

Concerning Conventionalities

Why We Do Certain Things

WEBSTER defines conventionalities "artificialities," "formalism." We are apt to confound conventionality with etiquette, or good manners, when, in reality, it is vastly different. For every age and for every condition, good manners provide helpful equipment. Both in business and society a manifest ignorance of the rules of good breeding puts many a young man at such woeful disadvantage that all his sterling qualities of mind and heart are lost sight of in his one great lack of manners.

But conventionality is another matter. It is really a custom, or style, set by certain people, and, as Webster says, contains the elements of formality and artificiality. A certain prevailing style of dress, of entertaining, of conducting oneself, both at home and abroad, cannot be followed without sacrificing one's personality and common sense in many cases, besides a great deal of money.

Hundreds of people commence their married life with a conventional wedding and a conventional wedding trip, when they could ill afford to waste either money, or nerves. How much better if they had saved their money and used it to help furnish a cosy home for themselves! Often after their home life is commenced the young wife thinks it beneath her to do her own work. It is courage she lacks, when she decides that it is scarcely in keeping with her social position to do her own housework, and her disinclination for it helps her to see reasons why it should not be becoming.

It would be better if we were not so easily given to taking up with new ideas, with things that receive the popular sanction. If we were more in the habit of thinking for ourselves there would be so much less foolishness in the world. The daily life into which we are born, and into which we are absorbed before we are aware, forms chains which only one in a hundred has moral strength to despise and to break when the right time comes, when an inward necessity for independent action arises, which is superior to all outward conventionalities. A wave of popular sentiment has very often little basis of sober thought, and popular customs and conventions are quite likely to be hugely lacking in common sense. What could be less sincere than the conventional handshake.

Then, take as another instance the conventional dress. Consider the ridiculous things they call hats, and the impracticable things they call shoes. Think of wearing short sleeves in winter and trailing perishable fabrics in the dust as we walk. Many a woman is a slave to conventionality. A fashion edict seems to paralyze her brain. Before what she supposes to be the inviolable laws of the kingdom of fashion, she stands petrified. She dare not be original because she fears to be thought odd. If green is the conventional shade, she dons green, when perhaps it is not, in the least, suited to her complexion. A woman should no more accept a bonnet that is unbecoming, because it is the fashion, than she should accept a husband of a certain type, because that is the style of man they are marrying this season. Better study one's own style and select from the prevailing modes that which is individually becoming, keeping in mind the couplet by one of England's poets:

"Be not the first by whom the new is tried, Nor yet the last to lay the old aside."

The wealthiest young woman in America attended a public function in New York, and this is a newspaper's account of her appearance: "There was nothing of what we call 'conventional' in Miss Helen Gould's appearance. She wore a small black hat, which would have been completely hidden in the crown of a 'merry widow,' and which was trimmed only with a bow of black velvet, and a buckle. Her white shirtwaist, with a neck ribbon, was of the simplest order, and a black skirt and short black coat were alike quiet and ladylike. So simple was Miss Gould's attire that she was an unconscious rebuke to the overdressed girls and women around her, who could ill afford the clothes they wore, and it must be confessed that the quietly dressed woman, worth millions, looked the woman that she is, while of those around her the least said the better."

Do not lose your own personality in trying to be conventional. Remember home manners and home affection and happiness are in no sense dependent upon style or custom. We are likely to forget that our appearance in the eyes of our little world is not dependent upon what we have in our houses, or even the sort of clothes we wear, but is almost entirely dependent upon our own personality. The world may confidently expect us to do certain things, and follow certain customs which it has set down, but we have our own lives to live and can afford to do without the plans the world offers us. It is not, as many believe, so important to know how to walk and sit and dress quite correctly; just how to order a dinner from a menu card, and which fork to use. The ideal people are the simple and unaffected ones, and the truly great are at all times honest and without sham.

At the same time, the world's opinion is to a certain extent well worth heeding, and much sorrow often comes from utterly disregarding it. Let us live simply and dress quietly. Let us smooth out our faces, and take the frills from our manners and speech. Let us begin to rid ourselves of unnecessary convention and reserve. In the greatest moments of life there is no room for affectation, nor in the lesser moments is there need of it. To our own selves be true. In every hour of our lives cultivate simplicity and obey the mandates of the duty which lies nearest us. The elements of happiness and faith and joy in living are all within us. They can never be found in the outside world.

Let us sweep the cobwebs of envy, and discontent from our house of life and open its door to the sunshine that is waiting to come in.

The Simple Fact Remains

Shakespeare was a poet grand
  Traditions so declare;
Some things he did not understand,
  But they were very rare.
But nowadays we have no time
  For sixteenth century lads,
For hubby reads the politics
  And wifey reads the ads.

Rabelais and Cervantes, too,
  Had humor—so they say,
And Moliere molded, wise and true
  And witty, human clay.
With patient art they pictured forth
  Sinners, saints and cads—
Now hubby reads the baseball news
  And wifey reads the ads.

Plato, a philosopher,
  Wrote many things of note;
He taught men truth (so we infer
  From things we hear he wrote);
But that was long, long, long ago
  Among forgotten fads—
Now hubby bolts the stock reports
  And wifey reads the ads.

No one was bound by culture's rules
  When Homer smote his lyre,
There were no graded public schools
  To set the world on fire;
No colleges worked day and night
  To manufacture "grads,"
While hubby read the racing tips
  And wifey read the ads.

Of course, I don't presume to state
  That things are worse to-day
Than when men marched through Hadrian's gate
  Or lined the Appian Way,
When Virgil no typewriter had
  Or even paper pads.
Still, hubby does read sporting news
  And wifey does read ads.

THOMAS L. MASSON.

From Woman's Home Companion.

FASHIONABLE EMBROIDERIES

SO many of our readers are interested in the punched or Normandy embroidery that we are showing some further suggestions for this fashionable work, as well as a diagram which will clearly show the method of working this beautiful embroidery. It is seldom that an embroidery becomes so suddenly popular and suitably adapted to so many uses as the Normandy or punched work. One of the reasons for this is that it is most durable, and while the background stitch may be somewhat tedious the remainder of the design is so easily and quickly embroidered that in reality less time is expended upon this than other embroideries which require so much padding before the work is commenced.

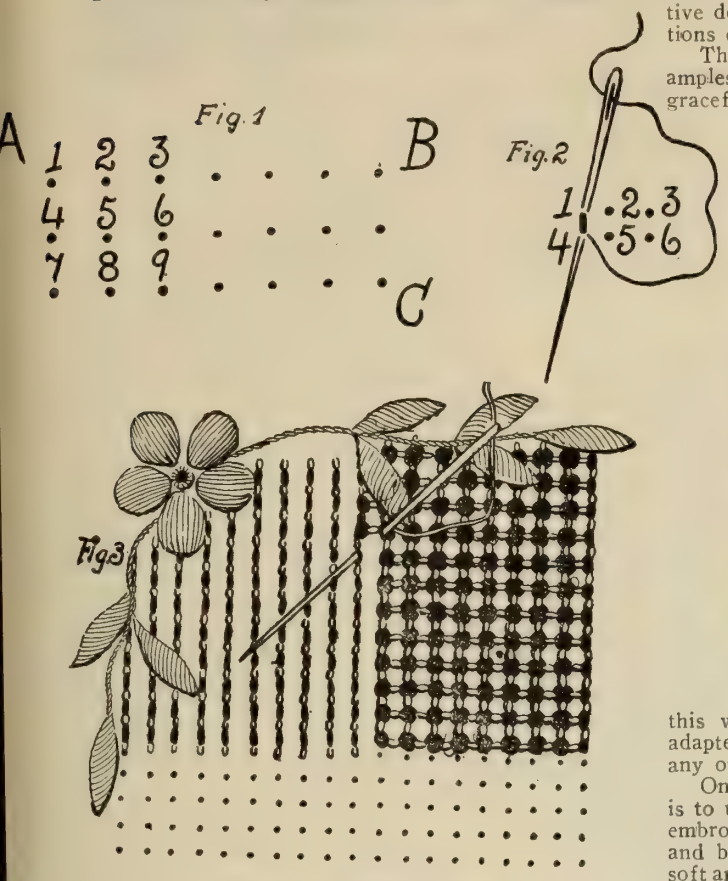

Diagram for Punched Stitch.

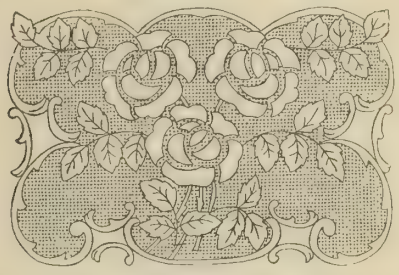
All articles of household linen as well as dresses, waists, collars, etc., are made attractive with this embroidery. The linens of rather open weaves are necessary for large pieces of work, but fine marquisettes, lawns, sheer linens, etc., are also suitable for dainty fine dress and lingerie purposes.

Special needles are required for this embroidery.



No. 6501—Cushion (front and back). 90 cents.

They are coarse, and the punching of the linen with these threaded with a strong fine thread gives the lace-like background. The diagram will show that the embroidery is to be worked in straight rows first, all one way, then across, keeping an even tension on the embroidery thread. The beauty of this work depends upon the evenness, as a beautiful design may easily be ruined and puckered by pulling the strands too tightly together.

On large, bold designs, such as the two centre-pieces we illustrate, the design only requires heavy outlining, using a coarser thread than for the punched background. Other embroidery seems to rather detract than add to the effect, as the beauty of the design is to have the linen in relief against the lace-like background.

Smaller embroideries, where the punched design is used for filling scrolls, etc., are effectively combined with solid padded embroidery, this idea is shown on collar Set. No. 8225, which has an attractive design of French embroidery with dainty insertions of punched work.

The two cushions illustrated are effective examples of this class of embroidery. The 6503 is graceful, and original, and one of the features of this work is so many striking designs have been adapted, which would not have been practical for any other class of embroidery.

No. 8225—Collar and Cuffs Set. 60 cents.

One of the newest ideas for cushions and centres is to use cream or greyish linen background for the embroidery, working the punched filling with white, and bringing out the remainder of the design is soft artistic tones matching the coloring of the room where it is to be used. Thus 6501 Rose Cushion could be punched with white, the scrolls and leaves outlined and veined with green, and the roses either only outlined or else worked in solid padded satin stitch in dull rose or brown shades. Many effective combinations will suggest themselves to our readers.

No. 6046—27-inch. 80 cents.

Many beautiful waist designs are being shown for this effective embroidery, many of which are being embroidered on sheer masquisettes. The effect is most dainty and the designs are equally suitable for either the kimono effect of the set-in sleeve which is being so much used at present. We will be pleased to give further information regarding these to any one interested.

Readers will please note that the prices quoted on this page are for stamped linens only.

No. 6047—36-inch. $1.35.

No. 6503—Cushion (front and back). 90 cents.

If further information is required as to prices for materials to finish, etc., address Belding, Paul, Corticelli, Limited, Linen Department, Montreal.

Special needles for the punched embroidery can be supplied at 5 cents each.

IF YOU WILL SEND US

— 35 CENTS —

we will send you

8 SKEINS OF EMBROIDERY SILK

which is sufficient to finish a

15 INCH CENTRE PIECE

which is stamped for

"THE NEW HEATHER EMBROIDERY"

This is the very latest embroidery which will be fashionable for 1912.

We will

SUPPLY FREE

sufficient lace to edge this Centre Piece, and the diagram enclosed will furnish full instructions for this beautiful embroidery which is simple but effective.

Send at once as this generous offer is made for a short period only.

Our Art Embroidery Silks are the best on the market.

Send 10 cents for a copy of Belding's Needle and Hook Book which contains all the latest suggestions for Art Embroidery. :: ::

Address

BELDING, PAUL, CORTICELLI
LIMITED

Dept. L MONTREAL, P.Q.

When two numbers are given with one costume, two patterns are required at 12 cents each. Send cash to PATTERN DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, 59-61 John Street, Toronto, Canada. Order always by number, stating size wanted. Patterns are mailed from our Toronto office the same day as order is received. PAPER PATTERNS TWELVE CENTS EACH POST PAID.

Gowns for Afternoon Occasions

TWO of the most noticeable features to be found in the latest fashions are graceful overskirts and peplums, and these models show them to advantage. In the illustration both gowns are made of taffeta, one white, the other striped, but fabrics are marvelously beautiful just now, and there are a great many that can be adapted to the purpose.

The white gown is exceedingly dainty. It is trimmed with frills and banding of lace, and it is in every way as attractive as can be. The tunic is made in three pieces, and the complete underskirt in four. There is very little labor involved in the making, and the effect is smart in the extreme. The blouse includes the kimono sleeves that retain all their favor. It can be made just as illustrated or either with a square or high neck. In this case one material is used throughout, but overskirts always suggest combinations, and the model will be a very pretty one for two materials. Blouse and overskirt, or tunic, made of marquisette or other transparent material over a messaline skirt would be beautiful, or plain material could be combined with striped, or two colors could be used to make a good effect. For trimmings can be used frills, bandings, scalloped edges or any preferred finish, but frills of graduated widths make one of the new features. The slightly raised waist line is always pretty, and is liked by many women, but there are a great many girdles being worn, and this skirt can be cut to the natural line and finished with a belt if found more becoming.

For the medium size the blouse will require 2⅞ yards of material 36, 1½ yards 44 inches wide, with 2⅛ yards of banding and 2½ yards of lace; for the skirt will be needed 7¾ yards 36, 5½ yards 44, with 8 yards of lace.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7402, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 bust; of the skirt, No. 7403, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist.

The second gown shows the favorite two-piece skirt and a blouse that is finished in an extremely novel way. Trimming portions are arranged over the tucks and over the edges of the peplum to give a most distinctive effect, and there is a fancy collar at the back that is in every way attractive. The foundation model, however, is just a plain one, shown in the small view, and the peplum can be made shorter if liked. As a result the model suits simple materials as well as the silk, and it would be charming made of shantung or foulard with trimming of satin.

For the medium size the blouse will require 3¾ yards of material 27, 2⅝ yards 36, 2¼ yards 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard of silk for the trimming, and 1½ yards of allover lace 18 inches wide: for the skirt will be needed 3¾ yards 27, 2¾ yards 36 or 44 inches wide; the width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2⅛ yards.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7410, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust, of the skirt, No. 7304, in sizes from 22 to 32 waist.

A Fascinating Bag

THE very newest of all the adaptations of Irish crochet work is a bag, all of the crochet, but by no means of the fine, closely twisted imported Irish thread. That would make an endless task, for the bag is fully seven inches by ten, without its novel fringe. It is made of a heavy mercerized D. M. C. cotton, silky white, and is practically made from two of the oblong rose centred medallions so often used for inserting in fine lingerie waists or for neckwear.

The same working formula, however, would serve without a change, as the cotton is so coarse that the rose in the centre of each side of the bag is almost, if not quite two inches across, with silky petals standing up from the surface of the groundwork. The quality of the thread used makes it possible to crochet this bag in this enlarged fashion without the result being at all "sleazy." The groundwork is well filled with picots, and the little "motifs" made by crocheting a succession of triple crochet stitches into one of the picot loops. When the sides have been finished they are joined with a half-inch edging of the same thread, and a lace of some two inches in width is crocheted around the top, the open spaces of which are used as a beading in which to run a heavy twisted cord of the working cotton.

Around the edges of the joined section, at the sides and bottom, the bag is a fringe of "dangles"—pendants some two inches long, wider at the lower end and tapering toward the top, "plain crocheted" around a "stuffing" of white cotton wool or some similar filling.

New Embroidery Ideas

BEADS still play as important a part in the trimmings as they did earlier in the season, and all colors and kinds of them are very much used. Far newer than the metallic or glass ones, however, are those of white china, and these are used in embroidery for all sorts of materials and occasions. Lovely scarfs of messaline or chiffon have on the ends a deep border done in beads of a contrasting color, as tiny pink beads on a white scarf, or white beads on a pale blue one. Tunics made of very thin silk or chiffon also have this bead work, and they are even used on the washable linen and mull frocks. One lingerie gown shown had the entire front of the blouse closely embroidered, a smaller design on each side of the back, a straight deep band around the edge of the kimono sleeves and an eight-inch band on the skirt. Smart parasols in dainty colors are shown with a wide border of these white china beads.

The work is all done by hand and any of the designs formerly used for braiding may be chosen. Care must be exercised not to pull or draw the material in working, and also each bead should be sewn on by taking a tiny back stitch. This will prevent the entire design being ruined if the thread breaks or one bead works loose. Beaded bags are being carried, the long cord by which they swing from the arm being made of several strands of strung beads tightly twisted.

Another new idea in embroidery is to decorate white lingerie frocks with colored oval disks. One very effective dress illustrating this was of white dimity, while the disks were of pale pink linen, and in three sizes. They were applied to the hem of the skirt to form a deep border in three rows, the largest disks being at the bottom. The smallest size only was used on the edge of the sleeves and to form a motif on the blouse front.

Blouse Pattern No. 7402
Skirt Pattern No. 7403

Blouse Pattern No. 7410
Skirt Pattern No. 7304

Dainty Lingerie Gowns

THE lingerie gown is always one of special interest at this season, and here are two lovely models, one of which is designed for young girls and for the small women to whom girlish styles are becoming.

Marquisette is one of the prettiest as well as most fashionable materials of the season, and in the illustration the gown to the left is made thereof with trimming of simple lace. The model is a most attractive one, including many new features. The wide fichu is important, and the peplum is to be found upon many of the very latest designs. This last is separate from the gown, however, and can be omitted if a plainer effect is liked. The skirt is made in two pieces, lapped on to narrow panels at the sides. The blouse is a simple one with separate sleeves sewed to the armholes. If liked, it can be made with high neck and long sleeves. All the pretty lingerie materials of the season are appropriate, and the model also can be utilized, for the simple silks that often are made in lingerie style, while for trimming any one of the fashionable laces or embroidery can be used. As all the banding is arranged on indicated lines, the labor of making is slight, while the result is in every way satisfactory.

For the medium size will be required 6¾ yards of material 27, 6¼ yards 36, 4½ yards 44 inches wide, with 10 yards of edging, 10 yards of insertion to make as illustrated, 1½ yards of allover lace 18 inches wide for yoke and long sleeves, as shown in back view. The width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2¼ yards.

The pattern, No. 7419, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 inches bust measure.

Flouncings and bordered materials never were prettier than at this season. They are shown in almost limitless varieties, and the young girl's model is especially adapted to their use.. The simple straight tunic, or overskirt, is in every way smart and attractive, while the foundation, or under portion of the skirt, is a straight band stitched to the lower edge, consequently there is only the weight of one skirt, while the effect is of two. The blouse is so simple that it speaks for itself. Kimono sleeves retain all their favor and are always graceful, and the tucks mean just pretty fullness. The neck can be made square

Priestley's

Every yard of "Priestley's" cloth is rolled on the varnished board and the name stamped every 5 yards on the selvedge.

"PRIESTLEY'S LIMITED"

Whether you want a dainty silk-and-wool fabric like "Ambrose"—a fine or large twill—or a coating serge like "Sandown" or "Concord"—be sure that you get the genuine "Priestley's" goods, rolled on the varnished board. 4

The Best of the World's Fashions are illustrated and described, and the cost of the garments to you told, in the Economist Style Book.

Thousands of Canadian women dress better now than was ever before possible within their means, because they use this Style Book.
Send us your name and address and we will mail you a copy. (Free).

Why Not Dress Well?

Let Us Convince You AT OUR RISK that you can dress as well as the best dressed women in the leading cities at very much less expense, by using the Economist Style Book.

Our guarantee of absolute satisfaction or money promptly refunded goes with every garment we sell.

No. G 192.
Price, - $5.95
(all charges paid)

No. G 192

We prepay all charges on goods to you, no matter where you live.

The Economist Cloak & Suit Co.
Dep' HJ TORONTO, ONT.

BUST AND HIPS

Every woman who attempts to make a dress or shirt waist immediately discovers how difficult it is to obtain a good fit by the usual "trying-on-method," with herself for the model and a looking-glass with which to see how it fits at the back

"HALL-BORCHERT PERFECTION Adjustable Dress Forms"

do away with all discomforts and disappointments in fitting, and render the work of dressmaking at once easy and satisfactory. This form can be adjusted to 50 different shapes and sizes; bust raised or lowered, also made longer and shorter at the waist line and form raised or lowered to suit any desired skirt length. Very easily adjusted, cannot get out of order, and will last a lifetime.

Write for illustrated Booklet containing complete line of Dress Forms with prices.

Hall-Borchert Dress Form Co., of Canada, Limited.
70-72 Pearl St., Toronto, Can.

or high. If bordered material is not liked, or for any reason it is desirable to use the model for plain fabric, the edges can be trimmed with banding or with insertion, or they could be scalloped, either bound or buttonholed, for scallops treated in these ways are among the smartest of all things this season.

For the 16-year size will be required 2⅛ yards of flouncing 28 inches wide, with 3½ yards 17 inches wide, and ¼ yard of plain material 36, ½ yard of tucking 18 inches wide and 2¼ yards of banding to make as illustrated.

The pattern, No. 7413, is cut in sizes for misses of 16 and 18 years of age.

New Neckwear

THE round neck admits of many different treatments in the name of finish and decoration, but the new turned-down plaiting, varying an inch to four inches in width, is one of the foremost; the narrower are perhaps the more choice. This frill is cut either from a straight or a graduated piece, and it is made of satin, of taffeta, of footing, or of lace insertion. In some cases two materials are combined. One of the prettiest plaitings shown is of footing half an inch wide, edged with the same width of satin ribbon, while another shows a strip of selvage cut from a length of satin, and plaited. When lace is chosen, Mechlin and shadow are two of the kinds that, being made with straight edges, are successful as plaitings.

The graduated frill which shows a decided point in front and on each shoulder is a nice variation from the straight line, and often more becoming and less trying.

A tiny plaiting of insertion or footing sometimes surrounds the quaint old-fashioned round-cornered collar which is one of the season's revivals. This bit of embroidered mull fitted the round neck of great-grandmother's gown, and is destined to appear once again, but this time with the additional plaiting.

On certain of the newest summer frocks made of medium weight tub material, the neck is cut out to a line four inches below the collar, and then mounted upon a more sheer yoke.

Models for Silk and Linen

THE present may well be called a silk season, for a great many kinds are being extensively worn. In the illustration are shown two models, which are especially well adapted to taffeta and to silks of a similar kind, and also to linen and other fabrics that take tailored finish with success.

The young girl's costume includes a blouse that is belted in the Russian style that is so popular this season, and sleeves that can be made either in three-quarter or full length. Long sleeves have taken a great hold, and unquestionably are fashionable, but those of three-quarter length are equally correct, and are apt to be preferred by many wearers during the warm weather season. The simple little skirt is made in two pieces, with a straight band joined to the lower edge, and this band is laid in inverted plaits at the sides. The striped silk makes an exceedingly good effect, and stripes of any material would be found equally satisfactory, but such a design as this one is not to be limited to any one treatment. In the back view linen is trimmed with embroidery, and with tucking, and the result is excellent, while thinner and lighter materials, such as voile and the simple lawns and batistes, can be treated in the same way with success. Plain, changeable taffeta would be pretty made after the manner shown in the front view, with the edges of the little blouse or

Dress Pattern No. 7419 Dress Pattern No. 7413

Buy Your Ostrich Feathers at First Cost

Ostrich feathers form the most beautiful and most stylish trimming in existence for millinery. But you don't have to pay exorbitant prices for these feathers if you know where to buy them.

The London Feather Company affords a greater variety of high quality ostrich feathers at a lower price than you can find anywhere else in Canada.

Magnificent willow plumes, beautiful French duchess curl plumes, delicate aigrette and all the latest fancy mounts in the newest Spring colorings are made by us in our own factory from raw materials imported direct from African farms, and sold to you at a saving of all the middleman's profit. You don't have to take our word for the quality of these beautiful plumages. We will gladly refund your money if you are not fully satisfied after

10 DAYS' TRIAL

Send for our beautiful illustrated ostrich feather book. This will be sent you free by using the coupon below. Don't put it off—before you forget it use the coupon NOW.

London Feather Co., Limited
144 Yonge St., Toronto
London, Eng. Paris New York Montreal

London Feather Co., Limited
144 Yonge St., Toronto, Ontario

Gentlemen:—
Please send me at once your illustrated booklet (H) on Ostrich Feathers

Name

Street and No

City ..... Prov

Don't take chances with your fine things — Silks, Satins, Laces, Suits.

Send them to Fountain, to be cleaned or dyed.

If soiled, our Dry Cleaning will restore them to pristine freshness. If stained or faded, we can dye them as good as new. Fountain's work is irreproachable.

We pay express one way on goods from out of town.

Write for free copy of our book, which tells all about our work and our prices.

Fountain "My Valet"
30 Adelaide St. W., Toronto.
15

DOMINION EXPRESS
Money Orders

and Foreign Cheques are payable all over the World.

They may be sent in payment of produce, tax, gas and electric light bills, interest on notes and mortgages, insurance premiums, subscriptions to newspapers and magazines, and in fact in payment of all kinds of accounts, whether in or out of town.

We give you a receipt and if the remittance goes astray in the mails,

we refund your money or issue a new order free of charge.

TRAVELLERS' CHEQUES ISSUED.
MONEY SENT BY TELEGRAPH AND CABLE.

When purchasing Goods by mail, ALWAYS remit by

DOMINION EXPRESS CO.
MONEY ORDERS

RATES FOR MONEY ORDERS:

$ 5. AND UNDER			3	CENTS
OVER	5.	TO $10.	6	"
"	10.	" 30.	10	"
"	30	" 60.	15	"

AGENCIES THROUGHOUT CANADA.

This Washer Must Pay For Itself

A MAN tried to sell me a horse once. He said it was a fine horse, and had nothing the matter with it. I wanted a fine horse. But I didn't know anything about horses much. And I didn't know the man very well either.

So I told him I wanted to try the horse for a month. He said, "All right, but pay me first, and I'll give you back your money if the horse isn't all right."

Well, I didn't like that. I was afraid the horse wasn't "all right" and that I might have to whistle for my money if I once parted with it. So I didn't buy the horse, although I wanted it badly. Now this set me thinking.

You see I make Washing Machines —the "1900 Gravity" Washer.

And I said to myself, lots of people may think about my Washing Machine as I thought about the horse, and about the man who owned it.

But I'd never know, because they wouldn't write and tell me. You see, I sell my Washing Machines by mail. I have sold over half a million that way.

So, thought I, it is only fair enough to let people try my Washing Machines for a month, before they pay for them, just as I wanted to try the horse.

Now, I know what our "1900 Gravity" Washer will do. I know it will wash the clothes, without wearing or tearing them, in less than half the time they can be washed by hand or by any other machine.

I know it will wash a tubful of very dirty clothes in Six minutes. I know no other machine ever invented can do that, without wearing out the clothes.

Our "1900 Gravity" Washer does the work so easy that a child can run it almost as well as a strong woman, and it don't wear the clothes, fray the edges, nor break buttons the way all other machines do.

It just drives soapy water clear through the fibres of the clothes like a force pump might.

So, said I to myself, I will do with my "1900 Gravity" Washer what I wanted the man to do with the horse. Only I won't wait for people to ask me. I'll offer first, and I'll make good the offer every time.

Let me send you a "1900 Gravity" Washer on a month's free trial. I'll pay the freight out of my own pocket, and if you don't want the machine after you've used it a month, I'll take it back and pay the freight too. Surely that is fair enough, isn't it?

Doesn't it prove that the "1900 Gravity" Washer must be all that I say it is?

And you can pay me out of what it saves for you. It will save its whole cost in a few months, in wear and tear on the clothes alone. And then it will save 50 cents to 75 cents a week over that in washwoman's wages. If you keep the machine after the month's trial, I'll let you pay for it out of what it saves you. If it saves you 60 cents a week, send me 50 cents a week 'till paid for. I'll take that cheerfully, and I'll wait for my money until the machine itself earns the balance.

Drop me a line to-day, and let me send you a book about the "1900 Gravity" Washer that washes clothes in 6 minutes.

Address me this way—

B. G. Bach, Manager 1900 Washer Co.
537½ Yonge St., Toronto, Ont.

coatee and the upper edge of the bands on the skirt finished with the pinked out ruchings or with flat puffings, that are so much liked in that particular silk. For the 16-year size will be required 5 yards of material 27, 4½ yards 36, 4 yards 44 inches wide, to make as shown in the front view; for the treatment indicated in the back view will be needed 4½ yards 27, 4 yards 36, 3¾ yards 44 inches wide, with 2⅛ yards of flouncing 12 inches wide, 9 yards of insertion, 3¼ yards of tucking 4½ inches wide, and ⅜ yard 18 inches wide for the yoke.

The pattern, No. 7423, is cut in sizes for misses of 16 and 18 years of age.

Buff linen makes the gown shown to the right with chemisette of white embroidery and frills of sheer white muslin. It is very smart and very attractive, altogether in the height of style, for color and material both are exceedingly smart, but there is scarcely any fashionable model to-day that can not be varied, and this one can be made with a shorter peplum and with or without a collar, and with the blouse made plain or with a frill, or with an applied band of lace, as indicated in one of the small views. In whatever way it is treated, it is exceedingly attractive and altogether fashionable, and the details therefore can be left entirely to individual preference. The skirt is a simple three-piece one with the edges at the left of the front, overlapped in place of being seamed. The blouse is made with sleeves sewed to the armholes, and the peplum is separate so that it can be used or omitted, as may be liked. Again, the three-quarter sleeves are not the only ones, for they can be finished with deep cuffs extending them to the wrists. Whether linen, pique, taffeta, or any other seasonable material is used, the gown is sure to be liked, and in addition to its other advantages it is easy to adjust, for the closing is made at the left of the front.

For the medium size will be needed 8¼ yards of material 27, 6½ yards 36, 5 yards 44 inches wide, with ⅝ yard 18 inches wide for the chemisette, 1¾ yards of muslin ruffling for the frills.

The pattern, No. 7411, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust.

Collars, Cuffs and Revers on Suits

THERE has been some change in collars, cuffs and revers on many of the suits this season. As these make the suit attractive or otherwise, great attention is being given to their construction. The large collars have disappeared and the small ones take their place. The mannish revers and collars are also considered very good. The shawl collar remains. Self collars and cuffs are seen in many of the plainer garments, but in the more dressy ones there are collars, revers and cuffs of satin, bengaline, wash-rag cloth, repp, pique, linen or lace. These will be popular this spring.

Dress Pattern No. 7423

Dress Pattern No. 7411

Girl's Dress

THE yoke dress is always a pretty one for little girls. This one is quite novel, for the yoke is closed at the left side of the back while the dress itself is closed at the centre, beneath the box plait. In the illustration it is made of linen with trimming of embroidery, but frocks such as this can be utilized for all materials that are used for girls' dresses. The model is a charming one for challis, cashmere and the like, and for linen, soft finished pique, and also the thinner and lighter washable materials, such as lawn and batiste, with trimming of any preferred banding; or the front of the dress could be left plain

The sugary hearts of sweet corn, toasted crisp and rolled thin as a wafer — that's the dainty that delights the appetite! TO-DAY order
Kellogg's
TOASTED
CORN
FLAKES
10c

DYEING BUT NOT DEAD

LADIES of refinement and culture know that fine gowns add lustre of youth to the appearance.

FINE gowns and everyday dresses cost money, but the life of a costume may be doubled by proper care.

PROPER care includes timely cleaning or dyeing before the stains become ingrained.

WE are alone in guaranteeing a jet black on Raw or Pongee Silk.

OUT of City orders as cheap as city trade. We pay express.

WILLOW PLUMES made from your old feathers.
$3.00 to $8.00

Write for price list and advice.

RELIABLE AGENTS WANTED IN EVERY TOWN

SINCLAIR DYE WORKS
656 College St. - Toronto, Ont.
Phone Coll. 621.

The foundation of a good dinner

A few drops of H.P. Sauce itself will teach you more about its excellence than an ocean of description; try it with hot meat, cold meat, or even bread and cheese.

H.P. SAUCE

A secret combination of richest oriental fruits and spices with pure malt vinegar.

Made in England—but sold here.

and the yoke be made from all-over embroidery, as indicated in the small view.

The dress consists of front and back portions that are plaited and joined to the lining yoke. The pointed yoke is finished and arranged over the lining. The three-quarter sleeves are tucked at their lower edges, the long sleeves are gathered and the short sleeves are left plain.

Dress Pattern No. 7373

For the 6 year size will be required 3 yards of material 27, 2½ yards 36, 2 yards 44 inches wide with ¼ yard of banding to trim as shown in the large view, ⅜ yard of all-over lace and ¾ yard of banding to trim as shown in the small front view; 8 yards of braid to trim as shown in the back view.

The pattern, No. 7373, is cut in sizes from 4 to 8 years.

Girl's Dress

SUCH little dresses as this one are the prettiest possible for the little girls. They are charming in their simplicity, and they suit all childish materials. This one can be made with or without the revers and with or without cuffs, consequently it can be made just a plain little dress for morning and playtime or a pretty, dainty one for afternoon occasions. It is closed at the front, and even the littlest child can take it off and put it on herself. In the illustration one of the new striped voiles is trimmed with white batiste that is scalloped and embroidered by hand.

The dress is made with blouse and skirt. The blouse is cut in one with the sleeves,, but is made with a seam at the centre back as well as under the arms. The skirt is straight. The two are joined at the belt. When the revers are used it is seamed to the right front edge.

For the 6-year size will be required 3¾ yards of material 27, 2¾ yards 36, 2¼ yards 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard 27 for the trimming. For the embroidery can be used transfer designs 583 and 417. Price 10 cents each.

The pattern, No. 7342, is cut in sizes for girls of 4, 6 and 8 years of age.

Peplum Blouses Coming

THE latest word in lingerie blouses is peplum styles—revivals of 1830, says Ready-to-Wear. The shape of the peplum is its strong feature, and many and odd are the cuts in which they are produced. Some are pointed, some scalloped, and others are round with old-fashioned tabs attached to the centre of the back.

Peplum styles have been exploited before, in recent seasons, but never with the same amount of enthusiasm which is evidenced on their behalf just now.

New Cobweb and Lace Veils

THE fashion in veils is varied; that is, varied in style and design, rather than in mesh. The cobweb veil is without doubt the favorite, and it is seen both plain and combined with dots—small, medium, and large. The plain cobweb veils come in simple designs, hexagon, octagon, and conventional flower patterns; but no matter what their design, they are used for face veils only. Other face veils have the foundation mesh in cobweb, and are ornamented with chenille dots. To describe the many patterns would be impossible, so great is their number.

One pretty veil, the foundation of which is cobweb, has a large hexagon figure made of small chenille dots, and the conventional flower in the middle of each hexagon is also chenille. This veil may be worn appropriately with a dress or semi-dress hat. The hat, however, must be moderate in size, for the face veil, which, to be correct, should cling close to the face and hair, is not in good taste when flowing loosely from a picture shape.

In the same class with the veil just described is the plain cobweb mesh veil. This pattern, because of its simplicity, is much worn by the conservative woman, and when properly arranged over the face the effect is very soft and dainty. A pretty veil more appropriate to wear with the tailored hats, has a sheer foundation, with small chenille squares in black and white, forming a checked pattern. Another, with the hexagon pattern, has a plain square design, with the squares seemingly held together with small dots.

All face veils, whether arranged on a tailored hat or a dressy shape, should be carefully pinned around the edge of the brim of the hat, allowing the lower edge of the veil to come just below the chin. The veil should be inconspicuously fastened with hairpins just below the barrette in the back of the hair, thus drawing it closely at the lower edge. Twisting the veil under the chin, to take out the fulness, spoils the shape of the veil, and surely detracts rather than adds to its pretty effect. The ends of the veil are tied, and tucked out of sight.

Dress Pattern No. 7342

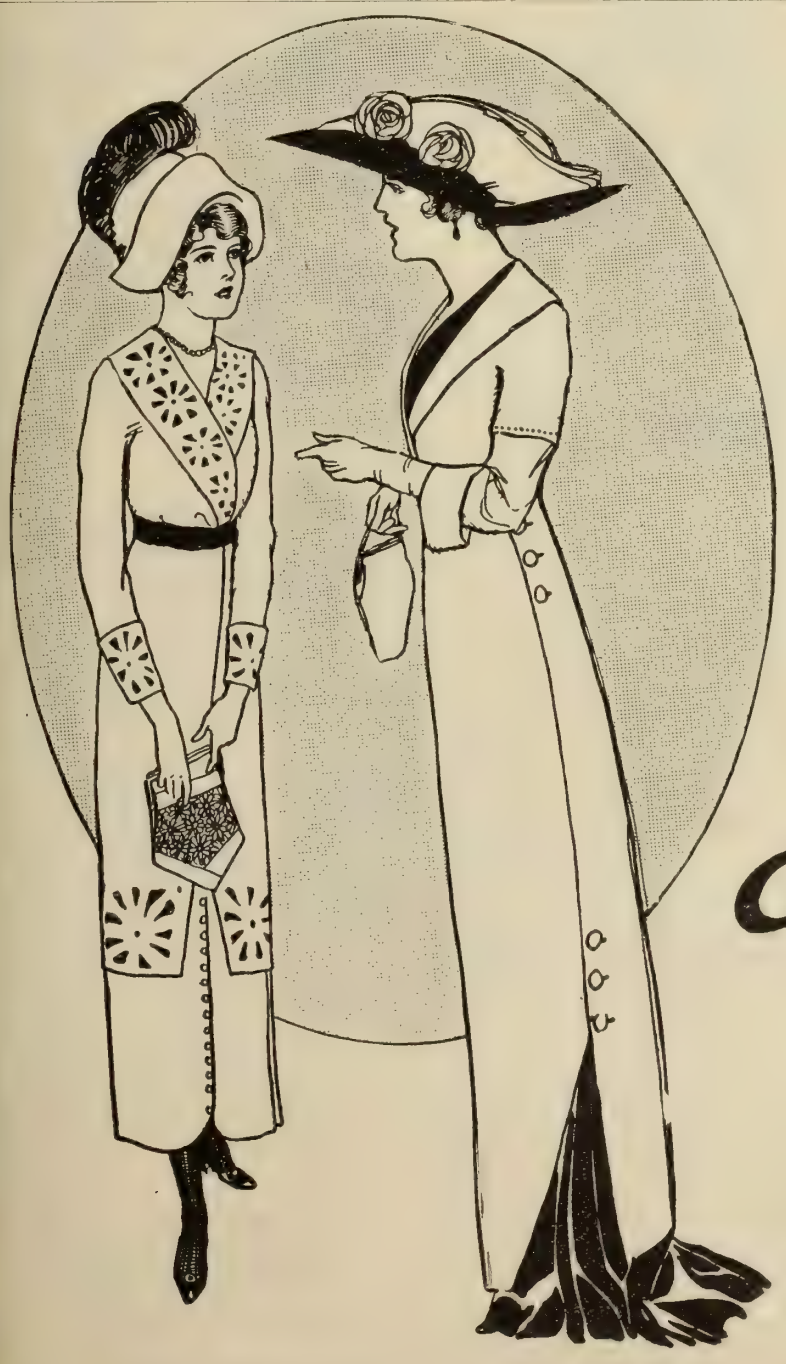
Lately the face veil has had a decided rival in the lace veil, and it seems likely that this latter veil will enjoy its decided popularity for several months to come From time to time there are new patterns and weavings, but there never has been quite so unique ideas as now.



IF YOU want your new gown to fit and look well, first get one of the new C/C a la Grace Corsets. There are so many models to choose from—each designed for a particular type of figure—that no woman need sacrifice comfort for fashion, if she is particular to get the model intended for her.

C/C à la Grace

CORSETS

are more popular than ever this year, because no other corset so successfully preserves the pliant, youthful lines now so fashionable.

No. 517 is a new model especially designed for slim, girlish figures. Lightly boned to give ease and naturalness.

No. 687 gives youthful lines to more mature figures. Unusually flexible and comfortable. Low bust for average figures.

¶ If you would like to see all the new à la Grace models write for our free style book to Crompton Corset Co., Limited, Toronto

401

When you reach home fatigued, a cup of

BOVRIL

or a little Bovril soup will put you in good trim for your evening meal.

Dietetic experts have shown that the rapid nutritive action of Bovril is a valuable aid to digestion.

B-4-12

Jaeger Summer Wear Should Follow Jaeger Winter Wear

People are more careful buying winter underwear than summer underwear.

This is a mistake.

Those who find Jaeger the ideal winter wear will find Jaeger light weight summer underwear just as necessary for the hot weather as Jaeger heavy weight is for the cold weather.

Health and comfort both require Jaeger.

Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woollen System Co. Ltd.

TRADE MARK

OWN STORES

231 Yonge Street - - - - - TORONTO
316 St. Catharine St. West - - MONTREAL
364 Portage Ave. - - - - WINNIPEG

And from Jaeger Agents throughout the Dominion.

IF YOU ONLY KNEW how easy it is to get splendid results from home dyeing with

MAYPOLE SOAP

The Quick, Clean Home Dye

you would certainly use it and save yourself a lot of needless expense. For with Maypole Soap you can dye dresses, ribbons, curtains, table-covers, cushion-tops, feathers, parasols, bathing suits, children's clothes—in fact, scores of things that have lost their beauty—and make them fresh and pretty as new. 24 brilliant, fadeless colors, from which you can make any shade. Colors 10c. a cake. Black 15c., at your dealer's or postpaid with booklet, "How to Dye" from

F. L. Benedict & Company, Montreal

PEASE FURNACE

Note vertical shaker; no more back-bending.

Unless you have used a PEASE Furnace this winter your heating troubles will be fresh in your memory. Spring will soon be here and your furnace will have completed its work. Instead of waiting till the last minute, why not arrange for your heating at once for next winter. Now is the time when you can get the best service and attention without undue haste.

There is nothing as good as the PEASE Warm Air Furnace, or PEASE Hot Water Boiler. "Ask the man who has one." Send for our booklet, "The Question of Heating and Boiler Information."

PEASE FOUNDRY COMPANY, Limited
Toronto 350 Winnipeg
WESTERN REPRESENTATIVES
PEASE-WALDON CO., Limited, - WINNIPEG

A LETTER

THE CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL
Toronto, Ont.

Alta., April 4, 1912

Will be glad to have this Pattern, as I find the May Manton Patterns very good ones, no trouble to fit at all. We enjoy our Magazine coming in every month. Wishing it every success.

Yours truly,

Mrs. G. R. L———

Although the lace veil is very picturesque and exceedingly becoming, it has had a decidedly bad feature, which was this: When drawn over the face, it was almost impossible to see through it, and it was quite as impossible for the passer-by to see the fact behind it. Now this has all been done away with, by having the centre of the veil of plain mesh just big enough around to fit over the face. Of quite as much importance as the simple mesh feature in the cobweb veil is the very new and very correct arrangement of the veil itself. The top of the veil is shirred in the centre front, and fastened to the brim of the hat with a silver butterfly. At the side the veil is not fastened to the hat, but arranged in soft folds. At the back it is again shirred, but not quite so much; and at this point it is fastened, and the ends hang in graceful, loose folds.

One attractive lace veil has a plain mesh ground with dots and large leaves, done in the running stitch, scattered over its surface. The lower edge is finished with a border of the leaves and tiny flowers in lily of the valley effect.

The special feature of one of the newest fashionable veils has its border of fringe. Filet net veils are also much favored.

Girl's Dress

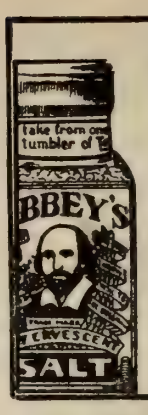
EVERY suggestion of the double skirt is exceedingly smart this season, and this dress shows the effect in an exceptionally attractive manner. In one view it is made all of one material; in the other view it is made of two, and it is equally well adapted to both treatments. All seasonable materials are appropriate, but the dress on the figure is made of rose colored linen with the collar and cuffs embroidered with white, while the back view shows white combined with color.

The dress consists of blouse and skirt. The side portions of the blouse and the upper portion of the skirt are lapped onto the front and lower portion to give a novel effect, yet the making is extremely simple. The one-piece sleeves are stitched to the armholes. The skirt is made in three sections and both the upper and lower sections are straight at their lower edges. The three-quarter sleeves are finished with bands and rolled over cuffs, the long sleeves with deep straight cuffs.

Dress Pattern No. 7365

For the 12 year size will be required 4¾ yards of material 27, 3¾ yards 36, 3⅜ yards 44 inches wide to make of one material throughout; 3½ yards of light colored material 27, 2½ yards 36 or 44 with 1½ yards of dark material 27, 1⅛ yards 36 or 44 inches wide to make as shown in back view.

The pattern, No. 7365, is cut in sizes for girls of 10, 12 and 14 years of age.



Abbey's Effer-vescent Salt

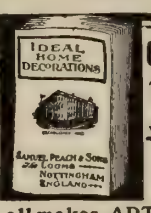
A wise person knows when to use Abbey's salt.

Don't you think it time to get a bottle?

25c and 60c.

Sold everywhere.

82



$500 Select from Buy Direct. Post Card

1912 Ideal Decorations 144 pages

Given Away This Book. First Cost. will bring it

Home Catalogue. illustrated.

CURTAINS, all makes, ART FABRICS, MUSLINS, Household LINEN, Ladies and Gents Underwear, Boots & Shoes, Costumes, Gents Clothing.

$6.25 TABLE DAMASK PARCEL POSTAGE & DUTY PAID.

2 White Damask Table Cloths. 64ins. by 84 ins. 2 White Damask Table Cloths, 60 ins. by 58 ins., rich Scroll and Floral designs, hemmed. 2 Half Bleached Table Cloths. hard wearing. 2 Irish Cambric Tea Cloths, 2 Handsome Tray Covers, Irish Embroidered & drawn thread. Greatest Value ever Offered.

$500 worth of Goods Free to Overseas Customers, third year of Gifts, full particulars with Catalogue.

Buy from actual Makers. Estd. 55 years. Great saving. Satisfaction Guaranteed.

SAML. PEACH & SONS, Box 667 The Looms, NOTTINGHAM, England.

Look for the "Cravenette" Trade Mark when you go to buy showerproof coats or cloth
The great improvement in showerproof cloth for men's wear, as well as for women's, makes it necessary to ensure that you get the genuine.
The Cravenette Co. Limited, Bradford, England.
Cravenette
24
If you cannot obtain goods write
Cravenette Co.
P.O. Box 1934. Montreal, Que.

Freckles

Maybe you can't prevent them, but you can remove them--quickly too

It is far better not to wait. The hot spring and summer sunshine bring out your freckles in all their unwelcome ugliness. There's a simple remedy—that removes freckles and discolorations as if by magic—and it's guaranteed to remove them, too, besides curing Red Nose, Blackheads, Rashes, Eczema, etc. Use it and get a clear complexion. Price, $1.50, express paid.

Princess Complexion Purifier

Superfluous Hair

Moles, Warts, Red Veins, etc., permanently eradicated by our reliable method of electrolysis. Booklet "H" and sample toilet cream mailed free.

Hiscott Institute
61 College St. TORONTO

Be Your Own DYER

Anyone can have Perfect Results Dyeing Right at Home if They Use

DY-O-LA
ONE DYE FOR ALL KINDS OF GOODS

The kind that dyes either Wool, Cotton, Silk or Mixed Goods, perfectly with the same dye.

Grasp the Idea?

You don't have to know what kind of cloth your goods are made of that you have to dye.

No Chance of Mistakes

That's what makes DY-OL-A the popular home Dye with the ladies.

The druggists keep it in a little cabinet like this.

Don't fail to send post card for story booklet, "How Dot Saved the Day," DY-OL-A color card, and Booklet telling what color your goods will "take" successfully.

The Johnson-Richardson Co., Limited

Montreal, Canada

Plain Blouse or Shirt Waist

THE plain shirt waist that is finished with shaped front edges that are overlapped is a new and smart one. The one illustrated can be treated in that way or finished with plain hemmed edges, as liked. It is without fullness and includes regulation sleeves with overlaps and straight cuffs. Altogether the design is a most satisfactory one both for the plain waist and for the foundation for material that has been tucked or trimmed to suit the fancy.

The waist is made with front and back portions, and the neck edge is finished with a neckband. The sleeves include openings that are finished with overlaps. The collar is separate and attached by means of buttonholes and studs. When made as shown in the large view, the front edges are slashed and finished and lapped one over the other; when made as shown in the small front view they are hemmed, and the closing is made with buttons and buttonholes for the entire length.

Pattern No. 7333

For the medium size will be required 2¾ yards of material 27, 2 yards 36, 1⅝ yards 44 inches wide.

The pattern, No. 7333, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42-inch bust measure.

Black in Combination

OF black and silver and black and gold there is no end. The black and silver combination is approved by almost all the great French dressmakers.

The manufacturers have provided a wealth of wonderful materials both in black and silver and black and gold, and the beauty of the metallic nets, laces and embroideries is beyond description. Black chiffons, marquisettes, etc., with gold borders, are legion, and the dressmakers are making artistic use of these bordered materials.

One lovely model has a white satin under-robe, over which falls a straight tunic of black chiffon, with a border of gold running up into the black in long points. Below this woven border is an applied border of wide dull gold lace joined to the chiffon under a narrow band of ermine. This tunic falls very low on the white satin skirt and over it is a graceful crossed drapery of black chiffon bordered widely with white chiffon, a single line of jets marking the line between. The bodice is of the gold bordered black chiffon with touches of gold lace and ermine in the short sleeves, and with a draped fichu of black chiffon bordered, like the over-tunic, in white chiffon, from which it is separated by a line of jet.

Black satin coats, so much worn last winter and so exceedingly practical, are here again, and there are plenty of smart-looking, graceful coats in this material backed or lined with bright color, which shows in collars and cuffs.

The Wizard Who Ends All Corns

Some years ago a chemist invented the now famous B & B wax.

To apply it we invented the Blue-jay plaster.

Since then, fifty million corns have been ended forever by this little application.

It is applied in a jiffy. The pain instantly ends. Then the B & B wax gently loosens the corn. In two days the whole corn, root and all, comes out.

No soreness, no discomfort. You simply forget the corn.

Why pare corns when this thing is possible?

Paring simply removes the top layers. It is exceedingly dangerous, for a slip of the blade may mean infection.

Why trifle with corns—treat them over and over—when a Blue-jay removes them completely, and in 48 hours. Prove it today.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

Blue-jay Corn Plasters

Sold by Druggists—15c and 25c per package

Sample Mailed Free. Also Blue-jay Bunion Plasters (151)

Bauer & Black, Chicago and New York, Makers of B & B Handy Package Absorbent Cotton, etc.

"Corn Fed!"

See the Kellogg "Corn Fed" boy! Isn't he a big, chubby fellow? Every morning he gets a big dish of the "growing" food — Kellogg's Corn Flakes. He thrives like your children will thrive when you feed them the nutritious sweet hearts of the world's finest corn.

Buy a package today.

42

Kellogg's TOASTED CORN FLAKES 10c Per Pkg.

Peerless Poultry Fence Protects
We build Peerless Poultry Fence strong enough to keep marauding animals out and sufficiently close to keep small fowl in.
A Real Fence That Gives Real Service
Built same as farm fence of good galvanized wire, protecting it against rust. Top and bottom No. 9 heavy, hard, steel wire—intermediate horizontal wires No. 12—stays No. 13, 32 to the rod. This makes an excellent, all around, general purpose fence suitable for turning all classes of stock.
Agencies nearly everywhere. Live agents wanted in unassigned territory.
The Banwell Hoxie Wire Fence Co., Ltd., Winnipeg, Manitoba, Hamilton, Ont.

Ontario Women's Institutes

GEORGE A. PUTNAM
SUPERINTENDENT
PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS, TORONTO

New Institutes

OUR list of Institutes has been added to during the past winter series of Farmers' and Women's Institute meetings, and it is gratifying to note the appreciation on the part of these Institutes, of the work which may be done by the Institute. It will be of interest to the older Institutes to know where these new Institutes have been organized. The list is: Algonquin, Shanley, Iroquois, Williamsburg, Kars, South March, Canton, Mount Grove, Spencerville, Phillipston, Ivanhoe, Stirling, Elgin, Coldsprings, Harwood, Baltimore, Centreton, Sunderland, Cornwall Centre, in Eastern Ontario; Belmore, Rosemount, Holland Centre, Shallow Lake, Strathnairn, Bognor, Wardsville, Hatford, Huttonville, Anten Mills, Thornton, Carlisle, in Western Ontario.

We wish the greatest success to all these new branches.

Annual Meetings

THE Department of Agriculture is pleased to note that Women's and Farmers' Institutes are co-operating in holding their annual meetings at the same time and place. The business sessions are usually held in the forenoon or early afternoon, followed by a brief programme, and later by an old-fashioned picnic. These gatherings can be made pleasant and profitable to both men and women, young and old.

Some provision should be made at these gatherings for one or two addresses by prominent local people or lecturers from the Department. Unless there is some special attraction, it can hardly be expected that many visitors from a distance will attend the annual. A meeting at which only business matters are considered is not always attractive to the average number. The business of the Institute should always be of interest to the members, but a special address will, as we know, increase the attendance, and add to the pleasure and profit of the meeting.

It will be impossible for the Department to furnish lady lecturers for such occasions, but some of our regular Farmers' Institute workers, as well as members of the Agricultural College staff, are available.

In planning for the annual meeting the district executive should arrange for the discussion of ways and means whereby the work can be extended and made of greater value during the coming year. They should ask that some of the local representatives give reports emphasizing features of the work which have specially appealed to the members of the branch represented.

The Summer Series of Meetings

ARRANGEMENTS are being made for some 700 Women's Institute meetings, to be held from the end of May to early in July. These will be attended by lecturers from the Department of Agriculture.

During this series, social and health problems, community improvement, wholesome literature, as well as subjects bearing more directly upon household management, will be emphasized. Medical doctors, nurses, domestic science graduates, school teachers and the thoroughly practical, successful women without special training, are all represented upon the staff of workers. The variety and practicability of the work undertaken by the Women's Institutes is one of its strong features.

The hearty co-operation on the part of the officers and members in securing a limited amount of local assistance in making definite plans as to the time and place of meeting, in thoroughly advertising the same, is all that is required to make the coming series decidedly successful.

With a few exceptions, only afternoon sessions will be held during this series. This plan is recognized as being more successful than when two sessions are announced.

A partial list of the meetings is given in this issue of the HOME JOURNAL.

Conference of Institute Lecturers

IT is the desire of the Department of Agriculture to give the best instruction to our Institutes, and a conference is being planned for the lecturers who will attend the summer series of meetings. Speakers of national reputation in social, philanthropic and domestic science work will address the lecturers, who will also have ample time to exchange ideas and suggestions gathered from the experience of former years.

The lecturers who appear before Women's Institutes in these days require to be well equipped along the lines for which they are announced. Institute members have been furnished with reports, bulletins and periodicals from time to time which have been the means of self-education to the point where they are becoming quite critical. Our lecturers recognize this, and see the necessity for thorough preparation.

The conference referred to will be held just previous to the time of the summer meetings, and the lecturers will take to the Institutes not only the information gained, but also the enthusiasm which always attends such a conference.

ROAD TO THE MILL, NEAR ROCKWOOD, ONT.

District Representatives

IT is gratifying to note the more general co-operation between the Women's Institutes and district representatives of the Department of Agriculture. It is well for both the representative and the Institute in his district, that the Women's Institutes should be well informed as to the nature of the work undertaken by these men appointed by the Departments of Agriculture and Education to look after the agricultural interests of the county in which each is located. They not only teach agriculture in the local High School, but co-operate with the officers of the organizations concerned in the improvement of agricultural societies, making more effective the work of the Farmers' Institutes, the encouragement of better methods in fruit growing, surveying farms for drainage systems, seed improvement, keeping of herd records, establishment of poultry circles, etc. Literature of interest to farmers and farmers' wives will be found in the office of the district representative, and we trust that the Women's Institutes will make greater use of the office of the district representatives, which we wish our readers to consider as a bureau of information to those who are looking for assistance in matters pertaining to farming and home and community improvement. Many of these men are prepared to give addresses of special interest to the Women's Institutes along nature study lines.

The list of representatives is as follows: W. E. J. Edwards, of Essex; W. H. Porter, of Petrolea; J. E. Smith, of Simcoe; F. C. Hart, of Galt; J. McLaughland, of Collingwood; J. H. Hare, of Whitby; D. A. McKenzie, of Lindsay; E. S. Hopkins, of Norwood; A. P. MacVannel, of Picton; S. Kennedy, of Perth; A. D. Campbell, of Morrisburg; A. D. McIntosh, of Stirling; R. S. Duncan, of Port Hope; W. D. Jackson, of Carp; H. A. Dorrance, of Orangeville; A. S. Smith, of Sault Ste. Marie; C. A. Galbraith, of New Liskeard; F. M. Clement, of Dutton; H. C. Duff, of Markdale; J. C. Steckley, of Newmarket; G. W. Collins, of Fort William.

It is expected that six or eight additional representatives will be appointed during the present season. Announcements will be made in these columns as soon as appointments have been made.

Libraries

ONE of the most satisfactory ways to use the Institute money is to establish a small library in connection with the Institute. This library could very well contain books of special value in household matters, and which are not usually found in the ordinary public library. The traveling libraries which are sent out by the Department of Education have been much appreciated by our Institute, especially in those localities where there is not a public library. There is, however, a peculiar pleasure in having a few books of one's own, and we would commend to the Institutes the expenditure of a portion of their funds for this purpose.

The lists of books given herewith are suggestive. A full list is found in the Handbook. These books may be ordered through the office of the superintendent.

"Food and Its Functions," "Home Economics," "Care and Feeding of Children" (Holt), "School Sanitation and Decoration," "Flowers, and How to Grow Them," "The Marvels of Our Bodily Dwelling." $5.30 and express charges.

"Food and Its Functions," "Home Sanitation," "The Hygiene of the Schoolroom," "Dust and Its Dangers," "The Rights of Children," "Home Economics." $5.23 and express charges.

"The Science of Nutrition," "Home Economics," "Laundry Manual," "Vegetable Gardening," "How to Plant Home Gardens," "From the Child's Standpoint," "Home Nursing" (Harrison), "Handbook of Invalid Cookery." $8.25 and express charges.

"Food and Its Functions," "School Hygiene," "Home Sanitation," "The Story of Germ Life," "The Study of Childhood," "Care of Feeding of Children" (Holt), "Husband, Wife and Home," "Home Economics," "The Expert Waitress," "Teaching Truth," "Flowers and How to Grow Them," "The Outlook to Nature," "Economic Function of Women." $10.00 and express charges.

Notes of General Interest

IN two or three districts visited by one of our lady lecturers during the recent winter series, about 300 new members were secured for the Institutes visited. This is an evidence that it pays to advertise the meetings and to "talk up" the Institute.

The Burlington Institute, which has a membership of about one hundred, has in its membership ninety-six subscribers to the HOME JOURNAL. This is suggestive to other Institutes.

One of our secretaries asks for a dialogue which would set forth the objects and benefits of the Institute. This would need to be something original, and we see here an opportunity for some of our enterprising Institute members.

The Warkworth Institute is giving $100 toward the remodeling of the hall in the vicinity. In return, the Institute will have the free use of the hall for all meetings.

The lecturer who visited the Northumberland Institutes during the past winter reports that she found them very flourishing, but ready to accept new ideas and to venture new work. The Institutes in West Northumberland are interesting themselves in the Cobourg Hospital.

The recent meeting of the Alvinston Institute was rather a unique one. Six girls took up the three meals of the day—two taking each meal, one telling what to prepare and the other how to serve it. This is an idea for other Institutes.

The Mount Grove Institute is the first Institute to be organized in Centre Frontenac. It was organized in February last.

County Conventions

IT is not too soon to think of county or district conventions. The holding of such a convention in the early fall has, in almost every instance, been a stimulus to the work, and we would suggest that this be one of the items of business to be discussed at the district annual meeting. In planning the programme for a convention, it is well to arrange that the various sections of the district or county be represented by the best local speakers, and also to have one speaker from a distance. The Department will be prepared to co-operate in furnishing lecturers for these conventions.

Saskatchewan Home-makers' Club

IN Ontario the work of the Women's Institutes is well established. It is interesting to watch the progress being made by the Institutes in the other provinces.

The Saskatchewan organizations—which have taken the name of "Home-makers' Clubs"—have evidently caught the spirit of the West, and have made great strides in the work. The report of the first annual convention, with less than one hundred delegates in attendance, shows considerable enterprise, and we have pleasure in giving space to an address given by Mrs. W. R. Motherwell at that convention. We are sure that this address will be of interest to our Ontario members.

The Department of Agriculture in Saskatchewan is in full sympathy with the work of these clubs, and, among other things, publishes small leaflets and booklets containing suggestions and advice as to the conduct of the work, reports from the clubs and a limited amount of practical information.

The aims, responsibilities and difficulties of the women's societies formed for the betterment of home and community conditions, whether in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, New Brunswick, or our own Province of Ontario, are similar. Some quotations from the literature received from Saskatchewan will be found of value to our Ontario members.

Successful Meetings

"SUCCESSFUL meetings don't just happen," they are caused to come to pass. This does not mean that a great deal of work is done in connection with them, but that plans are laid ahead, not left until shortly before the meeting and then hurried arrangements made. Try, as suggested before, to decide on subjects and speakers for at least three months ahead, and better results will follow. Many Institutes in other parts of Canada which have been at work for a longer time, arrange and print their programmes for twelve months ahead, so even a new Institute should be able to plan for three months ahead.

If we cannot all at once get an ideal programme, we can at least work towards one. In the words of John R. Mott, "May we never be content with small success; may we never lose a vision of our possibilities."

PREPARATION.

Half an hour's work at home, before the meeting, by the secretary, looking over the order of meeting, the minutes and any letter she may have received during the month from the Department, thus being well prepared for her part, prevents things dragging, and maintains the interest of the listeners. The same applies to the president. For success, it is necessary to make as thorough preparation for the eight members who may be present, as would be made if twenty-eight were expected.

There is a difference between smothering a discussion and keeping it to the point, a difference too, between talking a question over with one's right or left hand neighbor, and discussing it in the meeting. If the rest of the programme is to create a helpful atmosphere for the one who is to read a paper or give an address, then the chairman must endeavor, tactfully, to keep a firm grip on the meeting, discouraging both wandering from the point and "visiting."

It adds wonderfully to the attraction of a programme to have either a song, an instrumental piece, a reading or a recitation, more than one if possible.

FOR UNEXPECTED GAPS.

In many of the magazines and papers of to-day helpful articles, from a woman's point of view, appear. Why not keep an eye open for such articles suitable for reading at a meeting of the Institute, should an unexpected gap on the programme occur? Having something of this kind to fall back upon gives a feeling of security to the one responsible for the meeting.

Questions and Answers

A SUGGESTION has been made that for twelve months Institutes adopt this plan: At each meeting have one member (asked a month previously) in her own words, and occupying only three or four minutes, answer the questions, What is an Institute? What can it do? This is one way of getting diffident members to take a small part in the programme. It will mean by the end of a year that every member has a better understanding of what the Institute is, besides being enlightening to newcomers and visitors.

Further, anything which tends to draw one and another into taking a small, but direct, vocal share in the programme is of value.

New Members

WHEN asked the secret of his eloquence, William Jennings Bryan replied, "I mastered my subject, I believed in my cause, I hungered for success." Those are the kind of folks we want on the membership committee; such as have an understanding of the aim and purpose of an Institute, who believe in it, and who "hunger" for success in enrolling new members.

How can an Institute increase its membership? Emphasis cannot too often be laid upon the importance of making the meetings so good that people want to come to them. Good meetings will be talked about, and will increase and will hold the membership. Concerning an altogether different organization, I heard the remark made the other day, "Much good the meeting will do; you won't hear anything worth while there." The way to increase the membership in that particular society is to put more work on the programme. It is not a bit of use having a good, working membership committee, and all the other members alive to their responsibilities in the same matter, unless their efforts are well backed up by the programme committee. To be permanently successful a merchant must have good goods behind advertising.

Then the meetings should be well advertised. Many new members will be added without much effort if we make sure that people know about the meeting and the programme. Have a notice in the local paper before and after the meeting, a notice in the post office, school, general store, in fact, wherever possible, and have it there for at least a week beforehand to give all an opportunity to hear of it.

Let it be known too, who are wanted for members. If the idea gets abroad that the Institute is only for married ladies it will be hard work to coax the young, unmarried girls to come. In the membership we want young and middle-aged, and old, all over fourteen, all who are interested in any way in home or the community life. Each has something to contribute which no one else can so well contribute. Therefore, see that the membership committee too, those who are seeking new members, includes ladies of different ages, interests and spheres, if possible.

Nor should our efforts be confined to securing the prominent people of the district, or those who we think may be able to read good papers, help in carrying on of the meetings, or contribute freely to the funds. In interesting even the youngest and most difficult girls we can't tell how great an asset we are adding to the Institute. I once heard a preacher put it after this fashion, "We may not only be fishers of men, we may be fishers of fishermen." We can't tell who are going to be the Institute's most valuable members, or who most needs the help to be gained from the Institute.

Don't approach those who have not attended any of the meetings with the request that they become members. Not understanding the Institute, they will possibly say "No." Interest them first. Ask them to come with you to the next meeting as a visitor, and give them an opportunity to know something about an Institute; then ask them to join. When they join we want them to have some understanding of what they are joining, and what their membership means.

NEW MEMBERS ARE ADDED BY:

Knowing your field and trying to cover it.

Reminding members to bring their friends to the meetings with them.

Personal solicitation, which wins where all else fails.

Making strangers and visitors feel thoroughly welcome when they come.

Never belittling the work of your Institute, however humble a beginning it may be.

Seeing that those who are members already attend.

Living up to your programme promises.

Adding new features to the programme year by year.

Keeping interest keen through passing on to others the information you come across regarding the progress of the work in your community or elsewhere.

And when you have got new members, include them in the work.

Give Money to Institutes

Burlington, April 2nd, 1912.

To the Editor of CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

Dear Sir—Announcement has been made in the press recently that the Provincial Department of Agriculture will have some one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, granted by the Dominion Government, available for various lines of agriculture work in Ontario during the current year. I have been wondering whether or not justice would be done in the redistribution of these funds to these societies that are "doing things." The Women's Institutes are well known throughout the whole province, and are holding monthly meetings on their own account, and once or twice a year have lecturers from the Department of Agriculture. At some of the meetings visited by departmental delegates it has been customary in the past to give cooking demonstrations. Very little of real value, however, can be expected from isolated demonstrations, and the Institutes have been looking for some time for some

The Right of Way

In the bowl of the

DE LAVAL CREAM SEPARATOR

¶ No confusion occurs between the cream and skim-milk currents.

¶ There is a guarded channel for each, and yet any dilatory fat particles have full opportunity to join the cream current without disturbance in any way. Each has its full right of way from entrance into, until discharged from the machine. That's why the skimming is so perfect.

GET A CATALOG.

The De Laval Separator Co.
173-177 Williams St.
MONTREAL
VANCOUVER—WINNIPEG

If you want wash-day to be the easiest day of the week, get a

MAXWELL'S

ELECTRIC WASHER AND WRINGER

Here is the machine that will do your whole washing, without your lifting a hand.

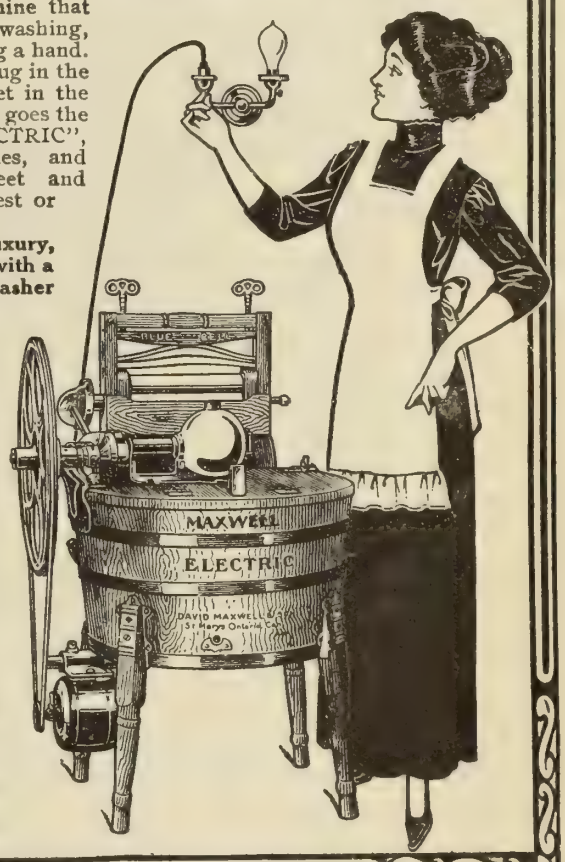
Simply put the plug in the electric light socket in the kitchen—and away goes the "MAXWELL ELECTRIC", washing the clothes, and making them sweet and clean, while you rest or read.

Wash-day is a luxury, in homes equipped with a Maxwell Electric Washer and Wringer.

You will realize how easily this washer works—and how economically it operates—when we mention that it is run by a ⅛ horse power motor, from the ordinary lamp socket. The wringer can also be attached and driven by same power.

As usual, Maxwell is the first in Canada to perfect an Electric Washer and Wringer.

See them at your dealer's—or write us for catalogue, showing the complete line of Electric, Water Motor and Hand Washers.



David Maxwell & Sons,
ST. MARYS, Ont.
128

To Prevent Chapped Skin

—use warm water and Baby's Own Soap.

The warm water opens the pores of the skin and the minute particles of pure refined vegetable oils which form the creamy, fragrant lather of Baby's Own Soap are absorbed into the skin, keeping it soft, healthy, and preventing cracks and chaps.

A perfect rinsing, then smart rubbing when drying guarantees a fine smooth skin in any weather.

BABY'S OWN SOAP

Best for Baby
Best for You

2-12

Canada's Standard toilet and nursery soap for over 30 years.

ALBERT SOAPS, LIMITED, - MONTREAL.

DON'T TRY TO SAVE MONEY BY buying low grade coffee. An extra half cent or cent a day will buy
Seal Brand
and you will know the exquisite flavor of the finest coffee obtainable.
PACKED IN ONE AND TWO POUND CANS ONLY
CHASE & SANBORN
MONTREAL
32

Player-Piano Individuality
The average person is under the impression that all Player-pianos are practically alike, and no matter what make they purchase the results will be the same. This is a mistaken idea, and the artistic instrument which the maker has spent many thousands of dollars in perfecting should not be confused with so-called "Players" which are offered at very low prices.
Special features in the
NEW SCALE WILLIAMS
place it in a distinctive class and make it the only Player-piano which will produce the effects the trained musician is after.
We will be pleased to give you full particulars about the New Scale Williams Player-piano, and if there is no dealer in your locality, will arrange to supply you direct from the factory.
Ask about our extended payment plan.
THE WILLIAMS PIANO COMPANY, Limited
OSHAWA ONTARIO 240

OUR PRICES INCLUDE ALL CHARGES, BOTH DUTY AND POSTAGE

All Orders delivered direct to your home securely packed

Best Quality Hair only used.

THE UNIVERSAL HAIR Co

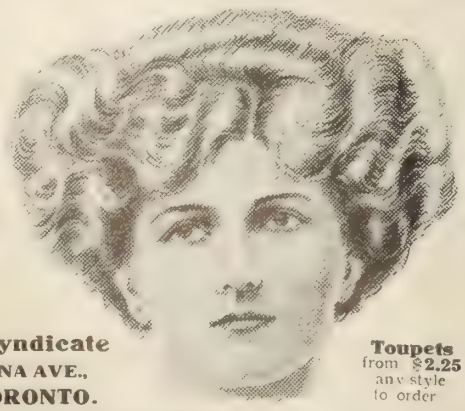
TRANSFORMATIONS made of the Finest quality Human Hair.
Any style $9.50, or extra full of hair $13.

Only measurement required is circumference of Head.

FRINGE NETS made of Human Hair
Large size $1.75 per dozen.
Smaller size $1.45 per dozen.

Send Sample of Hair, and also remittance either by Express or Postal order or Registered letter.

All Goods securely and privately packed, and sent Duty & Post paid.



For Light, Grey, Pale, or Auburn Shades, an extra charge is made.

SWITCHES OF PURE HUMAN HAIR.

16 inch	$1.10
18 "	$1.35
20 "	$1.85
22 "	$2.50
24 "	$4.25
26 "	$5.00

Any length to order.

LATEST CATALOGUE No. 7 ... on application to

Clougher Syndicate
449 SPADINA AVE.,
TORONTO.

Toupets from $2.25 any style to order

ALL GOODS SENT DIRECT. POSTAGE AND DUTY PAID.

This most Effective Toupet with slight division on left side (or where desired) only $5, Duty paid. Entire Transformation $9.50 to $13.00.

Address all ORDERS Manageress

84, FOXBERRY ROAD, BROCKLEY, LONDON, S.E. ENGLAND.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

systematic instruction along demonstration lines. A trial course of this nature was given in Haldimand district during November, December and January. This, as I understand, consisted of a course of some fifteen lectures each, accompanied by a demonstration. So far as I have heard, the Institutes concerned appreciated this work, and the individual members derived much benefit therefrom.

I have been wondering whether or not a reasonable proportion of the one hundred and seventy-five thousand will be devoted to this feature of work. I am confident that the members taking advantage of these lectures will be only too willing to pay a reasonable amount towards the cost of the same. We feel, however, that the Government would be justified in appropriating three or four thousand of the one hundred and seventy-five thousand for this work in Ontario.

We appreciate the co-operation of your journal, and are certain that you will be only too glad to give publicity to the above.

Yours truly,
AN INSTITUTE MEMBER OF LONG STANDING.

The Message of the Asters

By JEAN MURRAY

A photo I am sending you
Of flowers that in my garden grew;
Asters—purple, pink, and white,
So gay they were, some dark, some light.
Their beauty I shall long remember,
Aster, queen-flower of September.

THE MESSAGE OF THE ASTERS

One day they seemed to speak to me,
Whispering softly, earnestly.
I listened, and they seemed to say,
"Just live as we do—day by day;
No thought have we of care or sorrow,
Nor do we ever dread to-morrow.
We're trying to be bright to-day,
To cheer some heart along the way."
That was their message; don't you see
A lesson there for you and me?

My Child's Future

(We are pleased to give herewith a synopsis of the address given by Mrs. M. N. Norman of Toronto, at the last annual convention of Women's Institutes).

I AM to have the privilege of speaking to you on the subject, "My Child's Future." Of course, when I say my child, I mean every child. The real mother heart is big enough to take in all the children of the world. To seek to save our own children, without seeking to save our world children is an indication of stupidity as well as of a narrow motherhood. The evils which result from the ignorance and defencelessness of the uncared for child, reach their ugly and defiling tentacles into every part of society. No one is safe. Only by making such conditions as will ensure the right kind of boyhood and girlhood, manhood and womanhood, can we have a safe, healthy, happy humanity.

To those who consider that the present evils are just and inevitable I have no word to say. But to those who long to see better things, who desire the best things in life for all human beings, who look forward to the time when love will be the ruling factor in life, I earnestly urge a consideration of the fact that the child is the one hope of permanent betterment. This is our one seriously important concern, the making of healthy, wise, educated, refined, honest, kind citizens; everything else should take second place. It is easy to see that having done this, the laws could go away for a perpetual holiday. When we have learned to love our neighbors as ourselves, we will need no law to keep us safe. We can hasten that time by teaching our boys and girls that love, not money, is the most valuable asset, that love, not social position, is what makes men and women worth while; that love, not ambition, should be the motor force of their lives. Of course, when I say "love," I do not mean "in-love"; "in-love" means passion, good and beautiful in its own place, but love means service, that which constantly seeks to bring joy into other lives.

In one of Horace Ttaubel's wonderful poems is this line, "The father creed must give place to the child ideal"; which means that men and women must realize that woman's place in life must not be one of servitude to man, nor man's place in life that, merely, of bread-winner, but that together they must unite their forces to guarantee the child its right to be born well and then to be guided and guarded into the right kind of citizenship.

To that end our boys and girls of this, our day, must be taught. They must get such knowledge as will make them recognize it as imperative that their children shall be born with good bodies, and shall have such opportunities as will ensure them a chance to live happily.

I remember my father's refusal to let me have a horse until I learned to hitch and unhitch, harness and unharness—deeming that knowledge necessary for my safety. But do many of us ever give a thought to the question of our fitness for the most serious, the most sacred function of life, that of bringing new lives into the world? No; we leave all that to chance. Why, we are even told to-day, in this enlightened age, that it is a debatable question whether our children shall be taught concerning this terribly vital matter. When I hear anyone talk in that way, I always wish I could hold up before them—printed in letters of fire—the facts of which I am aware concerning the conversation, the written things, the actions of many of our children. What I know comprises a very small part of the truth, but it is sufficient, if it were widely known, to make the real mothers drop their bridge clubs, their dinner parties, their brooms and dusters, their looms and needles, and gather the children of the world close to them. They would tell them the truth about life, and they would see to it that they were safe, for they would realize that death is to be preferred to the continued pollution of our race. They would realize that only knowledge and wise protection can save our little ones.

Our girls should be taught to ask themselves such questions as, Have I the kind of body which is worthy to be the temple of the sacred office of motherhood? Have I a disease which it is possible I might transmit to a child, and curse it from the beginning with a weak body? Have I the sort of equipment, mental, moral and physical, which will make me the best kind of mother?

Our boys should be taught the necessity of taking care of their bodies, of keeping their minds clean, of refusing to allow anything debasing to enter their lives, of understanding the vital importance of being worthy of the serious responsibility of fatherhood.

You say, "We cannot talk to our boys and girls about these things, they don't understand." Those of you who have had little children to deal with know that anywhere from the age of four years they begin to ask you questions. Do you suppose, when you refuse to answer their questions that they cease being curious? It is better for us to tell the children all they can learn wisely, or is it better to let them get their knowledge from the gutter?

We have all kinds of machinery for the punishment and correction of humanity gone wrong: prisons, policemen, juvenile courts, reformatories, refuges, asylums, but little is done to start it right and keep it going right. We need to give the right kind of teaching, we need supervised playgrounds, many public parks, public baths; we must have free medical inspection and attendance of school children, free dental parlors, and the schools used as social centres. Children need companionship, and they will have it; we must see to it that they have the right kind in the wisest way. Parents should be the playfellows of their children. They should take part in their games, and should share their lives in every way.

You women, especially, have such a great power. Oh, if you would only use it, bringing your minds, your sympathies, your understanding, to bear upon this greatest and most important of all questions, "The Child and its Future."

May Flowers

GO search the wild-wood everywhere,
Among earth's fairest flowers;
Not one, I think, is half so fair,
As these pink gems of ours.

Although 'neath counterpane of snow,
Earth may serenely sleep,
And woodland song and streamlet flow,
Be hushed in silence deep.

They grow along the birchen slope,
And in the pine-clad vale,
Heedless alike of ice and snow,
Or the fierce northern gale.

And cheerfully among brown leaves,
Although cold breezes blow,
They nestle in the frozen moss,
And bloom amid the snow.

—Contributed by a Nova Scotia reader.

Domestic Bookkeeping

By MRS. W. R. MOTHERWELL

From the First Annual Report of the Saskatchewan Home-makers' Club.

DOMESTIC Bookkeeping. Why introduce such an unpopular subject at a gathering of this nature? What has bookkeeping to do with a female department of the home? We thought this convention was to lend itself to considering helps to the women in the homes. We readily understand why such subjects as "Social Life in Country Homes," "The Model Kitchen," "Growing Fruits," "House Plants," "Raising Poultry," etc., should be introduced, but bookkeeping and domestic at that! The inference is that it, too, is one of the legitimate housewifely occupations.

I understand very well the horror with which most women look upon bookkeeping, and this is quite natural when one considers the limited opportunities afforded many women, especially in the rural districts, to study this phase of home life, and to expect them to keep books in the ordinary sense of the term, is quite impracticable. Therefore, it is not my purpose, formidable as the title of this paper may appear, to recommend any particular style of bookkeeping for you to follow, but rather to draw your attention to the advantage of having some plan devised by yourself and understandable to yourself whereby you can tell just how much money you have spent each month so that, should there be an unnecessary leakage anywhere, you are in a position to discover it and apply a remedy.

But again, you become aroused at the mention of the word "money." You feel strongly tempted to ask the question, "Where am I to get the money? My husband takes charge of that. He is the treasurer; he is the one who pays the bills; my part is to buy as savingly as possible. I have no money to handle excepting an occasional five or ten-dollar bill that much coaxing has procured for me, or the cash proceeds I may secure for my butter, eggs and poultry." I know that, too, and that is where one of our real difficulties arises. I think this difficulty is experienced more by the women in the country than those in the city. It is not an unusual thing for the latter to be given an allowance by their husbands on which to finance the household; but to my knowledge not many of the rural women enjoy the advantages of a personal bank account. Our first efforts, then, toward domestic bookkeeping must be applied along the lines of opening the eyes of the "darkened understandings" of our husbands, and persuade them to make us true partners of the firm; giving into our keeping a share of the proceeds and allowing us to meet what is generally termed the "inside" expenses. We are more or less familiar with the masculine answer when approached on this subject. He dons a grieved and injured air and says quite magnanimously, "My dear, all I have is yours, what is your complaint? Am I not feeding you and clothing you as well, or even better than your neighbors? When you need anything, all you have to do is to ask me for it and if I can afford it it is yours. Surely you should be satisfied." The fact remains, we are not satisfied. We try to be, but we are not. There are so many channels to-day open to woman whereby she can make an independent living for herself (and many have tasted the joys of self-support before entering their husband's homes) that it makes it doubly hard to be thus dependent, and when anything is required, instead of going to a purse of her own as formerly, she has to humiliate herself by asking her husband for it and undergo the mortification of being refused if she fails in getting him to appreciate the need as she does. One need not be a suffragette to arrive at the conclusion that there are rights and privileges denied the women in the home that, if enjoyed, would not only make them happier, but their husbands also. It would be a mutual benefit, and I have faith in man's fairness and his respect for individual rights—even those of his wife—to believe that, if the thought has been presented to him in a fair, businesslike way, he will recognize the reasonableness of it and set about providing a way whereby his wife may handle the money of the home that is rightfully and naturally hers. And here I would add that for a man to know that his wife is keeping an intelligent account of her expenditures, and is quite as businesslike about her finances as he is about his, is a strong incentive for him to give her a free hand and scope for her energies.

I find it convenient to do my bookkeeping under four headings—food, clothing, hired help and miscellaneous. I get monthly statements from the merchants, check them off with the bills received, enter all items into a small dated diary and then transfer to my cash book under the above headings. After totaling each separately, I find the aggregate expenditure for the month.

It is very interesting to compare one month's expenses with another, and any given month with the corresponding one for the previous year. By doing so one often makes discoveries that are quite startling. For instance, supposing that for a certain time the farm supplied the meats used on the table, and then for a corresponding period the meats had to be bought, the food accounts for these two periods would immediately show a decided increase. Our attention is arrested, and we at once investigate to discover the cause. We find that it is due to the failure of the farm to produce its own meats, and so with many other things that might be home grown. If we have been carrying out the principle of arousing and maintaining our husband's interest in our bookkeeping, he will not only acknowledge where the leakage came in, but will immediately set about correcting it. The garden, the dairy, the hens, the pork, the beef are tremendous assets to a farmer's table, and often money is paid out for these things that if kept account of and faced in cold figures, a remedy would be provided.

The farmer is situated differently from the salaried man. Generally speaking, he does not have much cash to handle until after his grain is threshed, but after he begins to market his grain why not deposit in the bank to his wife's credit as many hundred dollars as he expects it is going to cost to keep herself and household during the next year. It all amounts to the same thing in the end. He will have to pay out that amount anyway, and if his wife knew how much money was at her disposal for the year she would spend it to better advantage. By keeping a monthly statement of her expenditure,

Continued on page 50

Try the flour that holds the confidence of thousands of home-cooks

THE present huge demand for PURITY FLOUR shows the confidence in which it is held by thousands of home-cooks.

Those who have used PURITY FLOUR have come to believe in it. They look on PURITY as a friend. They feel they can trust it implicitly, because each and every lot of PURITY FLOUR has always been uniform—always up to the high standard of quality that has made it famous.

Wouldn't you, too, like to use a flour you could always rely on? Wouldn't you like to feel certain that your bread, cakes, and pies were going to turn out exactly right? That's just how you'll feel when you become a user of PURITY FLOUR — the confidence-creating flour.

PURITY FLOUR gives high-class results, because it consists exclusively of the high-grade portions of the best Western hard wheat.

On account of the extra strength of PURITY FLOUR please remember, when making pastry, to add more shortening than an ordinary flour requires.

PURITY FLOUR

"More bread and better bread"

And when making bread add more water, and PURITY FLOUR will expand into more loaves than the same weight of ordinary flour can produce, thus making "more bread and better bread."

Make your next flour order spell P-U-R-I-T-Y F-L-O-U-R.
It costs slightly more, but it's worth the difference.
Add PURITY FLOUR to grocery list right now.

104

The Portfolio For Our Institute Representatives

You all know the rate to Institute members given in consideration of large club orders sent us. In many of the branches a member of every family subscribes to the Journal.

To make it easier to send orders we are giving to the club raiser in each branch a portfolio fitted with pockets for Journal envelopes, order blanks, etc., and any Institute papers.

The Institute colors are used, the cover and pocket corners are blue, while the lettering is with gold leaf. We hope it may prove useful and attractive.

Any Institute club raiser who has failed to receive this portfolio will please notify us.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

ARNOTT INSTITUTE

The work of the ARNOTT INSTITUTE in treating Stammerers and Stutterers is becoming more and more widely recognized as perhaps the most successful on this continent.

Following our own scientific methods, the Institute treats the CAUSE of stammering—not the habit itself. It teaches the patient why he stammered, and once he understands that, it is comparatively easy for him to learn, in from five to eight weeks, how to speak fluently and naturally, without any of the objectionable mannerisms commonly taught. As he knows why he is speaking correctly, the cure is permanent.

If you know anyone who stammers or stutters, in kindness to them advise them to consult the ARNOTT INSTITUTE.

BERLIN, ONTARIO, CAN. 7

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Royal Vinolia

THREE ROYAL DENTAL PLEASURES FOR YOUR CHOOSING

Tooth Paste

Truly "a Dainty Paste for Dainty People"—for it embodies not only perfect cleansing and antiseptic qualities but conveniences in use that make it unique amongst dentifrices. The winding key at the base of the tube enables you to use every atom of paste—and keep the tube neat and plump at all times. Then too, the Paste itself comes from its tube in a ribbon of special shape that clings closely to the brush—avoiding waste, saving time and temper. Owing to the antiseptic qualities of Royal Vinolia Tooth Paste, the teeth are not only made white and lustrous, but are preserved from decay. Price 25 cents.

ROYAL VINOLIA TOOTH POWDER
VINOLIA Co LTD LONDON, PARIS, NEW YORK
ROYAL VINOLIA TOOTH POWDER
VINOLIA Co LTD LONDON, PARIS, NEW YORK

Tooth Powder

In this remarkable Powder science has succeeded in combining that most useful of all cleansing agents, that arch-enemy of decay—OXYGEN. Hitherto this most elusive but desirable friend to the teeth, the gums and the mouth has never been fully available. Oxygen, the cleanser, the purifier, is now at your service in Royal Vinolia Tooth Powder—which means that every tiny interstice of the teeth, every nook and corner of the mouth is searched, cleansed and purified as never before.

In boxes of attractive shape, with patent top so that there is no waste in applying the Powder to your brush. Price 25 cents.

Fluid Dentifrice

The exquisite and refreshing flavour of this liquid dentifrice will be the most welcome thing about your daily ablutions, once you commence its use. A perfect tooth and mouth cleanser though it is—its action goes much further, for germs of disease as well as tooth-decay are daily eliminated from the mouth. Children delight in Royal Vinolia Fluid Dentifrice; there is no trouble in teaching them the habit of tooth cleanliness with its use.

Price 25 cents.

VINOLIA COMPANY LIMITED, London, Paris, Toronto

By appointment Soapmakers to H.M. THE KING. 132

TRY A

"SWAN" FOUNTAIN PEN.

FIRST

The comfort of it, the sureness, ease and sweetness—each and every characteristic deserves notice. Unqualified satisfaction guaranteed

Prices from $2.50 Sold at Stationers.
Catalogues Post Free.

MABIE, TODD & CO., 124 York St., Toronto
London, New York, Chicago

Don't Throw it Away Does Your Granite Dish or Hot-Water Bag Leak?

MENDETS

A PATENT PATCH

They mend all leaks in all utensils—tin, brass, copper, graniteware, hot water bags, etc. No solder, cement or rivet. Anyone can use them; fit any surface, two million in use. Send for sample pkg., 10c. COMPLETE PACKAGE ASSORTED SIZES, 25c., POSTPAID. Agents wanted.

Collette Mfg. Co., Dept. D Collingwood, Ont.

Sterling Silver Hat Pin

of attractive design, with a fine stone, given for ONE six-months subscription to CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL at 50c., and to cover postage and packing send an extra 5c.

Take A Scoopful Of Each— Side By Side

Take "St. Lawrence" Granulated in one scoop—and any other sugar in the other.

Look at "St. Lawrence" Sugar — its perfect crystals — its pure, white sparkle— its even grain. Test it point by point, and you will see that is one of the choicest sugars ever refined—with a standard of purity that few sugars can boast. Try it in your home.

Absolutely Best St. Lawrence Sugar Absolutely Pure

Analysis shows, "St. Lawrence Granulated" to be "99.99/100 to 100% Pure Cane Sugar with no impurities whatever"

"Most every dealer sells St. Lawrence Sugar."

THE ST. LAWRENCE SUGAR REFINING CO. LIMITED, MONTREAL.

65

Canadian Girls' Club

Many Maids of Many Plans Earning Money

THE Girls' Club is solving many problems for a constantly increasing number of members. There's a very busy housekeeper who doesn't feel that she can spare money from the household funds to get a number of books which she feels that the family should have. Another is outfitting her kitchen with beautiful aluminum ware. The girls who are buying personal things are innumerable.

Fruit and Flower Mission

One of our members is very interested in a fruit and flower mission. During the past year she has earned several hundred dollars from work in the Club, which she has used for bouquets and baskets of fruit to cheer up the invalids. In town, where these are so expensive, you can imagine with what pleasure they were received. Perhaps in some places fruit and flowers would not be such a luxury, but in every town there is work to be done, and the truest charity is that which makes some sacrifices of time or effort.

The College Girls

As one college girl says, "The demand on one's pocket-book is something fearful, little parties, matinees, concerts, pictures, especially if one is away from one's home town." The Girls' Club just suits the college girl, with several months of freedom and lots of time to call on friends. There are hours each day that she can spend on club work, and not interfere with any pleasures or home duties.

> Here are a few orders sent from home. Just a couple of months now and I shall be sending you lots of names. I am going to start as soon as I get home. The short time I was a member of the Club last summer showed me what can be accomplished.
>
> Very sincerely,
>
> S. F.

Starting With a Few

Please don't get the idea that you have to make a business of this club work. Many of our members have just a dozen or so subscribers, friends and relatives, many of whom were already subscribers. Others started with a small circle like this, and kept widening and enlarging it whenever they had an opportunity. One member says:

> I did not think I would have time to do any work this year, but my friends have written asking if I would take their renewals, so I thought I might as well. I'll do what I can to increase the list in my spare time.

Specimen Copies

So far as we can supply them, we will send sample copies to lists sent in by members. Of course these are not current copies, but copies that were not sold by news dealers. One of our members has just earned about $70 with this plan in a month. She writes:

> Dear Secretary:—
> I was really surprised to find how easy it was to get subscriptions. Of course the sample copies helped some, because many had never seen the JOURNAL before. Then asking if they had received the samples made a good opening to talk about the JOURNAL. But I am so enthusiastic about it that I think I made every one else feel the same.

The Shirt Waist Set

We are changing the number "13" from an unlucky to a lucky one for new members, and any former members who for some reason haven't sent any orders yet. Just thirteen subscriptions sent within the first month will entitle you to a most attractive enamel bar pin and two collar pins to match. This is a memento of your first orders, and entirely additional to all regular earnings.

> The pins came yesterday; they are very pretty indeed, and my friends are all envious. You must be sending out lots of these. It only took me a few days to get thirteen orders. I hope to send you lots more very soon.
>
> Sincerely,
>
> L. N.

Joining The Club

All we ask is that you want to help make the JOURNAL known to every woman in your neighborhood. No matter how small or large the field, no matter how little time you have to work, we ask only that you do what you can, and we will help you all we can.

Secretary,
Canadian Girls' Club,
CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

You Need Both the Knox Packages

Every housewife will find it of the greatest convenience to keep a package of Knox Pure Plain Sparkling Gelatine and also a package of Knox Pure Sparkling Acidulated Gelatine always on hand.

KNOX
PURE · PLAIN
SPARKLING
GELATINE

With the Knox pure Plain Sparkling Gelatine you are always ready to make a dainty Dessert, Cream, Ice or Candy, using freshly cut fruits or nuts for ingredients and flavor—or to use unsweetened for Salads, Sauces or Gravies.

KNOX PURE SPARKLING ACIDULATED GELATINE

is exactly the same as the Plain, with an extra envelope of pure concentrated fruit juice—a great convenience when you are too busy to squeeze lemons. Each package contains tablet in separate envelope r coloring if desired.

With each package you know the ingredients of your dish exactly—which you cannot know with the ready flavored packages. Each makes two full quarts (½ gallon) of jelly, or four times as much as "ready" packages.

— Coffee Bavarian Cream —

½ box KNOX Sparkling Gelatine
½ cup clear and strong coffee
Yolks of 4 eggs. 1 cup sugar
1 pint cream 1 pint milk
1 teaspoonful vanilla extract

Soften gelatine in coffee 5 minutes; stir milk and cream together, beat with whip churn, drain the whip; add to unwhipped cream enough milk to make one pint in all, scald and cook in it yolks of eggs beaten with sugar. When thickened slightly, add gelatine, strain into pan standing in ice water. When mixture begins to set, add vanilla and fold in cream, then turn into mold.

KNOX RECIPE BOOK FREE

Contains over 100 recipes for Desserts, Salads, Candies, Jellies, Puddings, Ice Creams, Sherbets, etc. Sent FREE for your grocer's name.

CHARLES B. KNOX CO.
501 Knox Ave., Johnstown, N.Y.
BRANCH FACTORY:—MONTREAL

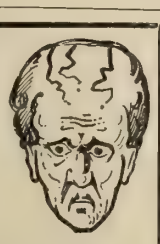
Royal Victoria College

McGILL UNIVERSITY
MONTREAL

For Resident and Day Students.

Students prepared for degrees in Arts, Pure Science and Music. Scholarships are awarded annually. For all information apply to the Warden.

Whenever you feel a headache coming on take



NA-DRU-CO Headache Wafers

They stop headaches promptly and surely. Do not contain opium, morphine, phenacetin, acetanilid or other dangerous drugs. 25c. a box at your Druggist's. 131

NATIONAL DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO. OF CANADA, LIMITED.

THE daily bath is an important item for the outdoor girl to consider. Many of us do not care for the shock of the icy plunge advocated by devotees of the cold bath. Unless you are particularly robust you are likely to chill for a good half day from the reaction, but the rinsing water of the bath should be at most barely tepid, and cooler if you can endure it.

A nice perfume for the bath is violet water prepared after the formula of a famous beauty who is just now giving her beauty secrets to an eager feminine world through the columns of a great daily. Here it is:

"Take extract of violet, ten drams; extract of cassia, ten drams; tincture of orris root, twenty drams; tincture of civet, four drams; oil of bitter almonds, twenty drops; oil of rhodium, forty drops; alcohol (95 per cent. pure), one quart; and rosewater, twenty-five drams. Turn the oils into the alcohol and allow them to stand, shaking twice daily for one week, then add the tinctures."

When compounding perfumes for one's own use you must remember that certain odors kill each other, while others develop and mingle together. Neroli, lemon, and verbena will mix harmoniously, as will almond, heliotrope and vanilla; or tuberose, cassia, and bitter almond.

DENTISTRY has reached a perfection in this age which makes us wonder what next can be done to improve or preserve our molars, incisors and other useful or ornamental equipment. Miss Annette Beacon, in giving the girls some good advice, remarks:

Wouldn't you like to take a lesson in the art of taking care of your teeth, Milady? I promise not to be a severe task-mistress. All in favor of taking exquisite care of the teeth say, ay. Not one dissenting voice! Isn't that nice? I do like to see women take a pride in their appearance, and always try to help them make their beauty dreams come true. Since you are all waiting for my lecture on teeth, I mustn't spend another minute gossiping, dearly as I would like to.

Are you the woman who thinks there is nothing to be done for your teeth besides brushing them daily and hurrying, panic-stricken, to a dentist when a toothache starts? Then you are sadly mistaken. There are hosts of things to be done for the teeth, and I intend telling you some of them right now.

Did you know that you cannot have perfect health if your teeth are decayed? This is a fact. All sorts of health troubles come when the teeth are neglected. Once you realize the importance of having sound teeth, you will make it a point to visit your dentist at least once a year.

In case you object to this expense, I would suggest testing your teeth for cavities at home. Any woman can do this work for herself, and in a few minutes' time. How? Let me explain. Teeth that are in good condition have a smooth, polished surface, whereas, the presence of a cavity is indicated by a roughness, which can be immediately detected if a silken thread is drawn between the teeth. Should the thread catch, you can be sure of the existence of a gaping hole. The sensible woman, upon making this unpleasant discovery, immediately pins on a hat and flies to a filler of teeth. She doesn't wait, as that merely gives the cavity time to grow larger.

Don't indulge in gold fillings. The modern dentist fills cavities, but, unless especially requested, not with gold. He works with nature, rebuilding the teeth in such a manner that they are free from ugly and expensive ornamentations.

I wonder how many of my readers have cracked teeth. Probably one-third at least. Did you ever stop to think what was the cause of this beauty catastrophe? No? Then I am sure you would like to know the why and wherefore. The teeth crack when subjected to extremes of temperature. You should never, if you value teeth beauty, follow a cup of hot coffee by a plate of ice cream, or an iced pudding by a hot drink.

Let me implore you not to use your pretty teeth as nut-crackers. This is forcing them to do work for which they were never intended. So many people, men and women both, find it easier to use the teeth to crack a nut or bite through a thread or cord than to hunt up a nut-cracker or a pair of sharp scissors. What is the result of this pernicious habit? Why toothaches, ruined teeth, and a big dentist's bill.

Now let me chat for a moment on the correct way of brushing the teeth. The usual way is to brush across the teeth, but I advocate an up and down stroke. It is very important that the bristles of the brush should pass between the teeth, as in this way particles of food are dislodged. The cross stroke of the brush does not penetrate between the teeth, consequently you see I have good reason for advising the up and down stroke.

Another thing! Next time you brush your teeth, be careful to scrub them on the inside as well as the outside, and while you are scouring away, do not overlook the tops of the back teeth.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Miss E. T.—Would like to know about grey hair and a place where superfluous hair can be successfully removed.

Don't worry about grey hairs; they are not always a sign of advanced years, and hair dyes are not always successful.

The firm whose name you mentioned is spoken of by several as being the most reliable firm in Canada for the removal of superfluous hair. It is worth all the money they charge if the work is done right. Don't go to a cheap place, or use unknown preparations for the removal of hair.

"Christine" asks how to dress her straight black hair, also how to make hair wavy.

Christine does not say how old she is, but I would judge that she is about sixteen.

I suppose you would like to do your hair in the latest style, and my advice to you is, part it in the centre, allowing it to fall just over the tips of your ears, then bring it around to the back, forming a Psyche knot. This is a very pretty style, and very appropriate for young girls. Do not wear ribbons; they are going out of fashion.

To make the hair wavy, you should use wire curlers with elastic, which can be purchased at any hair goods store. They are about four inches long, and the size of the wave can be made large by using a large amount of hair on the curler.

Miss B. P. writes asking for information as to the removal of "blackheads," also name of lotion to close pores of skin.

Hot water and shell castile soap will cleanse the skin, and if used several times a day, will be found to remove the cause of blackheads, which is greasy secretions under the closed pores of the skin. Cold water used after the hot will close the pores of the skin.

Any of the face creams mentioned in our advertising columns are reliable.

C. M. S. wants to know what can be the matter with her nails. She has them manicured several times a week, but they are growing quite brittle and are covered with white spots.

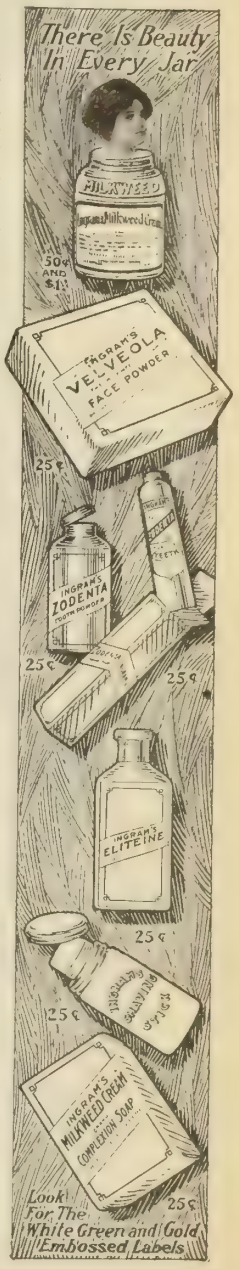
Your description of your nails makes me think that you belong to the army of girls who over-manicure. Stop polishing the nails for a time, or if you polish them do not heat them by the rubbing. Also be careful not to injure the skin about the nails.

Ask for "The Beauty in Every Jar" Line of Celebrated

Ingram's

Toilet Specialties

FOR two generations the toilet specialties of the House of Ingram have been the choice of leading beauties of the age—theatrical and operatic stars—and hundreds of thousands of women who know the "Beauty in Every Jar" Line and have long praised Ingram products both publicly and to their personal friends.



Ingram's Milkweed Cream

There's Beauty in Every Jar. Improves bad complexions. Preserves good complexions. Cures complexion faults. Is absorbed by the skin, leaving it neither sticky, shiny nor dry. Healing. Soothing. Delightful. Creates or retains the natural beauty of youthful skin. Prevents pimples, blackheads, and removes imperfections. 50c. and $1.00. Sample free.

Ingram's Velveola

The Milkweed Cream Face Powder, in 4 shades. Smooth, finely pulverized and exquisitely scented. Delightful to use either in connection with Ingram's Milkweed Cream or otherwise. 25c. Sample free.

Ingram's Zodenta

Paste or Powder for the teeth. "Keeps the teeth white. Keeps the breath right." Insures healthful gums. Prevents ferment and objectionable breath. Destroys bacteria and stops decay. 25c. Sample free.

Ingram's Eliteine

Prevents and cures chapped skin. Delightfully pleasing. Evaporates without leaving greasy or sticky feeling. Applied immediately after shaving, prevents irritation, annoyance from close shaving, and practically all other causes. 25c.

Ingram's Shaving Stick

In sanitary, opaque glass jars. Forms profuse creamy and lasting lather without drying or smart, softening the coarsest, most wiry beard. Universally used and publicly praised by particular self-shavers and barbers, 25c. Guest Room size, 5c.

Ingram's Milkweed Cream Complexion Soap

Keeps or makes the skin smooth and firm. Lathers freely and neutralizes all ill effects of hard or alkaline water. Antiseptic and sterilizing cells of the skin, 25c. Recommended to be used with Ingram's Milkweed Cream.

NOTE—We also recommend INGRAM'S Complexion Tablets, 25c., INGRAM'S Talcum Powder, 25c., and our latest delightful creation, INGRAM'S Lavender Ice, etc. "Not like ordinary smelling salts, but better." Also INGRAM'S Rouge, 50c.

Druggists Know and Will Tell You So—Or Write Direct to Us

INVITATION

Madam or Sir:—Confer a favor upon us by requesting us to see that you are supplied with liberal samples of Ingram's Specialties that you desire—through your druggist or direct from us if you have any difficulty in getting what you ask for.

Frederick F. Ingram, President

Frederick F. Ingram Co.

1 Ouellette Ave.

Windsor -:- -:- Ontario

BON-TON

THE above are reproduced from the "Bon-Ton" 1912 Spring and Summer Style Book, which should be in the hands of every lady who wants to dress well and as economically as possible.

When noting the prices quoted below, remember that every article we list will give lasting satisfaction. We do not sell goods which will not wear well, and with us quality of material is as important as style. As a very large part of our business is from former customers, we can safely say we have given good satisfaction.

722—Tailor Made Suit, of fine diagonal cream serge. Lined with good silk—collar and cuffs of white watered silk — stylish buttons and real tailored finish. A real Parisian style....$19.95

7123—Dress in all wool Panama, black or navy blue. Good satin trimming—embroidered Brussels lace yoke—the very most correct style and excellent finish. Splendid value at...$7.98

7351—Fine imported "St. Gall" Muslin Blouse—a most stylish and well finished article which will give satisfaction to the most exacting. Only.....$2.49

7457 — Corset Cover — Fine cotton — good embroidery—a bargain.....39c

75210—Child's Petticoat in Nainsook — Cut full, pretty Swiss embroidery at edge. Sizes 2 to 7 years.....49c

75213—Young Girl's Petticoat. Ample skirt. Swiss Embroidery, 18 to 24 inches.....64c 26 to 30 inches....74c 32 to 36 inches...84c

7552—Belt in White Washable embroidered linen, 2 inches wide—nice pearl buckle, 22 to 32 inches.....19c

7524 — Good Cotton Chemises, Swiss embroidery, 8 to 16 years.....39c

7561—Linen Collar, 2¼ inches high, Sizes 12½ to 14½.....10c

7562—Collar—Prettily embroidered both in front and at back—12½ to 14½.....13c

7563—Fluted Jabot, fine linen, Valenciennes lace and insertion.....19c

75621—Shopping Bag, good quality, undressed kid, gilt mountings, real leather linen, silk corn, black, brown, green or gray — very special value at.....49c

Remember that in buying from us you run no risk. We pay all shipping charges, whether the order be large or small, and absolutely guarantee to refund purchase price if article does not please.

Get the "Bon-Ton" Style Book at once, and select your Spring Outfit quietly and without the rush and fatigue of the crowded stores. We send this 72-page book free on request.

THE BON TON CO., 439 ST. JOSEPH ST., QUEBEC. 3-3-12

Of Importance To Everyone Who Needs Money.

Tell your friends and neighbors that to secure a pin, or some other desired article, you are raising a club of subscribers for the Journal. In nearly every case you will get an order. With the commissions you earn you can buythe premium. One worker in every town should earn $10. to $100. every month. Write for terms to representatives. Subscription Department, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

The Cost of a Crime

Continued from page 13

"Charlton? Yes, of course I know the fellow, never liked him either. But he's at the Cape at present, isn't he? I remember my uncle sent him out to overhaul the Cape business, and my father thought he was mad to do it."

"Well, he was and he wasn't, so far as the business is concerned; he's straight enough. He couldn't afford to be anything else, having been once had by the heels; do you follow me, Mr. Stephen?"

"You mean, of course, that he had a discreditable career before he entered my uncle's place. But nobody need be surprised at that," he added facetiously, and perhaps not in the best taste, considering the terms upon which Turner had left London Wall and been taken into Old Broad Street. "My uncle's taste in employes is—is, well, to put it mildly, not like anybody else's. No offence, Turner, but you know what I mean."

"Perfectly, but I will do Mr. Currie the justice to say he don't make many mistakes. He has a way of getting the best out of his folks, but he's bin had this time, Mr. Stephen, by gad, he has."

"This is interesting, but get on quickly. I suppose you've found out something about Charlton."

"I have that. He came home from the Cape to-day, sir, and the governor and Miss Wrede were at Southampton to meet him, as if he had been a bloomin' prince, or at least a victorious general comin' back from the war."

"A damned good cheek, but don't waste time, Turner. What's this all leading up to? I don't suppose you came up to Hampstead Heath to tell me these facts, with which, of course, I'm perfectly acquainted already."

"No, sir, you're right. You used the right words, sir, a damned good cheek, and he had it, too, bein' a married man with a small family already. Yes, and a jailbird as well, at least, if not a jailbird, he oughter be one, and it warn't through no fault of the perlice he isn't one now."

"This is very serious, indeed, Turner," said Stephen Currie, paling again in his rising excitement. "I hope you have taken pains to verify these wild statements before you bring them here; you understand the seriousness of it?"

"Don't I? If I didn't I shouldn't be here."

"Have you said anything to Mr. Archibald Currie?"

"Not yet, Mr. Stephen; you see, I haven't seen him. They all came up from Southampton together to-day, and Charlton, he came to the office, but the governor and Miss Wrede went straight on to Hyde Park Square. I was in two minds to go to 'im first, but I thought it would be better to consult you first."

"Then you are prepared to stand by this extraordinary thing you have told me? You have the proofs, Turner?"

"Yes, sir, as many as I need, but there's more to come. I came to you, sir, knowin' what we all expected at the office, how you and Miss Wrede were to be married if this—this wrong 'un hadn't come between. I thought you were the man to come to."

"Yes, yes; well, what more is there? I don't see what more there can be, unless you're going to tell me the fellow has committed murder."

"Mr. Stephen, sir," said Turner, "that fellow, as you call him, who has looked at honest men in Old Broad Street as if they was dirt beneath his feet, he's one of the worst villains as has ever gone unhung. And his name's not Charlton at all, but John Reedham."

Stephen Currie fell back with an exclamation of utter incredulity.

"Turner," he cried shrilly, "you must be mad to make such a statement."

"Mad, not a bit ov me. I'm as sane as you at this moment, and a deal quieter. You see, I've bin watching 'im off and on for over a year. I never liked 'im, to tell you the truth, from the first moment he set foot in our office. "I knew he was a wrong un. Settin' hisself up as the hardest worker that ever was born, and ready to give every one of us pints that was honest men afore ever he was born. 'Im and me had jus' one row, and though he got the better of me that time, bein' a snake in the grass that had wormed hisself into the governor's confidence, I made up my mind to lay low and keep dark and get even with 'im. An' by gad, I have."

(To be continued.)

THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS

Continued from page 10

warm upon a shivering girl, crouched among the pillows, a girl with honey-colored hair, and a dead white face, a girl with staring, terrified eyes, which widened when they saw him, and flamed suddenly into happiness.

"Christine!"

"Oh, Mark! You have come?"

The doctor, no longer mystified, left them together.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

ONE sometimes wonders if what we call environment is really the solid thing we take it for, or if there is something else nearer, more subtle, an invisible environment which we carry with us and from which all else takes the shape and color. If not, how shall one account for the change which took place in Brook Street? And how did it happen that, for one at least, the House of Windows fulfilled its true destiny and became a castle in Spain? One can only state the fact that while, for Mrs. Halloren, Brook Street was still Brook Street, for Mark and Christine it transformed itself into a little by-way out of Paradise.

It was wonderful how the fine weather held that autumn, and how, after the cold, clear nights, the sun rose gloriously persistent.

"Another motor trip to-day?" asked Celia, smiling. "I think you and Mark almost live in a motor, Christine. See, dear, let me pin on your hat. You know you must be careful of that arm for a long time yet."

Christine relinquished the hatpin with a laugh.

"Mind you don't get it too far back," she cautioned. "Just the tip of the nose should show, you know. Mark says he is beginning to take the rest of me for granted. It suits me though, don't you think?"

Celia kissed the blooming face under the tip-tilted hat. "It is perfect," she said, fondly. "You do look sweet in a motor veil, Christine. I used to think that motor veils were such ugly things."

"That was before we went motoring ourselves," said Christine sagely. "It is wonderful how one's point of view can change." She slipped into her long, loose coat with the air of a comfortable kitten. Then, under cover of fixing a stray lock of Celia's hair, she stole a long look into her sister's face.

"Celia," she said, "are you quite sure that you do not want me to stay in to-day. The last day in the old rooms? One's point of view does not change much in regard to them, does it? After all, it will seem like leaving—home! Oh, Celia, do you think we shall ever be quite as happy anywhere else?"

"You little sentimentalist! As if you are not happier at this moment than you have ever been in your life!"

"Oh, yes—of course—but that is—Mark!"

"Well, if it is Mark, it will not matter much where you live, will it, since Mark is moveable? Personally, I have no doubt that you will manage to be quite as comfortable upon Amberly Avenue as you have ever been on Brook Street."

Christine blushed, dimpled, and gave her an extra kiss.

"Yes, I know—isn't it lovely! It is like a dream. And then there is Mr. Tor— father (she said the new name very prettily). Do you know, Celia, there are times when I quite forget about him not seeming to be my father. He feels so natural. I shouldn't wonder if some time I get quite used to him. Do you think so?"

"I shouldn't wonder. There is Mark's horn! Run, dearest!"

The girl hid her face in Celia's shoulder with a little shudder of nervous terror. It was one of the legacies of that last day in the gable room that she could not hear a motor horn without shrinking.

"Why don't you tell Mark that you do not like to hear the horn, Christine?"

"That would be cowardly. I must get over it. I don't deserve the future if I can't conquer the past."

When she had gone, Celia turned slowly and went over to the window where Ada sat in her favorite chair. The two girls said nothing, but sat with clasped hands for a long time.

"Our little girl is happy at last," said Ada dreamily.

"Yes."

"But I can't feel that you are happy, Celia."

"I think I am, dear. What you mean is that I am no longer young."

"You should be young. You will be young when you are happier."

"I am happy."

"But you are fretting about leaving these rooms. I know you are."

The other girl made no reply.

"And yet it has been long years of hard work—slavery, for you."

"It has been my life. You may be right in saying that I feel the wrench of leaving. I can't explain it. My life is buried here, perhaps that is why. Christine, and you, perhaps, may go out to other lives, and I shall have my full share of your happiness. Don't imagine that I am going to be a sour old maid. But my life—so much of it—is buried here. I can't explain it."

"One feels so much that one can't explain," said Ada. "The dear old rooms!" Quick tears rushed to her eyes. "Do you remember how the girls from the store used to come and sit when Christine was a baby, and how they used to beg to be allowed to bathe her? And the garden! No other garden will ever be quite the same. This garden always seemed to belong just to me. No one else seemed to care for it—except Tommy. Do you know what I was just thinking? That never once have I walked in it all these years! At first I thought I would coax the key from Mrs. Halloren, but then I thought I would leave it as it has always been, a kind of dream garden, not like any other garden that ever was!"

"I think you are wise, dear. Is Mr. Torrance coming to-day?"

Ada blushed faintly. "I—I don't know. I think so."

The girls sank into silence again, each so busy with her own thoughts that both started a little at the sound of a knock upon the door—but it was only Mr. Torrance with some roses for Ada.

"All alone?" he asked, laying the fragrant blossoms in her lap.

"Alone? No, Celia is here—at least she was here a moment ago."

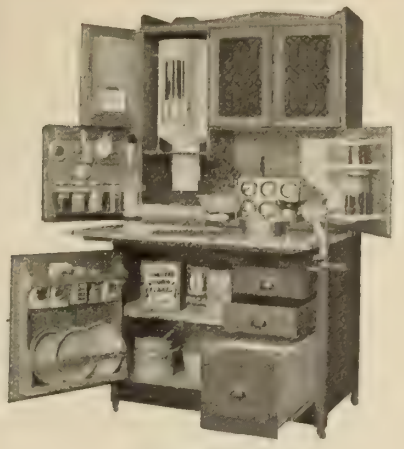
"Then she must have slipped out. May we not slip out too? I passed Mark and Christine. The air is so bracing I know it will do you good."

"It is our last day here—"

"I know, that is why you should go out."

"If Celia will go too."

But Celia, appearing just then from the inner room, was adamant. She had so many little things to do, she said, that she would be busy all afternoon Ada, however, ought really to get some fresh air. She had had a headache, and the drive would do her good. Besides, it would be so pleasant if Ada would bring Mr. Torrance back for tea; Christine was sure to bring Mark, and Tommy was quite likely to drop in, and they could all have tea together. So



Look for the Trade-Mark

Extension top of bright aluminum

KNECHTEL KITCHEN CABINET

Registered.

Will neither tarnish nor rust

Why You Need a Knechtel Cabinet in Your Kitchen

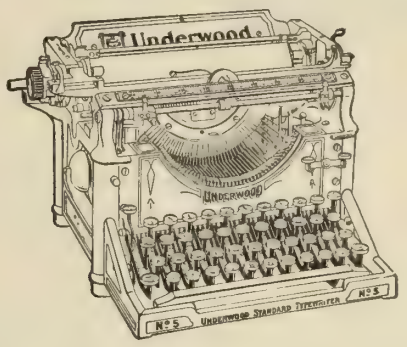
Because it makes for neatness and order in the kitchen—because it saves time and money, and does away with hundreds of unnecessary steps every day, and because it keeps everything at your fingers' ends. No running back and forth looking for articles you can't find. Everything has a place of its own, and everything is in its place. The

Knechtel Kitchen Cabinet

has flour, sugar and meal bins, spice jars, air-tight canisters, bread and cake box, plate racks, sliding shelves, (with many practical features besides), and is beautifully finished in oak

Other styles and finishes (equally good) from which to choose. Write for booklet "B."

Knechtel Kitchen Cabinet Co.
HANOVER, Limited ONTARIO



A FEW YEARS AGO Typewriters were used only in business offices—for correspondence. Now, however, they are being put to a multitude of uses.

More than twenty special models of the Underwood are made for work other than letterwriting. Bookkeeping is now done on the Underwood. The Underwood makes possible the Multiple Unit Order System; the Condensed Billing System; the Retail Bill and Charge System; and many others which are effecting remarkable economies in the business office. In short, every phase of recording and statistical work is done by the Underwood better than it can be done in any other way.

The scope of the typewriter's usefulness has been wonderfully enlarged. The Underwood is being more and more extensively used in educational institutions of all kinds; and with the rapid development of technical training the Underwood will assume still greater importance in the educational scheme.

More than that, it is finding its way in rapidly increasing numbers into the home—wherever there is writing to do there is a place for the Underwood. 550 Underwoods are made every day. Many go into homes which recognize not only their convenience, but their educative value to young folks of school age.

United Typewriter Co. Limited

Everywhere in Canada

Head Office at Toronto

New Books by Canadian Authors

The House of Windows

By Isabel Ecclestone Mackay

That this wonderful story of an abducted child with its marvellous witchery of plot and action will be read everywhere is a foregone conclusion.

The malignant revenge carried out with superhuman cunning by a deranged woman forms the ground work of a story that will immediately take its place amongst the talked-of books.

That a story built upon revenge should overflow with the most beautiful of human passions—affection, courage, persistency and devotion, shows the great versatility of the author's powers.

Read "The House of Windows"; it will grasp you with the intensity of its action and the reality of its actors.

Price $1.25

Open Trails

By Janey Canuck
(Emily Ferguson)

"Janey Canuck in the West"—that delightfully fragrant potpourri of humor, philosophy and original observations on a new land, elicited a chorus of approval. "Janey's" personality is as invigorating as the western prairies themselves, and it permeates her new book, "Open Trails," as thoroughly and charmingly as it permeated its predecessor. In "Open Trails" the author continues her "impressions," but those who have not yet been so fortunate as to make the acquaintance of "Janey" will not be at a disadvantage in reading the new book before the old.

Price $1.25

Rory of Willow Beach

By Valance Patriarche

With the setting in a "back" town of New Ontario, this is a story that has the breeziness and freshness of the pinewoods which figure in it so largely. The character-studies of the townspeople are drawn with the directness and virility that are typical of Canadian life generally; but the chief note of the book is its humor—refreshing in its simplicity, kindliness and purity—which enter into the charming idyll and runs through all. This idyll shows that the ways of the "new" maid of the New World with a man are much the same as the ways of maids have been since the world began.

Price $1.00

Ask Your Local Bookseller to Show You a Copy

Published by

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, 42 Adelaide Street West Toronto

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

OXO CUBES

The great invention that has revolutionized the Beef-tea trade! A cup of strong Beef Tea for 2½ c.—ready in a moment—and just the right strength when made with OXO Cubes.

One Cube to a Cupful.

4 Cubes 10c. 10 Cubes 25c.

"Niagara to the Sea"

Is the title of a handsomely illustrated booklet, describing the most delightful all-water trip through the 1,000 Islands and down the Rapids of the St. Lawrence River to Montreal, Old Quebec and the wonderful Saguenay River via the steamers of the Richlieu & Ontario Navigation Co. Copy of booklet will be sent on receipt of 6c. postage by H. Foster Chaffee, A. G. P. A., Toronto, Ontario.

Ada's hat was pinned on and Ada's motor veil tied securely, and Celia stood at the door and heard her laugh float up—still the clear laugh of a girl, and happy with that wonderful happiness which comes to us all but once.

They passed Tommy upon the landing. Celia could hear the laughing greeting, Ada's soft voice, and Mr. Torrance's deeper one—and then Tommy's step came up the stair—it seemed to Celia's imagination—more slowly and heavily than she had ever heard it mount before.

She waited for him at the door to catch the look upon his face before he had time to cover it with a smile. But Tommy looked as usual. Indeed he appeared rather festive. They went back into the room together.

"I met Ada upon the stair," said Tommy conversationally.

"Yes, she has gone out," said Celia. "Mr. Torrance thought the fresh air might do her good."

"It will—and she is looking so well. I have never seen Ada look like she looks now."

"Neither have I," said Celia.

"Do you think it's relief from money difficulties—the freedom from anxiety?"

"No," said Celia bluntly, "I don't."

"Well, perhaps not. Anyway," with a somewhat obvious effort, "I am glad that she has gone out. I wanted to see you alone, Celia. I want to speak to you. You know that I have often wanted to speak to you, but you would never quite let me. But now you must listen to me. I want to ask you to marry me, Celia. Everything is changing here. You are leaving this home—won't you make a home for me?"

When Celia turned her eyes to him they were very soft and wet.

"Thank you, dear," she said, "but I can't."

"Can't you tell me why, Celia?"

"No, I don't believe that I can. I would rather you did not question me about it, Tommy. One does not argue about things like that. One merely feels."

"That's just it," said Tommy eagerly. "One does feel; it is all feeling, and when one tries to make words of it, it doesn't sound right." He hesitated miserably. "I know that if I could talk to you as I would like you would listen."

Celia shook her head. "I am not a woman who cares for pretty phrases."

"Yes, you are. All women like them. All the same," with a flash of insight, "it is partly your own fault, Celia. You try not to let me say things, you know you do!"

Celia looked at him keenly. Was he pretending, or did he really consider her so hopelessly dense? An erratic impulse of shee frankness seized her.

"Tommy," she said, "I have known for years that you love my sister Ada."

At least he had not been pretending! The shock was patent. He sat there, staring at her, white-faced—the pain of a wounded child in his light blue eyes.

"So now you know!" finished Celia, relentlessly. Now that she had spoken there were other things to say. Things that clamored for utterance. The vengeance of hurt pride, of jealousy, of pain long and bravely hidden; the sum of years. But somehow that look of the hurt child in him stopped her. Instead, she added almost gently, "You can see, can't you, that you have no right to ask me to marry you?"

"Is that what has been the matter all the time?" asked Tommy, very low.

"Yes."

"You think I do not—love you?"

"I know it."

The pain in Tommy's eyes seemed to harden into something bright and cold. His whole appearance seemed indefinably to change. He left his chair and came close to her, seizing her wrist.

"Celia Brown," he said, "if you had only been truthful once—just once—we might have been happy all these years!"

"You can't deny that you love her!"

"I don't deny it. I do love her. My love for her is—I don't know what it is. I can't put it into words. But I am telling you the simple truth when I say that I can love her just as well when she is Mrs. Torrance as I do now when she is Ada Brown. God bless her! She has always been like a saint to me. I think she is part of my religion. One does not expect human love from the object of one's devotions. I doubt," with a little doleful smile, "if one would know what to do with it!"

"I won't take second best," said Celia grimly.

"You would rather have what I have given Ada than what I have given you?"

"I don't know what you have given me."

Before she could stop him he had her in his arms. "This!" he said, "and this! and this!"

Then he let her go and sat down quietly in his former place.

Celia sank into Ada's chair by the window. She was trembling. There was a horrible suffocating pain in her throat. Her lips where he had kissed them were bruised and burning. She felt insulted, angry, unbearably surprised and shaken—and yet—what was the other feeling? A young feeling, a feeling which sent the blood to her cheeks and a light to her eyes? She kept her face turned away.

"I suppose," said Tommy presently, in a subdued voice, "I suppose I have lost any chance that I ever had now. But you drove me to it, Celia. It made me wild to think that you could have misunderstood so badly all these years. I loved you from the first day I saw you in Anger's store. I followed you home. I got to know you. There has never been anyone but you—in that way. Ada is different—so beautiful, so far away! Haven't you felt like that about her yourself? But one does not refuse to be happy on earth because one has looked at a star."

Celia sat up suddenly.

"They will all be in to tea presently," she remarked without looking at him, and with her face still turned away she filled a kettle with water and set it over the gas. Tommy watched her with a growing sense of injury. One never knew of what Celia was thinking. Was she thinking at all? Did she care at all? Was she really as heartless as she seemed? If he could only understand her! Vaguely he knew that understanding now would mean everything, and yet he was so powerless to understand! A kind of rage possessed him that a man might be so near to happiness and miss it! The barrier between them was so real yet so invisible. It was not something which a man might find and tear down with his hands. How careful she was not to look at him! With what precision and daintiness she placed the china upon the table. Tommy had seen her place it so, hundreds of times. A wave of deep regret swept over him that he saw it now for the last time. The old life was ending. Christine and Ada were going to homes of their own. The thought brought blank loneliness.

"By Jove!" he exclaimed, involuntarily. "This is the last day!"

Celia nodded. "Had you forgotten?"

"Yes—for the moment."

Silence fell again while Celia measured the tea.

"Celia," said Tommy sternly, "now for the last time I ask you to marry me."

"Tommy, for the last time, I refuse."

"You do not love me?"

Celia placed the butter upon the table with a little thump.

"I think," said Tommy patiently, "that when a man asks a woman to marry him, he has a right to know whether she loves him or not."

Celia placed the raspberry jam beside the butter.

"I think," she said, "that when a woman refuses to marry a man he has no rights whatever."

"That is unfair. Why not be frank?

Continued on page 54

Useful, pretty and smart are these improved knit coats

For driving or motoring—as for a hundred other outdoor enjoyments—you will be glad of your Pen-Angle Sweater Coat on windy days and chilly evenings. For, though they feel so fleecy to the touch and set so lightly on the body, they are warmth-giving indeed. Knit by the Pen-Angle process, from wools of the choicest; these useful garments possess a smartness and style not known to the usual knit coat. And they retain their shapely lines, because they are carefully shaped to fit snug to the figure. That shape stays in them because it is knit into them – the Pen-Angle way.

Your exact physical type is included in the wide range of

Pen-Angle Sweater Coats

Your taste in style and colors has been carefully consulted. Some store convenient to you will show you these beautiful garments for men, women and children. 62

Pen Angle Knit
WARRANTED HIGH GRADE PENMAN'S CANADA

Penmans Limited
Paris, Canada

The Normal Baby

Continued from page 19

class a baby that is below the average as one condemned by Nature, and surely no parent will do so. Nor will it do to class a baby that is above the average as necessarily having the approval of Nature. Human life has some queer ways of asserting its strengths and disclosing its weaknesses quite regardless of our fallible judgments of what should, or should not, be expected to happen.

The most one can say is that the term 'average baby," as used in this paper, is designed to stimulate critical observation and study of all babies. It is a point of view, a way of looking at human life, a suggestion of what one may seek to know and apply to the problem of a better quality of babies. It is the beginning of a conscious, intelligent parenthood, and of a conscious, intelligent social control of the forces that condition the generation and care of men.

For, in proportion as we learn to estimate, with more or less exactness, the vitality of body and mind in our babies, and the initial promise of their efficiency and happiness in the world, will we set to work to give them the kind of parentage they should have, and the kind of care subsequent to birth that will insure the realization of the best that is in them. As a civilized society we have long since learned that our domestic plants and animals can be improved only by selecting the right kind of stock and subjecting it to the right kind of conditions. We have government experiment stations in every state of the Union where men and women are trained to produce grains, fruits and vegetables, and horses, sheep and cattle, with absolute scientific control of the forces that operate in their production. Thus the quantity and quality of vegetable and animal life are being steadily improved, and the resources of civilization are being thereby enhanced. Is it not strange that we are so slow to learn how human life may be controlled in its beginnings with much the same certainty and results? Is it not strange that we have done so little to improve the parentage of children, and the conditions of environment that insure a better generation of men and women, when we know so much about the process that insures better vegetables and fruits, and horses and cattle?

These criteria of the average baby's physical development may now be summarized in tabular form as follows:

		Male	Female
Average	height in inches, at birth	20.6	20.5
"	weight in pounds "	7.55	7.16
"	girth of chest "	13.4	13.0
"	diameters of chest "	4.3	4.2
"	girth of abdomen "	13.4	13.0
"	length of arms "	8.0	8.0
"	length of legs "	7.6	7.6
"	circumference of head "	13.9	13.5
"	length of head "	4.5	4.4
"	width of head "	3.8	3.8

[Complete statistics of the child's physical development, from birth on to maturity, are not available. Those used in this paper have been gleaned from Robert's Manual of Anthropometry, Holt's Diseases of Infancy and Childhood, Hall's Adolescence and Warner's Study of Children. Most of the measurements of children have been made in the public schools, and cover the ages from five or six, on to sixteen or eighteen. They relate mainly to height, weight and chest girth. A summary of these, in more popular form, may be found in Warner's Study of Children, published by the Macmillan Co.]

Well, it is not a vain hope, nor an unreasonable faith, to believe that the day will come when civilized society will produce men with the same intelligent regard for the laws of nature that we now show in the production of poultry and pet dogs. The day will come when every intelligent community will utilize, in propagating and nurturing its children the same knowledge and skill that men like Luther Burbank now use in the propagation and the nurture of plants. Then will the baby really come to his own, desired and welcomed by men and women, who will not only know why he is in the world, but what should be done with him after he is here.—Good Housekeeping Magazine.

The Schooner Girl

Continued from page 7

"How could I know? You see, I'm not a fisher-girl; my parents, none of my kin are fishers."

"I don't believe ye," the pettish man blurted. "Down to Ste. Pierre you towns folks knows as much about our fisher ways almost as we, and you know you do."

"But I'm not from Ste. Pierre,—not native. I lived there just long enough to learn your dialect, to find the way to dress when coming here, the things you like and don't like. I am really a French-Canadian girl, a habitant they call us, from a town far back from the St. Lawrence. The only fishing we ever see is the boys catching minnies in the creeks."

The quiet sympathy in the girl's voice was bringing peace to the man.

He changed his position on the rocks and she drew closer. She ran her hand through his tousled brown hair, as she'd seen the fisher girls do to their lovers. Then, toying with a bit of reindeer moss, she went on:—

"To show you how really sorry I am, I'm going to make everything right for you at the village, and the girls'll never laugh at you, and you'll have your chances same as before.

"We'll go down and then I'll tell all of you something which will surprise you, and which I hadn't intended letting you know until long after I'd gone."

The curiosity of the half-tutored was aroused now. The man was eager to hear.

"Come, on, then, and let's get it through with. Then, if you will still think you can get your punt out to meet the dowry from the mail-boat, I'll be off with her, when she comes tomorrow, for my work is practically finished here, and I'll never come into your way again."

Something in her tone reassured Nikolaus, but a sense of sadness at the parting was also there.

Down at the settlement on the beach the fisher folk had looked on Clothilde as just a little superior to themselves, "a town critter" whose word bore more weight than their own, and Nikolaus had secretly counted on the time when he should rule, in all councils, by reason of what his wife advised.

Slowly the two passed down the trail to the sea. Off in the far distance some whales were blowing, but they paid no heed to these. Instead, Clothilde led the way squarely to the shed where the other folk still cleaned the fish. Jane Esberry, who sat nearest the door, raised her one drooping eye and gave her dirty black shirt a toss, as was her habit, when stirring; as she turned to ask how "the bairn was now." Tildy Saliciliba let the cod she was about to decapitate drop back to the tub of fish and laid the flake covered knife in its niche. Sympathy is, indeed, all-prevalent on the Labrador, and everything stops till the suffering are succored.

Even Tucker and Barstow, jolly, much bearded fishermen, who were tusseling with a load of cod they must raise from the sea, let the ropes slip back, while they listened to how she felt.

For answer, the girl called to the five or six other villagers to come closer, she wanted all to hear the story, and when the conch-horn brought these to positions among the salt barrels, she began:

"My friends," she said, with a quiet smile for each, "I'm afraid I have a little confession to make. I intend leaving on the mailboat to-morrow, if we can get out to her, and I don't want my very good friend Nikolaus to be teased about something which we are neither to be blamed for after I'm gone.

"It is true that, as you s'posed, I have lived both at St. Pierre and Miquelon, but this was only long enough to study their people's ways, and then to find out enough of your own to let me come here and work. I had heard so much of the schooner-girls of Labrador that I had long before resolved some time to give their position a trial.

"Away down in the south, where my real home is, both in Canada and in the United States, the people are interested

Continued on page 54

"Uniformity is a big word, Bud."
"I 'spect it's because it means a lot, Rose."

Steady—Regular—Dependable Quality, there's the FIVE ROSES idea.

No bad dreams bakeday eves — the morning batch "flat" instead of "up."

So very exasperating, you know, to get less loaves this week than last from the same quantities.

FIVE ROSES is the sure flour — reliable, you see.

No wrinkling worries over bread, or cakes, or pies, or anything.

Bake things always up to the mark of your happy expectations.

Disappointment—never.

Four times Uniform—Strength, Color, Flavor, too, and Yield.

FIVE ROSES—trouble-proof flour.

Use FIVE ROSES always. 10

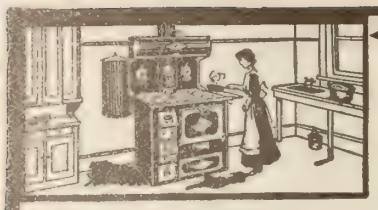
Five Roses Flour

Not Bleached Not Blended

LAKE OF THE WOODS MILLING COMPANY, LIMITED MONTREAL

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.



DIRECT FROM FACTORY TO KITCHEN

SAVE OVER $25 WHEN BUYING YOUR RANGE THIS FALL.

$41.00 TO $49.00

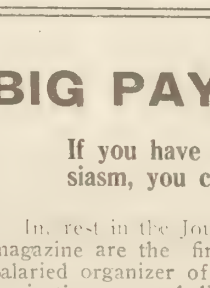
AND WE PAY THE FREIGHT

You Can Buy "DOMINION PRIDE" RANGE At Factory Price

Direct From The Largest Malleable Range Works in Canada

IF you want to save from $25 to $30, and at the same time get the most satisfactory kitchen range made, write for our Catalogue and look into the merits of the "DOMINION PRIDE," at from $41 to $49.

If we sold you identically the same range in the usual way, through a dealer, you would have to pay from $69 to $78 for it. You would be paying two extra profits—to wholesaler and retailer—which would add $25 to $30 to the cost of your range, but absolutely nothing to its value.



"The Evolution of the Cook Stove"

TELLS about cooking from the time the Cave Dwellers dropped hot stones into the pot to boil it. It also tells all about "Dominion Pride" Ranges. Whether you need a Range just now or not you will enjoy reading this book.

Write for Free Copy.

Besides costing much less than other ranges in its class, the "DOMINION PRIDE" is much more satisfactory. It is made of tough, strong, malleable iron and the best blue polished steel—materials which will not warp, crack or break.

The polished steel does not need blacking—simply rub it over with a cloth. With its cold rolled steel plate oven—sectional iron fire-box lining, with air chambers—and double-walled flues lined with asbestos—the "DOMINION PRIDE" is the most economical range you can buy. Actual tests have proved that it saves over 30% of fuel, burning either wood or coal.

WE PAY THE FREIGHT

A "DOMINION PRIDE" Range, with high closet shelf and elevated tank or flush reservoir, with zinc sheet to go under range, 8 sections blue polished steel pipe and two elbows, will be delivered to any station in Ontario, Quebec or the Maritime Provinces for $41, or to any station in the four Western Provinces for $49—$5 to be sent with order and balance to be paid when the Range is delivered at your station. If not convenient to pay cash we will arrange to accept your note.

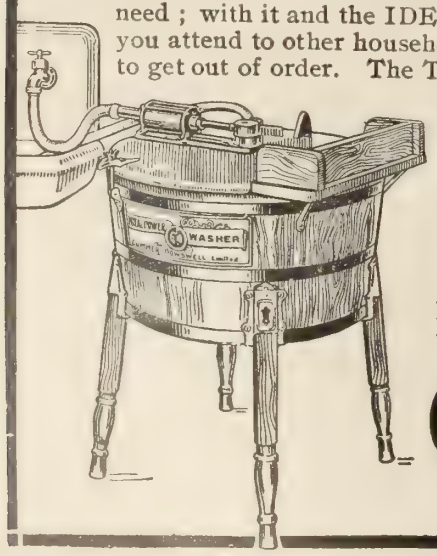
Canada Malleable & Steel Range Mfg. Co., Limited, Oshawa, Ont.

When writing it will be a distinct favor to us if you will mention this paper. 7

'IDEAL' POWER WASHER

How Is Your Washing Done

Do you do your washing with the old style hand machine or worse still the back-breaking wash board? Are you doing this because you think it is cheaper? But is it cheaper? The hand machine does good work, and is infinitely better than the wash-board, but the "IDEAL" Water Power Washer is better still. Do you know that the cost of the IDEAL is little more than the cost of the others. Is not the saving of your strength, your time, your temper and your clothes worth the difference. Ordinary city water pressure is all you need; with it and the IDEAL your washing is being done while you attend to other household duties. There is nothing about it to get out of order. The Tub is strongly bound inside and out with steel hoops, keeps it's shape and will last for years. It has large capacity, opening and permanently fixed water board.



What the IDEAL will not do towards lightening the drudgery of washing clothes, cannot be done.

Write for booklet "Aunt Salina's Wash Day Philosophy" — It points the way to happier wash days. C-12

CUMMER-DOWSWELL LIMITED.

HAMILTON, CANADA.

BIG PAYMENTS FOR MAGAZINE WORK

If you have some knowledge of human nature, observation and personal enthusiasm, you can earn quite a lot of money in your spare time in magazine work.

Interest in the Journal and loyalty to a Canadian magazine are the first requirements, just as the salaried organizer of charity work or fraternal organizations must believe in the value of the work he is doing.

The high quality and Canadianism of the Journal and the standing of our workers secures the respectful attention of everyone.

We realize that we must pay such representatives well. There is a large commission and a monthly salary. Many are earning $40 to $70 a month in their spare time. Others only find time to earn a few dollars, providing pocket money or buying something they want.

If any young man or lady wishes to earn extra money, write to us for terms to subscription workers.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Domestic Bookkeeping

Continued from page 43

she knows exactly what she has. She also has an opportunity to provide during the light financial months of the year for the heavier ones. If she succeeds in closing the year with a balance on hand, what joy!

Here is another benefit in domestic bookkeeping. Providing, through lack of experience, her husband and herself also have not a correct knowledge of the amount of cash that should be set aside for one year's expenses, at its close, after having done her best, she finds herself with a deficit. Well, her husband will have to meet it, but if she has been keeping him in touch with her accounts each month and has been taking him into her confidence, he will not only be surprised, but will see the reasonableness of supplying her with a more generous bank account, or possibly plan his farm that large quantities of meat, vegetables, dairy products, etc., hitherto purchased, will be supplied at home on the farm, and thus lessen very substantially the cash outlay that would otherwise be required.

Always remember that we are partners in this home firm. While allocating our money to the different branches of the work, and each carrying out the management of our respective departments, there should be frequent and constant counsel throughout the year that each may be in intelligent touch with the affairs of the other, as any business partners would be.

Some think that this kind of business relationship between husband and wife would interfere with the domestic happiness and raise a barrier. No such thing. It breaks down barriers, promotes good fellowship and inspires mutual confidence. Its success, however, depends first on our ability to convert and convince our husbands as to what constitutes true home partnership, and second, on the accuracy, constancy and simplicity by our domestic bookkeeping.

Summer Institute Meetings

WE give below a list of the summer meetings up to and including June 8th. The balance of the series will appear in the June issue of this journal.

For the most part only one lecturer will be sent to each division, although it may be that, in a few instances, a second lecturer will be sent. Full particulars will, of course, be sent to the Institute officers concerned.

We look to the officers and members to do all in their power to make these meetings well known, and to induce those who are not members to attend and become identified with the Institute.

Division 1.—Lecturer, DR. LAURA HAMILTON, Toronto.

WELLAND—
1. Stamford	aft.	May	27
2. Allanburg	aft.	"	28
3. Quaker Road	aft.	"	29
4. Welland	aft.	"	30
5. Crowland	aft.	"	31
6. Willoughby		June	1
7. Stevensville	aft.	"	3
8. Bowen Road	aft.	"	4
9. Ridgeway		"	5
10. Humberstone	aft.	"	6
MONCK—
11. Fulton	aft.	"	6
12. Rosedene	aft.	"	8

Division 2.—Lecturer, DR. ANNIE BACKUS, Aylmer.

LINCOLN—
1. Niagara-on-the-Lake	aft.	May	27
2. Queenston	aft.	"	28
3. Jordan Harbor	aft.	"	29
4. Beamsville	aft.	"	30
5. Grimsby	aft.	"	31
SOUTH WENTWORTH—
6. Winona	aft.	June	1
7. Tapleytown	aft.	"	3
8. Stoney Creek	aft.	"	4
9. Mt. Hamilton	aft.	"	5
10. Hannon	aft.	"	6
11. Binbrook	aft.	"	7
12. Blackheath	aft.	"	8

Division 3—Lecturer, MRS. W. J. HUNTER Pleasant.

EAST KENT—
1. Botany	aft.	May	27
2. Thamesville	aft.	"	28
3. Croton	aft.	"	29
4. Wabash	evg.	"	30
5. Kent Bridge	aft.	"	31
WEST KENT—
6. Eberts	aft.	June	1
7. Irwin	aft.	"	3
8. Valetta	aft.	"	4
9. Quinn		"	5
10. Tilbury		"	6
NORTH ESSEX—
11. Cumber	aft.	"	7
12. Staples	aft.	"	8

Division 4—Lecturer, MRS. E. B. MCTURK, Lucan

NORTH NORFOLK—
1. Hartford		May	27
2. Windham Centre		"	28
3. Simcoe	aft.	"	29
4. Courtland		"	30
5. Guysboro	aft.	"	31

All the world loves a dainty woman. When you dress, use Ideal Orchid Talcum Powder. It is the velvet Italian Talc, perfumed with the fragrance of Borneo Orchids.

For your handkerchief, use

Ideal ORCHID PERFUME

the queen of perfumes—the most exquisite fragrance ever extracted from flowers. Your druggist should have these "Ideal" specialties or write

SOVEREIGN PERFUMES, LIMITED, - TORONTO. 52

English Handmade LACE

This lace (which is well known as the "Bucks Pillow Lace") is made in the county of Buckinghamshire, Eng. and also the outskirts of Bedford and Northamptonshire, in the agricultural districts, by the wives of the farm hands, and is a great help to their scanty income.

We wish to introduce this beautiful hand craft into Canada as a means of reviving the Bucks Lace Industry. It is made of linen thread in many forms and patterns.

We keep a stock of Edgings and Insertions in white and cream from 15c. to $3.00 per yard.

Women's and Girls' Collar and Cuff sets from $2.50.
Collars, Ties and Bows from $1.00, $2.00 and $3.00.
Plastrons, $4.00 up; Jabots, $1.50; Handkerchiefs, $1.00.
Stock Collars from 50c., Leaves, 25c.
Tray Cloths and Table Centres, $2.50 up; Doylies and Mats, $1.00 up.

Write to-day for a trial package sent on approval.

Mrs. S. Hogg
New Liskeard, Ontario

A Real Breakfast Delicacy

Your breakfast table is incomplete if you have'nt provided

Upton's Orange Marmalade

Its purity is unquestioned and its flavor is unexcelled.

(K46)

Made solely from pure granulated sugar and luscious selected oranges in our modern, sanitary factory. For sale by all leading grocers. Ask for it by name.

EASTER TERM

From Tuesday, April 9th, Students commencing now are able to complete course without interruption, as school is open all summer. Write for free copy of catalogue.

British American Business College

Y. M. C. A. Building, Toronto

EAST ELGIN—
6. Bayham....aft. June 3
7. Luton.... " 4
8. Grovesend.... " 5
9. Aylmer.... " 6
10. Mapleton....aft. " 7
11. Lyons.... " 8

Division 5—Lecturer, Miss B. Gilholm, Bright.

WEST LAMBTON—
1. Lucasville....aft. May 27
2. Osborne....aft. " 28
3. Colinville....aft. " 29
4. Brigden....aft. " 30
5. Wilkesport....aft. " 31
6. Thornyhurst....aft. June 1
7. Port Lambton....aft. " 3
8. Beecher....aft. " 4
9. Rutherford.... " 5
10. Oakdale....aft. " 6

WEST MIDDLESEX—
11. Wardsville....aft. " 7
12. Appin....aft. " 8

Division 6.—Lecturer, Mrs. W. B. Ferguson, Strathroy.

EAST WELLINGTON—
1. Arthur....aft. May 27
2. Damascus....aft. " 28
3. Kenilworth....aft. " 29
4. Mount Forest....aft. " 30
5. Conn.... " 31
6. Cedarville....June 1
7. Colbeck....aft. " 3
8. Grand Valley.... " 4

CENTRE WELLINGTON—
9. Erin....aft. " 5
10. Ospringe.... " 6
11. Conongsby....aft. " 7
12. Hillsburg....aft. " 8

Division 7—Lecturer, Mrs. M. N. Norman, Toronto.

SOUTH WATERLOO—
1. New Dundee....aft. May 27
2. Ayr....aft. " 28
3. Central Dumfries....aft. " 29
4. Branchton....aft. " 30
5. Galt....aft. " 31
6. Preston....aft. June 1
7. Hespeler....aft. " 3
8. St. Jacobs....aft. " 4

NORTH WATERLOO—
9. Winterbourne....aft. " 5
10. Floradale....aft. " 6
11. Hawkesville.... " 7

Division 8.—Lecturer, Mrs. C. H. Burns, Toronto.

SOUTH BRANT—
1. Ohsweken....aft. May 27
2. East Oakland.... " 28
3. Scotland....aft. " 29
4. Mohawk....aft. " 30
5. New Durham....aft. " 31
6. Cathcart....aft. June 1
7. Burford....aft. " 3
8. Whiteman's Creek....aft. " 4
9. Falkland....aft. " 5

SOUTH PERTH—
10. Tavistock....aft. " 6
11. St. Paul's....aft. " 7
12. St. Mary's....aft. " 8

Division 9.—Lecturer, Miss M. Allan, Jarvis.

WEST HURON—
1. Goderich....aft. May 27
2. Holmesville....aft. " 28
3. Londesboro....aft. " 29
4. Blyth....aft. " 30
5. Wingham....evg. " 30
6. St. Augustine....aft. " 31
7. St. Helens....June 3
8. Kintail.... " 4

SOUTH BRUCE—
9. Lucknow....aft. " 5

CENTRE BRUCE—
10. Ripley....aft. " 6
11. Bervie....aft. " 7
12. Armow....aft. " 8

Division 10.—Lecturer, Miss M. V. Powell, Whitby.

NORTH GREY—
1. Meaford....May 27
2. Straithnairn.... " 28
3. Bognor....aft. " 29
4. Chatsworth....eve. " 30
5. Desboro....aft. " 31
6. Keady....eve. June 1
7. Kilsyth.... " 3
8. Annan.... " 4
9. Brookholm....aft. " 5
10. Kemble....aft. " 6
11. Shallow Lake....aft. " 7
12. Clavering.... " 8

Division 11.—Lecturer, Mrs. D. McTavish, Port Elgin.

DUFFERIN—
1. Orangeville....aft. May 27
2. Blount.... " 28
3. Camilla.... " 29
4. Whittingham.... " 30
5 Laurel.... " 31
6. Black's Corners....June 1
7. Bowling Green....aft. " 3
8. Corbetton....eve. " 4
9. Horning's Mills.... " 5
10. Honeywood.... " 6
11. Shelburne.... " 7
12. Violet Hill.... " 8

Division 12.—Lecturer, Mrs. M. L. Woelard, Toronto.

CENTRE SIMCOE—
1. Penetanguishene....aft. May 27
2. Elliott's Corners....aft. " 28
3. Wyebridge.... " 29
4. Wyevale.... " 30
5. Elmvale.... " 31
6. Silver Maple....aft. June 1
7. Crossland.... " 3
8. Phelpston.... " 4
9. New Floss.... " 5
10. Edenvale.... " 6
11. Minesing.... " 7

Division 13—Lecturer, Miss L. Reynolds. Scarboro.

NORTH ONTARIO—
1. Sunderland....aft. May 31
2. Sandford....aft. June 3
3. Goodwood....aft. " 4
4. Altona....aft. " 5
5. Zephyr....aft. " 6
6. Gamebridge....aft. " 7
7. Brechin....aft. " 8

Division 14.—Lecturer, Dr. Jennie Smillie Toronto.

NORTH YORK—
1. Laskay....May 27
2. King....aft. " 28
3. Schomberg.... " 29
4. Kettleby....aft. " 30
5. Vandorf....aft. " 31
6. Aurora....eve. " 31
7. Newmarket....aft. June 1
8. Queensville....aft. " 3
9. Keswick....aft. " 4
10. Mount Albert....aft. " 5

EAST YORK—
11. Richmond Hill....aft. " 6

Division 15—Lecturer, Mrs. H. W. Parsons Forest.

WEST DURHAM—
1. Solina....aft. May 22
2. Bowmanville....aft. " 23
3. Orono....aft. " 29
4. Kendall....aft. " 30
5. Newtonville....aft. " 31
6. Port Hope....aft. June 1
7. Canton.... " 3

EAST DURHAM—
8. Charlecote....aft. " 4
9. Garden Hill....aft. " 5
10. Elizabethville....eve. " 5
11. Bewdley.... " 6
12. Bailieboro....aft. " 7
13. Millbrook....eve " 7

Division 16.—Lecturer, Miss E. Robson, Ilderton

EAST PETERBORO—
1. Norwood....aft. May 27
2. Warsaw.... " 28

WEST PETERBORO—
3. Lakefield....aft. " 29

NORTH PETERBORO—
4. Mt. Julian.... " 30

EAST VICTORIA—
5. Omemee....June 1

WEST VICTORIA—
6. Lindsay....aft. " 3
7. Little Britain....aft. " 4
8. Oakwood....aft. " 5
9. Conya....aft. " 6
10. Manilla....aft. " 7

Division 17.—Lecturer, Miss B. Millar, Guelph.

FRONTENAC—
1. Inverary....eve. May 27
2. Westbrooke....aft. " 28

AMHERST ISLAND—
3. Stella....aft. " 29

LENNOX—
4. Conway....aft. " 30
5. Adolphustown....aft. " 31

PRINCE EDWARD—
6. Picton....aft. June 1
7. Milford....aft. " 3
8. Cherry Valley....aft. " 4
9. West Lake....aft. " 5
10. Wellington....aft. " 6
11. Bloomfield....aft. " 7
12. Gilbert's Mills....aft " 8

Division 18.—Mrs. F. W. Watts, Clinton.

SOUTH LEEDS—
1. Lansdowne....aft. May 27
2. Seeley's Bay....aft. " 28
3. Elgin....aft. " 29
4. Westport.... " 30
5. Newboro.... " 31

BROCKVILLE—
6. Athens....June 1
7. Delta.... " 3

SOUTH GRENVILLE—
8. Algonquin.... " 4
9. Maynard....aft. " 5
10. Spencerville....aft. " 6
11. Shanley.... " 7

NORTH LEEDS AND GRENVILLE—
12. Merrickville....aft. " 8

Division 19.—Lecturer, Mrs. L. Rose Stephens, Huntingdon, Que.

DUNDAS—
1. Iroquois....aft. June 3
2. Morrisburg....aft. " 4
3. Williamsburg....aft. " 5
4. Winchester Springs....aft. " 6
5. Chesterville....aft. " 7
6. Morewood....eve. " 8

To Make Good Bread

requires good yeast, and to have good yeast you should insist upon your grocer giving you White Swan Yeast Cakes. A 5c. package contains 6 cakes. Free sample sent on request. White Swan Spices & Cereals, Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Shaw's Schools

Toronto

Give excellent courses in all Business Subjects and train young people for good salaried positions. Enter any time. No vacations.

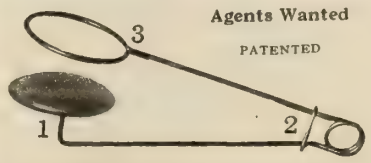
Catalogue on Request. Write

W. H. SHAW, President
Yonge and Gerrard Streets, Toronto

Darn the Stockings
With a Handy Stocking Darner

Agents Wanted

PATENTED



With this simple device a woman can save time and darn the holes much better and easier than by the old fashioned way.

HOW IT IS USED—Place cap (No 1) in stocking under the part to be mended, slide link (No. 2) up, which clamps ring (No. 3) to stocking and holds it in place while being mended.

Can be used to darn anything from a stocking to a dress; does not stretch the hole, but holds the stocking or goods securely.

You are so sure to like it that we will send one to you on trial for 25 cents post paid. If you do not like it return it and we will refund your money. Send cash with order.

V. B. CONVIS 159 Dufferin St. TORONTO

The Labor of Sweeping and Dusting reduced to a minimum by the use of

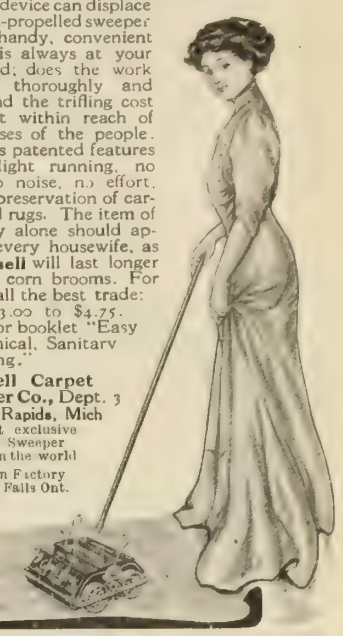
BISSELL'S

"Cyco" Ball Bearing Carpet Sweeper

A good carpet sweeper is the daily necessity of every home. No other cleaning device can displace the hand-propelled sweeper as this handy, convenient cleaner is always at your command; does the work quickly, thoroughly and easily and the trifling cost brings it within reach of the masses of the people.

Bissell's patented features insure light running, no dust, no noise, no effort, besides preservation of carpets and rugs. The item of economy alone should appeal to every housewife, as one Bissell will last longer than 50 corn brooms. For sale by all the best trade: prices $3.00 to $4.75. Write for booklet "Easy Economical, Sanitary Sweeping."

Bissell Carpet Sweeper Co., Dept. 3
Grand Rapids, Mich
Largest exclusive Carpet Sweeper makers in the world
Canadian Factory Niagara Falls Ont.



Webb's

Chocolates

for people who want the best

THE
Harry Webb Co., Limited
TORONTO, CAN.

"Shooting the Rapids"

Certainly an exciting trip is the descent by steamer of the famous Rapids of the St. Lawrence River by the steamers of the Richelieu & Ontario Navigation Co. The experience is thrilling and the scenic views enchanting. Why not arrange this summer to take the St. Lawrence River trip and see the 1,000 Islands, Rapids, Montreal, Quebec and Saguenay River. For illustrated booklet "Niagara to the Sea," send 6c. postage to H. Foster Chaffee, A. G. P. A., Toronto. Ontario.

SHORT STORY WRITING

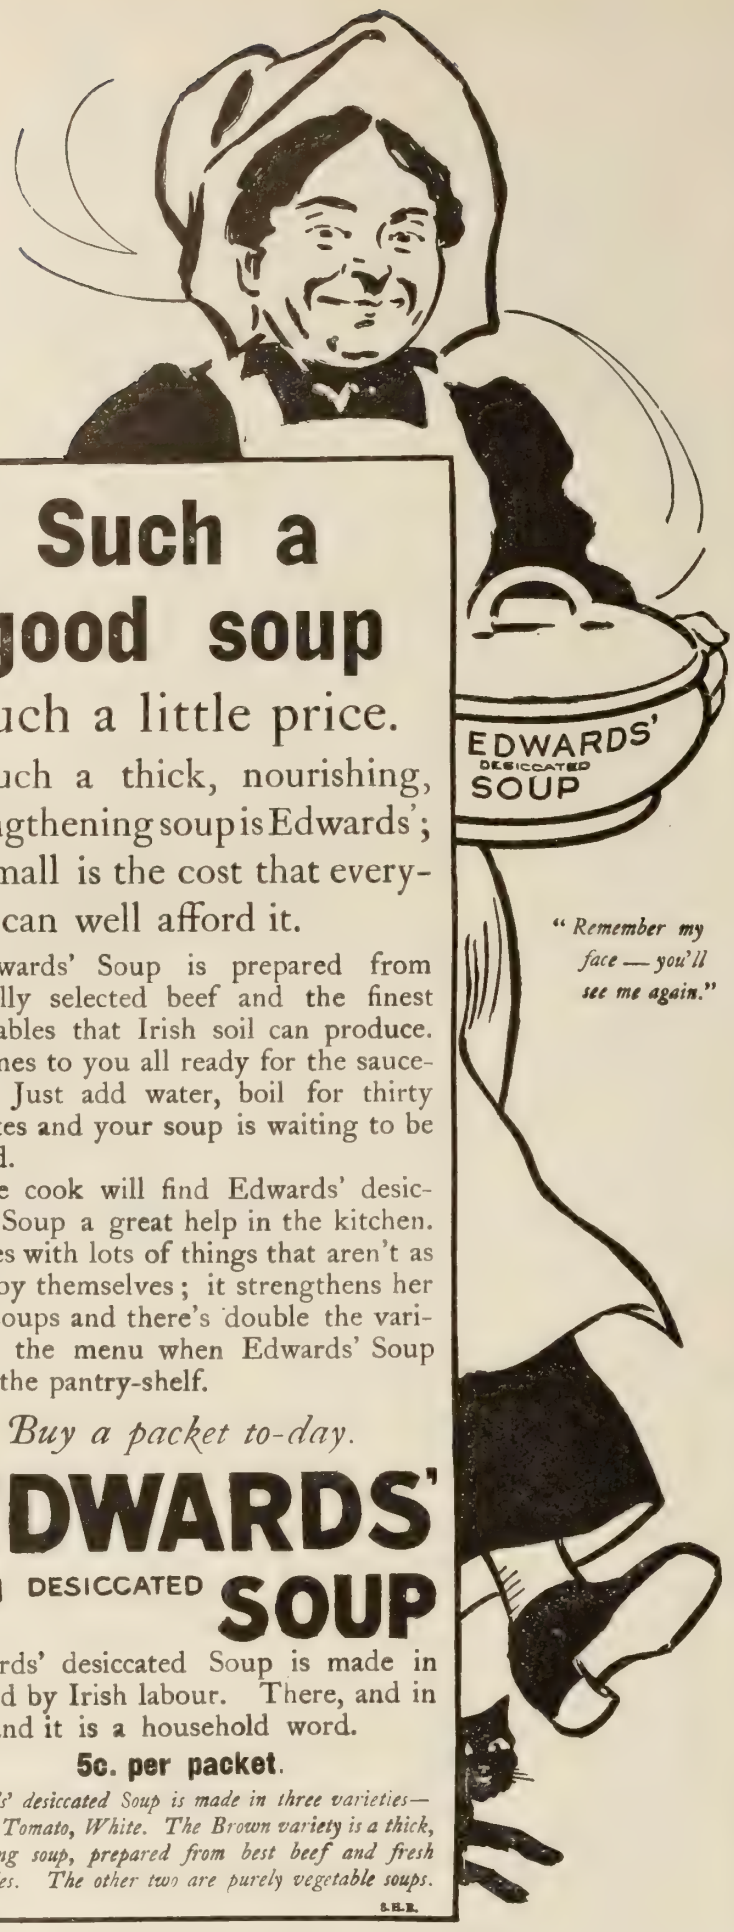
A complete, practical and thorough course of instruction prepared by and taught under the supervision of one of America's ablest Writers and Tutors.

THE MAGAZINES GO BEGGING

for bright interesting stories. This appeals to YOU Cut out this ad and mail to-day for particulars.

Name _____
Address _____

The Shaw Correspondence School
391-397 Yonge Street - Toronto



"Remember my face — you'll see me again."

Such a good soup

Such a little price.

Such a thick, nourishing, strengthening soup is Edwards'; so small is the cost that everyone can well afford it.

Edwards' Soup is prepared from specially selected beef and the finest vegetables that Irish soil can produce. It comes to you all ready for the saucepan. Just add water, boil for thirty minutes and your soup is waiting to be served.

The cook will find Edwards' desiccated Soup a great help in the kitchen. It goes with lots of things that aren't as tasty by themselves; it strengthens her own soups and there's double the variety in the menu when Edwards' Soup is on the pantry-shelf.

Buy a packet to-day.

EDWARDS' DESICCATED SOUP

Edwards' desiccated Soup is made in Ireland by Irish labour. There, and in England it is a household word.

5c. per packet.

Edwards' desiccated Soup is made in three varieties—Brown, Tomato, White. The Brown variety is a thick, nourishing soup, prepared from best beef and fresh vegetables. The other two are purely vegetable soups.

1176 S.H.P.

Dainty Lunches

are always possible when you have

CLARK'S PERFECT FOODS on hand.

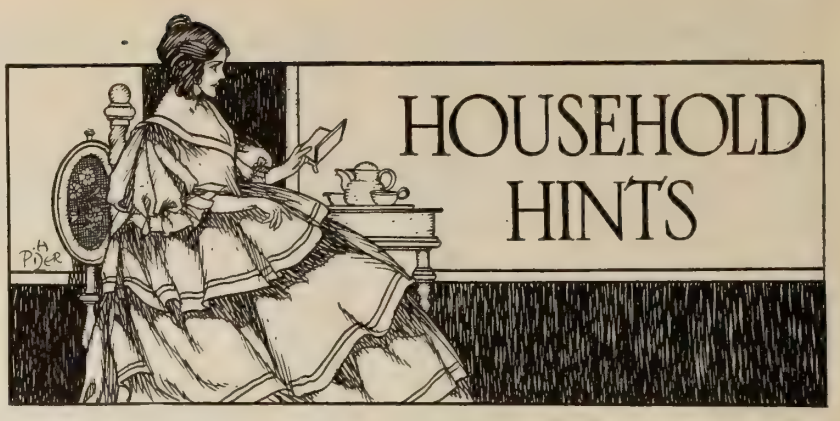
All ingredients used in Clark's Preparations are the very best that can be procured. There is nothing "just as good."

Insist on Clark's

Wm. Clark, - Montreal

Manufacturer of tne Celebrated Pork and Beans

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.



HOUSEHOLD HINTS

Pure Food Campaign

AS a safeguard buy nothing in the baking powder line unless all the ingredients are printed on the label. The manufacturers of the brands of baking powder in which large quantities of alum are used, are afraid to print the ingredients on the label, as no person would buy it at any price. Magic Baking Powder is pure and guaranteed not to contain alum.

Fruits as Medicines

APPLES are a wholesome vegetable aliment and in many cases, medicinal, particularly to those of weak chests. The Australians say, "He who eats apples before going to bed, robs the doctor of his daily bread." But in general they agree best when eaten either roasted or stewed or baked. The more aromatic kinds of apples are the best for eating raw.

Pears resemble much in their effects the sweet kind of apples, but have more of a laxative quality and a tendency to cause flatulency.

Cherries are in general a wholesome fruit and are beneficial in many diseases.

Plums are nourishing and have besides an attenuating as well as a laxative quality. If eaten fresh and before they are ripe, especially in large quantities, they are most dangerous. They occasion colics and other complaints.

Peaches are not very nourishing, but they abound in juice and are very serviceable in bilious complaints.

Apricots are more pulpy than peaches, but are apt to ferment and produce acidities in weak constitutions.

Gooseberries and currants, when ripe, have similar qualities to cherries, and are cooling.

Strawberries are an agreeable, cooling aliment, and are considered good, not only for the teeth, but for many disorders of the stomach.

Cucumbers are also cooling and agreeable to the palate in hot weather, but to prevent them from proving hurtful, the juice should be squeezed out after they are sliced by sprinkling over salt; then oil, pepper, salt and vinegar added.

How Other Women Manage

IN moving the piano around, the wall paper was badly scratched, and I was in a quandary as to how to mend it without having the patch noticeable. First, I cut a square and then a round piece and pasted each on. But the joining showed up strongly. In despair I tore a small piece and stuck it on. Imagine my surprise when the edges blended so that no break was visible. I then found that cutting the paper had left a hard, thick edge, while in tearing it the edge was very fine and was one-fourth only as thick as the body of the paper. Besides, the line was not straight and sharp, so it blended with the pattern, and would not attract the eye. The same effect can be made with care if tearing is not successful by scraping the under side of the paper at the edges, so as to make the final edge very, very thin. Have the edge of the paper to follow, if possible, the pattern, so that the piecing will be less noticeable than a straight line which joins the old paper abruptly.

Very useful I find my small brush for brushing out the folds of trimming and ribbon loops on my hats. This little accessory is of my own manufacture, and I want to tell you how I made it. A stiff bristle shaving brush gave me the idea. For fifteen cents I bought one. A piece of brown velvet covered the metal part that holds the bristles and contrasts well with the brown handle and the cream-white of the bristles. The band must be very tightly put on, otherwise it will look clumsy. I used brown silk to sew the joining and the seam is scarcely discernible. One of these bonnet brushes, decorated with loops of dainty ribbon, would make an attractive holiday gift.

Many a dress has been regarded as ruined when streaked with a stain of axle grease, paint or tar. But it is not spoiled, and may be renovated with little trouble. First apply lard to the stain and then rub with any good white laundry soap, and finally wash. The lard and stain will disappear.

Did you know that putting a little blue into the rinsing water prevents black hose from fading? Well, it does. Just try doing so and hang the stockings in the shade to dry. They will keep their color until worn out. This discovery has been a boon to me, as I have often been obliged to discard the children's hose on account of their faded appearance.

To several of my friends who have embroidered articles I have given little blankets on which to iron the embroidery design. These I have made of several thicknesses of white outing flannel about one yard square, and bound with dainty colored ribbon. They will certainly be useful and can be made as ornamental as one desires.

If the housekeeper is in an especial hurry to heat or cook quickly, before putting the stew-pan on the fire, rub some laundry soap over the bottom several times. When the pan is washed the black comes off like magic.

Concerning Rhubarb

LIKE many plants whose flowers, fruit, leaves or roots are tinged with red, rhubarb was anciently dedicated to Mars, and consequently was supposed to have many virtues in the way of healing wounds and reducing inflammation. It was said to cleanse and cool the blood in the springtime, and to be good for various liver ailments. The Irish peasants still consider rhubarb very useful for this purpose, and though as a rule they care little for cooked fruit or sweet dishes of any description "stewed roobub" is an exception! The delicate pinky tint of the young stalks is supposed to show that it is good for the complexion—what "colleen" would not like to have just such a rosy tinge in her cheeks! It is also rightly supposed to be very good for children.

Formerly the plant was said not only to be excellent for the skin and digestion, but was credited with the power of curing headaches, melancholy, gout, sciatica and cramp. Ague, jaundice, and sundry fevers, too, were supposed to be cured by it. The root was steeped in red or white wine, or whey—a cooling drink much esteemed by our forefathers, and quite neglected now. Boiled down with wine and honey, it was thought good for sore eyes, and was also used to remove the blue marks caused by bruises.

Eggs by Weight

EGGS should be given by weight, not by count, as they vary in size. The old-fashioned sponge cake—ten eggs, their weight in powdered sugar, and half their weight in flour—is a perfect recipe. A rule of this kind always produces good results; and see how easily it can be divided. One can use any number of eggs; simply weigh them, use an equal weight of sugar, and half the weight of flour.

In making sponge cake the best results are obtained by beating the yolks, sugar and rind and juice of half a lemon for ten minutes. Fold in the whites and then mix in carefully the sifted flour. A wire egg-beater is the best for all the mixing, as well as the beating. Sponge cake requires a hot oven. If you bake the batter in gem or layer pans ten minutes is sufficient time; a "loaf" will require a full half hour.

CULINARY CONCEITS

PINEAPPLE BAVARIAN CREAM

Two level tablespoons granulated gelatine, 1 can grated pineapple, ½ cup sugar, ½ cup cold water, 1 tablespoon lemon juice, 3 cups whipping cream.

One cup of whipping cream means to measure before whipping. One cup whipped cream means measured after whipping.

To make the Bavarian cream soak the gelatine in the cold water. Heat the pineapple to boiling point. Add sugar, lemon juice and soaked gelatine. Stir well to dissolve sugar and mix ingredients. Set in ice water to chill. When it is thoroughly cold and begins to thicken fold in the whipped cream, a little at a time and set aside a few minutes. When all the cream has been folded in pour into a mold. Square bread tin is good. Set in a cool place. This dessert can be made twenty-four hours before it is used. This simplifies the work of the last day and enables the housekeeper to do all the cooking for this entertainment.

Four recipes of this cream will be needed to serve a company of fifty. It may be served the same as brick ice cream.

RHUBARB AND MARSHMALLOW JELLY

Peel and cut into small bits enough fresh rhubarb to make two quarts. Put this into a porcelain-lined saucepan with a scant cup of cold water, cover closely, and set where the contents of the pan will simmer slowly. When the rhubarb is very tender, strain the liquid, a little at a time, through a cheescloth bag, pressing the fiber of the plant hard to extract all the juice. Measure the liquid, and for each pint of this allow a pound of granulated sugar. Return the liquid to the fire and heat the sugar in the oven, stirring often to prevent scorching. When the juice has boiled for ten minutes, add a little lemon juice, and cook for ten minutes longer before pouring in slowly the heated sugar. As soon as this is dissolved add a dozen minced marshmallows for each pint of jelly, stir in quickly, pour the jelly into glasses, and set aside to get cool and firm.

TUTTI-FRUTTI PRESERVES

Prepare the various fruits as they ripen, and use others that are always in market—such as pineapples and oranges—to suit the taste. Shred pineapple into small strips, and separate oranges into lobes. Put the fruit in layers in large jars, and sprinkle each layer with four tablespoonfuls of sugar. When the jar is filled, pour in slowly white whisky or brandy, letting it percolate to the bottom of the jar, and cover every bit of fruit. Fill until almost overflowing; then fit on the airtight top of the jar, and set in the cellar. Do not open in less than six weeks or two months.

CHERRY SALAD

Buy the large white cherries which are put up in tin cans. Remove the pits and slip into each cherry a small round nut or a piece of pecan or other nut. Pack in a dish. Cover with juice and let stand in a cool place until ready to serve. These may be prepared the day before.

Twelve eggs, 1 cup vinegar or lemon juice, 2 cups sugar, ¼ cup butter.

Beat the eggs and sugar well together, then add vinegar or lemon juice and butter. Beat again. Cook in a double boiler and stir constantly. When thick and yellow put away to cool. When ready to serve dilute to the desired consistency with the cherry juice. Serve six or eight cherries on a leaf of lettuce and cover with the salad dressing.

STEWED RHUBARB

Lay the stalks in cold water for an hour, then cut into inch lengths. Put these into a granite saucepan, strewing each layer thickly with granulated sugar. Cover with water, and simmer slowly until very tender. Add the juice of a half-lemon, and take from the fire. Serve cold with plain cake.

RHUBARB BROWN BETTY

Butter a pudding dish, and put in the bottom of it a layer of stewed, slightly sweetened, rhubarb. Sprinkle with granulated sugar, and cover with a layer of fine, dry bread crumbs, and dot these thickly with bits of butter. Add more rhubarb, then more crumbs, and proceed in this way until the dish is full. Have the top layer of buttered crumbs. Bake for twenty minutes, and serve hot with a hard sauce, flavored with lemon.

PARKER HOUSE ROLLS

One pint of milk, let come to a boil, put in a piece of butter the size of an egg, let cool until lukewarm; then add half a cupful of sugar, a little salt, and a cupful of yeast and flour enough to make thick sponge. Let rise until light, then knead it down and let rise again until light. Then roll out and cut with a biscuit cutter, rub butter over top, and lap over. Let rise until light and bake in a quick oven.

SAVOY CAKES

Beat together for twenty minutes the yolks of six eggs and one-half of a pound of powdered sugar. When light and thick add one-half a pound of sifted pastry flour, the grated rind and juice of one lemon, and four ounces of corn starch. Whip the whites of the eggs to a stiff, dry froth, and carefully cut them. Bake in a quick oven in finger molds that have been buttered, then dusted with flour and sugar.

NUT CHOCOLATE CAKE

Two-thirds cup butter, 2 cups sugar, yolks of 4 eggs, 1 cup hot mashed potato, whites of 4 eggs, beaten dry; 1 teaspoon nutmeg, ½ teaspoon cloves, 1¾ squares chocolate melted, ½ cup sweet milk, 2 cups pastry flour or 1 2-3 cups bread flour, 3½ teaspoons baking powder, 1 tablespoon cinnamon, 1 cup nut meats.

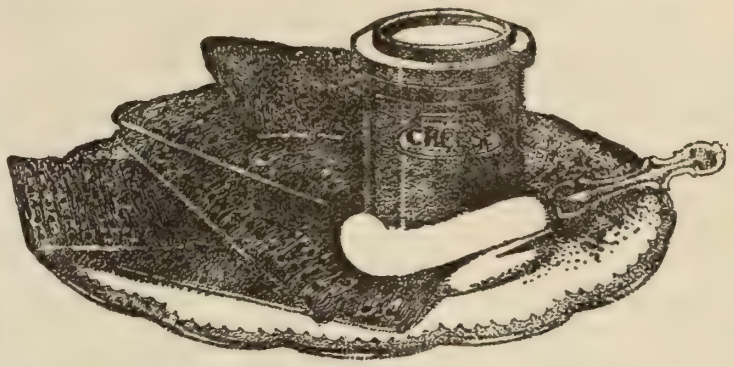
Cream the butter and beat in the sugar. Add the potato and melted chocolate and finish as usual. This makes a large cake. Cover with the marshmallow icing.

LEMON CUP CAKE

One-half cup butter, 1 cup sugar, grated rind and juice of half a lemon, 4 eggs, 1¼ cups pastry flour, ¼ teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon soda.

Cream the butter and sugar, add the lemon juice and grated rind and the yolks of the eggs. Sift together the salt, flour and soda. Add this mixture to the other and when thoroughly mixed fold in the stiffly beaten egg whites. Bake in small tins.

The Toppy, Tasty Toast



Food science has taught us that there is much body-building nutriment in the whole wheat grain which we do not get in white flour. The only question is how to make the whole wheat grain digestible. That problem has been solved in the making of the shredded whole wheat wafer.

TRISCUIT

It is the whole wheat, steam-cooked shredded, compressed into a wafer, and baked—the maximum of nutriment in smallest bulk. Many people prefer it to ordinary bread toast. Heated in the oven to restore its crispness it is delicious for luncheon, or for any meal, with butter, potted cheese or marmalades.

"THE TOAST OF THE TOWN"

Made of Choicest Selected Canadian Wheat

A Canadian Food for Canadians

Made by

The Canadian Shredded Wheat Company, Limited

Niagara Falls, Ont.

Toronto Office: 49 Wellington Street East

I-81

BENGER'S FOOD

FOR INFANTS, INVALIDS AND THE AGED.

A food of great nutritive value, which can be made suitable for any degree of digestive power by the simple process of letting it stand for a longer or shorter period at one stage of its preparation.

Benger's Food forms with milk, a dainty, delicious and highly nutritive cream, entirely free from rough and indigestible particles. "The Lancet" describes it as "Mr. Benger's admirable preparation."

Readers can obtain a 48-page booklet, "Benger's Food and How to Use It," which contains a "Concise Guide to the Rearing of Infants" and practical information on the care of Invalids, etc., on application to Benger's Food Ltd., Otter Works, Manchester, England.

Benger's Food is sold in tins by Druggists, etc., everywhere. B22

DAINTINESS IS THE KEYNOTE

What pride you take in the quiet artistic arrangement of your bedroom! ¶ So restful, so harmonious! ¶ But the furniture may be a little the worse for wear. If so, try —

"LACQUERET"

It's so easy to apply! ¶ And it will cover up blemishes on your bedstead, rejuvenate the doors; brighten the drawers, and hide the wear and tear marks on the sofa and table legs. "LACQUERET" is made in 8 artistic shades. Also in Silver and Gold, Flat and Gloss White and Flat and Gloss Black. ¶ Our little booklet, "Dainty Decorator," tells of its many uses in the home. ¶ Write for your copy. Ask your dealer—Don't accept a substitute.

INTERNATIONAL VARNISH CO., Limited

TORONTO - WINNIPEG

Largest in the world and first to establish definite standards of quality H-1.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

The Schooner Girl

Continued from page 49

very deeply in what people of other places do. They like to know, for example also where their fish come from, and then all about the people of the far away places who take these for them. They want to know about the icebergs and the seals and the whales and the other things which you have here; but in particular, they want to know about yourselves, the people, and how you live and you work and you play.

"This world is such a big, big place that we can't all of us go everywhere to see for ourselves, and, besides, it's often such awfully hard work, seeing things, that most people prefer to stay home and learn through their books. The cold off the bergs, for instance, which you don't mind at all, because you're used to it, has made me shiver and suffer more often than once, and if people were planning to come, just for pleasure, one taste of it would soon send them home.

"Somebody, though, must come here and see—to tell them about it, and if this somebody, when she came, told you she was here just to look on, you'd all of you feel like people who know they're being watched and you'd be on company manners and not natural. You'd not be the real jolly fisher folk that I know you, and the person, when she left, would have the wrong idea, about what she wished to tell.

"Now as your work is to give people fish for their tables, so mine is to give them things for their books. You try to give them the best fish always. I try to teach them things as correctly as I can. To this end I came among you to be one of you, to work with you, dress like you, eat, drink, sleep with you, and meantime to learn all about your ways.

"I like all of you equally, and I made no choice as to friends. Nikolaus, however, has been especially kind to me, but I did not understand; I thought this was simply due to the fact that he, in especial, had taken a liking to me a bit stronger, perhaps, than the rest.

"I did not know that he was 'sparking' me.— had no idea, because you see, down in my part of the world it is all done very differently, and a man would hardly start courting the first day he saw a girl of his taste." (Her conscience, for the moment recalled cases of "love at first sight," but she stifled if for the time). "Not dreaming of his intention, I had no reason to discourage his kindness, and only to-day did I learn what he had in mind.

"That, I am sorry to say, at the outset, is impossible, for more reasons than one."

The faces around her, filled with astonishment as they were, looked askance.

It was plainly evident that they wondered why, even had she been mistaken at the outset, she would not accept the man, now that she knew, and that he'd promised she need not work as did they.

Little by little, in the embarrassing silence following her renunciation, murmurs began to come, voicing the question. So, again, she opened the subject:

"With one in my line of work, who must go hither and thither, freed from any and all ties, I repeat, marriage to a fisherman is out of the question."

A happy thought, borne of the women's hands, scarred by hard labor, had struck her; these folk knew nothing of laws of non-support by a husband, among them a wife worked along with and fully as hard as did he.

"We have all of us, friends, our livings to make in this world, and I make mine with the pen and note book. I am not, will never be strong enough for this work which you do, and would be only a burden to a fisherman to support. The hauling of fish, standing on my feet all day cleaning, the cold, the fog, this sort of thing would kill me. I came for one summer of it, to see what it was like, but I find I can't even live through this, and I would not impose myself on a husband to keep without helping."

At least she wouldn't up here, she calmed conscience.

"I am leaving, therefore, on the mail boat."

She halted for a moment to step to the little trunk beneath her cot in the next chamber. Opening this, she carried a long hemp sack to the curing rooms and from it began counting out coins; actual gold pieces, rare things indeed, on the cold Labrador, where an entire family, working all the summer, may clear twenty, at best thirty dollars.

She took five of these, and making a place among the dripping cod-fish, she stacked them neatly on the table.

"You have your customs, and we have ours," she said quietly, "and one of those which we have, which I like best, is that of leaving a souvenir behind on quitting a place, after a visit. There doesn't happen to be any thing around that I could buy for this purpose, so instead, here are five five-dollar gold pieces, which I will leave in your care, to be used to buy a wedding gift for the lucky girl who will some day become Mrs. Nikolaus Weddle."

Clothilde slipped out into the open for a breath of fresh air for her headache, she put it, leaving the astonished fisher-folk to themselves. She strolled the beach two or three times, as far as the incoming tide permitted, then slipped back to the house. Through the open door she could see Katinka and Nordesta and the three other single girls besieging Nikolaus with their condolences, and assuring him they liked him quite as much as before. What did it matter if he had been deserted by a miserable town girl from down Canady-way, who was to leave on the morrow? They were still here, they were his friends.

Even as the Canadian girl listened, the sun broke through another fog and its first long beam reached the edge of the gold pieces on the table, giving them additional gilding. The three girls' eyes focussed on the gold, each already accounting it her own.

Nikolaus started out to make his punt ready for the journey to the end of the tickle.

The married folk crowded round Clothilde to begin their tedious farewells which would last till next day. Only the maidens stayed inside a long time eyeing the gold pieces, each of them speculating what she would do first if she won them.

And then, girls being girls, the world about, they went off in pursuit of the man.

House of Windows

Continued from page 48

It is just as easy for you to tell me that you do not love me as to keep silent."

"It would be, if it were true—no, Tommy! Please stay where you are. If you want frankness I'll give it to you. I think I do love you. I think I loved you long ago. Not just at first, but when I knew you better. But all my love has been spoiled and embittered. I saw your love for Ada. I knew it was a kind of worship, but I thought it was more than that (or less, whichever you like). I did not see how you could love me too. And I do not see it now. I do not want a divided love. I am jealous—not of Ada, but of love. And if I will not marry you now, it is not because I do not long for love, but because I long for it so terribly that I can't risk not having—all."

She left the table and came across the room to where he sat. It was growing dusk, but he could see her plainly, could see the flush on her cheek and the light in her eyes.

"Do you understand—now?" she said.

A great wave of illumination swept over Tommy. Miraculously he did understand. The problem of Celia which he had feared might baffle him forever seemed suddenly all made plain. It was not that she had given little, but that she could give so much!

And to give it she required a like surrender; no divided allegiance would do; all the years of his waiting were as nothing to her; her own lost youth was nothing. She stood there before him, a woman with all her best to give; demanding the utmost as her due! And as he saw all this, a new feeling stirred in him, a resolve, an unutterable longing! A longing which deepened into hope—into certainty! He stood up and looked into her eyes.

"Dear," he said, and then, "I shall win you yet."

But this time he lifted only her hand to his lips and kissed the fingers gently.

Celia went swiftly into the next room. When she came back she looked as usual.

"And so, just to change the subject," she said, "what are they going to do to the man Wilson now that they have caught him?"

"Penal servitude, I suppose," he answered cheerfully.

"And the old woman?"

"Asylum. She's as mad as a March hare! Since that afternoon when Johnson and Cunningham found her sitting in the ditch by the wood, she has not had a lucid interval, never will have, now. She is harmless. Goes about asking everyone if they have seen her daughter Alice. Mr. Torrance will see that she has the best of care for the rest of her life. The doctors think that she was already irresponsible sixteen years ago when she stole Christine."

"Poor creature! One can't hate a mad woman. When one has suffered so that reason rebels, it is time for the rest of us to be merciful."

"You feel like that now, when Christine is safe and happy, but you didn't feel quite that way a month ago."

"No, I did not. That is just a little way life has! Tommy, please don't sit there and stare. It is time to cut the bread."

She smiled at him so gaily that Tommy forgot how serious he was, and smiled too.

"You make such nice thin slices, you know," said Celia, handing him the knife.

Tommy smiled again with the modesty of conscious worth.

"You have not read me your latest poem, either," said Celia.

"Perhaps we shall have time for it before the others come back."

Tommy laid down the bread knife.

"It might be better," he agreed. "Mark has absolutely no appreciation of poetry, and sometimes I doubt if Mr. Torrance really enjoys it. Of course I know that I am not a great poet. But I really rather like this last. It was Ada's garden that gave me the idea. May I read it now? We can cut the bread after they come. Here it is—

"'I gazed into a garden, once, between the iron bars;
The roses all were red and tall,
The lilies pale, like stars.
Trembling, I passed the garden gate—to find, ah me, ah me!
The glamor fled, the flowers dead,
What time I turned the key.'"

Celia took so long to comment upon this that Tommy observed her anxiously.

"You don't like it?" he asked.

"Oh, yes. I like it—as poetry. I was just wondering if it were true."

The poet's face cleared. "If it's good poetry, it doesn't matter whether it's true or not," he said cheerfully.

Celia laughed and pointed to the uncut bread.

The clear toot-toot of a motor horn, followed quickly by a honk-honk of deeper tone caused the poet to drop his verses and seize the bread knife.

"Here they come," said Celia, and as she heard their laughter upon the stair a tender light came into her blue eyes. But she said no appropriate or touching word; she looked as much like a sphinx as ever, as she poured the water upon the tea and opened the door so that no one might trip upon the third step from the top.

THE END.

The Unforeseen

Continued from page 28

at your hands. I thought you were my friend and my daughter's lover."

"I'm her mother's lover, and I hope her friend," he answered eagerly. "Just look in the mirror behind you, my—my dear, and dare to call yourself old."

And the next moment his arms were around her, and she had forgotten all the loneliness of her intervening years in the solid and glowing happiness which suddenly welled in her heart.

"I'm ashamed, I ought to be ashamed—the mother of a grown-up girl! And aren't you afraid of what they will say? They will speak of me as the designing widow. Are you brave enough to stand that?"

Calderon's answer was not verbal. The happiness and peace of his heart made him oblivious of outward things. He felt that he had built his house on a sure foundation, and that this dear woman would make for him a perfect home. As for Kate, they did not think very much about her just at that moment, and Mrs. Eardley begged for a little respite. She wished to tell her daughter in her own time and way. She chose them late that night after they had gone to bed. She came into Kate's room in a white dressing-gown, with her still beautiful and luxuriant hair unbound and lying loose on her shoulders.

"Mummy, you look a positive angel, and your eyes are shining like everything!" said the girl enthusiastically.

"I felt I couldn't go to sleep with it on my mind, darling. I've been trying to tell you, but I couldn't. Can't you guess what has happened?"

Kate paused in the process of brushing out her own hair, and looked at her mother with a sudden, strange, arrested expression on her face.

"I can't guess anything. What is it?"

"Mr. Calderon has spoken to me this afternoon. He—he has asked me to be his wife, Kate, and oh, I hope you won't mind, for I think I love him, and I would like to make him happy."

"Yes, oh yes, certainly—why not?" asked Kate, and quite suddenly, without a word of warning, let her hair fall over her face like a veil.

"Tell me all about it, mother, and do you mind if I go on brushing my hair? How did it happen? I'm simply dying to hear."

Kate managed to be matter-of-fact, and Mrs. Eardley talked on, relieved to have got the ordeal over so easily.

When Kate threw back her hair at last her face was perfectly composed and her voice quite steady.

"How perfectly delightful! You will go and live at that lovely Moat House and have everything you want in this world. And oh, mummy, you do deserve it, and I hope you will be happy for years and years and years, and let me come and stay with you when I get tired of Uncle Harry. Of course I'll go there now, and everything will be settled just like a story book."

There was a sort of feverish eagerness in her speech, which, had her mother been less absorbed with her own feelings, she must have noticed.

They talked long together, and finally parted with a very tender good-night. When her mother's footsteps died across the corridor, Kate turned the key in the lock, and then stood staring into space with her hands clenched and a very bitter expression on her face.

"Fool! fool! you thought it was you, and gave your heart away! But oh, she must never know, she must never know!"

And she never did.

The Reason

JUST before the recent departure of William Dean Howells for Spain a popular novelist called. He told about his phenomenal sales. Then—fishing for compliments—he sighed and said: "I grow richer and richer, but, all the same, I think my work is falling off. My new work is not so good as my old." "Oh, nonsense," said Mr. Howells. "You write just as well as you ever did, my boy. Your taste is improving, that is all."

LADIES' BLOUSE MATERIAL

Our new Spring and Summer Imported Shirtings cloths consisting of Silks, Zephyrs, Oxfords and Flannels are to hand. We will be pleased to mail you samples upon request

HARRY TOLTON - BERLIN, ONT.

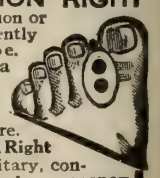
Importer of Woven Cloths of Rare Weave and Exclusive Designs

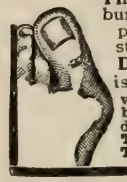
Cure that Bunion

No need to suffer bunion torture another day.

DR. SCHOLL'S BUNION RIGHT

removes the cause of your bunion or enlarged toe joint by permanently straightening the crooked toe. Gives INSTANT RELIEF and a FINAL CURE of all bunion pain. Shields, plasters or shoe stretchers never cure.





Dr. Scholl's Bunion Right is comfortable, sanitary, convenient. Guaranteed or money back. 50 cents each or $1.00 per pair at drug and shoe stores, or direct from The Scholl Mfg. Co., 472 King St. W. Toronto. Illustrated Booklet Free

Have City Conveniences

REPLACE the pestilent, draughty, dangerous and offensive out-of-doors closet with an indoors closet which requires no sewer, no plumbing, and no flushing system. Have city conveniences in your home. Safeguard family health by installing a

"Tweed" Closet

sanitary and odorless

"Tweed Closets" can be installed in the bathroom, cellar, or any other convenient place indoors, merely requiring to be connected by a pipe for ventilation with a chimney hole. "Tweed" Liquid Chemical, used in connection with "Tweed" Closets is both a deodorant and a disinfectant. Many hundreds of "Tweed" Closets have been sold in Canada. Send for illustrated price-list.

The Steel Trough & Machine Co. Limited

1 James Street -:- TWEED, ONT.

Let Us Help You Decorate Your Home

As shown in our book, "Homes Healthful and Beautiful"
DINING ROOM

Our method is so simple and the material so easily applied that thousands of women decorate their own homes.

LET US SEND COLOR PLANS FREE

For the rooms you intend to decorate this season. Last year we furnished without charge thousands of original plans for wall decoration. These were used in some of the most artistic homes, studios and offices in America, by people who selected the exquisite water color tints of Alabastine in preference to wall paper, paint or kalsomine. Skilled designers prepared these plans. It is service you could only obtain in the larger art centres at considerable expense.

We have a form called the "Information Blank," which may be had from your dealer, or which we will send on application. When filled out this blank will give us all the information required to suggest color schemes intelligently.

THESE ROOMS WERE DECORATED WITH ALABASTINE

Thousands of Canadian women have their homes decorated with

ALABASTINE

Why not decorate yours with this beautiful sanitary wall finish?

Alabastine makes a Handsome and Inexpensive Decorative Material for Church, School or Public Building Interiors.

TAKE OFF THE OLD UNSANITARY

wall paper and use Alabastine the beautiful wall tint

It is more artistic than wall paper or paint, more easily applied—and costs far less. It is too superior to compare with kalsomine—distinctly a wall covering for people of taste and refinement—used for more than a quarter of a century.

With Alabastine you may give living room, library, dining room or bedroom an individuality of its own. The charming modified tints are given unstinted praise by architects and decorators who are producing some of the most attractive of the new city and country homes and public buildings. They specify Alabastine as the ideal foundation for all future decorating, for a new coat can be applied directly over the old—from time to time when you wish to renew your decorations—without the expense and nuisance of washing the old Alabastine off the walls. It hardens with age.

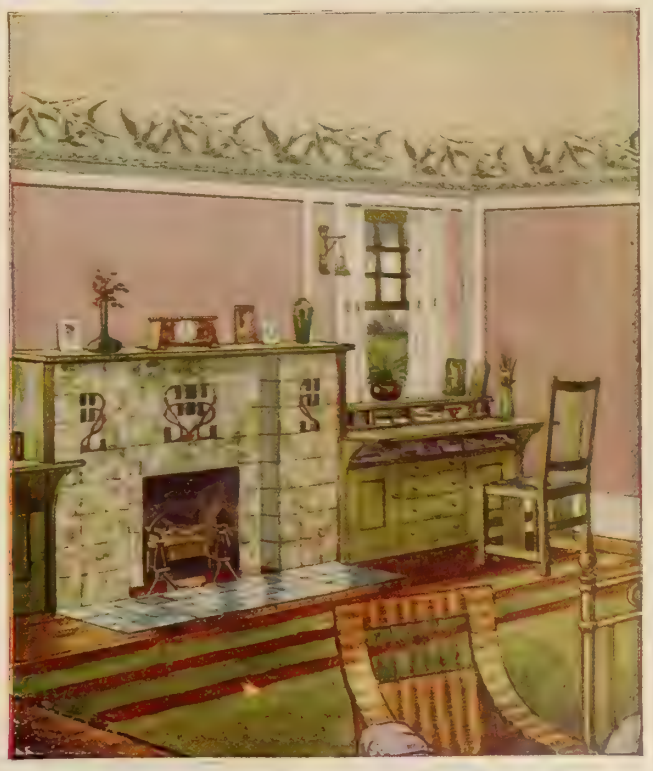
Alabastine is absolutely sanitary and far more durable than any kind of kalsomine. Lasts longer, does not chip, peel or rub off if properly applied and covers more wall surface per pound than other wall coating. It is the easiest to use—mixed simply with cold water—applied with an ordinary wall brush

Alabastine is for sale by all the leading hardware and paint dealers in Canada, but to obtain one of our beautiful books, "Homes Healthful and Beautiful," showing rooms in colors it is necessary to write us direct and mention this magazine. Also ask about our offer to supply STENCILS FREE to Alabastine users.

Write a card and send it to-day.

THE ALABASTINE CO. LIMITED

25 Willow Street -:- -:- Paris, Ontario



As shown in our book, "Homes Healthful and Beautiful."
BEDROOM

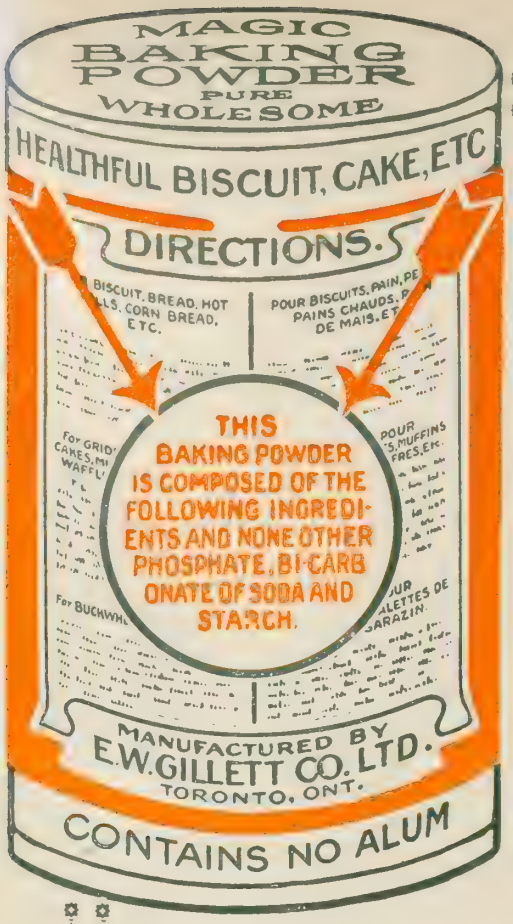
Post Toasties
The Morning Chorus:
Post Toasties —"The Memory Lingers"
'Most as much fun as a Christmas tree!

JUNE
1912

Canadian Home Journal

PRICE
10 CENTS

Published by THE CANADIAN WOMEN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., Limited
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA



CONSIDER how frequently you use Baking Powder, and consequently how important it is to use a baking powder that is unquestionably pure and wholesome. It is not a question of taste only, but materials, skill and absolute cleanliness, that makes Magic Baking Powder of surpassing excellence in point both of purity and quality. The only Baking Powder made in Canada that has all the ingredients plainly printed on the label. See if this information is given about the kind you are using. Look at the label.

Made in Canada

MAGIC BAKING POWDER

Contains no Alum and costs no more than the ordinary kinds.

E. W. Gillett Company Limited

Winnipeg TORONTO, ONT. Montreal

Made in White Enamel, Fumed or Early English Oak or Mahogany

Bungalow Beds

FOR YOUR

Summer Home

True To The Bungalow Spirit

The lines of these Bungalow Beds are Wide. Out in the country where the acres are broad, and the wide, low roof covers spacious rooms, there's a call for the harmony of wideness, unanswered by the massive and canopied bedsteads—a real call of good taste, answered splendidly by the makers of "The Better Make of Canadian Quality" with an English design correctly reproduced.

Our Shop Mark

TORONTO FURNITURE CO. LIMITED

TORONTO - - - - CANADA

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Subscriptions must be paid in advance and are stopped on expiration. To change address we must know former and new address. No address chang'd later than 15th

Published on the 25th of each month preceding date of issue by
THE CANADIAN WOMAN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., LIMITED
TORONTO CANADA
WILLIAM G. ROOK, President

Yearly subscription price for Canada & Gt. Britain is $1. U.S., $1.35. Foreign, $1.60. Remit by Express or P.O. Orders. Add collection charges to checks.

EDITORIAL CHAT

Do you know the feeling of pride with which a mother looks upon a daughter developing into full vigorous girlhood? Well, if you do, you know just how we feel when we see this magazine pushing into the front rank of women's magazines in America.

Our readers have made possible the wonderful improvements made during the last year, and in return we promise to do everything in our power to make it still more worthy of their favor in the future.

In the matter of covers we are spending more money to secure good covers than the usual magazine spends for its entire contents. We know that our readers appreciate our using good covers and that they are pleased to see the advances we have made in this direction.

Our readers must agree with us that the June number marks another step in our progress. There is a new serial, two splendid complete stories, the concluding chapters of another serial, ten pages of fashions, enough recipes to keep our readers cooking and eating for a month, music, and a host of other good things.

No part of magazine publishing is worthy of more consideration than the selection of a serial story, and it was only after weeks of consideration and the reading of many of the best stories that we selected "The Third Man" for our next serial story. The author, Silas K. Hocking, is a writer whose fiction is well known where good books are read. "The Third Man" is not a story of "drawings rooms" and "pink teas," but rather a story of the real every-day kind of a young man, who, while not sure he loved the girl, still he did not want her to marry a man whom he thought was unworthy of her.

To learn just how the difficulty was overcome you had better read the first instalment on our recommendation; after that we are sure you will be just as anxious as we were to find out just which of the three men the heroine will marry.

No person has ever told us just why so many marriages are performed in June, but the custom appears to be a popular one, and for that reason we have prepared some interesting articles, giving advice to the bride-to-be about floral decorations, customs at the weddings, furnishing the bride's home, and many other things she should know about preparing for the happy event.

Our short stories this month are somewhat above our standard, and what is better, they are from the pen of two of our brightest Canadian contributors. We want the magazine to be thoroughly Canadian, and will always give Canadian authors the preference.

Lois Rayburn's wedding is a well-told story of a beautiful girl's devotion to her fiance. Even though he had apparently become an invalid for life, Lois insisted upon keeping her promise. Read the story, you will like it.

There are moments in the lives of most married couples in which it would only require a few words to start a wordy war between husband and wife. The air seems to be charged with electricity. Well, it was on just one of these occasions that "Joe" unknowingly brought home to his wife a box of beauty roses that was intended for another person. It was a strange mix-up, and it cost "Joe" just twenty dollars to keep his wife from suspecting the truth. It is an excellent story, and well worth reading.

Luncheons, menus and culinary conceits are in the issue in abundance. Luncheons for June, menus enough for every day for two weeks will help the busy housewife decide the vexed question of what she will prepare for the family. Then there is a splendid number of timely recipes that are well worthy trying and keeping for reference.

Our readers have asked us for some time to give them more fashions. We hesitated to do so owing to the limited amount of space available in which to place the good things we prepare for our readers each issue. The demand for more fashions has become so general that we have given ten pages to fashions and kindred matters in this number. It is only another indication of how anxious we are to at all times give our readers what they ask for.

Dr. Hastings, Medical Health Officer for Toronto, has written a splendid article on the extermination of flies. Every one of our readers should read this article, and enlist in the army of women who will "swat" every fly they see this summer. Nothing that can be done around the home is more necessary from a sanitary standpoint than the extermination of the flies.

The change made in our Journal Juniors Department will be appreciated by our younger readers. Most of them like puzzles, and when they know that they will be given a prize for the solution of the puzzles they will be more than anxious to send us the answers and endeavour to secure a valuable prize.

Another new serial will be started in our July issue.

SPECIAL NOTICE—We have moved our offices from 61 John Street, to larger offices at 26-28 Adelaide Street West, Toronto. Our readers should use this new address when writing us.

June CONTENTS 1912

FICTION

LOIS RAYBURN'S WEDDING - - - 6
HE SETTLED WITH JOE - - - - 8
THE THIRD MAN - - - - - 9
THE COST OF A CRIME - - - - 11

SPECIAL FEATURES

FURNISHING THE BRIDE'S HOME - 7
MUSIC - - - - - - - - - 19
BANISHING THE FLIES - - - - 20
FLORAL DECORATIONS - - - - 21
FORMS AND CEREMONIES AT WEDDINGS 34
MY LADY'S GARDEN - - - - 46

FASHION DEPARTMENT

FOR THE BRIDAL PARTY - - - 22
PRETTY PARASOLS FOR SUMMER - 23
SUMMER COSTUMES - - - - 24
FASHIONABLE SILK GOWNS - - - 26
LINGERIE - - - - - - - 27
FASHIONS FOR THE CHILDREN - - 28
UP-TO-DATE EMBROIDERIES - - 29

MATTERS OF MENU

JUNE LUNCHEONS - - - - - 15
APPETIZING DISHES - - - - 18
MENUS FOR BUSY WOMEN - - - 33
CULINARY CONCEITS - - - - 49

FOR THE HOUSEHOLD

HOUSEHOLD DECORATION - - - 16
HOUSEHOLD HINTS - - - - - 48

SPECIAL DEPARTMENTS

AROUND THE HEARTH - - - - 13
JOURNAL JUNIORS - - - - - 14
GIRLS' CLUB - - - - - - 30
DRESSING TABLE - - - - - 35
FROM THE PUBLISHERS - - - - 40
BUT THAT'S ANOTHER STORY - - 50

SUBSCRIBERS' ADVERTISEMENT GUARANTEE

Readers of the "Canadian Home Journal" are fully protected when buying from any of our advertisers. We know that every advertiser in this issue is reliable, and that our readers will be dealt with fairly and honorably. Should any of our readers have an unsatisfactory dealing with any of our advertisers we will undertake to have a satisfactory adjustment made or the money refunded. This absolute guarantee is good only when our readers tell advertisers when dealing with them that their advertisement was seen in the "Canadian Home Journal."

There is Nothing in the World Like

JAP-A-LAC

The King of Household Finishes

THE secret of Japanese Lacquer has remained unsolved for centuries, and what is true of Japanese Lacquer is true of JAP-A-LAC—there are scores of imitations, but there is no substitute for JAP-A-LAC.

Why? Simply because JAP-A-LAC is made from the secret formulas and by a secret process that the imitators of JAP-A-LAC have tried in vain to discover. Among the ingredients of JAP-A-LAC are especially prepared oils imported from China and rare and costly gums from far New Zealand, but the method of blending and manipulating these oils and gums is ours and ours alone. JAP-A-LAC is made by skilled hands under the personal supervision of trained experts and specialists. It is a product of The Largest Varnish Plant in the World.

A brush and a can of JAP-A-LAC are all you need to make your home beautiful. JAP-A-LAC makes old things new and keeps new things from getting old. It is so easy to use JAP-A-LAC that it requires no special skill. Any clever woman can produce beautiful results with JAP-A-LAC.

JAP-A-LAC is made in 21 colors and Natural (clear). JAP-A-LAC your woodwork, make your old furniture new, give it new life, new lustre and new beauty. JAP-A-LAC renews everything from cellar to garret. It has a thousand and one uses. It comes in all sizes. Don't spoil your furniture, woodwork or floors experimenting with any unknown article.

REDUCED PRICES

Quarter Pints	formerly	$0.25	now	$0.18
Half Pints	"	.35	"	.30
Pints	"	.60	"	.50
Quarts	"	1.10	"	.90
Half gallons	"	1.90	"	1.75

Also special Jap-a-lac cans 10c.

Jap-a-lac is for sale by all paint and hardware dealers

The Glidden Varnish Co.

Canadian Factory, TORONTO, ONT.

Spring is the Time to Jap-a-lac Everything

CANADIAN
HOME · JOURNAL

10 CENTS A COPY | JUNE, 1912 | Vol. IX | No. 2 | $1.00 PER YEAR

H. PIZER

The Woman's Club

THERE was a time when the club woman was held up to ridicule and contempt, as a person who neglected important duties for the sake of a vain display. We recall the story of the man who was a "jiner," who belonged to every society under the sun and was a stranger to his own fireside. No doubt there are some women who follow a similar course and join so many societies for uplift and improvement that they forget the duties which lie the nearest. However, there is a happy medium in the matter of club devotion, and the woman who is too ardent in attendance at club meetings is not often encountered in Canadian towns and cities.

On the other hand, it is well to consider what a benefit the club or the society has been to the woman whose nerves were breaking under the strain of monotony. "A change is as good as a rest" has passed into a truism. The eye and brain that are weary of one scene may brighten and become invigorated when given a fresh subject for contemplation. A man who has business cares has also, in connection with his life down town, a dozen trifling diversions which broaden his outlook and make the daily round less monotonous than the routine of domestic affairs. Every healthy woman takes an actual pleasure in ordering well the ways of her household, but there is a danger in too close application to recurring small duties. To go to a club meeting and hear of some other world than ours, to attend an Institute gathering and discover how other women do things will make the next day's work more interesting and keep one from finding the world a dull place.

The June Bride

WHEN the month of roses comes at last, one's thoughts turn to the girl graduates who will step out proudly with nice, fresh diplomas, and to the bride who will set forth with a marriage certificate in safe keeping. The most cynical of social philosophers unbends, as he regards the June bride in her "white ninon over satin" and utters best wishes for her happiness. It must be admitted that women are supremely interested in the weddings which come in June, and that the masculine guests have an anxious rather than a pleased expression.

The June bridegroom is, indeed, a comparatively insignificant being, whose nervousness, instead of being regarded with sympathy, is contemplated with furtive amusement. Yet, who would grudge the bride her importance and satin splendor? A man may become an alderman, the mayor of a city, a member of Parliament, or a railroad magnate, but a woman's wedding day is the great occasion of her life, when, for the space of a brief ceremony, she is the centre of a happy group. Ours is a country of many prosperous homes, where "problems" do not press too heavily, and may it long continue so!

Plant a Tree

AS a custom, Arbor Day has an excellent effect on any community. Nature has been so good to Canada in the matter of forest resources that we have been prodigals indeed, taking little care of our heritage, and have only lately aroused to consider the need for conservation. The forest fires, which have so frequently ravaged large sections of our country, are a proof of carelessness in protective measures and are hardly a credit to our civilization.

To appreciate the beauty and comfort of shade trees, one must live for a while where there is a dreary absence of their umbrageous charm. When, day after day passes, without a glimpse of a grove or forest, with only miserable stunted shrubs to break the plain, then we would give many dollars for a few spreading maples or a stately elm. The love of trees and flowers cannot be instilled too early, for the civilizing influence they exert adds greatly to life's abiding pleasure. As Lucy Larcom tells us:

"He who plants a tree
Plants a hope.
Rootlets up through fibres blindly grope;
Leaves unfold into horizons free,
So man's life must climb
From the clods of time
Unto heaven's sublime.
Canst thou prophesy, thou little tree
What the glory of thy boughs shall be?"

The Girl on the Farm

WE wonder when our farmers will open their eyes to the injustice which they have so often shown to their daughters. Again and again we read paragraphs deploring the fact that so many girls are forsaking the farm for work in the city. What is the reason? In the majority of cases, we believe that it lies, not in youthful unrest, not in a longing for city amusements, but in a protest against the fraternal policy which denies a proper allowance to the daughters of the household. It is all very well to say that our great grandmothers did a great deal more work than their descendants of to-day and that the farmer's daughter of several generations ago was thankful for a roof over her head and the simplest of gowns. Our great grandfathers, also, worked much harder than the modern farmer, who would not dream of using the antiquated implements of sixty years ago.

The son on the farm is usually treated with much more consideration than the daughter, in the matter of money. The old distrust of woman's business capacity dies hard. The way to remove feminine ignorance is not to refuse to give woman an opportunity to learn the ways of the business world. If a father would take his daughter into his confidence in business matters and encourage her to have her own bank account, with a view to investment, there would be fewer mistakes made by mature women in the management of their affairs. A certain widow who has been most successful in looking after her own business remarked to her lawyer: "I owe a great deal to my father, who talked to me in my girlhood about his farm and his investments, giving me advice which I have never forgotten. He believed that every woman should know something of business affairs and be encouraged to have her own account."

It has often been said that we cannot learn by the advice of others, that it is necessary to make mistakes of one's own before wisdom is practically attained. This is only partly true. We may not hope to escape blunders and their consequence, but many disasters have been averted by the remembrance of wise counsel. If the farmer wishes to keep his daughter at home—and it is an infinitely better place for her than a city office—let him treat her as an industrial equal, show that he values her work and give her the benefit of his own hard-won experience.

LOIS RAYBURN'S WEDDING

A Beautiful Girl Proposes to and Marries a Helpless Man

By LOLA MARTIN BURGOYNE

A GIRL lay face downward on the bed crying as if her heart would break. Great sobs shook her slender form. Jim, an invalid for life! The thought brought fresh tears, and she sobbed until exhausted. Jim, the brightest of them all, the leader of all the sports, so big, so strong, and now, never to walk again! He had saved the child, though, and there was a little warm glow in her heart as she remembered that. The little mite had rushed out without warning, in front of Jim's big car. It was the child or the ditch, and, without a second's hesitation, Jim had turned into the ditch. His car turned turtle and he was pinned beneath it. They had carried him tenderly home to the big house on the hill, and for weeks he had hovered between life and death. Then came the turn for the better, and his splendid strength and clean life turned the scale, and he gradually crept back to life. Then had come this awful thing. Never to dance or skate or even to walk again! With a little moan she covered her face.

If only she had the right to go to him. Down in her heart she knew he cared. Many little half-forgotten things came to her, and that night skating on the pond—what had he been going to say to her, when Ruth came flying over and spoilt it all? If he had only told her and she could go to him now. She had not known herself that she cared so, till the news came of the accident and had shown her the truth, and now—

"Lois, Lois," called Ruth, hammering on her door. "What on earth have you locked your door for? Mother wants you to come down and see the Locketts."

"Oh, Ruth, please, I can't go and talk to them. Tell mother my head aches, and I am going out to try and walk it off. Get me out of it, that's a darling," Lois said.

"All right, I shall do my best. Wish I was old enough to do as I liked," said Ruth.

Lois sighed. "Do as she liked." Much Ruth knew about it!

"Mercy, what a sight I am," she cried, as she walked towards the mirror. "Crying certainly doesn't improve one's beauty."

She washed her aching eyes in cold water and brushed out the masses of brown hair. Jim thought she had nice hair, for he had exclaimed at its length that night of the fancy dress dance at Howes', when she had gone as Marguerite. She slipped into a brown velvet suit and pinned on a little brown fur toque with its single yellow rose. "Nut Brown Mayde," he had called her. She went out the side door, successfully eluding her mother and the tiresome Locketts, and was soon walking rapidly down the street. The air was cold and crisp, and the wind blew the wisps of hair that escaped from under her hat, and her cheeks were soon glowing.

"Oh, Doctor," she called, as she saw a tall man coming out of a house just ahead of her. His face lit up as he turned and saw her.

"Well, Lois, what a picture you are," he said, as he clasped her hand warmly. "It is well for us poor doctors that everyone is not as healthy as you are. Where are you off to this cold day?"

"Just for a walk to try and drive the blues away." Then, hurriedly and with flushing cheeks, "Doctor Merton, how is Jim?"

His kindly face clouded, and he looked at her face keenly.

"He is doing as well as can be expected, but he seems to have lost his grip since he found out that he would not be able to walk again. God bless my soul—when I think of him finding out now, when I did not mean him to know for a long time—perhaps never. Oh, God bless my soul," and the old doctor stamped up and down, blowing his nose violently.

"If we could only make him see there was lots to live for yet," he continued more calmly, "he would be all right, but he has given up hope."

Suddenly she raised her eyes and looked straight at him.

"Doctor, may I see him? Perhaps (her breath came quickly), perhaps I might cheer him up."

"He hasn't seen anyone yet, although he is in the library now. Yes, little girl, go ahead and try. I'll be around later and see how it works." With another shake of her hand he was off, and she turned, trying not to tremble at the thought of her visit. Why should she be afraid—of Jim, too? She had often been to the big rambling house when his mother was living, and she smiled at the remembrance of the good times that they had had in it. It somehow looked very forbidding as she walked up the drive. Poor Jim, all alone in that big house, and suffering too.

She quickened her pace at the thought, and ran lightly up the steps and rang the bell.

"Well, Sarah, how are you to-day?" she said, as the old woman with her stiffly starched apron opened the door. "Can I see Mr. Jim?"

"I'm very well, thank you, Miss Lois, I am afraid Mr. Jim won't see anyone to-day, Miss."

"Doctor Merton said I might see him. I'll go right in, Sarah, and then he can't refuse."

"Perhaps you can cheer him up a little, Miss Lois. He finds it very hard to be tied to a lounge all day, poor lamb."

"He is in the library, isn't he? Never mind coming up, I know the way," and Lois went up the broad stairs.

She stood for a second at the closed door and then knocked lightly and walked in.

A voice from the lounge near the fire cried impatiently, "Sarah, didn't I tell you I didn't want you again? Can't you women let me alone for ten minutes?"

"Oh, very well," said Lois coolly. "If you are so fond of solitude I won't intrude." But, instead of leaving, she walked into the room and stood smiling at him.

At the sound of her voice he turned his head swiftly. His whole face lit up, and he held out both hands impulsively. "Lois, oh, Lois," he cried, his eyes shining.

She dropped her big muff on a convenient chair and put her hands in his. For a long moment they looked deep into one another's eyes, and Lois gave a sigh of deep content. She had found out what she had come up for.

"Well," she said, with a tremulous little laugh, "must I go or may I stay and talk with you?"

"Indeed, you may stay. Oh, but it's good to see you again, and how—how lovely you look," he said as she stood up to remove her wraps.

A picture she certainly was as she stood in the dim old room with the afternoon sun shining on her wavy brown hair.

She threw her furs and long coat over a chair and raised her hands to her hat.

"May I take my hat off too and be comfy?" she asked. "It's so warm."

He just smiled at her without speaking, almost afraid that she was a figment of fancy that would fade and leave him alone.

She drew up a footstool to his couch and began telling him all sorts of odds and ends that she thought would interest him. Once Sarah, passing in the hall, heard him laugh and hurried to tell Thomas, Mr. Jim's man.

"Bless her heart, she'll cheer him up, little sunbeam that she is."

But "Little Sunbeam" was not having such a good time of it. She had mentioned Ralph Burns several times in her little items of news, and gloom had instantly settled on Jim's face. He answered her shortly, staring moodily into the fire. Her heart ached at the change in him, and conversation lagged in spite of her efforts.

Suddenly she caught her breath and plunged boldly.

"Jim," she said, "will you tell me what you were going to say when we were skating on the pond that night, when Ruth interrupted us?"

She heard him draw his breath quickly, and for a long moment there was silence.

"No, Lois, I can't tell you," he said at last.

"Why not?" she asked softly, "I—I would like to know."

She was busily tying knots in the fringe of his rug, but saw him clench his hands—oh, how thin and white they are now.

Again there was silence and his voice was very low as he answered.

"Things have changed since then, and I have no right to tell you now what I was going to say that night."

Her head was bent low as she asked in an even voice, "Will you marry me, Jim?"

"Lois, for God's sake!" he cried.

"Will you?" she repeated.

"No!"

A little sob broke from her. "Oh," she whispered, "I—oh, I thought you cared." She covered her burning face with her hands.

"Cared! God, I love you! Lois, Lois, you know I can't marry you. Marry you! You beautiful thing! Don't you know I'll never be able to walk again—never—never. And I may live to be an old man. It's worse than death to give you up."

With a quick movement she bent down beside him. She put her hands in his, but his fingers did not close over hers.

"I love you, Jim; what else matters in all the world? Why can't we live our lives together? I can't live without you. I knew these last weeks"—her head drooped.

"Lois, for heaven's sake, go. You make me forget everything except that—I love you—Oh, my darling."

She deliberately put her arms around his neck and he crushed her to him.

"Well, Jim, old boy—oh, God bless my soul!" and the old doctor stood speechless.

Lois sprang up all flushed and laughing, but with dewy eyes.

"I've cheered him up beautifully, Doctor, but I have had an awful time doing it. I'll never, never propose to a man again. It's dreadfully hard work."

The doctor sank into a chair. "Well, of all things," he gasped. "By George, you're a lucky fellow," he said, turning to Jim. "He certainly does look better, Lois."

"Doctor, try to put some sense into her head," said Jim, but Lois put her fingers gently over his mouth.

"Now, Jim, be quiet," she said, "you know perfectly well you can't live without me, and I wouldn't live without you, so what are you going to do about it? No, Doctor, Jim doesn't know it yet, but we are going to be married to-morrow. Can't you get us a special license or whatever is necessary, and, please, not a word to anyone."

For a long time they talked, Lois finally getting her way. The doctor promised to arrange everything, and took her home in his motor, leaving Jim to his dreams.

Lois needed all her courage to face the family with her news, and there was a stormy scene when she told them, but she finally won them over. Perhaps the fact that Jim Foster was one of the richest men in the town had something to do with it.

"Oh but it is good to see you again."

It was a strange party that assembled in the Foster library the next afternoon. Lois, in her plain white dress, by Jim's couch; Mr. and Mrs. Rayburn, and Ruth, Stewart Hamilton, Jim's chum; Dr. Guthrie, the clergyman; Doctor Merton, and Sarah in the background.

Lois' voice was as clear as a bell as they went through the service, but Jim's broke utterly as he tried to say the solemn vows. With a beautiful gesture Lois knelt down beside him, and the service continued as she knelt there, with her hand in his.

When it was over Doctor Merton hurried them out, so Jim would not be fatigued.

Lois knelt by Jim's couch with her head on his shoulder. There was a great peace in her heart.

"Lois, my darling," Jim whispered, "God grant that you may never repent it, my Life, my Love"—but here a knock sounded at the door, and in hustled Dr. Merton.

"Excuse me for a moment, children, but I have brought you a wedding present." He held an open letter in his hand. "A wedding isn't half a wedding without a present. I've got one I think you'll like. When Jim was first injured I wrote to a specialist in Vienna and I have just got a reply, which says Jim can be cured."

FURNISHING THE BRIDE'S HOUSE

Photographs by courtesy of Eden Smith & Sons

A HANDSOME DINING-ROOM, FURNISHED IN CHIPPENDALE STYLE

THE point upon which we must all agree is that the bride should have a home of her own. Living with parents is not advisable in most instances.

Buying furnishings for the new home is a source of much pleasure with the bride, especially if she has an unlimited purse. Most brides, however, have to count the dollars and make them go as far as they can. It is always advisable in buying furnishings to make each room harmonize.

The days of the old-fashioned parlor are past, and in place of seeing a jumble of rockers and mahogany, silk-covered furniture, we now see the room furnished with mission furniture and the walls and curtains to match.

Living rooms, as they are called, can be used much more freely, and one feels more at home when there is the "comfy" look about the room.

In the dining-room, oak or mahogany furniture is the most popular, and at the same time serviceable kind to buy.

The illustrations of dining-rooms shown on this page give one a splendid idea of styles and arrangements. There is every appearance of good taste; there is also harmony in the furnishings, and the furniture, while costing more than the ordinary kind, gives satisfaction.

As a rule, furniture is bought to last from ten to twenty years, and there is every reason, when buying, to buy only furniture that you will not desire to give away in a few years, owing to its cheap appearance.

Styles in furniture frequently change, but not as often as in women's clothes. Designs that were popular centuries ago are in demand to-day. Perhaps the most-asked-for design in dining-room furniture is the Chippendale, as shown in the illustration in center of page. Other designs asked for are the Jacobean or early French, old English, and the Colonial. Furniture of these styles, made by a reputable dealer, will last a lifetime and will have the appearance of quality about it.

Manufacturers of cheap furniture are becoming so expert in making imitation pieces that a purchaser must make a close examination before buying. Elm can be stained to look like oak, and in many instances pine wood is used and painted and grained to look very much like oak. Birch can be stained to look like mahogany, and so well is the finishing done that only upon close examination can the nature of the wood be discovered.

The best finish for furniture is the dull or satin finish. It is the kind that does not readily show finger marks. The gloss finish looks very nice when the furniture is new, but it is more easily marked, and shows wear much sooner than the satin finish.

A commendable feature that has recently been given attention by furniture manufacturers is the building of articles from four to twelve inches above the floor. This will be appreciated by the clean housewife, as it permits the keeping of floors below the furniture clean and sanitary.

There is a wide range of furniture that can be considered in good taste in bedrooms. Some prefer brass beds, with the balance of the pieces golden oak; others all white enamel, and others all oak, while many prefer mahogany. The same can be said of bedroom furniture as in other parts of the house, the best is the cheapest.

Next to the furniture the most important item to consider in making a home cosy and attractive is the pictures, hangings and rugs: they must harmonize.

In hanging the pictures, before you place the pictures on the walls you measure up the spaces, study the furnishings, and place them where they are to remain in each room. Always try to bear in mind from what angles the light comes in each room, so that each picture shall be placed to the best advantage. Do not try to crowd the walls of a room. Consider each space carefully and the room as a whole, for when they are all up in each room there must be general harmony of color as well as of outline to each wall. Never hang pictures in rows or on a straight line. Vary the monotony of the walls all you can by using oval pictures and circular frames. Indeed, the effect of the best set of pictures can easily be spoiled by improper hanging.

It takes a good deal of artistic taste to make the pictures of a room give the finishing touches to its decorations as they really should. A crowded hall is always ineffective and most inartistic. Each picture worth hanging deserves sufficient space about it to make it show to the best advantage. If you want to be considered a success as an artistic wall decorator, see well to it that your pictures and frames harmonize with the room where they are placed. This is the most important item in the work. The subjects must also be correct in the kind of room in which they are hung, and if you are decorating in a "period" house both subject and frame must correspond to all the rest of the furnishings, and be of the same "period."

Pictures should be the correct finish to a correct home, for they, more than all else, indicate the culture, education, and refinement of its inmates.

A SPACIOUS DINING-ROOM, WITH CHINA CABINET ON LEFT

In hanging pictures dispense entirely with wire or chains and fasten them flat against the wall, so that they will appear to be part of the wall decoration, and not tilted out, spoiling the line of the wall. Study the lighting of each picture, and if there is a distinct play of light and shade, hang it so that the light from the window will fall upon it from the direction in which the artist represented it as coming. A picture, as a rule, should hang on about a level with the eye, but if a picture of doubtful merit is hung slightly above the line of vision it will tend to minimize its defects.

In most homes the fireplace may be arranged without much expense, even if at present there may be the undesirable gas grate with its repulsive odor. The gas piping may be taken out and a pair of grate dogs substituted. In harmony must be the tiling or woodwork, and if at all possible we must work in a little book case in which may be kept our favorite poets and authors, from which to have always at hand those volumes which most nearly express our own feelings, or, to which we usually turn for some message fitting our immediate mood.

But the heart of the home, what of it? Well, to the writer, it is that cozy open fireplace, in the comfortably furnished, living or lounge room. During the long winter evenings how inviting is the crackle of the pine knot, and the leaping up in fantastic forms of the lurid glare, and the warmth shed out from its midst. Around such we are content to sit and dream alone, or with the one we have chosen, to weave around it, into one fabric the story of the past, the ambitions of the present, and the hopes of the future. Around it will entwine the happiest moments of story-telling, of confidences and family ties.

Search high, search low, in the parlor or in the kitchen, nowhere else will you find in any sense "the heart of the home."

A BRIGHT, COSY LIVING-ROOM, WITH PICTURES ARTISTICALLY ARRANGED

DINING-ROOM, WITH CONSERVATORY IN THE REAR

HE SETTLED WITH JOE

How a Box of Beauty Roses Made Farmer Dave Twenty Dollars Short in His Quarterly Payment

By MISS MABEL BURKHOLDER

IT was not until Farmer Dave was coming from the barn to the house, the team unhitched, the bags of feed safely stored in the granary, the groceries sent ahead to the house by the eager children who always ran to meet him on his return from town, that he remembered how cross and ill-tempered he had left Maggie at noon. Perhaps it was the very infrequency of the situation which disturbed him, for, usually, Maggie was the most patient and loving of wives, easily deferring to his opinion in all matters that seemed of importance in their quiet, uneventful lives. But deep water, when thoroughly stirred by a storm, takes the longer to settle, and Maggie would not easily forget that he had refused her request so emphatically expressed.

It was about money, of course. Women were always so foolish about money. If they could get all the little trifles they seemed to set their hearts on, what would become of the big things demanding payments at stated intervals of the year? Why couldn't they see that when a man was niggering along trying to pay the debt off his house and land, his one thought was for the wife and children? And why would they insist that a man found pleasure in handling money, when all he did was to pass it over the counter of the grocery store for the bare necessities of life?

By the time Farmer Dave had reached this point in his reflections he had arrived at the wood-shed door. A basin of water stood on a bench and a towel hung over it. Here the men were in the habit of washing off the worst stains of toil, and absent-mindedly Dave reached up to the shelf above for the soap. The action brought his face into close proximity with the little window which opened into the kitchen.

Supper was on the table and the three children played peacefully in front of the fire. The kettle poured forth a cloud of white steam, and the lamp on the mantle was trimmed and burning brightly. It was a perfect scene of domestic content.

But where was Maggie? Farmer Dave's eyes searched the room rather apprehensively until he discovered that his wife was standing apart from the rest, smoothing her hair before the mirror. What in the mischief was she doing anyway? By all the shades of the departed, she was twining a rose in her hair. A rose in November. Where in the world did it come from?

His eyes traveled lower and discovered that there was a whole box of them lying on the table beneath her hand. No stunted and half grown specimens were they. They were great gorgeous American Beauties, which filled the whole corner of the room with color as she lifted them up into her arms with passionate tenderness. Then, like one afraid of being caught in a foolish action, she gave them a quick kiss and crushed them into the box again.

Farmer Dave stood like a man transfixed. It struck him with terrific force that Maggie was still a very pretty woman, that while he was going his slow, plodding way, other people had their eyes open to her charms. The warm flush on her round cheek, the sparkle of her soft brown eyes certainly indicated a lively interest in the sender of the flowers, whoever he might be. Ah, watch how the roses would take their departure for some unused storeroom or cupboard, when the rightful lord and master of the domain announced his presence. With a cold perspiration starting from his brow, he opened the door and walked in.

But strange to say, Maggie gave no self-conscious start, nor did she try to hurry the flowers out of sight. The beautiful glow of her cheek deepened as he approached her, and she coquettishly turned her head to display to best advantage the bud in her hair.

"You're looking rather gay to-night," said Dave.

"Just see what night it is!" she laughed happily.

Then Dave, with another jolt, woke up to the fact that it was her birthday. He should have brought her some little gift. But the date had not entered his head since last year, when he had also forgot to get her anything. One thing was plain, however. While he was forgetting somebody else had been remembering. An unaccountable wave of resentment made him as sore-headed as a bear.

The sore-headedness must have communicated itself to Maggie by that delicate sixth sense of which many women are possessed. As soon as she perceived that something was not right she contritely drew near his side.

"Maybe I shouldn't have opened the box," she whispered. "But I knew it was flowers—and I was so curious."

"It didn't matter," he said huskily.

And then, to his utter surprise, she threw her head down on his shoulder and burst into tears.

"I was so nervous and cross the whole afternoon," she sobbed. "Nothing went right after dinner, and—forgive me, dear—it seemed to me you did not care. Then, to think you had me in mind all the time, and brought me those beautiful roses for my birthday. I kept saying all day that you would never think of it, that you were only interested in large things like houses and land, that I ought not to have been such a child as to expect anything. But I was just hungry for something that wasn't a necessity in the house, something that was frivolous, and sweet, and girlish; then when your flowers came—forgive me, Dave—I had to cry, I was so happy."

Farmer Dave's mind was doing some lightning calculation, until, finally, out of all the details of the day's busines was evolved a sentence which seemed to throw a little light on the subject.

The sentence was this: "Dave, I'm throwing a parcel into your rig—I'll get it when you reach home."

The sentence had been spoken by young Joe Harkness, his nephew, from a distant part of the country, who had hired with him during the busy summer season and who would finish the remainder of the fall ploughing before he went back home. Joe had also been in town during the day, but was going to walk out later. Wednesday afternoon was Joe's day off. They seldom counted on seeing him home for supper. They had their private opinion that he got that meal over at the home of the black-eyed Jennie Brown, to whom he had been paying attention all summer.

"Maybe I shouldn't have opened it," she said.

Then another of Joe's sentences came back to Farmer Dave with startling distinctness. It was a gloomy confidence, uttered while his nephew was at work with him in the field.

"I tell you Jennie Brown is no easy girl to hold. She's as stubborn as a balky colt. I don't know this very minute whether she'll turn me down the next time I go to see her or not."

Two and two are four the world over. Joe had bought the roses as a peace offering for the shrine of his irate goddess. And the box which now lay on the table was, without any doubt, the parcel he had thrown into Dave's rig before it left town.

A wave of helplessness swept over Farmer Dave. Joe would be in any minute demanding the box which Maggie persisted in hugging to her heart. If he attempted to confess, one would make him out a liar and the other would make him out a thief. It was a difficult situation, but the state of affairs in his home at that moment was a blissful that he felt like making a desperate effort to retain it at all hazards.

While he pondered his precarious position, Maggie bade him sit up to the table. She had taken an old-fashioned jug down from the mantle, filled it with the roses, and placed it as a centrepiece on their humble board. The effect was gorgeous. The children squealed, with delight, and the roses on Maggie's cheeks were as lovely as any in the vase.

Farmer Dave might have been sitting on pins for all the comfort he got out of that meal. When the caught the sound of Joe returning from town. He rose from the table and started to the door with a savage look on his face, as if he expected to encounter a burglar in the hall. But Joe, who had come in the front way, passed on upstairs. He would dress for the evening first.

"It's only Joe," laughed Maggie.

"So it is," said Dave, subsiding into his chair.

"I suppose," said Maggie, as she buried her nose in the fragrant rose petals for the hundredth time, "I suppose there is no use asking you where you got these beauties, or how much you paid for them."

"No use," Dave responded nervously.

From the room above came the sound of a dropping shoe. Dave fancied he could see his nephew cramming his feet into his Sunday-best.

"It would seem that Joe hadn't a minute to spare," he observed, squirming on his chair.

"I think Jennie is pretty exacting with him," smiled his wife.

Farmer Dave was constrained to get up and walk around the room. He felt like opening the window to get a long breath. Young Tootsie was playing with the box the flowers had come in. She had arranged the tissue-paper within to her liking, and then had closed down the lid and tied the ribbon across in a fair imitation of the original bow. "Here's a box of flowers for oo," she lisped, toddling to her father.

Joe was descending the stairs in mad haste, striking a match to see if his treasured box had been left on the hall stand. Dave was seized with a sudden inspiration.

"Take the box to Joe, dear," he whispered, as Maggie went to the kettle for a cup of hot water.

The child obeyed, trotting out into the hall and leaving the door dangerously wide open. Hastening to close it, Dave was in time for the last half of the harangue in process without.

"See here! That's mighty careless of you, Dave. The kid might have got it untied!"

"So she might," confessed Dave, as if he had just thought of it.

As he turned back into the room he looked straight into the eyes of his wife. She was not wise.

"I can't understand," said Maggie, meeting her husband in the kitchen the next morning, "why Joe did not come back last night. His bed has not been occupied."

"Truth to tell," confessed Farmer Dave, "I had a little difference with Joe when he came in last night."

"What, you? Did you sit up then till his return?"

"I did. He was not late."

"Did you sit up with the express intention of having a difference with him?" asked his wife wonderingly.

"I sat up with the intention of settling a difference with him. But there was no settlement in him. He was in a desperate humor."

"Jennie had turned him down in all probability."

"So it came out."

"Well, I hope he didn't blame you for that!" exclaimed Maggie, indignantly.

"I believe, in the course of his remarks he even went so far," muttered Dave.

"How absurd!"

"I offered to pay him three times the price of the—of the—that is he demanded a month's wages in advance, and rather than have a quarrel between our families. I gave it to him."

French Fabrics

FABRIC favorites are clearly indicated. Taffetas, taffetas, and still more taffetas, is the cry on every hand—plain, changeable and chameleon taffetas, taffetas broche, splendid faille taffetas—never before was there such a taffeta season. Tussores and crepe shantungs are as yet touched more cautiously. A covert cloth is again being used; both Bechoff-David and Drecoll are showing smart models for automobile coats in this material made severely plain, with collar, cuffs and buttons of the material. In a pretty unlined suit of white crepon shown by Drecoll, the collar, cuffs and buttons were of glace kid in a dull shade of red.

Crystal buttons are here to stay. Premet obtains a very rich pompadour effect by applying upon plain taffeta large medallions, square or diamond shaped, beaded or embroidered in heavy silk upon net.

Quantities of pearls, in bands of beadings or long ropes, are being used as trimming; several Drecoll evening gowns show three-quarter tunics of net, entirely covered with long loops made from chains of large, colored pearl beads; the effect is barbarically oriental.

THE THIRD MAN

By Silas K. Hocking

CHAPTER I.

A Strange Proposal

'SUPPOSE we both propose to her?"

"What folly, Geoff!"

"Of course, neither of us has the ghost of a chance."

"Do you want her—that is, are you in love with her?"

"Well, not exactly—only—"

"Then why trifle with so serious a matter? Would you like a practical joke played on your own sister?" And Bart Gordon's face flushed a little angrily.

"You misunderstand me, old man," the other answered quickly. "It's that cur Wiggs of whom I am thinking. I'd like to head him off by hook or by crook."

"I confess I fail to understand even now," Goddon replied after a pause.

"Then answer me this. Would you like to see Eve Marsden married to David Wiggs?"

"No, I wouldn't." And Gordon's face flushed again. "I'd rather see her buried."

"Exactly. So would I. But he'll marry her, as safe as houses, unless he's headed off."

"What makes you think so?"

"Oh, any number of things. In the first place, he wants her. In the second place, the old man likes him; and, in the third place, she may think he's her only chance."

"I don't know why she should think that."

"Put yourself in her place, man. Think of her secluded life. It is by the merest accident that we have been admitted into the circle of her acquaintances. Then Wiggs comes along. Almost the first eligible man she has ever known intimately. He has money, and cheek, and a smooth tongue. If she thinks he's the only chance she's likely to get—why, she'll accept him."

"I don't see that that necessarily follows," Gordon answered, growing red again.

"Well, not necessarily, perhaps, but likely." And Geoff Lincoln walked to the window and looked down into the street. Gordon watched him with a puckered forehead and a troubled light in his eyes. His dislike of David Wiggs was as strong as Lincoln's, his admiration of Eve Marsden as great—perhaps greater—and the suggestion that she and David might make a match of it was peculiarly distasteful to him. But the proposal of his friend, Geoff Lincoln, was really too absurd to be treated seriously.

He waited for Geoff to speak again. The subject had a peculiar—even painful—fascination for him. Geoff, however, appeared to be absorbed in something that was taking place in the street.

"Do you really think that bounder has a chance?" Gordon questioned at length.

Geoff gave a little start, then turned slowly round and faced his friend. "If I did not think he had a chance I should not have alluded to the matter," he said quietly.

"Which means that Eve likes him?" the other questioned, after a pause.

"After a fashion, perhaps. That she loves him I don't believe; but he is pertinacious, as you know—"

"But Eve Marsden would never marry a man unless she loved him."

Geoff laughed uneasily. "Don't be too ready to stake your existence on that assumption," he said. "Girls will do the most unaccountable things. Take the case of my cousin Ethel."

"Oh, that was an extreme case. Besides, Eve is not an ordinary girl, she has refinement, imagination—ideals. Do you remember what she said to us one evening when we were discussing Wordsworth?"

"Wiggs is as able to discuss Wordsworth with her as you or I. Besides, he has come in for heaps of money. Don't forget that. He may be a rank outsider from your point of view, but girls don't see men with men's eyes. He has an oily tongue and an insinuating manner, and a girl like Eve, who has been kept in a kind of walled garden all her life, may be easily imposed upon, particularly if the old man speaks a good word for him."

Gordon turned and walked back to his chair and began to fill his pipe. "Somebody ought to tell her," he muttered at length.

"But who's to do it? Besides, the way to make a girl determined to marry a man is to warn her against him. The more you blackguard him the more she'll admire him."

Gordon struck a match angrily on the underside of the mantelpiece and began pulling vigorously at his pipe.

"Of course, it is no business of ours," Lincoln went on. "Neither you nor I can marry her, though if we were in a position we might do worse; but that is nothing to the point. What is to the point is, we both admire Eve Marsden. We'd both be awfully sorry to see her spoil her life, as she'd be certain to do if she married Wiggs, and we'd both do anything in reason to stop his little game."

"I'd like to wring his neck," Gordon muttered savagely.

"My proposal is less primitive," Lincoln answered with a laugh. "Wringing necks has gone out of fashion."

"So has practical joking, for that matter—at least, with educated people."

"Then suggest something better, my wise and sedate friend. I have made what I consider a practical proposal. It has the merit of simplicity. If it does no good I don't see that it can do much harm."

"But what possible good could come of it; tell me that."

"I'm not sure that any good would come of it, but then, one never knows. It might give Eve a little bit better opinion of herself. Open her eyes to the fact that she is really attractive to the other sex. At present she has not the remotest idea how charming she is. Indeed, I believe she thinks herself—thanks to her training—a sort of ugly duckling, a girl that nobody would be likely to notice, much less admire. Hence her special danger. The fear is she will regard Wiggs as a kind of special providence and come to the conclusion that if she rejects him she will never have another chance."

"There would be no great calamity in that."

"From your point of view, perhaps. But in these days girls are expected to marry. It is the only profession open to a great many of them. I don't suppose the old man has been able to make much provision for her future. Hence, naturally, marriage will appeal to her on other than sentimental grounds."

Gordon, however, did not appear quite satisfied. He pulled at his pipe with savage energy and frowned at the fire. He was as eager as Lincoln was to spike David Wigg's guns and save Eve Marsden from the calamity of marrying a man who was not worthy to tie her shoes. But—

"You had better think the matter over," Lincoln said after a pause, and he turned away from the window and dropped into an easy chair with a book.

Geoffrey Lincoln and Bart Gordon shared rooms. Nearly three years previously they had come up to Oxford with scholarships—the one to Merton and the other to New. They became acquainted during the first term at a Union debate, since when they had been almost inseparable. They were now working for "Greats" which they expected to take during the next month. Beyond that there might be much, or—the other thing.

Gordon intended to have a shot for a fellowship, but was not at all hopeful of success. Lincoln, who had entered at the Middle Temple, would go down to read law with the expectation, a little later, of getting called to the Bar.

They were both young—neither much over twenty-one—both poor, both ambitious, and if neither of them was actually brilliant, Lincoln, at any rate, had more than average ability.

The previous year they had become acquainted with Eve Marsden, the only child of a retired don, who lived in a neat villa on the outskirts of the city. Eve had spent most of her life in a convent school in Brussels. She was an exceedingly pretty girl, shy as a linnet, and with no more knowledge of the world than of the geography of the planet Mars.

Her father had been known in his more active days as old Dr. Dry-as-dust. He had lectured on Roman law for so many years that he almost forgot that he was living in the beginning of the twentieth century.

When, at the age of eighteen, Eve returned from school he was at a loss to know what to do with her, or how to treat her. That she was pretty he could not deny, and that seemed to make his task all the greater. That she was innocent and trusting formed a peril to be guarded against; that he would ultimately have to get her married was a duty that he could not possibly ignore. If he had ever been touched by sentiment or romance, it was so long ago that he had lost all recollection of it.

Since her return, now nearly three years ago, he had guarded her with jealous care. What else could he do? He had a vague notion that girls were helpless things and quite incapable of looking after themselves. If they were kept strictly within well-defined limits they need not give much trouble, but if they once got out of hand there was no knowing what would happen.

At the time our story opens he felt that he was nearing the end of his responsibility. For several months he had been passing through a rather anxious time. Three young men had gained admission to the privacy of Rose Villa, and he was not without misgiving that there were others who, so to speak, were looking over the wall. He had horrible visions of what might happen if Eve got really out of hand.

It had been no part of his programme that young men should be allowed to come to his house, more or less indiscriminately. It was the one thing he had tried to guard against. He had a vision of one suitable young man who should come by his invitation and to whom in due course he would surrender Eve.

Fortunately, in the present instance, two of the young men did not count; they were only youths with their way yet to make in the world, and to whom matrimony, if it entered their thoughts, was in the far distant future.

David Wiggs was of a somewhat different order. He was older than the other two by several years, and was, moveover, master of a very considerable income. He had impressed the professor by his self-confidence, his knowledge of the world, and his general air of robustness. Geoff Lincoln and Bart Gordon were youths, David Wiggs was grown up. John Marsden was so little a man of the world himself that he failed to distinguish between self-reliance and vulgar swagger. The breezy assurance of David acted on him like a tonic.

When he discovered that Eve was the chief attraction he was quite pleased. From his point of view nothing could be better. He encouraged him to come to the house as often as he liked. He was quite certain he would make Eve an excellent husband, and when she was safely married his responsibility would be at an end.

David had no difficulty in getting the old man's consent.

"Have you spoken to her?" he questioned as an afterthought.

"Not yet. I thought it was the proper thing to get your permission first."

"Yes, yes. That shows a correct temper of mind. You may tell Eve it is all right; so we may consider the matter settled."

"You think she will consent?"

"Consent?" And the professor raised his bushy eyebrows in surprise. "Why, of course. You can tell her we have settled the matter between us."

David left the old man to his books and went off in search of Eve. In spite of the assurance he had received, he was by no means certain of the reception he would get. Eve had always been friendly and pleasant and hospitable, but he was very doubtful if she had ever thought of him in the light of a lover. He had given her quite a number of hints, but bright and clever as she was generally, she seemed a little obtuse in some things. Had she lived more in the world she would have discovered his intentions weeks ago, but her secluded life had rendered her quite unsuspicious of ulterior motives.

He found her in the drawing-room busy with some needlework. She rose at once and extended her hand to him. She looked very sweet and winsome in her simple summer gown, and her greeting lacked nothing in cordiality.

"It's all right," he reflected. "I've nothing to do but go ahead and win."

CHAPTER II.

The Test.

BART and Geoff decided before taking any definite action to pay another visit to Rose Villa. Geoff might be wrong in his diagnosis. Bart could not bring himself to believe that a girl of Eve's sweetness and refinement would accept a bounder of the type of David Wiggs. They discussed the matter again as they made their way through the park in the direction of Dr. Marsden's residence. Geoff had received a shock from which he had not quite recovered, when his pretty cousin Ethel married an old rake of sixty-five for a title and a house in Park Lane. If Ethel thought so little of herself in comparison with position, what reason had he for assuming that Eve would cherish a loftier conception of the dignity of her sex? Geoff talked like a man of forty who had had a wide and disappointing experience.

"I tell you what, Bart," he said as they strolled slowly along under the trees. "Girls don't look at things as we do. We idealize them. I don't know why we should, but we do; but girls never idealize themselves. They look upon marriage as—well—as a profession, shall I say. I don't say they all do, but a good many of them do. They want to get settled, to have a house of their own; and the most eligible man—that is the man who has the most money and the best prospects—has the best chance."

"I don't believe it," Bart burst out at length. "Eve can't be that sort of a girl."

"David may be all right from her point of view," Geoff urged. "Of course, he's ugly, and—and—he isn't a gentleman; but then, what experience has she had?"

□

"Trust a girl's instincts. I tell you, I don't believe Wiggs has any more chance than we would have."

"I wish I could think so," Geoff answered. And then they walked on again in silence.

They were told on reaching Rose Villa that Miss Marsden was engaged, but that the professor was in his study. And the maid led the way upstairs to his room.

Bart fancied he heard voices—low but urgent—as he passed the drawing-room door, and a vague feeling of fear and unrest took possession of him.

The old man received them very kindly, as was his habit, talked about the weather, the chances of the various boats during Eights Week, the approach of "schools," the more recent debates at the Union. He apologized for the absence of Eve. She was engaged and might not be at liberty for some time.

He did not invite them to stay to tea, and they were both quick to notice that he appeared restless and more or less on the qui vive.

Bart was just turning away from the window to say good-bye to the professor, when he heard the front door bang. Instinctively he stood still for a moment longer, and he saw David Wiggs walk slowly down the garden path and pass into the street. There was nothing in his gait to indicate either depression or exultation.

The professor walked down the stairs with them and opened the front door. They talked loudly in the hope of attracting Eve's attention, but she did not come into the hall. At the garden gate Bart turned, hoping that he might see her face at the window, but she kept resolutely out of sight.

For a considerable distance they walked in silence, then Geoff remarked casually: "We did not gain much by our visit this afternoon."

"I'm not so sure," was the somewhat sullen answer.

Geoff glanced round with a look of surprise, but did not venture any remark.

"Do you know," Bart said at length, "that Wiggs was with Eve all the time?"

"How do you know that?"

"I saw him leave the house."

Geoff gave a low whistle, but did not make any further reply.

"Did you notice," Bart ventured after another long pause, "how restless and absent-minded the professor seemed?"

"I had a feeling that we were not particularly welcome."

"He knew, of course, that Wiggs was with Eve. I hope, Geoff, that you have not been right all along. I confess I am beginning to have my fears—"

"That she will accept him?"

"She may. Good heavens! it will be a burning shame if she does."

"I've told you all along that unless Wiggs is headed off, he'll marry her as safe as houses."

It was on the following morning that Bart broached the subject again. He felt that if he did not, Geoff would not. Geoff had delivered his ultimatum, as it were, and would now let the matter rest. Bart was pouring out tea. They took it in turns to preside at the breakfast table.

"Have you thought anything more about the suggestion you made the other day, Geoff?" he questioned, without taking his eyes off the teapot.

"To what suggestion do you refer?" Geoff questioned after he had emptied his mouth of toast.

"Really, old man, I did not know you were so prolific in ideas," Bart laughed.

"You don't know me, my friend; ideas and suggestions flow from me without effort and without end."

□

"Do be serious, Geoff, for a moment. I admit I scouted your suggestion the other day, but, really and truly, I can't think of anything better."

"I quite believe you, old man."

"The point is, are you still prepared to carry it out? After our experience yesterday I scent serious danger. Mind you, I don't believe Eve cares for him an ounce; but what excuse has she for rejecting him? I mean, what excuse has she that would weigh with her father?"

"But suppose you should propose to her and she should accept you?"

"That is a proposition that won't hold water for a moment, as you know?"

"I mean if she were willing to wait."

"It's no use discussing that. Our business is to side-track Wiggs, if possible. Are you still willing to carry out your own suggestion?"

"Quite willing. Mind you, I'm not very hopeful of results, particularly after yesterday's visit to Rose Villa. But I agree with you—we ought to do our best. We shall blame ourselves afterwards if we don't."

"Then we are agreed at last. Now let us discuss details. My own feeling is, there is no time to be lost. Will you propose first, or shall I?"

"Suppose we toss for it?"

"Agreed." And a penny was spun in the air without loss of time.

The lot fell to Geoff, and he pocketed the penny in silence.

"Will you call round this afternoon?" Bart questioned after a long pause.

"I don't know. Perhaps I will. The sooner it's over the better," and Geoff's brow contracted and his face became unusually grave. Now that he had come really face to face with his own proposition he saw difficulties and possible complications that had not occurred to him before. To propose marriage when he really did not want to marry her—well, to say the least of it, it was a case of doing evil that good might come.

He was exceedingly restless and ill at ease all the morning, and the lectures on English and Roman law to which he listened left but the vaguest impression on his mind. It was his own proposition, and yet now, when it came to the point, he did not quite like it, and the chances of heading off David Wiggs seemed more and more remote.

He felt painfully nervous as he made his way in the direction of Rose Villa. There was an air of unreality over the whole business. He kept wondering how he should begin; how he should introduce the subject; what excuses he should make; what form of words he should use.

He found Eve in the drawing-room alone, engaged in decorating a table-cover with various colored silks. She rose at once to receive him, dropping her needle as she did so. Her greeting was exceptionally friendly, though her smile lacked the brightness he was accustomed to. He spent several minutes in searching for the needle, and when he had found it he insisted on threading it for her; then he dropped into a chair not a yard away and commenced talking about the tennis match of the previous afternoon.

She did not seem particularly interested, he thought. Some of her answers were not very relevant, and now and then, when she glanced at him, her eyes had a distant look. Also, she was paler than usual, and he thought once or twice that her lips trembled a little.

□

He could not help feeling that she was in trouble of some kind, and his heart went out to her in a great sympathy. She had never looked more winning, more dainty, more absolutely sweet and wholesome. He drew his chair a little closer and dropped his voice to a lower tone.

Bart waited for Geoff's return with impatience. It would be his turn to go on the morrow or the day following that, unless Geoff should discover in his interview that she was already pledged to David Wiggs. It was this latter possibility that troubled him most. David had most of the winning cards. He had not to wait to make a position—his position was already made; he could provide Eve with a good home to-morrow—that is, if a good home meant a large house, plenty of servants and unlimited cash. Bart resented his own poverty, almost resented his youth, and chafed under the hard fate that doomed him to long years of toil before he would be in a position to maintain a wife.

Geoff Lincoln, it was true, was no better off than he, but then Geoff regarded Eve with different feelings. He did not know that, of course; nobody know, and he intended to keep the secret to the end, or until such time—

His face brightened as hope pictured a possible day when this sweet dream of his youth should be realized.

There was a step on the stair at length, the door was pushed open and Geoff, flushed and excited, came into the room. Bart glanced at him with a look of apprehension.

"I've done it," Geoff said, flinging his gloves into a corner of the sofa.

"Yes?"

"Sit down, old man ,and I'll tell you all about it."

CHAPTER III.

Twisted Loves

GEOFF took a cigarette from his case and struck a match. "It's a queer world, this, Bart," he said with a hard laugh.

"Why queer?"

"Because it's nearly always the unexpected that happens."

"Then you were too late?"

"No, I was just in time."

"I don't quite understand!"

"I don't quite understand myself. It will take me some time to sort things out. Anyhow, she's accepted me. Behold in me an engaged man."

"What nonsense, Geoff!" And Bart felt all the blood leaving his face.

"It's the sober truth, anyhow. Unless I'm dreaming—unless we both are. I proposed to Eve Marsden an hour ago, and she accepted me."

"Accepted you?" And Bart walked across to the window and looked down into the street. Was it possible? Perhaps they were both dreaming, after all. He turned on his heel suddenly and faced his friend. Geoff had dropped into an easy chair and was blowing smoke-rings into the air.

"I can hardly realise it yet," he said without turning his head, and speaking in low, passionless tones. "It all came about so suddenly. She is pretty, though, Bart, awfully pretty. I did not know that she cared for me a bit. I don't think fellows ever properly understand girls; but, really, old man, she is one in a thousand, she is indeed. You can't imagine how sweet she is, how shy, how trusting. I'm going to try to make myself worthy of her. I felt a brute for a moment or two. You see, I was not quite prepared for her confidence. But it is all right now, I feel sure it is. A girl like that could make a statue love her."

Bart dropped slowly into an easy chair and rested his chin in the hollow of his hand. The room seemed to be spinning like a merry-go-round at a fair. Geoff's voice sounded indistinct and far away; his brain refused to grasp the reality of things; a numbness had crept over him from head to foot.

"Then Wiggs had not proposed to her?" he found himself asking at length, though he hardly recognized his own voice.

□

"Well, he had, in a sense, but she had put him off. She's in a rather tight place, poor girl. The professor is quite gone on Wiggs. I understand there was something of a scene yesterday after we left. She seemed awfully grateful to-day for a way out of it."

"But you can't marry her," Bart jerked out abruptly.

"She doesn't want to marry—at least, for years to come. She's awfully sensible, is Eve. Pretty girls as a rule have not much brains, but she is an exception. You've no idea how clever she is."

"Then you think she would not have accepted Wiggs even if you had not come along?"

"Oh, no, I don't say that. You see, the professor assured her that she would never have another chance, and I fancy she was inclined to agree with him. My coming along was a great surprise to her."

"Do you think she would have accepted me if I had gone first?"

"Of course I don't Accepted you! Come, come, Bart! Girls of the type of Eve only love one man at a time."

"But she might have married Wiggs."

"But she would never have loved him; she assured me that with her own lips. Wasn't it lucky that the man she did care for just came along in the nick of time?"

Bart did not reply for several seconds. He was slowly getting back to his normal self, and things were beginning to appear in their true perspective.

He was not convinced that Eve loved Geoff. She liked him, no doubt, as he liked her. He was infinitely to be preferred to David Wiggs. He could understand that she might hail his proposal as a happy deliverance, he was ready to believe that she was quite satisfied with her choice; but—

In the present instance it was a very big "but" from Bart's point of view. No arrangement could possibly be satisfactory that left him out of the reckoning. Had he been certain that Geoff loved Eve with all his heart, and that she loved him equally well in return, he would still have regarded the arrangement with gloomy apprehension. But since he could not bring himself to believe either proposition, he saw nothing but unhappiness for all concerned.

He tried his best not to betray his feelings. He almost hated Geoff for the moment.

(Continued on page 42)

THE COST OF A CRIME

The Story of Yielding to Temptation and the Tragedy Ensuing

By ANNIE S. SWAN

"BUT Turner, it's impossible. My uncle knew Reedham quite well. He could not have been taken in like that."

"But you've seen this Charlton yourself, Mr. Stephen," said Turner shrewdly. "More than once haven't you, and you did not recognize him?"

"You're right, but I can't believe it. I tell you it's impossible, why it was an awful thing to do."

"It was, but he'll stick at nothing, makin' love even to Miss Wrede an' his own wife livin', an' his very boy in the office beside him."

Stephen Currie stared helplessly.

"Of course, the lad Reedham was in the office, didn't he recognize him then?"

"No, he didn't, but Charlton he was always messin' round 'im. It was that that made me suspect fust. You see it warn't natural for a bounder like that to take such an interest in a boy from nowhere, so to speak, one that couldn't give him a leg up in his own ambitious schemes."

"And Turner, Mrs. Reedham married again. She's Mrs. George Lidgate now, don't you know that, and Charlton must know it."

"He may know it by now, he didn't afore he went away. But then I warn't sure quite. One day jes before he went to the Cape I went into his room sudden with a cable for him to look at, and he was sitting there with his goggles off, and I saw his eyes. Remember Reedham's eyes? They weren't like nobody else's; they seemed to look right through you. It gave me a start, and from that minute I was nearly sure, but to-day, when I saw him speak to the boy, I knew. What's got to be done, Mr. Stephen?"

"Well, in the first place my uncle will have to be told."

"And then the perlice, Mr. Stephen," said Turner anxiously. "Scotland Yard, ain't that our first duty?"

"Not just yet, Turner, we must go cautiously, because I don't grasp the truth just yet. We must be absolutely certain. My uncle is at Hyde Park Square, you say?"

"Yes, sir, they will come up from Southampton together."

"Well, if you wait just a moment I'll go back to town with you."

He stepped out of the room, and stood a moment irresolute in the hall. It was not half-past eight. Reflecting that it would take him at least three-quarters of an hour to get to Hyde Park Square, he decided to slip out without saying anything to the rest of the family.

To throw such a bomb in their midst and afterwards listen to the babel of horrified discussion, would be to waste the entire evening. Besides, before saying a word to a living creature he must make sure of the truth of this extraordinary, almost incredible story.

He believed it to be true. He could not see what benefit a man like Turner could achieve by concocting it. Besides he had not sufficient imagination. He rang a bell in the hall, and as he took down his overcoat the parlourmaid appeared looking somewhat surprised.

"Just help me on, Jane, and tell them I have been called out unexpectedly. Wait till I have been gone a few minutes. It's important business, tell my father I'll explain it when I come back."

"Yes, sir."

She pulled up the velvet collar of his coat, brushed a few specks from his shoulders, and gave him his gloves and hat. She observed the pallor of his face, and wondered whether he had got into any private scrape. She had not particularly liked the look of the individual she had admitted to the breakfast-room, his oily familiarity had incensed her greatly. Jane was one of the props of Fair Lawn, an excellent servant, priding herself on her long years of unimpeachable character.

She withdrew before the two passed out, which they did rather quietly, closing the inner door without a sound.

"I brought a 'ansom, sir," said Turner, as they turned into the dark shrubbery. "I guessed it would be Hyde Park Square, and told him to wait."

"That was wise, Turner, it will save time. I can drive you so far on your way, unless you'll come to Hyde Park Square too, and substantiate your story, I really think you ought."

"No, sir, not to-night, thank you. I've done enough. To-morrow if there's any dispute or trouble you may call on me, but now I must be getting 'ome to my wife and kids."

"Where do you live then?"

"Kennington, sir. If we go down 'aversack 'ill I can get a Elephant omnibus, that'll do me near enough."

The hansom was waiting outside the front gate under the light of the lamp which spanned it. Stephen gave his directions to the man, and they both got in. They spoke little as they drove rapidly down the hill, but Stephen Currie was in a fever of excitement.

At the junction of Euston Road and Hampstead Road Turner got out and sought the 'bus to convey him to the Elephant and Castle. Stephen continued his way alone. His hands were clenched, he bit his lips to keep down the rising excitement. His rage against Reedham was the noblest, manliest passion that had ever made ferment in his soul. It was this that had come between Katherine Wrede and himself, this double-dyed scoundrel, who not content with desolating his own home, had tried to wreck an innocent life—surely no punishment could be too great for such an one.

By the time he reached Hyde Park Square, just after nine, he had worked himself up into a perfect tempest of indignation.

"Mr. Currie is at home, sir, yes," said the butler. "A gentleman had just gone into the boudoir, Mr. Charlton, perhaps you know him. He was expected to dinner, but he did not come."

"Yes, I know him," said Stephen thickly. "Put me into the library and ask my uncle to come to me at once. Tell him, if you like, that it is a matter of life and death."

Stephen was perfectly familiar with the house, he went to the library himself and the butler proceeded to the boudoir to deliver his message.

Mr. Currie did not delay, he followed the butler immediately out of the room, leaving Charlton and Katherine alone together.

"What has happened, Stephen?" he said good-humoredly, seeing his nephew standing by the table with his overcoat on, as if in a hurry. "Have you been ordered South, or what, and is this good-bye?"

"No, Uncle Archie, it is nothing of that sort. Come in and shut the door. A terrible thing has happened."

"Where? Not at Fair Lawn, I hope? I saw your father to-day. He said all were well."

"No, no, we're all right, Uncle Archie. It's something else—a horrible thing. The man Charlton you've had so long, in whom you've placed such implicit confidence, who—damn him—has put me out with Katherine——"

"Softly, softly, Stephen; I don't allow that kind of language in my house. What have you to say against Charlton? Remember that moderation brings conviction."

"But, Uncle Archie, I can't be moderate about such an awful thing," stammered Stephen. Do you know what has happened? —who he is? He isn't Charlton at all. He's John Reedham."

The old man stared at him stupidly, his ruddy face beginning to look a little grey in the soft light.

"Yes, I tell you it's true. Turner has found it out. He came to me to-night. He says there's no doubt at all about it. Isn't there anything about the man that convinces you? You've seen him often. Did you ever suspect?"

Still Archibald Currie did not speak. A weight seemed to settle upon his soul. Incredible as the suggestion might seem, some inward intuition pointed to it as true.

"I can't take it in," he murmured at last, and feebly like a man who has been suddenly stricken. For he had just welcomed the man of whom he had spoken to his inmost home. He had felt his own heart warm to him, he had seen the light in Katherine's eyes. If this were true——. But surely, he told himself, God would never permit it to happen.

"Well, I don't wonder. I couldn't at first. It was only after Turner began to explain it a little, to fill in the details, that it took shape as a likely thing in my mind. It was through two things he betrayed himself—his attention to the boy Leslie, and one day Turner saw him without his glasses, then he knew. And all the time he had been lodging with a woman at Camden Town who used to be a servant in his house at Norwood. Turner has been to the house and interviewed her, and she has known it all along. Of course, she has been in his pay."

Archibald Currie straightened his bent shoulders suddenly, and turned towards the door. His face had now become very white, and there were depths of anguish in his eyes which betokened the severity of the blow.

"Charlton is in the house now," he said steadily. "We will go in and clear this awful thing up once and for all. Come."

For the shadow of a moment only Stephen drew back. For the ordeal they were about to face was one from which even the least sensitive might shrink. Archibald Currie—courteous, but obviously impatient—began to lead the way. They crossed the hall, went under the little archway, and he opened the boudoir door.

It was a pretty picture within. Katherine was fond of golden hues, of amber and saffron intermingled; the room was a perfect harmony of colour and tone, and she, in her sweeping robe of softest brown velvet, harmonized with it. She was sitting on the couch, Charlton in front of her, talking eagerly. The light on her face came from within. She turned with evident reluctance to the door, and distinctly frowned at sight of Stephen Currie following her uncle. But she rose, and Charlton rose with her, both turning simultaneously to the door.

Archibald Currie stepped forward. His tall, spare figure seemed to have taken on a new and pathetic dignity. His white face terrified Katherine.

Charlton, seeing the menace in Stephen Currie's eyes, knew that his hour had come.

"Charlton," said Archibald Currie in a low voice, which, however, was calm and judicial, "my nephew has come here to-night to bring a terrible and almost incredible charge. He says that your name is not Charlton, that you are John Reedham. What have you to say?"

The silence was so intense that the sound of their breathing seemed to fill the room. Charlton put his hand up, nor did it tremble, and took the blue glasses from his face.

"Yes," he said, in a low, clear voice, perfectly heard in every corner of the room, "I am John Reedham."

CHAPTER XII

PAID IN FULL

KATHERINE gave a little cry.

Archibald Currie turned to her with an infinity of tenderness, and touched her arm.

"Go upstairs, my dear. I will come to you in a few moments. Go now."

He guided her to the door where she stopped and threw up her head. There were no tears in her eyes, but her expression Archibald Currie carried with him to the day of his death. It was the one barrier in the way of his complete forgiveness of John Reedham.

"Be merciful," she whispered.

He put her outside the door, gently closed it, and walked back.

Reedham stood silently there, not a muscle of his face moving, looking with unseeing eyes upon Stephen Currie's flushed, indignant face.

They waited, both for the directing hand.

It came in a moment, making itself felt with no sort of indecision, He was ever the man for a crisis, this glorious old Scotchman, with the iron and wine of kings' blood in his veins.

While other men hesitated over the wisdom of this course or that, he determined, and it was done.

"I wish to speak to you privately, Stephen, no, not a word here. Go to the library. I will come to you there."

Stephen went at once. It was a moment for obedience, and the tone of his uncle's voice, the expression of his face, admitted of no demur. He was a compelling force, rather than an imperious one, however, moral suasion acting instantaneously on the mind it sought to influence.

"You will wait here," the old man said then, turning to Reedham, "I have your word that you will wait here till I come back to deal with you? I promise you it will not be long."

"I will wait," said Reedham quietly, and the next moment he was alone.

Archibald Currie stood for a moment in the middle of the hall, ere he went to his nephew, and in that wonderful moment he reviewed the whole ground and saw the way clear. But a colossal task was before him, the most colossal, perhaps, that he had ever essayed, to shut the mouths and seal the lips of other men.

Stephen was waiting impatiently by the table and sprang forward with eager words on his lips.

"Quiet, a moment, boy, it is I who will speak first."

Again Stephen was hushed, and stood waiting for what should come.

"You and I have not been so very intimate, Stephen," began the old man; "we have never understood one another fully. Our outlook upon things has been different all along the line."

"I suppose it has, Uncle Archie, though I don't know what that has to do with the case."

"It has everything to do with it, for I am going to try and find a platform upon which we can meet. I am going to ask you to co-operate with me to save a man's soul. I wonder whether I shall succeed?"

"You mean you are going to wait, to let Reedham off scot free!" was the harsh reply. "By God no, I can't do that; sorry not to oblige, but just think of what he has done. Why, the mere embezzlement was nothing to this! Think of all the lives he has ruined!"

"It is because I do think of them I want to act for the best now," said the old man patiently, and in no way resenting his nephew's attitude, which was not only natural, but by the circumstances entirely justified.

"Listen, Stephen, you speak truly enough when you say ruined lives, but if the whole story is exposed now, there will be outer darkness indeed. Take Reedham's wife, for instance. She is very happy with Lidgate; happier, perhaps, than she deserves to be, for her taste in marrying, but we must not judge any woman. Take Lidgate, who up till now has had no happiness in life, what sense would there be in throwing this bomb into their home?"

"But it's immoral!" pursued Stephen. "She isn't his wife, and no amount of charitable humbug will make her so."

"Your words are within the strict province of truth but I hold to what I say. She is not strong, your father tells me she is to have a child in a few months. Picture to yourself, Stephen, what will be the result if you persist in your intention of proclaiming this wretched story on the housetops."

Stephen remained silent, and the lines of his mouth relaxed. He was not a hard man by nature, though circumstances and training had given him the outward semblance of one. And there was something here, some influence emanating from his uncle, which somehow altered as in a flash, his whole philosophy.

"He made love to Katherine," he said sullenly. "That surely in your eyes would be the unforgivable sin?"

"He has never made love to Katherine. He has held himself so aloof from us, accepted so few of our offers of intimacy, that I have resented it. At least, we must be just, Stephen."

"What would you do with him, then? It doesn't seem right, but I'd like to hear what you're going to do. By-the-bye," he added suddenly, "do you really believe you'll find him there when you go back? By this time he is probably out in the Edgware Road."

Archibald Currie faintly smiled.

"He is there," was all he said.

"Stephen," he added after a moment. "I think you are going to help me in this. Remember that any fool can send a man down. It takes a better man than himself to lift him up. If you can promise to hold your tongue, Reedham shall go out to London, out of our lives, and the place shall know him no more. Will you promise?"

"I could keep quiet, but there's Turner, the man who ferreted things out."

"I can silence him, I think," replied Archibald Currie.

"But what will you do with Reedham? How shall we be certain that he won't turn up again in a new role?"

"He will go to the war, Stephen, he has spoken of it already."

There was a moment's silence, great issues hung in the balance. There was a brief struggle between personal resentment and something nobler in Stephen Currie's mind.

"All right, Uncle Archie. I don't know what you're driving at, or whether I'm doing right, but I'll do what you ask. I'll keep my mouth shut, it's only ten days anyhow, the C.I.V.'s embark on Thursday week."

"Thank you, my boy."

Archibald Currie came nearer, and looked for a moment with a strange kindliness into his nephew's face.

"I'm a lonely man, Stephen. Many have wondered why I have never married. But for my own folly I might have had a son like you to comfort my old age. The solitary life is the price I have paid for—for the time when I have went down into the pit and another man lifted me up."

Stephen Currie stared in bewilderment, scarcely crediting what he heard.

"Uncle Archie, it can't be true! Why you, you have always been the model we've been taught to regard and copy from afar."

"I speak the truth, lad. All the eccentricities which have puzzled and vexed my relatives and others, have been my reasonable atonement. The men who could have sent me down refrained. It was Abraham Willett, and he lived to see his mercy justified."

Stephen continued to stare, and a little rush of affection warmed his heart and went out to his uncle.

"I'm glad you told me this, Uncle Archie. I—I won't forget it, and it has helped me to understand."

Their hands met and the compact was sealed. With what different feelings did Stephen Currie leave Hyde Park Square! He returned to Hampstead a better, because a more merciful man, and he never breathed to his home circle or to others what had passed in his uncle's library that night.

Archibald Currie saw his nephew off, and then went back to the boudoir, this time with a heavier, more reluctant step.

He even paused more than once, and the lines on his face deepened, until they seemed to have been ploughed by some invisible force.

But his mind was clear, his decision quite unshaken he knew what he would do with John Reedham, but, he was wounded in his dearest part.

Reedham was sitting down in a curious attitude, with his hands crossed on his knees, his now uncurtained eyes staring into space. He drew a sharp breath and stood up, when the door opened, as a man would stand to receive the sentence he expects, but scarcely dreads.

The old man closed the door and came forward.

"I am ready," he said slowly, "to bear what you have to say."

The life had gone from the tones which had so often breathed hope and encouragement to Reedham's ears, and the coldness of the features seemed to say there was no hope.

"I have nothing to say. I am guilty, sentence me, Believe me I am ready to take that sentence, which has been too long delayed."

The old man raised his hand with a slight impatience.

"The motive might be explained in detail. It is impossible to believe that a man like you should have entered upon his life deliberately, without taking the smallest trouble to review possible consequences. What was the idea?"

"I was down. I wanted to get up. I vowed that I should get up by my own efforts. You gave me my chance—that is all."

"Yes, yes, that part I understand, but your wife? Had you told her all might have been well. Man, did you never pause to think what would inevitably happen to an unprotected woman? Either she comes to grief wrongly, by being exposed to temptation in circumstances which make it difficult for her to withstand it, or—or the other man is given his chance. It is inconceivable that you should have lived as you have done for the past years without informing yourself of your wife's welfare, of finding some means to reassure her. Nothing can ever explain that away, Reedham, in my opinion it is the heaviest part of your guilt."

Reedham bowed his head. It was just censure. He had not a word to say.

"Then the boy?"

"The boy knows, Mr. Currie, I revealed myself to him to-day when he told me that his mother had married again."

"I see. Do you realize, I wonder, what has happened even now? The woman who was your poor wife, and who is now a happy one, for Lidgate is an honorable man, and he has loved her for a long time. She is to have a child in a few months' time. This I fear will kill her."

Reedham's face became as that of the dead.

"Need she know?" he asked in a hollow voice. "Let me go for her sake. I promise that before the morning light I shall have passed from the world of men and gone to take my just punishment at the hands of the great Judge."

Archibald Currie rebuked him with one scathing word.

"There is another way out. I offer it to you, not for your own sake, but for the sake of those to whose suffering you did not give sufficient heed. Listen, this is Thursday, on Saturday another boat goes to the Cape. You will go by it." Reedham tried to answer him but his tongue clave to the roof of his mouth.

"What you do there matters little to me. The best course would, probably, be to offer yourself for service at the war. Meantime the secret will be kept. The whole object of our lives, of those I mean who are in possession of the facts, will be to keep them from your wife."

"But the boy!" gasped Reedham. "He will never be able to keep it; and, further, he will not leave me. He only left me to-night when I promised that some way would be considered whereby we could be together. To-night he has altered my whole outlook, and left only the desire to get away with him where none could come between us."

"Selfish even in this," murmured the old man; and even as he spoke and saw Reedham wince, a sense of his own injustice struck him. "His mother could not spare him. It could never be explained to her satisfaction."

"She could spare him, I think," said Reedham sadly and humbly. "So far as I can gather from Leslie, she has put him outside. Perhaps we need not wonder at it. He is like me, they say; and, anyhow, he is a too painful reminder of the past."

"It is incredible. Do you see what havoc has been wrought even in natural affections by your conduct? Do you realize, I wonder, the extent and magnitude of it?"

Reedham bowed his head.

"I think I do. I can't speak, but I see it. My God, if I did not I should not be where I am at this present moment?"

Archibald Currie took a turn across the room. Reedham's words concerning the boy added a new complication. Once more his active brain had to include that fact in his sweep of the horizon of affairs.

"You say positively he will not leave you?"

"To-night when he opened his heart to me," said the man—and the misery of his soul, the rent passion of his heart, betrayed themselves in the harsh vibration of his voice—"he begged me to take him away to another country, or at least to let him live with me where I am now. I pointed out to him how impossible it was. He would hardly leave me. He walked to this very door with me, and, but for my promise to you, I could not have left him even then."

"Would he go home, do you think?" asked the old man sharply.

"He promised that he would."

At that moment there was a knock at the door, and the butler appeared, with seeming reluctance.

"Someone for Mr. Charlton, sir—a young lad. He is waiting outside."

"Show him in," said his master curtly; and Reedham stood up more like a man than he had been at any time during that painful interview.

A moment more and Leslie appeared. The lad's face was white and drawn; under his eyes lurked great shadows. He was visibly laboring under intense excitement.

"Excuse me, father," he said tremblingly. "And please, sir, don't be angry," he added to Mr. Currie; "but I couldn't stop away. I went home. My mother had gone to the theatre, and I left a message that I would not be home to-night. I thought I would walk home with you, father, and stay there. I—I can't go home—to the other home—never any more."

He walked to his father's side and stood there, and his hand slipped into his. The old man's face softened, the hardness died out of his heart. He cleared his throat.

"You, at least, bear no malice, my boy. Yes, I know all," he said kindly. "You are willing, I see, to stand by your father, even after all he has done."

"I will never leave him, sir," said the boy quietly. "He belongs to me, and I to him. We will stay together now for always."

"Great is your faith!" said the old man, with a faint sigh. "See that you become worthy of it, Reedham. Now go. To-morrow I shall see you both, by which time I shall have formed a plan. Probably I shall find some occupation for you at the Cape, though not, of course, the former responsible post. In the meantime I will see your mother, my lad, and try and explain it to her so that her suspicions are not aroused. Now go."

He held out his hand to the boy, but he did not offer it to Reedham.

As they passed out, however, he called him back.

"It is love that has saved the sinner ever since the Lord Jesus Christ died," he said. "Take this lesson to your heart, Reedham, for the boy's sake, live henceforth the upright life before God and man."

This time the hand was offered but Reedham shook his head.

"Not yet," he said, in a low voice. "Some day, please God, but not yet, I cannot thank you. There are no words graven for the purpose."

He passed out, the boy clinging to him, and the door was shut.

The strain lifted, the old man permitted his feelings for a moment to have vent. He wept even as he prayed.

With the second closing of the door there was a swish of silk on the stair, and Katherine Wrede came in.

"Uncle Archie," she said in a low voice, "what have you done? It is no use to send me away or to tell me I must not ask questions. It will be best to tell me everything. Indeed, it is the only way."

He saw that it was, and in a few words he put her in the possession of the full facts and of the terms on which Reedham had left the house.

She listened quietly, and then, without comment rose and kissed him.

"I thank God for you, Uncle Archie. I thank God. But the story is not ended yet."

On Saturday afternoon from Southampton Dock sailed John Reedham and his boy. There were none to bid them God-speed, or to speak a word of farewell, but they needed none. They were sufficient one to the other. And in Reedham's heart there was a peace that had not lain there since the blight had fallen on his life. But he was impatient to be gone. Every moment now increased the fear lest any chance word might betray the secret to Leslie's mother. She had been entirely reassured by Archibald Currie, who had brought to bear upon the matter all the tact and diplomacy for which he was known.

When the boat began to glide out from its landing stage Reedham went below, his feelings were too much for him, he would be alone to unburden them. In the stateroom he found a letter.

Within there were only these words:

To wish you God-speed and hope, from your friend,

KATHERINE WREDE.

Reedham pressed the letter to his lips, then very carefully hid it in his breast. It would never leave him, he vowed, so long as life lasted.

So passed John Reedham once more from the world of men. Those who had known him kept the secret well, until the time came when there was not such pressing need for silence.

In the month of November Lidgate's wife died in childbed. After one brief year of happiness, he had to return to the soiltary life.

Archibald Currie and Katherine were at Clere Minster when the brief intimation appeared in the Telegraph. Katherine saw it first and passed it over in silence for her guardian to read.

"Ah!" he said, drawing a long breath, and that was all.

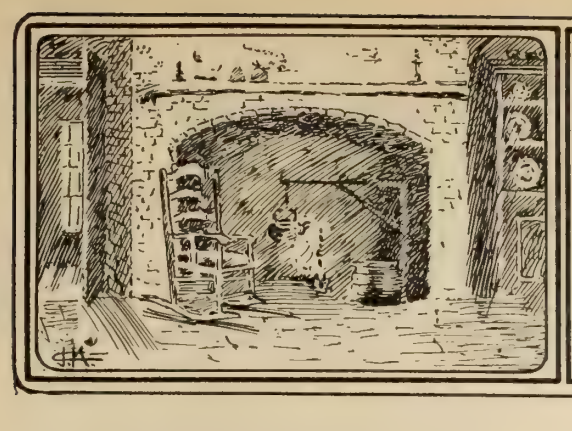
So, step by step, the drama was unfolded. A year later, Archibald Currie also entered upon his glorious rest, leaving the world incomparably poorer for his passing. Contrary to all expectations, his fortune was discovered to be comparatively small, accounted for, of course, by the fact that he had disbursed it so lavishly in his life. What was left, with the exception of Clere Minster, went absolutely to charity. Clere was left to Katherine to do with as she willed. Except for the old house, of no great value, she was as penniless as when she first came, a subdued and hopeless girl, from the dreary pension at Bruges.

She was not without friends, however, and received more than one offer of a home.

But Katherine, after converting Clere Minster into a Home of Rest for certain derelicts who had struggled on the drearier shores of life, left England.

She went to those who needed her most.

THE END



AROUND THE HEARTH

Written for the Canadian Home Journal

By JENNIE ALLEN MOORE

"A grey eye is still and sly,
A roguish is the brown;
But in the black eye's sparkling spell
Mystery and mischief dwell."
The eye of blue is ever true;

JUST IN PASSING

SITTING behind me in the observation cabin of the boat Princess Royal, between Vancouver and Victoria, were two women talking. I could not help hearing the conversation, which was a friendly one, dealing with their traveling experiences, the leaving of their homes, and many little details of family life. One exclaimed, "How I love to study faces, don't you?" "Yes," the other replied, "I do; faces always attract me. There seems so much written in some countenances. Don't you think so?"

"A little extract I had once read came into my mind—"Every time we look into a face, we are gazing through a window. The external face, the form, the color, the contour, is simply the glass, and through that we see the individual. If we can see peace enthroned, with joy and content, intellect and kindly love, then are we prepared to pass our judgment as to the beauty of the face." And so it would seem that in the expression the beauty consists, rather than the form or coloring. People do not agree as to what constitutes beauty in consequence of the varied types. There are so many really beautiful faces in the world, perfect of form and contour, aristocratic, self-possessed and intellectual. There is the piquant, saucy-faced beauty, with irregular features, yet pretty and bewitching. We have the pale face, the rich in coloring, the perfect complexion, the different colors of eyes, shading of hair, form of mouth, shape of nose; and from these details physiognomists delineate the character of the individual.

The most perfectly formed face can be spoiled by the expression. The most exquisite mouth can be disfigured by a sarcastic smile, or a scornful curl of the lip, and "whether the eye be black or blue," if it looks coldly and proudly from beneath long sweeping lashes it does not draw admiration. Faces attract and repel only as the spirit through the outward expression is revealed. The plainest face can radiate a kindly interest, a cheerful optimism, an intelligent brain; the faded eye can look out peacefully on all mankind, the unshapely mouth may show nought of discontent, or sneer. Thus far I can discriminate, study and admire, but have no faith in my own judgment further, and do not fully endorse that verse I quoted, because there are blue eyes that are not true, and grey eyes that are noble, and brown eyes that are sad; but, say, black eyes are mysterious, like great unfathomable wells, inscrutable and full of mystery.

~

I HAVE a fault of procrastinating in some matters, but, really, I never noticed that I had until after I took a certain trip some years ago, and we all bunched together in the Pullman—there were just eight of us—and in the twilight amused ourselves in various ways, one man undertaking to tell our peculiar qualities of character by our features. "You are apt to postpone anything, and it often needs some impetus to force you to perform certain work." He was stopped right there and told he was wrong, and I believed he was, but I kept track of myself somewhat after that, and he was right. I do put off things that I do not like doing—mending for example. It piles up, and up, and, oh, the effort to start at that pile and work to the bottom! It will never get ahead of me again, I vow, but it does.

Then there is the cleaning of the silver. Those two jobs are my bugbears in housekeeping. I leave it until some unexpected company is announced, and in the preparation for their arrival, in desperation, attack the tarnished silverware, and when it reflects credit on my efforts, and shines and sparkles, I am certain it will never be left so long again. But it is.

Now, if it is true that our countenances reveal so much of our character, and if every one had the gift of reading them, what an interesting time we would have! How anyone can correctly read a face, head or hand, is something beyond me, and is a science of which I profess utter ignorance. Do not ask me if I believe in it, for some readings strike the truth so hard, some revelations so amaze me, that I am unable to answer. There seems something very mysterious about it all, a complete stranger being able to unclothe your faults and reveal your thoughts, explain your past and foretell your future.

And how we all love to dip into the obscure, to have unfolded the closed book, and peep with inquisitive eyes into the years ahead! How can they do it, we inquire, when a person looks at our palm, and describes our home, and our children, tells about our finances, our friends, enemies, travels, health, abilities, and what not? There are many forces in this old world we do not understand, and among them is this occult science of clairvoyancy, mental telepathy, mind-reading, what you will; but as for me I am on the outside.

~

MEETING old acquaintances, and discussing old times, inquiries about old friends, usually begin with, "Oh, yes; John Brown, is he there still? How is he getting along?" This "getting along" meaning usually his financial progress, but bringing in its wake many details of home and family life, their prospects, their marriages, births and deaths. And how interesting it is to see the eagerness with which people listen to old friends and neighbors, inquiring individually for each member of a family, and how they are succeeding in life. Are they still satisfied with the old conditions, or launched out and away from the associations of their early life? Have they made a name for themselves? Has life been a success?

Listening to these conversations found me sifting through my brain for a definition of what a successful life means. To accumulate money, and live on a grand scale, travel around and make a big display, does that denote success? Doesn't it count that a man toiling humbly and faithfully, living an earnest, honest life, bringing up his family to regard truth and right as their highest ideals, and yet remaining what we call a poor man; doesn't that count for a success, or must we call such a life a failure? Ask the children of a man who has gone quietly on year after year, giving them an education, preparing them for useful lives, setting an example of industry and cheerfulness, inspiring their minds with lofty thought, yet failing to pile up riches, if their father was a failure. Methinks I see the indignation flash as they tell you he was the grandest man in all the world. A success? None more so.

Years hence, ask the children of a woman whom I visited in the West, if their mother was a success. She said this to me: "There is one thing I try to impress upon my children, not to do mean things. I have done a few things that I deeply regret. They were not bad, but what one would call small, and somehow they stick, and every little while they crop up in my mind, and make me wish I could forget them. So I instil it into my children that it does not pay to act meanly, for the future years will bring retribution. We haven't much money, but we can be rich in ourselves, and we do have a good time, for I missed so much in my childhood that I am determined my children shall enjoy, and one is plenty of good advice," she laughingly added. Who of us but can recall some mean thing we have said or done? On the spur of the moment, under great provocation, the word or act has been committed, and remorse drives it home occasionally "lest we forget—lest we forget!"

~

WE attended a large church in Seattle. My friend whispered, "I am so sorry our own minister is away to-day. He is a grand orator. Some special service in Victoria has secured him for the occasion." The choir was splendid. As we settled down for the sermon, all hats were removed. There was no request made, it was the adopted ruling of the church. They were simply held in the lap, and as quietly replaced when the sermon was ended. It was so sensible that other churches might well pattern after—no noise, no fuss, a matter-of-fact proceeding, that attracted no attention, and gave unbounded satisfaction to those sitting behind wearers of large hats.

The minister was a stranger, an old man, and hence the disappointed remark. Talk of power, rhetoric, and eloquence—I could not resist it—my program furnished the paper, my friend the pencil, and I took notes, some of which I want to tell you about, and leave you to draw some conclusions. The text was, "Some cried one thing, and some another." He applied these words to the physical, mental, and spiritual necessities of our lives, to conditions educational, social and political. Some claim that vegetable growth is what makes a person strong, and prove it by the horse, because its food is of the vegetable variety. Then others try to show by the daring and courage and strength of the lion that animal food is what creates such power and vigor.

Some people have been taught as religiously as their prayers, "Early to bed, and early to rise." Others claim that to rise early, before the sun has risen to dispel the noxious miasmi of the night vapors, is to invite asthma and other diseases. There are people who cry out against denominational religion being taught in colleges, saying that students should be allowed full scope to form their own religious beliefs, unbiased and unprejudiced. Others believe in molding young people's minds in religious matters as an important part of their education. Some say that the study of ancient languages, Greek and Latin, is a waste of time, and advise that students devote their energies to more practical knowledge; others advise just the reverse. There is one set of people who say, "Education makes the man," and another who say, "The man makes himself," that the most influential men are those who have never been inside of colleges. There is a diversity of opinion on all reform, on matters of prohibition, franchise, protective policy, free trade, and financial basis.

Then he wound up his remarks by a masterpiece of eloquence calling upon his hearers to notice the lethargy of a people who have come to a time when they wonder at nothing. "Even the birth of a nation in a day does not excite us. It is high time we awakened from our mental and spiritual slumber. We have to reach conclusions on questions of education, of constitution and government by our own intelligence. We must use the pickaxe of our own intellect to dig out of our brains, and the dynamite of our soul's convictions to search out of our own experience, the fundamental principle of things. We are independent agents, we must assert our own individuality in our investigations. Do not belong to the know-nothing party, who cannot exercise their reasoning faculties, and who do not prove by their conduct or speech that they are free agents, or even responsible beings." This is the sermon in a nutshell—draw your own inferences.

~

THE loss of the Titanic will, by the time this is published, be, to the majority of people, a subject which will have passed into history; but, as I write my page, the world is passing through a nightmare of agony and suspense unequalled by any catastrophe it has known in the form of a marine disaster. From the first intimation of the terrible calamity until the last harrowing tale from the survivors had been heard, the people of two continents, at least, lived at a tension so great as to be indescribable. There were four forms of suffering—those at sea, who lived through the horrors of that shipwreck, and who, without protection, felt the physical discomforts of cold and exposure on the open sea, and watched that queen of the ocean dive to her death, carrying their nearest and dearest down to a grave in the icy waters—a grave two miles deep.

There were the anxious relatives and personal friends of those who set sail on that ill-fated steamer, whose minds, torn by hope and anxiety, could not grope with the awfulness of the peril of their loved ones. Then the great sympathetic heart of those outside the two realms—the public at large, who watched, and read, and listened, and were awe-stricken at the appalling loss of life; and whose hearts were swept with waves of pity, grief, and sympathy.

Of the sixteen hundred souls who perished we draw a curtain over their suffering, and only dwell on their bravery and self-sacrifice. There are heroes buried with the Titanic whose names will live only in the memory of those who mourn their untimely death. There were men of unlimited usefulness, wide influence, gifted, talented, wealthy, who went down side by side with the ignorant, obscure, and unknown. Rank and money profited nothing, gained no advantage; only this was counted, that weakness held first place, and was supported by strength. Gallant, chivalrous manhood stood the test, and all ages will honor and reverence the fearless men who stood back and placed helpless women and children in the lifeboats, and faced their doom, bravely and unflinchingly.

The financial loss, enormous though it be, is as nothing compared to the loss of human life. The millions of dollars expended in perfecting what was supposed to be an unsinkable ship, the personal belongings of many wealthy and notable people on board, the treasures picked up in travel in foreign lands, the valuable papers and manuscripts of world-famed authors and journalists, representing years of study and research, the thousands of letters that will never reach their destination, the entire belongings of emigrants, and the luxurious palace itself; all went to the bottom.

What was the cause of that dreadful accident to the ship? Where shall the blame be attached? "Some cry one thing, and some another." Not all the inquiring committees, nor the conjectures, nor the censure, personal and general, that can be heaped on individuals or companies can alter the fact, nor place the fault; but it can evolve a better order of control, and sufficient lifeboats to save passengers and crew, and less desire for speedy transit. It has been a severe experience, but lessons never to be forgotten should be the outcome of this national tragedy.

Silverware of Unrivalled Reputation

The durability of 1847 ROGERS BROS. silverware is beyond question. For 64 years it has been proving its wearing qualities. To-day it is the standard in silver plate.

1847 ROGERS BROS. XS TRIPLE

is guaranteed by the largest makers of silverware in the world. Local dealers everywhere sell this famous

"Silver Plate that Wears"

Send for catalogue "E 48" illustrating the most popular patterns.

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO.
(International Silver Co. Successor)
MERIDEN, CONN.

New York Chicago
San Francisco
Hamilton, Canada

With the Journal's Juniors

A Corner for the Small Person

By COUSIN CLOVER

Prizes will be given to the first girl and to the first boy reader of the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL sending in the correct answers to all of the puzzles in the Journal Juniors' Department in this issue.

THE Journal Junior readers, I am sure, will be pleased to have an opportunity of solving puzzles. I feel that they are just as bright and will solve these puzzles just as easy as any other class of girls and boys I know of.

We purpose offering puzzles in every issue and will publish the correct answers in the following number.

COUSIN CLOVER.

The Puzzle of the Spite Fence

FOUR men together bought an octagon-shaped piece of property. Each of them built a house, a garage, a chicken-coop and planted a tree. The accompanying diagram shows the exact shape of property, and the location of the houses, garages, chicken-coops, and trees.

In course of time differences of opinion arose, friendship ceased, and thereafter each household had its own entrance to the property. Matters grew worse instead of better, and, finally, the spite fence appeared. To build the fence the property had to be divided into four pieces of exactly similar size and shape, and each piece was to contain one house, one garage, one chicken-coop, one tree, and have one gateway. Can you show on the accompanying diagram how the property was divided? Look for solution in July Number.

How Did He Change the Bill?

A YOUNG lady walked into a drug store and ordered a drink of soda water, the price of which was five cents. In payment she tendered a one dollar bill.

"Sorry," said the clerk at the soda fountain as he glanced at the contents of the cash drawer, "I can't make change for one dollar, but if you have a five dollar bill I can give you $4.95 cents change."

She handed him the five-dollar bill and received $4.95 in change, although the drug clerk had not been able to make change for a one dollar bill.

Can you explain why? If you can't, look for the solution in July Number.

(Continued on page 41)

A JUNE LUNCHEON

PREPARED BY
MARY H. NORTHEND

WITH the approach of the summer season, the matter of entertaining is greatly simplified. The profusion of flowers then readily procurable solves the difficulty of decorations, and the variety in kind and coloring leaves nothing to be desired in the way of proper material for devising artistic effects. Then, too, the mildness of climate offers an opportunity for open-air socials, with the result that the hostess is afforded a broader scope in which to plan attractive affairs than at any other season of the year.

The month of roses is particularly lavish in floral display, and the many events with which it is crowded—weddings, commencements, etc.—affords abundant opportunity for the ingenuity of the hostess to manifest itself.

Roses are first and foremost associated with June affairs, yet there are several other flowers that as readily lend themselves to effective adornment. The simple bachelor's-buttons may be mentioned in this class, and when combined with proper greenery serve as an admirable central feature.

One scheme sets forth the value of this pretty flower very well. Here it is shown massed with its own foliage in a bark jardiniere, its light and dark blue tints blending harmoniously with the dull brown of the bark finish. A mat of galox leaves, repeating the coloring of the jardiniere in a slightly darker tone can serve as a foundation, and ropes of these same lovely leaves stretch from the mat to the table corners. Small crystal holders, equipped with blue tapers, can dot the outline of the main feature at intervals, completing the color theme of blue and brown. The place cards may be simple, white cards, attached by inch wide blue ribbons to the lower part of the jardiniere.

The table complete is simple yet most attractive. The decorations permit of abundant room for the placing of food, yet give no hint of scantiness. The coloring of the bachelor's-buttons, which, as the main feature, dominate the decorations, is repeated wherever possible, and as a foil for their soft blue tones, dull shades of brown with a glint of golden, is introduced with excellent effect.

Whether such a luncheon table is arranged indoors or upon the porch, the decorations of room or verandah should be of like nature. Nothing will harmonize so well with this bachelor's-button theme as more bachelor's-buttons, and in consequence they should be given the preference. Greenery, such as ferns, may be grouped with the blossoms in low bowls or rustic baskets, arranged about the room, and the result will be far more pleasing than if other flowers were used to adorn the room proper, even though they should be entirely harmonious in tone.

LADY FINGER SANDWICHES

PEAS WITH LAMB CIRCLES

CREAMED SHRIMPS

The table decorations completed, the next consideration is the menu. As a help towards its solution, the following is offered in the light of a suggestion.

Egg Canapes
Cream of Asparagus Soup
Radishes Croutons Nuts
Creamed Shrimps Lamb Circles
Fruit Salad Peach Pudding
Lady Finger Sandwiches Coffee

EGG CANAPES—Mash the yolks of six hard-boiled eggs with a little butter, to form a paste. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Spread on rounds of crisp toast, and garnish each with a slice of stuffed olive and a spoonful of hard-boiled egg white, chopped fine.

CREAM OF ASPARAGUS SOUP—Boil two bunches of asparagus until tender, then rub through a coarse sieve and season. With one teaspoonful of flour mix one teaspoonful of butter, and stir into one pint of hot milk. Add the asparagus and boil for ten minutes. Cook the tips separately, and add to the soup just before serving. Serve hot, and drop a tablespoonful of whipped cream into each plate.

CREAMED SHRIMPS—Remove shrimps from can several hours before using. Break each one into two or three pieces and put in cool place. Put into kettle 1 cup strained tomato juice, 1 cup water, 1 tablespoon butter, and ¼ teaspoon curry powder. When this boils add 1 tablespoon flour rubbed smooth in a little water. Stir constantly until sauce is thick; season with salt and pepper, add shrimps and cook two minutes longer. Serve in patty shells, garnish with whole shrimps and green.

LAMB CIRCLES — One large pint chopped lamb, 1 scant pint of fine bread crumbs, 1½ teaspoon salt, 1½ teaspoon pepper, 1 tablespoon butter, 1 egg, 1 tablespoon chopped onion, milk to moisten the whole. Add seasoning to bread; when well mixed add to meat; add beaten eggs, and lastly the milk. Form in circles, roll in flour and bread crumbs, and fry in hot fat.

FRUIT SALAD — To make this salad, remove the pulp from three blood oranges and tear it in small pieces with a fork, discarding all the tough membrane. Seed and cut in bits a cupful of white grapes. Mix the orange and grape pulp together, draining off the superfluous juice. Blanc and shred half a pound of almonds, mix with the fruit pulp, and pour over all the following dressing: Beat to a froth one egg, and add half a cup of strained honey and three tablespoons of maraschino Beat thoroughly together before turning over salad.

PEACH PUDDING: Make a plain blanc mange, using one quart of milk, and also a peach jelly flavored with fruit syrup and colored pink with a few drops of cochineal or color paste. Wet a plain mold and pour in the blanc mange and gelatine in alternate layers, allowing one to harden before the next is added. Just before serving time, unmold and garnish with slices of fresh or preserved peaches and Maraschino cherries. Serve with plain cream and sugar.

LADY FINGER SANDWICHES—Split the lady fingers, spread a layer of strawberry jam between them, and tie each sandwich with narrow ribbon.

PEACHES IN LEMON JELLY—For a quart mold make a quart of lemon jelly. (Always prepare enough jelly to fill the mold without considering the article to be molded.) Have the peaches chilled, as it shortens the process greatly; cut them in halves and take out the stones; peel and rub over the outside with the cut side of a lemon, to keep them from discoloring; put a blanched almond in the place of the stone, dip the other half of the peach in liquid jelly, and press the halves together; let stand on the ice until firmly joined. Do not prepare all the peaches at once; when one is in place prepare another. Let a very thin layer of jelly form in the bottom of the mold; dip a peach in liquid jelly and place it on the firm jelly and against the side of the mold; put a teaspoonful of jelly around it. Arrange also two or three thin slices of citron or angelica cut in the shape of peach leaves against the side of the mold, to which they will adhere, if the mold has been properly chilled and the leaves dipped in jelly. Add peaches, leaves and jelly as are required to fill the mold. Serve with whipped cream.

SIZE

is no guarantee of the purity or value of the contents of the bottle

IN the process of manufacture if we were to use fillers in our Jams, Catsup, etc., we could give our customers twice the quantity we now send out.

A person is often tempted to purchase the large size bottle without due consideration to the quality or purity of the contents.

If it is purity you want then be sure the package bears this label

E D S

There is a great temptation in these days of increased cost of living to buy cheap and adulterated foods. But what is the use of living unless you can eat pure wholesome food.

Almost any grocer keeps for sale our preserves, Jams, Jellies, Marmalade, Catsup and Grape Juice.

E. D. SMITH
WINONA - ONT.

NA-DRU-CO

NA-DRU-CO ROYAL ROSE TALCUM POWDER

THE dainty embodiment of the queenly rose's fragrance. Made of best Italian Talc, ground to impalpable fineness, to which are added soothing, healing, antiseptic ingredients, Na-Dru-Co Royal Rose Talcum Powder keeps the skin soft, comfortable, healthy and beautiful. It is a toilet delight.

25c. a tin, at your Druggist's—or write for free sample to

NATIONAL DRUG AND CHEMICAL CO. OF CANADA, LIMITED, - MONTREAL.

192

THE SITTING-ROOM

ANYTHING AMISS?

We refer to your sitting room—the room you live in most—the "Show" room of your house. Is the floor worn in places? The wainscoating scratched? Table and chair legs marred? Picture frames a little shabby?

LACQUERET
HOUSEHOLD LACQUER

will restore the original finish, and it is so easy to apply. It dries overnight, and is made in eight shades and clear. Also Silver and Gold, flat and gloss White and flat and gloss Black. It works wonders on any kind of wood. Send for our booklet the "Dainty Decorator," it gives you a better idea of what can be done with "LACQUERET." Cans contain full Imperial measure. Ask your dealer. Don't accept a substitute.

INTERNATIONAL VARNISH CO. LIMITED

G-98

TORONTO -:- -:- -:- WINNIPEG

Largest in the world and first to establish definite standards of quality

By JESSIE E. RORKE

Period Furniture

THE tendency in modern cabinet making to turn to the designs of the early periods and produce furniture that is either a copy of these models or has been made with the same lines and style of ornament as a base of its design makes it of interest to glance back over the different periods and notice their distinctive designs and the different influences which affected them. We find the various English and French and the colonial periods all represented in the furniture of to-day, and each with strongly marked characteristics which may be distinguished at a glance if one is familiar with the historical development of interior decoration.

In England but little advance had been made in the decoration of the home and its furnishings before the Tudor period. Whatever beauty was to be found in the furnishings of an earlier time was attained almost entirely by their simplicity of form and appropriateness for their purpose, and any ornamentation partook of the same characteristics—as the long bolts and hinges of the Gothic. But the effect of the Renaissance, which was influencing every form of art on the continent, could not fail to be felt in England as well, and during the reigns of the early Tudors ornament became more important, and inlaid work and carving began to appear. This tendency greatly increased during the reign of Henry VII. The splendor and magnificence of the Field of the Cloth of Gold fired the whole English court with a desire to emulate their French hosts, and much that they had seen abroad was introduced into England on their return. These borrowed styles, which show a mingling of Italian, French and Flemish influence, became decidedly more English under Elizabeth, the terms Early Renaissance and Elizabethan being practically synonomous.

Original furniture of the Elizabethan period is almost priceless, but good reproductions are fairly plentiful. Furniture of this period is best suited to large spacious rooms and simple and dignified surroundings. Only massive types could be appropriate in houses where the living room was a great hall forming the central room of the house, and in many cases rising straight to the roof without any intervening story. One end of this room led to the kitchen and servants' quarters, while from the other the grand staircase was reached. This led to the great chamber which was used as a reception room and was the forerunner of our modern drawing-room. As might be expected, we find the furniture designed for such rooms as these always simple and strong in design, though sometimes most elaborately ornamented. The staircase of the time offers a good example of this: in the form it was little more than a step-ladder, but in some cases it would be almost covered with a rare carving. Wood-panelling was the favorite method of wall decoration; sometimes the whole wall was treated in this way—or the panelling might reach only a portion of the distance up, the remainder being decorated with costly tapestries.

The panelled wall is also characteristic of the Jocobean period, but is distinguished by the "rising" panel which replaced the sunken panel of the Elizabethan. Tapestries were still used and the deeply set windows with their small diamond panes had many cushions. The spiral leg found in cupboards, chairs, and chests of drawers is one of the distinctive features of Jacobean furniture. In the finest types the spirals were hand-carved. Elevated cupboards on high supports were also typical. With the introduction of walnut during this period veneer and inlay began to supersede carving. The use of cane, too, became popular at this time.

With the closing of the Jacobean period and the coming of William of Orange, the best ideas of the craftsmen of Holland were brought into England but it was not until Queen Anne's reign that the Dutch and English designs became amalgamated, and it is from her that the period takes its name. The effect of this Dutch influence was to produce greater simplicity of ornament with beauty of workmanship and dssign. Many of the types of this period are well suited to the small and unpretentious home. All parts of the furniture were made lighter and more graceful. Chairs began to be shaped to fit the human figure instead of being rectangular, and the easy chair appeared for the first time. The typical Queen Anne chair has round shoulders, long unshaped back, and a seat that is wider at the front than at the back. The cabriole leg succeeded the spiral and is one of the pronounced features of the period. Marquetry became the most popular form of ornament.

During the latter part of this period religious persecution in France drove hundreds of skilled workmen to the neighboring countries, and the influence of French designs began to be felt. This influence continued throughout the eighteenth century, and while the excesses of the French period were avoided, its effect was to bring new charm and grace to the English designs.

Much of the French furniture is very beautiful, but much, too, is exactly the reverse. Its complicated rococo and bewildering variety of curves required the handling of a master, and, in other hands, gave opportunity for concealing poor construction and quality of material beneath masses of ornament that in itself became far from artistic. The same may be said of modern reproductions. Only a well-filled purse should be brought to this selection, as the elaborate carving and the lavish use of gilt and bronze in this style of furniture makes a cheap imitation with any good qualities whatever an impossibility. One must remember, too, that this furniture was designed for costly and elegant surroundings, and only rich rugs and tapestries with extremely decorative effects seem to be in keeping.

CHIPPENDALE DESIGN

The period of Louis XIII corresponds with the Jacobean period in England, and has many of the same characteristics. The walls were hung with tapestries, the ceilings were heavily beamed, and the fireplaces and furniture were massive and richly carved. The upholstery and draperies were of the richest materials, and the use of much gold embroideries and gold fringe brightened the dull interiors.

The period of Louis XIV is characterized by striking effects with generous but not too lavish decoration. A combination of both straight and curved lines gave a feeling of grace and strength, which was very desirable. Carving and gilding became very popular at this time, and the dull tapestries of the former period were succeeded by gay colors and panels of gilt and white marble. The latter designs of this period are well suited to a formal, stately drawing room.

The rococo or shell ornament, which had begun to appear in the latter part of Louis XIV's reign, is the chief characteristic of the following period. Colors became light and brilliant, straight lines were entirely lost, and everything was lacquered, painted or gilded. The general style of the furniture was dainty, graceful and pleasing, but there was no reserve, no restraint, and in spite of the marvellous workmanship and delicate handling of the minutest detail, one wearies of the surfeit of ornament and longs for a plain surface somewhere. The original pieces of the best craftsmen of this period are worth many thousands, but are barely found, except in museums.

The period of Louis XVI shows a return to straight lines and greater simplicity of decoration. Ornament for the sake of ornament alone is entirely lacking, but the greatest care is given to perfection of detail and the laws of proportion, which had almost been lost in the former reign, were never violated. Fluted columns were a distinguishing feature of this period. They apeared in the legs of chairs and tables, and in the form of pilasters in the cabinets.

The Empire period, which followed this closely, had a marked effect on the colonial style of a later day. The gilt furniture of the former periods was entirely discarded, and most of the pieces were made of solid mahogany with decorations of gilt and bronze. The motives for decoration were borrowed from the Greek and Roman. The Empire designs inclined to be clumsy and heavy, in strong contrast to the slender, graceful shapes of former periods.

The influence of French designs on English decoration is perhaps most markedly shown in the work of Chippendale, whose book on cabinet--making was published about the middle of the eighteenth century. Many of the characteristics of the Louis XIV and Louis XV furniture appear in his work, which was seldom entirely original, but was cleverly adapted from the work of other craftsmen,—so clleverly, indeed, that under his handling it grows to be his own, the Dutch, French, and Chinese all lending him material for his designs. Unlike the preceding periods, the names of a few men now stand out prominently as the originators of a new style, all tending in the same direction, yet diversified by the individual genius of each designer. Chippendale was the first of these and he was followed by the Adam Brothers, Hepplewhite and Sheraton. The original work of these men brings extremely high prices, but modern reproductions, when found in good wood and showing honest workmanship, are quite as beautiful, though lacking the charm of antiquity. The most of these designs are suitable to the ordinary home, and no later style has shown greater merit, or so well combined graceful, well-proportioned lines and beauty and dignity of ornament. Characteristic of Chippendale's work are the acanthus, rococo and ribbon designs, borrowed from the French, and, later, Chinese fretwork with dragons, monkeys and pagoda tops, his ornament usually taking the form of carving. The bow line of the back of his chairs is one of the sure ways of detecting his models, and in his early work we find the bandy-leg with ball and claw-foot, which may be distinguished from the same style of the Queen Anne period by its carved acanthus or shell. He loved bright colors and his walls and ceilings were done in studio with gilded or colored panelled effects in French rococo, or covered with papers in gay French or Chinese patterns.

COLONIAL DESIGN

The Adam Brothers looked upon Chippendale's fantastic designs with disfavor. Their work shows a fine reserve in the use of ornament, the delicate carvin or inlay of satinwood being offset with a large proportion of plain surface. Their style is adopted from the pure classic of the Greek and Italian with a succession of French influence, and is characterized by a use of straight rather than curving lines.

Hepplewhite's chairs, tables and sideboards show the principal types of his work. His chairs with their shield-shaped, oval or heart shaped racks were extremely graceful in construction, but sometimes lacked strength; the legs were slender, square and tapering and frequently decorated with an inlay of the bell flower. His sideboards have either straight or curving fronts, slender tapering legs with spade feet, and frequently the bell-flower inlay. Damask and leather he used most frequently for upholstery, and these were invariably fastened on with brass-headed nails arranged in designs. The influence of the Adam Brothers is shown in his work, his ornamentation being usually of classic design and showing extreme simplicity.

Sheraton is consldered to have given us some of the most beautiful furniture designs in existence. He published five books on cabinet making, illustrated with his models, and these were widely copied throughout the country, so even in the antique furniture it requires an expert to detect a real Sheraton; but it is only the few that are interested in these costly pieces of furniture, and the really important fact is that his designs were preserved and are still being reproduced with much of their original grace and charm. Simplicity and utility were the keynotes of Sheraton's style, which in many respects resembled Hepplewhite's. His chairs were characterized by square rather than round back and horizontal bar across the back near the seat which gave greater strength. The Sheraton sideboards have a convex corner, while Heplewhite's were always concave. Sheraton decorated with both carving and inlay, and was fond of light delicate colors. White or gold chairs, with dainty satin upholstery, were among his favorites in drawing-room designs.

ELIZABETHAN PERIOD

Colonial furniture, as its name suggests, is an adaptation of the varying English and French styles to the needs of a new country. Dignity, simplicity, breadth and utter lack of ornament are its chief characteristics. The influence of the eighteenth century designers and of the Empire period is strongly felt but simplified to suit the spacious rooms of country houses where wealth did not abound, but all the refined tastes of an older country were brought to aid in building up beautiful homes in the new. Colonial furniture has much to recommend it for present use, particularly for country homes where the rooms are large and airy, where every window has its attractive view, and flowers are to be had in abundance. Here little is needed in the way of ornament, and simple beautiful lines will give the best effect.

Around the House

Sometimes one desires to change the air of a room in, as it were, double quick time. Then the plan is to open the window wide, and to open the door and to swing it backwards and forwards very quickly, making it serve as a sort of fan.

To cure earache, warm a little salad oil to milk heat and drop it from a spoon into the ear. Another remedy is to roast an onion in the coals and take out the centre, put the fire point of this into the ear and let it remain several hours.

To prolong the life of window cords they should be dusted and rubbed with a well-greased rag. The snapping of cords is caused by friction, and they are further weakened by sun and weather. The greasing makes them pliable and prolongs their usefulness.

Should the knob come off the lid of a pan or kettle, a screw should be slipped through the hole with the head to the inside of the lid, and a cork screwed on to the protruding end. This will make a knob that will not get hot, and that can be easily removed when dirty.

Madam–Are You Serving Your Family Steamed Beans or Baked Beans?

BEANS that are merely steamed and boiled cannot possess the enticing flavor that baking gives.

It is real oven-baking that develops the rich, appetizing aroma which greets you the moment a tin of Heinz Baked Beans is opened.

—And good! There never were beans more delicious since New England's famous bean-pot first gave up its savory contents. They conform to the standard set for all the

57 Varieties

Every Heinz Baked Bean is baked through and through—every particle made tender—mouth-melting.

Topped with tender strips of choicest pork and permeated with Heinz pure Tomato Sauce—all the zest and flavor of real tomatoes—caught the instant the luscious, red-ripe fruit is picked from the vines.

Heinz Baked Beans

(Oven-Baked)

And Heinz Baked Beans contain far less water than boiled and steamed beans—far more of strength-building elements.

There are four kinds of Heinz Baked Beans

Heinz Baked Beans With Pork and Tomato Sauce

Heinz Plain Baked Pork and Beans (Without Tomato Sauce)

Heinz Vegetarian Baked Beans (Without Pork)

Heinz Baked Red Kidney Beans.

All good grocers sell Heinz Baked Beans under our guarantee to refund full purchase price if you are not satisfied. Try also our India Relish, Peanut Butter, Olives, Olive Oil, Tomato Soup, Vinegars, Preserves, etc.

H. J. Heinz Company—57 Varieties

Member of Association for the Promotion of Purity in Foods

You will be proud of the bread you'll make with PURITY FLOUR

AFTER seeing a batch of big, golden-crusted, snowy white loaves, that you have baked from PURITY FLOUR, you will, indeed, be proud of your cooking-ability—and proud of your wisdom in deciding to pay the little extra it costs to procure such high-class flour. You will admit, too, that we are justified in the pride we take in milling this superb flour.

PURITY FLOUR

"More bread and better bread"

PURITY FLOUR is milled exclusively from the best Western hard wheat—the world's finest. More than that, PURITY FLOUR consists entirely of the high-grade portions of the wheat. The low-grade portions are separated and excluded during the PURITY process of milling. Such high-class flour, of course, expands more in the baking. It makes "more bread and better bread."

It makes lighter, flakier pastry, too, if you just take the precaution to add more shortening. On account of its unusual strength PURITY FLOUR, for best results, requires more shortening than ordinary flour.

Progressive dealers, everywhere, sell PURITY FLOUR and take pride in recommending it.

Add PURITY FLOUR to your grocery list right now. 106

HE SAID—"Few of us realize how much salt we eat. The fact that we put salt on all meats and vegetables—in bread, cake and pastry—soups and sauces—butter and cheese—shows the importance of using an absolutely pure salt."

SHE SAID—"Well, we are using WINDSOR SALT and no one could make me believe there was any better salt in the whole world than my old standby 64

WINDSOR TABLE SALT

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Appetizing Dishes from Left-Overs

By GRACE RENAUD

IN these days of pure food laws, when canned goods are above suspicion—cleaner oftentimes than fresh meat or vegetables—there is no excuse for not having a well-equipped emergency shelf in one's pantry. That, however, should be a last resort, as the good housekeeper's refrigerator should always contain left-overs, which may with little trouble be converted into appetizing dishes.

To find left-overs in one's pantry and refrigerator should be, not a matter of chance, but a regular, daily occurrence, which is easily brought about by systematically preparing a little more of each dish than is required for one meal. There are few foods that cannot be kept over from one day to another if properly cared for.

In making up dishes from left-overs a little pastry is a great addition. This in itself may be a left-over from baking day. The best way to keep pastry is to roll it into a ball, cover it well with lard, and put it on ice. This method prevents a crust forming on it. Pastry treated in this manner has the advantage of being thoroughly chilled, a condition that is invaluable if one would secure the best results.

The first use of left-over pastry that I would mention is to make of it the old-fashioned jelly tarts which most of our grandmothers used to make on baking days. Two discs were cut from the dough, and pricked carefully with a fork, and from the rest, with infinite care and patience, three small discs were cut with a thimble. Then the tarts were baked a delicate brown and allowed to cool. When it was time to serve them a teaspoonful of jelly, jam or conserve was placed on the bottom of the disc, and the top carefully laid on to prevent the jelly from oozing out at the sides.

If the pastry has been sufficiently rolled, dotted with lard, dredged lightly with flour, folded and rolled again, and this process has been repeated four or five times, it will puff nicely when baked, and this same scheme of cutting will answer in an emergency for the more elaborate patty shells. One's judgment must determine the size, but those cut with pound baking-powder cans for the bottom, with a disc cut from the top with a half-pound can, are a convenient size. If the edges are brushed with egg they can be laid one on top of the other before being put into the oven and will bake in one piece. But this requires extra time and calls for the wholly unnecessary use of an egg, which might be put to a better use in another way. If handled carefully, the crusts baked separately will hold together very well after having been filled. These may be filled with any combinations of meats, vegetables, or fruits that can be conveniently prepared. Here are a few that have proved satisfactory:

Uses of Left-over Pastry.

Take bits of left-over steak or roast, mince, heat in gravy, season and fill tarts, allowing gravy to run over crust.

Remnants of chicken fricassee may be cut into small pieces and treated as just described. If there is rice and gravy and no chicken left, use in the same way. This, with a baked sweet potato, makes a tasty and attractive dish.

Mince some corned beef or ham and spread a thick layer on bottom crust. Place top on and fill with creamed peas, asparagus, or mushrooms.

Scramble some eggs, allowing two tablespoonfuls of milk to each egg. Add one-half cup of grated cheese, a seasoning of salt and a dash of red pepper. Cook slowly until the eggs are light and creamy, stirring constantly. Fill shells, sprinkle with chopped parsley and serve at once.

As an accompaniment to a salad, try these cheese pasties: Take a piece of dough of whatever size you wish. Roll out, dot with lard, dredge lightly with flour and sprinkle thickly with grated cheese. Repeat the process five times. Cut into squares, cut the squares in two diagonally, and bake. Crisp in the oven before serving. Another novelty, which may accompany a salad or may be served with stalks of celery stuffed with pimento cheese as an entree, is made as follows:

Prepare crust as for tarts. Cut in squares. Put an oyster and a piece of crisp bacon in the center of each. Season with a speck of butter and a dash of white pepper. Fold over, secure the edges by pressing with a broad-tined fork and bake. Serve hot.

Besides the tarts above mentioned we will not forget the apple or peach dumplings, which are such a toothsome finish to a very light dinner. Sweets which will be just the bit one wants after a hearty dinner may be made as follows:

Roll into the crust finely chopped raisins and nuts, cut in fancy shapes, and bake.

Sprinkle the dough with currant, cut out in diamonds, shake some red sugar over the top, and bake.

Add some spices and sugar to the crust, cut in small rounds, and bake. We call these "pennies." Any kind of preserves, jam, mincemeat, or apple-sauce may be converted in a few minutes into a "pocketbook" tart, made by laying preserves in the center of the paste, folding over and securely pressing the edges.

Left-over Meat, Fish, or Vegetables

The sandwich can be made the most substantial part of a luncheon, or may be served as a successful entree. One's ingenuity can readily make combinations that will attract both the eye and palate, at the same time utilizing many remnants of food-stuff that would otherwise be wasted. The following combinations, served in the form of sandwiches, have proved acceptable enough to be repeated, and demonstrate economy both of time and food:

Knead into left-over mashed potato as much flour as it will hold. Mold into a flat, round cake, cut into four triangular pieces, roll in flour and brown on both sides, using as little fat as possible. When sufficiently browned cut in two, lengthwise; butter, fill with slices of crisped bacon and bits of cress and serve. These may also be filled with minced meat to which has been added a little gravy, and more gravy may be poured over them.

A particularly nice way of using up remnants of chicken or veal is to roll pastry and cut into rounds or diamonds. Spread on each piece the hot minced chicken or veal, put two together, pour gravy over and serve.

Peas, asparagus, or a combination of these vegetables, may be mixed with white sauce and put between slices of thin buttered toast. Add the yolk of an egg to the remaining sauce and pour over the sandwich. Serve very hot.

Fried oysters which have been left over may be minced and have added to them an equal quantity of chopped celery. This should be mixed with mayonnaise and served on a leaf of lettuce between slices of hot, buttered toast. A bit of bacon or ham laid on top gives an additional relish.

Left-over ham and eggs may be chopped together and served between slices of French toast which has had the crust removed. Cut the toast rather thick and fry quickly so that it will be moist and not greasy.

Left-over bits of bacon may be reheated in the oven and served between slices of toast garnished with watercress.

Where good slices of roast beef are not available for hot roast-beef sandwiches, chop finely the more inferior part, put between slices of bread, pour hot gravy over and serve.

Pieces of cold fish may be heated in white sauce or mixed with mayonnaise and spread between buttered toast. Put grated cheese on the top, set in the oven until the cheese melts, and serve at once. Bits of cold vegetables, such as peas, beans, asparagus, or carrots, may be treated in the same way.—Good Housekeeping.

Frosted coffee is delightfully invigorating after a long walk on a warm day. To prepare it make a strong, clear, drip coffee; sweeten to taste and chill thoroughly. Just before serving drop on each glassful a heaping teaspoonful of whipped cream which has been faintly sweetened and slightly flavored with vanilla.

Music and Matters Musical

A Splendid Old-Time Song

SCENES THAT ARE BRIGHTEST

Words by ALFRED BUNN.
Music by W. VINCENT WALLACE.
Cantabile e con molto semplicita.
8va pp
1. Scenes that are
2. Words can - not bright - est May charm . . . . . a - while . . . . . .
scat - ter The thoughts . . . . . we fear, ...
Hearts which are light - est, And eyes . . . . . that For though they flat - ter, They mock . . . . . the smile; Yet o'er them a - bove us ear. Hopes will still de - ceive us, dim.
Though . . . . na - ture beam, ... With none . . . . . to With . . . . tear - ful cost, ... And when . . . . . they love us, How sad . . . . they seem With leave us The heart . . . is lost And rit.
none . . . to love us, How sad . . . . they seem I when . . . . they leave us The heart . . . is lost I Ped.
FINE.

* Play small notes to lead into second verse.

Editor's Note

WE know that there are many among our readers, musically inclined, who would be filling positions as church organists or as concert accompanists, had they felt sure that the following life story was a possibility. It was only after much persuasion that the writer consented to allow us to publish it, and our strongest reason was that we felt many others would be encouraged thereby to equal or surpass this record. If at any time any of our readers are perplexed in their study of music, we want you to give us an opportunity to assist you. Address your enquiries to the Musical Editor.

Making an Organist

WHEN as a youngster of three or four years of age, I almost worried my mother to death with questions and pleadings for her help in my babyish attempts to play and sing the old familiar hymns. I can just picture myself standing up on the old chair, beside mother at her baking, and with the hymn book open anywhere but the right place, demanding her attention to my song.

This must have been extremely funny, on the old farm, and as I look back and see the picture I almost laugh out loud. They put up with me at home for three years, or perhaps a little longer, and finally decided that the training of such a determined child must be placed in the hands of a teacher. Now, as we were fifteen miles from town, you may imagine the delightful drives I had, sometimes through rain or heavy snowstorm, but very often having the benefit of God's rich sunshine and pure air. It was not infrequent that the roads were so bad, that I had to make part of my journey by train. However, a thirty-mile drive for a child's music lesson became a very heavy tax on those who had to accompany me, and it was soon arranged that I would become one on the circuit of a traveling teacher. I can well remember that during this period, on one occasion, while accompanying myself on the little organ, at an annual tea meeting in the old frame church, I stopped in the middle of a word to cough. Can you imagine what the audience did? Can you imagine, too, what was said to me when I got home.

These lessons lasted but a couple of years, and, owing to different circumstances, I was compelled to make the best of what tuition I had received, and advance myself to the best of my ability.

It must have been in my early teens when we bid good-bye to the old farm, with its row of tall poplars and spreading willows, and to the old collie, to which I was more fondly attached than to the farm itself. After what seemed to me an exceedingly long ride on the train, we arrived at the big city, which has since then been my home.

We had been in the city some years, finishing my public school work, before I had the opportunity of renewing my tuition, although during this time many friends coming to our home seemed to keep me well supplied with music, and one dear old friend suggested that as I was still at school, I should try for a scholarship, given by one of the large colleges. Without much hope of winning, and with many fears and tremblings, I went into the presence of the great professor. It was indeed a happy surprise for me to learn that I was really the winner, and I had now before me a long-hoped-for opportunity of studying under a first-class teacher. There was one serious handicap to my making rapid advance, for, shortly after winning the scholarship, I left school and went to business, and all my lessons and practice had to be during the evening, which found me in rather poor trim to make good headway, but I was enabled to complete my junior examination in piano and theory with first class honors.

This practically completed all my tuition for the time being, and my only help came through accepting an opportunity to help in church work, to which I must give no small amount of credit. It is certainly one of the best helps that any student of music could wish for, that is in trying to fill the position of pianist in some of the large church organizations. Singing in the choir cannot possibly injure the student's work, nor will the playing of hymns for a small congregation have any bad effect. But the very opposite is true. It will strengthen one's confidence in oneself, and give a certain stability of work.

As an outcome of my work at the piano in the Sunday School and our young people's society, our choirmaster made bold to risk his organ in my care during the vacation of our organist. Fear seemed a frequent visitor with me, but it was downed on that memorable first Sabbath morning by a little touch of pride. I was somewhat afraid on this occasion, because I had never had a lesson—was I too daring? This relief work during vacations occurred twice, when, to my surprise, an invitation came to me to accept the position of organist in another small church. This position and a small class of piano pupils kept me busy for a few years.

During this period it was my privilege to study the organ for a couple of terms only, with a thoroughly competent teacher; also to again substitute for holidays, but this time on a much larger organ.

There are times of discouragement in nearly every life, and my discouragement was in the length of time which passed without my having an opportunity to give up my small organ for a larger one, and more than once I determined to give up the work. The opportunity came at last, however, and my ambitions were realized, and now some of my happiest moments are spent at the keyboard, making some of the old masters express my own feelings.

To me the memories of the childish song, and the years spent in close touch with music, are the brightest and most valuable parts of my life. The friendship created, the spoken appreciation of my effort, and the field of opportunity have been all too valuable to think of in any light manner. We can hardly estimate the condition of the world with music and its companionships taken away.

Music in Our Public Schools

THE need for more and better music in our town and rural schools is too apparent to call for much debate, and is a plain one-sided question, even though at the present time there are those who cry "away with the musical bosh." Just how music influences us is difficult to describe, but that it does have a refining effect even on the lives of young boys and girls at school, cannot be denied. There is something in man that responds to its work, and there is created a deeper love for the beautiful in art, music and character.

Instead of saying we cannot have music in our schools, so far out of town, or, so poorly placed for money, let us set our minds on it, organize a concert or two with our own school children taking part, and we are positive of splendid support from the adults. Then with proceeds in hand, buy an organ or piano and develop the better side of the child's life. None of us have to go outside our own homes to find someone who almost prayed that school would be burned down or that the teacher "would get married." That is unnatural and was due to the lack of development of the better nature, which could be overcome through the influence of music, in song, orchestra or piano. This is the highest development we can reach out to and it will well repay our effort.

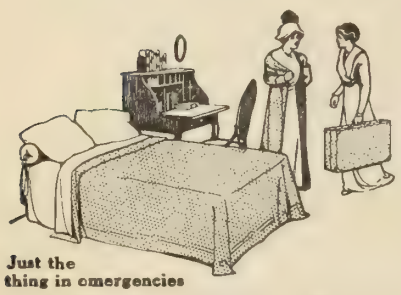
"IDEAL" Steel Davenport

See this strong, sensible, serviceable all-steel davenport and you'll want to get one for your porch or summer home.

Doesn't it look inviting? And comfortable, too. Nothing burdensome, intricate or breakable about it—and it doesn't warp or get out of order like wooden kinds.

Springs in seat and back. Substantial, sanitary mattress securely fastened to both seat and back. Length is 73 inches; width of seat, 22 inches; width wide open, 47 inches.

Useful All Day And At Night, Too



Just the thing in emergencies

Gives double value, because it is a handsome couch by day, and a comfortable bed at night. Probably it's the very thing you've been looking for. Be sure you get the "IDEAL" kind—with our trade mark stamped on it.

We'll tell you where you can get one if you write for Booklet No. D 11

THE IDEAL BEDDING CO. LTD.
21 Jefferson Ave., Toronto

36

An I H C Manure Spreader a Necessity on Every Farm

IF you expect to continue farming and raise a paying crop every good year, you must arrange to return to the soil the plant food taken from it by growing crops. Neglect is bound to decrease the productivity of your farm, and, in the end, to ruin it. When a farm is once run down it takes years of slow, careful upbuilding to bring it back to its original fertility.

If you attempt to fertilize by spreading manure with a fork, you fertilize unevenly and waste fully half the manure. When you use an I H C manure spreader properly, the fertility of your soil remains at a constant standard, while its physical condition improves from year to year, assuring bumper crops in good years and the best possible stand when weather conditions are unfavorable will spread manure as it should be spread; in an even coat all over the field, light or heavy as may be needed, and pulverized so that the plant food elements in it combine with the soil.

I H C Manure Spreaders Corn King and Cloverleaf

An I H C spreader has many mechanical advantages. The apron moves on steel rollers running on steel tracks. This construction reduces draft and prevents the apron from slipping under the load. The apron feed mechanism and beater gears are provided with shields which protect them from sleet, snow, and manure. A strong, durable feed moves the apron steadily toward the beater at any desired rate of speed. This steady movement insures even manure spreading whether the spreader is going up hill or down.

Compare the I H C apron feed mechanism with that of any other manure spreader and see how much stronger and more positive it is. I H C spreaders are so constructed in every detail that they do their work positively, with the least effort on the part of driver or horses.

I H C spreaders are made in different styles and sizes for use in orchards, vineyards and gardens, on small and large farms. The I H C local agent will show you the machine best adapted to your needs. See him for catalogues and full information, or, write nearest branch house

CANADIAN BRANCHES

International Harvester Company of America
(Incorporated)

At Brandon, Calgary, Edmonton, Hamilton, Lethbridge, London, Montreal, N Battleford, Ottawa, Quebec, Regina, Saskatoon, St. John, Weyburn, Winnipeg, Yorkton.

I H C Service Bureau

The purpose of this Bureau is to furnish free of charge to all the best information obtainable on better farming. If you have any worthy questions concerning soils, crops, land drainage, irrigation, fertilizer, etc., make your inquiries specific and send them to I H C Service Bureau, Harvester Building, Chicago, U S A.

BOUNTY FOR FLY KILLING

Dr. Hastings' Clarion Call for Abolition of House Pest—How Things of Evil Multiply

"IF we can just get people to think about it and realize the seriousness of the fly problem, I am sure they will agree with me that prompt action is necessary," said Dr. Hastings, Medical Health Officer of Toronto, recently.

BEWARE OF DORMANT FLIES

The Medical Officer of Health again draws the attention of the citizens to the dangers of the house fly, and that the most important feature in connection with house cleaning is the careful search for flies that have secreted themselves and remained in a dormant condition for the winter months in clothes closets, among books, magazines, etc., and behind loose papers on the walls, especially in the corners of rooms and about the cornices.

TAKE NO CHANCES

Don't think that because a fly is not flying or crawling around that it is dead. Like the man who was cabled to that his mother-in-law had died, and asked what they should do with the body—cremate or bury—replied, "take no chances—do both."

"Take no chances"—cremate everything in the shape of a fly that you come across while house cleaning. One winter-over fly beginning to deposit eggs (120 at a time) on the first of May, under favorable conditions, has been demonstrated, will mean 5,500,000,000,000 in five months' time.

BOUNTY FOR FLY KILLING

Pay your children all you can afford for every fly they kill in May.

Public spirited citizens, and organizations for infant and child welfare could not do better than offer premiums for the largest number of flies killed or caught by any child in the months of May and June.

The maggots you see in the warm weather in your garbage tins or boxes, around any decomposing meat, vegetables, manure, etc., in ten days' time, if not destroyed, will have developed into full grown flies.

CARRY DISEASE

Dr. Jackson, of New York city, found that flies caught in special traps on the shores of the North and East Rivers, near outfalling sewers, carried innumerable bacteria, one fly alone having as many as 125,000 on its body and legs. With the aid of a chart, on which the typhoid cases were recorded, Dr. Jackson was able to prove that the increase of typhoid and other intestinal diseases stood in direct ratio to the multitude of flies in the neighborhood of the outfalling sewers.

FIRST AID TO TYPHOID

The increase in typhoid fever in the late summer months and early fall is attributable, to a large extent, to the house fly. This is also true of the various diarrhoeal diseases of infants and children in the summer months, the flies passing in many cases directly from the unprotected excretions of these cases to the nipple and the feeding bottle of the child, to the milk, and other articles of food.

The same applies, to a greater or less extent, to all communicable diseases. Consequently, what has been formerly known as the house fly, is now better known as the typhoid fly or the death fly.

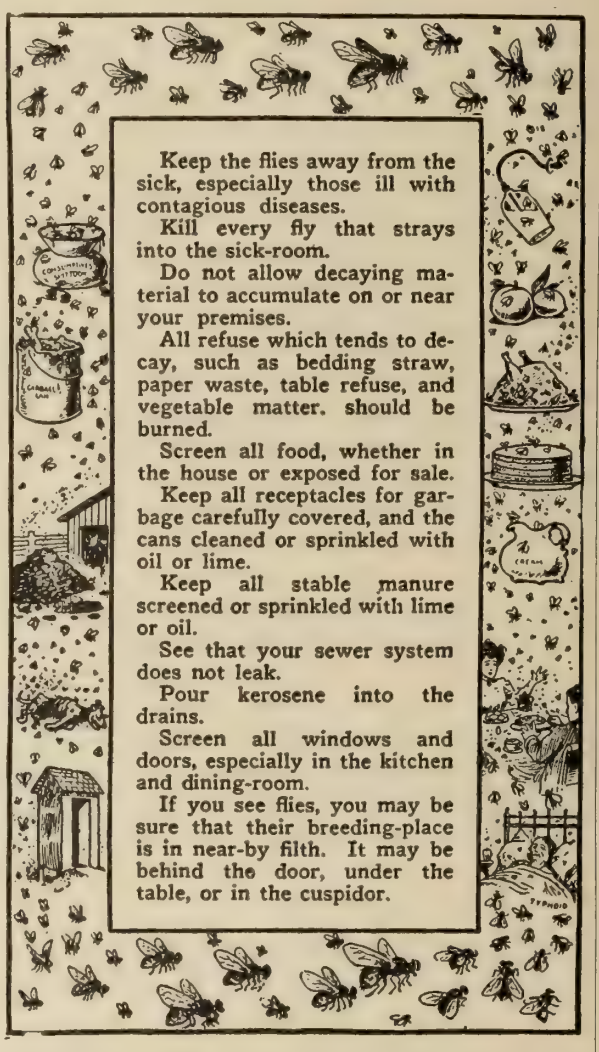
JOINT ACTION NEEDED

Flies breed in all kinds of decomposing animal and vegetable matter, more especially in the manure from stables. It must be apparent then that this disgraceful pest can be practically annihilated by conjoint action of the citizens in killing all flies early in the season, and a complete control and protection of all breeding places.

LABORATORIES BUILT PANAMA CANAL

In this connection it will be remembered that it was not the more efficient engineering or better financing of the United States Government that built the Panama Canal, but the extermination of the mosquito, which was spreading disease to such an extent that men were dying by the hundreds, and it became impossible to secure men to do the work. In other words, it was the Health Laboratories that made possible the building of the Panama Canal.

The extermination of the house fly will probably do more to stay the spread of disease than any other single action on the part of our citizens.



Suggestions for the Home

ELASTICITY is restored to rubber by soaking it in one part ammonia and two parts clear water until the desired results are obtained. This is specially true in the case of rings or other articles that have become stiff and brittle.

There are many ways of getting rid of mice, but try this. When mice trouble you, hunt out their entrances to pantry or cupboard and plaster them with a mixture of melted (just soft) laundry soap and red pepper. They will not come again.

WEDDING FLORAL DECORATIONS

By MARGARET LAING, FAIRBAIRN

AS the time of the wedding draws near the question of what the decorations shall be and who shall do them, looms large in the mind of the mother. (We are thinking now of the average mother who cannot hand over all this sort of thing to paid workers.)

The little bride is busy putting the finishing touches on her trousseau, seeing friends, and acknowledging the gifts that are pouring in, so that she can give her mother little help in the planning for the flowers at the wedding—how they shall be used in the decorations for the table at the wedding breakfast, and how arranged in the drawing-room, living-room, parlor (or whatever name the chief room in the bouse bears) as well as in the other rooms to be used.

We are going to suppose there is no florist in the question—either he is too far away or he would charge too much, or his arrangements would be too elaborate for the simple home wedding which is our ideal. Anyway, he is eliminated from the problem for which we will seek a solution.

There is the garden, of course, and neighbors have generously offered whatever we covet from theirs—everyone loves to help a bride—and, besides, there is all out-doors to draw upon, with its glory of field and woods.

Since weddings are apt to come off at any time in the year, in spite of the fact that Providence seems to have designed June for that special purpose, in our reckoning we will have to take into account the cycle of flowerdom, from early spring to late autumn.

Suppose we glance over a few of our common garden and field flowers and flowering shrubs that might serve for the purpose in hand.

There are lilacs, hydrangea, japonica, field daisies, syringa, and black-eyed Susans, golden rod, wild blossoms of tree and bush, autumn leaves—in fact, the list is so long that it would be impossible to give it, so we merely offer samples. Flowers differ from one part of Canada to another, from one garden to another, from week to week and season to season, and there is scarcely a bloom of them all but may be utilized. The question is, how to select them and combine with taste.

We will begin, then, with the flowers for the table at the wedding breakfast. White is the usual choice, because of its suggestion of purity and its use is a matter of taste. Color gives a more brilliant effect. Of greenery there must be a generous supply, such as ferns, bracken, acacia leaves, asparagus, anything that is small and feathery, fluffy and green.

On the bridal table choose for flower holders a table vase for the centre surrounded by four smaller ones. Glass is always in good taste and inconspicuous. A very inexpensive set, easily ordered from a departmental store, consists of fold fish bowls, one large and four small, for there are four sizes to choose from.

Another pretty arrangement is made by utilizing a large bowl, if it happens to be a handsome punch bowl so much the better, in the centre of which stands a vase preferably green or clear glass.

By using a piece of wire netting with ends bent by pliers to fit over the edge of the bowl and making a sufficient break in the middle for the vase, you have the foundation for a beautiful mound of cut blooms.

To complete the effect, make a centrepiece of ferns or small green leaves, patterned on the cloth in the shape of an oval or star.

Another very practicable and unique decoration is carried out with moss and bark. It would require a square of galvanized tin with an inch-wide rim turned up as a foundation, to prevent the moisture going through to the cloth.

This is partly filled with sand and covered with brilliant green moss from the woods. From the centre of this rises the flower receptacle, which, to all appearance, is a section of a log with the bark on, but in reality is a little top pail or a crock or anything which will go inside the bark cylinder, made of a straight piece curved.

Where a buffet breakfast is served at the wedding the decorations must be on a large scale to be effective, since many of the guests will see it only at a distance instead of seated at the table.

A striking design would be a bark canoe filled with a brilliant mass of bloom, the sides partly veiled with the vines that droop over it. The little craft would be emblematic of the voyage on which the young couple were starting together.

A more twentieth century idea would be an aeroplane, but the idea might be more difficult to carry out, so we will go keep to the boat. The home carpenter can easily make this out of bark. It should be anywhere from eighteen inches long, should be filled with moist sand, to hold the flowers, and should be raised some inches above the table on supports, hidden under the mass of green.

These are only a few suggestions indicating the wealth of material available and the variety of design possible, and are given as skeleton plans to be filled in to suit individual requirements.

Before leaving the question of the table decoration, perhaps a definite description of a particular table decoration might be helpful, which could, of course, be carried out in whatever flowers were in season.

The wedding we recall was late in July, when the wild carrot is in bloom along all the roadsides of Ontario—"Queen Anne's Lace Flower" is the prettier and more poetic name it is known by in older countries, where it is highly cultivated. At the bride's table its lace-like whiteness filled the receptacles of a glass epergne having five slender vases in a cluster and a large saucer-like vase, the epergne resting on a centre-piece of ferns. Smaller vases of the lace flower or a centre of ferns decorated each of the smaller tables for guests, presenting an exquisitely dainty appearance by using what most people call "a weed."

Field daisies would carry out a similar scheme—do you remember that when Lord Rosebery's daughter, Lady Peggy, was married, that it was a "marguerite" wedding? So would syringa, white asters bridal wreath, white lilacs.

When it comes to the decoration of the other rooms, so much depends on their size and arrangement that it is difficult to give definite advice, but one general principle is, let the impression be one of out-of-doorness of life and things growing.

Bring in huge branches of lilacs, japonica, syringa, spiraea, wild aster, the starry blue wild chicory, feathery asparagus, apple blossoms, or brilliant autumn leaves. Cover the newel post in the hall, fill the umbrella stand, place big jugs or even pails in the corners of the room, hidden by the furniture and holding miniature trees and branches, make a bower for the bridal couple in the bay window, bank the mantel shelf with a mass of bloom, the low vases hidden by moss or a wilderness of ferns and green foliage.

Much of the cutting and arranging of flowers can be begun days before with such as keep their freshness, like daisies, asters or chrysanthemums. Autumn foliage and many of the wild flowers, which lose their color and freshness soon, must be left till later. A bush of chicory cut off just around the roots, will droop the first day, but by the next will revive beautifully.

But perhaps this wealth of foliage and wild flowers is not as available as garden flowers. In that case select a single color for each room. Yellow is always cheerful and gay and would include sunflowers of all kinds, helianthus, nasturtiums, coreopsis, marigold, gaillardia, black-eyed Susan, and all the rest of this golden family.

Arrange in large bouquets or masses of smaller ones, according to the flower taking the greatest care to mix only those which are different tones of the same color.

Sometimes a brilliant contrast will be a success, as, where the blue of canterbury bill or larkspur is placed near a bunch of some yellow flower.

A very lovely color scheme could be carried out by using sweet peas, asters (running the whole gamut of color), sweet williams, and phlox.

A Summer Morning

KODAK

The personal pictures in and about the home—pictures of the children and grown folks, pictures of the familiar surroundings and of the family pets—these as well as the travel and vacation pictures make Kodakery worth while. ¶ And you can make good pictures with a Kodak.

CANADIAN KODAK CO., Limited

Catalogue free at the Dealers or by mail.

Toronto, Canada

Make Your Kitchen a Model of Convenience—Get a Knechtel Kitchen Cabinet

For neatness, cleanliness and convenience (three kitchen essentials), there is nothing can take the place of the KNECHTEL KITCHEN CABINET in your home,

Look for the Trade-Mark

Extension top of bright aluminum

KNECHTEL KITCHEN CABINET Registered.

Will neither tarnish nor rust

Substantially made and beautifully finished. The KNECHTEL is THE ideal kitchen cabinet. It has every possible modern convenience, including: Flour, Sugar and Meal bins; Spice jars; Air-tight canisters; Plate racks; Pot cupboards; Sliding shelves, and many other practical features. Ask your dealer to show you the five handsome "KNECHTEL" Styles.

Booklet "B" FREE on request.

Knechtel Kitchen Cabinet Co. Limited

HANOVER -:- -:- ONTARIO

BIG PAYMENTS FOR MAGAZINE WORK

Interest in the Journal and loyalty to a Canadian magazine are the first requirements, just as the salaried organizer of charity work or fraternal organizations must believe in the value of the work he is doing.

The high quality and Canadianism of the Journal and the standing of our workers secures the respectful attention of everyone,

We realize that we must pay such representatives well. There is a large commission and a monthly salary. Many are earning $40 to $70 a month in their spare time. Others only find time to earn a few dollars, providing pocket money or buying something they want.

If any young man or lady wishes to earn extra money, write to us for terms to subscription workers.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

When two numbers are given with one costume, two patterns are required at 12 cents each. Send cash to PATTERN DEPARTMENT, Canadian Home Journal, 59-61 John Street, Toronto, Canada. Order always by number, stating size wanted. Patterns are mailed from our Toronto office the same day as order is received. PAPER PATTERNS TWELVE CENTS EACH POST PAID.

For the Bridal Party

PRESENT styles lend themselves to the bridal costume with singular success. This one is attractive in the extreme. It is simple and dignified, yet absolutely smart. The frocks worn by the young attendant and the tiny flower girl also are charmingly dainty, and the group altogether is replete with suggestion.

The bride's gown shows one of the very new skirts, made in three pieces and lapped on to a panel. The side edges of the train are finished and lapped on to the side portions in place of being seamed thereto, and the train can be made pointed or in shorter round length. The blouse is made with two pieces only, there being no shoulder seams. It is shirred and arranged over the lining. It can be finished with the pointed girdle illustrated, or with a narrow straight girdle, as preferred, and the neck can be made as illustrated, or either lower or higher, but round necks of this sort are among the features of the season for bridal gowns.

For the medium size the blouse will require 2¾ yards of material 27 or 36, 1½ yards 44 inches wide, with ⅜ yard 36 or 44 for the girdle and ⅜ yard 18 inches wide for the chemisette; for the skirt will be needed 5 yards 27, 36 or 44, with 1¼ yards 18 inches wide and ½ yard of flouncing 14 inches wide for the panel.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7383, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust; of the skirt, No. 7380, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist.

The young girl's costume consists of a simple straight skirt and blouse that is made in two pieces with sleeves stitched to it. It is lapped on to a chemisette portion, however, and it consequently suits two materials peculiarly well. In the illustration marquisette is combined with shadow lace and with tucked net. The model could, however, be used for almost any seasonable material, for the blouse can be made with or without a lining, and can be finished with round or high neck and with or without under sleeves. The skirt can be made as illustrated or with a belt at the natural waist line.

For the 16-year size the blouse will require 3¼ yards of bordered material 16 inches wide, with ¾ yard of tucked net 18 inches wide, or 1½ yards of plain material 27 or 36, 1¼ yards 44 inches wide; for the skirt will be needed 3¼ yards of material 27, 2¼ yards 36 or 44, with 2 yards of banding, or 2 yards of bordered material 38 inches wide.

The pattern of the blouse, No. 7364, and of the skirt, No. 7363, are cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

The tiny girl's frock is made of white Brussels net with trimming of Valenciennes lace and is worn with a wide ribbon sash. The long-waisted body portion is prettily tucked, and the trimming that is arranged between the tucks is left loose near the lower edge to allow the slipping of the sash under it. The skirt is straight and gathered. The model can be utilized for an extremely dressy little frock, as this one, and for the simple dress with equal success, for it can be made just as illustrated or with high neck and long sleeves, and with or without the trimming.

For the 4 year size will be required 2½ yards of material 27, 2¼ yards 36, 1¾ yards 44 inches wide, with 7¾ yards of insertion, 4½ yards of edging, and 2½ yards of ribbon.

The pattern, No. 7384, is cut in sizes for children from 2 to 6 years of age.

Blouse Pattern No. 7383
Skirt Pattern No. 7380

Blouse Pattern No. 7364
Skirt Pattern No. 7363

Dress Pattern No. 7384

The Brides of June

THE month of roses is always the month of brides also, and suitable costumes for the central figure herself and for her attendants will surely be needed. These are charming; they include the very latest features, and they are simple withal.

The bride's costume includes one of the draped skirts that make a very important feature of the latest styles. It is made of satin combined with lace. The draped portions are circular, and the separate train is arranged over the back, while the foundation skirt also is circular with the panel and the flounces arranged over it. The accompanying blouse is an extremely graceful one with a wide bertha of lace. Beneath the bertha there is a simple blouse with the sleeves sewed to the armholes. The high waist line is fashionable, but the natural one is equally so, and this gown can be finished in either way. The train can be made pointed or round, plain or square, as preferred.

For the medium size, the blouse will require 2¾ yards of material 27 inches wide or 2 yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 1¾ yards of lace 12 inches wide for the drapery, 1 yard for the sleeves, and ⅜ of a yard 18 inches wide for the yoke; for the foundation skirt will be required 4¼ yards 27 inches wide, 3½ yards 36 inches, or 2⅝ yards 44 inches wide, with ⅞ of a yard of allover lace 18 inches wide, and 2⅛ yards of lace 10 inches wide; for the drapery and train 6½ yards 27 inches wide, 6 yards 36 inches or 4½ yards 44 inches wide.

The pattern of the blouse, 7425, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 inches bust measure; of the skirt, 7418, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist measure.

The gown worn by the matron of honor is made entirely of lace flouncing, and such material is being extremely used. The two flounces of the skirt are joined one to the other and can be worn over any foundation, or the lower flounce can be joined to a close-fitting foundation of satin or other material, while the upper flounce is arranged over it. The fichu blouse is graceful and in the very height of style. In this case the fichu is finished at the waist line and the skirt is adjusted a little above the normal; but the model makes an excellent one for many occasions, and the blouse can be made with a postillion, as shown in the back view, and finished at the natural waist line quite as well as after the manner illustrated. This skirt is cut a little above the normal, but can be cut off and joined to a belt if the natural line is more becoming, and the upper flounce can either be tucked or gathered.

For the medium size of the waist will be required 2 yards 27 inches, 1¼ yards 36 inches or 44 inches wide, with 4 yards of lace 12 inches wide and ⅝ of a yard 18 inches wide for the chemisette and 1 yard of lace for the sleeve frills. For the skirt will be needed 4⅝ yards of flouncing 29 inches wide, with 1½ yards 36 inches wide for the foundation, if that is used.

The pattern of the waist, 7351, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40; of skirt, 7394, in sizes from 22 to 30.

The young girl's dress is pretty and dainty as well can be. It is made of embroidered net over messaline and trimmed with lace. The apron overskirt has a straight edge, and at the back there is a panel which is made of a straight strip finished with trimming. The under skirt is made in two pieces. The blouse is slightly full with the sleeves sewed to the armholes, and the fichu drapery is arranged over it. The net is in every way charming and well adapted to bridesmaid's wear, but, as the edges of both fichu and overskirt are straight, the design is an excellent one for lace flouncing and bordered materials. It will be found to be well adapted to graduation and to general summer wear, as well as to the bridesmaid's use. If liked, the neck can be made high and the sleeves long.

For the 16-year size will be needed 3⅝ yards 27 inches wide or 3⅛ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 1¾ yards of net 44 inches wide and 7½ yards of lace to make as shown in the figure, and 2 yards 18 inches wide for the yoke and long sleeves as shown in the back view.

The pattern, 7428, is cut in sizes for misses of 16 and 18 years.

Pretty Parasols for Summer

THE staid coaching parasol of plain colored taffeta looks actually prim and old maidish, this year, beside the fetching and frivolous affairs favored by fashion. Only when the costume is flowered, striped or broken up in some other pattern effect, is the parasol plain in color and even then gay little frills are apt to flaunt themselves at its edge or the upper part of it peeps coyly through lace.

The striped parasol is the whim of the moment and almost half the parasol models displayed in the shops are striped in effect. Black and white stripes are favorites, for the black and white sunshade has a snappy knack of according with every costume; but various colored effects are seen also—green and white stripes being in high favor. Sometimes the stripes are about an inch wide, and sometimes they are much wider, one Parisian parasol having black velvet stripes four inches broad on a white satin ground. Again, the stripes may be very narrow, almost in hairline effect, and when these narrow stripes run around, instead of up and down, and the parasol is twirled in the hand, the effect is fairly dazzling to the eyes. A parasol of this sort, trimmed with black and white chenille fringe, has a handle of black ebony with an exaggerated tassel of the black and white chenille, and the whole effect is inexpressibly chic.

Another striped parasol in the deep tub-shape now fashionable for carriage and formal use, has rose stripes on a pale lavender ground, and the chic black wood handle trimmed with a chou of the silk. A magpie parasol of black lace mounted over white silk has also a black wood handle trimmed with a chou of white silk. Some of the new parasols, called cordeliere models, are provided with a long cord handle, attached to the stick in such manner that when the cord is looped over the shoulder the parasol hangs gracefully and almost vertically at the side, leaving the hands free to carry a handbag, lift the skirt or examine fabrics in shopping.

The Hindoo parasol is a fad of the moment. This parasol is almost flat, like a saucer or inverted plate when open, but specially devised hinged ribs allow it to close in the ordinary manner. Summer parasols in Hindoo style are made of allover embroidery with a band of black velvet set between two frills of lace around the edge. Very elaborate carriage parasols have appliqued designs of velvet on silk, bunches of grapes, conventional flowers, huge dots and diamonds being used. Pompadour silk sunshades with insets of lace are wonderfully summery and dainty and there are elegant affairs of shirred chiffon and of allover lace trimmed with handsome fringe for extremely ceremonious afternoon occasions.

The Separate Coat

THE coat is very much the thing, this season. Every smart costume has its appropriate wrap, to match; and even the lingerie frocks designed for later wear are being shown with coquettish silk coats in delectable colors like peach blow, Limoges blue and an indefinable raspberry shade. Even frocks are made in coat-effect with peplums, coat tails and other additions below the waist line which suggest the coat lines; and really it is not going to be quite correct, this season, to go about in one's frock, uncoated, out of doors.

The styles of the wraps are legion, of course, and range from breezy polo coats and ulsters for the athletic girl to the most fanciful and feminine silk and lace wraps for garden party wear over diaphanous frocks. One may choose between a motor coat of severe mannish type, with close collar and revers and comfortable slash pockets into which the hands may be thrust informally as one stands, or huge patch pockets which will hold a wealth of small bellongings; and a trimly cut affair with tapering lines toward the feet, an exaggerated side fastening and revers of contrasting fabric. The one requirement of the separate coat for motor, steamer or traveling wear is that it shall have a perfect straight line down the back, from collar to hem. Fashion cherishes this line with painstaking determination, and the adroit dressmaker shows her customer how to stand, with the weight thrown on one hip and the other knee flexed so that this straight youthful line of the back is emphasized.

Very smart are the steamer coats of broken check in black and white, with black velvet collars and cuffs and touches of white in flat pearl buttons and white braid loops. Younger women are apt to go to the men's department for their motor and steamer coats, and on slender young figures the straight, mannish lines are smart and jaunty. Coats along mannish lines, and made of practical tweeds and woolen mixtures, are shown also in the women's coat departments. There is a new American woven tweed, which has a soft, hairy surface, and which is particularly supple and agreeable in texture. Coats of this fabric come in tan and grey and in pure white. The white coat grows more and more popular, as well it may, for there is something irresistibly dainty and youthful about a big, wooly, babyish coat of white ratine serge or polo cloth, or the new white terry cloth which resembles Turkish toweling.

The taffeta silk wraps for afternoon wear over summery frocks are adorably quaint and old-fashioned and are trimmed with puffings, quillings and pleatings in true Early Victorian style. Most of these wraps have a mantle or dolman suggestion, and some of them are sleeveless. A melon pink taffeta wrap, worn over a cream net lingerie frock at a recent opening, covered the shoulder and upper arm like a scarf folded around the figure, the folds crossing surplice-wise over the bust. At the back long ends hung below the waist to hip length, as though the scarf had simply been crossed and the ends carried to the back and knotted there.

Fashionable Summer Costumes

THE pannier makes the latest feature of fashion. In its later development, it is graceful and attractive, and many charming gowns are made in this style. It is especially well adapted to foulards, taffetas and other soft silks, but it is being used for materials of many kinds. The gown illustrated combines one of the new flowered silks with plain taffetas, the trimming being of lace, the yoke of net, and the full portions of the blouse of chiffon. The pannier can be made after the manner shown on the figure or with closed front and wide bands, as shown in the small view, while the skirt can be made in walking or round length and finished at the high or the natural waist line. As illustrated, the pannier makes part of a charming afternoon costume. Made with the longer skirt and with a blouse, from which the yoke has been omitted, it would become adapted to dinner and evening wear. In whatever way it is treated, it is charming in a picturesque and interesting way.

For the medium size, the blouse will require 2¼ yards of material 27 inches wide, or 2 yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with ⅜ of a yard 44 inches wide for the full portion, ¾ of a yard 18 inches wide for the yoke, and 5¼ yards of

Dress Pattern No. 7428

Blouse Pattern No 7351
Skirt Pattern No. 7394

Blouse Pattern No. 7425
Skirt Pattern No. 7418

When a New Perfection Comes in at the Door Heat and Dirt Fly Out at the Window.

What would it mean to you to have heat and dirt banished from your kitchen this summer—to be free from the blazing range, free from ashes and soot?

New Perfection
WICK BLUE FLAME
Oil Cook-stove

With the New Perfection Oven, the New Perfection Stove is the most complete cooking device on the market. It is just as quick and handy, too, for washing and ironing.

This Stove saves Time
It saves Labor
It saves Fuel
It saves—YOU

Made with 1, 2 and 3 burners, with long, enameled, turquoise-blue chimneys. Handsomely finished throughout. The 2- and 3-burner stoves can be had with or without a cabinet top, which is fitted with drop shelves, towel racks, etc.

All dealers carry the New Perfection Stove. Free Cook-Book with every stove. Cook-Book also given to anyone sending 5 cents to cover mailing cost.

THE IMPERIAL OIL COMPANY, Limited
Winnipeg, Montreal, St. John, Halifax and Queen City Division, Toronto

See Canada

this summer by making the

St. Lawrence River Trip

1000 Islands
Rapids St. Lawrence
Old Quebec and the wonderful
Saguenay River

VIA THE

Richelieu and Northern Navigation Co.

Delightful Summer Hotels: Manoir Richelieu, Murray Bay, P.Q., Hotel Tadousac, Tadousac, P.Q. - - - - Open early in June.

Rates, folders, etc., from railway and steamship agents or for illustrated booklet "Niagara to the Sea," send six cents postage to

THOS. HENRY
Traffic Manager, Montreal

H. FOSTER CHAFFEE
A.G.P.A., Toronto

"IDEAL" LAWN FENCES AND GATES

FOR CHURCHES, SCHOOLS,
PARKS, CEMETERIES.
TOWN LOTS
AND LAWNS

Not only afford protection but add greatly to the appearance and value of the properties on which they are erected. Ideal Lawn Fence is not expensive. It can be put up at a small cost by anyone. Will accomplish the same results in efficiency and appearance as an iron fence costing many times as much. A postal card will bring our catalogue 132 which shows and describes each Ideal Ornamental Product.

The McGREGOR-BANWELL FENCE CO., Ltd
WALKERVILLE - ONTARIO 13

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

lace; for the pannier will be needed 3½ yards 27 inches wide or 2¼ 36 or 44 inches wide, with ½ yard of silk for bands and 3½ yards of lace; and for the foundation skirt, 3 yards 27 inches, or 2¾ yards 36 or 44 inches wide.

The pattern of blouse, 7218, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 bust measure; of skirt, 7434, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist measure.

Over-blouses of taffeta, worn with lingerie gowns are amongst the smartest of all things this season. All sorts of pretty colors are used for their making, and they are extremely attractive and very generally becoming. The one illustrated is perfectly simple, closing at the shoulder and under arm. It includes a peplum that can be adjusted at either the higher or the natural waist line. The guimpe beneath is a simple one, with the kimono sleeves that are general favorites. The tunic, or upper skirt, is straight, consequently, it suits flouncing and bordered materials peculiarly well; but it can be made from plain material trimmed with equal success. In this case, the tunic is arranged over an entire two-piece skirt, but, if liked, this underskirt can be omitted and a straight band stitched to the tunic beneath the lower edge. The skirt as well as the over-blouse can be finished at either the high or the natural waist line.

For the medium size, the over-blouse will require 1⅜ yards of material 21 or 27 inches wide, or 1⅛ yards of material 36 or 44 inches wide; for the guimpe, 4½ yards 18 inches wide or 1¾ yards 36 or 44 inches wide; for the tunic, 2 yards of flouncing 38 inches wide; and for the foundation skirt, 3 yards 27 inches or 2¼ yards 36 inches wide, to make as illustrated; for the band attached to the lower edge will be required ¾ if a yard 27 inches wide.

The patterns of waist, 7335, and of guimpe, 7292, are both cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust measure; of skirt, 7431, in sizes from 22 to 30 waist measure.

The Lace Blouse

A GREAT richness is given many of the separate blouses this season by a lavish use of heavy laces. One model shows an effective combination of Venetian and Irish lace. The shallow yoke which continues in a panel down the centre-front is made of this lace. On each side of the yoke, and veiled by the Venetian lace, taffeta shading from light to deep primrose is introduced. Irish lace forms the Eton jacket effect which hangs loosely over the girdle of black taffeta. At the left side are a bow and ends of black and primrose taffeta, and in the centre-back this combination is used for a small bow, below which hang two short postilions of Irish lace. The sleeves are entirely of the Venetian lace and are straight and loose without a cuff.

A blouse far removed from the shapeless lace waist of yore is shown in one of the smartest shops. The patterns of the heavy and baby Irish lace, of which the waist is made, show to advantage over a lining of fine black net. A deep V back and front and on the top of each sleeve remains unlined, and so gives a pleasing contrast. The pointed,

Blouse Pattern No. 7218
Skirt Pattern No. 7434

Over-Waist Pattern No. 7335
Guimpe Pattern No. 7292
Skirt Pattern No. 7431

panel-like sash-ends are finished with crochet tassels. The lace hangs in loose Eton effect over the waist line, where a bow of black and cerise liberty satin is placed at the left side; the sleeves are three-quarter length, and the cuff, made in one-piece with the sleeve, fits closely around the arm. The well-fitting, collarless neck is finished by a picot edging.

For Bright June Days

ALMOST numberless materials are being worn this season, but among them all, there is nothing prettier or more fashionable than cotton marquisette. Here are two gowns made thereof, over which is worn a little taffeta coat, and such wraps are among the smartest of all things.

The gown is in semi-princess style, combining a two-piece skirt, which includes a narrow panel at the sides, with a fichu blouse. This blouse can be made with square or high neck, and with long or elbow sleeves, and there is a separate peplum which has been omitted from the gown worn with the coat. The little coatee can be adjusted to either the high or the natural waist line, and can be made either with the rever at the right side or without and with the long postillion or with the short, made either round or pointed. Coats of this kind are made from taffeta in all colors. Black and dark blue are liked by conservative wearers, but lighter, brighter colors are more picturesque and are exceedingly smart. Taffeta, charmeuse and messaline are favorites, but taffeta may be said to have a special vogue. For the gown, all lingerie materials are appropriate.

For the medium size coat will be required 3 yards 27 inches wide, 1¾ yards 36 inches wide, or 1⅝ yards 44 inches wide, with ¾ of a yard 27 inches wide for trimming; for the gown will be required 6¾ yards 27 inches, 6¼ yards 36 inches or 4½ yards 44 inches wide; to trim the skirt as shown in the front view will be needed 2½ yards of wide banding and 2½ yards of narrow insertion; to trim the gown as shown in the back view, 10 yards of edging and 10 yards of insertion, with 1½ yards 18 inches wide for the yoke and sleeves.

The pattern of coatee, 7432, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust measure, and of gown, 7419, in sizes from 34 to 40 bust measure.

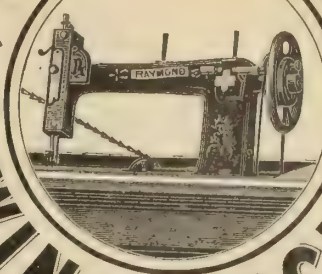
The gown to the right combines marquisette with eyelet embroidery, and it is trimmed with Irish lace banding. The blouse is a very new one with crossed fronts and a vestee, but is closed at the back. If liked, it can be made with high neck and with three-quarter sleeves. The tunic takes exceptionally graceful lines. It is made in three pieces and arranged over a two-piece skirt. It can be adjusted at either the high or the natural waist line, and it can be made in walking or round length. The model is an excellent one for the new fashionable silks as well as for marquisette and other materials of the kind. Dolly Varden Juoy foulard over two-toned taffeta would be charming.

For the medium size blouse will be required 2½ yards 27 inches wide or 1⅝ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with ⅜ of a yard 18 inches wide for the vestee, and 2¾ yards of banding. For the tunic will be needed 3⅝ yards 27 inches or

Blouse Pattern No. 7432
Skirt Pattern No. 7419

Blouse Pattern No. 7354
Skirt Pattern No. 7403

CANADA'S BEST; THE RAYMOND SEWING MACHINE



PUT UP IN HANDSOMELY FINISHED GOLDEN OAK.

Send for prices to the Manufacturers.

EVERY MACHINE GUARANTEED

IT DOES PLAIN OR FANCY WORK.

SEWS PERFECTLY FROM THE LIGHTEST TO THE HEAVIEST GOODS.

GIVE IT A TRIAL.

THE RAYMOND MFG. CO. GUELPH, LIMITED, ONT.

Single Breasted

TRADE MARK

Dr. JAEGER SANITARY WOOLLEN SYSTEM CO., LIMITED

Which, Woollen or Cotton Underwear for Summer?

Non-wool underwear has serious objections. It absorbs and retains moisture, induces chills and is less sanitary than wool.

Jaeger Pure Wool Underwear—very light weight for summer—is free from every objection and is the only really safe underwear. Jaeger Pure Wool should be worn in warm as well as cold weather.

316 St. Catherine Street West, Montreal
231 Yonge Street, Toronto, Ont.
364 Portage Avenue, Winnipeg, Man.

And from JAEGER Agents throughout the Dominion.

Dye Those Summer Things

Scores of Summer things, such as fancy parasols, bathing suits, colored stockings, ribbons, feathers and artificial flowers, hammocks and cushion covers, get faded and dingy long before they are worn out. But with you can give them a new lease of life, usefulness and beauty, and save many a dollar. No stained hands and kettles, no muss, no work to speak of. 24 colors—will give you any shade. Colors 10c. Black 15c.—at your dealers, or post-paid with free booklet, "How to Dye," from

MAYPOLE SOAP
THE CLEAN, EASY HOME DYE

Frank L. Benedict & Co., Montreal

$1.00 for One and a Half Spare Hours

A lady who is getting subscriptions writes: "I have worked seven days and only 1½ hours a day." She earned $7.25. This was her first experience and she is confident of doing better. There is a similar opportunity in every village, town and city for spare-time workers. Write for information. CIRCULATION DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

Just WHY

Old Dutch Cleanser

Scours Your Pots & Pans Without Hard Scraping

Because the fine particles of the Cleanser immediately loosen and remove the hardest "burnt in" food-crusts, which soap-powders and scouring-bricks may only wear off after long, hard scrubbing.

Rinse pot or pan in water; sprinkle on a little Cleanser and rub briskly with scouring brush. Wash and wipe dry. The cleanser removes all grease and "burn" (no tiresome scraping with a knife necessary), and leaves utensils "sweet" and clean.

Many Other Uses and Full Directions on Large Sifter-Can, 10c

2½ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 4 yards of banding; and for the skirt, 4 yards 36 inches wide. The width at the lower edge is 2⅛ yards.

The pattern of this blouse is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 bust measure, and of skirt, 7403, in sizes 22 to 30 waist measure.

Fluffy Ruffles

SOME of the daintiest lingerie dresses for the kiddies are much beruffled. One little model seen had three hemstitched ruffles on the bottom, while others have one and two.

A very pretty variation in trimming is to have the embroidery and lace panel continue from the neck or yoke down to the lower edge, the ruffles not extending across the front.

Long waists are exceedingly popular.

The Fashionable Silk

SILK is one of the smartest materials for street wear this season, and for early summer, it is charming. Taffeta is being much worn, but charmeuse and faille are also much in vogue. In the illustration are shown two costumes that are adapted to any of these silks and also to other materials of the season. The young girl's dress would be exceedingly charming made of linen, pongee or similar fabric.

The suit to the left shows many new features. The skirt is double, there being a complete two-piece underskirt, while the tunic is shaped at the front. This tunic, however, is straight, and it can be made without the shaping if preferred. When treated in this way, it becomes adapted to flouncing and bordered materials, as well as to the plain ones, and if the double skirt is not liked, the straight tunic can be lengthened by means of a band stitched to it beneath the lower edge. Bordered materials are much liked made in this way, with bands of messaline or velvet ribbon.

The coatee is an exceedingly smart one. It is excellent for wear over gowns of lingerie materials as well as for the entire costume, and little wraps of this sort made of colored taffeta are much liked over white gowns.

For the medium size, the coatee will require 3¾ yards of material 27 inches, 2¾ yards 36 inches, or 2¼ yards 44 inches wide, with one yard 27 inches wide for the trimming; for the skirt will be required 6⅜ yards 27 inches, 4½ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 1½ yards for trimming, to make as illustrated. To make from bordered materials will be required 2 yards 38 inches wide, with ¾ of a yard of plain material 27 inches wide for the band.

The pattern of the coatee, 7453, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 inches bust measure; of the skirt, 7431, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist measure.

The young girl's frock is made in the Russian style that is exceedingly fashionable. It gives quite the effect of a coat, but in reality, the three-piece skirt is joined to the three-piece tunic beneath the finished edge. The blouse is a simple one with sewed-in sleeves. In this case, taffeta is trimmed with lace and the neck is made round and the sleeves in elbow length. For a plainer dress, of the more useful sort, linen with trimming of embroidery or heavy lace will be charming. If liked, the neck

Blouse Pattern No. 7453
Skirt Pattern No. 7431

Dress Pattern No. 7441

For every June Social Function

there is a dainty Knox Gelatine dish. Every housewife will find it of the greatest convenience to keep on hand in this month of social activities, a package of Knox Pure Plain Sparkling Gelatine, also a package of Knox Pure Sparkling Acidulated Gelatine. Here is a simple Knox recipe

Fruit Foam

½ box Knox Gelatine — 2 eggs
1 cup cold water — Sugar
3 cups crushed strawberries, raspberries or currant juice

Soak gelatine in cold water 5 minutes. Heat crushed berries, or juice: pour over gelatine, sweeten to taste. Stir until gelatine is dissolved, let it stand in cool place until nearly set. Then add whites of eggs, beaten stiff, and beat well into the jelly. Mold and serve with whipped cream or a custard sauce made of yokes of the eggs.

KNOX PURE PLAIN SPARKLING GELATINE enables you to prepare countless dainty desserts and delightful candies for receptions, parties, luncheons, church festivals and other social functions, using your own fresh cut fruits or nuts for ingredients and flavor.

Knox Pure Sparkling Acidulated Gelatine

is exactly the same as the Plain, with an extra envelope of pure concentrated fruit juice added. Most Gelatine recipes require lemon juice and here you have it without taking the time to squeeze lemons.

Each package—Plain or Acidulated—contains a tablet in separate envelope for coloring, if desired.

Each makes two full quarts (½ gallon) of jelly, or four times as much as "ready-prepared" packages, and you know the ingredients when it is made of Knox Gelatine.

Visit Our New Factory

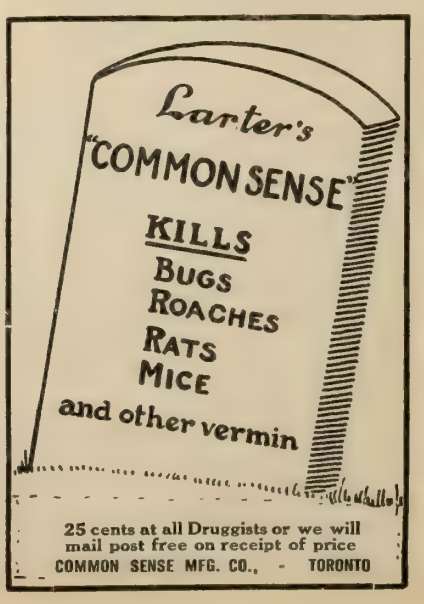
if you are in the neighborhood of Johnstown. It will give you even more of an appetite for Knox desserts to see how daintily Knox Gelatine is handled.

Knox Recipe Book FREE

for your grocer's name. Contains over 100 recipes for Desserts, Salads, Candies, Jellies, Puddings, Ice Cream, Sherbets, etc.

Pint sample for 2c. stamp and grocer's name.

CHARLES B. KNOX CO.
501 Knox Ave., Johnstown, N.Y.
BRANCH FACTORY:—MONTREAL



25 cents at all Druggists or we will mail post free on receipt of price
COMMON SENSE MFG. CO., - TORONTO

Cravenette
is a private registered word, that is confined exclusively to shower-proof cloth and coats, proofed by the Cravenette Co., Limited. Obtainable at leading stores.
23
The Cravenette Co. Limited
Bradford, England.
If you cannot obtain goods write
Cravenette Co. P.O. Box 1934
MONTREAL, QUE.

SEND "IT" TO

Silks, Satins, Velvets, Feathers, Gloves, Ladies and Men's Suits, Curtains, Blankets, Rugs cleaned thoroughly without impairing fabric or finish.

Send your nice things to Fountain.

We pay express one way on goods from out of town.

Write for free copy of our book, which tells all about our work and our prices.

Fountain "My Valet"
30 Adelaide St. W., Toronto.
17

QUEEN'S

ARTS, EDUCATION, THEOLOGY, MEDICINE, SCIENCE, including ENGINEERING

Arts Summer Session
July 3 to Aug. 17

The Arts course may be taken by correspondence, but students desiring to graduate must attend one session.

Short Course for Teachers and general students July 10th to 31st.

For calendars write the Registrar
G. Y. CHOWN
Kingston, Ont.
20

UNIVERSITY
KINGSTON ○ ○ ○ ONTARIO

IF YOU CARRY A
"SWAN"
FOUNT-PEN

you are always ready to "jot it down." The "Swan" has no intricate or delicate parts—consequently it never gets out of order, and is always ready to write without adjusting or coaxing. Good for a lifetime. Sold by Stationers. $2.50 upwards.

CATALOGUE FREE
MABIE, TODD & CO.
124 York St., Toronto
London New York Chicago

BUST AND HIPS

Every woman who attempts to make a dress or shirt waist immediately discovers how difficult it is to obtain a good fit by the usual "trying-on-method," with herself for the model and a looking-glass with which to see how it fits at the back

"HALL-BORCHERT PERFECTION Adjustable Dress Forms"

do away with all discomforts and disappointments in fitting, and render the work of dressmaking at once easy and satisfactory. This form can be adjusted to 50 different shapes and sizes; bust raised or lowered, also made longer and shorter at the waist line and form raised or lowered to suit any desired skirt length. Very easily adjusted, cannot get out of order, and will last a lifetime.

Write for illustrated Booklet containing complete line of Dress Forms with prices.

Hall-Borchert Dress Form Co.
of Canada, Limited.
70-72 Pearl St., Toronto, Can.

can be finished with a standing collar and the sleeves made long.

For the sixteen-year size will be needed 6¾ yards of material 27 inches, 4 yards 36 inches, or 3¼ yards 44 inches wide, with 1¼ yards of allover lace 18 inches wide and ¾ of a yard of lace edging for the undersleeves.

The pattern, 7441, is cut in sizes for 16 and 18 years, and is well adapted for small women.

mpire Night Gown

THE Empire night gown is always a pretty one. Illustrated is one of the very newest, the body portion of which is cut in one piece with the sleeves. It can be made with V-shaped or square neck, and it will be found suited to all materials that are used for gowns, including cross-barred and all dotted muslins as well as plain batiste and the like. If a very elaborate effect is wanted the entire body portion could be cut from allover embroidery while the lower part is from batiste or lawn. Trimming always can be any preferred banding, or beading can be used to cover the seam joining the yoke and body portion, while the neck and sleeves are finished with embroidery.

The upper or body portion of the gown is made in one piece, and the lower full portion in two pieces. Whether the neck is made V-shaped or square the gown is simply drawn on over the head.

For the medium size will be required 4 yards of material 36, 3½ yards 44 inches wide, with 1¼ yards of insertion and 2 yards of narrow lace, 2¼ yards of beading and 3 yards of wide lace to make as shown in front view; 1½ yards of banding, 2½ yards of edging, and 1¼ yards of beading to make as shown in back view.

Nightgown Pattern No. 7299

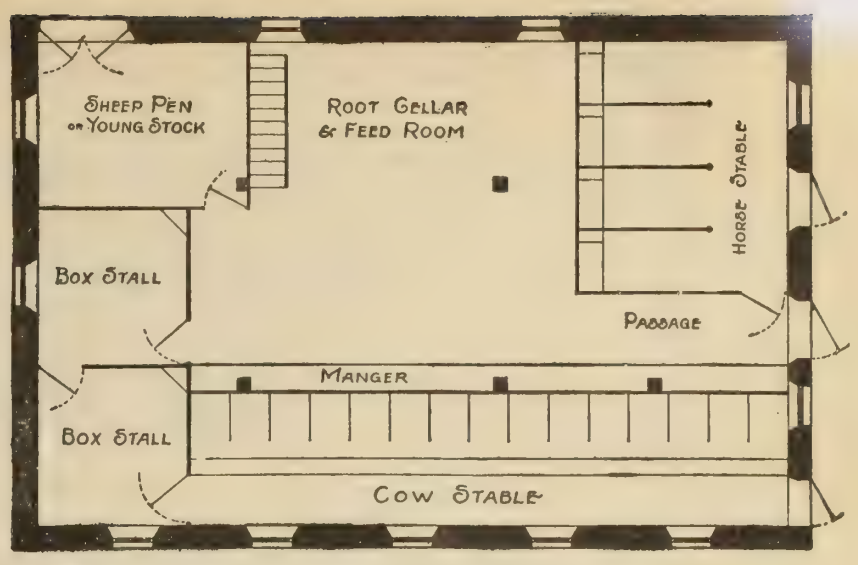
The pattern, No. 7299, is cut in three sizes, small 34 or 36, medium 38 or 40, large 42 or 44, bust.

Child's Dress with Bloomers

THE frock that is made with bloomers to match is one of the most practical that the little girl can wear. It does away with the need for petticoats and is thoroughly comfortable and at the same time it is absolutely protective. This one is made in the simple style that is so much in vogue, but with separate sleeves that are attached below the shoulder line, such sleeves making one of the newest features of fashion. The model will be found an excellent one for all the simple materials that are liked for little girls' dresses. This one is made from



One of the modern barn plans prepared by our Builders' Service Dept.

Above is shown one of the modern barn plans prepared by our "Builders' Service Dept." Others are shown in a portfolio that will be mailed to you on receipt of the coupon attached to this ad, properly filled out.

If you will tell us the size of the barn you expect to build, and the number of cattle you want to house, our Board of Advisers, consisting of ten of the best barn builders and contractors in the Dominion, will co-operate with you to plan a building exactly suited to your own particular requirements.

This service is offered to you FREE of charge. It's our way of showing our appreciation of the generous and hearty support the farmers and builders of Canada have given our products, particularly Preston Safe-Lock Shingles.

Preston Safe-Lock Shingles merit the tremendous demand they enjoy to-day, for they afford guaranteed protection against lightning. They keep out the rain, snow, moisture, wind and fire, too. They cost nothing for up-keep, as they never need painting or repairs.

Our latest edition of "Truth About Roofing" booklet tells all about them. We'll send a copy along with the Portfolio of Barn Plans. You want the Portfolio, that's certain, if you intend to build. So send the coupon by first mail. Address it to

G. Dolph Manager
Metal Shingle & Siding Co., Limited
Branch Office and Factory, Montreal, Que. Preston, Ont.

Please send me portfolio of Barn Plans showing framework construction and plans of interior. I intend building a barn.....ft. by.....ft. Do you intend re-roofing or re-siding any building this year? (Yes or No.)

Name

P. O. Address

County

Province

Paper

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

201

That Corn Will Go for Good

It will be ended forever in 48 hours, if you use a Blue-jay plaster.

The pain ends instantly when you apply it. Then the B & B wax gently loosens the corn. In two days it comes out, root and all.

No soreness, no discomfort. Nothing else known does what Blue-jay does.

That's why millions use it. You will never let corns disturb you when you find this out.

Nor will you ever pare them. Paring takes off just the top of the corn. And a slip of the blade means infection — sometimes a dangerous one.

The right way—the easy way—is to end them completely with this famous Blue-jay plaster. Prove it today.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

Blue-jay Corn Plasters

Sold by Druggists—15c and 25c per package

Sample Mailed Free. Also Blue-jay Bunion Plasters (152)

Bauer & Black, Chicago and New York, Makers of B & B Handy Package Absorbent Cotton, etc.

Gerhard Heintzman Pianos
Pianos of Prestige

DON'T BE MISLED

by the appearance of a piano or by salesmen's arguments. The lasting tone qualities are its real value.

On any piano the mere note may be struck, but rare indeed is the instrument with voice so subtle that through it the real soul of the music can be born anew.

The Gerhard Heintzman
Canada's Greatest Piano

has a "voice" at once so sweet and searching, so infinitely mellow and compelling, so majestic in its sweeping power that the very essence of music is extracted by the magic of its tone.

Over 20,000 purchasers of GERHARD HEINTZMAN pianos in Canada can testify to its enduring tone qualities. Can you buy a piano without first hearing for yourself this magnificent instrument.

We will be pleased to demonstrate our pianos to you at our display rooms where you can carefully judge them without feeling the least obligation to buy.

Our new descriptive booklet sent free. Used instruments taken in exchange.
Convenient payments readily arranged.

Gerhard Heintzman, Limited

New Salesrooms:
41-43 Queen Street West (Opposite City Hall)
TORONTO

New Salesroom in Hamilton next to Post Office

Are Your Walls In Style

Kalsomine and wall paper are hardly up-to-date. Tinted walls are now the vogue. And by far the most popular are those tinted with Alabastine, the sale of which has doubled during the last two years. Alabastine tints possess that soft, velvety, restful effect considered so desirable by fashion authorities. With the 21 tints and white, any desired color combination can be produced quite easily. Mix Alabastine with cold water and apply with a flat bristle brush. Anyone can do it. Alabastine is an Alabaster rock cement. Its colors are permanent. It won't rub off. You can redecorate any time without scraping or washing off the previous coat. The most sanitary, durable, economical and stylish wall decoration.

CHURCH'S COLD WATER Alabastine

FREE STENCILS To enable those who use Alabastine to secure the most beautiful and artistic effects we will have our expert decorators prepare suitable Color Schemes free of charge, and in addition give Free Stencils. Write to-day for particulars and handsome booklet. For sale by all Hardware and Paint Dealers.

THE ALABASTINE CO., Limited
25 Willow St., Paris, Ont. 10

OF IMPORTANCE TO EVERY ONE WHO NEEDS MONEY

Tell your friends and neighbors that to secure a pin, or some other desired article, you are raising a club of subscribers for the Journal. In nearly every case you will get an order. With the commission you earn you can buy the premium. One worker in every town should earn $10 to $100 every month. Write for terms to representatives of the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

rose colored linen with fancy stitching of white as a finish. The high neck and the long sleeves are comfortable for cold weather, but round neck and short sleeves are preferred by many mothers and worn by many children at all seasons. The dress can be finished in that way, if liked.

The dress is cut all in one piece. The sleeves are separate and stitched to the armhole edges. The opening is cut at the front and underfaced. The belt holds the garment in place at the waist line. The bloomers are circular in shape, smoothly fitting at the waist line and full enough for comfort at the knees. They are joined to a belt and closed at the sides.

Dress Pattern No. 7251

For a girl of 6 years of age the dress will require 3 yards of material 27, 2¼ yards 36, 1⅞ yards 44 inches wide, and 2 yards 27, 1⅜ yards 36, ⅞ yard 44 inches wide for the bloomers.

The pattern, No. 7251, is cut in sizes for girls of 4, 6 and 8 years of age.

Circular Open Drawers

DRAWERS that are smoothly fitting over the hips but that flare comfortably and generously at the knees always are favorites. These are cut in that way. They can be finished with circular frills or with straight gathered frills.

The drawers are made with circular leg portions and when circular frills are used they are joined to straight edges. When gathered frills are used the edges can be left straight, or shaped as shown in one of the small views. The fullness at the back can be arranged in inverted plaits or gathers or the drawers can be cut off in habit style. In any case they are under-faced at the upper edge and closed at the back.

Drawers Pattern No. 7306

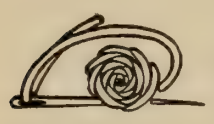
For the drawers with circular frills will be required 2¼ yards of material 36 or 44 inches wide with 3½ yards of edging and 8½ yards of insertion to trim as illustrated; for the plain drawers will be needed 1¾ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, and for the gathered frills 3½ yards of embroidery 8 inches wide.

The pattern, No. 7306, is cut in sizes for a 24, 26, 28, 30, 32 and 34-inch waist measure.

UP-TO-DATE EMBROIDERIES

THERE is such a constant demand for new ideas that the old world has been visited and many of its most beautiful embroideries and treasures have been modernized, reproduced and adapted to our modern needs, and the result is that seldom before have so many new and beautiful embroideries been brought together as the spring of 1912 has produced, and they are quite different in form and coloring, but all seem to be adapted effectively to many different materials.



Method of Making Rose

To one of the needlework novelties here shown has been given a name which is very descriptive, and one desires to at once know what this embroidery is like, the designs are so fascinating in their daintiness. This embroidery is known as the "Little Rose" or "Rambler Rose." It is the rose itself which this embroidery distinctly features, and the method of making it will be clearly understood by studying the diagram.

We show one rose in the process of making, and it will be seen that it consists of overlapping rows of outline stitch, which look very simple, but the art is in the building up of the centre of the rose before the outline stitches are commenced.

No. 8196—Cushion. 60 cents.

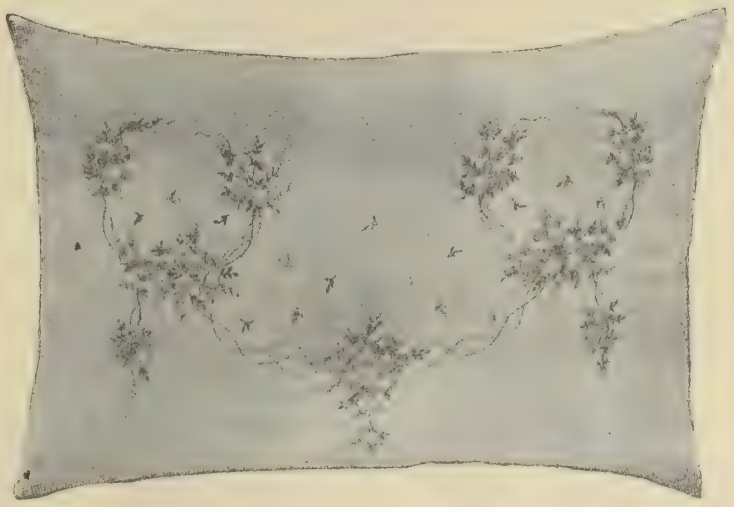
To commence the rose, which we will suppose is to be worked in pinks, thread a needle with rope silk (using one which will carry the silk easily) and insert the needle in the middle of one of the little rose forms, making a cross stitch. Make a series of cross stitches, turning to form a circle and spreading each stitch a little outward, crossing in different directions, until they form a little mound, which should be almost the size of the rose, and about a quarter of an inch high. Of course, this size varies with that of the rose, on larger roses the centre mound needs to be larger, but on small groups the above directions will be found satisfactory. Then make two or three small French knots on top of the centre point of the roses, using a dark shade, and commence the outline stitches which form the outer surface of the rose. The first few rows should be worked around in a circle with a needle well inserted under each preceding row, using long outline stitches and making one stitch lie well under the other. The rows of outline stitches near the outer edges are worked closely together, but not so directly under preceding rows as they are at the beginning, and thus the rose gradually flattens towards the edge. With a little practice it becomes an easy matter to work these compact little button roses, which may be said to pad themselves. About three shades may be used to work one of these roses darker towards the centre and about six shades of pink or any preferred colorings may be used on a piece of embroidery, as different roses may be worked, making some light and some dark. Rope silk is used for the roses and it is a good plan to have a needle threaded with one each of the shades conveniently at hand.

No. 7169—Scarf, 22 x 54. $1.50.

The leaves are worked in the familiar lazy daisy stitch and form a dainty setting for the clusters of roses, many designs for which show baskets and ribbons combined with the roses and leaves. Suitable materials for these designs are heavy brown linens, and one of the cushions, 8196, and centrepiece, 2242, come already tinted on a suitable grey linen. No. 6512 is not tinted, and a centrepiece matching this may be supplied in either 22, 27 or 36-inch.

No. 8185—Cushion. 60 cents.



No. 6512—Cushion. 60 cents.

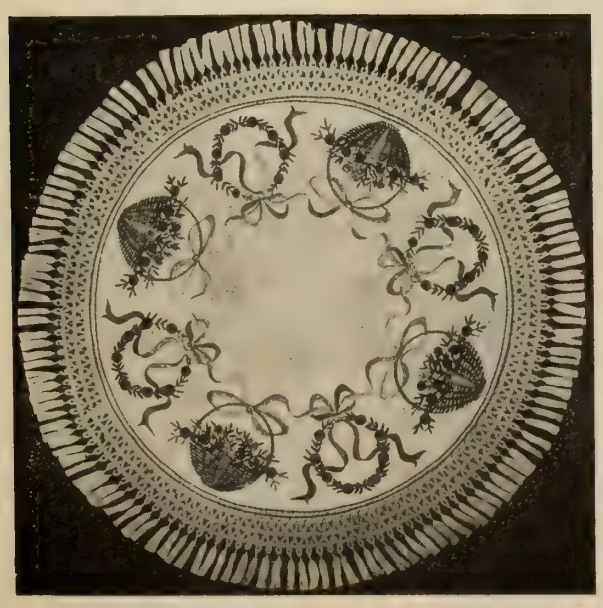
Another effective application of the Rambler Rose is for waists, and beautiful examples of this have been shown on voile and linen, which have been embroidered in white. The method of embroidering is the same, the remainder of the designs being embroidered in solid padded satin stitch.

Another novel embroidery is known as the Wood Bead, and is another handsome imported novelty, and its application to articles of household decoration is entirely new. The large Wood Bead is the one that is used for this new work, and is peculiarly adapted to fruit designs, both in regard to color effect and size. This embroidery is so realistic that it cannot fail to become popular, and another thing in its favor is that it works up so rapidly. One has only to slip a bead over the needle, take a stitch or two in the material and a berry is produced.

The scarf and cushion illustrated is a beautiful arrangement of mountain ash worked with reddish shades of beads and combined with solid embroidery. The bands which form the background for the graceful groups of berries are couched with rope silk, using black and water greens. This combination is beautiful.

The prices quoted in these colnmns are for stamped or tinted linens only, as we do not supply embroidered articles. We will quote on request prices for silks, beads, fringes, and any other supplies which may be needed to complete these embroideries.

For further information regarding any of the articles described in these columns, Address Belding, Paul, Corticelli, Limited, Dept. L. Montreal, P. Q.



No. 2242—27-inch. 55 cents.

IF YOU WILL SEND US

— 35 CENTS —

we will send you

8 SKEINS OF EMBROIDERY SILK

which is sufficient to finish a

15 INCH CENTRE PIECE

which is stamped for

"THE NEW HEATHER EMBROIDERY"

This is the very latest embroidery which will be fashionable for 1912.

We will

SUPPLY FREE

sufficient lace to edge this Centre Piece, and the diagram enclosed will furnish full instructions for this beautiful embroidery which is simple but effective.

Send at once as this generous offer is made for a short period only.

Our Art Embroidery Silks are the best on the market.

Send 10 cents for a copy of Belding's Needle and Hook Book which contains all the latest suggestions for Art Embroidery. :: ::

Address

BELDING, PAUL, CORTICELLI
LIMITED

Dept. L MONTREAL, P.Q.

"Breakfast Ready?"

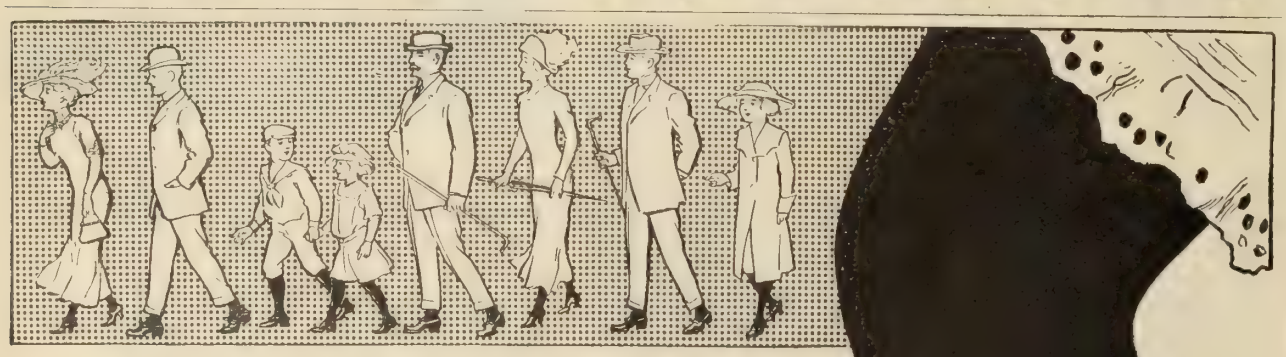
Kiddies don't have to be coaxed to "eat up all your cereal, now!" when they face a big plateful of these delicious, crisp, flaked hearts of sugar corn; nor do grown-ups. Every morsel delights and nourishes. Give your folks plenty of

Kellogg's TOASTED CORN FLAKES

10c. Per Pkg.

Look for signature "W. K. Kellogg" on the package

44



Learn now of Hosiery Really Fault-Free!

Let your next hosiery purchase be Pen-Angle. Examine these perfected stockings or socks closely when the clerk shows them to you. Notice the utter absence of the clumsy, troublesome seams you have been wearing. Hold them up and study how the shape has been knit into them---not the fabric dragged into shape as in all other hose. And then, when you wear them, see how snug and neat their fit ----how shape-retaining their method of manufatcture---how long-wearing our exclusive knitting process makes it sure your hose will be---once you cease casual buying and demand only

71

WARRANTED HIGH PENMAN'S GRADE HOSIERY

Pen-Angle

Full-Fashioned Seamless Hosiery

Made by Penmans Limited, Paris, Canada

UNDERWEAR, SWEATERS, HOSIERY

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Canadian Girls' Club

If you wanted to earn a few dollars for — oh, for many things; if you were an interested reader of the JOURNAL; if you could name a dozen or twenty or fifty neighbors and relatives and friends who would like the JOURNAL very much if they knew of it; wouldn't you be glad to tell them about it and earn some money in your spare time.

Experiences

"Dear Secretary:

"The beautiful set of pins have just reached me. I certainly do appreciate them. How you can give them besides all the commissions and salary, I scarcely understand, but I am accepting them all thankfully. I am hoping to get the watch, too, in another month.

"I am so glad that I wrote to you. It has been a pleasant surprise to find that I could get so many subscribers. A dozen at most was what I hoped for, but then I became so interested, and everyone appreciates the Journal so much that the field has developed. I have so many names of friends of my subscribers that I can scarcely find time to call on them all. So I would better start right now, would I not?

"Very sincerely,
"S. L."

"Dear Secretary:

"Thanks for the salary, check, it came just when I needed so many spring things. You certainly are generous.

"I'll have another big list of subscribers for you soon. All my girl friends and subscribers have given me names of their friends, and with these introductions I am having fine luck. Is it the Journal or myself that makes everyone so cordial? Both, I guess, for they say I am so enthusiastic they like to hear me, and I certainly couldn't talk so if I were not sure they would like the Journal, and if it were not Canadian. I hope everyone else is having as much success and enjoyment.

"Je vous salve
(As the French say)
"R. G."

"Dear Secretary:

"I received from you last Wednesday, copies of the 'Canadian Home Journal,' order blanks and other information which I have found to be of great assistance to me in securing subscriptions for your splendid magazine.

"Enclosed you will find the money for the first twenty-five. I am sure I can send in fifty before the end of the month.

"Thanking for you the opportunity given for the earning of a little extra money, I am, sincerely,

"J. G."

If you like the JOURNAL, and can spare a little time to work, won't you also join the club. We have members from coast to coast, single ladies, and married ladies, young and old. Let me tell you about the club, anyway.

Secretary,
Canadian Girls' Club,
CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

DAINTY SUMMER WEAR

Coiffure Pins and Combs

AFTER an absence of several seasons from the forefront of fashion, shell back-combs are again making an appearance. Many of the women at Palm Beach this winter wore rhinestone and pearl-set pins across the top of a low hairdressing at the back; and almost every woman had two or three of the fancy, two-pronged hairpins thrust into her coiffure. These large pins suggest a wealth of luxuriant tresses which require massive pins to hold them in place, though of course the coiffure now is built carefully with many small wire hairpins, and the larger two-prong pins are added afterward as ornaments. There is more skill than the average woman realizes in the placing of these massive pins, which by their adjustment may be made to suggest dignity, youthfulness, coquetry and many other effects.

At the top of the head a tall comb always gives a stately suggestion—the tall shell comb over which the Spanish woman drapes her mantilla being an example of this. Two combs protruding from a low coiffure at the sides of the head suggest girlishness, as do the outstanding loops of a hair ribbon. Thrust into the coiffure at jaunty angles, the shell pins may be very coquettish—but the woman with a natural instinct for artistic dressing will know without being told how to adjust her coiffure pins to give the most becoming effect, and the woman without the coquettish instinct will wisely follow the unexaggerated and conventional fashion in arranging her hair and hairpins.

The prettiest of the new coiffure pins are set with rhinestones, the tops having bowknot, butterfly and lyre shapes and the rhinestones showing to splendid advantage against dark hair. There are also pearl-set pins and handsome pins with jet settings for older women. Some of the pins are in platinum finish and look very like real platinum, and there are plain, heavy shell pins with rounded tops, which look well in wavy thick hair, simply arranged. Sometimes several pins are used at one side of the coiffure and none at the other side; in fact, one-sided hair arrangements are much in vogue in Paris, and rolls, puffs, and coils are placed at odd angles on the head in most unsymmetrical but exceedingly chic effect.

But, however the back of the hair may be dressed, the line over the top of the head, from brow to crown, must be kept as flat as possible. If the natural hair is very fluffy and wavy at this point a barrette or shell comb is thrust into the pompadour, or just back of the parting, to keep the coiffure flat on top and preserve the contour of the head at this point.

The Trousseau

EVERY trousseau is a revelation of the individuality that marks each woman's choice in patterns. No two order sets exactly of the same design. Fewer white petticoats figure in the modern trousseau than in the one of old, but there is always the chance that the changing vogues may bring those delightful garments into wear again, and the outlook at present is decidedly favorable for their reappearance.

It is noticeable that in many sets of whitewear there are no ribbon runners, for the fashion for threading narrow ribbons and broad ones into every item of underwear has been greatly overdone, and the expected revulsion has occurred, leaving the clothes absolutely white and as plain and simple as can be, withal of the most delicate possible hand stitchery, fine lace and exquisite embroideries.

Real lace of the most exquisite quality, hand-embroidery of the daintiest and linen or batiste in the daintiest of webs go to make up the the daintiest of webs go to make up the lingerie of the bridal trousseau, but there must also be distinction of design and a little originality in the models if the modern bride is to be altogether pleased with her outfit.

Most fascinating among the lingerie now shown in fashionable shops for the trousseau are the filmy garments made in exact reproduction of some of the wonderful pieces of French needlework which were included in the wardrobe of Marie Antoinette and which have been faithfully preserved so that they may serve as models for all this sort of handiwork. Even the most exacting bride must fail to find any fault in these fragile creations. Three-piece sets made on these Marie Antoinette designs are of hand-drawn linen of the sheerest quality. The design of the gown is a very interesting one, for the two sides are different over the shoulders. The drapery of lace which is carried across the bust forms a sleeve over one arm and over the other it is allowed to droop off the arm, displaying the shoulder, as is the fashion in some evening gowns. The garment is supported on this shoulder by a straight strap.

Another fascinating feature of this design is the apparent looping up of the skirt or lower edge of the garment. The left side of the skirt is slashed from the lower edge, the lace border being carried up on both slashed edges and finished with a bow of ribbon.

Filet lace is now used as much on lingerie as on other garments, and some of the most beautiful of the new gowns show this lace employed with lierre, Cluny, Irish or Valenciennes. In some of the newest and most attractive gowns there is no hand-embroidery employed. Several kinds of lace furnish the variety needed for working out the design of the trimming instead of the embroidery being used with the lace for this purpose.

The fichu effect is apparent in many of the most interesting of the new gowns. In one very new model filet and Point de Comyn lace are used to form this fichu. The back of the yoke of this gown is quite square and cut very low. The gown has a box pleat from the shoulders.

Although Irish crochet lace has been so much used that it can no longer be considered as exemplifying the newest fashions, there is still much of it used for trimming gowns and combinations, because it makes such an exquisite contrast to the lighter laces and may also be relied upon to launder and clean so very well. Embroidered linen and Irish insertions with wider pieces of Valenciennes is a favorite and effective combination both for gowns and the other pieces of the set. When expense is a matter that must be considered, there are very charming effects to be obtained from the mingling of fine hand-embroidery and narrow Valenciennes lace. One of the new Empire models, than which nothing could be prettier, shows this combination of trimming. There is also a new model, which, although short waisted at the sides and back, has a straight panel piece down the front.

White Blouses Will Be Popular

THERE is to be a revival in white blouses for the spring, according to fashion reports from Paris. The smartly dressed woman in tailored costume is to have a blouse of snowy lawn, with long sleeves ruffled at the wrists and high collar, in place of the ninon design, to tone with the costume of the present season.

After having stoutly insisted on blouses of the latter type for some sea-

Good Cheer
THE FURNACE WITH A REAL WATER PAN
WARM AIR
FURNACES STAND FOR QUALITY
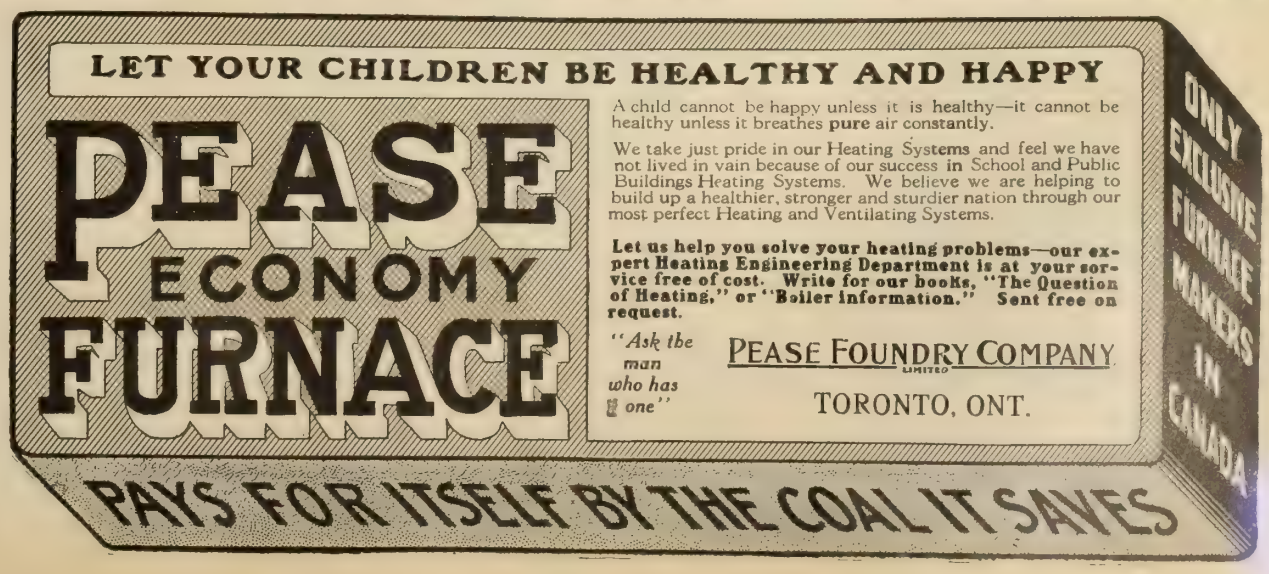
& SATISFACTION
A Winter Warmth in the home like the breath of a day in June, compared to the July-like dryness and intensity of the furnace heat with which you are familiar. It's all in the big CIRCLE WATER-PAN with its adequate provision for humidifying the heated air, and a furnace construction absolutely gas and dust tight.
The James Stewart Manufacturing Company, Limited
WOODSTOCK ONT
WINNIPEG MAN
FURNACE CATALOGUE MAILED ON REQUEST
1

MURESCO
Only One Coat Required. Easy to apply.
Muresco can be applied by anyone, to any kind of surface. It will not rub off or peel, shows no laps, spots or brush marks, and is the only material producing that flat, subdued, velvety effect, so much admired. It is made in a large variety of handsome tints and colors, also white. Ready for use when mixed with hot water. It can be recoated any number of times and removed easily by washing when desired, thus insuring walls being kept in perfect condition. Beware of wall finishes containing lime or plaster that cannot be removed by washing when desired; they are neither practical nor sanitary, and will eventually peel off, leaving the walls in ruined condition.
Muresco is in use by the best decorators in the country, and sold by leading paint dealers everywhere.
Send for sample cards, descriptive matter and prices.
BENJAMIN MOORE & CO.
Limited
Sole Mfgs., Toronto, Canada
New York Chicago Carteret Cleveland

Canadian Home Journal Patterns
12 Cents Each
Are the SIMPLEST to Use



LET YOUR CHILDREN BE HEALTHY AND HAPPY
PEASE ECONOMY FURNACE
A child cannot be happy unless it is healthy—it cannot be healthy unless it breathes pure air constantly.
We take just pride in our Heating Systems and feel we have not lived in vain because of our success in School and Public Buildings Heating Systems. We believe we are helping to build up a healthier, stronger and sturdier nation through our most perfect Heating and Ventilating Systems.
Let us help you solve your heating problems—our expert Heating Engineering Department is at your service free of cost. Write for our books, "The Question of Heating," or "Boiler Information." Sent free on request.
"Ask the man who has one"
PEASE FOUNDRY COMPANY LIMITED
TORONTO, ONT.
ONLY EXCLUSIVE FURNACE MAKERS IN CANADA
PAYS FOR ITSELF BY THE COAL IT SAVES

Every Woman Who Has Ever Worn A

Priestley's

Gown or Skirt

knows what thorough satisfaction she had out of every yard of "Priestley's" cloth.

Whether it was a soft, delicately tinted Silk-and-Wool Cloth for house or evening wear — a fine Twill or Coating Serge— or a "Priestley's" Cravenette — the service was equally satisfactory.

Ask your dealer to show you the new weaves and colors in "Priestley's" Gown, Suit and Skirt fabrics.

"Priestley's Limited" stamped every 5 yards on the selvedge. 2

WONDER-SHINE

SILVER CLEANER

for cleaning SILVER, GOLD & PLATEWARE without rubbing

the Harmless Rub-less Polish

AT ALL DEALERS

25¢ & 50¢ a package

Have City Conveniences

REPLACE the pestilent, draughty, dangerous and offensive out-of-doors closet with an indoors closet which requires no sewer, no plumbing, and no flushing system. Have city conveniences in your home. Safeguard family health by installing a

"Tweed" Closet

sanitary and odorless

"Tweed Closets" can be installed in the bathroom, cellar, or any other convenient place indoors, merely requiring to be connected by a pipe for ventilation with a chimney hole. "Tweed" Liquid Chemical, used in connection with "Tweed" Closets is both a deodorant and a disinfectant. Many hundreds of "Tweed" Closets have been sold in Canada. Send for illustrated price list.

The Steel Trough & Machine Co. Limied

1 James Street -:- TWEED, ONT.

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL TEETH IN THE WORLD

Dentyne Peroxide TOOTH PASTE

CONTAINS OXYGEN

DENTISTS RECOMMEND IT

25c at all first-class Druggists or by mail postpaid from

F. L. BENEDICT & CO. - - MONTREAL

sons back Parisiennes have already gone over to white and cream blouses entirely, the models being in fine net, daintily trimmed with lace and fine tucks or fine lawn with similar trimmings.

Blouses in white lawns and nets are being worn in Paris even with the heaviest of velvet or tweed costumes, and there are many smart designs in white satin, white mousseline de soie or white Crepe.

Two Parisian ideas of the white blouse for tailor mades were seen recently. In one design of fine lawn, inset with insertion and trimmed with tucks and embroidery, there was a narrow frill of lace down each side of the box plait in front, the sleeves coming nearly to the wrists. The other, in mousseline de soie, had a deep hemstitched revers on one side and lace on the other, and in both cases the collars were high.

Nearly all the blouses in Paris have high collars, and very often plaited frills of the materials fall over the hands from the long sleeves. Sometimes the high collars have a frill of lace along the top, but this fashion is only becoming to a few.

The satin blouses are mostly tailored, though they have none of the severity once associated with the word tailor made. They have long sleeves and tucked shoulders and yokes, some being softened in one way or another by dainty little frills of net or lace.

Some of the lawn blouses have lace and hand-embroidery introduced in the frills and collars, but many are severely simple, though fine, and here again one finds the models with adjustable collars, allowing for the use of separate stocks and frills.

The Matter of Millinery

THE question of what is the most fashionable hat is a somewhat disputed one, but the hat that suits one's individuality is really the correct hat, and so its choice is dependent on the woman herself. There are a few fashion features about the new millinery that should be considered, however. They are as follows: If the hat has a rolling brim turning quite high on one side, the trimming should also be rather high, but placed on the other side of the hat. If the hat has a drooping brim, or one with a slight roll, the trimming should not be too high. Most of the trimming on the new hats is placed on the right side, very much nearer the front than it was this past fall and winter.

Many flowers will be used on the summer hats. The first spring models showed few, if any, but as the season advances the desire for flower trimming is growing rapidly. There are to be small turbans almost covered with tiny roses or violets; there are to be high-standing clusters of flowers on the picture shapes, while some of the models with drooping brims will have two or three large single blossoms as their trimming.

Ostrich plumes that are not too heavy will be used a good deal, especially in black and white, while feather effects, or "feather fancies," as they are called, will be very much the vogue.

Lace of all kinds will be seen on the summer models.

Blocked hats seem more fashionable than those of straw braid, though, of course, the latter are always conservative and in good style. The Leghorn and light-weight straws have their brims faced with velvet or taffeta silk, which, by the way, is used a good deal for covering crowns, or for bows, rosettes, and fancy wing effects. The head sizes remain large, no bandeaux are used, and the hats set well down on the head.

The Summer Wardrobe

UNLESS one plans carefully and knows before the first dress is bought just what the complete summer wardrobe is to include, ultimate satisfaction cannot be expected.

First on the list of requisites is a good, light-weight woollen suit of serge, homespun or lightweight ratine. This will answer admirably for traveling. Four tailored blouses of white China silk, made on strictly mannish lines, with turn-back link cuffs and worn with a separate, soft, turndown collar of pique, and a silk four-in-hand tie, would make this traveling outfit complete. These silk shirts wash well and easily, and, with homespun skirts, serve equally well for tennis. The hat for this suit should be a straw shape on the order of the velours, and felt hats, that have been worn for sporting uses all winter. This should be in a neutral color, so that it may be worn with almost anything, and trimmed with some simple decoration, such as a rosette, a quill or a pompom. With this suit, chamois gloves and low tan shoes with silk or lisle thread stockings to match are proper. And just a word about chamois gloves: be sure to get them in as heavy a quality as possible and with pricked seams. These are smartest and will keep their shape and appearance the longest. Those with arrow-back stitchings are somewhat scarce, but straight, heavily seamed backs do practically as well. Dead white is preferable to yellow, but there is no real objection to the latter.

Then there should be one serviceable, but not too severe, stuff frock for semi-dress occasions, such as a small luncheon on a day too damp for muslins. Nothing answers this purpose better than a foulard or a cotton voile with either a bordered or an allover pattern. Taffeta is, of course, the rage, but it does not wear as well as some other materials. To wear with this dress a hat in colors that will harmonize with other gowns should be chosen. A good French model is a black straw in a medium size, trimmed with American beauty velvet ribbon and large roses. Of course, it is always safe to choose an all-black hat or one of white and black. The shoes for this costume should be black, preferably dull calf or kid, rather than patent leather.

New Neckwear Features

FOR the neck there is a revival of a former fashion which was always found becoming. This is the wearing of the white tulle ruche which is so charming a finish for a light dress. The ruches only go around the neck—they do not extend to the shoulders, and are not finished with bows or ends as has been done formerly. They fasten tightly around the throat framing the face. Although white is the most dressy, they are pretty in colors to tone with the costume.

The high collar has so come to its own again that one of the new dresses shows a collar that turns over at the back, and reminds the fashion student of a style in vogue about twenty years ago, when the fashion books show collars that were boned and wired to stand out above the line of the throat.

Jabots of various kinds are seen, although the one-sided frill which has had such a run is dead, or at any rate is not worn by the best dressed people. A long double frill of plaited muslin reaching nearly to the waist is liked.

There are a number of novel ideas in bows, some with a single loop, two ends and a cross piece, on which is perhaps, a tiny knot of black velvet. Cord or flower net, lace, chiffon and muslin form the foundation.

Tulle tailored bows with or without a ribbon flower garniture are conspicuous, as well as the larger, fluffier bows, "Kitties," as some of the young girls call them.

The butterfly bow is perhaps the most popular of all. It is made somewhat large with full pointed wings, a tight cross-over knot, and may be worn at the throat, or as a corsage ornament. Chiffon novelty bows trimmed with black velvet ribbon are very natty.

No summer collar that considers itself in the mode owns to ordinary square, sailor lines; and the woman who is fastidious about the tiny details of dress observes that no really smart collar comes together at the front now. There must be several inches between the points and in the space is set a smart little bow of velvet or taffeta, the bow extending across the throat, giving a square effect to the neck opening. When there is a narrow vest below the bow, or when the frock buttons down the front, this arrangement of the collar is exceedingly effective. The only collars that open in pointed effect at the front are the tall Richelieu models which give an effect of stateliness and dignity to the whole costume. The back of the Richelieu touches the base of the shoulder and arm and is finished with hair and at the front the opening is quite low—several inches below the throat line. These collars are picturesque and novel, but it is not probable that they will be widely worn.

The fichu of filet lace is intended for wear with summer frocks, and is a graceful model which droops over the washable cotton fringe. All the new fichus are cut so that they fit smoothly over the shoulders and back and lie very flat when pinned in place at the waistline. A bow of black velvet ribbon at front and back gives a smart touch to the fichu.

An All-Potent Skin Clarifier

For clearing, refining and beautifying the skin, and securing the charm of a pure complexion, free from rashes, freckles, blackheads, discolorations, etc.

Princess Complexion Purifier

is unequalled. Its efficiency in this direction became known nearly twenty years ago. Ever since then it has been tried, tested and found to be entirely satisfactory. Delivered anywhere for $1.50.

Of the many blemishes that the skin of the fair sex is heir to, none to a womanly woman is so objectionable as that masculine disfigurement, Superfluous Hair. This condition can be removed by none other than Electrolysis. We assure results satisfactory to the most sorely afflicted and dejected. Moles, Warts. Red Veins, etc., also permanently eradicated.

Booklet "H" and Sample of Toilet Cream on Request

The Hiscott Dermatological Institute

61 College Street Toronto

CLEANING

—AND—

DYEING

—AT—

REDUCED RATES

Write for Price List and Advice

—TO—

SINCLAIR DYE WORKS

656 College St., Toronto

Phone College 621

Royal Victoria College

McGILL UNIVERSITY MONTREAL

For Resident and Day Students. Students prepared for degrees in Arts, Pure Science and Music. Scholarships are awarded annually. For all information apply to the Warden.

The foundation of a good dinner

A few drops of H.P. Sauce itself will teach you more about its excellence than an ocean of description; try it with hot meat, cold meat, or even bread and cheese.

H.P. SAUCE

A secret combination of richest oriental fruits and spices with pure malt vinegar.

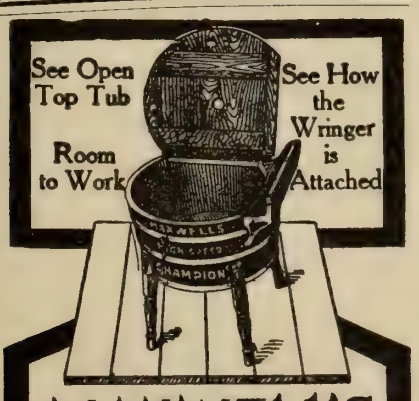
Made in England—but sold here.

Upton's Pure Orange Marmalade

The most delicious preserve you ever tasted and served with toast or rolls and coffee, makes one of most nourishing and delicious light meals procurable.

Upton's Brands are made only from the most luscious selected oranges and pure granulated sugar.

Ask your Grocer—he keeps UPTON'S



MAXWELL'S HIGH SPEED CHAMPION

The Wringer Board extends from the side, out of the way of the eaves. This allows practically the whole top of the tub to open up—makes it easy to put in and take out clothes.

No other washer has as large an opening. No other washer can be worked with crank handle at side as well as top lever.

Do you use Maxwell's "Favorite"—the churn that makes quality butter?

Write us for catalogues if your dealer does not handle them. 89

DAVID MAXWELL & SONS, ST. MARY'S, Ont.

MENUS FOR BUSY WOMEN

(PREPARED FOR CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL READERS)

MOST women who have the care and responsibility of preparing the meals know just how tiresome it is to think "what will we have for dinner." It often causes more worry to know what to make than it is to make it. These menus have been prepared for the purpose of assisting those women who have to prepare for hungry boys and men that they may send them back to work with a feeling of satisfaction.

SUNDAY

BREAKFAST

Fruit, Oatmeal, Milk
Nut Gems, Coffee

DINNER

Clear Soup
Panned Chickens, Brown Sauce
German Cabbage
Rice, Dandelion Salad, Snow Pudding

SUPPER

Cottage Cheese, Bread
Lemon Jelly, Tea, Sponge Cake

MONDAY

BREAKFAST

Fruit, Oatmeal, Milk
Eggs, Toast, Coffee

DINNER

New England Boiled Dinner
Apple Tart, Coffee

SUPPER

Duck Ragout, Rice
Fruit, Tea, Cinnamon Buns

TUESDAY

BREAKFAST

Creamed Chipped Beef
Mush, Bread, Coffee

DINNER

Tomato Soup
Stuffed Calves' Hearts, Brown Sauce
Potatoes, Buttered Beets
Farmer's Cabbage Salad
Canned Fruit, Coffee, Cinnamon Buns

SUPPER

Cottage Cheese Balls
Fruit, Whole Wheat Gems, Wafers

WEDNESDAY

BREAKFAST

Fruit, Farina, Cream
Quaker Omelet, Coffee, Brown Bread

DINNER

Julienne Soup
Boiled Corned Beef
Horseradish Sauce
Potatoes, Dandelion Greens
Apple Tart, Coffee, Cheese

SUPPER

Eggs Virginia, Tomato Sauce
Corn Bread, Tea

THURSDAY

BREAKFAST

Fruit, Oatmeal, Milk
Omelet with Tomato Sauce
Rolls, Coffee

DINNER

Dried Pea Soup
Broiled Ham, Cream Sauce
Mashed Potatoes, Dandelion Greens
Pineapple Sago

SUPPER

Chipped Beef, Brown Sauce
Corn Gems, Fruit, Tea

FRIDAY

BREAKFAST

Creamed Salt Cod, Boiled Potatoes
Corn Bread, Coffee

DINNER

Ragout of Potatoes
Bean Souffle, Asparagus, Boiled Onions
Jolly Boys, Sugar

SUPPER

Potato Croquettes, Cream Sauce
Hot Brown Bread
Fruit, Cocoa

SATURDAY

BREAKFAST

Farina, Cream
Scrambled Eggs, Rye Gems
Coffee

DINNER

Barley Broth
Stew of Mutton in Potato Casserole
Canned Peas
Fruit Pudding, Orange Sauce

SUPPER

Cottage Cheese, Johnnycake
Fresh Fruit

SUNDAY

BREAKFAST

Oatmeal, Cream
Boiled Eggs, Toast
Cinnamon Buns, Coffee

DINNER

Tomato Soup, Croutons
Roasted Ducks, Potato Stuffing
Stewed Turnips, Cabbage Salad
Grandmother's Rice Pudding

SUPPER

Thin Sliced Ham, Spiced Apples
Brown Bread, Tea

MONDAY

BREAKFAST

Stewed Prunes, Oatmeal, Milk
Broiled Bacon, Coffee, Corn Bread

DINNER

Tomato Soup, Panned Steak
Hashed Brown Potatoes, Cold Slaw
Dutch Peach Pudding, Milk
Coffee

SUPPER

Cottage Cheese, Rye Gems
Fruit, Tea, Cinnamon Buns

TUESDAY

BREAKFAST

Fruit, Farina, Cream
Eggs, Coffee, Biscuits

DINNER

English Beef Soup (left-over steak)
Boiled Ham, Dried Apple Sauce
Baked Potatoes
Stewed Cabbage, Asparagus Salad
Strawberry Tapioca, Cream
Coffee

SUPPER

Escalloped Macaroni, Tomatoes
Sour-milk Bread, Fruit, Tea

WEDNESDAY

BREAKFAST

Fruit, Potato Omelet
Corn Bread, Coffee

DINNER

German Gruel Soup
Roast Leg of Mutton, Brown Sauce
Rice, Buttered Beets
Canned Peach Tarts, Coffee

SUPPER

Canned Corn Pudding, Biscuits
Fruit

THURSDAY

BREAKFAST

Fruit, Oatmeal, Milk
Broiled Bacon, Coffee, Johnnycake

DINNER

Barley Broth (mutton bones)
Shepherd's Pie, Asparagus, Canned Peas
Brown Betty, Caramel Sauce
Coffee

SUPPER

Cheese Fondue, Fruit, Brown Bread

FRIDAY

BREAKFAST

Fruit
Codfish Balls, Tomato Sauce
Gems, Coffee

DINNER

Vegetable Soup (no meat)
Hot Canned Salmon, Sauce Hollandaise
Potatoes, Escalloped Tomatoes
Cabbage Salad
Cheese, Coffee, Crackers

SUPPER

Strawberry Shortcake, Cream

SATURDAY

BREAKFAST

Fruit, Oatmeal, Milk
Beauregard Eggs, Coffee

DINNER

Cream of Tomato Soup
Stewed Chicken, Dumplings
Potato
Dutch Peach Cake, Cream

SUPPER

Cold Thin Ham
Mayonnaise of Cabbage
Canned Fruit, Rye Gems, Ginger Snaps
Tea

To Our Million Milkweed Cream Users: We especially commend to our friends who have helped to make Ingram's Milkweed Cream famous, that they ask their druggists to show them the full line of

Ingram's

High Grade Toilet Specialties

Look for the name Ingram on the White, Green and Embossed Gold Labels to insure the genuine satisfaction we promise you in every product of the House of Ingram, including: Ingram's Zodenta, paste or powder, for the teeth 25c —Velveola the Milkweed Cream face powder, 25c.— Eliteine, for chapped skin, 25c. — Ingram's Rouge, 50c. — and many other Ingram Specialties for toilet purposes.

THERE IS BEAUTY IN EVERY JAR

Ingram's Milkweed Cream

improves bad complexions; preserves good complexions; cures complexion faults. Healing, soothing. Creates or retains the natural beauty of youthful skin. Is absorbed leaving the skin neither sticky, shiny nor dry. Prevents pimples, blackheads, and removes imperfections. 50 cents and $1.00.

"Druggists know and will tell you so." Most druggists carry the Ingram Line, but if you have any difficulty in getting what you ask for, write us, and we will see that you are supplied.

Frederick F. Ingram, Pres.

FREDERICK F. INGRAM COMPANY

1 Ouellette Ave, Windsor, Ontario

All the world loves a dainty woman. When you dress, use Ideal Orchid Talcum Powder. It is the velvet Italian Talc, perfumed with the fragrance of Borneo Orchids.

For your handkerchief, use

Ideal ORCHID PERFUME

the queen of perfumes—the most exquisite fragrance ever extracted from flowers. Your druggist should have these "Ideal" specialties or write

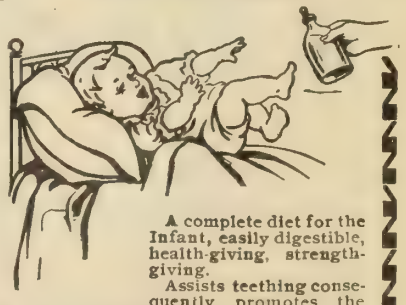
SOVEREIGN PERFUMES, LIMITED, - TORONTO. 52

Over 80 Years' Established Reputation.

Neave's Food

FOR INFANTS

When prepared according to the directions given, forms:



A complete diet for the Infant, easily digestible, health-giving, strength-giving.

Assists teething consequently promotes the healthful sleep so essential to the well-being of the infant.

Sold in 1 lb. airtight tins by all Druggists in Canada.

Free to Mothers—Write for free tin of Neave's Food and copy of our helpful book "Hints About Baby", to the Canadian Agent — EDWIN UTLEY, 14 Front Street East, - TORONTO.

(Mention this paper.) 37A
Mfrs. J. R. NEAVE & CO., England.

CLUBS AND GIFTS

You can say to your friends, "Join in a club and help us get a low price clubbing rate." And, while giving your friends this fine rate, you get a fine premium for getting up the club. You can get STERLING SILVER TABLE ARTICLES, CUT GLASS DISHES, LIMOGES TEA SET, LETTER PAPER, FOUNTAIN PENS. Write for red premium list.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

WEDDING CEREMONIES

By A SOCIETY EDITOR

NOBODY realizes quite as well as a newspaper woman who has conducted an inquiry column, just how many perplexing questions pop up when it comes to deciding about the detail of the wedding.

At a distance it all looks easy enough. The Reverend High Church will marry the couple, of course—who else should when the bride has been one of his flock as long as she can remember, and the bride will wear white and there will be flowers and flowers and flowers, some music in the church and much eating at home. Yes, it all looks easy a year away.

But when the twelve months have shrunken to six, then five, then four—it's quite another story, and the bride's mother begins to worry.

How shall the invitations be written, and when sent? What expenses are met by the bride's family, and what by the groom? How many bridesmaids shall there be, or shall there be any? Shall there be a matron of honor and flower girl as well as bridesmaids? What colors shall they wear? Or shall the bride be "unattended" as the society column says? Who precedes who, and at what point in the performance does this and the other one have something to do? How shall they sit at the table, and—well never mind. We might go on forever.

The newspaper woman would remind the perplexed ones that no rules of etiquette are fixed, they are not hard and fast affairs. They are merely a sort of formula to enable the people to do the right thing in the easiest way. They are a fair guide when called in consultation, but they are not to be trusted to take full charge of the case.

One wants to be sure, however, what is right and proper when conducting the important ceremony, and then it is time to decide whether the formal rule suits one's circumstances and is in harmony with one's individual ideals.

When my friend, Mrs. Mike O'Flannigan, who was also my laundress, and for whose common sense and ability as a washwoman I have the highest respect, chose to have her daughter married in white satin with real orange blossoms for the bridal wreath and a five story wedding cake at the feast, it did seem a bit extravagant though it was the proper thing. I know better now.

"She'll only be a bride once in her life," said the mother, standing with arms akimbo, as she told me about it next day, "leastways, I hope so, and it's little satin she'll be wearin' the rest of her life, by the way things look, for he ain't the kind that'll rise in the world, though he's sure the man of her choice. So I just put all I could spare into the weddin' and gave her the time of her life. She'll always have it to remember and think about, and that's somethin'. 'Twas the best I c'd do for her, seeing I c'dn't choose her man."

I agreed that it was money well spent, and said the account read well in the paper. I meant it, too.

But on the other hand there was little Miss Emley Purse, who was related to most of the aristocrats of the place although she had supported herself and two other urchins. She and her lover walked to the manse one day and were married and did without a wedding trip. She might easily have done the conventional thing at home at some one else's expense, but she only made what preparations she could afford, and it meant that she was married in a year-old suit. The future looked bright, but they wisely did not discount it.

But it is the correct thing we are concerned about just now, so the first consideration about the wedding is the invitations, these should be sent out at least two weeks before the event. A formal invitation will be engraved in either script or English lettering, the usual wording is:

Mr. and Mrs. Smith-Jones request the pleasure of
Mr. and Mrs. Blank's company at the marriage of their daughter
Marion
to
Mr. John White on Thursday, June the eighth at four o'clock
at their home, Woodlawn, 18 Dufferin Street.

If the wedding is in the church the invitation to the house is added "and afterwards at Woodlawn, 18 Dufferin Street."

Separate invitations must be sent to grown sons and daughters in a family unless there are several daughters, when one may be addressed to "The Misses Blank."

Should the wedding be a very simple affair, informal invitations would read something like this:—

My dear Mrs. Blank:

It would give Mr. Jones and myself great pleasure if you and Mr. Blank would come to the marriage of our daughter Marion, to Mr. John White, on Thursday, June eighth, at five o'clock.

Yours very sincerely,
Mary Jones.

The bride may be attended by a bridesmaid or a matron of honor, or she may have a full complement of atendants, including flower girl, maid of honor, and two or more bridesmaids, always use even number.

Should the wedding be in the evening, low cut gowns might be worn by the women and swallow tail or full evening dress by the men, but evening weddings are now-a-days the exception.

The bride's gown at a day wedding will be white, cut slightly low at the neck. A veil, even of the simplest, adds greatly to the becomingness. The groom will wear a frock or morning coat, pin striped trousers, white vest and ascot tie. The bridesmaids dressed alike in pairs, and the maid of honor in a color distinct from them.

According to church etiquette, hats, caps, veils or wreaths must be worn by both the bride and her attendants in the church, guests wear their hats at a church wedding, and at a house wedding in the afternoon but not in the evening.

If a bride is married in her traveling suit and hat, the bridesmaid must not wear white, but some light color so she will not be so conspicuous as the bride, who must be the chief figure.

A widow marrying again does not wear white; pearl, mauve, or any light becoming color being in better taste. Her wedding is always a quiet affair.

We come now to the performance of the ceremony. If at home, some part of the drawing-room or parlor is arranged for the bridal party, so that the clergyman faces the guests. The groom, accompanied by the best man, enters the room first and takes his place beside the clergyman, when the bride enters on her father's arm, followed by her attendants.

At a church wedding the bridal party assemble at the entrance, and by a pre-arranged signal, the bridegroom is notified, so that he and his groomsman enter from the vestry as the bridal party proceeds up the aisle, ushers first, bridesmaids next, flower girl, and then the maid-of-honor immediately preceding the bride, who is on her father's arm. On reaching the chancel the attendants divide, half the ushers and of the bridesmaids going to the right and the other half to the left. The bride leaves her father and takes her place beside her future husband. All present, guests or onlookers, rise and stand during the ceremony.

When the clergyman asks, "Who giveth this woman," the father responds, or the mother if the father is dead, and when further on the ring is to be put

(Continued on page 45)

LET us send you this Book. It tells how to heat your home comfortably—and save one-seventh of your Coal Bill. ¶ The Hecla steel-ribbed fire-pot makes this saving. With three times the radiating surface of any other furnace, it sends more heat to the living rooms and less to the chimney. ¶ Everyone who is building a home, everyone who has a worn-out furnace or one that is wasting coal, will value the suggestions and information contained in "Comfort & Health."

Hecla Furnace

FOR COAL AND WOOD

Healthful heating is not possible with a leaky furnace. Coal Gas is not only unpleasant—it is a menace to health. The Hecla will supply your whole house with pure warm air because it cannot leak gas or dust. 170

Every point where a leak might otherwise occur is fused by our patent process absolutely tight.
Time and use cannot loosen the Hecla Fused Joint.

Steel-ribbed Fire-pot

No Gas
No Dust
Fused joints cannot leak

Saves one ton in Seven

Is 1/7 of your Coal bill worth saving? Do you want more healthful heat?

Write for "Comfort & Health," a book on the sane heating of homes.

CLARE BROS. & CO., LIMITED,
Dept. J, Preston, Ont.

EVERY woman naturally desires to have thick and lustrous hair, for there is nothing that is so unbecoming as thin, dry locks that stand out from the head in broken wisps over the ears and at the nape of the neck, or scant oily tresses that cling close to the head and absolutely refuse to be arranged in any of the new coiffures.

In order to preserve the hair that is in good condition, or to cause the hair to grow thicker, the scalp must be carefully treated. When tonic is applied it should be put on regularly and not spasmodically. Sometimes hair tonic is used for one week and neglected for three. Such treatments will do little good. Most toilet preparations made by reputable firms are meritorious, but they will not make the hair grow in one night. If, however, a tonic is used persistently in conection with massage for a reasonable time it is sure to stop the hair from falling.

Shampooing oftener than once in four weeks should not be done, and is absolutely unnecessary for cleanliness, for if tonic is used, it removes dust that that otherwise might accumulate.

A dry shampoo is excellent for oily hair, and I consider powdered orris root best for a dry shampoo, as it not only makes the hair light and fluffy, but gives it a delicious fragrance of violet as well. Powdered orris can be purchased of any druggist or at any department store that handles toilet articles. The powdered orris is easily applied. The hair is first combed carefully, and thoroughly brushed until every bit of dust and dirt is loosened from the scalp. The powder is then applied with a powder puff, being very careful not to get it into the scalp. Let it remain a few minutes and brush out carefully. Once a week, as a rule, is often enough to wash a brush. More than that is apt to make the bristles limp. A few drops of ammonia in a basin of water is the best cleansing agent I know of for brushes and combs.

Liquid green soap is an excellent basis for a shampoo, but so strong is it that any application containing green soap must be reduced before it is used. The soap should be shaved fine and enough boiling water poured upon it to dissolve it. Then when cold it may be further reduced with water. Before shampooing, the hair must be thoroughly wet, so that the suds will foam. If enough soap has been put on, and the rubbing is done properly, all the dust is loosened and will wash out just as soon as the head is held over the basin. There is never the slightest difficulty in knowing when the hair is clean, for after all dust is out, if the locks are squeezed in the hands, there will be a slightly creaky feeling. Until the creaking is felt, more soap and more rinsing must be given. Dry with soft towels.

In massaging the scalp: First, let down the hair and loosen it by giving it several light shakes. Brush thoroughly. To my mind a rubber cushion wire brush is the best to use. Next, part off the hair and apply the tonic with a piece of absorbent cotton or soft tooth brush, until the head is all wet. Now place the tips of the fingers just over the forehead and move them with a circular motion backward, toward the top of the head. The movements should be firm, but light, so as to stimulate the follicles, and at the same time loosen the scalp. The next movement: Bring the fingers over the ears, where the hair begins, and the movements should rotate toward the top of the head. In the third movement the hands meet at the back of the neck and work up toward the line where the second massage left off. Five minutes of massage like this will set the whole scalp in a glow. The hair will respond quickly with the stimulated circulation, and often three or four massage treatments will restore it to health. Self-given massage is not, however as easy as it sounds—that is, if kept up for five minutes. It is very tiring to the raised arms, sometimes even exhausting. But it is better to be one's own masseuse than not to have one at all, and one soon becomes accustomed to it.

STIMULATING TONIC

Eau de cologne - - -	8 ounces
Tinct. of cantharides -	1 ounce
Oil of lavender - - -	½ dram
Oil of rosemary - - -	½ dram

Too frequent shampooing makes oily scalps more oily; it is one of the most injurious methods that can be adopted. For in this way the pores, already overstimulated and throwing out an abnormal quantity of oil, are enlarged by too much water, and if the oily condition does not grow worse the victims are fortunate.

When a woman is troubled by oily hair she must use something which will act as an astringent to tighten the pores of the scalp. Tonics which will strengthen the general health of the head are desirable naturally, but with them must be alternated an astringent, but not one that is so strong that it will act too quickly.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Amelia.—Can you tell me what causes dark rings under my eyes? Resting does not seem to help me, for I have these dark circles just as much in the morning on arising as when I go to bed at night.

The so-called dark rings around the eyes are an indication of a sluggish circulation of the blood or an abnormal condition of the blood itself. Live in the sunshine and fresh air as much as possible. Take plenty of physical exercise. Do not eat any but nutritious and easily digested foods. Persons with insufficient circulatory powers and blood of poor quality must not burden the body with an unnecessary amount of an improper quality of food.

Mrs. Y.—How can I tell if a cold plunge bath agrees with me? Sometimes I suspect it does not. I am forty-five years of age.

The actual cold plunge bath agree with very few. It is to many a great shock. If, however, you take a cold plunge, and reaction takes place and you feel warm after it and the skin is red, then it is good for you.

But if you feel chilly afterwards it means that the blood has been driven from the surface of the body, and that your power to have it return promptly is not strong enough. Then you know that the cold plunge does not agree with you. In that case try a medium bath, or a cold sponge bath, which is not so severe. Try the water between eighty and ninety degrees Fahrenheit. You can buy what is called a bath thermometer at any druggist's for twenty-five cents, and that will correctly tell you the temperature of the water. Sixty-five degrees you will find is a cold bath. Eighty or ninety is a tepid bath. From ninety to ninety-eight is a warm bath.

Corinne.—It may be a feminine vanity, but I do not like the first appearance of "crow's feet" coming to me. Is there anything I can do to stay this apparent ravage of years?

Catch a glimpse of yourself in a mirror as many times during the day as you can. Watch and take note of how often you find yourself frowning or in various other ways twisting and distorting the facial muscles. Sit down before a mirror and carefully observe your expression while you talk and laugh. I am sure in a short while you will see that you make unnecessary grimaces all day long, and that these distortions of your countenance are responsible for the lines which cause the "crow's-feet."

Plainly speaking "crow's-feet" are usually landmarks made by habit and needless motion and action of the muscles of the face. They are, by no means, necessarily caused by the ravage of years.

"Countrywoman" asks: Can you tell me any safe way to prevent a constant falling out of my hair?

Hair cannot grow on poor soil. The scalp must be thick and pliable and move freely over the bones of the skull. If the scalp is tightly drawn over the bones it will constrict the blood supply and cause a decay of the roots of the hair. Employ much friction to help loosen the scalp and aid the circulation.

The constant presence of dandruff will injure the health of the hair. It is highly important to keep the scalp clean and free from dandruff, and to attain this a daily brushing and a weekly or fortnightly washing are necesary.

If the head perspires very freely and does not have a chance to dry, the roots of the hair may suffer. Always keep the hair as dry as possible. Germs thrive under conditions of heat and moisture.

Let the hair fall down loosely about the head as long and as often during the day as possible. And, if you can do so, sun and air the whole scalp a few minutes of each day.

Bonnie Prince Charlie Talcum Powder is of the very finest grade, cooling, soothing and refreshing, making an ideal toilet and nursery powder.

Delightfully fragrant, with the exquisite odor of White Heather.

By its daily use babies are protected from chafing; their skin is kept smooth, velvety and healthy.

Bonnie Prince Charlie Talcum is recommended to all who suffer from soreness, irritations and abrasions of the skin, or from prickly heat.

Gentlemen will find it a grateful aid to comfort after shaving.

In white or flesh color

Price 25 Cents

Decorated with Royal Stewart Tartan design in correct colors, and a portrait of Bonnie Prince Charlie encircled with Scotch thistle design. A unique and charming package. Same size as Royal Vinolia Talcum.

On sale at all druggists.

Vinolia Company Limited, London, Paris, Toronto

By Royal Appointment Soapmakers to H. M. King George V.

127

"The Most Beautiful Women in the World"

consider the proper arrangement of their hair, as a matter of utmost importance to their personal appearance.

"Nature's Deficiences" can be supplied by Canada's foremost hair goods house,

"DORENWEND'S"

All our goods are of the finest quality hair, manufactured by experts, making detection from the natural hair impossible. The styles we offer are designed from the newest London and Paris fashions.

Write now for our handsome illustrated catalogue "X" and booklet on hair dressing

Free on request to any address

Ladies' Transformations, Pompadours, Waves, Fronts, Bangs, Switches, etc.

Satisfaction guaranteed on mail orders

The Dorenwend Co. of Toronto, Limited

(The House of Quality Hair Goods)

103 - 105 Yonge Street, Toronto

Webb's

Chocolates

for people who want the best

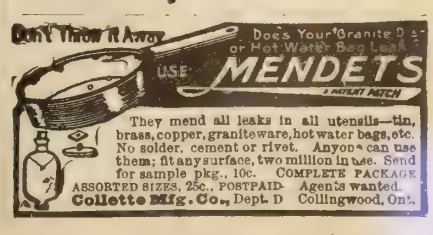
THE

Harry Webb Co., Limited

TORONTO, CAN.

Na-Dru-Co Headache Wafers certainly do make short work of headaches. 25¢ per box.

132



Don't Throw It Away
Does Your Granite Dish or Hot Water Bag Leak
USE MENDETS
A INSTANT MATCH
They mend all leaks in all utensils—tin, brass, copper, graniteware, hot water bags, etc. No solder, cement or rivet. Anyone can use them; fit any surface, two million in use. Send for sample pkg., 10c. COMPLETE PACKAGE ASSORTED SIZES, 25c., POSTPAID. Agents wanted.
Collette Mfg. Co., Dept. D Collingwood, Ont.

Ontario Women's Institutes

GEORGE A. PUTNAM
SUPERINTENDENT
PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS, TORONTO

Demonstration Lecture Courses

ARRANGEMENTS are being made whereby several groups of Institutes in various sections of the province will be given a demonstration lecture course next fall or winter. Full announcements regarding this will appear in an early issue of this journal. The lecturers attending the summer series of meetings will also be prepared to outline the methods of work and the conditions upon which trained domestic science lecturers will be furnished. It is expected that a considerable amount of money will be available for this feature of work in connection with the Institutes.

The superintendent has received a number of inquiries regarding the lecture course and we are sure that the above announcement will be appreciated by many of the Institutes who are interested in a systematic course of study along the lines of household economics.

Conference of Institutes

A CONFERENCE of Institute lecturers, some thirty in number, was held on the 22nd and 23rd of May, when the following programme was carried out. Well known authorities on health topics, social service, school problems, as well as other features of interest to Institute workers, gave the lecturers the benefit of their experience and advice. Altogether, the lecturers received valuable information which they in turn will be able to give direct to the Institutes at the summer meetings.

PROGRAMME.

Wednesday, May 22.

1. Review of work and outline of regulations.
2. Outline of address to members of local Institutes, indicating how they may make their local organization a success.
3. Literature for Institutes.
4. General discussion.

Thursday, May 23.

1. Demonstration lecture courses.
2. Health topics.
3. The School.
4. Social service.
5. General discussion.

Membership Cards

A QUESTION occasionally comes regarding membership cards for Institutes, and we give herewith a copy of one used by the Kingsville branch in 1911-12. The rules and regulations are printed on the back of the card.

These membership cards are furnished by either the district officers or the branch concerned. This might well be one of the items of business at the district annual meeting.

These cards can be printed at a small cost, and it certainly gives the Institutes an air of business to issue a membership card to those who pay the fee. In a number of districts the acknowledgement of membership is printed upon the last page of the programme of monthly meetings.

MEMBERSHIP TICKET

This is to Certify that

.....

Has paid dues (25c) for the year ending May 31, 1912.

MRS. HARRISON SMITH, Pres.
MRS. WM. HOLDAWAY, Sec'y.

RULES AND REGULATIONS, KINGSVILLE WOMEN'S INSTITUTE

1—Meetings held first Tuesday of every month at 2.30 p.m.

2—Meetings held in members' homes.

3—Membership fee is 25 cents a year. All members should pay dues 1st of June each year.

4—Members who have not paid dues 1st of June are not entitled to hold office or vote on any question until said dues are paid.

5—The person taking a topic must either give the subject in person or send in a written paper to be read by our secretary or chairman of programme committee.

6—Each member is supposed to buy a pin, the emblem of our Institute, and it is supposed to be worn at every meeting of Women's Institute. Price of pin to each member is 15 cents.

7—No member shall speak without rising to her feet and getting the sanction of the chair before speaking.

8—Members will please keep good order while anyone is speaking.

9—Ladies are always welcome to invite and bring their friends to the meetings.

Talked Law to the Ladies

MANY of the errors which women are supposed to make, and sometimes do make, would be prevented if a little time were given to the study of the laws of the business world. The members of the Lanark Institute have put this thought into practice, and, at one of their recent meetings, listened to an address along this line. The report states: "Mr. W. H. Stafford gave an edifying talk on legal points upon which women should be informed, starting with banking and widening the scope of his talk to embrace other features closely akin. Many questions arising out of the address were carefully answered."

The aim of the Institutes surely admits of a broad education.

A New Rest Room

THE principal matter before the members of the Woman's Institute on Saturday afternoon, was the rest-room movement, and details in connection therewith were advanced to some degree. The rooms in Mr. Forgie's block have been engaged and are being cleaned and put in shape for occupancy. Very kindly appreciation of the movement is being freely expressed, but what is really needed more is that that appreciation be expressed in a practical way. It will cost about $250 a year to keep the rooms open, and it is quite an undertaking for the ladies to assume. Business men and others who will benefit materially by the presence of these rooms in the town should subscribe liberally to the support—not by little picayune sums such as would be given to a juvenile hockey or lacrosse club, but by amounts in comparison with the importance of the enterprise.

An Enthusiastic Institute

THE Burlington secretary writes: "At our April meeting several members expressed the opinion that our meetings are growing better each month. It is wonderful when you think the interest never diminishes, and we have not had a lunch or cup of tea at our meetings since last August. We find it a splendid plan to take the members alphabetically to prepare the programme. A steam-cooked dinner, cooked on one burner of a coal-oil stove, was demonstrated with great satisfaction."

We are sure that Miss M. M. Dadson, the secretary, would be glad to pass on to other secretaries, who might write her, some of the details of the methods used by this Institute.

Notes of General Interest

A GOODLY number of the members of the Shirley (South Ontario) Institute are taking up the course of study under the St. John's Ambulance Association. We commend this study to other Institutes. The course includes lecturers on Home Nursing, First Aid to the Injured and Home Hygiene.

A new Institute was organized on April 25th at Carterton in St. Joseph Island. This was organized by the district officers at the request of the women in the vicinity of that place. It is the exception when failure is the end of an Institute organized in this way.

The Institute at Flesherton recently held a joint meeting with the Farmers' Club. We received only the briefest report, but judge that the meeting was a decided success. These two organizations can be mutually helpful.

One of the features of the April meeting of the Eldorado branch was a roll responded to by each member, giving some information regarding a favorite bird. This bit of nature study must surely have added to the brightness of the meeting.

Mrs. L. A. Hamilton, a member of the Port Credit Institute, and Mrs. H. W. Parsons of Forest, one of our staff of lecturers, are announced to speak in the interests of the Institute at the annual meeting of the National Council of Women, to be held in London on the 27th and 28th of May.

The report of some recent monthly meetings would indicate that a number of the Institutes have used some of the funds to good profit by distributing flower and vegetable seeds among the school children. No doubt interesting accounts will be given in the fall of the exhibits made by these children. A competition such as this should be made of educational value to the children.

"The Institutes in the Leeds district are all in a flourishing condition." So says one of the district officers. They are certainly enterprising. One of the most recently organized is about to manage the building of a town hall to cost about $5,000. Another has just bought a new piano and paid for it in full.

The Acton branch believes in the social side of the Institute, and a short time ago held a very delightful open meeting, at which a very large number of people enjoyed the entertainment provided by the members of the Institute. The secretary, Mrs. W. Laird, will, no doubt, be exceedingly glad to give the particulars to any Institute which may be interested.

Miss E. H. Besley of Shelburne, the district secretary for Dufferin, has sent us an account of an evening's entertainment recently given by the Shelburne branch. The principal feature of the evening was a debate in which the Institute had the assistance of the gentlemen. These open meetings are one of the ways in which the work of the Institute may be kept before the public.

ONE OF THE ATTRACTIONS OF FARM LIFE

Paper Bag Cookery

IN these days of labor-saving devices —the paper bag cookery included— the following report of a recent meeting held by the Parkhill Institute will be of interest.

"We had a successful demonstration of paper bag cookery at a recent meeting. We had a coal-oil stove in the Institute room, and one of the members prepared beefsteak for cooking by buttering the bag, putting the steak in and pinning the bag at the end with common pins. While the steak was cooking, another member read an interesting article on paper bag cookery. The steak was delicious. Beef cooked in this way has no gravy, except some juice in the bag, and, if gravy is desired, this juice can be used as a foundation. Several of our members use the paper bags and find them satisfactory."

Practical Side of the Institute

DURING the past winter, the Ladies' Hospital Aid of Kincardine requested the three Women's Institutes—Barvie, Kincardine and Ripley —to assist with a bazaar to be held in April in Kincardine in aid of the hospital work. The appeal met with a hearty response from the three branches who agreed to have a Woman's Institute table, at which the following articles would be sold: Barvie, home-made baking and fruit; Ripley, large and small aprons and men's night robes; Kincardine, home-made candy, fancy work and articles of clothing. Each branch sent two members to assist at the table, choosing those who had the largest circle of acquaintances. The splendid result of this bazaar, as manifested in the large receipts, was in no small measure due to the interest taken by the Institutes named.

Institute Work in Alberta

MISS ROBERTA MacADAMS, a graduate of MacDonald Institute, Guelph, had charge of a series of short courses in domestic science throughout Alberta during the past winter, under the direction of the Department of Agriculture of that province. This work was so much appreciated by the women that they asked for something more permanent. As a result, Miss MacAdams has been asked by the Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. Duncan Marshall, to undertake the organization of Women's Institutes in that province. Miss MacAdams spent some time studying the methods of the Ontario organizations and will make use of this information in her work in Alberta. She is impressed with the value of the Institute work and will, we are sure, carry a good deal of enthusiasm into the work of organization.

We would suggest that, if any of our Ontario Institute members should leave this province to locate in Alberta, they communicate with Miss MacAdams regarding organization. She may be addressed in care of the Department of Agriculture, Edmonton, Alta.

"Home Journal" Appreciated

THE Moyle and Tranquility branch in North Brant is another of the Institutes which appreciates the HOME JOURNAL. The secretary writes: "The HOME JOURNAL is in every home, except one, represented in our Woman's Institute. Two years ago we had six subscribers, last year I sent in twenty-five, and this year forty! Everyone is delighted with the JOURNAL."

Summer Series of Meetings

WE gave in the May issue of this journal a list of the summer meetings up to and including June 8th. We give herewith the balance of meetings announced.

We look to the officers and members to do all in their power to make these meetings well known, and to induce those who are not members to attend and become identified with the Institute. The success of the summer series depends to a large degree upon the thoroughness with which the meetings are announced.

DIVISION 1—Lecturer: Dr. Laura Hamilton, Toronto, June 10 to July 5; Miss Mary McKenzie, Toronto. June 17 to 22.

MONCK—
Smithville		June	10
Fenwick		"	11
Winger		"	12
Attercliffe	aft.	"	13
Canboro		"	14
Dunnville	aft.	"	15
HALDIMAND—
Canfield	aft.	"	17
York	aft.	"	18
Caledonia	aft.	"	19
Cayuga	aft.	"	20
Decewsville	aft.	"	21
Gill	aft.	"	22
Clanbrassil	aft.	"	24
Springvale	aft.	"	25
Hagersville	eve.	"	25
Garnet	aft.	"	26
Jarvis	aft.	"	27
Erie	aft.	"	28
Sandusk	aft.	"	29
Nanticoke	aft.	July	2
Cheapside	aft.	"	3
Rainham Centre	aft.	"	4
South Cayuga	aft.	"	5

DIVISION 2—Lecturer: Dr. Annie Backus, Aylmer, June 10 to July 5.

SOUTH WENTWORTH—
Glanford	aft.	June	10
Carluke	aft.	"	11
Ancaster	aft.	"	12
Jerseyville	aft.	"	13
NORTH BRANT—
St. George	aft.	"	14
Glen Morris	aft.	"	15
Paris	aft.	"	17
Tranquility	aft.	"	18
Tutela	aft.	"	19
Onondaga	aft.	"	20
Langford	aft.	"	21
Cainsville	aft.	"	24
NORTH WENTWORTH—
Orkney	aft.	"	25
Rockton	aft.	"	26
Sheffield	aft.	"	27
Freelton	aft.	"	28
Carlisle	aft.	July	2
Millgrove	aft.	"	3
Waterdown	aft.	"	4
West Flamboro'	aft.	"	5

DIVISION 3—Lecturer: Mrs. W. J. Hunter, Pleasant.

NORTH ESSEX—
Woodslee	aft.	June	10
Maidstone	eve.	"	11
Maidstone Cross	aft.	"	12
Oldcastle	aft.	"	13
SOUTH ESSEX—
Essex	aft.	"	14
Amherstburg	aft.	"	15
Harrow	aft.	"	17
Kingsville	aft.	"	18
Cottam	aft.	"	19
Leamington	aft.	"	20
WEST KENT—
Wheatley	aft.	"	21
Port Alma		"	22
Cedar Sprirgs		"	24
EAST KENT—
Guilds	aft.	"	25
Morpeth		"	26
Highgate	aft.	"	27
WEST ELGIN
Rodney	aft.	"	28
Dutton	aft.	"	29
Wallacetown		July	1
Iona		"	2

DIVISION 4—Lecturer: Mrs. E. B. McTurk, Lucan.

EAST ELGIN—
Springfield		June	10
SOUTH OXFORD -
Brownsville		"	11
Tillsonburg	aft.	"	12
Mount Elgin	aft.	"	13
Springford	aft.	"	14
Norwich	aft.	"	15
Burgessville	aft.	"	17
Currie	aft.	"	18
Beachville	aft.	"	19
NORTH NORFOLK—
Thamesford	aft.	"	20
Kintore		"	21
Lakeside	eve.	"	22
Harrington	aft.	"	24
Embro	aft.	"	25
Braemar		"	26
Bright	aft.	"	27
Plattsville	aft.	"	28
Drumbo	aft.	"	29
Princeton	aft.	July	2

DIVISION 5—Lecturer: Miss B. Gilholm, Bright.

WEST MIDDLESEX—
Mt. Brydges	aft.	June	10
Strathroy	aft.	"	11
Napier	aft.	"	12
Kerwood	aft.	"	13
NORTH MIDDLESEX—
Lobo		"	14
Coldstream		"	15
Beechwood	aft.	"	17
Ailsa Craig		"	18
West McGillivray		"	19
Sylvan	aft.	"	20
Greenway		"	21
Parkhill	aft.	"	22
Mooresville	aft.	"	24
Lucan	aft.	"	25
EAST MIDDLESEX—
Birr	aft.	June	26
Hyde Park		"	27
Wellburn	aft.	"	28
Thorndale	aft.	"	29
Crampton		July	2
Harrietsville		"	3

Dates to be arranged later for meetings at Petrolea, Oil Springs, Warwick and Shetland.

DIVISION 6—Lecturer: Mrs. W. B. Ferguson, Strathroy.

CENTRE WELLINGTON -
Marsville	aft.	June	10
Orton	aft.	"	11
Belwood	aft.	"	12
Metz	aft.	"	13
Cumnock	aft.	"	14
Bethany	aft.	"	15
SOUTH WELLINGTON—
Paisley Block	aft.	"	17
Arkell	eve.	"	18
HALTON—
Acton	aft.	"	19
Ballinafad	aft.	"	20
Georgetown	aft.	"	21
Norval	aft.	"	22
Stewartown	aft.	"	24
Kilbride		"	25
Sheridan	aft.	"	26

DIVISION 7—Lecturer: Mrs. M. N. Norman, Toronto.

NORTH WATERLOO -
Linwood	aft.	June	10
Wellesley	aft.	"	11
PEEL—
Streetsville	aft.	"	12
Brampton	aft.	"	13
Malton	aft.	"	14
Cheltenham	aft.	"	15
Belfountain	aft.	"	17
Alton		"	18
Mono Mills	eve.	"	19
Palgrave		"	20
WEST YORK—
Kleinburg	aft.	"	21
Woodbridge		"	22
Maple	aft.	"	24
Elia	aft.	"	25
Thistletown	aft.	"	26
Weston	aft.	"	27
Islington		"	28
Mimico	aft.	"	29

DIVISION 8—Lecturer, Mrs. C. H. Burns, Toronto.

SOUTH PERTH—
Kirkton	aft.	June	10
Fullarton	aft.	"	11
Staffa	aft.	"	12
Mitchell	aft.	"	13
Sebringville	aft.	"	14
NORTH PERTH—
Hampstead		"	15
Milverton		"	17
Millbank		"	18
Listowel		"	19
WEST WELLINGTON—
Palmerston	eve.	"	20
Rothsay	aft.	"	24
UNION—
Teviotdale	aft.	"	25
Clifford	aft.	"	26
Drew	aft.	"	27
SOUTH GREY
Ayton	aft.	"	28
Hanover	aft.	"	29
Elmwood	aft.	July	2
Louise	aft.	"	3
Dornoch's	aft.	"	4
Durham	aft.	"	5
Dromore	aft.	"	6
Robb	eve.	"	8
Holstein	aft.	"	9

DIVISION 9—Lecturers: Miss M. A. Allan, Jarvis, June 10 to June 12; Miss H. McMurchie, Harriston, June 10 to July 5.

CENTRE BRUCE—
Kincardine	aft.	June	10
EAST HURON—
Belgrave		"	11
Brussels	aft.	"	12
Walton		"	13
Molesworth	aft.	"	17
Bluevale		"	18
SOUTH BRUCE—
Belmore		"	19
Teeswater		"	20
EAST HURON—
Gorrie	aft.	"	21
Fordwich	aft.	"	22
SOUTH BRUCE—
Mildmay		"	24
Walkerton		"	25
CENTRE BRUCE—
Pinkerton	aft.	"	26
Paisley	aft.	"	27
Chesley	aft.	"	28
Williscroft	aft.	"	29
WEST BRUCE—
Port Elgin		July	2
Arkwright	aft.	"	3
Tara	eve.	"	3
Allenford		"	4
Tiverton		"	5

DIVISION 10—Lecturer: Miss M. V. Powell, Whitby.

CENTRE BRUCE—
Hepworth	aft.	June	10
Park Head	aft.	"	11
Wiarton	aft.	"	12
Colpoy's Bay		"	13
Mar		"	14
Hope Bay	eve.	"	15
Lion's Head		"	17
CENTRE GREY—
Holland Centre	aft.	"	19
Williamsford		"	20
Markdale		"	21
Dundalk	aft.	"	22
Hopeville		"	24
Badjeros		"	25
Maxwell		"	26
Eugenia	aft & eve.	"	27
Priceville		"	28
Flesherton	aft.	"	29
Vandeleur		July	2
Kimberley		"	3
Walter's Falls		"	4
Rocklyn		"	5
Heathcote		"	6
Clarksburg		"	8

DIVISION 11—Lecturer: Miss M. Allison, Chicago.

WEST SIMCOE—
Rosemont		June	10
Everett		"	11
Avening		"	12
Creemore		"	13
Singhampton	aft.	"	15
Duntroon	aft.	"	17
Sunnidale		"	19
Batteau		"	18
SOUTH SIMCOE
Stroud	aft.	"	20
Churchill		"	21

THE SINGED CAT

Those who have paid dearly for the use of cheap cream separators, through many unhappy experiences, know now—what they doubted then.

Their unanimous testimony—

THE DE LAVAL FOR MINE

Tells the story.

Better get a Catalog.

Agents everywhere.

The De Laval Separator Co.
173-177 Williams St.
MONTREAL
VANCOUVER—WINNIPEG

Establish a Credit for Yourself

A careful man, with a systematic savings account, will in time of need receive greater consideration from his banker than the man who lives up to his income. If you have not already done so, open a systematic savings account with this Bank. $10 deposited monthly will at 3% interest, compounded half-yearly, within 10 years amount to nearly $1,400

Head Office . TORONTO

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS
$6,850,000

TOTAL ASSETS
$52,000,000

The Traders Bank of Canada

INCORPORATED 1885

113 BRANCHES THROUGHOUT CANADA

Paneled Oak Walls at the Price of Good Wall Paper!

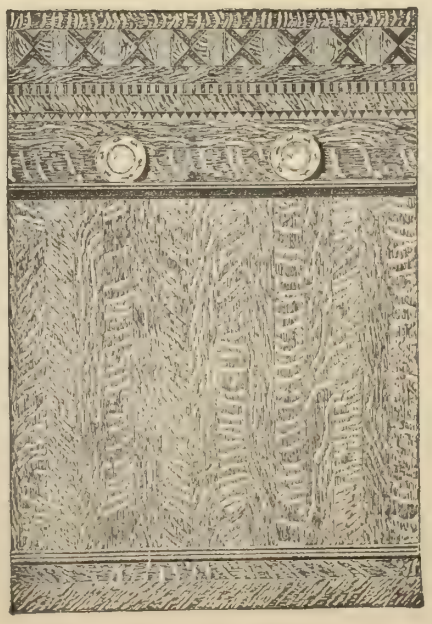

Illustration shows section of dining-room wall with paneled lower (No. 1, Light, or No. 2, Golden) plate rail and parquet design border (No. 13, Light, or No. 14, Golden).

ECONOMY and beauty are perfectly combined in this new material for making your home attractive. You can have your dining-room or library, den, kitchen, bathroom, or hall, as beautiful as you have wished—at the price you have been paying for good wall paper. Imagine your room paneled in oak, either light or golden. This new home luxury can be yours at so small a price as to seem almost ridiculous.

Fibre Veneer

is an exact reproduction (not imitation) of fine grained oak, manufactured in several panel and parquet patterns. Put up in rolls 36 inches wide by 34 feet long. Fibre Veneer is applied just like wall paper—in fact, more easily—which is still another advantage if you are going to do the work yourself. The Veneer makes a very attractive decoration for walls and ceilings without using any finish. Being a perfect substitute for hardwood, Fibre Veneer can be used as a border around rugs. Fibre Veneer can be washed like linoleum. After one coat of Orange Shellac, it may be stained or varnished. It is very durable.

Introductory Price only $1.50 per roll, delivered free at your exp. office.

Send for Samples—or order by mail, enclosing remittance.

HUGH SILVER & SON - PRESCOTT, ONT.

Woman's World and Work grow larger with increasing freedom from household drudgery. Food sense and food knowledge have taken her out of the kitchen into the larger realms of home-making. When cooks fail and servants fail there is to lean upon in every emergency. Being ready-cooked and ready-to-serve it is so easy to prepare in a few moments a delicious, nourishing meal with Shredded Wheat Biscuit.

SHREDDED WHEAT

Simply heat the biscuit in an oven for a few moments to restore crispness, then pour over it hot milk, and salt or sweeten to suit the taste.

Made of Choicest Selected Canadian Wheat
A Canadian Food for Canadians

Made by

The Canadian Shredded Wheat Company, Limited
Niagara Falls, Ontario

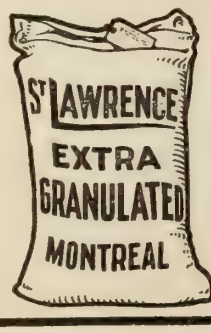
Toronto Office: 49 Wellington Street East I-76

Try it—test it—see for yourself — that "St. Lawrence Granulated" is as choice a sugar as money can buy.

Get a 100 pound bag—or even a 20 pound bag—and compare "St. Lawrence" with any other high-grade granulated sugar.

Note the pure white color of "St. Lawrence"—its uniform grain—its diamond-like sparkle—its matchless sweetness. These are the signs of quality.

And Prof. Hersey's analysis is the proof of purity —"99 99/100 to 100% of pure cane sugar with no impurities whatever". Insist on having "ST. LAWRENCE GRANULATED" at your grocer's.



ST. LAWRENCE SUGAR REFINING CO., LIMITED, MONTREAL. 66

If You Value Your Complexion You MUST Use

BEETHAM'S
La-rola

ENTIRELY REMOVES AND PREVENTS ALL ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, TAN, IRRITATION, ETC., AND RENDERS THE SKIN DELICATELY SOFT AND VELVETY

It is the most perfect Emollient Milk for the skin ever produced and for the Toilet and Nursery is invaluable. It is delightfully refreshing and soothing, if applied after Motoring, Cycling, Tennis, Golfing, Boating, etc. It is neither sticky nor greasy, and can be used at any time during the day. Men will find it wonderfully soothing if applied after shaving. Ask your Chemist for it.

M. BEETHAM & SON -:- -:- CHELTENHAM, ENG.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Coulson's Hill ..... aft. June 22
Auld Kirk, Scotch Line ..... " 24
Newton Robinson ..... " 25
Thornton ..... " 26
Ivy ..... " 27

WEST SIMCOE—
Stayner ..... aft. " 28

DIVISION 11 (a)—Lecturer: Mrs. D. McTavish, Port Elgin.

EAST SIMCOE—
Crown Hill ..... aft. June 10
Shanty Bay ..... aft. " 11
Orillia ..... aft. " 12
Ardtrea ..... aft. " 13
Warminster ..... aft. " 14
Coldwater ..... aft. " 15
Waubaushene ..... aft. " 17
Victoria Harbor ..... aft. " 18

DIVISION 12—Lecturer: Mrs. M. L. Woelard, Toronto.

CENTRE SIMCOE—
Anten Mills ..... eve. June 10
Dalston ..... " 11

SOUTH MUSKOKA—
Port Carling ..... " 12
Windermere ..... aft. " 13

CENTRE MUSKOKA—
Ufford ..... " 14
Utterson ..... eve. " 15
Port Sydney ..... aft. " 17
Allansville ..... aft. " 18

SOUTH MUSKOKA—
Bracebridge ..... " 19
South Macaulay ..... aft. " 20
Baysville ..... " 21
Monck, Bracebridge ..... aft. " 22
Bardsville ..... " 24
Muskoka Falls ..... " 25
Germania ..... eve. " 26
Reay ..... aft. " 27
Gravenhurst ..... " 28

DIVISION 13—Lecturers: Miss L. Reynolds, Scarboro Junction; Mr. H. Grose, Lefroy.

NORTH MUSKOKA—
Martin Siding ..... June 11
Aspdin ..... " 12
Ashworth ..... " 13
Ravensceliff ..... " 14
Huntsville ..... " 15
Silverdale ..... " 15
Hillside ..... " 17
Dwight ..... " 18
Fox Point ..... " 19
Dorset ..... " 20
Brunel ..... " 21

DIVISION 14—Lecturer: Dr. Jennie Smillie, Toronto.

EAST YORK—
Thornhill ..... aft. June 10
East Toronto ..... aft. " 11
Scarboro Junction ..... aft. " 12
Highland Creek ..... aft. " 13
Agincourt ..... aft. " 14
Box Grove ..... aft. " 15
Markham ..... aft. " 17
Stouffville ..... aft. " 18

SOUTH ONTARIO—
Claremont ..... aft. " 19
Kinsale ..... aft. " 20
Brougham ..... aft. " 21
Whitevale ..... aft. " 24
Pickering ..... aft. " 25
Whitby ..... aft. " 26
Brooklin ..... aft. " 27
Columbus ..... aft. " 28
Shirley ..... eve. " 29

DIVISION 15—Lecturer: Mrs. Horace W. Parsons, Forest.

EAST DURHAM—
Manver's Station ..... aft. June 10
Mount Pleasant ..... aft. " 13
Springville ..... aft. " 14

WEST NORTHUMBERLAND—
Elmview ..... aft. " 15
Cobourg ..... aft. " 17
Grafton ..... aft. " 18
Coldsprings ..... " 19
Roseneath ..... " 20
Fenella ..... " 21
Centreton ..... " 24
Baltimore ..... aft. " 25

EAST NORTHUMBERLAND—
Smithfield ..... aft. " 26
Hilton ..... aft. " 27
Dundonald ..... aft. " 28
Castleton ..... aft. " 29
Warkworth ..... aft. July 2
Codrington ..... eve. " 3
Wooler ..... aft. " 4
Menie ..... aft. " 5
Campbellford ..... aft. " 6

DIVISION 16—Lecturers: Miss E. Robson, Ilderton, June 10 to June 15; Miss M. McKenzie, Toronto, June 10 to June 14; Miss H. Gowsell, Port Arthur, June 15 to June 17.

WEST VICTORIA—
Woodville ..... June 10
Lorneville ..... aft. " 11
Linden Valley ..... " 12
Islay ..... eve " 13
Cambray ..... aft. " 14

EAST VICTORIA—
Dunsford ..... aft. " 15
Bobcaygeon ..... aft. " 17
Cameron ..... " 18
Pleasant Valley ..... aft. " 19
Fenelon Falls ..... eve. " 20
Burnt River ..... aft. " 21
Kinmount ..... aft. " 22

HALIBURTON—
Minden ..... aft. " 24
Haliburton ..... aft. " 25
Irondale ..... aft. " 26
Gooderham ..... " 27

DIVISION 17—Lecturer: Miss B. Millar, Guelph.

PRINCE EDWARD—
Mountain View ..... aft. June 10
Rednersville ..... aft. " 11

EAST HASTINGS—
Belleville ..... " 12
Melrose ..... " 13
Quinte ..... aft. " 14

WEST HASTINGS—
Sec. Con. Sidney ..... aft. " 15
Frankford ..... aft. " 17
Wallbridge ..... aft. " 18
River Valley ..... aft. " 19
Chatterton ..... aft. " 20

EAST HASTINGS—
Phillipston ..... " 21
Roslin ..... " 22
Tweed ..... " 24

NORTH HASTINGS—
Ivanhoe ..... aft. " 25
Stirling ..... aft. " 26
Wellman's Corners ..... aft. " 27
Springbrook ..... " 28
Marmora ..... aft. " 29
Queensboro ..... aft. July 2
Madoc ..... aft. " 3
L'Amable ..... " 4
Bancroft ..... eve. " 5
Ft. Stewart ..... " 6

NORTH PETERBORO—
Clydesdale ..... " 9

DIVISION 18—Lecturer: Mrs. F. W. Watts, Clinton.

RUSSELL—
Vernon ..... June 10

CARLETON—
Kars ..... eve. " 11
Manotick ..... " 12
Stittsville ..... aft. " 13
South March ..... eve. " 14
Carp ..... aft. " 15
Kinburn ..... eve. " 17
Antrim ..... eve. " 18
Galetta ..... " 19

NORTH LANARK—
Almonte ..... aft. " 20
Clayton ..... eve. " 21

SOUTH LANARK—
Carleton Place ..... aft. " 22
Perth ..... aft. " 24

NORTH LANARK—
Lanark ..... aft. " 25

SOUTH LANARK—
Maberly ..... eve. " 26

FRONTENAC CENTRE—
Mt. Grove ..... " 27

SOUTH RENFREW—
Burnstown ..... aft. " 28

DIVISION 19—Lecturer: Mrs. L. Rose Stephen, Huntingdon, Que.

STORMONT—
Finch ..... aft. June 11
Cornwall Centre ..... eve. " 12

GLENGARRY—
Martintown ..... " 13
Maxville ..... " 14

PRESCOTT—
Vankleek Hill ..... aft. " 18

NORTH RENFREW—
Stafford (Micksburg) ..... " 20
Shields ..... aft. or eve. " 21
Greenwood ..... " 22
Westmeath ..... eve. " 24
Beachburg ..... " 25
Forester's Falls ..... " 26
Queen's Line ..... " 27

The meetings announced in Divisions 20, 21, 22 and 23 are held under the auspices of the Farmers' and Women's Institutes of the riding concerned. Separate afternoon sessions will be held for the Women's and Farmers' Institutes. A joint meeting will be held at the close of the afternoon sessions, or in the evening.

DIVISION 20—Lecturers: Miss E. E. Smillie, Toronto; Mr. J. C. Shaw, Norwich.

EAST PARRY SOUND—
Emsdale ..... May 28
Doe Lake ..... " 29
Midlothian ..... " 30
Magnetawan ..... " 31
Burk's Falls ..... June 1
Sundridge ..... " 3
Wattenwyl ..... " 4
South River ..... " 5
Trout Creek ..... " 6
Granite Hill ..... " 7
Golden Valley ..... " 8
Arnstein ..... " 10
Loring ..... " 11
Restoule ..... " 13
Carr ..... " 14
Hotham ..... " 15
Powassan ..... " 17

TEMISCAMINGUE—
North Cobalt ..... " 18
Haileybury (Buche Tp.) ..... " 19
New Liskeard ..... " 20
Milberta ..... " 21
Chester's Corners ..... " 22
Hillview ..... " 24
Uno Park ..... " 25
Hanbury ..... " 26
Thornloe ..... " 27
Earlton ..... " 28
Hilliardton ..... " 29
Tomstown ..... July 2
Heaslip ..... " 3
Charlton ..... " 4
Marter ..... " 5
Chamberlain ..... " 6
Matheson ..... " 8
Monteith ..... " 9
Porcupine ..... " 10
Cochrane ..... " 11

DIVISION 21—Lecturers: Miss S. Campbell, Brampton; Clark Hamilton, Dundela, Ont.

EAST NIPISSING—
Mattawa ..... June 3
Brule Schoolhouse ..... " 4
Eau Claire ..... " 5

WEST NIPISSING—
Feronia ..... " 6
Sturgeon Falls ..... " 7
Warren ..... " 8

CENTRE ALGOMA—
Goulais Bay ..... " 10
Tarentorus ..... " 11
South Prince ..... " 12
West Korah ..... " 13
Base Line ..... " 14
East Korah ..... " 15

NORTH SHORE ALGOMA—
Garden River ..... " 17
Echo Bay ..... " 18
Bar River ..... " 19
Laird ..... " 20
McLennan ..... " 21
Desbarats ..... " 22

EAST ALGOMA—
Johnson's Schoolhouse ..... " 24
Bruce Mines ..... " 25
Cloudslee ..... " 26
Alma Heights ..... " 27
Little Rapids ..... " 28
Livingstone Creek ..... " 29
Sowerby ..... July 2
Iron Bridge ..... " 3
Walford Hall ..... " 4
Massey ..... " 5

WEST NIPISSING—
Webbwood ..... " 6
Woodlands ..... " 8
Lee Valley ..... " 9

DIVISION 22—Lecturers: Miss G. Gray, Toronto; David James, Thornhill, Ont.

EAST MANITOULIN—
Little Current (W. I. only) ..... June 3
Sheguindah ..... " 4
Green Bay ..... " 5
Budges ..... " 6
Hilly Grove ..... " 7
Tehkummah ..... " 8
South Baymouth ..... " 10
Sandfield ..... " 11
Silver Bay (Big Lake) ..... " 12
Mindemoya ..... " 13
Carnarvon ..... " 14

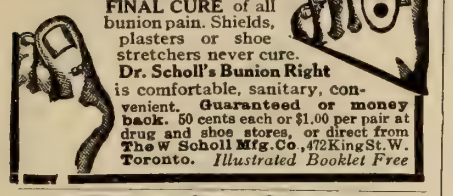
WEST MANITOULIN—
Grimesthorpe ..... " 15
Billings ..... " 17
Ice Lake ..... " 18
Long Bay ..... " 19
Poplar ..... " 20
Barrie Island ..... " 21
Gordon's ..... " 22
Evansville ..... " 24
Silver Water ..... " 25

Cure that Bunion

No need to suffer bunion torture another day.

DR. SCHOLL'S BUNION RIGHT

removes the cause of your bunion or enlarged toe joint by permanently straightening the crooked toe. Gives INSTANT RELIEF and a FINAL CURE of all bunion pain. Shields, plasters or shoe stretchers never cure.



Dr. Scholl's Bunion Right is comfortable, sanitary, convenient. Guaranteed or money back. 50 cents each or $1.00 per pair at drug and shoe stores, or direct from The W Scholl Mfg. Co., 472 King St. W. Toronto. Illustrated Booklet Free

OXO

An Oxo Cube dissolved in a tumbler of milk or soda water is a marvellous pick-me-up, stimulating and refreshing.

4 Cubes 10c. 10 Cubes 25c.

Cubes

PEERLESS PERFECTION

The first cost should be the last cost.

You should put up a fence that will give you real fence service first, last and all the time. The cheapest is always the most expensive in the long run on account of repairs necessary.

Peerless Saves Expense

because it is the poultry fence that never needs repairs.

Peerless poultry fencing is made of the best steel fence wire—tough, elastic and springy—and will not snap or break under sudden shocks or quick atmospheric changes. Our method of galvanizing positively prevents rust and will not flake, peel or chip off. This feature alone adds many years to the life of a fence.

The joints are securely held with the "Peerless Lock" which will withstand all sudden shocks and strains yet is so constructed that Peerless Poultry Fence can be erected on the most hilly and uneven ground without buckling, snapping or kinking.

The heavy stay wires we use make Peerless Poultry fencing rigid and upstanding thereby preventing sagging and needs only about half as many posts as other fences.

We build our poultry fence stronger than seems necessary in order to keep marauding animals out and close enough to keep the smallest fowls in. Many of our customers are using this style as a general purpose fence with entire satisfaction.

Peerless Poultry Fence when once put up is always up and will look better, wear better and serve you better than any other fence built.

Our Catalogs are all Free to You

Write us for literature and address of nearest agent. We also manufacture a complete line of general fencing, farm gates, walk gates and ornamental fencing. Agents almost everywhere.

Banwell-Hoxie Wire Fence Co., Ltd.
Winnipeg, Man. Hamilton, Ont.

MAXWELL'S "PURITY" FOOD-CUTTER

is entirely different from the ordinary food chopper. The barrel is in two closely fitting sections, clamped together by one set-screw.

Canadian made machine.

Better in quality, capacity and price works better, better finished, less in price.

Five different cutting plates.

"MAXWELL'S PURITY" is the only food cutter made in Canada—and in ease, convenience, perfect cutting and durability—is superior to anything imported. If your dealer does not handle "Maxwell's Purity" write us.

DAVID MAXWELL & SONS,
St. Marys, Ont.

132

St. Joseph's Island—
Marksville	June	28
Stone	"	29
Kentvale	July	2
Richard's Landing	"	3
Carterton	"	4
DIVISION 23—Lecturers: Mrs. Thos. Shaw, Hespeler; R. S. Stevenson, Ancaster, Ont.
Thunder Bay—
Dorion	May	30
Ouimet	"	31
Port Arthur	June	1
Slate River	"	3
Hymers	"	4
South Gillies	"	5
O'Connor	"	6
Conmee	"	7
Murillo	"	8
Kenora—
Barclay	"	11
Dryden	"	12
Glengoland	June	13
Oxdrift	"	14
Eagle River	"	15
Kenora	"	18
Jaffray	"	19
Rainy River—
Sleeman	"	24
Stratton	"	25
Shenston	"	26
Barwick	"	27
Emo	"	28
Barnhart	"	29
Big Fork	July	2
Devlin	"	2
Burriss	"	4
Thunder Bay—
Fort William	"	8

June Flowers for the Table

THE arrangement of the table in June is a delightful task, so abundant and varied are the blossoms to be had. All through the winter, many housekeepers have to content themselves with a potted plant as a centre piece, or without any table decorations in the way of flowers at all. But with the beginning of summer comes a wealth of flowers in country gardens and growing wild in fields and woods, while even in cities many kinds of flowers can be bought at a price within the reach of housekeepers of limited means. It is very often the case that the mother, however much she may feel the importance of having the table look nice, is too busy with other matters to look after the purely decorative part, particularly at breakfast, when, if ever, the table should be attractive and inviting. The young daughters should be encouraged to undertake this part of the preparations, and it is not hard for the parents, by a little genuine appreciation now and then, to stimulate rivalry in the production of pretty effects.

In Japan the daughters of the house are taught flower arrangement just as they are other branches of housekeeping. Their idea as to what is artistic differs from ours in that they seldom mingle different kinds of flowers and never mass the blossoms so that individual beauty is lost. In Japan one very often sees a single branch of a flowering shrub, stuck in a tall jar, the only decoration in the room. This is a good suggestion for the use of lilac, among the loveliest of the June flowers If the branch arrangement is not practicable for the table, try the effect of a few clusters instead of a massed vase-full. Lilacs are best kept by themselves, but if one had some long-stemmed pink roses to mix with the mauve lilacs the color effect is very pretty.

Pansies, which come later, can only be shown to advantage in a flat arrangement with plenty of room. Fill a low, flat dish with moist sand, and into it stick the flower stalks with a few leaves around the edge of the dish. Another method of supporting pansies is to have a piece of wire netting that just fits into the top of the bowl. The stalks are inserted through the meshes into the water, and the flowers are held over the surface. Wild violets should be arranged in little bunches, each bunch with its own leaves.

Garden snowballs, which come in June, can be made in similar ways an attractive decorative decoration for the breakfast table. Put the stems of the snowballs well down into the sand, and here and there stick a bit of asparagus fern or any delicate greenery, letting the green trail over the edge.

Daisies are always pretty for table decoration, and they stay fresh-looking longer than almost any other flower. They combine charmingly with other flowers of the season, and can be arranged with grasses and feathery fern in a tall, slender vase, or in a quantity by themselves in a lower one.

Nothing is lovelier than the June roses, but their life is brief. As a rule each color of rose looks best by itself, but one can often find several shades of the one color, especially pink, running from the palest tint to a deep glowing color. A pretty centre-piece is a rather low vase of white roses set in the middle of a flat dish of pansies or violets.

If one is fortunate enough to be able to get white pond lilies in their season, one can have a lovely centre-piece delightfully cool-looking on a hot day.

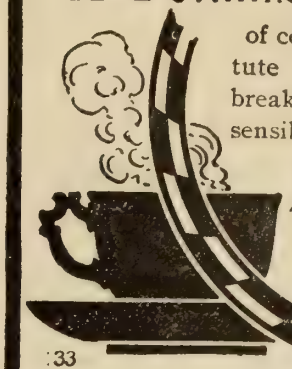
NOTWITHSTANDING THE ABUSE of coffee by the cereal substitute people, coffee is still the breakfast favorite of millions of sensible people.



Seal Brand is the finest coffee that can be procured.

PACKED IN ONE AND TWO POUND CANS ONLY

CHASE & SANBORN MONTREAL

33

The World's Greatest Operatic Stars Use and Endorse THE NEW SCALE WILLIAMS CANADA'S GREATEST PIANO

"The tone is simply magnificent"—Slezak.

¶ If you stop to consider the number of times this Piano has been used on the Concert platform, and the standing of the Artists who use it, there can be no doubt in your mind about the high position it occupies in the musical world.

Artists like CARUSO, FARRAR, HOMER, FREMSTAD, RAPPOLD, SLEZAK, SCOTTI, ELMAN, SEMBRICH and DESTINN, have chosen this great instrument for their Canadian Tours, because it is different from other pianos, and its magnificent tone is recognized as the NEW STANDARD which appeals to those who will have only the best.

Sold by reliable dealers from Coast to Coast or from factory direct.

Ask about our extended payment plan.

242

The Williams Piano Co., Limited
MANUFACTURERS Oshawa, Ont.

LEO SLEZAK
Great Wagnerian Tenor

OUR PRICES INCLUDE ALL CHARGES, BOTH DUTY AND POSTAGE

OUR CAP CURLS Only $5.00 mounted on a light frame, most easy to arrange

THE UNIVERSAL HAIR Co.

TRANSFORMATIONS Any Style, $9 50
Extra Full of Hair, $13.00
Made of the finest quality Human Hair, a complete covering for the head. Circumference of head only needed

A STYLISH TOUPET ONLY $5.00
Entire Transformation $9.50 or $13.00

For Light, Pale, Grey & Auburn Shades extra is charged.

TWIST OF PURE LONG HAIR (as sketch) to complete this effective dressing. Price according to length and thickness required, from $5.00.

A STYLISH POMPADOUR. Entire Transformation $9.50 or $13.00. Toupet only, $2.25 or $3 50.

All Orders delivered direct to your home, securely packed

Send for LATEST CATALOGUE No. 7 to:
CLOUGHER SYNDICATE,
449 Spadina Ave., TORONTO.

Address all ORDERS Manageress 84, FOXBERRY ROAD, BROCKLEY, LONDON, S.E. ENGLAND.

Beautiful Gift Books For the Bride

Types of Canadian Women and of women who are or who have been connected with Canada.
Edited by Henry James Morgan, LL.D., F.R.S.N.A.
Vol. I.
Large Quarto. Cloth, with hundreds of portraits.
$5.00 Net, postpaid

Treasury of Canadian Verse with brief biographical notes.
SELECTED AND EDITED BY
Theodore H. Rand, D.C.L.
Cloth, $1.25. Full calf decorated in gold, $3.50 net, postpaid.

A Wreath of Canadian Song
Containing biographical sketches and numerous selections from Canadian poets.
by Mrs. C. M. Whyte-Edgar
Cloth, with full page group pictures of Canadian poets, $1.25 postpaid.

Mountain Wild-Flowers of Canada
A simple and popular guide to the names and descriptions of the flowers that bloom above the clouds.
Profusely illustrated with beautiful full-page engravings.
Cloth, $2.00 net, postpaid.

Canadian Wild-Flowers
PAINTED AND LITHOGRAPHED BY Agnes Fitz-Gibbon with Botanical Descriptions by
C. P. Traill
Large Quarto—flowers in black and white, $2.50, postpaid.
Hand-painted by Mrs. Agnes Chamberlain, $6.00 net, postpaid.
At all booksellers or from

William Briggs
PUBLISHER
29-37 Richmond St. West - Toronto, Ont.

Muskoka

The wide expanse of waters and the marvelous beauties of Muskoka can only be realized by a journey along the shore of the lakes. The Canadian Northern Ontario Railway runs through the heart of the district, with wharf-side stations at Bala Park and Lake Joseph

THE LAKE SHORE LINE

FROM THE PUBLISHERS

MRS. ISABEL ECCLESTONE MACKAY'S first novel, "The House of Windows," has been published during the last month, and the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL is proud of the fact that this work of fiction was introduced to the public as a serial in its columns. Our readers became deeply interested in the fortunes and misfortunes of the beautiful heroine, as the months went by, and were anxious to see whatever would become of Christine, who had been kidnapped in her infancy and brought up by a genuine benefactress in the person of Celia Brown, the girl who worked in the great "Stores." Aside from the genuine story interest in the book, there is a sketch of the conditions under which the shop girl lives and works, which should give pause to the modern student of economics and social service. The style in which the narrative is told proves that Mrs. MacKay has the novelist's gift of lifelike portrayal and narration. Of all the characters, that of the blind girl, Ada, is the most delicately and convincingly presented. Her imaginary garden is one of the "truest" things in the story and suggests a world of dream joys. There is a glimpse of Western Canada in the story, which makes the Eastern reader ardently desirous of buying a through ticket for Vancouver. We are sure that the popularity which "The House of Windows" enjoyed as a serial will be extended to the volume in which the complete novel appears. (Cassell and Company.)

~

IT has never been decided just how much a book's title has to do with its selling qualities? There are certain titles which attract us at once, there are others which make us believe that the books bearing them must be dull or uninteresting. A title which must have been chosen in a happy moment is "The Maid of the Whispering Hills," which belongs to a prettily-bound novel, written by Vingie E. Roe. This is a book for the girl who loves a romance, to read and enjoy. It makes no pretence to being anything but a simple tale of love and adventure. It deals with no problems, exploits no new theories for the world's upheaval, but narrates the stirring events which took place in the lives of certain adventurers in the Far West of Canada, about the year 1796. We are taken back to the days of feud between the Hudson's Bay Company and the North-West Company, which became bitter war, indeed, before the end was seen. There is a heroine of the traditional marvellous beauty, Maren Le Moyne, whose brunette charms turn at least three masculine heads in the community and create an immense amount of mental havoc. Anders McElroy, the Hudson's Bay Factor, is the foremost of these suitors, with "a mouth that was all Irish and a square Scottish jaw." Then there is Alfred de Courtenay, chivalrous and gay, a hero of the gallant, old, fascinating type, which every schoolgirl loves. Lastly, there was the careless boy, Marc Dupre, the beau ideal of trapper and voyageur, who took life lightly until he looked into the dark eyes of Maren Le Moyne. The story of the journey to the Whispering Hills is graphically told, and there are no dull moments in this romance of long ago. The charm of outdoors—the outdoors of virgin forest and sun-kissed lake is never far away. (Toronto: William Briggs.)

~

INDIANA is a state which has lately made a great name for itself in American letters. James Whitcomb Riley is the poet who has made it famous for homely verse, such as you place in your scrap-book and remember for many a year, when more imposing rhymes are forgotten. Our latest story of Indiana is "A Hoosier Chronicle," by Meredith Nicholson, which is a story of love and politics, with the ingredients blended judiciously. Mr. Nicholson is one of the "best-selling" novelists, although, from the artistic standpoint, he is hardly among the first or even second American novelists of the day. Mr. Tarkington, for instance, far excels him in smoothness of literary execution, while Mr. Nicholson is very far below the "Dean" of American literature. However, "The Hoosier Chronicle" is a thoroughly entertaining story, with a heroine of somewhat unusual qualities, and a hero of the right order, the modern young American with a strong jaw and a determination to "get on" and be fair and square. The cheery warmth of the "Chronicle" is its most attractive quality, and the reader becomes a "personal friend" of Mrs. Owen, who winds up the story with the comforting reflection: "It's all pretty comfortable and cheerful and busy in Indiana, with lots of old-fashioned human kindness flowing round; and it's getting better all the time. And I guess it's always got to be that way, out here in God's country." (Toronto: William Briggs.)

MRS. ISABEL ECCLESTONE MACKAY

~

WE are glad to see that "Seranus," whose verse appears all too rarely, has published "In Northern Skies," a booklet of poetry which gives us some old favorites and introduces several recent works. "In Northern Skies," the first poem, is a brilliant description of those lights in the Arctic regions which compensate for much dreariness and the desolation of white stretches:

"Shields of silver, studded with fires of topaz, Harps that are silver-strung, rimmed pale with pearls."

These poems are essentially of Canada, in subject and atmosphere, yet are written with a breadth of feeling which prevents the slightest taint of that provincialism which mars so much of latter-day verse.

Kellogg's
TOASTED
CORN
FLAKES
You have tired of other cereals --- but you won't tire of this! Spend a dime today for 59

10c
Per Pkg.

DOMINION EXPRESS
Money Orders
and Foreign Cheques are payable all over the World.
They may be sent in payment of produce, tax, gas and electric light bills, interest on notes and mortgages, insurance premiums, subscriptions to newspapers and magazines, and in fact in payment of all kinds of accounts, whether in or out of town.
We give you a receipt and if the remittance goes astray in the mails,
we refund your money or issue a new order free of charge.
TRAVELLERS' CHEQUES ISSUED.
MONEY SENT BY TELEGRAPH AND CABLE.
When purchasing Goods by mail, ALWAYS remit by
DOMINION EXPRESS CO.
MONEY ORDERS
RATES FOR MONEY ORDERS:
OVER $ TO $ AND UNDER $ CENTS
5 10 10
10 20 20 10
20 30 30 15
AGENCIES THROUGHOUT CANADA.

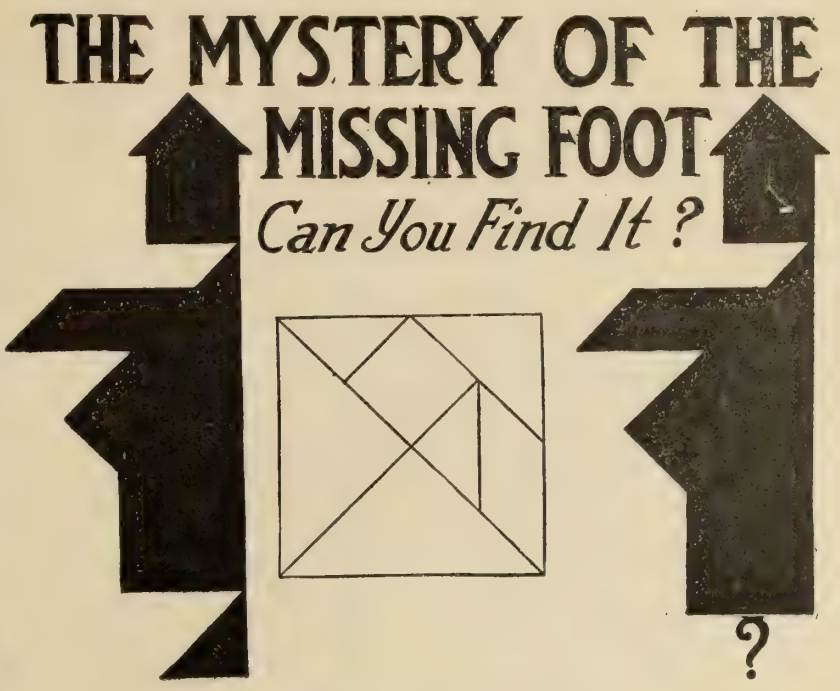
$500 Given Away
Select from Buy Direct. Post Card
1912 Ideal Decorations 144 pages

This Book. First Cost. will bring it
Home Catalogue. illustrated.
CURTAINS, all makes, ART FABRICS, MUSLINS, Household LINEN, Ladies and Gents Underwear, Boots & Shoes, Costumes, Gents Clothing.
$6.60 CURTAIN PARCEL POSTAGE & DUTY PAID.
2 pairs charming old Lace Design Curtains, 3½yds long, 60ins wide, worth $2 per pair.
2 pairs neat conventional floral, fancy ground, 3 yards long, 48 inches wide.
1 Duchesse Toilet Set of 6 Lace Covers. Our Patent Contrenet Make Curtains, durability guaranteed, White or Ecru. $500 worth of Goods Free to Overseas Customers, third year of Gifts, full particulars with Catalogue, Buy from actual Makers. Estab. 55 years.
Great saving. Satisfaction Guaranteed.
SAML. PEACH & SONS, Box 667
The Looms, NOTTINGHAM, England.

REMOVAL NOTICE
Readers will in future address us at 26 and 28 Adelaide St. West, Toronto.

WITH THE JOURNAL'S JUNIORS

(Continued from page 1)



The Mystery of the Missing Foot

THIS is a real serious puzzle, no matter how suspiciously you may regard it. If you don't believe it can be done, just wait until you see next month's CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, containing the solution, and when you know how it is very, very easy.

Getting back to the beginning, here are two figures, closely resembling each other. The only noticeable difference is that the one on the left has a foot. The one on the right has none. Each of the figures was made with the self-same seven pieces of the square shown above. In each case the pieces fitted closely together, and there was no overlapping. In both cases the head, hat, and arm are precisely alike, and the width of the body at the base is the same. Yet one figure has a foot and the other has not. Where did the first man get his foot from?

Cut out the square and divide it into seven pieces by cutting along the division lines as marked. Arrange the seven pieces to form first one figure and then the other. In this way you may be able to solve the mystery of the missing foot.

Squaring a Greek Cross

One of the favorite puzzles of the mathematicians of ancient times involved the cutting of a Greek cross into five pieces which could be fitted together again to form a perfect square. The sross and the ancient solution are shown herewith.

But modern puzzle solvers can find a much better solution to this ancient puzzle. It is not necessary to cut the cross into five pieces. With two clips of the scissors you can divide the cross into four pieces, which will fit together perfectly to form the square.

Can you show how this is to be done? The solution will appear in July Number.

Gore Bay, Ont., April 7, 1912.

Dear Cousin Clover:

I am just going to tell you about the place where I live. I live in the township of Gordon, province of Ontario. It is about four miles from Gore Bay. My father has a farm and we grow apples, pears, peaches and many other things. We have no snow here at present. We have no skating here now. In the summer I go bathing and skating. I enjoy going to town because I have a sister there. We have a church and a Sunday School over here, and it is an English church. We have about fifty scholars when they are all present. I go to Sunday School, and I have a lovely teacher; her name is Mrs. McIntosh. I go to school, it is called S.S. No. 1. I am in the third reader. There are two boys and three girls in my class. I think I have told you all, so I will close now. Hoping Cousin Clover much success with the letters. Yours truly,

BELLA PEMBERTON.

Fairview, Van., B.C.
1499 8th Ave. W

Dear Cousin Clover:

We take the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL and I like it very much. I always read the Juniors' Page. In the summer holidays we go out in the country. I and my brother found a camp stove and we cooked potatoes and carrots and beans, and we ate them.

We have two ponies, named Nip and Tuck. I ride on Nip with the saddle up and down the road. Tuck is only a colt. We have a calf and a cow. One day the calf got away and we had great fun catching it. I will close now.

Yours sincerely,

MARTHA MCKECHNIE.

Martha has received no assistance. She will be ten years of age next January.

MRS. ANNIE C. MCKECHNIE.

* * *

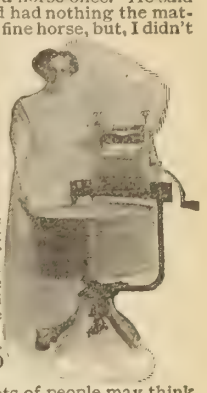
Dear Martha:

With such a name you ought to make a famous housekeeper some day, and, indeed, your neat handwriting gives assurance of your tidy ways.

Nip and Tuck are new names to me for ponies, and I am sure you must enjoy your rides on the former. I wish you had a photograph of your small self on his back.

THIS WASHER MUST PAY FOR ITSELF.

A MAN tried to sell me a horse once. He said it was a fine horse and had nothing the matter with it. I wanted a fine horse, but, I didn't know anything about horses much. And I didn't know the man very well either.



So I told him I wanted to try the horse for a month. He said "All right," but pay me first, and I'll give you back your money if the horse isn't all right."

Well, I didn't like that. I was afraid the horse was'nt "all right" and that I might have to whistle for my money if I once parted with it. So I didn't buy the horse, although I wanted it badly. Now, this set me thinking,

You see I make Washing Machines—the "1900 Gravity" Washer.

And I said to myself, lots of people may think about my Washing Machine as I thought about the horse, and about the man who owned it.

But I'd never know, because they wouldn't write and tell me. You see I sell my Washing Machines by mail. I have sold over half a million that way. So, thought I, it is only fair enough to let people try my Washing Machines for a month, before they pay for them, just as I wanted to try the horse.

Now, I know what our "1900 Gravity" Washer will do. I know it will wash the clothes, without wearing or tearing them, in less than half the time they can be washed by hand or by any other machine.

I know it will wash a tub full of very dirty clothes in Six Minutes. I know no other machine ever invented can do that, without wearing the clothes. Our "1900 Gravity" Washer does the work so easy that a child can run it almost as well as a strong woman, and it don't wear the clothes, fray the edges, nor break buttons, the way all other machines do.

It just drives soapy water clear through the fibres of the clothes like a force pump might.

So, said I to myself, I will do with my "1900 Gravity" Washer what I wanted the man to do with the horse. Only I won't wait for people to ask me. I'll offer first, and I'll make good the offer every time.

Let me send you a "1900 Gravity" Washer on a month's free trial. I'll pay the freight out of my own pocket, and if you don't want the machine after you've used it a month, I'll take it back and pay the freight too. Surely that is fair enough, isn't it.

Doesn't it prove that the "1900 Gravity" Washer must be all that I say it is?

And you can pay me out of what it saves for you. It will save its whole cost in a few months in wear and tear on the clothes alone. And then it will save 50 to 75 cents a week over that in washwoman's wages. If you keep the machine after the month's trial, I'll let you pay for it out of what it saves you. If it saves you 60 cents a week, send me 50 cents a week 'till paid for. I'll take that cheerfully, and I'll wait for my money until the machine itself earns the balance.

Drop me a line to-day, and let me send you a book about the "1900 Gravity" Washer that washes clothes in six minutes.

Address me personally: F. I. Bach, 357 Yonge St., Toronto.

It is during its simple preparation that the unique advantages of Benger's Food become apparent.

By allowing it to stand for a longer or shorter period at one stage, you can adjust this food for infants or growing children, for persons suffering from dyspepsia, and for all conditions of illness, when ordinary foods are unsuitable. This range of utility is unique among foods.

Benger's Food, while being entirely distinct from pre-digested foods, contains the natural digestive principles, with the difference that they are under entire control during its preparation.

Every householder should possess a copy of "Benger's Food and how to use it — for Infants, Invalids, and the Aged." Post Free from:—
BENGER'S FOOD, Ltd
OTTER WORKS,
MANCHESTER, ENG.
Benger's Food is sold in tins, by Druggists, etc. everywhere.

THE THIRD MAN

(Continued from page 10)

Geoff was worse than a rival; he had actually stolen the woman he loved. He did not know, of course. Everything had been done fairly and squarely, but the result was tragic all the same. He had never imagined such a termination for a moment.

Bart went back to the window again, and stared into the street. He supposed he would get used to the idea in time, but for the moment everything, except a dull pain at his heart, seemed terribly unreal.

The old don accepted Geoff as his future son-in-law with a good many inward protests. He hated having his calculations upset. He had nothing against Geoff personally: he was a very nice young man, and in time, given health and a fair chance, might make his way in the world; but, compared with David Wiggs as a husband for Eve, he was not to be mentioned on the same day. David could, and would, have taken Eve off his hands at once. All anxiety respecting the future would have been at an end.

He had yielded in the end for the sake of peace and quietness. He hated to see Eve in tears; it disturbed the harmony of things; it was as bad as a snowstorm in June. He had never quite realized before how illogical women were. Eve swept all his arguments aside as if they were of no account.

She didn't love David Wiggs, and she did love Geoff Lincoln, and that was practically all he could get out of her.

Neither was he able to get any real satisfaction out of Geoff.

"Don't you think it is very foolish," he demanded sternly, "to engage yourself to a girl before you have made a position for yourself?"

"And what business had you to propose to her before asking my consent?"

"I apologize for that, of course," Geoff answered frankly. "You see, I did not intend speaking quite so soon."

"Then why did you speak?" the old man thundered.

"Well, that is not a very easy question to answer. We do a good many things under the influence of a sudden impulse."

"You mean that you do. I never act on impulse. I hope I have too much sense."

"We have not all the same amount of self-command that you possess."

"I want Eve to marry a man who is able to maintain her. You talk about love. All young people do. It is a passing phase; a pleasant though dangerous emotion; a fleeting passion. You cannot live on sentiment. Rent has to be paid and food and clothes provided."

Geoff, however, did not reply. It occurred to him that silence might be golden under the circumstances.

A few minutes later he found Eve in the drawing-room, looking as sweet and dainty as a June rose. She rose at once, with a smile and a blush, and held up her face to be kissed.

Geoff felt years older than he did a week ago. He was a man now, and this fair girl had promised to be his wife. It was all very wonderful and not a little intoxicating. When he was alone a good many awkward questions presented themselves to him—questions for which he could find no very satisfactory answer; but here, in the presence of Eve, every unpleasant and disquieting thing was forgotten. It was just pure delight to sit and look at her. From her crown of sunny hair to her daintily slippered feet she was a perfect picture.

"Was father very cross?" she questioned, with half-averted glance.

"He was rather."

"My heart was thumping in my throat all the time you were with him."

"Dear little girl."

"You do care for me lots and lots?"

"Heaps and heaps."

"I am so thankful, Geoff, and—and—happy. It is such a deliverance."

"But you would never have consented to marry David Wiggs?"

"I should have been most unhappy if I had. But father was so bent on it, and David was very determined, and really I do think he was very fond of me. It did not occur to me that aybody else could care for me so much."

Geoff did not reply for some time; then he said slowly and with averted eyes, "I think we will not talk about David again, if you do not mind."

"You are not jealous, you foolish boy."

"No, it is not jealousy. Bart felt just the same."

"Bart Gordon?" And a soft blush suffused her neck and face, then slowly vanished, leaving her paler than usual.

"Bart is the best fellow in the world," he replied warmly. "I hope he will win a fellowship, then he will be able to look after you when I am gone down?"

She glanced up at him and smiled.

"Do you think I shall need looking after, Geoff?"

"Oh, I don't mean that I am afraid. But if Bart remains up, he will be able to take you out sometimes and be company for you."

"That would be very nice." And she dropped her eyes again.

"I intend to earn money as soon as possible. It will take time, of course, to win a position, but now that I have you I shall work like a nigger."

"You must not overwork yourself, Geoff."

"Oh, there is no fear of that," he said, with a laugh, "but I don't intend keeping you waiting any longer than I can help."

"I don't mind waiting in the least, now that—that— You know what I mean! Oh, I can wait as long as you like," and she lifted her face to him again and smiled.

"Do you know," he said, with a note of pride in his voice, "I think you are the sweetest girl in the world?" and he bent over and kissed her.

David Wiggs received his dismissal with an ill-grace. He had not an excess of amiability at the best; at the worst he had less than his fair share. That he should have a somewhat exaggerated idea of his own importance was perhaps natural; the grace of humility had never been given a fair chance. His father had been a successful cotton-spinner. David was his only son—his only child, in fact; hence, on Abel Wiggs's death, about nine months previously, David had come into possession of more money than was good for him, and was likely to come in for a good deal more should he survive his mother.

It was Abel Wiggs's great ambition that his son David should be a gentleman. He did not claim any such distinction himself. He began life in a cotton mill as a half-timer, and gradually worked his way up to the position of manufacturer.

"Keep thy eyes open, David," was his father's parting injunction, "and larn to do th' correct thing. Don't be fooled by foak who don't understand business. Always be up a few minutes afore your neighbor, if you're to get on. And don't you be imposed upon; no man wins respect by lying down for others to tread on him. Keep a civil tongue; but don't remain in anybody's debt. If a man downs you, bide your time till you get quits. Insults should be returned with compound interest. Always do more than thou says, David, especially to the man to whom thou owes a grudge. If there's owt to be gained by pulling an oar, don't be afraid of sweatin'. Remember thou'rt thy father's son, and do credit to thy upbringing."

David took on polish rather slowly, but in most respects he lived up to his father's injunctions. He became quite proficient on the river, and won his college colors—that was his one distinction, and he spoke of it with somewhat exaggerated modesty. He managed in his second year to pass Mods, but never got any farther; his attempt to get through Schools two years later was a dismal failure.

He could not help recalling his father's words as he wandered away from Rose Villa, after that May evening, when Eve informed him that she was betrothed to Geoff Lincoln: "Always do more than thou says, David, especially to the man to whom thou owes a grudge."

He shut his teeth tightly and quickened

THE HOME BEAUTIFUL

AND ITS HYGIENIC UP-KEEP

Modern housekeeping makes it imperative that all home surroundings shall be absolutely sanitary. Twenty-five years ago many things that were deemed luxuries have now become positive necessities, solely through the universal demand for the maintenance of perfectly sanitary conditions of living.

MAPLE LEAF FLAT WALL COLORS

Are now positively necessary for perfectly sanitary artistic wall and ceiling decoration. They are oil paints which dry flat, forming a perfect, non-peeling, sanitary glaze on the wall. They are non-absorbent and impervious to dust or germs, are waterproof and can be frequently washed with soap and water, or after sickness, with disinfecting fluids. All pigments contained therein are non-poisonous and will not dust through the air. From an economic standpoint no better service can be obtained in the artistic sanitary decorative maintenance of the home than that given by MAPLE LEAF FLAT WALL COLORS.

WE WILL HELP YOU in your home decoration, select for you the best materials to use, give you free color schemes, and place our experience at your disposal. We have a most complete line of decorative materials and stencil patterns for carrying out any scheme of decoration.

Fill in this coupon and mail to us, for our free book "The Wall Beautiful and Hygienic," telling how to obtain free the services of our Maple Leaf Decorative Aid Dept.

It contains a catalogue of excellent stencil designs.

Please send me at once your free booklet "The Wall Beautiful and Hygienic."

Name.....

Address.....

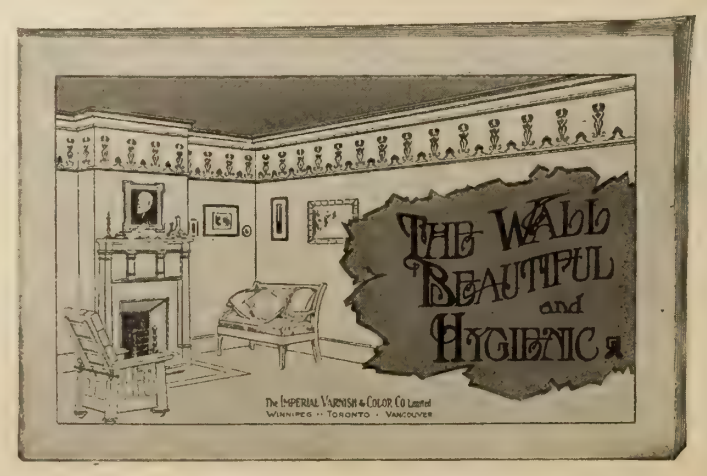
City.....

CHJ 6-12

The Imperial Varnish & Color Co., Limited

6-24 Morse St., Toronto

108 Princess Street, Winnipeg
365 Water Street, Vancouver



his pace in the direction of the town. It might not be wise to say much. Words had an unpleasant knack of turning up when least wanted. He could bide his time and keep silent. Was not that also his father's injunction? And his father, in spite of his lack of education, was a shrewd man.

The bitterness of defeat and the sense of humiliation did not grow less as the days passed away. He felt sure that Lincoln had poisoned Eve's mind against him—how else could her conduct be explained? Girls were not fools. They knew, as a rule, on which side their bread was buttered, and when it came to a question of eligibility, Lincoln was not to be mentioned on the same day.

He made inquiries as to Lincoln's antecedents, and discovered that he was the eldest son of a doctor in a London suburb. The discovery filled him with disgust. If he had been a sprig of the aristocracy Eve might have been forgiven for turning a blind eye to his poverty; but that she should have preferred the son of a sawbones, with nothing, to the son of a manufacturer, with plenty, could only be explained on the ground that he had either lied or told her the truth with too much circumstance and detail.

It required a considerable amount of self-control to keep his thoughts and intentions to himself. He never saw Geoff but he wanted to take him by the throat and strangle him. He never saw Eve but the smart of his wound seemed to increase a hundredfold. During Eights Week, notwithstanding his college boats made two bumps, he was more miserable than anyone knew. Geoff and Eve were all the time together, and he was constantly running across them somewhere. Geoff was not a rowing man, and so he was able to give all his time to Eve. Their very happiness lashed him into fury, whilst the way they ignored him drove him almost to madness.

The more he reviewed the circumstances, the more he became convinced that Geoff Lincoln had supplanted him by treachery.

"It's that blank scoundrel's lies that have done the trick," he would exclaim, "but your day will come, David—your day will come."

CHAPTER IV.

Partings

EVE'S engagement made a difference in many ways. She was happier than she had ever been in her life before. During Eights Week she lived in a condition of almost unbroken ecstasy. Geoff took her down to the river every afternoon and seemed proud to introduce her to his friends. They watched the races from his college barge, had tea on board, and when the last bump had been made, sauntered away across the meadows, and usually reached Rose Villa when the dusk was falling.

But after that came long days when she scarcely got a glimpse of Geoff. He was grinding early and late for his final and could not be expected to spend much time with her. Indeed, she would not have allowed it had he desired to do so. She knew her duty, knew what was good for him, knew what was best for both.

Her great trouble came at the end of June when she had to say good-bye to Geoff for an indefinite period. He was going down for good. Others would return in October to the cloistered stillness of Quad and garden, but Geoff's work at the 'Varsity was done. He was going out to face the world, to fight the battle that every true man has to fight, to win or lose in the great encounter.

Geoff was sad at leaving Eve. Her tearful face distressed him very much; but he was sadder still at having to say farewell to Oxford. Like nearly everyone else he had got to love the place.

He could not help recalling nearly three years before when he came up a fresher and found his way alone to his college. How strange and lonely he was no one ever guessed. He felt chilled and disheartened when he saw his rooms—his bedroom especially gave him the creeps—it was so small and bare and dark. And he had left a warm, snug home, which echoed with the laughter of young children. He hated Oxford that first evening, and felt sure he would hate it to the end of the chapter. Now his heart was heavy, and the tears were very near his eyes because he had to say good-bye. He was not thinking of Eve as he returned across the park from Rose Villa. "Dear old Oxford," he said to himself all unconsciously, and a mist came up before him which he cleared with his hand.

He turned into his own college for a last look round, wandered across the Quad and out into the garden, sat for a few moments in the shade of a wide-spreading beech and lighted a cigarette.

It all came back to him again like a pleasant dream. He saw the years pass in swift procession, pictured himself with hundreds of others all similarly clad, careless, joyous, often indolent; loitering down the "High," hands in pockets, head bare, gown twisted round the neck. He recalled the pleasant evenings in the Common Room, the debates at the Union, in which he had often taken part, the suppers on great occasions, the "rags," the bonfires, the narrow escapes. He recalled, too, the political speeches in country villages, the fun they had in going and returning, the tilts with interrupters, the friendly notice of great leaders.

He flung away the end of his cigarette and rose to his feet. It was all over now. The free, careless, inconsequential life of youth was at an end. Henceforth there must be work, and evermore work.

He had not realized all his hopes and expectations. He had come into competition with the pick of all the public schools, and even in Oxford rank counted for a good deal, but he had taken a respectable position. In the Union debates he had won a distinct place for himself. He would return home with no sense of shame or defeat.

In the weeks that had elapsed since Eve accepted his offer he had not only made the best of it, but he had succeeded in persuading Bart, and very largely in persuading himself, that he was desperately and whole-heartedly in love with Eve. When in her company he felt the happiest man in the world. She was not only delightfully fair to look upon, but she was so charmingly sweet and gentle in disposition that he could not help being fond of her. But when away from her presence and the glamor of her gentleness no longer steeped his senses, he discovered another influence at work within him. Pretty as Eve undoubtedly was, and loyal to her as he intended to be, there were times when there came up before him the picture of another face—a face that had haunted him for more than a year. He had been introduced to her on Balliol barge while watching the races. He stayed and had tea, and she sat directly opposite. He met her again the following day and walked with her across Christ Church meadows. In the crowd on the bank of the river they lost sight of each other, and he had never seen her since, and, indeed, he never expected to see her again. Her cousin—a fellow named Wilson—in introducing her, had not mentioned her name very distinctly. Also, he had been introduced to so many people that it was easy to forget. But the following day he had walked with her for quite a distance. Had talked about the weather, and the races, and the crews, and the chances of the various colleges. He could so easily have got to know her name and whence she hailed, but he had let the opportunity slip.

Not that it mattered, he told himself. A boyish fancy for a pretty face was never of any account. Only—only—well, she was not like anyone he had ever seen before or since. Her beauty was of so rare a kind that he wanted to see her again. Also, the fact that he did not know who she was, and had no means of knowing, piqued him; the unknown and the unknowable have always an irresistible fascination.

He made his way slowly out of the garden and back to his diggings. He was loth to tear himself away from Oxford, he shrank a little from meeting his father. Should he tell him everything? Should he tell him a part only, or should he tell him nothing?

His father was a level-headed man, not easily carried away by sentiment. How unutterably silly the whole thing would look in his eyes. Even if he were desperately in love, what madness it had been to get engaged. He had not even started in the way of earning his own living, and even with good fortune it would be years before he would be able to maintain a wife or even maintain himself.

The nearer he got to London the more troubled and perplexed he felt. The conviction grew upon him that he had made a mess of things, and yet he had no thought of drawing back. He would

"Listen, Rose."
Bud reads:
"Madam, your own white hands are the first to touch FIVE ROSES.
"For nearly one mile it travels through "hygienic automatic processes—more "and more spotless.
"Till in a clear creamy stream it flows into "clean new packages, filled full-weight by "infallible machinery—sewed automatically."
"Goodness!" said round-eyed Rose.
Bud reads eagerly:
"Hand-proof, germ-proof. Every littlest "bit of machinery is bright—polished like "those piano keys of yours. FIVE ROSES is "healthy flour, wholesome, none like it. "Unbleached, too."
"Nobody touches my flour—but me" said Rose.
Imagine such purity—get FIVE ROSES. 11

Five Roses Flour

Not Bleached Not Blended

LAKE OF THE WOODS MILLING COMPANY, LIMITED MONTREAL

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

have to be true to his promise whatever happened.

"I expect I had better make a clean breast of it," he said at length in desperation. "The truth is bound to come out sooner or later."

CHAPTER V

HESITATION

IT is proverbially easy to make resolutions, proverbially difficult to carry them into effect. Geoff had so many things to talk about on the evening of his arrival that he said nothing about his engagement.

The next day presented no favorable opportunity, nor the day following that. So a week passed away, and the great secret remained untold; what was worse still, he discovered that his courage was a steadily diminishing quantity. Over the dinner table and in the drawing-room the affairs of their neighbors had been talked about from time to time. And it appeared that a young fellow who lived with his parents two or three doors away had become engaged to a rather pretty nurse who was studying at one of the London hospitals. Geoff's brother Watty got hold of the story first, and retailed it as a good joke. Mrs. Lincoln chimed in that it was much too serious a matter to joke about. Dr. Lincoln characterized the young couple as a pair of silly children who ought to be locked up in separate nurseries until they had learned sense.

All this made his own case increasingly difficult. Like all young men, he had a horror of being laughed at. And if the whole neighborhood was laughing at Billy Smith and commiserating his parents, what would happen when his own case became known?

If his father got angry and Watty became supercilious, he would have no one to whom to turn for comfort. Perhaps, under all circumstances, he had better let his family discover the secret of his engagement by slow degrees.

After a week of idleness at home he went to the Temple to work up his law. There was no time to be wasted. He was anxious to get through his exams. as soon as possible. The sooner he was called the sooner would come the chance of earning his own bread.

During the first week or two he missed Eve terribly. He had got so completely into the habit of walking across to Rose Villa and feasting his eyes on her fair face that when he could no longer do so he felt intensely miserable. It was a great satisfaction to him that she had become so necessary to his peace of mind. It seemed proof, and the best possible proof, that he had not made any great mistake after all in proposing to her.

But when two or three weeks had passed away and he began to accommodate himself to his new surroundings, the sense of loss gradually wore away; he ceased to miss her, ceased to long for her company, and was quite content to receive a letter from her every now and then, and was not troubled at all if she missed a post or two Also, he found answering her letters something of a task. There was so little to write about. Every day seemed a replica of the day that had preceded it. If he had been violently in love he could have gone on repeating the same story with variations ad infinitum, but as he was not violently in love he had to fall back on news, and news after awhile became exceedingly scarce.

It was not until late in August that his engagement became known to the family. In London Eve's letters were rarely sent to his home address, but while they were away on their holidays in a small village on the north coast of Devon all the letters came by the same post and to the same address. Every morning. Dr. Lincoln would go through the pile and pass on the letters to the different members to whom they were addressed

Every other morning, with almost the regularity of clockwork, came a letter for Geoff, always in the same handwriting and bearing the Oxford postmark.

He spoke to his wife about it. She had had her suspicions for more than a fortnight. Indeed, she had been worrying herself for nearly a month.

"It's without doubt a woman's handwriting," he remarked meditatively.

"I do hope he's not got entangled with a girl," she said plaintively.

"So do I, most sincerely."

"Girls nowadays are so forward and cunning."

"Not more so than they have always been."

"Oh, yes, Tom, there's no comparison. Why, when I was a girl——"

"When you were a girl, mother," he interrupted with a laugh, "girls were girls and boys were boys."

"Oh, yes, but the behaviour——"

"Let's not discuss that," he said, in the same jocular tone. "The question is, shall we say anything to Geoff?"

"I'm surprised he has not taken you into his confidence. You've been such a companion to your boys."

"Perhaps there's nothing to be confidential about. Let us hope so, at any rate."

Later in the day the doctor intercepted Geoff as he was walking on the cliffs alone. He was not a man who believed in beating about the bush. If there was anything unpleasant to be known he would rather know it at once.

"Dreaming, Geoff?" he questioned in a jocular tone.

"I was enjoying the sea-breeze."

"Find it dull here?"

"Not a bit. It's a delightful change from London."

"Rather be in Oxford, I expect?"

Geoff looked up sharply. There was something in his father's tone that arrested attention. There was a smile, too, lurking round the corners of his mouth.

"Why do you think I would rather be in Oxford?" he questioned.

"You have friends there. Evidently one in particular. Is she very nice?"

"About whom are you talking?"

"The lady who writes to you every other day with such amazing regularity. Not engaged to her, I hope?"

"I hope to marry her when I am in a position to do so."

Dr. Lincoln stopped short in his walk and faced his son. "I'm sorry. You're much too young, and it's a pity to be handicapped so early in the race."

"I don't know why you should speak of it as a handicap. Why should it not be a help and an incentive?"

"In your position, Geoff, it is not well to have one's attention divided. However, I suppose that can't be helped now, but you need not have kept it so dark."

"You all made such fun of Billy Smith that I did not care to become the laughing stock of the family."

"Won't you tell me all about it, Geoff?" he questioned at length, and there was a note of pathos in his voice that was by no means usual.

Geoff began to talk in a low voice and with eyes averted. He was glad to get the secret off his mind. He admitted that perhaps in his courting he had been somewhat hasty and impetuous, but there was a reason for that. He said nothing of Bart Gordon's interest in the matter. It was just David Wiggs. He had plenty of money, a suave tongue, and unfailing pertinacity. He had got round the old professor and was gradually wearing down Eve's resistance. If he (Geoff) had not come along he would have married her by this time, and Eve would have been made miserable for life.

"And would you have proposed to her, Geoff, if there had been no David Wiggs on the prowl?"

"Perhaps not, father. Or, at any rate, not so soon. But one could not stand by and see that bounder walking off with the prettiest girl in Oxford."

"I am glad to hear she has been well brought up and is of good family. She must visit us when we get back."

"I'm sure you'll like her, father. She's a girl in a thousand, and she's quite willing to wait any length of time."

CHAPTER VI

IN LONDON

EVE came up to London in September. The weather was glorious, with only the faintest suggestion of autumn in the air. Geoff met her at Paddington with his father's motor.

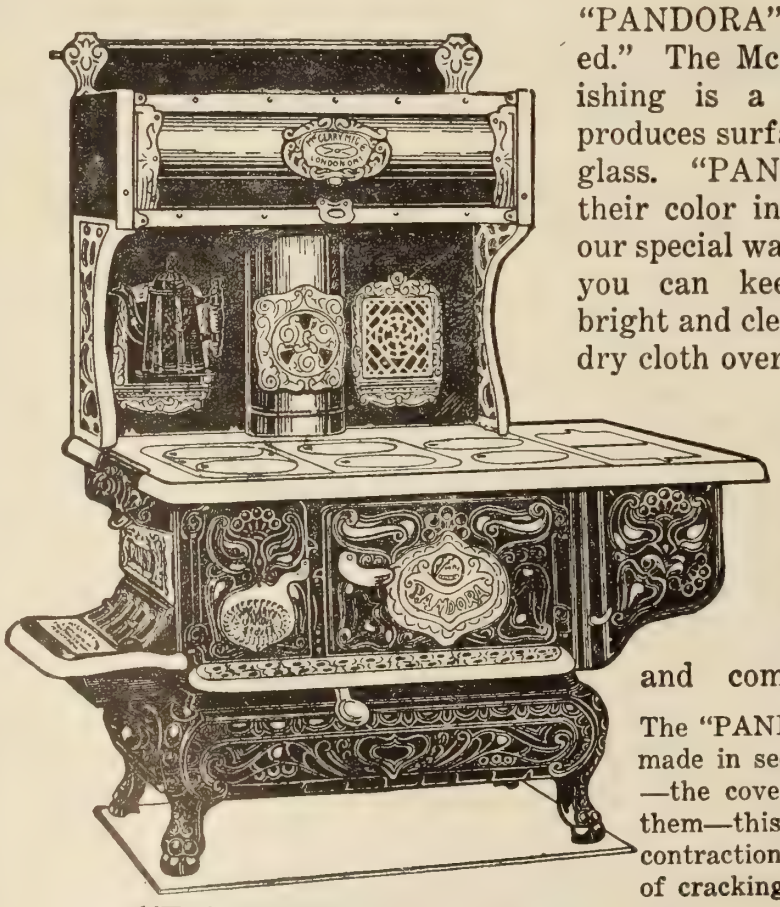
He scarcely recognized her for a moment. She wore a big hat that threw her face completely in shadow.

"Oh, Geoff," was all she could say, and he took both her hands in his and looked into her face. He wanted to kiss her then and there, but refrained—there were too many people about. He did not like her hat—he decided that on the spot—but no headgear could utterly spoil her loveliness; her smile was as sweet as ever, and her eyes shone with unusual brightness.

"It was just lovely of your mother to invite me to visit her," Eve said at length.

A Beautiful Range---Yet Easily Kept Clean

Glance at the "PANDORA" as it stands complete—a handsome range surely, yet easily kept clean. McClary's famed "Duplex" nickelling cannot burn off—it never becomes tarnished. About it there is no superfine "impossible-to-keep-clean" tracery—the nickel adornment is rich—the carving bold.



"PANDORA" surfaces are "burnished." The McClary system of burnishing is a special process that produces surfaces as smooth as plate glass. "PANDORA" surfaces keep their color indefinitely—they retain our special water-proof dressing. So, you can keep the "PANDORA" bright and clean by simply rubbing a dry cloth over it.

The "PANDORA" is more than a handsome range. It is also a permanent investment because it is built to endure—it is the one range that is as strong and compact as it looks.

The "PANDORA" cooking surface is made in sections with expansion top—the covers and cross-bars fit into them—this allows for expansion and contraction without any possibility of cracking or warping.

"PANDORA" Range

Top sections are reversible—you can place a boiler cross-wise on the "PANDORA" if you wish to use front pot-hole over fire. "PANDORA" lids and entire top are extra heavy and guaranteed not to crack or break under ordinary usage.

N. B.—You can have the story of "PANDORA" Efficiency in detail by simply asking for our free book, "REASONS FOR 'PANDORA' POPULARITY."

LONDON
TORONTO
WINNIPEG
ST. JOHN, N. B.

McClary's

MONTREAL
VANCOUVER
HAMILTON
CALGARY

102

IT IS WORTH ITS COST TO YOU

in increased vigor and strength, in increased power to produce, to earn, to enjoy. For is acknowledged to be the greatest known producer of human energy.

BOVRIL

Bovril is Concentrated Beef

The Best

training leading to a good salary is to be had under best conditions in any one of

Shaw's Schools

TORONTO

Courses in Business, Shorthand, Higher Accounting, and Civil Service and Telegraphy are provided for resident students.

Home Study Courses in the above subjects and also in Commercial Art, Short Story Writing and Photography are given. Positions secured for graduates. Write for particulars to

W. H. SHAW, President
TORONTO - - CANADA

THE COAST LINE TO MACKINAC

DETROIT CLEVELAND BUFFALO NIAGARA FALLS TOLEDO PT. HURON GODERICH ALPENA ST. IGNACE

THE CHARMS OF SUMMER SEAS

Spend your vacation on the Great Lakes, the most economical and enjoyable outing in America.

Where You Can Go

Daily service is operated between Detroit and Cleveland, Detroit and Buffalo; four trips weekly between Toledo, Detroit, Mackinac Island and way ports; daily service between Toledo, Cleveland and Put-in-Bay.

A Cleveland to Mackinac special steamer will be operated two trips weekly from June 15th to September 10th, stopping only at Detroit every trip and Goderich, Ont., every other trip. Special Day Trips Between Detroit and Cleveland During July and August.—Railroad Tickets Available on Steamers.—Send 2 cent stamp for Illustrated Pamphlet and Great Lakes Map. Address:

L. G. Lewis, G. P. A., Detroit, Mich.
Philip H. McMillan, President
A. A. Schantz, General Manager
Detroit and Cleveland Nav. Co.

Have You a Camera?

WE TEACH AMATEUR AND PROFESSIONAL PHOTOGRAPHY

right at your HOME in your spare hours. Under our instruction there is no GUESSING, EXPERIMENTING or WASTING. You learn to do successfully every step of the work yourself. OUR INSTRUCTOR IS CANADA'S ABLEST PHOTOGRAPHER and TEACHER. Success guaranteed. Fill in your name and address, cut out this ad. and mail today for full particulars.

Name_____

Address_____

THE SHAW CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL
391-397 YONGE ST. TORONTO

Change of Address

Agents, advertisers and subscribers will notice that our address is now

26-28 Adelaide St. West
TORONTO, ONT.

'I've been just dying for years to see and know London."

"But you have been here before?"

"Never to stay. I've driven from Paddington to Charing Cross and from Charing Cross to Paddington again and again in going and returning from school, but that is all. Oh, I'm aching to see all there is to be seen.

I hope you are not too awfully busy, Geoff," she concluded.

"I shall give to you as much time as possible, you may be quite sure," he said, stealing his arm timidly round her waist.

She made no response to his attempted embrace. She hardly seemed conscious of it. Her attention was absorbed by other things.

"I don't want to be a burden to you, of course, but I should like to see as much as possible."

"My brother Watty will be able to chaperon you when I am not available," he laughed a little uneasily.

"Oh, that will be splendid!"

"You won't mind?"

"Of course I won't mind."

He felt a little piqued. He had a vague feeling that she ought to mind.

A week later he began unconsciously to analyse his impressions and emotions. Eve had quite captivated the younger children; Watty declared that she was "ripping." Mrs. Lincoln took her to her heart at once; her disposition was as sweet as her face was fair. The doctor appeared satisfied with his son's choice. He did not say very much, but all that he did say was in Eve's favor. Geoff alone was conscious of something lacking. In some curiously elusive way or other, Eve in London was different from Eve in Oxford. Her beauty seemed less striking, the charm of her personality less rare. In Oxford she stood alone, as it were; there was no one to compete with her. In London she seemed dwarfed by the crowd; there were so many beautiful women, so many well-dressed women.

It was satisfactory, however, to find that a closer acquaintance demonstrated the sweetness and kindness of her disposition. London was a new world to her; its streets, its parks, its public buildings, its museums, its picture galleries, its whirling, rushing multitudinous life interested her beyond expression. She returned every evening—sometimes with Geoff, sometimes with Watty, sometimes with the doctor—with eager face and kindling eyes, and it invariably transpired that she had seen so much more than the others had seen. The days passed for her all too quickly. She was having the most delightful time of her life. She was in love with all the Lincoln family, and not a little pleased that in due time she would be related to them.

She came up for a week, and stayed a fortnight, and then returned quite cheerfully. She had had her fill of sightseeing, and was getting a little tired; also, she wanted to see her father, and her canary, and her collie, and her flowers; and, of course, she was almost bursting to tell all she had seen during her visit.

Geoff parted from her with a curious sense of disappointment and regret. He was still conscious of something lacking—lacking in himself as well as in her. They had had a fortnight together, and yet there had been practically no sweethearting. Eve allowed him to kiss her whenever he liked, as a matter of course, and she had returned his kisses in the most charming manner, but without emotion. Geoff had no right to complain, he knew. He was not a passionate lover himself; he had not proposed to her because he could not live without her; it was not passion but chivalry that led him to offer his hand, hence it was not reasonable to expect from her what he did not give himself. And yet he had expected—or at least he had hoped—that she would supply his lack, that her wealth of affection would fill all the void, and that propinquity would change his admiration into passive love.

He was loitering at the bookstall for a few minutes after the train had left the station, when suddenly he looked up to encounter the stare of David Wiggs. He was so astonished that for a moment he could not speak, and yet in that moment he had received an impression of malignant hate such as he had never before conceived possible. He tried to smile; he would have offered his hand in spite of the passion that blazed in his eyes, but David gave him no opportunity; with a muttered execration, he turned swiftly on his heel, and strode into the booking hall.

Geoff's eyes followed him as though fascinated. The very evil in the man's face threw over him a kind of spell. He knew that David was a surly fellow—he had borne that reputation in Oxford—but a look of such deadly and concentrated evil he had never seen in a man's eyes before.

As a matter of fact, David's affection for Eve had become a kind of mania; it obsessed him to such a degree that he could think of nothing else; it colored everything he saw, and made him indifferent to every other interest in life.

He went down from the 'Varsity an embittered and disappointed man. He would not have minded failing in "Schools" if he had succeeded in love; but to have failed in both was a humiliation too great to be endured, and he owed this humiliation entirely to Geoff Lincoln. How was a man to concentrate his attention on his books when his heart was torn with hatred and jealousy? So his hatred of Geoff steadily increased. The more he brooded over his wrongs the more bitter his feelings grew.

His father's mill was still in full swing, under the charge of a competent manager, but David hated the sight of it, hated the roar of the looms and the rattle of the spinning frames, and loathed the smell of the size. His mother wanted him, now that his education was finished, to take an interest in business and in affairs of the town. He might run as a candidate at the next municipal elections; in time he might become Mayor of Croston, as his father had done before him.

David curled his lip with scorn at the suggestion.

"Oh, father was all right," he answered, "but every man in his own order. Father was brought up to the mill; I wasn't."

"But thou shouldn't sneer at the mill. It's thy best friend still. It earns th' brass for thee."

"I'm not denying that. But what's the use of my meddling? Steve Duerden is managing it all right, isn't he?"

"Oh, ay. Duerden's a good man o' business, but' it's well thou should understand the run o' things in case of accidents."

"It's too late in the day, mother, even if I had the inclination, which I haven't."

"Then what art thou goin' to do? Thou art not goin' back to college again?"

"No; I've done with college, as you call it. But there are plenty of ways in which gentlemen can spend their time. I intend to see what London is like, and perhaps Paris and Berlin."

(To be continued.)

Marriage Ceremonies

(Continued from page 34)

on the bride's finger, the maid of honor or bridesmaid steps forward, takes her bouquet and helps her remove her glove (many brides slit the finger of the glove to facilitate matters). When the ceremony is over the bridesmaid helps the bride unveil her face. (Sometimes the veil in front is short and parted down the middle) and the bridal party start down the aisle. If there is a flower girl she goes first scattering flowers. Then follow the newly wedded couple, next the maid-of-honor and best man, then the bridesmaids and ushers in pairs. Guests do not leave until after the bridal party is gone.

On arriving at the house the guests are given an opportunity to congratulate the newly-weds before refreshments are served.

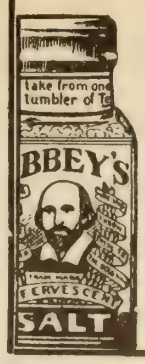
These are usually light, unless where guests have come a long distance to attend. Sandwiches, salads, cakes, coffee, lemonade, and ice cream, and, of course, wedding cake. If a more elaborate wedding breakfast is wanted, the first course may be either fruit prettily served or bouillon, according to the season. This is followed by a meat course, hot or cold, and this by a dessert such as mousse, charlotte or ice. Last of all coffee and bonbons

The bride must, at dessert, put the knife into the wedding cake which is then removed to be cut away from the table and served.

All expense of the wedding rests with the bride's family, except the carriage for groom and best man, carriage for the newly-weds to the station, fees to minister and flowers and gifts to the and her attendants.

After all this attention to the detail of wedding etiquette may we just turn for a moment to the romantic side of a little custom? It concerns the custom of placing the wedding ring on the third finger.

One explanation is that an old superstition connected the third finger with the heart by an artery. It may be that it is better explained by an old custom in England of setting the wedding ring on the tip of the thumb while the clergyman recited, "In the name of the Father," then the ring went to the index finger at "of the Son," then to the middle finger at "the Holy Ghost," and with the "Amen" it was placed on the third finger where the blessing was completed.



A bottle of prevention is better than a deranged stomach.

Abbey's Effer-vescent Salt

25c and 60c bottle.
Sold everywhere.

83

At a Rent of Two Dollars a Year

You can secure a splendid island lot in the heart of Muskoka. The Canadian Northern Ontario Railway has made this possible. The Company holds a number of lots on Bala Island, and as the leases are made out for ten years and are renewable this extremely low rental means practical ownership.

The Conditions

are remarkably easy, and the man who desires a cool, secluded spot to conserve his energies during the hot, close months of summer has but to agree that he will erect a cottage costing three hundred dollars or more upon the land. Such other details as there are take only a few minutes to arrange. The Canadian Northern Ontario desires to have as many people as possible take advantage of this offer. That explains the easy terms. The lots offering are large and have a beautiful location. Far from the dust and turmoil of the city the man who builds his home on one of these lots will enjoy the cool, health-laden breeze sweeping in from the lake. Bala Park is only a little more than three hours from Toronto, and there is a walk of but a few minutes from the nearest railway station.

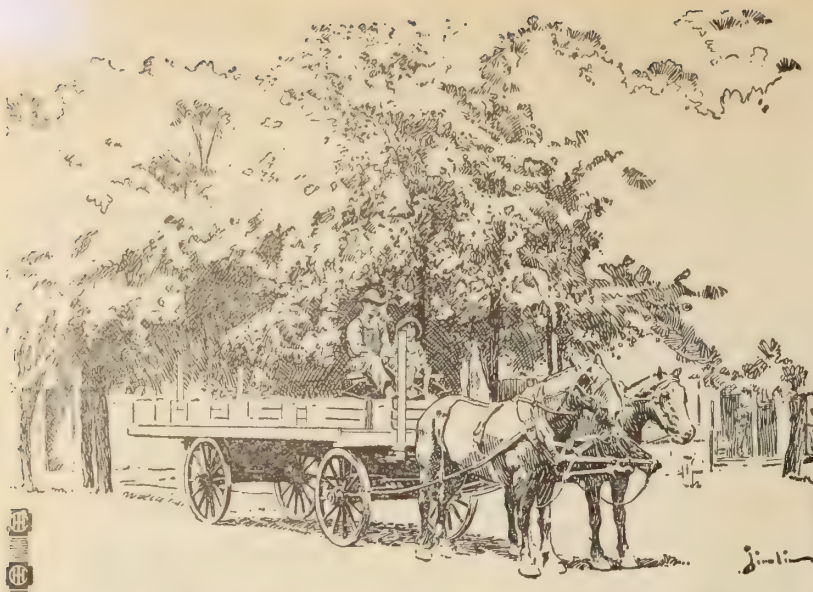
The Week-Ender

The Canadian Northern Ontario is arranging a splendid summer service. Solid vestibuled trains will be run at convenient hours, and there will be also the Lake Shore Express, which gives the best and fastest service through this engaging district. The summer rates are attractive and well within the reach of all. Especially is this true for the week-enders.

Lovers of the naturally beautiful are turning to Muskoka in increasing numbers each year. The opportunity given here may never be duplicated, and anyone desirous of securing these easy terms should apply quickly to

F. V. HIGGINBOTTOM
City Ticket Agent
52 King Street East

R. L. FAIRBAIRN
Asst. Gen. Pass. Agent
Canadian Northern Building
TORONTO



Every I H C Wagon is Inspected Four Times

HOW do you buy a wagon? Do you wait till you need one and then take the first that's offered you, or do you find out in advance which wagon will give you best service, and buy that one? Why not get as much as you can for your money? Buy the wagon that will stand up for the longest time and be easiest on your horses. That wagon is an I H C wagon. Here is why: Each I H C wagon is thoroughly inspected. I H C wagons—have just one standard—the highest. The lumber used is selected from large purchases. Every stick of this lumber is carefully inspected. Another inspection is made when the parts are ready for assembling. This inspection assures perfect shaping and ironing.

Petrolia Chatham

The third inspection, when the wagon is ready for the paint shop, covers all the points of superior construction for which I H C wagons are famous. Bearings are tested, every bolt and rivet is gone over, the pitch and gather of the wheels are verified. When this inspection is finished, the wagon is up to standard everywhere, good enough to be stamped with the I H C trademark.

The final inspection is made when the wagon is ready for delivery. Four inspections to make sure that you get everything you pay for.

All these inspections are for your benefit, so that any farmer who owns one can say with truth, "My I H C wagon is perfectly satisfactory." The I H C local agent will show you the wagon best suited to your needs. He will supply you with literature, or, we will send it if you write. Address—

EASTERN BRANCH HOUSES
INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER COMPANY OF AMERICA
(Incorporated)

Hamilton, Ont. London, Ont. Montreal, P. Q.
Ottawa, Ont. Quebec, P. Q. St. John, N. B.

I H C Service Bureau

The purpose of this Bureau is to furnish, free of charge to all, the best information obtainable on better farming. If you have any worthy questions concerning soils, crops, land drainage, irrigation, fertilizer, etc., make your inquiries specific and send them to I H C Service Bureau, Harvester Building, Chicago, U S A

'VELOX' MOTOR-WASHER

IF you have running water in your house, why make a drudge of yourself 52 wash days every year, when a VELOX Water Motor Washing Machine will wash your clothes as fast as two women can do the other necessary operations, such as blueing, rinsing, hanging out, etc. AND DO IT WELL.

The "VELOX" runs itself, needs no attention, goes right after the dirt and soiled spots and removes every trace without the slightest injury to the finest fabric. The Tub has the Cummer-Dowswell "Anti-Warp" ring inside; this means tight tubs. No other make has this feature.

Ask your dealer to demonstrate it. The Motor has single, direct acting shaft, no cogs or gears and is self contained.

Write for "Aunt Salina's Wash Day Philosophy". We send it free and it will help you on next wash day.

B-1-12

CUMMER-DOWSWELL, LIMITED
HAMILTON, CANADA

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

HOMESEEKERS' EXCURSIONS

MAY 30, AND JUNE 11 AND 25

and every second Tuesday until SEPT. 17 inclusive

WINNIPEG and RETURN, $34.00
EDMONTON and RETURN, $42.00

Proportionate rates to other points.
Return limit 60 days.

THROUGH TOURIST SLEEPING CARS to Edmonton via Saskatoon, also Winnipeg and Calgary via Main Line.

Ask nearest C.P.R. Agent for Homeseekers' Pamphlet

UPPER LAKES NAVIGATION

Steamers leave Port McNicoll Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays at 4 p.m. for SAULT STE. MARIE, PORT ARTHUR and FORT WILLIAM

The Steamer Manitoba, sailing from Port McNicoll Wednesdays will call at Owen Sound leaving that point 10.30 p.m.

STEAMSHIP EXPRESS

leaves Toronto 12.45 p.m. on sailing days making direct connection with Steamers at Port McNicoll.

TICKETS AND FULL INFORMATION FROM ANY C.P.R. AGENT

MY LADY'S GARDEN

Late Planting of Fruits

By A. C. BLAIR

THE date for planting fruit trees depends solely upon the conditions of the tree at the time it is planted. If it is truly dormant it can be planted at any time, and it will grow, even though the planting may not be until midsummer. If, on the other hand, its buds have appeared, or its leaves have started to expand, it will be less likely to live, even though it should be planted very early. In planting trees on which the leaves have appeared, it is best to cut these back severely, and remove the advancing foliage, giving the tree opportunity to push forth more dormant buds after their roots have started.

It is the custom for extensive nurserymen to keep trees in cold storage and often shipments are made late from such trees. It is safe to plant them, even though it may be late in the year. The earliest trees should be the cherry. This is less liable to live if planted late than any other. The peach, on the other hand, can be planted very late, and if cut back severely, will be in as good condition as though planted early.

The greatest objection to the late planting of trees is that they are liable to have started growth late in the season, and are injured by being transplanted after the growth is started. The greatest objection to the late planting of dormant trees is that the growing season is thus shortened, and unless the growth is stimulated by good fertilizers and cultivation, this may be very feeble, and the tree may not gain strength enough to make it resistant to the destructive effects of the winter. Trees planted very late are quite liable to be weakly and easily winter-killed. It is the feeble trees that are thus damaged. The greatest security against winter injury is a strong, vigorous growth of good thick twigs and healthy buds well matured before the severe weather comes. Early planting, proper fertilization and cultivation are the best means of securing this. The first winter is often the hardest winter on the young trees. The earlier in the spring all trees, bushes and shrubs are transplanted the better it will be to insure their starting right, and making a good growth during the summer.

Watering the Lawn

WATERING is an important factor in the succcssful treatment of lawns. Constant moisture is essential for vigor and color in the turf. When the proper conditions in soil and seed treatment have been complied with, there need be no failure with the lawn if it is situated where there is a good water supply. Lawns in the cities and in the country, if practicable, should have a generous provision for artificial waterings.

It is best to apply the water towards evening or in the early morning. Give a good soaking. It is useless merely to sprinkle the grass. The water must be applied in sufficient quantities to percolate into the soil down to and below the grass roots.

Weeding Lawns

By A. B. CUTTING

IN many lawns, weeds are persistent nuisances. No matter how careful has been the selection of seeds and fertilizers, weeds will make their appearance. Frequent mowings will destroy many young weeds, but too frequent cuttings in dry weather often weaken the grass and sometimes weeds get the upper hand.

In a newly made lawn it is necessary to keep a careful watch on the weeds. They should not be allowed to get a sufficient start to make them troublesome. Dandelions, narrow leaved plantains, docks and weeds of that class can scarcely be gotten rid of except by spudding, and unless this operation is performed when the weeds are young, it may not be satisfactory, especially in the case of dandelions. A spud may be purchased at a hardware store or from seedsmen. Run the instrument (which resembles a wide screw driver or chisel) downward alongside of the root to loosen the soil so that the root may be pulled out whole. Do not be content with simply cutting off the crown of the plant below the surface of the soil, but as deeply as possible. After using the spud, immediately use a pounder to fill up the holes that otherwise would afford lodgement for weed seeds that are blowing about freely. These spots may also be seeded with grass seed to advantage.

Dandelions may be treated with chemicals with good effect. A few drops of sulphuric acid (oil of vitriol) poured on the crown of each plant usually will kill them. Spraying is also advocated for killing young dandelion plants. A 20 per cent. solution of sulphate of iron is used. Dissolve two pounds of sulphate of iron in a gallon of water, stirring with a stick to hasten solution. Apply with a hand sprayer. Use one gallon of this solution to one square rod of greensward. A second application may be necessary. The grass will be blackened and appear killed but in a few days it will recover and grow with increased vigor. Old dandelion plants cannot be killed by spraying. On these, apply dry sulphate of iron to the heart of the old plant. If this is repeated once or twice, it will kill them. Where the lawn is large and the dandelions plentiful, either of the foregoing operations may require too much time and expense. In such cases, the only thing to do is to plough up the turf and make the lawn over again.

Weeds are more prevalent on thin lawns than on those that are thick and velvety. By improving the turf, by means of fertilizing and additional seeding to thicken it, most weeds will disappear. Keep the mower going as it will do much towards keeping down most weeds.

Save the Old Bulbs

HYACINTH, tulip and narcissus bulbs can be stored during the summer for fall planting. Your stock can be increased by proper care and the saving in expense is considerable.

Easy as it is to keep the hardy Dutch bulbs—that is tulips, hyacinths, and narcissus, and especially the two first named—from year to year, most amateurs saddle themselves with unnecessary expense by digging them up and throwing them away after they have done flowering, and then buying new ones to plant out the following October. If you want purely bedding effects, where every bulb should be of uniform size and quality and you are only dealing with small quantities, it will certinly be best to buy afresh each season, getting selected bulbs of first size. But for ordinary border planting you can keep them over from year to year and increase your stock by a very simple method.

The great secret of successful bulb culture is to leave them alone after flowering and let the foliage ripen fully. Do not be in a hurry to disturb them until the foliage has become distinctly yellowed and begins to shrivel. When the foliage shows these conditions, it is a sign that the bulb has ripened and growth has ceased for the season; it can now be lifted from the ground without suffering any damage. Indeed, by proper handling, it will be improved.

Some time, during the present month generally, it will be safe to lift tulips and hyacinth bulbs and spread them out in an airy, shaded place to dry. Do not place them in full sunshine, but ou' doors under the shade of trees or in the shelter of a building. Let them ripen or cure here. When the foliage is carefully withered, curing will be complete. They can then be stored away in boxes in a cool place, where there is plenty of fresh air and free circulation. Everything depends on keeping them properly now. In a damp, badly ventilated place they will usually rot. In an overheated, excessively dry place, such as a furnace room, they will be completely shriveled. Keep them in a normal temperature and leave them until the fall.

In September, when garden work outdoors has generally ceased, will be time to attend to the bulbs. They can then be cleaned. The old stems will be perfectly dry and will crumble to dust as the bulbs are rubbed through the fingers.

Clean them thoroughly and assort them into sizes, removing any little offsets, which may be treated separately by growing on for flowering size later. The cleaned, selected bulbs can be re-planted in exactly the same way as the new stock imported from Holland. The small offsets should be planted in rows and treated exactly like the larger bulbs, and in time they will attain flowering size. Narcissus bulbs are best left alone for three or four years, and then, when they are disturbed, should be lifted in August and replanted as soon as possible. They can be held out longer, but a great deal in vigor is gained by early planting.

Bulbs that are planted in the lawn can be lifted in exactly the same way for replanting, if it is thought that the foliage will become unsightly during the summer, or they may be allowed to remain where they are, provided the lawn is not cut over so that the foliage is removed before there are signs of ripening. It is perfectly practical, if the room is wanted earlier, to lift the bulbs soon after flowering, heeling them in lightly to ripen in a shaded place in the garden. The one principle in bulb-growing and the only thing to be remembered is that the bulb cannot produce flowers next year unless it is allowed to grow naturally this season and mature its full growth before any attempt is made to dry it off and store it.

Forced bulbs that have been taken out from pots or flats and put into the garden border after flowering can be depended upon to recover if left alone, and the second year from forcing can be handled in exactly the same way as the other bulbs.

For storing, the best arrangement is to have the bulbs in shallow boxes or flats about two inches deep, with plenty of ventilation at the bottom, the boxes themselves being piled one on top of the other, but separated by supporting pieces so that the air can circulate freely at all times. In sorting out the bulbs for re-planting, remember that the best bulbs are the heaviest in comparison to their size—not necessarily the largest. A healthy bulb can be recognized very quickly by the dry, clean, glowing appearance of the outer skin.

Nasturtiums Easy to Grow

THE two chief groups among nasturtiums are those in which the plants are of small, compact, bushy growth, and those which throw out long running branches. The dwarf or bush type, which is commonly known as the Tom Thumb, makes a neat, rounded bush about ten inches high with comparatively small leaves, and in the older varieties the flowers are relatively small; but in the newer introductions the flowers come much larger in size and with broader and more fully rounded petals, which, by overlapping at their outer edges, make a broad or bold-faced flower that is distinctly showier than the smaller and more open flower of the older types.

The dwarf type of nasturtium is most desirable for edging flower beds and garden walks, as it makes a close, neat row of low, rounded growth, relieved by the profusion of highly colored flowers. It is also useful when the space is very limited but comes bushy only in well-drained soil or in a raised bed in the full sunlight, for if planted in low, wet ground or in partial shade there will be a very dense growth of leaves and stalks which is apt to blight and rot off during wet weather.

The tall or running varieties are the most generally grown. For pot culture, hanging-baskets, vases, boxes on the porch or lawn, or for window boxes, they are by far the most satisfactory type. They are also best for planting along the fences, walls, etc., or for a long border where there is ample room for the branches to spread as they increase in growth. Also they are most desirable for growing in solid beds or masses, as the long shoots or runners interlace and mingle freely over the entire bed or border, and will not rot off in wet weather as the very compact bush plants do. In any case they must have plenty of light and air. If planted in a shady place they will make long, slender runners and very few flowers.

One of the best plans for growing the running nasturtiums in a small garden is to plant them in a long row like peas and provide brush or poultry-wire netting for their support. Treated in this way they will come into flower earlier and blossom more profusely than they will if left to run at will on the ground. If a narrow border or bed is dug along the bottom of a paling or light ornamental iron fence, the shoots will climb and twist through the fence, with very little assistance in starting the early shoots in the proper direction, and make a most pleasing and ornamental effect.

When planted in pots a slender stake should be provided and the shoots carefully trained or tied at intervals to this support, but for baskets, vases, boxes, etc., the runners should be allowed to hang over the edges and to grow at will as trailing vines. This effect is more readily obtained if the seeds are planted or the young plants set around the outer edges of the boxes or vases in which they are planted, using taller erect-growing plants, like geraniums, etc., for the middle portion.

Among the running nasturtiums, the ordinary type is the strongest grower, and has the largest leaves, while the newer varieties have the largest flowers. The Lobbianum type is more compact in growth, with shorter and thicker and much darker and richer colorings in both the foliage and flowers, but the flowers are not as large nor as widely expanded as in the older type.

In the new ivy-leaved type there is considerable variation in the foliage, some kinds having the leaves more distinctly lobed or serrated than others, but the shoots are always more slender and vine-like than in the common running nasturtiums, while the flowers are of open form, the slender petals standing well apart from each other, and are distinctly toothed or serrated at the outer edges.

The most distinct type among the running nasturtiums is the old Tropoeolum minus, which makes long, slender, vine-like runners with small, smoothly-rounded leaves which are thickly set with small, bright flowers. This type is not as well adapted for long rows or masses as the larger-flowered kinds, but is especially pretty and graceful for hanging-baskets and vases or for trailing over rock work and other broken surfaces.

Many ordinary flower gardeners will of course prefer to plant everything in separate varieties and colors, but to my mind the general effect of the mixtures of the newer large-flowered varieties as offered by seedsmen is more showy and pleasing than a bed or row of a single color. The regular mixtures as offered in the seed catalogues run largely to solid colors, but include also varieties having small spots of contrasting color at the base of the lower petals and delicate lines in the throat of the two upper petals, so that for the richest and most varied effect in colors I would recommend the choosing of the special mixtures such as the Hotspur Harlequin, which has the red-spurred flowers, French Chameleon, Caprice, and Coquette. These selections comprise colors ranging from pale primrose or cream to deep golden tints, but are more or less overlaid by marbled shadings of bright red, scarlet, and soft rosy tints. They are bright and showy throughout the summer, but when cool weather comes in the fall they become still more varied, as the brilliant markings then deepen in tint and cover a much larger portion of the petals. These fall shadings are beautiful beyond description, and have been the cause of despair among flower lovers who have sought to fix these grand autumn tints by saving the seed from some especially fine flower. Such selections result in a more diverse coloring, but the most gorgeous tints and markings can be had only when the nights become cool in the fall.

The planting of the seed is one of the simplest garden operations. Dig the soil early in the spring, making a fine, loose surface as you would for other flowers, then open a shallow trench or drill one to two inches deep and scatter the seed thinly along the bottom. Another and better plan for a small quantity of seed is to push the finger or a small stick into the soil about two inches deep and drop a single seed in each hole, making a separate hole where each plant is to grow. In either case cover the seed with fine soil, pressing it firmly on the seed so that it may come into close contact with all the corrugations that compose the shell or outer covering of the seed. This firming of the soil is necessary to insure good germination; otherwise the seed is liable to rot in the ground. If the young plants come up too quickly in the row or if it is desired to give them an early start in a special seed-bed, they can readily be transplanted to another bed or location when three to four inches high and when they show two to four true leaves. Any further thinning that may become necessary can be done at any time during the summer until the vines or runners become interlaced or tangled together.

Wear Guaranteed Hose
Send for Price List

YOU ought to wear hosiery that really WEARS. Write for the price list on HOLEPROOF HOSIERY —six pairs guaranteed to wear without holes, rips or darns for six months.

A MILLION PEOPLE are wearing Holeproof Hose because of the wonderful service and comfort they give. These hose are so made that they wear longer than any other hose and yet they are soft and flexible. They are made in the lightest weights if you want light weights. No hose were ever more comfortable. Wear them this summer and your feet will be cool, yet the hose will wear SIX MONTHS. That is guaranteed. Think what it means!

6 Pairs Wear 6 Months
Or NEW HOSE FREE!

That's what we do. If they wear out (one pair or all pairs) we give you new hose free. 6,650,000 pairs outlasted the guarantee last year. But we replace every pair that does wear out without any question or quibble.

Here's how we get the "wear" and the softness that have made "Holeproof" famous—

We use a yarn that costs an average of 70c a pound, while common yarn sells for 30c a pound. It is Egyptian and Sea Island cotton, 3-ply strands, the softest and strongest yarn that's produced.

We spend $55,000 a year for inspection—just to see that each pair is perfection, capable of the guarantee.

Then we have had 39 years of hose making experience. We know how to make hose wear, and how to make them stylish, too.

These are the original guaranteed hose—the whirlwind success—the most popular hose in existence. You ought to try them.

Holeproof Hosiery
Reg. U. S. Pat. Office, 1906
Carl Freschl
Look for this Trademark

Send for Trial Box!
Stop Darning! End Discomfort!

Men need not any longer wear sox with holes in them. Children may now always wear neat-looking stockings. WOMEN MAY SAVE ALL THE DARNING! Think of the darning you do now; then order. Or send for the "Holeproof" list of sizes, colors and grades.

Don't pay out good money for hose that wear out in a week. Get this Trial Box of "Holeproof" and learn how hosiery should wear—even the lightest weights. Send the coupon and $1.50 now while you think of it. ($2 if you want them for women or children.) Remit in any convenient way.

Holeproof Hosiery Co. of Canada Ltd.
204 Bond Street, London, Can.

Are Your Hose Insured?

(320)

FAMOUS
Holeproof Hosiery
FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN
TRIAL BOX ORDER COUPON

Holeproof Hosiery Co. of Canada, Ltd.
204 Bond Street, London, Can.

Gentlemen—I enclose $1.50 ($2 for women's or children's) for which send me one box of Holeproof Hose. Weight..... (medium or light?) Size.....Color (check the color on list below.) Any six colors in a box, but only one weight and one size.

Name.....
Street.....
City.....Province.....

List of Colors
For Men and Women—Black, Light Tan, Dark Tan, Pearl, Lavender, Navy Blue, Light Blue.
For Children—Black and tan only—medium weight only.

"Remember my face—you'll see me again."

First aid to the cook

The handy packet of Edwards' desiccated Soup is something the cook is always wanting, always ready when she needs it.

It solves the problem of good soup on busy days because it takes so little time to prepare. It helps her to make a tasty meal out of things that get "left over." It strengthens her own soups and suggests many a meal when she's wondering what to give.

Buy a packet of Edwards' Soup to-day.

EDWARDS' DESICCATED SOUP
5c. per packet.

Edwards' desiccated Soup is made in three varieties—Brown, Tomato, White. The Brown variety is a thick nourishing soup, prepared from best beef and fresh vegetables. The other two are purely vegetable soups.

Edwards' desiccated Soup is made in Ireland from specially selected beef and from the finest vegetables that Irish soil can produce.

1205 S H.B.

RENEWING SUBSCRIBERS MISS COPIES

Renew expiring subscriptions early to be sure of getting the next copies. April copies were all gone by April 8th, and many renewing subscribers missed this number. No copies are sent after subscription expires.

CIRCULATION DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL
New Address 26-28 Adelaide Street West, Toronto

HOME MADE SOUPS

Are always acceptable, but seldom procurable. Therefore Soups already prepared are very handy to have in the pantry, and more especially when the Soups are the finest and most genuine ever offered to the public.

Clark's Soups in Pint Containers are What You Should Insist on Getting From Your Grocer

Clark's Soups are prepared with as much care as in the most particular home. All ingredients are selected, and the purity of Clark's Soups is absolutely guaranteed.

Just Try a Can or Two
Many kinds—Only one Quality

W. Clark - Montreal

Manufacturer of the CELEBRATED PORK and BEANS

The Greatest Bargain

That We Ever Secured

WE OFFER TO YOU

Alligator Skin Pocket Book and Card Case

Genuine Alligator of best quality, full leather lined, regularly costing $3.00.

We have secured these at a good price and we give them free to those who will secure a club order for us at this reduced club price.

THE LOW PRICE. Our club offer is six yearly subscriptions to the Journal for $4.50. That is only 75c. each if six or more club together. A subscriber can order two or three years ahead at this rate.

OUR OFFER TO YOU. If you will get your friends to give you six yearly subscriptions at this splendid club rate, we will send you this fine Pocket Book, free, postpaid.

EASY TO SECURE. Just tell your friends when calling on them how much you like the Journal, of the very low club rate at which they can subscribe now. Tell them of its Canadianism, appeal to their loyalty.

Sample Copies Free

Send for some sample copies to show your friends and order blanks and addressed envelopes.

Cut Glass Shakers

This is another fine club offer—a pair of beautifully cut Salt and Pepper Shakers with Sterling Silver Tops. Given for

6 Yearly Subscriptions at $4.50

Fountain Pens

A well known pen with a 14 karat solid gold point, guaranteed for years of service. Given for

5 Yearly Subscriptions at $3.75

Pearl or silver handled butter knife, limoges olive dish, sterling silver thimble.

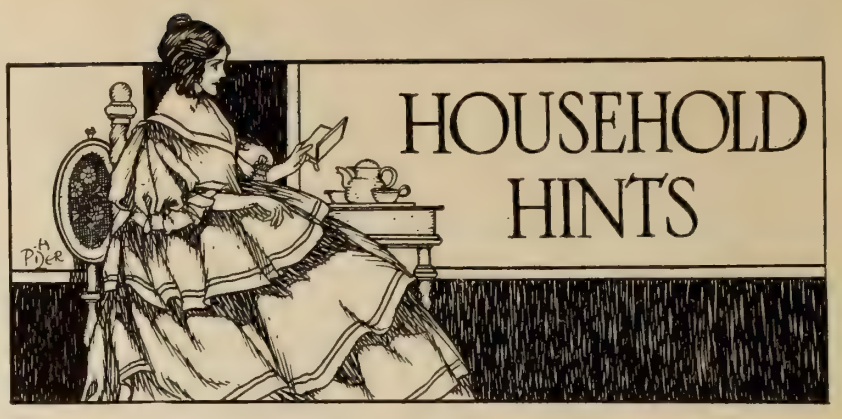
For 5 Yearly Subscriptions at $3.75

German Silver Coin Purse

This is a purse that is very popular now. It is 4 inches in width, with heavy chased frame, white kid lined, given for

8 Yearly Subscriptions at $6.00

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL



Choice of Linen

LINEN connoisseurs sometimes maintain that the most beautiful and artistic linen is that which has no pattern to distract one's attention from the evenness of the texture and its shining surface. It is true that a design is often used to cover the defects in the weaving of inferior grades.

Linen has one limitation. It takes color readily, but the leaky fibre is apt to lose some of the color under the influence or sunshine or moisture or in the laundry. Authorities say that there is no sure process for fixing color in linen. Therefore, highly colored linens are an uncertain investment. A great deal depends upon the maner of laundering. Washed quickly, in water not too hot, quickly dried, guarded from strong light, colored linens are often fairly satisfactory. They are bound to fade in time.

But for the usual household purposes, for the bed-room and dining-room, nothing else is as beautiful as pure white. It is always wiser to stick to white or to the varying ecru tones of the unbleached linens. They will bleach with use.

Hanging Curtains

MAKE a hem along the top of your curtains, to about three-quarters of an inch wide.

Make some loops, of from two to three inches in length, with some half-inch tape.

Then sew the loops to the top of the curtain at equal distances apart, and you will be able to put the curtain-rod through the loops without having the trouble of threading it through the hem. The curtains will also hang nicely, and there will be no danger of tearing them.

Cleaning Pointers

FIRST wash a tarnished chain well in cold water and soap, and then polish in soft tisue paper. You will be surprised at the result.

For inside gas ovens, pots, pans, and all kitchen utensils a handful of common salt rubed on with a damp cloth will remove any dirt or grease, no matter of how long standing.

Tea is a useful cleanser for woodwork, which it also helps to varnish. Tea leaves are a valuable purifier for stained decanters or vases, especially if boiling water is poured upon them and left to cool in the articles.

The most expeditious way of cleaning windows is by using coal oil. Well moisten a cloth with oil, and clean as many as are required. When finished, come back to the first one, and polish with a soft, dry cloth. This method gives the windows a beautiful polish.

To improve oilcloth dissolve a pound of blue in a quart of water over a fire, then rub it lightly over the oilcloth with a piece of flannel, and leave it to dry. If possible, do this in the evening so that the oilcloth may not be walked on until morning This treatment adds to the durability of the oilcloth, besides greatly improving its appearance.

First remove all grease and dirt from leather chairs by washing with warm suds; then let them dry. To renovate the worn, discolored parts, melt five cents worth of Bismarck brown in four fluid ounces of petroleum, and apply with a camel's hair brush to the places. Allow this to dry, and coat with clear liquid gum. Finally apply furniture polish and rub with a woolen cloth.

A capital contrivance for keeping knives, forks, and spoons in is a pocket tacked on the pantry door. Make this of American cloth, and line it with green baize, stitching small divisions to fit each article. The baize will absorb all moisture that may be left on the spoons or knives, and keep them in much beter condition than putting them in a basket or drawer, and they are always handy.

An excellent way to keep carpets in good condition is to go over them once every week with a broom dipped in hot water, to which a little turpentine has been aded. This treatment not only prevents moths, but freshens up the color of a faded carpet marvellously. Another advantage is that the dust is prevented from flying all over the house. If you try it, you will be astonished to see how much dirt and dust there is in a pail of water at the end of the sweeping.

Bits of Advise

During spring cleaning every bedstead should be wiped over with turpentine.

Iron kitchen spoons should be scoured after washing with a mixture of salt and sand.

Good eggs have dull shells. Remember this when choosing them for the table.

When beating carpets first lay them face downwards on the grass, then turn and beat the other side.

When marble is spotted sprinkle borax moistened with water, leave for a little time, and then wash with soap and water.

A useful gardening apron may be made out of the skirt of a waterproof cloak. This will be most useful when watering the garden

Varnish stains on the hands are quickly removed by rubbing with methylated spirit. Apply this before washing with soap.

Hair and wire sieves must be thoroughly well scrubbed after use, and should then be well hung in the air for several hours to sweeten.

Delicate cretonne and other cotton materials may be washed with impunity in a lather of Castile soap and water.

When cake making, collect all materials, weigh the quantities, grease the tin, and see that the oven is right before mixing the ingredients.

Where oil lamps are used, keep a box of dry sand in a prominent place. Should a lamp be overturned, some sand will soon extinguish the flames.

A novel pen wiper is a raw potato. When ink has corroded on a pen, stick it two or three times in a raw potato, and the nib will be as good as new.

Common yellow soap should always be bought in large quantities and kept in a warm, dry place. If it is hard before being used, it will last much longer.

Rugs, either Persian or Indian, will wear much longer if they are faced at either end with a piece of webbing. When a rug becomes worn it will be better to line it right through with Hessian, but that is not necessary at first.

Hygienic washing.—Into a four quart bottle put four ounces of sea-salt, one tablespoonful of camphor, and one of ammonia. Fill the bottle with hot water and let it stand for twenty-four hours before using. Put one teaspoonful into a basin of water. This is a wonderful cleanser of the skin.

Leghorn hats may be cleaned with sulphur and the juice of a lemon. Stir a teaspoonful of sulphur into the juice of a lemon. Brush the mixture well into the hat with a toothbrush. Hold under the tap for a minute to get rid of the sulphur, then dry in an airy place.

Buy It Pure

WHY buy mixtures known as alum baking powder when you can just as well, and at no more expense, get Magic Baking Powder? The ingredients are plainly printed on each package. See if this is on the others. All grocers are authorized to guarantee that Magic" does not contain alum.

CULINARY CONCEITS

MOBILE SPICE CAKE

One cupful of butter, two cupfuls of pulverized sugar, three cupfuls of flour sifted three times with two teaspoonfuls of yeast-powder, four eggs, one-quarter teaspoonful each allspice and cloves, one teaspoonful vanilla. Cream the butter and sugar, beat in one egg at a time, put in spices, then milk and flour and yeast-powder. Bake in loaf or in layers. Put together with a boiled icing made as follows: Two cupfuls of sugar and one cupful of water. Boil until it feathers. Have two eggs beaten stiff. If a little of the syrup is put into the eggs before they are well beaten, it will keep the icing from granulating.

BREAK-FAST ROLLS

Two quarts sifted flour, one quart milk, two tablespoons butter or lard, one tablespoonful sugar, one teaspoonful salt and cake compressed yeast. Scald the milk in a double boiler and cook it until it is lukewarm; add the butter, sugar, salt and yeast, dissolved in a little lukewarm water, to the milk; then stir the mixture into the flour and make into a dough. Knead and let rise over night in a cool place. Then cut off pieces and shape into rolls the desired size by rolling between the hands, but do not knead them. Set in a warm place to raise quickly.

SAVORY RICE AND TOMA-TOES

One cupful of cooked rice, 6 large tomatoes, 2 sweet peppers, 2 tablespoonfuls of butter, seasoning of salt, sugar and pepper. Peel and slice the tomatoes and chop the peppers fine. Butter a fireproof baking dish, put in a layer of the tomatoes, cover with rice and chopped peppers, and season with salt, sugar and pepper. Add layers of tomatoes, rice, chopped peppers and seasoning until the dish is full, having a layer of tomatoes on the top. Dot with the butter. Bake covered for three-quarters of an hour and uncovered for a quarter of an hour.

RHUBARB AND SAGO MOULD

Wash 3 ounces of sago, wipe and cut up one pound of rhubarb into small pieces, and put all into a saucepan with half a pint of water, 6 ounces of sugar, the juice of half a lemon, and a strip of lemon peel. Boil slowly for half an hour, take out the lemon peel, color a nice pink with a few drops of cochineal, put into a wet mould, leave to get cold. Then turn out and serve with custard sauce.

STRAW-BERRY FRUIT PUREE

Rub the berries through a sieve to make one cupful of the fruit. Blend three tablespoonfuls of cornstarch with two cupfuls of milk; boil and remove from the fire, add the yolks of two eggs and three tablespoonfuls of sugar. Cool, add the fruit and mix well; then add one teaspoonful of lemon juice and serve in bouillon-cups.

ASPARA-GUS A LA MOUSSE-LAINE

Asparagus a la Mousselaine is one of the many good vegetable dishes that may be served in individual casserole-dishes. Re-heat canned asparagus, and cut stalks of correct length to fit casserole. Arrange five stalks in each dish, and pour over the following sauce: beat the yolks of three eggs until thick and lemon-colored, and add one-half cupful of heavy cream. Cook over hot water, stirring constantly until mixture thickens. Add one-fourth cupful of butter, one-half tablespoonful of lemon-juice, and salt and pepper to taste. Serve at once.

DRESDEN SAND-WICHES

This emergency dessert may be cooked on the table in a chafing-dish. Cut stale bread in one-third inch slices: there should be six. Remove crusts, and cut in halves crosswise. Beat three eggs slightly, and add two tablespoonfuls of sugar, one-half teaspoonful of salt, and one cupful of milk. Strain into a shallow dish, and soak bread in mixture until soft. Cook on hot, well-buttered iron frying-pan or blazer; brown on one side, turn and brown other side. Spread one-half of the pieces with raspberry jam, and cover with remaining pieces. Serve with or without whipped cream, sweetened and flavored with vanilla, or serve with a thin corn-starch pudding sauce flavored with vanilla.

EGG DAINTIES

Boil 6 eggs twenty minutes. After removing from shells, slice a thin piece from the ends of each, so that the eggs will stand upright; then cut in halves, remove the yolks, and arrange around the edge of a platter. Cook one-third cupful of soft bread crumbs in one-third cupful of milk until a smooth paste. Add 1 cupful of finely minced ham or chicken and 1 slightly beaten egg. Season with salt and pepper, and when cool enough to handle, form into balls the size of the original yolk, and set one in each half egg. Heat 1 cupful of milk and 1 tablespoonful of butter, thickened with 1 tablespoonful of flour. Salt to taste, and turn into centre of platter. Rub yolks of eggs through sieve over all. Set in oven until eggs are hot, and serve at once.

COTTAGE PUDDING, STRAW-BERRY SAUCE

In strawberry season bake cottage pudding in an angel cake pan. Remove from pan to serving dish, fill centre with whipped cream, sweetened and flavored with vanilla, and pour around a strawberry sauce, for which cut strawberries in halves or quarters into an earthen bowl and set on back of range. Sprinkle with granulated sugar (the quantity depending on the sweetness of the fruit) and mash slightly. Keep warm until serving time. Strawberry sauce is always a delicious accompaniment to vanilla or orange ice cream.

MARSH-MALLOW ICING

Two cups granulated sugar, whites of 4 eggs, 1 teaspoon vanilla, 2-3 cup water, ½ pound marshmallows.

Boil sugar and water to 240 degrees or the hair stage. Pour in a fine stream on the eggs beaten dry, beating constantly meanwhile. Beat frequently till cool (not cold). Add the marshmallows, cut in fourths.

If the frosting is too warm when the marshmallows are added they will melt and ruin the frosting. This frosting should be thick and creamy and pile upon the cake rather than run off. This recipe will frost a large cake made in a dripping pan.

"MOTHER"

NO book in recent years has appealed to the reading public like "Mother." Edition after edition has been printed to supply the demand, and quickly exhausted.

It is of a girl, who from perfect faith and adoration of her mother gradually learns from her society associates the materialistic dread of children in the family. But finally love wins her back to the true vision.

Our Free Offer

We hope that every subscriber to the Journal may read this remarkable story, so simple, yet so charming. We will send it to you free for

2 Subscriptions to the Journal for $2.00 and 10 cents to cover postage

Your renewal for a year or two years may be used.

CANADA MONTHLY

(FORMERLY CANADA WEST)

"Canada's Leading National Monthly Magazine"

"CANADA MONTHLY" the livest, most entertaining, most thoroughly Canadian of the magazines in Canada.

"CANADA MONTHLY" regularly contains stories by the most sought-after and popular authors now writing—such writers, for instance, as Robt. Chambers, Arthur Stringer, Emerson Hough, Edwin Balmer and others. These are among the leading masters of fiction whose work is eagerly bought by the biggest magazines of Canada.

"CANADA MONTHLY'S" fiction comes from the same pens that popularize the Cosmopolitan, Saturday Evening Post, and the great English magazines. And with fiction of this high type, you get in "CANADA MONTHLY" articles respecting Canada and Canadian affairs, exact in matters of fact, illuminating in their treatment of Canada's progress and inspiring in their patriotism.

"CANADA MONTHLY" is the standard magazine of Canada, comparable to the best of the American standard magazines, both in contents and appearance. Read it. Be one of the thousands of Canadians who each month welcome it with pleasure, because it is wholesomely Canadian, while supplying at the same time the best stories, poetry and art work of the foremost living illustrators and writers.

"CANADA MONTHLY" will be sent to you for the balance of the year (July to December inclusive) on receipt of fifty cents.

SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER

CANADA MONTHLY

15 Cents the copy TORONTO, ONT $1.50 per year

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY SYSTEM

The Great Double-Track Highway Between the East and West

SOLID VESTIBULED TRAINS are operated daily between Montreal, Toronto, and Chicago, carrying the finest equipment, including Pullman Sleepers, Parlor, Library, Cafe Cars, Dining Cars and Modern Coaches.

1000 Miles of Double Track Line
Palatial Pullman Sleepers
Courteous Employees
Smooth Roadbed and Excellent Train Service

Full information from A. E. DUFF, Union Station, Toronto, Ont.; J. QUINLAN, Bonaventure Station, Montreal, Que.; W. E. DAVIS, Passenger Traffic Manager, Montreal; G. T. BELL, Assistant Passenger Traffic Manager, Montreal; H. G. ELLIOTT, eGneral Passenger Agent, Montreal.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

BUT THATS ANOTHER STORY

Short and Sweet

SENATOR SPOONER of Wisconsin says the best speech of introduction he ever heard was delivered by the German Mayor of a small town in Wisconsin, where Spooner had been engaged to speak. The Mayor said:

"Ladies and shentlemens, I haf been asked to introdoose you to the Honorable Senator Spooner, who vill make to you a speech, yes. I haf now done so; he vill now do so."—Everybody's.

Not the Rosary

The socks I darn for thee, dear heart,
Mean quite a pile of work to me;
I count them over, every one apart,
Thy hosiery, thy hosiery.

Each sock a mate; two mates a pair,
To clothe thy feet in storm and cold;
I count each sock unto the end, and find
I've skipped a hole.

Oh, carelessness, this thy reproof,
See how it looms across my sole.
I grind my teeth, and then in very truth
I darn that hole, sweetheart, I darn that hole!

The Village Choir

Half a bar, half a bar,
Half a bar onward;
Into an awful ditch,
Choir and precentor hitch,
Into a mess of pitch,
They led the Old Hundred.
Trebles to right of them,
Tenors to left of them,
Bellowed and thundered.
Oh, that precentor's look,
When the sopranos took
Their own time and hook
From the Old Hundred.

Screeched all the trebles here,
Bogled the tenors there,
Raising a parson's hair
While his mind wandered.
Theirs not to reason why
This psalm was pitched too high;
Theirs but to gasp and cry
Out the Old Hundred.
Trebles to right of them,
Tenors to left of them,
Basses in front of them,
Bellowed and thundered.
Stormed they with shout and yell
Not wise they sang nor well
Drowning the sexton's bell
While the church wondered.

Dire the precentor's glare
Flashed his pitchfork in air
Sounding fresh keys to bear
Out the Old Hundred.
Swiftly he turned his back,
Reached he his hat from rack,
Then from the screaming pack,
Himself he sundered.
Tenors to right of him,
Trebles to left of him,
Discords behind
Bellowed and thundered.
Oh, the wild howls they wrought!
Right to the end they fought
Some tuné they sang, but not,
Not the Old Hundred.

—Anonymous.

Not What He Expected

IT was the day after Christmas, and the hard-working postman plowed his way through snow and a cold wind, a sack of unusual size on his back. He ascended the spacious steps of a west-end residence, and in answer to his ring a man-servant in rich livery appeared. "Wait a moment, please," said the servant, as he took the letters. "The mistress wishes to speak to you." The postman's eye brightened. It was the holiday season. Now, no doubt, in recognition of his regular and faithful-- "I shall be glad," he said politely, "to await your mistress' pleasure." In a few moments the lady appeared. "Are you," she asked, "our regular postman?" "Yes, madam," he answered, bowing. "Do you come in the morning?" "Yes, madam." "And in the afternoon and evening?" Again he assented, smiling eagerly. Then the lady said: "Well, was it you who broke our bell?"

Going East

THIS, says a United States paper, has been found on the wall of a deserted shanty in the heart of Dakota:

"Fore miles frum a naber; sixteen miles frum a post offis; twenty-five miles frum a railroad; a hundred and atey from timber; half a mile frum watter. Heaven bless our home. We're going East to get a fresh start."—Tit-Bits.

No Name for a Christian

THE christening party consisted of the proud father, the baby—a girl—the grandfather and all the rest of the folks. The grandfather stood nearest to the priest during the ceremony.

"What d'ye think av that?" asked the priest of the grandfather at the appropriate moment.

"I dunno," the grandfather replied. And he turned to the father and whispered hoarsely: "What's its name?"

"Hazel," repeated the father.

"What?" asked the grandfather.

"Hazel," repeated the father.

The grandfather threw up his hands in disgust.

"What d'ye think av that?" asked the priest. "With the calendar av the saints full av gur-rl names—an' him namin' his after a nut!"

Food With Frills

A WOMAN instructor at Wellesley College, who presides over one of the dining tables at which sit a dozen students, says that one day some curly lettuce was brought on.

A freshman looked at it, then exclaimed:

"How clever of the cook to crimp it that way! I wonder how she does it?"

Aggravating Submission

TOMMY: "One of the boys says I look like you."

Tommy's Papa: "And what did you say?"

Tommy: "I couldn't say anything—he's a good bit bigger than me."

She Left Her Feet Behind

A GOOD old Scotch minister, calling unexpectedly on a widow who lives in a cottage on the outskirts of the village, surprised her in the midst of washing a lot of clothes. She hurriedly hid behind a clotheshorse and told her little boy to say that she was out.

The visitor knocked at the door. "Well, Jamie," he said, "and where is your mother?"

"My mother's not in; she's down street on a message," promptly replied the lad.

"Indeed", replied the minister, with a glance at the bottom of the screen. "Well, tell her I called; and say that the next time she goes down to the village she should take her feet with her."

Couldn't Help It

A MAN traveling on a through express left his chair in the crowded dining car just after he had ordered his luncheon. He went to get something he had forgotten in the Pullman.

When he returned, in spite of the fact that he had left a magazine on the chair in the diner, he found a handsomely dressed woman in his place. He protested with all the politeness he could muster, but the woman turned on him with flashing eyes.

"Sir," she remarked haughtily, "do you know that I am one of the directors' wives?"

"My dear madam," he responded, "if you were the director's only wife I should still ask for my chair."

Poor Papa

THE teacher had the letters c-a--t on the blackboard and was trying to teach little Pansy Peavish to pronounce the word, but Pansy couldn't come it. "Think," said the teacher. "What is it that has some whiskers and comes up on the porch late at night when it is cold and begs to come into the house?"

"Oh, I know!" exclaimed little Pansy, a great light dawning; "it's papa!"

Eve's Apple

HOW many apples were eaten by Adam and Eve? We know that Eve 81, and that Adam 812, total 893. But Adam 8,142 please his wife, and Eve 81242 please Adam, total 89,384. Then again Eve 81424ofy herself, and Adam also 812424ofy himself, total, 8,938,480.—Fun.

Frightened Him

LESPES, the French journalist, known as "Timothee Trimm," was once disagreeably intruded on by a creditor, who announced his intention of not departing until he was paid. The creditor planted himself on a chair, and Lespes beheld him, with consternation, draw bread and cheese from his pockets, as though to fortify himself against events. Several hours glided by; Lespes had resumed his writing and finished an article. The creditor showed no signs of moving.

Suddenly Lespes rose, and with bits of newspaper began carefully blocking all the apertures through which air could come into the room. He then made preparations for lighting a charcoal fire; but before applying the match, pasted on the wall, just opposite the creditor's eyes, a paper thus laconically worded: "Take notice that we died of our own will."

"What are you doing?" exclaimed the créditor, uneasily.

"Your society would render life intolerable, so we are going to commit suicide together," answered Timothee, tranquilly.

It is needless to say that the creditor decamped.—The Argonaut.

Making it Right

SHE raised her head from his shoulder for a moment.

"Do you believe that exercise and lotions and toilet preparations will improve a woman's looks?" she asked.

He pressed her blonde curls back upon his chest. "They couldn't improve the looks of some women," he said.

"Whose?" she asked.

"Well, yours and Violet Cochrane's, for instance," he replied, thoughtlessly.

"I don't understand you," she said, raising her head for the second time, and chilling him with a look. "We are not at all alike."

"I mean," he replied, turning her head for the second time and thinking quickly, "that your looks couldn't be improved, because they are perfect as they are, and that hers couldn't be improved, because no amount of work could make her pretty."

And the firelight flickered knowingly as she sighed a great sigh of contentment and relief while he drew a deep breath.

Bargain Hunter's Dream of Heaven

When the big, dark store is empty,
And the counters are shrouded in lawn;
When the oldest clerk has departed,
And the youngest floor-walker gone,
We shall rest, and faith, we shall need it,
Recline for a jiffy or two,
Till the lure of the bargain counter
Shall drag us to work anew.

But our forty winks shall be dreamful;
We shall shiver the still night air
With the notes of a jubilate,
For gloves sell at sixty a pair.
We shall read in our dreamland paper
Real lace can be had for a song,
We shall rise before daybreak, and breakfast
To be ready to hurry along.

For those who are early are happy,
They may struggle and call for their size,
But if they look sharp and keep busy
They may yet come away with the prize.
And they never will fuss about money,
But just for the joy of the game,
They will wait at the door and then scramble
With a mob which is doing the same.

And then they'll come home, fagged but joyful,
They shall sit in their rocking-chair
And survey the fruit of their labors
With glad eyes but tumbled hair;
They are six-dollar shoes at four-forty;
They may pinch, but who cares for that?
To save one-sixty it's worth it,
That much more for a new spring hat.

There are handkerchiefs, three for a quarter,
And boot laces six for ten,
And a chance like that collar for fifty
Will never be heard of again.
And they sit in their comfy rockers
Happy at heart, though faint,
For they've bought the thing as it isn't
At the price of things as they ain't

—The Globe.

A Dubious Compliment

WILLIAM LAWRENCE, bishop of Massachusetts, delights in telling this story:

"Once when there was a vacancy in the Massachusetts bishopric, Phillips Brooks was the most likely candidate. I was walking with President Eliot one day, and in the course of the conversation, I said to him, 'Do you think Brooks will be elected?'

"'Well, no,' said Dr. Eliot, 'a second or third-rate man would do as well.'

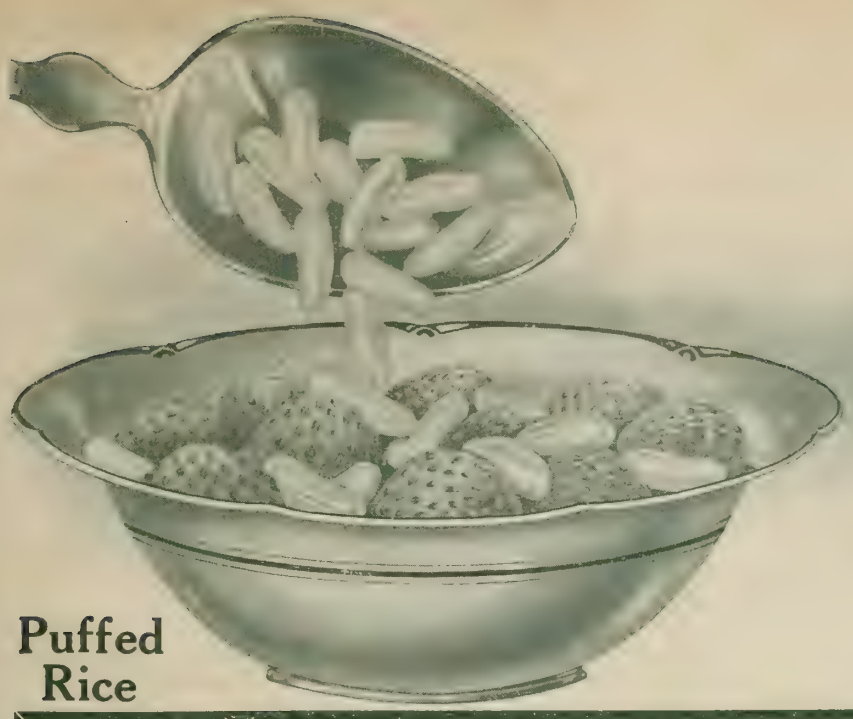
"Phillips Brooks was elected, and a short time afterward Dr. Eliot and I were walking again.

"'Glad Brooks was elected, aren't you?' I asked.

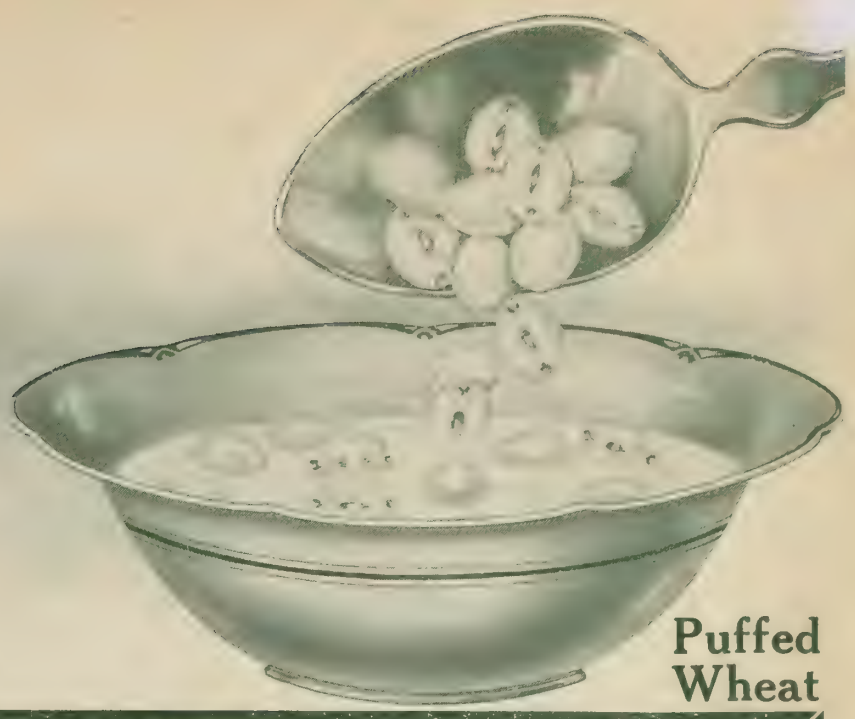
"'I suppose so,' returned Dr. Eliot, 'but, to tell the truth, William, you were my man.'"

One Little Thing

KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN tells of a hard-working farmer's wife, who was asked if she believed in woman's suffrage, and would like to vote. "No, I certainly do not," she exclaimed with a vigorous movement of the churn dasher. "I say, if there is any one little thing that the men folks can do alone, for goodness sake let 'em do it."



Puffed Rice



Puffed Wheat

Mornings

Serve With Berries

In June—the strawberry month—try mixing these Puffed Grains with berries.

These honeycombed grains taste like toasted nuts, and form a delightful blend.

Don't serve them merely with sugar and cream, as you do the year around.

Other Summer Uses

In the finest restaurants Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are used to garnish ice cream.

They are used like nut meats in frosting cake.

They are ideal crisps for serving in soup.

Girls use them in candy making. Boys eat them like peanuts when at play.

From morning till midnight—in a dozen ways—users find uses for Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice.

Shot from Guns

Blasted by Steam Explosion

These curious foods are due to a curious process.

We select perfect grains, then seal them up in mammoth bronze-steel guns.

The guns are revolved for sixty minutes in a heat of 550 degrees. That's where the grains get the nut-like taste.

The moisture in the grain turns to steam in that heat, and creates a tremendous pressure.

Then the guns are unsealed and the steam explodes. The millions of granules are literally blasted to pieces.

The grains are puffed to eight times normal size. Yet the coats are unbroken. The kernels are shaped as they grew.

Evenings

Serve With Milk

These grains are crisper than crackers—four times as porous as bread.

Each grain consists of a myriad cells, each bounded by thin, toasted walls.

Airy, flaky, whole-grain wafers—wonderful morsels to serve in milk.

Prof. Anderson's

Delightful, Scientific Foods

One mustn't forget that Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are not mere cereal dainties.

They have another advantage over all other cereals. They are fully twice as digestible as wheat or rice ever was made before.

The granules are blasted to pieces, so digestion can instantly act. It begins before the grains reach the stomach.

That is why these foods are prescribed by physicians when the stomach can't stand a tax.

That's why one may eat them at any hour—between meals or at bedtime—without ill result.

That is why brain workers eat them for luncheons.

Prof. Anderson invented this process to make whole grains wholly digestible, as never was done before. Their deliciousness was merely an accident.

1,000,000 Dishes Daily

Among all the cereal foods ever invented nothing compares with Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice.

Never were cereals so nut-like—never so melting, so flaky, yet crisp.

Countless users know this. And they consume a million dishes daily.

We invite you to join them—now on the verge of summer. For this is the acme of hot weather food.

Morning, noon and night—between meals and bedtime—the folks in your home will want Puffed Wheat and Rice.

Tell your grocer to get some now.

Puffed Rice . 15c Except in Extreme West

Puffed Wheat . 10c Except in Extreme West

The Quaker Oats Company

Sole Makers — Peterborough

(351)

COLGATE'S
TALC POWDER

after baby's bath
for a delicate perfume for comfortable summer dressing to keep the collar from wilting on dress shields on hands and face after washing after exercise
after the shave
for chapped hands
ECLAT
TALC POWDER
CASHMERE BOUQUET
TALC POWDER
COLGATE'S MONAD
DACTYLIS
TALC POWDER
COLGATE & CO.
If you can think of other talc uses not pictured here with us your suggestions and we will send you a trial sift of Cashmere Bouquet Talc with our compliments.

"WHAT'S talc powder used for, anyway?" said the artist when he took our commission for the design of this advertisement.

Thinking others might be as ignorant as he, we said: "Ask your family and friends how they use talc." Three days later he brought his sketch book half full of hasty sketches. Here are ten just as he made them.

¶ The fact that he readily found so many uses—some possibly new to you—shows how necessary it is to have a good talc in every home. But—

All Talcums Are Not Alike

Colgate's is different from ordinary talcums in its beneficial amount of boric acid, that mild yet efficient antiseptic, and its other sanative ingredients. It is the real boric powder—safest and best for young and old.

Soothing and absorbent, it gently cools and dries the skin and makes dressing comfortable. For nursery use, as well as after the bath and for the general toilet, Colgate's Talc excels.

Widest Choice of Perfumes

Eclat (new)	Cashmere Bouquet	Violet
Dactylis	Monad Violet (new)	and Unscented

Colgate's Talc is found wherever toilet articles are sold. If you wish a dainty trial box, send us 4 cents in postage, mentioning perfume desired.

COLGATE & CO.

Dept. H.J. Coristine Building Montreal

Makers of Cashmere Bouquet Toilet Soap — luxurious, lasting, refined

W. G. M. Shepherd, Montreal, SOLE AGENT FOR CANADA